DEFENDANTS' BUSINESS PRACTICES

Overview

23. Defendants operate a telemarketing scheme that deceives consumers into spending up to thousands of dollars for unnecessary computer security or technical support services (collectively, "technical support services"). Since at least 2013, Defendants have bilked millions of dollars from consumers throughout the United States. To achieve this, Defendants trick consumers into calling their telemarketing boiler rooms by making consumers believe that they are part of or affiliated with well-known U.S. technology companies, such as Microsoft, Google, Apple, or Dell. Once they get consumers on the telephone, Defendants scare consumers into believing that their computers are infected with viruses, spyware, or other malware, are being hacked, or are otherwise compromised. Then, Defendants peddle their technical support services and charge consumers up to thousands of dollars.

Defendants Lure Consumers to Purchase Their Services

- 24. Since at least 2013, Defendants have placed internet advertisements ("internet ads") that appear as search results generated by internet search engines, such as Google. When consumers conduct web searches concerning their technology issues using one of these search engines, Defendants' internet ads have appeared. In a number of instances, consumers dialed the telephone number displayed in the internet ads and were connected to Defendants' telemarketers.
- 25. Defendants have also used popup warning messages ("popups") that appear on consumers' computer screens when consumers are browsing the internet. The popups advise consumers that there is a problem with their computers, such as a virus, malware, or some other vulnerability. The popups instruct consumers to call the telephone number listed in order to resolve the purported problem. In a number of instances, consumers dialed the telephone number listed on the popups and were connected to Defendants' telemarketers.

- 26. Once consumers are connected to Defendants, they explain their technology issues to Defendants' telemarketers, who assure them that Defendants can fix the issues. In a number of instances, the telemarketers do not voluntarily disclose to consumers the real identity of their company. In other instances, when questioned by consumers, the telemarketers claim that they are a part of or affiliated with well-known U.S. technology companies, such as Microsoft, Google, Apple, or Dell.
- 27. None of the Defendants are part of or affiliated with these well-known U.S. technology companies.
- 28. After convincing consumers that they are dealing with a legitimate business, Defendants' telemarketers tell consumers that they need to remotely access the consumers' computers in order to identify and resolve their technology issues. The telemarketers direct consumers to go to a website, enter a code, and follow the prompts to begin the remote access session. Once Defendants gain remote access, they are able to control the consumers' computers. For example, Defendants can view the computer screen, move the mouse or cursor, enter commands, run applications, and access stored information, among other things. At the same time, consumers can see what Defendants are seeing and doing on their computers.
- 29. Defendants perform various commands and actions on the computers purportedly to identify the cause of the consumers' technology issues. Then, they misrepresent to consumers that the computers are infected with viruses, spyware, or other malware or that hackers are present in their computers.

- 30. A common ploy that Defendants use to scare consumers into purchasing unneeded technical support services is to show consumers numerous "Error" and "Warning" messages in the computer's Event Viewer. For example, Attachment A is a screenshot of an FTC computer, taken during an undercover transaction conducted on June 3, 2015, showing Defendants' use of the Event Viewer. The telemarketer drew the circles on the screen to highlight a number of errors and warnings in the computer and claimed that these are evidence of computer problems. In fact, the FTC computer used during this undercover transaction was free of viruses, spyware, malware, or other security issues at the time of the undercover transaction.
- 31. Another trick is to use the computer's System Configuration to show consumers that computer problems have caused a number of Windows services to stop working. For example, Attachment B is a screenshot of the same FTC computer, taken from the same June 3, 2015 undercover transaction, showing Defendants' use of the System Configuration. The telemarketer prompted the System Configuration window to show a number of such "Stopped" services.
- 32. Yet another ploy is to direct consumers to the computer's Internet Properties to show that there are questionable certificates in the computer's Certificates window. Defendants claim that these certificates—some labeled "Untrusted" or "Fraudulent"—are evidence of hacking or security breaches. For example, Attachments C and D are screenshots of the same FTC computer, taken from the same June 3, 2015 undercover transaction, showing Defendants' use of Internet Properties and the Certificates window. The telemarketer drew the circles to highlight a number of "Untrusted" and "Fraudulent" certificates in the Certificates window and claimed that these are evidence of "security breaches."

- hacked, or is otherwise compromised based solely on the fact that the computer's Event Viewer contains "Error" and "Warning" messages, or the fact that System Configuration lists a number of "Stopped" services, or the fact that the Certificates window within Internet Properties displays "Untrusted" or "Fraudulent" certificates. In fact, while "Error" and "Warning" messages appear alarming, it is normal for a Windows system to collect hundreds or thousands of such messages in the course of normal operations. Similarly, it is normal for Windows services that are not needed to be designated as "Stopped," and this in no way indicates that there is a problem on the system. Further, despite the "Untrusted" and "Fraudulent" labels that appear threatening, the certificates are, in fact, designed to help protect consumers from giving their information to an untrusted web server and are incorporated into any properly configured, up-to-date Windows system.
- 34. Nevertheless, Defendants tell consumers about the risks posed by viruses, spyware, malware, and hackers, and they use the messages described in Paragraphs 30 through 32 to underscore the urgent need for consumers to get the computers repaired. Defendants then peddle their technical support services to consumers that could include a one-time "fix" and/or a long-term service plan. The purported services include, among other things, correcting error and warning messages, installing security software, cleaning up the computer of adware, malware, and spyware, performing a "tune up" or "optimization" of the computer, restarting Microsoft services and reinstalling drivers, creating a backup of the computer, and promising to provide continuous monitoring of the computers and round-the-clock support.

- 35. After convincing consumers that they need these technical support services, Defendants' telemarketers obtain consumers' payment information and then direct consumers to Defendants' website to complete the purchase transactions. After charging consumers, the telemarketers transfer the remote access session to Defendants' technicians to perform the "repairs."
- 36. In some instances, Defendants' technicians deleted innocuous computer files, which the telemarketers falsely claimed were the cause or the evidence of consumers' computer vulnerabilities. This does not actually improve the security of the computer and could even adversely affect the computer's performance.
- 37. In other instances, Defendants' technicians caused negative impact on the computers during the "repair" process. For example, in some instances, the technicians removed consumers' antivirus and security software already installed on the computers and replaced it with some other programs. In at least one instance, the technician uninstalled a program designed to provide automatic updates to the computer's web browser, including security-related updates. In another instance, the technician disabled built-in Windows notification systems designed to send consumers "Security messages" and "Maintenance messages" about their computers. For example, Attachments E and F are screenshots of the same FTC computer, taken from the same June 3, 2015 undercover transaction, showing the Defendants' technician turning off the Windows notification systems. Attachment E is a screenshot before the technician disabled the notification systems, and it shows that the boxes for "Virus protection," "Windows Backup," "Windows Troubleshooting," and "Check for updates" are still checked. Attachment F is a screenshot after the technician disabled the notification systems, and it shows that the four boxes are unchecked shortly before the technician clicked "OK."

38. Defendants charge up to thousands of dollars for technical support services that consumers do not need. In some instances, Defendants did not fix the real technology issues for which consumers unwittingly called Defendants. In other instances, Defendants' actions rendered consumers' computers worse off or more vulnerable.

The Role of Bruce Bartolotta

- 39. Bartolotta is an owner, officer, and registered agent of C4S-CT, an owner and the chief financial officer, secretary, director, and registered agent of Innovazion, and an owner of iSourceUSA through Innovazion. He is deeply involved in Defendants' finances. For example, he has access to at least one Innovazion bank account used by Innovazion, iSourceUSA, and Spanning Source. He has applied for at least one merchant payment processing account ("merchant account") for Innovazion that is essential for any business to accept and process consumers' credit or debit card payments. Further, either personally or through employees, he manages and pays for the telephone services used by Defendants to solicit and contact consumers, including the telephone numbers listed on www.click4support.net, www.click4support.com, and www.c4sts.com.
- As C4S-CT's vice president of marketing, he receives all consumer complaints filed against the company through the BBB. Throughout the complaint process, he remains the company's main contact with the BBB and receives all related correspondence, including communications from consumers. In a number of instances, he has personally communicated with individual consumers by telephone and email about their complaints. He has the authority to approve consumer refunds and, in some instances, he has responded directly to consumers' refund requests. Once a complaint is resolved, he notifies the BBB to close the complaint. Further, Saab is the account manager for the virtual office used by iSourceUSA and Spanning Source. He receives the rental invoices, which are in his name.

The Role of Chetan Bhikhubhai Patel

43. C. Patel is an owner and officer of iSourceUSA and Spanning Source. Like Saab and N. Patel, C. Patel is significantly involved in Defendants' finances. He has also applied for and obtained at least one merchant account used by these companies.

44. C. Patel is also knowledgeable of and involved in the Defendants' business operations. For example, he has registered the business website www.click4support.com.

Recently, he entered into a lease of the virtual office in Newtown, Pennsylvania that Spanning Source and iSourceUSA currently use. Further, through Saab, he keeps apprised of at least some of the consumer complaints and related correspondence forwarded by the BBB.

The Role of Niraj Patel

45. N. Patel is an owner and officer of iSourceUSA and Spanning Source. Like Saab and C. Patel, N. Patel is deeply involved in Defendants' finances. He is also an authorized account signer for multiple iSourceUSA bank accounts, at times signing his name as a "Managing Member/Partner."
