

I have worn contact lenses for almost 25 years and have seen the industry develop them into an easy and affordable way to correct vision. Of course I believe we need trained eye doctors to prescribe the proper lenses, but it must be possible to buy them from an affordable, reliable, convenient source. Friends in Europe can fill their prescriptions in any drugstore. I typically buy mine online from a major retailer and have always had great success with them. My doctor would like me to buy them at the large chain eyeglass center she works for, but why should I pay a premium for the same lenses? Should I buy a car from my mechanic at a 20% markup? A prescription is a prescription wherever it is filled. I can always get my eyeglass prescription, so I must always be able to have my contact lens prescription. This should always be my right. I would like you to continue to safeguard that right. Thank you, Cheryl Huff,
