IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF ARIZONA

Federal Trade Commission,

Plaintiff,

v.

HCG Diet Direct, LLC; Clint Ethington,

Defendants.

No. CV-14-00015-PHX-NVW

ORDER

Before the Court is Plaintiff’s Motion to Lift Suspension of Judgment (Doc. 7), Defendants’ Request for Evidentiary Hearing and Discovery (Doc. 14), and the parties’ accompanying briefs. For the reasons that follow, the Motion to Lift Suspension of Judgment will be granted and the Request for Evidentiary Hearing and Discovery will be denied.

I. BACKGROUND

In 2011, the Federal Trade Commission (“FTC”) issued a warning letter to Clint Ethington and his company HCG Diet Direct, LLC (“HCG Diet”) for false advertising and related charges.<sup>1</sup> Negotiations ensued. In 2013, Ethington submitted personal and corporate financial statements to the FTC. In reliance on those statements, the FTC

<sup>1</sup> Hereafter, Ethington and HCG Diet will be collectively referred to as “Ethington” when the difference is unimportant.

1 agreed to settle by way of a Stipulated Judgment (Doc. 5) entered by the Court on 2 January 7, 2014.

3 The Stipulated Judgment provided injunctive and monetary relief. The injunction
4 was immediate, but the money was conditional. A judgment of approximately $3.2 5 million against Ethington was entered but “suspended.” (Id. at 11.) The suspension was 6 “expressly premised on the truthfulness, accuracy, and completeness” of Ethington’s
7 2013 financial statements. (Id.) The suspension was to be “lifted” if, upon the FTC’s 8 motion, the Court were to find that Ethington “failed to disclose any material asset, 9 materially misstated the value of any asset, or made any other material misstatement or 10 omission” in his statements. (Id. at 12.)

11 On September 15, 2015, the FTC moved (Doc. 7) to lift the suspension based on 12 the following misrepresentations and omissions in Ethington’s 2013 financial statements:

- 13 (1) Ethington reported income of approximately $8,500/month from his 14 company Ethington Management, Inc., but in fact the income was at least 15 $13,500/month.
- 16 (2) Ethington claimed that the companies he partially owned (“the Related 17 Companies”) had no financial assets, but in fact those companies had 18 between $65,000 and $150,000 in cash.
- 19 (3) Ethington did not mention that the Related Companies paid more than 20 $200,000 to its owners in 2013, or that one of those companies paid 21 $120,000 toward various credit cards the day before Ethington’s financial 22 statement.
- 23 (4) Ethington presented HCG Diet as a company on the verge of shutting 24 down, but the company then opened a new merchant account, and one of 25 the Related Companies, Prescription HCG, received income from a 26 merchant account in early 2013.

27 That Ethington made these misrepresentations and omissions is undisputed. (See Doc. 22 28

1 at 2-3; accord Doc. 14 at 5-17.)

2           Ethington contends these inaccuracies were not “material” and therefore do not 3 trigger the suspension-lifting clause in the Stipulated Judgment. He claims the 4 inaccuracies were unintentional and, in any event, would not have mattered to the FTC 5 because even an accurate description of his finances would have shown he was unable to 6 pay a monetary judgment. Accordingly, Ethington asks (Doc. 14) that the Court deny the 7 FTC’s motion outright, or at least allow limited discovery and an evidentiary hearing on 8 the matter.

10 II. ANALYSIS

11           At issue is whether the inaccuracies in Ethington’s 2013 financial statements were 12 material. A misrepresentation is “material,” as defined by the parties, if “a reasonable 13 person would attach importance to its existence or nonexistence in determining his or her 14 choice of action in the transaction in question.” (Doc. 14 at 18; Doc. 20 at 6 & n.4.) See 15 Caruthers v. Underhill, 230 Ariz. 513, 521, 287 P.3d 807, 815 (Ct. App. 2012). Thus, 16 materiality is context-dependent. One must understand the “transaction in question” to 17 determine how a reasonable person participating in the transaction would view a 18 misrepresentation made in the course of the transaction.

19           Here, the transaction in question was a settlement of substantial legal claims. The 20 FTC had accused Ethington and his company of causing $3.2 million of consumer injury 21 due to false advertising and related offenses. Rather than prosecuting these claims and 22 seeking monetary redress, the FTC agreed to a Stipulated Judgment in which the only 23 immediate relief was injunctive. This choice not to pursue monetary relief was, 24 according to the terms of the Stipulated Judgment, “expressly premised on the 25 truthfulness, accuracy, and completeness” of Ethington’s 2013 financial statements.
26 (Doc. 5 at 11.) In other words, the FTC’s choice in this transaction was based on its 27 perception of Ethington’s financial condition.

28

1           Given this context, a reasonable person in the FTC's shoes would have attached 2 importance to inaccuracies relating to Ethington's finances. A reasonable litigant would 3 have wanted to know, for example, that Ethington's monthly income was approximately 4 $5,000 higher than he said it was, that the Related Companies had at least $65,000 more 5 in financial assets than he said they did, and that those companies had recently paid 6 hundreds of thousands of dollars to their owners. Such knowledge would have produced 7 a perception of Ethington's financial condition markedly different from the perception 8 the FTC had when choosing to settle. Thus, the inaccuracies were material.

9           This finding of materiality is appropriate even in the absence of discovery and an 10 evidentiary hearing. Although Ethington requests these procedures, he cites no rule 11 requiring them. And although Ethington offers several reasons for these procedures, 12 none is persuasive.

13           First, Ethington requests discovery and a hearing in the hopes of revealing that 14 even if the FTC had known of the inaccuracies in his financial statements, it would have 15 made the same choice not to seek monetary relief against him. But this revelation would 16 prove nothing. The question is not whether the FTC would have acted differently 17 knowing the inaccuracies, but whether a reasonable person would have attached 18 importance to the inaccuracies. The distinction matters. Imagine a prospective 19 homebuyer discovers hidden roof damage on the eve of purchase. He might still decide 20 to buy the house even though he (reasonably) attaches importance to the roof damage.
21 His ultimate decision would not render the roof damage immaterial. Similarly, if the 22 FTC had known of Ethington's financial inaccuracies, it might still have decided not to 23 seek monetary relief even though it would have (reasonably) attached importance to the 24 inaccuracies. Its ultimate decision would not render the inaccuracies immaterial. All this 25 is simply to say that a factor can be material to a decision without being dispositive.
26 Therefore Ethington's hope to show that his financial inaccuracies were not dispositive to 27 the FTC's decision does not justify imposing extra procedures.
28

1           Ethington also requests a hearing to show that the inaccuracies in his financial 2 statements were unintentional. But Ethington’s intent is irrelevant. Materiality and intent 3 are separate concepts, as confirmed by a recitation of the basic elements of fraud. The 4 suspension-lifting clause in the Stipulated Judgment is triggered by “material” 5 misrepresentations or omissions, not “intentional” misrepresentations or omissions. Had 6 the parties wanted to insert an exception for unintentional material misrepresentations or 7 omissions, they could have done so. They did not. Therefore Ethington’s hope to show 8 lack of intent does not justify imposing extra procedures.

9           Finally, Ethington requests a hearing to further demonstrate that he was unable to 10 pay a monetary judgment, even after adjusting for the inaccuracies in his financial 11 statements. But the only significance of Ethington’s inability to pay is to show that the 12 FTC would have acted the same way—i.e., would have decided not to seek monetary 13 relief—had it known of his true financial state. As explained above, such a showing 14 would prove nothing about materiality. Furthermore, Ethington has so far offered little 15 indication that he was truly unable to pay any monetary judgment. Ethington derives his 16 “inability” to pay from the fact that his liabilities exceeded his assets. But a negative net
17 worth does not mean Ethington could not have paid the FTC. It only means Ethington 18 could not have paid the FTC and all his other creditors while maintaining his then-19 existing lifestyle. The FTC might reasonably have expected Ethington to pay a judgment 20 before paying other creditors, especially given that one of the companies he partially 21 owned paid $120,000 toward credit cards the day before his financial statement to the 22 FTC. Therefore Ethington’s hope to show an inability to pay a monetary judgment does 23 not justify imposing extra procedures.

24 25 III. CONCLUSION

26           Because a reasonable person in the FTC’s shoes would have attached importance 27 to the inaccuracies in Ethington’s 2013 financial statements, these inaccuracies were 28

1 material. The discovery and hearing requested by Ethington would not alter this 2 conclusion. Instead these procedures would drag out this litigation beyond the full round 3 of briefing and oral argument already conducted.

4 As a result, the suspension of the monetary portion of the Stipulated Judgment will 5 be lifted. Although this result may seem harsh, it is a result the parties appear to have 6 anticipated when settling the allegations of false advertising and related offenses.

8 IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that Plaintiff's Motion to Lift Suspension of 9 Judgment (Doc. 7) is granted.

10 IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Defendants' Request for Evidentiary Hearing
11 and Discovery (Doc. 14) is denied.

12 IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, pursuant to the terms of the Stipulated 13 Judgment (Doc. 5 at 11-12), the previously entered judgment in favor of the FTC and 14 against Defendants in the amount of $3,212,310, plus interest, is now due and may be 15 executed on.
