	include physicians and non-profit healthcare systems to be included in the non-compete FTC regulations."
Richard	"I fully support banning non-compete clauses. It is unfair to keep workers from taking better paying jobs or jobs that better fit them in other ways simply because they already work for a company in the same industry. I am sure that if firms are concerned about former employees sharing proprietary information, there are mechanisms in place to address that."
Amy	"I am a physician in very rural area. I am much more likely to stay in this area and treat the people here that I've already established relationships with. I will be more likely to stay in my community and try to build more mental health services. I am a psychiatrist and they are desperately needed here. However, I am in conflict with my employer. I am in complete agreement at banning the non-compete clause."
Daniel	"These should've been banned a long time ago. Job mobility is important if we "really" believe in our economic system. Ban NDAs."
Alex	"I am in full support of banning noncompetes for any worker, regardless of professional credentials and/or education level. I am a PhD-level researcher and had to sign a noncompete with my current organization, which develops educational and workforce assessments. It limits my ability to work for other organizations in the industry for a whole year, which very much would limit my ability to earn a living for myself and my family if I were to change jobs. This is a matter of equity, where organizations with more resources and access to expensive legal teams have written the rules to benefit them. In an economy that is increasingly dependent on workers with multiple jobs (i.e., the gig economy), noncompetes are an untenable, unsustainable, and outdated. To continue to level the playing field for workers, the United States needs to ban noncompetes."
Craig	"Hospital noncompetes are excessively punitive to physicians and harmful to patients through obstruction of access to their chosen physician. They give hospitals an unfair advantage in negotiations with physicians and influence over their livelihood. B"
Megan	"I support the banning on non-compete clauses because working in health care, I am required to offer my clients all their option when I decided to leave a job or switch to a new job except following me to the new position. Health care is a service which the client should be able to decided where they want services and with whom, the non-compete clause limits consumers ability of choice."
Craig	"Please ban non competes as these are unfair to us working folks."
Blake	"My wife and I operate a small medical practice and are proud of the quality of care we provide. We had to negotiate an exit from a non-compete agreement as part of starting our practice and are limited in our ability to grow our business since nearly all providers are in a non-compete agreement with their current employer. Non-compete agreements are stifling healthcare innovation. I strongly support the ban on non-compete agreements."

Daniela	"Non compete clauses affect not only physicians but patients as well. There is no logical reason why your current workplace can determine whether you need to move or not after you quit, nor should patients be left without their trusted physicians only because corporate greed will rather have patients change physicians instead of allowing physicians to decide what works environment better suits their needs and continue caring for their patients. This particularly affects rural areas where physicians are even more scarce"
RJ	"Please allow this ban to be enacted. In less populated areas where I live, non-compete clauses deter recruitment for workers and could force employees to move, a financial impossibility in some cases. We have a hard enough time finding employees as it is. Don't make it harder by allowing non-competes."
Sarah	"This ban on non compete clauses is vital to protecting not only workers but also research and design that improve products and industries. America need healthy competition, and less conglomerates to maintain its economy. The ban makes sense for employees and employers. I support the ruling."
Andrew	"It's a position whose practice for 23 years, the last 18 have been directly involved with rural medicine . I have moved from job to job three times. Each time my initial contract included a noncompete clause, the sad truth is that a noncompete clause did not stop me from leaving my job when I grew dissatisfied. How administration was treating me or how the job description has changed. I am opposed to forcing physicians and any other employees to sign a noncompete clauses as it is ineffectual way to maintain employees. It is, however, away, that a poorly run hospital can misrepresented job and essentially trap the physician into a commitment that is not beneficial for either party. I am coming into the twilight of my practice, so whatever decision you make does not really affect me. However, I think for the benefit of rural communities, it would be beneficial to eliminate the concept of a noncompete clause, if for any reason, other than having hospital administration into treating their physicians with respect and accurately, representing the jobs that they have agreed to work. Andrew Frost..."
Tim	"the non compete clauses put the worker in an unfair negotiating position with the present employer knowing that litigation will prevent competitive offers from other employers, thus reducing wages paid by the present employer."
Marilyn	"Getting rid of non-competes is the fair thing to do for the workers of America, especially for the large numbers who are not unionized and therefore do not have a ton of negotiating power. These so-called "agreements" are forced onto American workers and costing those workers billions of dollars in income — and additionally costing all of us in lost product development and/or inflated prices. I support this FTC proposal and urge its implementation as soon as feasible."
Michelle	"Get rid of non-competes, as a physician I would have to drive over 30 miles from my current location to work in my field instead of finding a local clinic or starting my own clinic. It would sometimes require complete relocation or not working for a year. why should someone have to relocate from their home or commute over an hour if they're unhappy w their current employer. Also why do I not get to continue taking care of my patients which I've developed relationships with."

Rachel	"Please pass the Non-Compete Clause Rule. Protect the right of workers to decide who they will work for."
Rachel	"I support the FTC ban on non-compete clauses. People should have the right to work for whom they choose and to use their skills where they choose. Non-compete clauses for all but very specialized senior people are only a way for companies to hold power over their workers. These clauses need to be banned."
Bryan	"As a practicing CRNA I support the banning of noncompetes"
Matthew	"Non-compete clauses or stipulations harm professionals in many fields who may wish to seek an opportunity elsewhere in their community or area and are held hostage by an employer with a non-compete. These conditions often can threaten the professional to relocate themselves and their families to a different city or state to avoid the threat of litigation against them for exercising their right to leave a position for another in their field that better suits their professional, personal and growth based needs. Non-compete conditions are only beneficial to the employer that is putting them on the professional. The professional is often times coerced into these "agreements" as a condition of their employment. These clauses almost never benefit the professional and only serve to keep people inappropriately detained in a job that may no longer be in their best interest and deteriorate their well being. This can cause undue and unnecessary suffering to the professional, their families, their communities and customers. I fully support the dissolution, abolition and prohibition of the binds of non-compete clauses."
Kevin	"Noncompete clauses are very wrong and are hurtful and destructive to the American worker. They need to be banned immediately. Workers should have the right to pursue any job that they want at any time. Thank you."
Shawn	"No compete is completely unfair to both the physicians and patients. Because of non compete, many physicians are forced to leave and practice far away from where they have been practicing for years. The patients they have been taking care of have to find new physicians to start over. Additionally, the hospitals have been using non compete to control their physicians. they force them to see more patients. This dramatically affect the quality of care the physicians deliver. Many physicians have been hijacked by this non-compete and have to do what the hospital admin wants them to do: make more money. They don't care the quality of care that will be delivered to the patients. I believe the majority of physicians want to give their patients the best care possible but they cannot as they are controlled by their employers."
Arthur	"Noncompetitive clauses are unjust and destroy the free market place. Noncompetitive clauses should be illegal."
Shaun	"Non compete rules are (as the name says) inherently anti competitive. They prevent workers from being able to freely sell their labor and because of their widespread and casual adoption workers often do not have the luxury to choose an employer who does not use them. It strips workers of bargaining power that should be their right under a free market. It hampers innovation by allowing companies to win without needing to compete ok ideas. Intellectual property protects companies from theft if proprietary information already, these agreements only harm the worker. If companies don't want to lose employees to competitors or new ventures then they should do more to attract and retain the talent which is clearly of value to them. I wholeheartedly support restrictions on or the elimination of non-compete agreements."

Greg	"Thank you for the consideration to ban non-compete clauses. I am a physician in a Midwest city in a relatively small field, so there are already limited job availabilities. I had to sign a non- compete with a geographic restriction just large enough to encompass the other hospital in town. I am hopeful that I do wish to continue to work for my current hospital. Otherwise, my family and I will need to move to different city (and inevitably sign a non- compete clause there too). Thank you, and I could not be more pleased about the FTC's work to ban non-compete clauses."
lynne	"Repeal the use of non compete clauses on contracts for jobs. It is unfair to people seeking jobs"
Tracy	"Please include physicians in this updated regulation. The current market is that majority of Physicians are employed. It is mostly big cooperate or prover equity firms that own the hospitals and clinics that employee physicians. These companies do not have any financial steal or support in our training - tho they claim this is the reason for non-competes. It's simply not true. Because of the Cuc rent nature and structure of medical practices . The non-competes are merely for greed and are unfair. It's an h fiat labor practice to employee physicians, that many of us don't understand when we first start working, and by the time we realize, it's too late we are many years in, with families and homes established and the only way out is to move out of state. Please include physicians in eliminating these abusive and unfair noncompete laws."
Jon	"Non-competes should be banned as they limit growth and wage negotiations for workers. My employer has expanded coverage so I would not be able to get another job in my area if1 left my current company. Also the non-compete includes anything they are considering maybe offering in the future. Which really limits my prospects if I Can't work for current customers either."
Kevin	"These non-competes are extremely unfair to physicians , and they are used against by hospitals against providers instead of providing them a rewarding workplace to retain employees. them. Throughout our career, non- compete are used against physicians. Residency and fellowship contracts say that you cannot work outside residency, but the pay is artificially reduced by the anticompetitive practices of the NRMP. These residency programs have no issue with abusing the 80 hr. work limitation, but they only want you working for them. After training, you join a hospital. They treat you poorly and try to squeeze every hit of work out of you. When you say you want to leave, you can't because of the non- compete. They make you move the whole family, or you deal with it. I've seen nationwide non- competes. While it may not be enforceable, the hospitals have deeper pockets to fight a frivolous lawsuit. This is bad for physicians and bad for patient care in a time when there is already a shortage of doctors. While there may be exceptions, 99 times out of a hundred, non-competes are used as punishment. I've sat in meeting with hospital CEOs as they brag about how they control their physicians. This is one of many reasons physicians are burning out."

Charles	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. I am currently under a non-compete agreement that has been very limiting. My previous employer initiated my termination while still requiring a non-compete. This has made finding a new employment challenging, some potential employers were spooked by it, and has limited me at my new employer as we wait for the term to expire for me to fully perform the requirements of my new job. It has also limited my personal life. I have developed strong friendships with my clientele and I have been threatened with legal action as I have tried to keep in touch. This is extremely unfair. I feel like it has been used as a club against, preventing me from leaving my former employer earlier my situation devolved, and has limited my prospects after. They initiated the separation and I get all the negative consequences. At a minimum, they should have to pay fair compensation (salary plus benefits) for the full term if they are going to restrict my ability to work and I have to sit on a shelf. Best would be not to have a non-compete. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. And please hurry. Sincerely, Charles."
Wassef	"I am a physician and I support banning non-compete. American Hospital Association doesn't represent me or any of the many physicians that I have spoken to about their stand regarding banning non-compete. Thanks!"
William	"See attached file for reference. This is my non-compete contract that I signed in 2011. I am still bound by this agreement but have recently secured new employment. I am in favor of the proposed ban because for many years I have felt like my skills and knowledge have been held hostage and limited my potential to grow and elevate my income. When this contract was presented I had already been employed with this company for 6 years. Many of my colleagues and I reluctantly signed in deress as we were told we'd be terminated without acceptance of said agreement. The biggest irritation for many of us was the verbiage referencing "perceived competitor" as there are many similar market segments in the agricultural manufacturing industry and so we felt handcuffed. Attachments Restrictive Covenant Redacted"
Tisha	"A non-compete has prohibited my husband from pursuing another position with a different company several times. He is in the Utilities industry and at this time can not accept a job with anyone else in the industry. Even if they are not a direct competitor. Because of this he has had to turn down jobs making significantly more money and better benefits. They have him trapped and they know it. Please consider eliminating them."
Caleb	"This is a great clause and should be implemented as soon as possible."
Zach	"As an employer I strongly support this new rule. I've seen friends and family members hurt by non-competes. Businesses shouldn't be able to handicap a FORMER employees career. Ultimately this is an anti-competitive practice, as enforced non-competes simply disallow former employees from working for competitors. Since NDAs and non-solicitations are still protected under this new rule, businesses aren't losing their IP protection. They are just losing their (unlawful, in my opinion) ability to prevent former employees from working in their field. The limited exception for buyers and sellers of businesses is smart, and crucial to the economy. If someone sells a business they are essentially being compensated for their non-

	compete. Buyers need to ensure that their investment won't be undermined by the seller. In order to maintain healthy M&A activity (and ongoing startup/business investment) this limited exception is crucial. In short, as an employer and someone who has witnessed the damage of current rules second-hand I support this."
Gerhardt	"Please move forward with the plan to ban all non-compete contracts. Non-compete contracts directly oppose competition in the marketplace. They are bad for businesses, potentially devastating to individual careers, and dull the economy. We should have everyone working to the best of their abilities in the place that works best for them."
Spencer	"I worked for a company starting in 2019 that did not impose non-competes. In 2021 the plant I worked at (same plant as in 2019) was acquired by another company. Day one of acquisition we were given a non-compete and non-disclosure and we were told we have until the end of the week to sign it as a term of employment. I watched as colleagues were walked out (fired) for not signing. Additionally, this limited my career trajectory significantly due to the new company's size and organizational structure. As a result I looked for another job and found one. When I approached my employer to be fair, transparent, and move on amicably I was threatened with a lawsuit if I took the new job. The new job offered a $35,000/year raise in pay from the current job with opportunities for growth. At the time our total household income was $140k/year. I was also given the opportunity to be a part of the offering company's expansion plans. I know this is one small example of how non-competes negatively impact a household, but this fits right in line with the reasoning given in the proposed ruling. We would have been able to contribute more to the economy by paying down debt faster but also possibly affording more goods and services, paying more in taxes, etc."
Mary	"None compete is not fair to workers who are fired or just choose to venture out on your own or just change jobs you have to change what you were doing to get a new job for way to long of a wait between jobs that we fall behind and may never get back to where we were because we have to make such a drastic change for a job"
Terry	"Non compete and non disclosure clauses in employee contracts is a great way to cover tracks when things aren't working out--we need transparency, especially in education that is publicly subsidized."
Rebecca	"I strongly favor eliminating noncompetes and INCLUDING physicians. I have practiced medicine in Iowa for several years now, and watched with dismay as physicians leave Iowa rather than continue at a job that wasn't providing proper support to them. Physician salaries may look high, but loan repayment combined with the financial pressure from entering the job market in our thirties paints a less rosy picture. Iowa physician salaries may look especially high, but when they come with working conditions that are unmanageable, this is a recipe for losing physicians to noncompetes. If these were abolished, physicians could negotiate for better working conditions and have MORE longevity in areas where they are highly needed."
Todd	"Non competes are akin to slave labor. It prohibits employees from seeking better jobs within there community. It allows employers to strong and workers. Get rid of it! Iain a small business owner (hearing aid center) Des Moines, IA and don't believe in none competes. I have had many people try to apply for open positions in my company but I cant hire them due to the none compete."

Mudassir	"There should not be a non compete."
Heather	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people. I am currently employed in Iowa, and I am unhappy with my work situation. I have the ability to take a job with another hospital, one literally within a few miles from my current hospital and another approximately 20 miles from my current hospital. Unfortunately, due to the no compete clause in my contract, neither of these options are available to me without putting myself at risk for significant legal ramifications with a lawsuit from my current hospital. I have firsthand knowledge that other physicians who have left this hospital for similar reasons, going to the hospital 20 miles away have been sued. One of the surgeons has almost been bankrupted by the hospital, pushing the no compete clause lawsuitso obviously, that is not in my future. I may be forced to leave the state or certainly my community, in order to find a better job -when there is another hospital literally across town that would like to hire me right now! And to be honest, if I have to pack everything up and leave, I might as well leave I want to go someplace warmer, even though I really like it here, and I would rather stay!! The no compete clause takes away a physician's ability to negotiate for improved conditions at the place where they are currently employed, causing places, like Iowa, who already have trouble attracting physicians to come to our beautiful, but not geographically desirable, state! Please straight down, no compete clauses in contracts. They are unfair and promote abuse of employees by the employer. As medical professionals if we are just satisfied with our working conditions, we have no option other than to pack up everything and leave our homes and communities if we want change for the better!"
Michael	"please adopt the proposed rule that would ban the use of noncompete clauses in future employment contracts and void such clauses in existing contracts. far too many workers are being unfairly treated by the existing rules..."
Sanjay	"The non compete clause in any place is simply supporting the monopoly. Monopoly hurts the people in numerous ways. Suppressing the critical process in which conflicting views or ideas can be offered for everyone's benefit, creating protection for the non compete clause organizations, hurts the freedom of individuals. If we do not support the monopoly the non compete should also be denied. In order for the best that can be put to work for the benefit of the people we need to stop this once and for all."
Carel	"I strongly agree to remove non compete clauses as this inhibits free movement of employees specifically to the health care industry. It is difficult to relocate a family and this industry exploits this fact to require additional work / patient care. Thank you for taking up this work on an important issue in work culture."
Erik	"Non competes are wasteful and unnecessary and should be outlawed."

Douglas	"I am a cook with over 30 years of accumulated knowledge, experience, a portfolio of recipes and techniques I've developed myself. I'm now retired and recently responded to an add for part time work to supplement social security. During the onboarding process Human Resources sprang a DNC and intellectual property agreement on me. Not only were they restricting my ability to work elsewhere, but they were laying claim to the intellectual property I was bringing to the work place for 15$ an hour. It would be one thing to hire me as an accomplished professional and compensate me as such with a prior contract negotiated for my knowledge and what would be left behind; and an entirely different thing to threaten me with litigation iff moved on to another prep cook's job. They had no recipes or procedures in place to "steal" instead they were intentionally co-opting the knowledge I and others were bringing to their business. I could read and understand the language. I didn't "need" the job so I walked. One of the young cooks, a recent Culinary School grad wasn't so lucky. He needed a job to pay living expenses. And student loans and got caught up in the language when he left making it difficult to Advance in the industry. Unless it's a highly technical field and there are very specific parameters, negotiated and put in place prior to employment, DNC and intellectual property clause for employment should be prohibited. These clauses have become favorites in industries dominated by private equity investors. I'm"
Glenn	"yes, this is only fair."
Advanced Registered	"As an Advanced Practitioner in a rural part of the country, I support eliminating non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Even though I do not have plans of leaving my current employer, many practitioners like myself are unable to advance careers, or be able to change positions due to these clauses. In rural areas, this becomes difficult as some populations have less access to healthcare due to the clauses. Practitioners can be trapped in positions that are not good for them and the patients suffer lack of care. Also, with non-compete, more practitioners will be able to help fill serve in the more underserved areas. Please remove non-compete clauses from contracts."
Angela	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Sincerely, Dr. Angela Olerich, DO"
Mary Kay	"I strongly support FTC actions to restrict use of non-compete clauses. Too often the employers expect applicants to have education or work experience then try to hold them in non-compete clauses."

Brytton	"I support the proposed rule to ban all non-compete clauses."
Padmanabhan	"I am a cardiologist in Iowa for last 6 years. Noncompete clauses prevent me from taking care of patients to the best of my ability and gives unfair advantages to employer as I cannot practice in the area if I chose not to follow their unreasonable demands. Please ban the noncompete as it hinders optimal patient care and will give liberty to physicians to act in the best interest of patients and not be bullied by the employers"
Eve	"I support the FTC ban of non compete clauses. They unfairly punish workers for leaving jobs. I work for a home health care agency . I needed the work, so I signed the contract agreeing that the company could sue me if I quit and didn't wait 6 months to work for another home health care agency. So if another company was offering $17 an hour and I'm being paid $16, I'm barred from moving to the higher paying company. Unfair. Totally unfair. Especially at a time when home health care agencies are begging for workers. And it's a way for the industry to collude so that they don't have to raise wages. Again, unfair. It stacks the system even more against working people."
Sue	"Comment Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. I also want to tell you how much I appreciate your work. Ever since I read your law review article on Amazon I have been telling people about this BRILLIANT young woman who is working to re-set the definition of market dominance. My personal story? I live in a medium sized college town. Used to go to one of the top beauty salons in town . I had the good luck to go when a new person was the one they sent new clients to. She was an amazing hair stylist, creative, confident, understood hair and understood clients like me who are into wash and wear, no fuss. Did I mention she was also very pretty? So owner got very gropey with her and she decided to leave. Of course the clients were lied to about the reason and he slapped aNCA on her. For two years she couldn't cut hair in our town She also couldn't file a complaint because that would have made her reputation even worse, given his high-standing in the community. She found a job as an instructor at a cosmetology school, less money, no tips, less creativity, etc. Eventually she was back at a different salon and I could get my hair cut again the way I wanted it. But those two years she made less for no reason other than that sexually predatory man's greed. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Sue Ravenscroft.
Susan	"I am most definitely in favor of banning non- compete clauses. I have personally been affected by them in a negative way. I am a dermatology physician assistant . A prior employer breached my contract but still threatened to enforce my non compete if I left. I had no choice but to hire my own lawyer and spend a couple thousand dollars out of my own pocket to defend myself and be able to seek employment in my specialty once I left that practice. I also work in an underserved state (Iowa) where there simply is a shortage of providers in my specialty. Non completes further restrict patient's access to care. I fully support banning non compete clauses in the practice of medicine. Thank you for supporting this legislation!"

Christopher	"Please ban non-compete clauses in employee contracts. These clauses limit competition for high value workers and hurt the job market and overall economy"
Jody	"Strike down non-compete clauses in any form."
Alinda	"Please pass this new rule. My 30 mile, 3 year non-compete significantly hinders my ability to change my place of work in my community without uprooting my entire family. This practice is ubiquitous in my profession and it's nearly impossible to avoid."
Ximena	"I am writing to express my opposition to physician non-compete clauses imposed by both for-profit and non-profit hospitals. These clauses restrict physicians from practicing in a certain geographic area for a period of time after leaving their current employment, which can limit patient access to care and stifle competition in the healthcare market. Non-compete clauses are particularly concerning when they are used by non-profit hospitals, as these organizations are meant to prioritize community health over profit margins. By limiting the ability of physicians to practice in a certain area, non-profit hospitals may be inadvertently restricting access to care for underserved populations, which is contrary to their mission. The AHA appeal has no moral or ethical ground. Moreover, non-compete clauses can lead to higher healthcare costs for patients, as they limit competition and reduce incentives for physicians to provide high-quality care. This is particularly true in areas where there are few providers, as non-compete clauses can create a monopolistic environment that allows hospitals to charge higher prices for their services. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to take action to limit the use of physician non-compete clauses, particularly in cases where they are imposed by non-profit hospitals. By doing so, we can ensure that patients have access to high-quality, affordable healthcare and that competition in the healthcare market is not unduly stifled. Thank you for your attention to this important matter."
Stone	"A friend shared this with me and I whole-heartedly believe non-compete agreements as a whole should be done away with. At best they stifle competition between competing companies, which is a bad thing for the consumer. And at worst it stifles employment competition by stifling who can be hired and where (assuming the company chooses to enforce the legal agreement). All-in-all getting rid of all non-compete agreements I feel would greatly benefit the American People in all aspects of their lives."
Christian	"I'm very glad the FTC is looking into noncompete agreements. Software companies abuse them by requiring you sign them to get jobs, and it's a restriction on someone's rights (morality-wise, regardless of its legal position). The ability to control what someone does AFTER quitting or getting fired from a job goes against the very right of "pursuit of happiness" and I would call it unconstitutional, oppressive, and immoral."

David	"Sirs, I am a physician in Iowa City, Iowa. I have worked here for many years. There are two hospitals in town, Mercy Hospital and the University of Iowa. Until a decade ago we exchanged physicians between the two institutions and I believe that patients and doctors alike benefited from the exchange of expertise and contacts for referrals. Then both started using non-compete clauses. Now if a new medical provider is recruited to town they must sign on with a noncompete clause. Iowa City is a small city. So, effectively this means that if you start at one institution and it does not work out, you have to leave town (or wait a year without employment). There is obviously much less exchange between the two institutions. More importantly it has crippled our ability to recruit high quality physicians to the area. Candidates frequently cite the non-compete clause and size of the city as being too much of a risk to relocate here. I understand that this is not a legal problem with non-compete clauses, but it is another way in which they harm the public good and even the institutions that use them."
jesse	"This would lift a huge weight off of the anxiety I have to switch jobs. Currently I have a fear of being pursued legally by my current company if I were to leave to a job that would pay significantly more. The current agreement I'm under is I couldn't work in a competing company for a year after employment within 60 miles of the original location I was hired at. This limits me to switch career fields, or move out of a location I'd like to remain in."
Fayez	"As a healthcare provider, non compete clause unfairly limits our ability to change employers in the same city. If a doctor wants to change employers due to unfair practices then they might be forced to uproot the whole family and move cities. Plus this would ensure fair compensation at all levels nurses to doctors."
Dave	"Every worker should be able to choose the job that best fits the skills and desires of the person...having to be afraid of legal action for simply moving to a different job is simply inexcusable and wrong. We aren't supposed to be living in a fascist oligarchy."
Jacob	"I cannot stress enough just how disgusted I am that non-compete clauses continue to be legal. For our government to deliberately depress wages by putting legal barriers in the way of legitimate job-seeking, is, yes, the origin of a deep disgust I feel in my soul towards the leaders of this country; accordingly, their banning would be a relief and a step towards making the country a fairer and more just place."
Logan	"I think non-compete agreements are overly used and abused, and getting rid of them are a good thing. Given how infrequent pay raises occur for most people, moving between employers is frequently the only opportunity people have for pay raises. People with specific skills should not have to move their entire families to an entirely new geographical location just to have the opportunity for a better income. Non-competes stifle wages and encourage monopolistic behavior."
Shannon	"Help w statement: From ChatGPT: Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter. Sincerely, Shannon C Thronson, MD"

Chandler	"Please make sure to keep ALL healthcare workers included in this rule with NO exceptions. This is the only way to ensure fair and equal access to employment opportunities for those who work to keep us healthy."
Teri	"Non-compete clauses only benefit corporations. They are not patient friendly and do not take into account the access in rural areas for healthcare. Non-compete clauses keep employers from striving to work with their employees to better services or care because; they keep the employee in one corporation to keep from losing revenue. Banning non-compete clauses allows for more access to people for healthcare and freedom of providers to be in the best place for their career and patient care."
Brian	"This is a great idea. this will help people find better jobs."
Oscar	"Non-compete clauses monopolizes already scarce medical human resources , particularly in smaller communities where recruitment of Doctors is very difficult."
Jayme	"The Non-Compete Rule was never about proprietary information, it was always about keeping employees from seeking better compensation or position at a competitor's company. Just look at the broad spectrum of companies utilizing the non-compete rule that have virtually no proprietary information to be protected. This is just another example of employers controlling employees or their rights like the so called right to work law."
Melanie	"Non compete contracts are harmful to any skilled trade position. In construction. An individual's skills are his livelihood. Forcing contractors to sign non compete contracts to keep their job forces the employee to stay in toxic work environments, forces employees to stay with a company that may be on the brink of bankruptcy which does not allow the worker to go find stable employment before being laid off. If he is a builder, and the clause is written such that he cannot go to a similar competitor for a period of time, the possibility to have to take a lower paying job to get through that period of time is possible. That lower paying job may not offer comparable benefits to the industry's standards, and that can potentially impact families. If it comes to an actual layoff, the worker has to collect unemployment benefits which have been cut in the state, again forcing the worker to take a job at a lower wage just to get through. In not having a non compete contract workers can properly plan giving them the opportunity to keep their finances balanced. Skilled trades are in demand. When 1 employer forces the signing of an agreement it actually hurts local growth too. In not allowing the worker to remain in the field, they go to other industries and may not come back. They may choose to leave the industry completely."

Xiaoxi	"As a physician , I strongly oppose the American Hospital Association's push to exclude physicians from the non-compete reform."
Sarah	"Ban non-compete clauses! While businesses claim they protect their innovation, the actual effects stifle worker innovation, creation of new small business, and suppress wages in ways that are uncompetitive."
Jenna	"I am in support of the ban on non-compete clauses. The non-compete too often allows employers to keep employees, while not continuously and appropriately assessing similar or surrounding markets. More times than not, I've seen non-competes in groups or organizations that are more unstable, who lose sight of retention opportunities and proper recruitment options. Non-competes cause tension leading to poor work environments, and force someone to travel 1-2 hours more for work that is outside of the stated non-compete boundaries. I urge you to pass this ban so that workers are able seek out better jobs if the current position isn't the right fit. In passing this ban on non-compete, employees can better their work life, and ultimately their home life, without having to move large distances or travel several hours on the road every day or week."
Mark	"Non compete disrupts established relationships with patients and their care in prevention and chronic conditions. In no way do non competes protect patients or physicians. So who do they benefit?"

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Kansas | Statewide Impact

	"I was recently terminated from my senior regional sales Director position, and the reason given was "we can't make you happy". Due to a one-year noncompete clause that I signed eight years ago, I cannot go to work [for] a competitor, and thus I am now on cobra, as well as living (off) our retirement savings. Noncompetes allow companies to not only unfairly ban them from working, they also harbor and foster environments where employees can be treated unfairly." -Matthew
 	"Please overturn any noncompete clause. I am a physician, and had a noncompete that impaired my ability to not only make a living, but also denied access to care for many patients. The institution I left, did not have the bandwidth to care for those patients, many of which went without medication and treatment after I left. My specialty treats sleep disorders, so there were narcoleptic patients without their waking medication that were driving and working. Patients with insomnia that did not get their sleeping pills that resulted in daytime dysfunction. If I had the ability to work right after leaving that job, these patients would've at least had somewhere else to go. So, in addition to impacting my personal life, as far as not being able to have a source of income for one year, the noncompete impacted the life of hundreds of patients that were denied access to care because of the enforcement of a noncompete from a health system that has over 1000 doctors." -Suzanne

	for my horses from the clinic I worked for. I was scared to lose my house and barn. I was unsure of what I would do if I was left to relocate myself, my family, and my animals. I tried to negotiate the contract to terms I was comfortable with but my employers would not budge. Instead, they offered more time off and more money. I felt if they were willing to offer these benefits, they were committed to me as a worker. Unfortunately for me, there was a clause within the non-compete that allowed it to stand if I left the job or if they let me go. They terminated me for "not being a good fit" two months after signing the contract. I have taken a significant pay cut and now commute two hours one way to continue to practice. I wish that my situation was unique, but unfortunately within this profession, my story is far from it. Additionally, rural areas of the country are in dire need of veterinarians willing to work in those locations. Personally, my non-compete affects my ability to practice in approximately 16 rural counties in southwest Kansas and northwest Oklahoma. These clauses not only negatively impact the employees that sign them but also impact animal owners in the non-compete radius who are either forced to say goodbye to their trusted veterinarian or are forced to use the same veterinarian because of a lack of competition." -Elizabeth
 	"I am bound by a non-compete agreement and have been bound for my entire professional career as a radiation oncologist. I am the only radiation oncologist in my community and my employment is traded like Pokémon cards without regard for my preference or the best interests of patients. It's a shame that doctors have lost their autonomy, non competes are a form of indentured servitude that hinders our advocacy for our patients, impedes innovation and progress, empowers big money in healthcare. It's obviously anticompetitive and should be changed." -Martin

Constituent First Name	Comment Highlights
Carla	"As a physician I agree that we should ban non-compete rules. Preventing patients from seeing me if I move to a new practice that treats me better deprives patients of sometimes life-saving continuity."
Neeti	"As an ophthalmologist , I firmly am against non-complete clauses in physician contracts. The focus should be on retention of employees by improving the workplace environment, rather than forcing unhappy doctors to stay in poorly fitting positions. Non-competes also limit one's ability to stay in a specific geographic area which could separate families. All of this leads to physician burnout, which in turn leads to poor patient care. Doctors need to be given the same privilege as other professions, to leave a job that isn't the right fit, but still serve the same geographic area with their expertise care!"

Brian	"I am a physician in the Midwest where my current non compete prevents me from obtaining similar work in a 20 mile radius. These non competes only help employers to suppress wages and continue to foster toxic, unsafe work environments for physicians, nurses, and APRNs. Getting rid of all non competes will help to provide a way out for healthcare providers that are trapped in terrible work environments that they were duped into when they come for short interview days that didn't reveal the true work environment. I urge you to get rid of all, not just some, non competes as they stifle growth, safety, and creativity."
Tyler	"Do not create any clauses that exempt certain types of work from a noncompete. As a physician working for a large hospital enterprise, I work with colleagues that are trapped in a job by their desire to raise their children in the same city because they're not allowed to work anywhere else within a huge radius of any satellite hospital location owned by our hospital were they to leave. Employers are able to discriminate against employees with families as they know they can push them a bit harder for more work rather than the alternative: moving out of state."
Anonymous	"As a master electrician working in distribution I've found myself stuck in a position unable to better myself and family do to a non compete agreement. I've had multiple offers with significant pay increases this has affected. It's put me in a position to despise the company I'm with and unable to be what makes me what I am. I sincerely hope this bill passes."
Mitchell	"I'm going to put this as simply as possible. Non-compete clauses are the most un-American thing I've encountered and dealt with in my life. Particularly in healthcare, the concept disrupts and interferes with patient well being and the health of our society, but also interrupts lives of healthcare workers who often times have to uproot their families, sell their homes, and completely start over in life. I have personal experience with this and would love to see this travesty put to rest."
Rechelle	"Hello! I am a Real Estate Appraiser in Kansas. I currently operate under a non-compete agreement wherein my employer takes 35% of my appraisal fee and if I leave my current job, I cannot work in the counties I currently cover for three years. It is typical and acceptable for appraisers to take 50% or more of a training appraiser's wage as they earn their license, as appraisers must train under a licensed appraiser until they have their full license. Unfortunately, upon earning a full license, the new appraiser must then often choose to move to a new county or continue to pay a large percentage of their earnings to the appraiser with whom they trained. This practice increases appraisal fees exponentially in order to create a living wage for the newly licensed appraiser and to create a profit for the "training" appraiser. This is especially disconcerting as many appraisers (including myself) operate as independent contractors and the benefits we receive from the appraisers we work for are very minimal if anything. The benefits in my case include access to a copy machine, paper and ink, an office space (although appraisers can easily work from home) and being connected to a known appraiser's office. Having the connection to a known appraiser is beneficial for a time, but after you are established and they lenders are aware of the quality of your work, there is little benefit in the connection to the appraiser who trained you. If appraisers were no longer subject to non-compete agreements, the overall cost of appraisals would be much more competitive, and they would decrease in price."

Audra	"I support the banning of non-competes in all facets of employment, especially for professionals like MD/DOs and DVMs . Non-competes can be very broad in scope, distance and length of time, preventing a professional from obtaining a new job without moving to a whole new area. This incurs expenses to the professional and may drive them out of rural areas, where there are already significant shortages and positions are hard to recruit to and fill. It also makes professionals feel trapped in current positions, which may be toxic work environments, contributing to the already high suicide rates. Even if the state does not enforce non-competes, winning that in court is often expensive, and corporations are going to have the resources to fight, whereas the individual will not. Overall, I think it is to the overall benefit of medicine, both human and animal, to eliminate non-compete clauses."
Phanthavong	"Non-Compete clauses do not benefit patients, employees, or the economy. It undermines competition and leaves a facility without quality healthcare providers, because they are not able to work in the same facility after their employer leaves or loses the contract with the facility. This leaves many patients in the area without access to care for that particular service. Non-Compete clause only benefits the employer!"
Heidy	"Non-competes can actually do hams to communities. I am a dual certified family and psychiatric nurse practitioner that lives in the very RURAL America. I have a special set of services that I can provide to underserved community. I am no longer able to keep working at my current employer due to concerns of dangerous practices. But to get a job, I have to drive 60 miles away- and serve a community that is not even the one I live in."
Ingrid	"I support the FTC's Non-Compete Clause Rule. This will create opportunity to create more jobs for working people. I am a retired office manager lead start worker."
Ravindra	"I support the ban on non compete clause. This hinders patient care"
Anne	"Getting rid of the non compete clause would allow me to take a job that I really liked but didn't want to be stuck in if I didn't enjoy it. Allowing me to leave a company and perform the same job duties in the same area allows me to find the correct job to have a good work life balance. If it stays the way it is, I could be stuck working for a company that I don't enjoy working for."
Kayla	"I am in favor of a ban on non-compete clauses."
Roxi	"Non-compete/non-solicitation clauses that are imposed in order to secure employment should be considered an unfair practice. I am against these agreements. I would love to see it banned in all states."

Yvette	"As a primary care physician (PCP), I am in favor of this rule to ban the use of noncompete clauses in employment agreements for employed workers as well as independent contractors. I have seen first hand the harm this causes to physicians, especially primary care doctors. The hospital systems use their considerable power to insist on these clauses and thus make it very difficult for physicians to change jobs. It's exploiting the youngest and most financially vulnerable new physicians at the beginning of their career. As chair Lina Khan rightly says, "The freedom to change jobs is core to economic liberty." However in the case of physicians, the problem with noncompetes also hurts their patients. Many patients get blind-sided when their PCP leaves their current job and all of a sudden the patients have to choose a new physician. Due to a noncompete clause the PCP usually has to set up across town and makes it hard for patients to follow their doctor. It would be better for the physician and their patients if they can get another job in the same general area and thus their patients could follow them to their new practice. Obviously the hospital systems want to keep their patients in their system but it's not fair to the PCPs or their patients. This gives the large hospital employers too much control and is unfair to both physicians and patients. I agree with this ban on noncompete clauses!!"
Jeffery	"I am a medical provider in a small rural town. If I wanted to change jobs, my noncompete would require me to move myself and my family several hundred miles away. This applies to physicians as well as midlevel practitioners such as Nurse Practitioners and Physician Assistants. Other alternatives, other than noncompetes, would be for the employer to offer competitive salary and other workplace improvements, so that the employee doesn't want to leave."
Jason	"Non compete is an unfair utilization of an individuals professional and intellectual skills. It limits competition and fair wages. Forces people to uproot their family from local ties in pursuit of better job opportunities."
Diana	"Please do not exclude physicians from the proposed regulations regarding eliminating noncompete clauses in contracts. Physicians in private practice are becoming increasingly rare, hospital employment is becoming the norm. Noncompete clauses unfairly restrict the rights of physicians and give all the power and control to the hospitals employing them. Physicians should have the same rights as others."
Michael	"From the online Mission Statement of the FTC, "The FTC's mission is protecting the public from deceptive or unfair business practices and from unfair methods of competition through law enforcement, advocacy, research, and education. Our work to protect consumers and promote competition touches the economic life of every American. We are the only federal agency that deals with consumer protection and competition issues in broad sectors of the economy." Capitalism, according to the mythology that has been touted about it, is based and driven by competition. By the most rudimentary of application of logic a "non-compete clause" is an obvious attempt at avoiding the very thing that capitalists inform us drives progress, which is competition in the market place to include the labor market. While Non-compete Clauses are not, at this point in time, illegal they are obviously, by the very definition of capitalism, unethical, harmful, and a blatant form of hypocrisy on the part of businesses engaging in them. It's no secret that many, if not most, American workers either mistrust the government. This is, in my opinion and the opinion of many others, partially the result of allowing Commerce to regulate Government which is a direct reversal of preserving an equitable economic environment for all. It's time the Government stepped up and did it's duty in regulating Commerce for the betterment of all."

April	"I'm a Nurse Practitioner and currently in a non-compete. I am unable to work in Family Practice within a 50 mile radius for 2 years if I were to quit or get fired. The company I work for owns clinics in 4 surrounding towns, one as far as an hour away. Pm unhappy with my job but I feel stuck. This rule would give me more opportunities and allow me freedom to choose where I want to work."
Heather	"I am for this proposal. As a healthcare worker , I have been subject to non-compete clauses in the past. In my opinion these clauses stagnate the health care world - limiting innovation, breeding apathy and in a post- covid world, encouraging health care practitioners to leave the workforce in search of better paying jobs with less in-person responsibilities. We need more people in health care and these clauses have the opposite effect. We need to breed excitement and innovation, encourage workers to stay in healthcare, keep pay competitive. This proposal fosters these needs. Employers can achieve such an intended retention of employees with sign on bonuses for specific length of work or retention bonuses without stifling the market."
Lisa	"I personally think non-compete clauses are garbage! I would be totally fine with banning them. I have known people under a non-compete and they ended up struggling to find a job when the non compete employer was HORRIBLE to work for. So YES! Ban them!"
Jacob	"Every family strongly supports the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred working families from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement, hurting their children in many ways from increased poverty, lack of Healthcare access and even generational lack of funds and education! Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone, a win-win indeed."
Matthew	"Sir or Ma'am. I am speaking in favor of the Non-Compete Clause rule because not allowing workers to choose who they work for is a violation of the 1st Amendment, the Freedom of Assembly. Also, currently, non compete clauses essentially put workers into indentured servitude discouraging them from bettering themselves. Thank you for your time on this issue."
Sara	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 As a psychologist working for a large not-for-profit children's hospital, we are required to sign non-compete agreements, as are medical providers. This has limited what many of us can offer to the community for providing additional services in different locations or to different segments of the community. Prior to these agreements, my colleagues who serve a specific medical specialty within the hospital (e.g., patients with cancer), used to serve more general needs for families outside of hospital time. This is an important gap in our community that can no longer be met. The non-compete agreement also limits our ability to accept work above and beyond what we provide at the hospital in order to obtain additional income for family needs, to pay off student loans, etc. In addition, it makes it much more difficult to change jobs as we must start from scratch in a new clinic or in private practice. All in all, my observations of prior to our non-compete agreements and now that they are in place is that only the interests of the large organization is served. The community now has worse access to quality mental health services for children and providers are limited in meeting their and their family's financial needs. Because of this, I very much hope that such rules will be eliminated, allowing us to more fully serve our community."

Michael	"Terrific idea to eliminate non compete clauses."
Ara	"This change would represent a significant step forward for US workers in all industries. Non-competes are exploitative - they keep employees "locked" into less than ideal job situations unless they are unwilling to uproot their lives to escape the borders of the noncompete and give employers less incentive to treat their employees well. This happens regardless of which end of the pay spectrum the worker happens to be on. I am strongly in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses."
Lee	"As an engineer , I work on large scale infrastructure projects, but am limited and cannot work for any competitors due to a non-compete that prohibits my ability to work anywhere else and has stunted my career growth. Non-compete agreements are too limiting to employees and clearly limit fair competition in industry."
Henry	"Please ban the unfair practice of non-compete clauses."
Christopher	"Hello, Please, please, please follow through with implementing a ban on non-compete clauses. I am an employee in the financial services industry . I have been working for my current employer for a few years and have received outstanding performance reviews Inflation is crushing my family's budget. I have been applying for internal promotions or raises within my current company, but they have been unwilling because they know I signed a non-compete clause and that I would have to leave the industry to find other employment which I am significantly less competitive and would require a pay decrease. The non- compete clauses essentially block workers from monetizing their industry experience. Please follow through with banning non-compete clauses so workers have a right to compete, just like businesses do. Thank you! Chris Hughes"
Leander	"As someone who is affected by non compete, It makes finding other places to work very difficult considering how large of an area I live in. Working for a company that makes us sign a noncompete keeps me stuck in the same place that I don't necessarily want to be at. Working conditions aren't the best and I would like to leave but the non compete is an obstacle I can't currently jump over."
Jonathan Andrew	"Please do not provide an exemption for hospitals and physicians . There is absolutely no reason to do this and only hurts workers. Hospitals are now multibillion dollar cartels that no longer serve their original purpose. Even nonprofit hospitals are obsessed with growth and power."
Vanessa	"I absolutely agree, there should not be a non-compete"

Geeta	" Physicians are the key stakeholders and need to be part of the discussion and decision makers"
Jake	"Non-competes do not help the best interest of the company nor of the employee. I am a physician and believe that the best fit influences outcomes, whether financial or healthcare. Employees and employees should find the best fit for both parties rather than solely protecting the employers' interests. Ridding the non-compete also spurs competition among employers, forcing better pay, benefits, etc, which then leads to greater competition for those available spots. Doing away with the non-compete clause is a win-win for both parties. At the end of the day employers want to keep employees who want to be there."
Heidi	"As a physician , non competes are unfair and unjust. It is virtually impossible to find a contract without one. I've seen too many physicians have to uproot their families and move for the sake of their career or to satisfy a non compete. This is not sustainable in underserved areas Others physicians stay in terrible situations which lead to a decline in their mental health. We know physician suicide is a higher rate than the general population. Please do not allow corporations to continue to take advantage of those of us on the ground, working to improve the quality of care in America"
Jason	"I am a Physician Assistant in Wichita, Kansas. I have worked in several specialties including family medicine, urgent care, emergency medicine, rural emergency medicine and currently dermatology. I have had several jobs through a 27 year career and a handful of them have had non compete clauses. In a desire to be gainfully employed and to be able to take a job that would allow me to support my family as a primary income earner the ability to pick and chose had not been in my advantage as much as I had wished it could. In those positions there were wage latency and working conditions that made them less than ideal as long term career location. However the ability to leave and find more suitable and economically better positions were squelched due to non compete clause. It forced a feeling of being trapped in a place where one could not leave as well as a feeling of being forced to stay in unproductive and even poorly managed clinics where patient care and support was questionable. As at college educated and trained medical provider I should have the freedom to chose what is in my best interest or in my families best interest. I should be free to leave without being forced to sell a house, move children out of their school, uproot a whole life to move 1-2 hours away to find employment in the same field. There is also a feeling of being controlled, held against ones will when in a non compete contract because its not equal. It is very unilaterally advantaged. If I leave, the non compete in in effect. If Im let go, the non compete is in effect. So at all times they control your freedom to leave or make a choice that favor myself. This creates a heavy felling that does not promote a healthy work environment. It stifles instead of encouraging a healthy work attitude. Pay raises can be sat on by management. An ambivalence to promotions, bonuses, etc are not as important to management because the workers have the metaphorical ball and chain attached. My best professional self thrives when it properly, adequately, and in a timely fashion rewarded and encouraged. A non compete clause removes that motivation by the employer. I have watched people come and go in employment. The business never fails. They just rehire. The professional that leaves may accrue 30k in debt moving and changing locations. The stress and hardship on an individual or family is exponentially more harmful than that of a place of business. There is not equality or fairness in the concept of a non compete clause"

Adriane	" Physicians should be included in the no non-compete rule. We work hard for our patients and sometimes in the hospital system, they do things to completely tie your hands behind your back (ie firing the entire anesthesia and ICU doctor roster by no longer allowing contract physicians despite the fact that there are other contract MD's that work there. This kind of hospital action is hostile, and keeps us from being able to work effectively (shut down OR's be no anesthesia) Physicians should be able to avoid non compete clauses as well."
Jinny	" Excluding physicians from this legislation would be a huge disservice to an already weary workforce. Many companies have very restrictive non-compete clauses that would mean a physician could not get a different job in a large metro area for several years, limiting their ability to work and provide for their family. For many specialties such as hospital based intensive care, etc. non-competes don't even make sense because patients cannot be -taken" with departing physician to another facility. It is east to tell a physician not to take a job with a non-compete, however the pressure on physicians to begin earning once they enter the workforce is immense and the employers who use non-competes know this. Physicians often leave training with huge amounts of debt, a decade behind peers with regard to saving for retirement and with fewer years to save. Non-competes unfairly impede physicians from being able to pursue better opportunities like employees in other fields are able to do freely."
George	"The non-compete clause has been relatively common in the broadcasting industry . I have known people who were under a non-compete for periods ranging from nine months to a year or more. They have not challenged it because of the time it takes in the legal process. By the time the case goes to court, the clause has expired or is close to expiring. In addition, different employers will have different time periods and requirements, and there's no uniformity with non-competes. One company banned employees from working for a competitor within a 50- mile radius of any of its locations, and this company had stations across the state of Kansas. That could require a worker to move out of state to satisfy the non-compete requirement. It's about time this practice was banned in the U.S. This is an employer asking for a hold on a worker beyond the term of employment. That's not fair, it's not right, and it's not something that an employer should even have the right to ask for in the first place."
Meichia	"Do not allow the hospital lobby to exclude physicians from the non compete ban. Physicians form the last profession where blatant worker exploitation and a culture of gas lighting and abuse are still acceptable. Why should a doctor who has spent the better part of their 20s and 30s in training, working for minimum wage, be forced to move their entire family to another city if they decide to change jobs? Physicians by nature are obliging and self denying. We already spend years in school, take on mountains of debt, and place patient needs before family and self, only to be forced into punitive contracts which ultimately lead to bum out and decrease the quality of patient care. Allow physicians the same freedoms of professional choice as everyone else."

Suzan	"Non-compete clauses trap physicians in unfair employment contracts. Often we come out of residency with little knowledge of contract law and negotiation, and once we start our first job realize we are trapped have agreed to less than fair market value and less than what we are worth. Even if better jobs are available, we are not able to take them because our former employer can still command our fate, which if you think about it is ridiculous and not present in any other field."
Steffany	"The proposed change in the Do Not Compete should stay in acted. If anything to provide the compromise put specific guidelines on length of time and distance as a standard practice to help provide uniformly across every state and territory."
Bryce	"Non competes and non solicitations need to go away. Companies red to do more to keep employees"
Lindsey	"As a physician working within the system, it seems completely unfair to exclude physicians from the rules of non-compete clauses. If they are found to be unfair for one person, they are unfair fur all. The noncompete clauses give the employers the unfair upper hand, as they don't have to work to ensure the physician is treated fairly, as they know the decision to leave would be an extensive one- often involving uprooting family and having to move completely. 117,000 physicians fled from the healthcare system due to the already horrible work environment and unfair conditions. This would further encourage people to leave the field altogether rather than ensuring employers treat them fairly to retain their services. In a world of significant doctor shortages and barriers to access to healthcare, this would further infuriate providers and worsen that divide."
Tom	"I agree that the NON-Competes should be banned. I worked for a company and I had a Non-compete. I was commission based. Once I landed a couple big accounts my employer started cutting my commissions. The last year I was there they changed my pay structure 4 times. none of the changes were ever in my favor. I ended up quitting my job and bounced around for a couple years waiting for my non-compete to run out. After it ran out I got right back into the same business. But I am having to start from scratch all over again. All I wanted was to make a living and feed my family but the non- compete made it hard and we suffered due to it. SO YES PLEASE BAN THE NON-COMPETES"
CasSandra	"I respectfully submit my comment to eliminate the employer non-compete clause. As a newly minted family medicine physician the contract I signed to practice medicine required a 2 year almost 20 mile non compete. If I chose to leave prior to 10 years with my hospital system, I had to change states or move outside the county I lived in. I was trained and performed obstetrics and had limited options for those hospital privileges, thus the hospital system had infinite contractual power. Primary care is the foundation of health care and non compete clauses by employers limit patient care and patient choice. This type of non compete is designed for hospital profit, not patient care."
Megan	"End non compete clauses, they are getting ridiculous! Many people in my industry (beauty) get bullied into signing these contracts and then don't have a leg to stand on if/when they want to leave a toxic work environment."

Ryan	"Getting rid on non competes help middle class families across the United States. When my company was sold in 2021 the new European company came in a basically forced the employees to sign 5yr non competes. 3yrs later they cut everyone's bonus'.... Now many employees can't leave to work in the only industry most have ever worked in. I was the only manager on the sales staff that refused to sign. They basically said I was going to be terminated but never did. Terrible behavior. Corporations lock employees into lower wages with contracts"
Jan	"I object to non-compete demands of employers. In my view these are intended to trap workers in jobs when the workers could change jobs for better pay, better working conditions, or to change work locations. Anti competitive behavior by employers is intended to hold down wages and to prevent competition from other employers. I view noncompete requirements as similar to indentured servitude requirements of past centuries. Jan Monroe"
Trevena	"Physicians should be included in the changes that would exclude health care personnel from non-compete agreements."
Dyan	"Please move to eliminate non-compete clauses. My husband has been subject to these clauses in his work and it has at times limited his employment options when he was seeking higher wages or a job closer to home. His inability to seek a job closer to home has negatively impacted our family life - putting more of the childcare and home care duties on me. Please make a decision that benefits the people - not corporate greed."
Michael	"I applaud the efforts of the FTC and their work to dismantle noncompete clauses in the United States. Having been held to these agreements my entire professional life has prevented me from accepting offers to increase my income and to better be able to provide for myself and my family. I look forward to the advancement of these conversations and the passage and protection of those of us held to these agreements."
Laura	"I am a CNM . CNM'S are often forced to sign non-compete agreements as a part of their contracts. I agree whole heartedly with this new rule and want to add that communities often suffer as a result of these types of agreements, especially smaller communities with fewer resources to begin with. I know of a rural community that lost one of it's OBGYN providers because the practice she was leaving enforced her non-compete even after the hospital tried to intercede on her behalf and even though she was the only OBGYN in the practice, so there was no one for her to compete against. This left two OBGYN's in a different practice, who were already busy and were then forced to turn patients away to travel long distances. They have tried to hire another OBGYN for several years now without success because of the rural location. Non - competes need to go away. They are unjust and they hurt Americans. Thank you for your consideration!"
Joanna	" Physicians should not be excluded."

A	"I strongly support banning non competes. I also think physicians should not be controlled by non competes. The non competes inhibit people from freely moving and staying where they choose. The impact of non competes in rural areas can only be detrimental to the communities they serve."
Dakota	"I am VP of a Bank in a small rural town of Kansas. I came from a bank that my grandfathers owned and operated since the late 1800s. My grandfathers sold the bank in 1993. It changed ownership one other time. The owner who bought it in 2017 made myself and several other employees sign non compete contracts that limited our work for a bank/lending group that would be within 60 miles of any of his 7 branches of banks in Kansas. The contract doesn't expire until 5 years after the day of resignation. I am currently VP of a Bank who still hired me (not for my prior customers, which would have got me sued via the non compete) for my banking acumen and experience. This non compete has been burdensome and it would be great if this new rule went into effect."
Cooper	"As a family physician at a small practice, I am in full support of this rule. With the ever-increasing conglomeration of healthcare practices, non-competes are becoming more and more widespread that it could drive a Physician completely out of state."
Christopher	"I fully support this action to prohibit employers from entering into non-compete clauses with workers and to rescind existing non-compete clauses."
Clare	"Thank you for voting to striking down the non-compete requirement. The non-compete rule is horribly unfair and hampers the growth of our nation. It prevents people from fully using their talents. America loses the benefits of these talents."
Laura	" Physicians should be included in the ban for non-competes! It's not good for communities, cities and even states when physicians must move in order to change jobs!"
Christina	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses benefit exploitive employers at the expense of workers and at the expense of American innovation. If you are, for example, a young programmer just out of graduate school, you need a first job that will give you the kind of experience and working references you'll need to advance your career. If you want to stay in the field you trained for, however, a non-compete clause in the first employment contract will trap you in your first job and rob you of the ability to bargain for a higher salary or a better position. This is blatantly unfair."
Jennifer	"As a female physician the non compete in my contract that I signed 18 years ago has forced me to stay in a bad work environment and make less money. Now I must drive and be away from my family and patients because of this so I can be in a healthy environment. Please make this law effective for physicians and ban all noncompete. This hurts workers and their families. And most importantly it's hurting my patients!!"
Concerned	"Dear FTC trade commission, I support a ban on non-compete covenant clauses in employment contracts in the healthcare industry. Specifically, I would like to see a ban for all healthcare system including those organizations that have been recognized by the IRS as tax-exempt organizations under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code ("Code"). I fear that the proposal in its current format may be

	interpreted to exclude many hospital system and therefore not apply to physicians. I support banning these clauses for physician employment. I am a Board-Certified physician in the early phase of my career and have already experienced and witnessed the devastating consequences of non-compete clauses. Due to shifts in reimbursement patterns, physician employment in medicine has transitioned away from self-employed private practice to corporate employment. Within the next decade the vast majority of physicians will be employed by corporations or hospitals. These entities force physicians to sign devastating non-compete clauses as a requirement for employment. These clauses prevent the physician from leaving their employer unless they are essentially willing to move and relocate their family out of town or accept terms of their employer. Although, this has been disguised as a method to protect trade secrets or referral sources, it essentially serves to bind a physicians hands and continue to work without the ability to negotiate terms of employment. Furthermore, when a physician is forced to depart, the patients are left to suffer the consequences. Sincerely, Midwestern Physician"
tanya	"I am family physician. I live in a rural area that is a healthcare shortage area. I recently left a job in a small town due to a toxic administration. Three out of 4 providers chose to leave due to the same reasons. This leaves our town with only 1 full time provider. I have a 2 year, 50 mile noncompete clause. I would love to continue to provide services to my area. I continue to live in the same town as does one of the other providers. We both plan to stay in this town. I am currently driving 2 hours to work in a larger town which is not in a healthcare shortage area. My patients, many of whom are elderly or lack transportation, are having to drive an hour or more to receive healthcare. Non-compete clauses especially in healthcare deprive people of much needed healthcare. Leading to increased death and disability in those communities. Please abolish non-compete clauses in healthcare."
Tanya	"Noncompete clauses in medicine hurt patients. I worked in an underserved area. Our hospital administration was toxic and several providers including myself left the practice. We are all still living in the community yet have to drive over an hour to work. My noncompete is 2 years and 55 mile radius. Patients in my community are having to drive at least 30 miles to receive care because the hospital has been unable to replace us. The hospital has been recruiting for a physician for over 3 years and have been unsuccessful Noncompetes in healthcare hurt the providers and patients. Please make Noncompetes a thing of the past."
Michael	"Noncompete clauses that prevent a worker from moving to a competitor company are nothing more than tools of intimidation to prevent experienced and talented professionals from pursuing better opportunities in their field. Since most professionals since nondisclosure agreements (NDAs) with their employer anyway, there is no added protection provided by preventing someone from accepting a new position with a competitor so long as they avoid operating in the same research or development area. Reasonable law would recognize the value of the protection provided by the NDAs as well as the right of an individual to take full advantage of career opportunities."
Karthik	"Non compete is harmful to physicians as major hospital chains work to control market, increase price for healthcare services to patients and in turn leads to high premium. Doctors are forced to move out of the geographic area if they Want to leave the hospital employed practice due to rigorous non competes. Patients end up suffering due to lack of specialists. My area needs 3 gastroenterologists and wait time is 4 months but non competes forced some doctors to leave the area when they resigned"

R	"Please include physicians ! Our families deserve the flexibility. We should not have to stay in toxic work environments for the fear of uprooting our family every time we want to switch jobs."
Angela	"The non-compete rule should be banned. Workers should be able to transfer jobs. We are supposed to value freedom."
Michael	"Watch out for other techniques employers use on non competes such as: 1) they make them so broad they encompass even secondary tasks that you have done are prohibited - so if you are a truck mechanic and you helped on the safety team and you helped repair a piece of test equipment, then the non compete has been enforced to prevent you from working in all 3 fields, not just your primary; 2) How long does the non compete last? So even in the few exceptions that a non compete may make sense, it can't be a lifetime ban; 3) Absurd geographic area: so you can't work within 200 miles, so essentially you need to move to a new State. Even 50 miles can be difficult if you are in a stand alone city and the next large metropolis is hundreds of miles away; 4) the employer reserves the right to contact any company that you are interviewing for a new job to tell them that there is a non compete, even if not within the scope of the non compete. So if you are an electrician who applies for a CDL truck driving job, you are required to tell your current employer that you are looking for a job and they get to telephone the company you interviewed with and discuss you (your non compete); 5) You are sent to an ordinary school to get a qualification needed by the company, say it is a 3 day class offered several times a year. The company will try to claim that it is a very specialized training and so you need a longer non compete; 6) Too vague or general - so if you are a truck mechanic and you become an aircraft mechanic, the company will prohibit you because a mechanic is a mechanic..... Thank you"
Meena	"Some of us cannot pursue work in the city that we live in if we want to change jobs because of our non competes. This would change everything. Please highly consider."
Kristin	"I am a physician . I paid for my training and expertise with hundreds of thousands of dollars and a decade of my life. I should not be shackled to a hospital system via a non compete and deserve the autonomy to find a job that is compatible with my life. Hospital administration changes can drastically affect my life and it is absurd to think that I would be forbidden from getting a job and truly helping as many patients as possible purely because of greedy hospital administrators. I am not the problem! Corporate greed is! Of course they want to keep me shackled to them—I'm the only way they can generate revenue."
Ronda	"Right now, noncompete agreements are being unethically used across the country to prevent workers from quitting their jobs for a better offer. Competition drives markets -- and when noncompetes eliminate competition in the labor market, employers don't have an incentive to give their workers better pay, working conditions, or benefits. I don't understand how these companies should have this power. This should have never been approved. The rights of workers should be supported not diminished. Workers are the backbone of the nation. They should be treated as such."

Vismay	"I have bought a house near the hospital I work, established myself socially and economically here. I have friends and community here. Amazing neighbors. Leaving everything for couple of years somewhere else with whole family because of non compete clause on contract can increase immense of stress and have extremely negative impact on quality and mental health of my/others life. This can disturb physicians life big time. This also gives big upper hand to hospital institutions with very less power to physicians to negotiate the work hours, patient load because of which patient care can be compromised only for hospital profits. My patients who follow up with me also suffer a lot who can actually follow up with me even if i leave the hospital institution if there was no noncompete clause. In conclusion, Non compete clause only allows to pressure physicians for their own profits and neglects physicians personal life challenges as well as compromises patient care."
Cynthia	"Thank you for addressing this issue. Non-compete agreements serve only to enrich corporations and have no benefits for employees. Please enact this proposed ban on non-compete agreements."
Paul	"Non-compete clauses are inherently un-American, restrict freedoms, stifle innovation and the ability of workers to build a career utilizing the skills they have attained over time in a given profession. Rarely are these skills and knowledge a result of training and commitment to helping an employee hone their craft, but instead gained through hard work and lessons learned on their own, over time. The trade off of what is often limited support by companies in propelling an employee's career while later restricting their ability to attain greater success elsewhere are rarely fair and equitable in nature, often favoring the employer greatly and unnecessarily. In many instances, a non-compete is held over an employee's head in order to attain a raise or promotion locking them into a type of indentured servitude. By not agreeing to one, employees are generally regarded as disloyal and their careers paths are met with a dead-end. Meanwhile, any employer can choose to execute mass layoffs at any time in the name of profitability, but then hold that same employee to their non-compete even if their termination was without cause. These agreements unnecessarily limit the ability of workers to become gainfully employed in a field in which they have spent a considerable amount of time due to the scope and reach of these agreements as many companies will refuse to hire an employee under a non-compete for fear of litigation and costs associated with defending lawsuits tied to these agreements. Because of all of these reasons listed above, I cannot more strongly urge the FTC to adopt the proposed rule making non-compete agreements illegal and unenforceable. Thank you."
Stacey	"My brother is a doctor and under a very strict non-compete, not unusual in the health-care industry. He's miserable with the current health system he's in; during the pandemic, they were forced to work more hours with the same amount of pay. They haven't backfilled vacated support roles, but instead have put more work on the remaining employees to pick up the slack, and in turn, burns people out who ultimately decide to leave the hospital. Despite his unhappiness and because of the industry standard NCA, he cannot change jobs without having to move to a different city and completely uproot his family and disrupt the life they've built. If the NCA

	wasn't in place, he would easily be able to get a job at another hospital in his current city that fits his subspeciality. This is negatively affecting his life; someone who has given his career to public healthcare, so much so that he's often thought about changing professions. There's not an endless supply of doctors, especially those with very specific subspecialties, so we, as a society, cannot afford to lose the good ones who are practicing now. He would never sacrifice patient care despite being treated like a machine, but we have to consider how much unhappiness these NCA's are causing our healthcare providers and the related downstream impacts. It's almost as if these health systems are holding their practitioners hostage by creating work environments that are solely focused on putting profits over people, knowing the healthcare workers can't go practice somewhere. Here's an idea, if employers don't want their employees to go somewhere else, instead of having them sign a NCA, maybe they could become good employers. We shouldn't punish our healthcare providers by forcing them to stay with crappy companies, just because a corporation can't "afford" to treat their employees right. If we get rid of the NCA's and let the "free market" decide, providers will work for health care systems that treat them right and in turn provide better care to their patients. If we keep the NCA's in place, we reward employers for their focus on profit over people, providers become miserable and burnt out which in turn negatively impacts to patient care and results in more malpractice claims and suits, and overall unnecessary suffering."
Russell	"U.S. Tech worker here, living in Kansas. I would like to comment in support of this rule! Non-compete have been a big source of confusion and concern through my career. Businesses themselves are able to sell and buy competitors all the time, but employees are being made to sign confusing agreements before employment that even if not legal, at least put mental restrictions what you can do even though your employer drastically changed from when you originally signed the document"
Jacquelyn	"As a new primary care physician, just out of residency, every single job opportunity came with a noncompete. The worst non compete agreement was made my family's local hospital - for a period of 2 years after resignation, you could not practice in any direction for a 75 mile radius. This would mean that a large section of underserved population would be completely off limits for any physician who was unhappy in their current position, or simply wanted a change of job. I grew up in a rural area in Kansas, left for my training, and wanted to return to the community that supported me in my youth, to give back. I was terrified to sign any contract, because I knew that if I were to want to change jobs in the future, I would have to leave my entire family to still practice as a physician. Non competes are unethical in many ways, but especially in the health care field."
C. Allyson	"I have a non-compete that would essentially force me to either work in the neighboring state OR move 2.5 hrs way to a new city. These non-competes essentially bind us to possibly untenable positions or else be forced to pick up house and home to practice medicine. This is unacceptable."
Bristol	"Physicians should not be excluded. They are workers too. Doctors should be able to seek employment without unfair non-compete clauses."

Christine	"I'm a pediatrician in Kansas. I have been negatively affected by non-competes twice in my career. Employees of any kind should be free to take whatever job they want at whatever location they choose. These handcuffs should come off."
Sierra	"I support banning non-compete clauses. They prevent a true balance in the market and only exist to hurt the employee and limit their options."
Brandon	"I'm a LMT+MBLEX with a 4.0 GPA and not just the Massage Envys in my area have NonCompetes for the whole county, for a year. So if I quit, I can't be with my family without being in a lower tax bracket. They pay me 19/hr piecerate, with no raises for 6 months. I would be independent if I could afford stability, but because of a Kansas Driver Suspension issue it's been a long road. This franchise has taken advantage of me repeatedly even tried to used my Tourette syndrome as an excuse. It's rude demeaning and cruel, but I have no where else to go. It's like all the owners are in cahoots suppressing the wages of the LMT community. They charge nonmembers 120$/hr. then harass the front desk to grow memberships. For those who don't know 120 is 200% national average. They also use the low stats to manipulate their LMT staff. They rank us on return%, but take advantage of the clients. Generally we receive tips with proper pricing, now because the franchise charges more we receive less. They hold our wages down and manipulate the system to take a portion of our tips. One may ask why work for this place? ME is a staple face for safe clinical work. Every LMT has the ability to do body work but the clients emotional safety is better with numbers. A franchised LMT business is a great idea, but there is no competition if they swindle every single student that come out of school. That's how you drive them away when they want to stand on their own. Massage therapy can be a powerful tool for protecting and enhancing society, Noncompetes single handedly cut off the legs of every LMT that looks to franchises for entry-intermediate level experience and report. Non competes have made my and others work, social, and home life hostile. I hope you make the decision to end them, and soon. I'm talking to my coworkers about giving their input, but I'm not sure of my rights to speak up about it. If my boss gets mad and fires me for telling others, I may be financially crippled for months."
Grant	"Non compete clauses prevent workers from accessing livable wages in a capitalist society. It is anti competition and unfairly punishes workers."
Monica	"Please do away with the Non- Compete clause!!!! I was hired in the fall of 1996 and started work in June of 1997!! I am in the medical field. 6 weeks after I started, I was told I "must" sign this non- compete. It was necessary because the "cardiologist" were threatening to leave!! I didn't have an option if I wanted to keep working. Advance 19 years and I was unhappy with changes that were being made. I was looking around and administration got wind I was unhappy and looking at a competitor in the same town. Administration fired me before i even had another position. Thankfully, the other Pediatrician clinic hired me. Within a month my original employer filed a $500,000 civil lawsuit against me because I violated the non-compete. THEY FIRED ME' 1'1' They did not want me working near them. Patients did leave them and follow me!!! I spent $80,000 of my own money defending my ability to practice in the same town. My attorney and new employer encouraged me to abide by the non-compete!!! I lost s0000 much because of the non-compete!! Please abolish the non-compete"

Ravi	"The noncompete clause for seeking employment I believe, is unconstitutional and impinges on the right to obtain work. This should not exist in the current work environment. We need to do everything we can to repeal this."
Ty	"I've served as corporate counsel in the real estate industry and restaurant industry for the last several years. In general, the abuses or overuse of non-competes for employees and independent contractors far outweigh the appropriate or necessary uses. That being said, there is a need for some level of non-compete for owners, partners, and franchisees. So long as the formal rule creates appropriate carve-outs for those legitimate uses, I believe a general ban on non-competes is appropriate."
Wage	"I strongly support this new rule. I work in the IT industry as a systems engineer with many years experience working in federal government contracting. My skill set is rather general and can be applied in almost any government agency or large corporation. About 11 months ago I changed employers and on the first day of employment I was faced with what I consider a rather strict non-compete contract. I felt there was no way to negotiate because I had already terminated my previous employment and would be left with no income if I did not sign the "agreement". So I signed the document that seems to prohibit me from taking other similar employment with any other company that competes with this employer - which could mean any government contracting company. The type of work that I do is not specific to my current employer and my taking a similar job at another company would in no way harm the company. I am a "commodity" in the market with skills that are somewhat in demand but by no means unique or hard to find. I strongly support this new rule to restrict the use of non-compete clauses for most situations. I could support an exception for executive level employees that truly have knowledge specific to a particular company that could be used by a competing company for unfair advantage. For most employees, including myself, this is absolutely not the case."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Kentucky | Statewide Impact

Kentucky Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual KY Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual KY Worker Earnings

	"In March 2018, I was fired from a job in local news for refusing to go into an unsafe situation. I'd recently received a letter from a man threatening to kidnap me. When my boss decided he would still send me out alone in the field, I fought him on it, lost, and was terminated. Three weeks later, I found out I was pregnant. Unable to work in my field because of a noncompete enforced even AFTER I was terminated, I had no choice but to apply for WIC and government assistance, and work at a retail job making half my previous salary. I wanted to work. I wanted money to support my child. I wanted money to move closer to home, to escape a domestic violence situation. My noncompete kept me in a horrible spot, and nearly cost me my life."
	"As a physician in a state hospital, I was required to sign a comprehensive no-compete clause that states: "Geographic Area" shall mean each and every location which is either (a) situated in any one of the Counties of Bourbon, Boyle, Clark, Fayette, Franklin, Jessamine, Laurel, Madison, Montgomery, Scott, Woodford and Rowan or (b) within a 50 mile radius from the intersection of Rose and Limestone Streets, Lexington, Kentucky. I am approaching retirement age and should I wish to provide occasional services to other local cancer practices, in theory I cannot. There is a shortage of cancer treatment physicians and I feel handcuffed by this agreement. Smaller centers that need help are having problem recruiting physicians which limits available resources for patients to receive high quality care. I strongly feel these non-compete covenants should be invalidated for the benefit of our cancer patients. Secondly, there are instances here where physicians have had their non-compete covenants not enforced for arbitrary reasons with one of our physicians moving down the street in return for his endorsement of the state hospital for NCI cancer center designation prior to his move. This arbitrary decision is not appropriate unless all physicians receive the same treatment." -Ronald
	"I have been personally effected by a Non Compete clause... I had a child and was forced to leave the job to care for my new born daughter. During the pandemic, I found an opportunity to not run full truck shipments but to coordinate Less than truckload shipments for a company and took the employment so I could get off of pandemic unemployment assistance. I was shortly after hit with a lawsuit claiming that I was now working for a competitor and in violation of my non compete agreement. This has been in the courts for multiple years now and I am facing financial ruin, and likely will have to file for bankruptcy if the court rules in 's favor. I currently do not work in the industry at all, and am working as a martial arts instructor. I do not plan on ever

	entering back into the logistics field. But I will face financial repercussions for the foreseeable future should I have to pay out money. I am looking at having to pay out $75,000 plus attorney's fees. I currently make around $45,000 a year. I would have never signed the agreement had I of known that it would have this type of negative impact on my life. I really hope the FTC decides to do the American thing and prohibit these from existing. Not only for myself, but many others in my situation. [The company] has reported record profits each year since I have left, what are the damages? There are ZERO damages to them but it could potentially put me in financial ruin which is not just damaging, but catastrophic for those involved such as myself. America is the land of opportunity, a free economy, and non-compete agreements are fundamentally against everything that is America. Please do the right thing and rule against these clauses!" -Ryan
	"Non compete clause is not only immoral but it is a dark dot on a clean sheet of a vibrant economic democracy like we have in the USA. Why not to compete? Why would you not let me compete? Are you privileged? Are you better than me? Come on !! We are not a banana republic. Every sphere of life should be available for competition so that the last person in the line will have as much chance to succeed." -Kamlesh
	"I am a Certified Nurse midwife and Family Nurse Practitioner. I work in a rural health community. There are two health care employers in my town that I could work as a midwife at. Other options are at least 45-50 minutes away from home. The healthcare system that I currently am working for has a non- compete binding me to them. If I wanted to leave I would not be able to work within a 50 mile radius. This would mean that I would have to uproot my entire life and my family, sell our home that was my childhood home and move away from our aging parents/grandparents. There have recently come to light some issues within the system that have led us to believe we will not be given raises after gaining 3+ years of experience and some have even been made to take a pay cut since they "aren't productive enough". Because of this non-compete it is almost beginning to feel like a hostage situation. Passing this law would mean that we would have more freedom to choose jobs that area better fit without being sued or having to uproot our lives. 1100% believe this would be life changing for thousands of people -Blakelee
	"I strongly support banning non-competes. I work in the veterinary medicine industry where they are standard for veterinarians, and have been subject to them multiple times. I had to completely switch gears, since both non-competes were for horse-related work and had geographically large enough areas (the county the practice was located in and all counties that touched it), and in order to continue working as veterinarian I either had to work in companion animal practice or physically move elsewhere (>50 miles away) to a different equine practice in

	order to avoid the non-compete area. My non-competes were also each for a length of 24 months. This hurt me financially each time, since moving out of the area was not an option either time. I strongly feel non-competes are unfair to workers and agree with the financial harm they can cause them. If I had moved out of the area, in my industry moving expenses are almost never covered by the new employer, and to stay I had to completely shift gears within my industry in order to not violate my non-compete. I now own my own mobile practice, and although I have no other employees, if I ever hire another vet or worker, I will never enforce or saddle them with a non-compete clause." -Stephanie

Ash	"Non compete agreements absolutely need banned. They stifle competition, suppress wages, and deny Americans the freedom to choose who they work for, and in many cases they prevent people from starting their own business. Non compete agreements are used increasingly on lower wage workers, like those in retail and food service. Why should a cashier or sandwich maker be restricted from working for a competitor for years? I was even forced to sign one as a package handler in a warehouse. Even doctors are being forced to sign them, and due to the fact that so many hospitals are owned by the same corporate entities, it has made the doctor shortage even worse. Non-compete agreements are anti-capitalistic, anti-democratic, anti-freedom, anti- American, and unconstitutional. They have no place in American society."
Adnan	"The non compete should have been banned a long time ago. It is harmful to the health of the general public, and only makes hospital systems richer but squashing healthy competition and monopolizing on entire communities"
Kellie	"I am firmly in favor of striking Non-compete clauses from employment contracts. It severely limits opportunities to move between one company and another. The rule has been used to create a power imbalance in favor of employers for years. Stagnation of employees restricts innovation and creative problem solving, when we would benefit as a society overall having more free flow of talent across companies."
Samuel	"Non- compete clauses are a scare tactic for organizations to keep physicians from making reasonable shifts in their own communities. As a hospitalist, I don't even have my own patient base, but the University of Kentucky has a non-compete in my contract. No patients would "follow" me to another hospital in town. But even if they did, they should have that option. If hospitals don't value their physicians and don't help them treat patients with the care deserved, both patients and physicians should be able to move their care to a new system without the consequence of having to leave their communities. Forcing physicians to leave towns s year of only hospitals hurts patients and communities that need them."

Adam	"I am a physician assistant in Kentucky employed by a non profit hospital. In order to be employed I must sign a 2 year contract agreement containing an evergreen clause automatically rolling over my contact every year if not renegotiated. Our administration has refused to renegotiate my contact for 4 years. They will not agree to mutual termination of the contract as it would null and void the non-compete clause. They do not want to renegotiate because my current reimbursement is below market value. My non-compete clause is 50 miles for one year. If I voluntarily resign it would be impossible for me to work anywhere else within driving distance and I would be forced to relocate my entire family. I highly agree with this proposal to make non compete clauses illegal."
Ashutosh	"Done. Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 - the ban against non-compete chaise should be applied uniformly to all employees - including physicians ."
Ramya	"With the added complexities one has with immigration visas and GC process. Added to it is really unfair to have this non compete clause. Definitely Talent should not be confined to one place"
Shad	"I am 100% in favor of removing anti competitive practices under all circumstances. Trade secrets are already covered under other non disclosure agreements and this practice is harmful to both smaller businesses and to employees. It should be illegal to prevent someone from having the freedom to better their lives and to get a new job, regardless of whether they move to a position in a similar field. As an software engineer , I have seen employers attempt to lock people into jobs with very broad terms that cover far more than just direct competitors. I also support the idea of forcing companies to tell their employees that they no longer have to abide by the agreement and these non competes should absolutely not be allowed in the US any longer. The US has a long tradition of competition in both the employment market and in the goods and services markets, but in recent years some of that has been eroded by special interests and lobbyist. Let's get back to free and fair markets."
Cliff	"I have worked about 15 years as a security professional and have had to sign a non-compete with my current job. So now I can't just quit and get another job in security for a year. I have been approached by other companies as I am under paid for my position and I am stuck at this job it is not a fair practice at all I don't want to learn a new job as I love this field. But I want to make more money then I am."
Mary	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" I would like to support removal of the non-compete clause from employment within the US. As a health care provider, this type of non-compete law prevents a person from working at another local hospital, and requires you to move out of town or even out of state in order to take another job. This is part of the reason we have a health care shortage in this country."
Divyesh	"I am employed in healthcare and believe Non-compete clauses have adversely affected patient care and availability of provider services in my city. I believe employers use the burden of litigation to intimidate employees, seek revenge for the employee's perceived disloyalty to the organization, and simply be vindictive. Non-competes do not appear to protect any legitimate employer interest. I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule change as proposed in Matter No. P201200."

Rachael	"As a healthcare practitioner, non compete clauses have become burdensome and unethical for both provider and patient. How did America get to a place where institutions can contractually prevent a patient from seeing a provider that has moved to another location? It is an obstruction of patient care and their free will to select the provider of their choice. I have worked in an environment where the employer has gone years without providing raises to their employees because they had the employees locked up so tight with a non compete contract that the employer knew the employees could not leave for better pay. Who is that benefitting? The owner or employee? It benefits the owner because they continue to keep the employees at less than market value, but demand increased production to increase the owner's bank account. It is corporate greed. People's livelihood and careers have been destroyed by non compete clauses. While I agree with non disclosures on the level of not sharing an institution's trade secrets or finances, I will never understand why any form of government would agree that it is ok for employers to keep their employees from bettering themselves by seeking better employment that could include a better salary or promotion. Why do we not want to allow American citizens the opportunity to provide better for themselves or their family? Why would we allow an employer to write a contract stating that patients are not allowed to follow the healthcare practitioner? Do you want someone to tell you that you are not allowed to see your doctor anymore because they left the current practice? Please pause and give that some thought. Relationships are built with medical professionals on a personal level. As a consumer of healthcare, I am selective with my doctors and HCPs. Approximately 20 years ago one of my doctors left his practice. I was not "allowed" to have the information to the practice he was moving to and that I would be transferred to another provider within that office. I found my doctor and transferred my records. It is not ok, EVER, to prevent patients from seeing the I-ICP of their choice. I will repeat myself, it is: unethical practice, obstructing care, increasing corporate greed, destroying careers. If you want to grow the work force, drop all non-compete clauses."
Eileen	"Noncompete clauses are unfair to workers. As a pediatric specialist, I am still paying back my loans, I spent 10+ years obtaining medical training If I want to leave this employer, I can't stay in my home, I have to move to an entirely new city due to non-compete clauses. I can't switch employers or start my own practice within a certain mile radius, because my current employer has all the control. They pay me for my work, but gave me no great "investment" to start here—why do I have to sign away my freedom to get a job?"
Bryan	"I have been in the insurance business for 15 years and never been able to switch jobs or start my own Agency due to a non-compete. This would change our industry for the good by allowing veteran brokers to start their own firm or actively look at opportunities to better themselves and their families. Thank you for making this overdue change to the rules."

Theresa	" Physicians should not be held to non-compete contracts. This should include non-profit as well as for profit health care systems. Physicians are often forced to leave an undeserved area when non-competes are enforced."
Harpreet	"There should be no non- compete for physicians like every other profession. This allows physicians too to change jobs without disrupting the lives of their loved ones by having to move cities, states because of non- compete. Thank you"
Kevin	"Non-compete agreements prevent healthy competition within the labor force. They do not allow workers to pursue better pay and benefits by leveraging their skills. This is an affront to the free market and all the principles of liberty we hold dear."
Jennifer	"Stop crippling the broken medical system with non-competes. I'm losing a great doctor and so is EVERYONE. Her practice was bought by Axia and she's making less than minimum wage. No one can live on that. She and her entire practice are quitting but can't work in Northern KY or most of Cincinnati because of a non-compete. Now all of the patients are scrambling to find a new practice who is taking patients."
Greg	" Several years ago the stylist that cut my hair decided she wanted to strike it out on her own and start her own small salon. Then she found out that she signed a rather obscure clause in sonic HR papers she signed when she was hired that told her she couldn't. A non-compete clause, designed to keep her from leaving, stifled her ability to start a new business, and at the same time made her unable to earn a living unless she moved 100 miles away. This is anticompetitive, and unnecessary in the services trade such as this."
Tina	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No.P201200 - If I had been under a noncompete clause at my previous job I would not be employed at my current employer. I would not have been able to make the switch to a position closer to home that offers more opportunities for advancement and additional benefits not offered by my previous employer. However in order to make the switch my current employer requires you to sign a non-compete agreement. So should I arrive at a similar situation where I had an opportunity to obtain better benefits at another like company I would no longer be able to take that position."
Nabil	" Physicians should not be exempted"
Julie	"I work in healthcare and non-competes for doctors severely impact patient care. Recent enforcement of a non compete in my area will move my OBGYN 45 minutes away from me. This has effected hundreds of people and will have a lot of consequences for patient care by creating delays in patient care that cannot be adequately addressed."
Patricia	"Please ban non-competes. There are many people in my field (including myself) that have been negatively affected by them. It completely negatively impacts the employee."
Megan	"I am greatly against non compete causes. As a family nurse practitioner I has to sign one to obtain by job and it makes it very difficult to go anywhere else in the surrounding counties in my employer and I were not go work out."

Amber	"I am a physician who has practiced in 2 states and I support banning the non compete. I feel strongly that noncompetes are bad for healthcare. Unhappy/burned out physicians get stuck with either staying in a job they don't like or are forced to move their family because of these rules. Employers also have no incentive to improve working conditions because their employees can't leave. Employers should instead reward employees for retention and work to create an atmosphere where people want to work/stay by their free will. Noncompetes are an unfair practice in a country that is founded on freedom and competitive markets. Healthcare is horribly understaffed, much of which is due to the healthcare system policies like non competes Banning noncompetes would be a huge step towards showing healthcare workers we value their work. We cant provide care without the people. I believe this change will ultimately create a healthcare system where people want to work, though forcing employers to make change that results in retention."
Concerned	"noncompetes are antithetical to capitalism"
Chris	"I support this action to abolish noncompete clauses. A close friend of mine is a healthcare small business owner and struggles in growing his practice due to a noncompete clause. It hinders work stream and personnel expansion. Please move forward with this action and restore the uninhibited entrepreneur spirit and wage equity. Thank you"
Chris	"The government should 100% do away with non compete clauses!! Big companies continue to make profits while preventing people from being competitive and making an honest wage. Also, if the non compete is unfair , an individual could never compete with the deep pockets of big business in court! Time to do away with non competes!!!"
C	"If employers may fire at will, then employees should be able to make themselves immediately whole by pursuing any employment available, without being burdened by non-compete restrictions. It's an unfair hardship. Besides, it is restrictive of a person's rights to pursue prosperity. An employer who imposes these agreements is thwarting ability of another employer to hire an otherwise available human asset."
BONNIE	"Taking away an employee's right to compete only allows big businesses to monopolize the industry and the workers have to endure less pay and benefits It also makes it easier for them to unfairly treat employees because they know they are stuck. The American dream would be stamped out."
Jennifer	"Please put an end to this nonsense! Non-compete clauses only help big businesses and that's not what medicine should be about. Doctors work hard to educate themselves for many years and deserve the right to a fair working environment and wage."
Anna	"I support ending no-compete clauses. As physicians , we don't have proprietary information. We have information on anatomy, physiology, pathology, mental and physical aspects of health. That is gleaned from years of training We should be able to take that knowledge wherever we can have the most well-balanced life. We deserve choice and freedom to move around, just as the majority of other employees."

Sean	"As an employee current under a very broad non-compete , I have first hand knowledge of how these one-sided, compulsory agreements negatively impact employment freedom and American innovation. It disallows new business creation in the industries employees are most familiar with and hampers wages by limiting the potential options employees have (often pushing them to industries where they have less expertise). I am in favor of these proposed changes."
Farzin	"I am delighted that this issue is being addressed. The Non-Compete Clauses are anticompetitive, increase costs (especially in healthcare limiting doctors and other professionals to move to another employer or start their practice) and affect mobility and access for many may people. Thank you for considering this rule change and along with multitude of friends and others who have commented, we urge you to please make them obsolete."
Chace	"I write you today in support of the proposed rule change regarding non-compete clauses. I am a Nurse Practitioner in a rural town in Kentucky. The non- compete clause I have in my current contract prohibits me from gaining employment without moving my entire family. In rural healthcare, it is of utmost importance to have access to healthcare. With current non-compete laws I am bound to my current area regardless of salary or poor working environments. Additionally, non-competes allow employers to use threat of litigation to maintain dominance over their employees. Non-competes breed stagnation in all fields where they are used and enforced. This rule change would improve MANY aspects of medicine. This rule change would increase access to healthcare in rural areas. This rule change would breed competition in the field, thus improving salaries and work conditions. I respectfully ask the FTC my support this rule change and to ban non-competes. Thank you."
Jason	"Please ban all forms of non compete contracts. Please make all existing on compete contracts null and void. These contracts work unfairly to keep employee earnings suppressed, prevent people from working in their chosen career fields that they have studied and invested in over the course of their adult life. These contracts only hurt hard working people in order to protect the profits of companies."
Alexander	"I support the FTC's proposed rule providing that it is an unfair method of competition for an employer to enter into a non-compete agreement with a worker. These agreements are abused by employers which results in negative outcomes for workers (and ultimately the economy as a whole) since they stifle competition and increase transaction costs, among other outcomes. I have seen firsthand how employers include terms in these agreements they constructively know to be unenforceable so employers can leverage these terms, along with their superior ability to withstand the costs of litigation, against workers to extract outcomes they desire. While in a vacuum there are reasonable justifications for these agreements, they have become another tool the powerful wield against the powerless. Any benefit is vastly outweighed by the cost and therefore it is proper for the FTC to determine that these agreements are an unfair method of competition. Thank you."
Satya	"Completely agree with banning the non compete clause. It will free up unnecessary hold of corporates and strain the choices of employees"

Ray	" Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help trillions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. Further, the notion that you can be fired at any time, for any reason, and then kept from seeking further employment in that field is nonsensical on its face. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Ray Gentile Richmond, KY Original Comment Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Kent	"Non compete clauses have become a tool for punishing workers who seek better employment, and should severely curtailed if not eliminated. If businesses are worried about retention, there are all manner of tools at their disposal including wage incentives, workplace amenities, benefits, etc. Making it impossible for an employee to make a living elsewhere smacks of a new take on the old company town of coal mining days. When the only means of support rests in the hands of the employer, workers have no more choice than did indentured servants. I urge the Commissioners to eliminate this practice. It is bad for business and harmful to working families."
Rupinder	"It is long overdue...please get it done this time."
Maria	"Please consider including physicians in abolishing non compete clauses. If a physician is unhappy they are not allowed to just leave. They are stuck. The only way out is to uproot their family and take their kids out of established schools and move sometimes to another state. This also puts patients at risk when losing their doctor. Finding a doctor is tough and finding one that you trust is even harder. Abolishing the noncompete would help patients, families and physicians"
Vinay	"Absolutely cancel . Hospitals are abusing physicians and blackmailing them into agreeing to suboptimal situations"
Campbell	"As a physician, I believe that this is an excellent rule. I know it will not be applied to all hospitals, but I wish it would be. I do not see how this will be bad for workers."

Rajiv	"These clauses infringes on employee rights and should be re evaluated."
Amitava	"I am a physician who has suffered as a result of this silly law. I left my practice in Louisville KY after 16 years of partnership. All I wanted was to be left alone. But my ex partners sued me for breach of non compete (practicing a specific type of surgery with 200 miles for one year). I wasn't even performing the type of surgery specified. Anyway I had to spend over 100K in lawyer's fees just to protect myself. This is a regressive law and must go."
Nicholas	"I live in Louisville, Kentucky but work as a primary care physician in Jeffersonville, Indiana. I trained with Indiana University and have connections to the state despite living across the Ohio River in Louisville. I am strongly in favor of the proposed rule by the FTC to ban non-compete clauses. I currently have a non-compete clause in my contract with my employer as I work in a hospital-owned practice. I have the same general objections to non-compete clauses personally that I believe any individual subject to a non-compete would have including increased difficulty with job mobility within a reasonable distance from where I live as well as the difficulty with negotiating more competitive compensation, but I believe this my non-compete is detrimental to the patients who I serve. With the significant shortage of primary care providers across the US, I know it would be a significant burden to my patients if I left my current practice and could not join or start a practice in the same geographic area. Patients want their primary care provider to be located close to where they live. Pd estimate that at least 90% of my patients live within 10 miles of my office. There area multitude of items I am currently weighing leading up to my next contract in 2024 that may result in me deciding that it is better for me to make a change, but under my current non-compete provisions I would be forced to work in a different state or at least 50 miles from my current practice location for at least 3 years after the end of my contact. Although I could easily work across the border in Kentucky, I know that many of my patients would not follow me because of the increased distance and traffic concerns in a much larger city than the smaller communities I serve. My preference if I were to make a change, would be to work in the same area and have the opportunity to serve the same patients I am currently serving. A different practice may actually allow me to serve them better with better staffing support, electronic medical records integration, etc. I think the benefits to the worker with respect to ending non-competes are obvious, but I do think that there can often be additional benefits to the community that I hoped to highlight. Thank you for strongly considering this proposed rule and I hope that it becomes enacted."
Greg	"I believe passage of this legislation will make employers treat all workers more fairly as it will keep long term employees from feeling trapped. I think it will open up new ideas in existing markets and may even create new markets not realized due to these agreements."
Tammy	"I work in a mailroom at a large utility company. I absolutely love my job. When the company I was contracted to lost the bid to renew their contract. The new company that came in hired some of us part of being hired was signing a non compete. I didn't want to sign but at the time I was scared and desperate. 54 and job hunting. So I signed. There is no proprietary knowledge in a mailroom. I make less than someone working fast food. Yet I am bound to these people who don't seem to care when it counts. Non competes are wrong. Any other contract you sign usually asks if you are doing it under duress."

Brandon	"I feel that the removal of non compete clauses would greatly improve people's wages and working environment. This would allow for people to move to a different company if they felt they were treated poorly and being taken advantage of. My wife is currently under a non-compete clause that lasts 2 years. tier license has to be renewed every 2 years, making it next to impossible, due to CE hours needed, to move to another company."
No Personally	"My mother has worked in Property Management for almost a decade now and was never required to sign a non-compete through out all her years of work up until this last year. The business she was last working for in Property Management didn't require any of their employees to sign a non-compete. That is until one of the employees left due to unfulfilled promises. Since the day that employee left everyone was required to sign a non-compete and to make it legally binding everyone got a pay increase and a title change. My mother signed the agreement expecting maybe a little heavier workload to pick up the slack but was willing to continue her employment with the company. Instead what followed was months of public humiliation, ridicule, and borderline verbal abuse on a daily basis. A few of the examples that she was willing to tell me involved the company hiring someone with little or no work experience as her boss despite her many years with the company and numerous years in her career. When she went to confront the CEO about the hiring practice and the new hire's shortcomings for the position she was told that the new employee would be talked with. Instead of a private conversation the CEO gathered everyone for a meeting and took what she told the CEO in a private conversation and publicly told everyone including the new employee. There were multiple meetings throughout the weeks and after each meeting the CEO became increasingly antagonistic toward my mother. The meetings were initially about processes that were supposed to be done by the new employee that weren't getting done. Each time my mother soon became the center of discussion with her duties being called into question as if she was expected to do her job and the job of someone else. Often times the meetings would end with the CEO yelling at her or her breaking down into tears and with her having signed the non-compete she felt trapped in a job that was no longer a cooperative, safe working environment that it once was. It was recently that she decided enough was enough and quit working for the company that was once a friendly and caring business now turned hostile. Unfortunately, due to the non-compete that she signed she can not work in Property Management within 50 miles of her previous employer for one whole year or for any person, business, or entity that she may have come into contact with during her employment. Which is in my opinion outrageous considering she is a single mother with a family of 3 Asking her to uproot her life and move 50 miles away to be able to work in the same industry would be costly not to mention difficult for her children to adjust to the new location. To not work in the same industry for one year is not feasible due to the significant decrease in income would require her to work 2 or even 3 jobs to maintain in different industries to maintain the same amount of income. On top of that not working for any person, business, or entity that she may have come into contact with would eliminate 75 to 80% of her local job market thus limiting the amount of jobs she may be qualified for and forcing her into less desirable jobs or jobs she has little to no experience in."

Hassaan	"Non compete clauses lead to unfair work environment for physicians and also patients suffer as they are unable to follow up with the physician of their choice. For patient safety and choice I would advocate to do away with non competes for physicians"
Jordan	""WE SUCK SO BAD AS A BUSINESS YOU HAVE TO SIGN THIS PAPER STATING YOU WONT IMMEDIATELY LEAVE AND GO WORK FOR OUR MUCH NICER COMPETITION." -businesses that rely on Non-compete agreements to retain employees Seriously though, if your business fails because your employees jumped ship to work for your competition, YOU are the problem. Not the competition, not the employees that left to go work for them, YOU. A legally binding document that threatens workers for using their skills somewhere else is not the help you need."
A Thomas	"Pass the regulation and make illegal ALL non-compete clauses. All types."
Kayla	"I'm a physician and non-Competes are bad for medical care. It creates a monopoly on patient care, contributes to physician burn out, and is overall a cause for poor patient outcomes. I strongly agree with the ban on non-competes."
Kayla	"Non-compete clauses hurt healthcare by contributing to healthcare worker burnout. By excluding them from this you're isolating an entire group and they will leave the field finding other higher paying jobs leaving us with a worsening healthcare crisis."
Stacey	"I am a resident of the state of Kentucky. Luckily for me, my state's Supreme Court has already looked unfavorably on non-compete clauses. Well run companies can design ways to limit any losses due to employees departures without making their former employees lives and their families lives unfairly proscribed. Intellectual property laws are firmly established and properly used to protect companies investments and products. In my case, as a veterinarian , some veterinary clinics have included non-compete clauses that encompass large parts of the state. I have luckily outlasted the final non- compete that has limited where I practice veterinary medicine and within a couple more months I could take any job in any town in Kentucky. Honestly, consumers want to make relationships with their providers of all kinds of services. Literally several of my clients have driven 45 minutes or more to see me as a veterinarian because they trust me with their pets' care but I cannot take a full time job closer in due to the non-compete clauses at my last employer's clinic. I have even had emergency clinics ask me to sign a non-compete which is ridiculous due to the fact that emergency veterinary clinics do not routinely see the same clients repeatedly because they are only there for emergencies. Thankfully I am an older veterinarian and very experienced. I worry about my young colleagues being forced to stay in a work environment that isn't suitable for their development due to the fear of having to add many hours and extra cost to work outside of a non-compete zone simply to enrich a former employer and keep their client base "safe". Non-competes generally help big business and harm individuals and limit their future horizons. Non-competes also affect consumers ability to choose the products and services they want to purchase in their own communities from the provider of their choice. I firmly support any federal rules that will limit the use of outright eliminate no non- compete clauses."

Caroline	"I am a neonatal nurse practitioner (NNP), I have cared for acute and chronically ill newborns for over 30 years. I was required to sign a non compete with my company. The hospital where I provided care contracted the services of myself and my fellow NNPs and our collaborating physicians, neonatologists. When the hospital dismissed the contact with my company, I was no longer able to work at the hospital or in the metropolitan area due to the non compete. The hospital and the Childrens hospital wanted to hire myself and the NNP team. My company refused to let us out of the noncompete. I am unable to work in my specialty for 2 years and 20 miles. The biggest concern is the loss in quality and safety of care for the babies and their families. The NNP team was the continuity in the NICU, Labor and Delivery and well baby nursery. I was told by my company that they would "fight" for me. This did not occur. I was told I could continue to work for my company if I traveled over an hour or more away. I was not interested in commuting this long of a distance. I want to work in the community where I live. I am a respected part of the community and have made a lasting impact on the lives of many babies and their families. I am no longer working for this company because I am disgusted with the way they have handled this situation. They do not care about me as an individual. I am currently out of a job. My career that has been my passion for 35 years. I am frustrated and bitter by what has transpired."
Patrick	"Government officials, Noncompete clauses are not fair. These stipulations actively contribute to physician burnout and career dissatisfaction. These provisions are routinely added to the contracts of physicians where they serve no benefit. Many doctors such as Hospitalists, ER doctors, Anesthesiologists and others do not have a patient population that actively follows them. Noncompetes have now morphed into a tool by bad acting administrators to hamper an employees ability to seek alternative employment in an unfriendly work environment. Thank you for reading."
Sharat	"As a physician who has served a rural community in the state of Kentucky under the employment of a " non-profit health system", I fully support repealing the use of any such non-compete in America. My understanding is this is being considered for mostly for profit institutions. This ignores a very large segment of employers who have described themselves as " non-profit" such as the bulk of health systems in the US. This is merely a label and a poor disguise for institutions which operate with nothing but the bottom line as their primary goal. My practice has operated since the 1990s in Danville, Kentucky. We are the only cardiology practice that has been present and has worked tirelessly to serve this rural community. The practice was a private practice originally. Unfortunately, just as most cardiac practices throughout the country have had to, our practice had to come under the control of these hospital systems to maintain its viability. We have strived hard to provide top level cutting edge care in this part of Kentucky. We have endured multiple hospital administrations and CFAs and have had a reasonable working relationship with the hospital through this time. This all changed with the advent of a new administration and a new CEO. This new administration and new CEO have worked over the last 3 years to dismantle all the work that has been done by multiple physician groups in this hospital system. Our group has been the latest and probably most significant victim of

	this administration. Despite our best efforts to reconcile and make things work, the CEO ignored all level-headed advice from all those around him and basically destroyed our practice. We have been desperate to maintain our practice and continue to serve our patients in the small community despite the situation. We worked with other employers with the idea of maintaining our practice while coming out from our current hospital system umbrella. This would have allowed us to continue to serve the community and remove ourselves from this administration. The CEO and the administration, driven by what most consider petty ego, have squeezed us out and forced us to leave the area with the employment contract non-compete in place. To say that a practice which has been here for more than 30 years should be pushed out by a CEO who has been here 3 years is ridiculous. I have spent the last 6 months hugging patients medical staff nursing who are stricken by the fact that we are being pushed out. Patients desperately ask me how they can maintain care if they have to travel up to an hour to see their doctors with this change. They worry how they can pay for the steep gas prices to see their doctors. They are told by this current hospital administration that they will be hiring replacement physicians. They are not told that these replacements are not cardiologists but primary care APPs who have absolutely no experience in taking care of any kind of cardiac pathology. They are truly concerned for the health of their families. All the while all I can do is tell them that my non-compete does not allow me, their cardiologist for the past decade, to give them any advice on how to maintain their care. This is the situation that arises when these non-profit health systems operate with complete disregard for the very sacred relationship that develops between physicians and their patients. I know that the non-compete concept is described in terms of lost wages and reduced competition. But what many fail to understand is that in healthcare, when it comes to non-competes with physicians and nurses and technicians, this non-compete is calculated in lives. I hope this is something that will make you guys push this removal of the use of non-competes and broaden it to include both profit and non-profit organizations. Thank you"
Andre	"It should not exist - bigger companies are taking advantages of employees and people to start their small businesses"
Sashi	"As an employed physician , I strongly support this rule which aims at eliminating the non compete clause in the contract. Most physicians have a non compete clause on their contracts which prevents them from working in a 25-50 mile radius from their last job for 1-2 years. This means, either they have to find a job away from their family or move the family to another town. This puts an enormous emotional burden on us and our families. Non compete clause has to go."
Manikya	"Yes it is absurd to have non compete clauses and this is preventing talent to move around and do advances. If big organizations are concerned they can always have non disclosure clauses but non compete in distance and time is bad."
K	"I support banning non-competes. I'm a qualified mental health professional working in a FQHC and my current contract includes a non-compete agreement. There is a shortage of QMHPs in my area. If I left my current job I would have to leave my rural area to provide services in the nearest town 30 minutes away."

Arpita	"As a physician , I fully support removal of non-compete clauses. These clauses limit fair pay for physicians by limiting ability to practice at the system of their choice. They do not add any value for workers, and just help hospital systems by forcing physicians to stay employed in their system. Thank you"
Adam	"This is a great step. Please move forward and end non-compete contracts."
Melissa	"Please consider doing away with non-compete clauses; it's better for patient care."
Mel	"I believe non-compete agreements cause very restrictive futures for key individuals at the companies they work for. Young workers jump jobs frequently to gain additional salaries, income experience and to find what work they love. Older workers over 50 that have many years of knowledge and innovation that get stuck because of these non-compete agreements is a crime. I think that a non-compete cannot cover a large scope of restriction, and that employers must pay a one year severance to keep a non-compete agreement in force. The non-compete agreement should never be more than one year and should really be banned. I have around 20 patents, and I have been stymied in my career with no pay increases in several years Eliminating non-compete agreements will stop this employer dominance and really improve innovation. I have several years of innovation to create."
Andy	"I never agreed with noncompetes. If a company is as wonderful as they present themselves to be, then why do they need this contract? I have worked my way up from the bottom being a warehouse assembler to the top of my industry for the past 24 years. Last year I was actually the #5 sales person in the nation for my national company that employs over 2500 people. About 3 years ago I was presented with a Non Compete, Non Solicitation Agreement, and a Non Disclosure. I even asked if I did not sign it what would happen? The answer was that I would not be allowed to work for the company. I have a wife, 2 kids and myself that I support on one income, so I could not risk losing my job in an industry that I spent over half of my life in. Things were nothing really to complain about until I signed that contract. The company's goals and my goals do not line up any longer, but I am chained to all the contracts I had to sign. I make a wonderful living, but I am customer driven and my companies goals seem to be profit and not the vision of the client any longer. I am unable to work with anyone that even in my industry (manufacturers, companies that compete, or anyone that might offer the same items we do). With me working my entire adulthood in one industry, it would be impossible for me to make the income I currently have. Matter of fact I have other companies constantly asking me to work for them at a much better wage and even offer to have lawyers look at my contract to see if there is a way to bypass it or at least find away to make it work for me until the expiration dates run out. However, I fear that if they find out I was talking to the other companies that they would consider firing me and I would lose my lively hood causing me not to work in my industry for at minimum. You would think being one of the best in the nation that your direct manager would give credit to this accomplishment, but constantly criticizes ever move me and my team do, because I focus on the clients' needs and he is only concerned about profit margins. I am a concervative Republican, but I pray this rule passes and helps people like me get out of these contracts that really feels like torture and no way out of the situation, unless we were to sell all of our assets, homes and vehicles that we worked so hard for the past 20+ years. If this rule passes, my company will have no choice but not only be more caring for their employees that they feel they have in slaved with these contracts, but I believe it will also give the employees like me to have more authority to fight for our clients to get the best possible outcomes or we will go to a company that will value that. Please do not change a single thing to the rule and pass this as soon as possible! I would be happy to speak to a congressman, senator or whoever I can to help this become [permanent]. I hope you fight to change the other contracts such as non disclosure, non solicitation, etcc as well. These are just as bad with the verbage they use."

Julie	"Non-compete agreements should be against the law. They're used by companies as a means to "punish" former employees by suppressing their ability to make a living. It's a fear tactic and it doesn't create a fair playing ground."
Jackie	"I am in complete support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements as our family has suffered through two back to back clauses since the COVID-19 pandemic stripped my husband of his high paying sales job with a very large company, who fired him for lack of sales during the pandemic and enforced their non-compete, causing him to withdraw from an industry he very much loved, due to no fault of his own. Our family lost more than 550k/yearly in wages as he had to take a much lesser paying job until the non-compete expired after one year. This occurred again when he returned to the industry for a short time, and once again lost his job due to the ownership changing, and still the non-compete clause not rescinded so he could explore other companies within the industry who very much wanted to hire him. This clause only directly impacts the employees who many times are unjustly let go to increase profits for large corporations who do not care about their employees. A company should never have this much control over a person and their financial wellbeing when they are allowed to unjustly fire employees at will to line their pockets and they enforce a ban on employment in a like industry. These employees are forced to sign these non-compete clauses in order to gain employment which causes long term financial damage for the employee who has no control over whether they can keep their job."
Kylee	"Please move forward with this to protect the American working class."
Michael	"I am an Independent Board Certified Family Medicine Physician and I am writing in support of banning all non-compete agreements. In the medical field most MD, DO, NP, APRN, PA (healthcare providers) are required to sign perpetual non-compete agreements as a part of their employment contracts. With large Medical Groups buying up hospitals and private practices, applicants often have limited employment options. Thus, with less competition almost every Medical Group requires the employee to sign a non-compete agreement. For example. in Louisville, KY and the surrounding 50 mile radius, the majority of Hospitals are owned by one of three large Medical Groups (Norton lcalthcare. l3aptist lmlth, and The University of Louisville). With the exception of the VA hospital, there are no options tier a hospital based healthcare worker to work without a required non-compete agreement. Hospital groups brag about their high retention rate, but fail to mention that their employees

	are essentially trapped. A typical non-complete agreement prohibits an employee from working for a competitor within a 30 miles radius from their clinic, for at least 1 year. Thus, for a healthcare worker to leave a Medical Group they will have to find a job 30+ miles away and commute to work for at least 1 year before they can return to the community they were serving. This creates stress on individuals, their spouses, and their children. If the employee changes jobs they will have less time to spend with their family because of the forced commuting time. There is also a logistical impact on trying to drop children off at school or daycare and picking them up at the end of the day. The childcare burden is especially difficult on single parents. Alternatively, if the employee wants to change jobs, they may have to uproot their family and move to a new community. As a result many healthcare workers cannot take jobs that offer a promotion, better pay, or a better fit with their family dynamics. Again, these punishments are due solely to the existence of the perpetual non-compete clauses required by virtually every Medical Group. With perpetual non-compete clauses Medical Groups have less incentive to improve work conditions because the employee bears the burden of penalties trying to work for a competitor. It is widely known that burnout is a significant problem for healthcare workers. (Ironically burnt out (or "morally injured") healthcare workers are leaving healthcare or moving away from direct patient clinical care into Administration . The lack of control over their own careers contributes to the burnout affecting healthcare workers. In addition to offering meditation classes, employers should compete in a free market to provide the best work environment to attract and retain the best employees. The non-compete clause guts the motivation for the employer to improve because "where are they gonna go"? In regards to intellectual property; that issue can be handled as a separate legal agreement if an employee wants to create IP in partnership with an employer. The majority of healthcare providers will spend all of their time caring for patients and not creating intellectual property. The ability/knowledge to treat a patient is paid for by the individual and taught by schools and training programs. In summary, the non-compete clause indirectly harms patients by harming healthcare workers. First, the patient loses their provider-patient relationship when the provider is forced to take a job 30 miles away instead of across the street. Second, when a healthcare provider leaves medicine or direct patient care that harms the patient by reducing their healthcare accessibility. Removing the non-compete clause will not solve all of medicine's problems. But it will create a free market environment where medical groups compete to attract and more importantly retain quality healthcare workers.  https://vvvvw.mcpiqjournal.org/article/S2542-4548(21)00126-0/fulltext"
Karen	"I am in favor of this change. I've seen countless people get stuck at my corporation because they have non-compete clauses. Once you've amassed expertise in an industry, it's difficult to find a new job outside of that industry. When a non-compete is in play, this means you either have to stay at your current job forever (not good for wages or mental health), must walk away from significant compensation (stocks, etc), or must get a job for a year or two outside of your area of expertise (likely at a lower wage or position). It's a terrible situation for an employee to be in. Especially when adding in the stress of maintaining healthcare benefits for a family. If a company can fire an employee at will, why can't an employee move jobs to any employer they choose at will?"

MEG	"I enthusiastically support the end of non-complete clauses—! I am a veterinary specialist and was not allowed to work in my city until I BOUGHT THE NON-COMPETE OUT, this, despite the fact that there was no one to replace me at my former employers. Veterinarians, clients, pets and communities are adversely affected by this antiquated law. Thank you for proposing its end."
Eric	"I FULLY SUPPORT getting rid of non competes. Companies should train their employees well enough that they can go anywhere but treat them so well that they don't WANT to go anywhere instead of having this fallback for employee retention. It will help keep them honest."
Brennan	"I am in strong favor of the proposed rule change. My noncompete agreement restrict me from changing jobs within my industry for one year. This severely limits my ability to negotiate fair market value for my services. I am forced to choose between taking whatever is offered by my employer or being unemployed for a year."
MARTHA	"The non-compete rule seems unjust, is unjust. Justice demands that the rule be banned or done away with. Justice is what matters whether I personally like the outcome or not."
Craig	"I am a Professor at a public University College of Dentistry . I strongly support banning employers from imposing noncompetes on their workers. This is a practice done at our College since 2010. I agree that noncompete agreements are widespread and an exploitative practice that suppress wages, harm morale, hamper innovation, and block entrepreneurs (e.g., healthcare providers) from starting new businesses. I encourage you to establish this rule, which would be consistent with recognizing noncompetes are an unfair method of competition and therefore violate Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act."
Shelley	"As someone who is currently bound by a non-compete, I am in FULL support of this rule. I am a specialized healthcare provider with a doctoral degree. My current non-compete would require me to commute over an hour from my home each way, or completely relocate my family, to continue working in my field. It is my opinion that non-competes of this scope are egregious, and simply meant to force employees to stay in a less than desirable work situation. It removes any responsibility for the employer to provide competitive compensation, opportunities for advancement, and a quality workplace culture. It stifles competition, creativity, and improvement in the quality of care and service delivery - and puts the focus of healthcare entities on dollar signs instead of where the focus should be, which is on the patients we serve. I look forward to the adoption of this rule, as I believe it will lead to better outcomes for patients by requiring employees to truly support their providers."
Michael	"As a physician at the University of Kentucky our hours are often expanded while our salaries remain fixed. The non compete clause includes any UK affiliate in the state with a 60 mile radius. This effectively makes it to where you must move out of the state to work anywhere else in the state of Kentucky. This not only keeps salaries fixed it reduces access to healthcare in a state that is suffering from a significant physician shortage by forcing us to move out of state to change jobs. The non compete is in place for the sole purpose of forcing providers to continue to work in a hostile underpaid work environment as inpatient physicians do not have a patient panel that can follow them when they leave. Please make this change and keep physicians in their home states to practice and provide care."

Cindy	"I support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses in the United States. Non-competes keeps talented people who want to work out of the workforce and often unemployed. My physician is unable to continue to serve our community because she did not renew her contract with a large, uncaring business that owns physician practices."
Genevieve	"I recently left a company with a non-compete contract. There are several reasons why this is unethical. First I have not received a raise in over 3 years because I am told I make too much. Secondly, I am employed as a family nurse practitioner with this company. I went back to school and obtained my degree and certification as a psychiatric nurse practitioner. This company did not pay for any of my education, but I am unable to leave to work as a psych NP without abiding by my non-compete. The last 6 months I have been harassed and had to get Human Resources involved. They were also not following my contract that I am being held by their powerful lawyers to abide by. The last 6 months has taken a toll on my physical and mental health while I tried to figure how to get another job without having to move. I have had to go on anxiety medication for the first time in my life, see a therapist, and was told by my cardiologist that due to the toll it has taken on my heart I must find a new job if I want to live. This has also affected my family. I beg you to make non-competes illegal! I hope no one ever has to endure the harassment and pain that I have over the last six months. I have had to take a part time job which does not pay near what I was making as the bread winner for survive. This is so unethical."
Ferenc	"My name is Ferenc Nagy MD, and I am a board-certified vascular surgeon. I have been in full time clinical practice since 2010. I am writing in a personal capacity and not on behalf of my employer or any society. In the strongest terms possible I support the proposed Non -Compete Clause rule in its current form. The current employment environment of clinical medicine is undergoing two fundamental shifts which show no sign of abating: 74% of physicians in the United States are now employed directly by health systems and large portions of traditional physician work is being replaced with non-physician practitioners (typically nurses and physician assistants). Taken together, these trends are placing enormous market power in the hands of large organizations regarding physician salary, work conditions, and practice patterns. The restrictive covenant of a non-compete clause, which by one study has impacted 90% of responding physicians, is the coup de grace; physicians now commonly find themselves tied to an organization, competing internally with nurses and PA's, and without the leverage of local mobility. Non-compete clauses in physician contracts are typically boilerplate inclusions, and no doubt comport with the local understanding of reasonableness in terms of duration and geography. However, the unique nature of medicine, as well as the enormous geographic footprint of increasingly consolidated health systems, make even "reasonable" restrictions effective eviction notices. As with all issues in medicine, this also ultimately is about the care of the patients we have dedicated our lives to. An employed physician, facing pressures that force him or her to consider leaving a group, routinely must consider a geographic upheaval as opposed to moving within a community to a new employer. This is an unacceptable disruption to the lives and care of the patients we treat. It is worth noting that the attorneys for the organizations that create these non-compete clauses have no such issue; non-compete clauses are barred by the American Bar Association"

Barbara	"I am reading the letter from American Hospital Association about non compete ban. They act like representatives for 270,00 physicians, 2 million nurses and other caregivers. I am not sure any one of the 5000 member hospital/health care systems asked opinions of their employees about their opinion (other than people in C-Suite). More over most of the health care workers are still not aware of this federal ban and how it will change their life for better. ABA is not a representative of employees other than health care systems. People who suffer from these rules doesn't even know some good like this happening. More over they are scared of health care systems retaliations if they publicly participate in this platform.. This ban will help lots of health care workers and employees of other business to have better life. It would improve the quality of life of people. thank you"
Casey	"Great companies are only great because of the extraordinary people who make them up - non competes are used by companies who were once great and no longer can sustain that greatness without suppressing others - you keep great people through empowerment- not suppression."
Ray	"Approve the rule and get rid of non-compete clauses they are the modern equivalent to Indentured servitude. Companies should have to prove financial loss not just bar employees from working in their given field for X number of months or years in a arbitrary geographical area."
Sarah	"As a physician , currently limited by a non-compete clause (in an academic institution), my ability to find work is limited. Every academic institution I interviewed with had a non-compete, which restricts free trade. I am in favor of abolishing non-compete clauses for all."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Louisiana | Statewide Impact

Louisiana Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual LA Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual LA Worker Earnings

	"I had to move 1600 miles away from my family for 2 years to get out of a NC with Emery Equipment in Baton Rouge, LA. Employers use the NC to bully their best sales people and other talent and can treat them with indifference because they know we can't go anywhere else in our chosen field unless we move out of state. One of my good friends left the company he worked for 22 years and was assigned customers out of state to handle to get around the NC agreement he had with the previous employer. However, the previous employer sued him anyway to make an example out of him because this was the 3rd salesman that left for his new company in 2 months. It ended up costing him $35,000 in attorney fees but the case was ultimately dismissed. They made sure they spread the message around that my friend had to borrow money from his dad to pay his legal cost. Please do away with this way out of date practice of bully companies. I'm currently under a 1 year non compete myself again." -D. B.
	"I am a service technician for a company that makes and repairs hospital equipment. Basically, do electrical repairs and plumbing repairs in hospitals. I have worked for them for 33 years. Many times, I was offered to better my life by switching jobs but couldn't due other companies did not want to deal with the non-competitive form I had to sign...At one point I didn't get a raise for 5 years. I like what I do and could have keep doing by starting my own hospital repair company but was afraid the company I work for would come after me. Doing away with this will force companies to treat people with more respect. Thanks." -Mike C.
	"When I worked in the petroleum industry as an inspector, non-compete agreements were commonly . . . complained about, since two of the largest companies in the sector . . . imposed these agreements onto their hourly workers. . . I told myself, ". . . The workers can still seek employment at a smaller barge service company and get the same job." However, I then watched Kirby acquire many of those small "competitor" barge companies . . . If it's not hard enough to only have a few mega-employers to work for, we then allow the employers to impose non-compete agreements on their employees so that they're unable to shop around for better wages Many of the agreements also prevent workers from starting their own business that would compete We can't succeed, thrive, and grow as a capitalist society if we allow companies to stifle competition, limit options for consumers, immobilize our workforce, and block innovation." -Cory K.

	"I strongly support this rule. I am currently the GM of a dealership and dream of owning my own but can't start one due to an unfair non-compete." -Mark N.
	"I have two acquaintances who have recently been disadvantaged by a noncompete clause. One was a franchise owner in Louisiana whose business was bought back by the franchisor after 20 years. The parties were unable to reach a renewal agreement last year and the buyout left the recent franchise owner at a disadvantage due to a noncompete clause. Another acquaintance works as an Information Technology professional in Florida under a contract with a noncompete clause that requires a time period of two years before he can go to work for a competitor or start his own IT business. He has earned a number of IT certifications and increased his value as an IT but employers are not inclined to increase the salaries of these skilled employees since other interested employers are reluctant to hire an employee who will be limited by a noncompete clause. The FTC ban on noncompete clauses would be a great relief to these two people as well as to thousands of other employees." -Dick H.
	"I am a neurosurgeon in a rural town. . . . I was assaulted and battered by one of the other neurosurgeons, and fearing for my safety and due to bodily injury, I left the group. I now find myself in a conundrum with my family waiting out a two-year non-compete that I did in fact sign but that I do not believe holds in these circumstances. . . . There are too few neurosurgeons in my region as there are in many regions and thus the geographic limitations of non-competes make it such that often neurosurgeons like myself have to relocate to a different state in order to obtain a different job and earn an income. . . . My non-compete was placed to run me out of the region if I ever left the practice regardless of fault or reason. From a patient perspective, my community has lost a neurosurgeon (and now level 2 trauma coverage for the region). . . . From my perspective, it is too financially expensive for me to relocate everything as a new graduate, and it would be a shame to waste three-and-a-half years of building a reputation in the community due to the silliness of the non-compete. I have been asked why I signed a non-compete in the first place. I have looked at numerous jobs, and I have never found one as a neurosurgeon without a non-compete clause." -P.B.

Kerry	"For those in specialized fields, noncompete are awful. If you are a specialist with 20 years of experience and are prohibited from working in your field if you decide or the company decides it is time for a change then you are in a horrible position. The financial impacts could be devastating. They should be banned."
Niksad	"I strongly support this movement to stop Non-compete clause. As a physician taking care of patients, we face so many challenges already. Recently we had private equity involvement in our owner ship and cut our payments by 30%. I am stuck in this unhappy situation and can't find a job in the town where my family is growing with kids going to school. Relocating to a new place will be hard on me and family as well. Non-compete clause allows management to treat physicians like puppets. Overall, it creates no competitions in die market to excel in what we do. Bad for die patient care."
K	"Don't limit doctors by profit oriented boundaries."
Anonymous	"I worked for a company for 19 years starting as a part time employee. I worked my way up the ladder learning my craft to become General Manager of the company. During my time as General Manager I was told by the owner he wanted all employees including me to sign a non-compete agreement. I knew this only benefits the owner and not the employees. I always trained and taught the employees to be Leaders in their fields so they could grow as a person and an employee. They excelled at becoming Leaders. When they asked for a raise that I couldn't afford I understood before the non-compete agreement that the employee should have the right to look for another job using their craft they excelled in. We were all told we had to sign the non- compete or risk losing your job. You had to wait out a year for the non-compete agreement to expire so that meant we had to find a job and start all over in another field then come back in a year, Non-compete should be outlawed everywhere since it benefits the owners only and not the employees. It means the owners have you under their thumb and you can take whatever your being paid or start over. An employee who is great at their job should not be limited to one company if they are not happy with the company pay or benefits. Every employee should be able to grow financially and shouldn't be punished for a year. It's like you are on parole by your employer if you leave. If you love what you do and work hard to improve you should be able to do just that. Grow and Compete not Non-Compete. Thanks."

Dr. Frank	"Non-compete is a relic of the pre corporate medicine past. Now our problems are more centered around monopolies and the power they have over individual physicians and the decisions they make for patients. Getting rid of non-compete will help physicians resist that pressure."
Robert	"Non-competes are absolutely unfair. They require an employee to surrender natural rights that they are entitled to."
Rachel	"Non-compete clauses are one of the most powerful tools that enable corporations to intimidate their employees. It is anti-trust and anti-American. All states should allow people a right to work, regardless of corporate greed!"
Rajiv	"1. I am a Subway franchisee owning 2 franchises and employing 12 individuals in Louisiana 2. Currently, my franchise agreement is for a term of 20 years. 3. When I signed my agreement, which was over 16 pages long, it was a "take it or leave it" situation in which I was forced to sign the agreement or walk away entirely. 4. The contract, which was drafted by my franchisor's attorneys and is completely non-negotiable, included a non-compete clause which states that "you will not have any direct or indirect association with a competing business within 3 miles of any Subway location, existing or existed in a prior year , for a period of 3 years after termination failing which I will be liable to pay up to 100,000 for 3 years.". . These terms restrict my ability to start a new business or in any way use my experience to work in a similar industry. 5. When my contract expires, I must renew for another 20 years, generally on significantly different terms that my original contract, pay a higher royalty at renewal to keep the existing terms of the agreement or give up my franchise entirely. 6. If I choose the latter, my noncompete clause makes it very difficult to use my experience to run and/or work for another business."
WILLIAM	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal and abolished!"
Byron	"I was hired by a regional staffing company in Louisiana in 06/2013. In 04/2017, was forced to sign a non-compete agreement to retain my job or face termination. In 01/2023 I was terminated, and then my former employer sought a temporary restraining order and filed for an injunction after I found employment with a national recruiting firm. My new employer chose to separate me to avoid issues. I gave my employer 10 years of service, and now I'm unemployed because I only know staffing, they are vindictive and irrational, and I cannot support my family. Please rescind this non-compete law."

Brittany	"As a specialized physician working for a large healthcare network, their non-compete stifles competition and prevents physicians from advancing in their careers locally. It forces physicians unhappy with their current position or looking for promotion to move out of state in order to find alternative employment, thus limiting the pool of highly qualified physicians in our already underserved area."
C	"Non-Compete clauses are immoral and should be banned from physician and nursing contracts."
Adam	"Please consider the addition on physicians and other medical professionals to the non-compete rule. Currently, non-competes harm patients, communities, and physicians. A large number of physicians pose not risk to their organization as many do not have a group of patients. Physicians such as anesthesiologists, radiologists, emergency medicine, pathologists, and other hospital-based physicians treat the patients that present to them. One hospital group in town has a non-compete that doesn't allow you to practice within a certain distance from one of their hospitals. This makes it so that anyone who leave must leave the state and neighboring state. This discourages innovative practice especially if the organization will not give you the full amount of resources needed to practice the full scope of your abilities."
Sarah	"No physician should have to sign a non-compete clause. This should also be the case in non-profit organizations."
Isolde	"I strongly support Banning non-compete clauses. They are anti-free Market, limit people's professional development, and essentially chain workers to particular companies with the only option to leave being to uproot their families and abandon their homes. Please support this. I'm sure there will be many businesses that launch strong efforts to protect non-compete clauses, but they are simply sayings for the American worker."
Dominic	"I support this rule. As a physician with a non-compete clause, I find that this hinders competition within our competitive market in our small medical community. While I love my current job and trust my employer, the non-compete stifles the free market. I support this rule change and the abolishment of the non-compete rules."

Carol	"Dear Members of the Federal Trade Commission. I am writing to support your proposed ban on non-compete agreements. I am a physician in Louisiana and have been practicing at the same job for 6 years. I am a hospital employee, and like most of my partners, I signed a non-compete agreement when I took the job. My non-compete agreement prevents the from working almost anywhere else in the state of Louisiana for two years after I leave my job. There is no end-date on this, so even if I work here for 20 years, I will still be held to the terms of this non-compete. I am currently happy at my job and not planning or desiring to leave it. However, if things changed and I needed or wanted to leave my job, I would have to move out of the state of Louisiana to be able to remain employed. My husband, who is also a physician and is in a highly subspecialized field of medicine, would be moving with me. Therefore, our state would lose two experienced physicians due to my non-compete agreement. Our state has lost a number of wonderful physicians who previously worked for my hospital but were not happy here; due to their non-compete clauses, they chose to leave Louisiana rather than risk being sued for violation of their non-compete agreement. This is terrible for our state, for our community, and most of all it is bad for our patients who lose their doctors. I understand that in Wine cases, an employer may make a significant investment in a physician when hiring them and that non-compete agreements protect businesses from losing this investment if a physician decides to leave soon after starting the job. I would estimate that this applies to only a very small percentage of physician jobs. If the FTC felt it necessary to protect businesses from this rare occurrence, they could allow exceptions and time-limited non-compete agreements for employers who make a very large investment in an employee. I think this is unnecessary overall, but I would understand if the Commission felt that it should be allowed. One might wonder why a physician would knowingly sign a non-compete as restrictive as the one I have. It is true that nobody (breed me to take the job. However, as hospital systems continue to conglomerate, many communities including mine are left with very few employment options for physicians. In many cases, a physician must choose between the job with the non-compete or no job at all. If people are dedicated to living in Louisiana, they will choose the job with the non-compete agreement rather than take a job in another region. I fully support the ban on non-competes because non-compete agreements are bad for physicians and even worse for our patients. Thank you so much for your consideration of this important matter." jacoby	"Non-compete clauses were designed to protect trade secrets. But there use has spread to workers such as waitstaff, hair dressers, medical workers, etc. whose certification and job skills are acquired not on the job but elsewhere and often at great expense. These do nothing more than to prevent the free movement of labor to those who will provide them with the best income, or best benefits, or closest to home. They are unfair and should be illegal. It is long past time to remove these restrictions on the an employee's right to work for whomever they want."

Allison	"We lose very good physicians from the state of Louisiana due to Ochsner's noncompete. They are essentially forced to leave the state. Many physicians feel trapped in this job because their families and lives are here."
William	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal. They give business owners too much leverage over employees. Rules can be promulgated so that business can seek redress for stolen customers or trade secrets. The main purpose of these clauses are to create indentured servants that have no choice of where to work if they do not want to uproot their families."
Vinod	"I am in full support of this rule. I am a practicing physician in a market with significant healthcare consolidation creating limited employer choice. When conditions get so bad that a physician with a non compete has to leave the geography I've seen a number of patients struggle to get adequate and high quality care. If a well established physician w a large patient panel is forced to leave the area, many of those patients struggle to find adequate care in a reasonable time. In many cases the wait time can be months to meet a new physician who has no context for any of the patient's conditions. This has an outsized impact with health disparities. There are a limited number of physicians willing/able to see Medicaid patients. When those physicians are forced to leave the communities, marginalized patients have an even more difficult time finding a new physician m. Additionally the physician's skills and acumen are the "trade secret" not the practice's infrastructure or marketing plan. I feel NCA's especially in health care compromise the physician's ability to practice their trade and compromise patient care."
Paul	"I think we need to provide workers with more leverage in an age of consolidation. We want entrepreneurs to be able to innovate and create products and services valuable to their local communities. We want workers to have the power to use their talents and apply their education on a competitive and level playing field. Please consider banning non-compete clauses."

	planned with my employer. He has nothing available after that time period. But my employer expects me to sign a non-compete which will be conditional for employment and will bind me 12 months after termination of this contract. This non-compete can keep me from full time employment once this contract is over. My employer has done this in the past and unfortunately, I have had to collect unemployment instead of continuing my trade with another company. If I did not have this non-compete, I would be able to apply for employment with the contract I am supporting full time, instead of this transitional phase of 6-9 months, which this company is going through. Supporting this bill supports competition and fair wages. Competition is good for everyone, the company and its employees. Better product, better services, etc... I hope this bill passes!!!"
Anu	"Please end non competes for physicians!!! It is ludicrous that a grown adult physician, with their family, would have to leave their entire community and home - because they couldn't practice within a certain radius of a large institution they worked for. This affects die children, die doctors, and the community as a whole. Big business is the only "winner" and holds this over the heads of the individuals, who tolerate abuse by their employer because they know that if they quit, their entire lives would be uprooted."
Glen	"The Non-compete Clause has not only surpassed its usefulness, been used in terribly one-sided ways (by companies), and caused hams to countless families, but also works to actively stifle individualistic creativity, small business creation, and negatively impacts the national economy as a whole."
Catherine	"I am physician who has practiced in a small community in Louisiana for over 28 years. I owned my own practice with a few other partners, then with changing cost of overhead with EMR's etc., we sold our practice to the hospital. As a hospital employed physician, the noncompete clause is nonnegotiable in our contracts. I feel it is outrageous that if I choose a different employment opportunity - that I would be railroaded out of a home and patients that I have served faithfully for nearly 3 decades! I am in total support of banning noncompete clauses."
Brant	"The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as

	physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompete should be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems."
Charise	"As a physician, I have moved from two states due to noncompete clauses to make a better work life balance and situation for my family. The real loss was to the patients I cared for in my previous cities. Had I been able to move my practice within the same vicinity (no noncompete), I could have stayed and supported those patients without sacrificing my own desires/job satisfaction in my career."
Michael	"Hello. I am writing to comment on the proposed ruling on noncompete clauses. I am a physician, and in my short career have had to sign many contracts which included noncompete clauses. These agreements are usually nonnegotiable on the part of the employer and are onerous in nature to the employee. These clauses have made practicing medicine very difficult, and in some cases life altering. I have had to move my entire family at least twice in my career in order to start anew due to the restrictive covenants of noncompete. Not only do they rob positions for local opportunities that don't disrupt your entire life, but they also rob communities of physicians they have entrusted their healthcare to. You will find many practicing physicians that have similar stories. You will also find many physicians that are no longer practicing because of such restrictive agreements. Noncompete clauses are an undue burden on the medical community who only wish to provide medical care for the general public. This hinders competition in the medical field, but also keeps many physicians, locked into horrible positions they no longer want to stay in. Practicing medicine is much more difficult when you are unable to leave your current position in order to start your own practice or join other groups that would greatly improve your quality life, and quite possibly your income. I highly support this ruling and hope that it goes through unopposed. Physicians will not be the only employees in America that will benefit from such a beneficial change to business practices."

Jill	"Please consider making this change for all physicians in our state, Thank you."
Deborah	"Noncompetes are just simply bad for patients and physicians. I worked for an emergency medicine staffing company in a rural location. When that company was fired due to poor production and the hospital gave the staffing contract to mother company, the original company had noncompete language, saying if the hospital wanted to keep me, they would have to buy out my contract. My identity as a medical physician should not be for sale! This is my hard work and education. It should not belong to any other entity to use as a pawn for their financial gain. Do not be deceived- the hospital lobby and corporate medical groups are against banning noncompetes for physicians and want an exemption - this is about control and money. This can be used to force a physician to stay at a practice even when it is no longer good for them. They might want to leave for many reasons - schedule, staffing, ancillary services, patient safety concerns. Physicians should be able to live and work in their own community even when they change jobs - which can be due to a bad work environment, or even a change in staffing contracts which are completely out of their control. We are held captive by noncompetes. This can lead to burnout, or to a physician actually having to leave the community to go to a different location. Patients lose their physician. Physicians lose their patients. This is a lose-lose. Please give physicians employment freedom and patients the freedom to keep their doctor when this happens. Why is this freedom not guaranteed??"
Pam	"I support the ban on noncompete clauses. In America our workers are as important as any managers or owners, Neither can exist without the other. These clauses trap people in lower wages, bad work conditions and make it harder for them to solve problems at work or improve their lives."
Angelle	"Non-compete agreements are particularly harmful to physicians , as they limit their ability to practice medicine in a way that best serves their patients and their own professional development. These agreements prevent physicians from moving to new practices, starting their own practices, or even working in the same geographic region for a certain amount of time after leaving their current employer. This can result in reduced access to healthcare for patients, as well as a lack of competition and innovation in the healthcare industry. Banning non-compete

	agreements for physicians would provide them with greater flexibility to move to new practices and locations, which would benefit both the physicians themselves and their patients. Physicians would be better able to utilize their skills and knowledge, and patients would have greater access to high-quality medical care. Furthermore, non-compete agreements for physicians can be particularly burdensome due to the extensive training and education required to become a physician. These agreements can limit the ability of physicians to practice in their chosen specialty, or to specialize in a new area of medicine. In conclusion, legislation to ban non-compete agreements for physicians is necessary to promote fair competition and ensure that patients have access to the best possible medical care. It is important to protect the rights of physicians and allow them to pursue their careers in a way that best serves themselves and their patients."
Atif	"Non competitive clauses are only used for intimidation and to keep employees as slaves. They do not provide benefits to anyone except for corporations and should be banned."
Nikita	"The Federal Trade Commission's proposed ban on non-compete agreements is a positive step towards promoting competition and innovation in the job market. Non-compete agreements can unfairly restrict workers' ability to seek employment in their field of expertise, limiting their options and potentially forcing them to accept lower wages or work in unrelated industries. These agreements can also stifle innovation by preventing employees from sharing their knowledge and expertise with competitors, hindering the development of new ideas and technologies. Furthermore, non-compete agreements can be particularly harmful to lower-wage workers who are often subject to these agreements as a condition of employment, even when their skills and expertise are not highly specialized. A ban on non-compete agreements would help level the playing field for workers and promote a more competitive job market, encouraging employers to compete for employees based on wages, benefits, and working conditions rather than restricting their mobility. Overall, the FTC's proposal is a positive development that would promote fairness and competition in the job market while allowing workers to pursue their careers and share their expertise freely."
Deborah	"Stop giving corporations everything they want. Consider the view of workers and the principle of fair, open competition. Enough with non-competes!"
Kathleen	"I am all for banning non-compete contracts. My current agreement with my employer prohibits me from performing the

	job for two years after termination of my contract. I have been working in my field for over 25 years and have honed my skills in my craft. Yet, if I leave this company, I cannot work in this area or even perform similar work. I cannot afford to wait two whole years to begin searching for available jobs, in my field, where I live."
Claire	"Non- competes are inherently detrimental to fostering and rewarding talent. They are regressive and a short sighted way for employers to bully employees in staying with them even if they fail the employees. In Healthcare, non-competes have caused massive monopolies and a talent brain drain to other fields. Doctors now warn people who wish to be doctors about the burdensome and often questionably ethical policies pressed on to new hires. I do not support non-competes, I will never support non-competes. And I will take offers for less money if it means not dealing with them. This is not a policy that will help employees or employers. It will only leave unhappy people trapped in jobs that do not value them, causing a sharp drop in productivity and share holder satisfaction. You are shooting yourself in the foot trying to kill competition which in all facets of life fosters excellence."
Karl	"Non compete clauses in medicine should all be rendered invalid. The focus of medicine is physician and patient. 1) Restraint of trade is never good 2) Physician shortages make it such that NCCs create an even greater shortage. 3) Employers often cite that the have "invested in a physician and taught them how to practice." This is absurd. The physician has put their own blood, sweat, tears, time and money into their education. The employer often taints the physician with improper styles of practice. Employers do NOT add value to a physician. 4) Employers do NOT own patients nor physicians. The two may establish their own unique relationship. In fact, that is the basis of medicine. 5) Young physicians are often misled into signing an employment contract that contains a NCC under duress because of their heavy debt load."
Barbara	"Non-compete clauses have gotten out of control. They put unnecessary restrictions on workers in favor of employers."
Dick	"Dear Ms. Lina Khan: I am writing to express my strong support of the FTC's plan to ban noncompete clauses. I believe noncompete clauses are unfair to workers. I have two acquaintances who have recently been disadvantaged by a noncompete clause. One was a franchise owner in Louisiana whose business was bought back by the franchisor after 20 years. The parties were unable to reach a renewal agreement last year and put the recent franchise owner at a disadvantage due to a noncompete clause. Another acquaintance works as an Information Technology professional in

	Florida under a contract with a noncompete clause that requires a time period of two years before he can go to work for a competitor or start his own IT business. He has earned a number of IT certifications and increased his value as an IT but employers are not inclined to increase the salaries of these skilled employees since other interested employers are reluctant to hire an employee who will be limited by a noncompete clause. The FTC ban on noncompete clauses would be a great relief to these two people as well as to thousands of other employees. Please accept this letter as my full support of the proposal to ban noncompete clauses."
Ronald	"I am a family medicine physician in New Iberia, LA. I joined a private practice because of the restrictive non compete clauses in all employed opportunities in the area. Even in private practice I had to sign a non compete for the city limits. I support FTC banning non compete. I think it would enhance physician career longevity."
Lucas	"Having been in industries where non-compete clauses were standard, I strongly support this rule and urge the FTC to adopt it. Capitalism only works when market actors are forced to compete with one another on an open marketplace, and that is as true liar a labor market as it is for other goods or services. If businesses want to hire the best staff, they should offer top-shelf wages and benefits, not erect contractual barriers to employees leaving should their work environment become toxic. That only incentivizes employers to become toxic to their employees, or at least removes any disincentive to treating them well. Such a thing ought to be viewed with contempt by anyone who values free-market competition and capitalism, not to mention the good of the working class, and such a rule is a prime example of a government intervention in the market which is morally, economically, and politically justified and proper."
Icant	"It takes a significant amount of effort for a physician to change jobs. Exempting physicians from this non-compete clause has to be the dumbest thing I've seen in a long time. If an organization does not want a physician to "switch jobs" and "take away a portion of the patient base" then its quite obvious that the worker should be paid more, or incentivized. The current non-compete agreements that are in place have resulted in hyperbolic, vindictive, egregious methods to keep physicians working at hospitals out of fear of retaliation. Hospitals use predatory tactics, such as baiting physicians in with high pay, but only if they meet impossible metrics. Then, their pay is docked, and now they cannot quit due to noncompete. Look up Oschner in Baton Rouge

	Louisiana. They have routinely done this for years. Some doctors get paid less than nurses. Unbelievable. Pure evil, and greed."
Kristie	"I support a ban on non compete clauses. I am a nurse and have worked for a home health company for nearly 13 years. It is a good company, with wonderful people working alongside me and I have had some phenomenal supervisors. However, the pay scale, for pretty much all positions, is well below our competitors in this market. I am now in marketing the this company and have sought employment elsewhere but due to my non compete am severely limited. I was actually offered a position, doing similar work, but not for a competing home health agency. This position would have paid about $20,000 more per year. It was with an LTAC, not home health, but because the parent company also owns home health agencies, their corporate attorneys said my non compete gave too much possibility of my company taking action against me and them. Non competes unfairly hinder Americans from market mobility that would improve our quality of life and our ability to provide for our families Again, I emphatically support the ban. Thank you for your time."
Elijah	"Agree with banning non compete. That will remove undue burden on a lot of doctors and make the administrators responsive to their needs"
Clinton	"I'm in support of the FTC proposal to federally ban non compete agreements."
Jeffrey	" Healthcare professionals often have a desire to practice in a city or town that has a need for them. In the event that the first occupational role taken by a professional is not the ideal situation, a professional is required to choose between abandoning patients to move to another area, not practicing for up to 2 years, or remaining in a less-than-ideal professional situation. Non-compete clauses stifle die ability for medical professionals to care for the patients in their community, something that especially harms small communities and FIRSA shortage areas. By removing non-compete clauses, healthcare professionals can not only help keep prices low for consumers. It also leads to better continuity of care, which leads to better healthcare outcomes for patients. As an owner of a dental practice, I believe that a non-compete is necessary for shareholders who own a significant portion of a business, but employees should not be subjected to such limitations. My employees have no non-compete, which forces me to give better pay, better treatment of employees, and treat them more fairly. Otherwise, they'll leave and could take patients with them. It forces me, as an employer, to not take advantage of employees who lack the knowledge, resources, or

	the ability to take an employer to court. In my opinion, everyone wins. However, the argument against this includes that it will stifle growth. I believe it will stifle the growth of large corporations - not small businesses. Our nation is built on small businesses in order to keep prices down, keep people employed, and provide a service for our community."
William	"Please pass this regulation - it will protect American workers and their families"
Cory	"I support the proposed rule to disallow certain Non-Compete Agreements. When I worked in the petroleum industry as an inspector, non-compete agreements were commonly discussed and complained about, since two of the largest companies in the sector, Kirby Marine and SGS, imposed these agreements onto their hourly workers. In 2013, I didn't think it was right for these companies to prevent their employees from seeking better pay or better working conditions, but I told myself, "It's not that had. The workers can still seek employment at a smaller barge service company and get the same job." However, I then watched Kirby acquire many of those small "competitor" barge companies, one by one, including Higman, Celiac, Savage, Seacor, and CGBM. You just have to read a day's worth of business news to see that Kirby is not the only large company that is acquiring any small competitor that pops up. If it's not had enough to only have a few mega-employers to work for, we then allow the employers to impose non-compete agreements on their employees so that they're unable to shop around for better wages or better working conditions. Many of the agreements also prevent workers from starting their own business that would compete with their former employer. We can't succeed, thrive, and grow as a capitalist society if we allow companies to stifle competition, limit options for consumers, immobilize our workforce, and block innovation. It is crucial for workers to have mobility, and the option to seek employment wherever they may better fit in, in order to be happier and more productive. I believe any concern over a company's secrets and confidential information can be adequately addressed with a non-disclosure agreement that has legal penalties for disclosing the confidential information."
JAMIE	"I think noncompete clauses in the healthcare industry are bad and the victims are patients. Sometimes physicians do not have a good fit with a hospital system whether private or non-profit owned. The hospital has the power to terminate contracts at will in Louisiana but physicians don't have power to leave at will? Our largest hospital system which is a non-profit, loves to place non-competes on physicians-- -even emergency physicians. It is a blanket power hold. I realize the onboarding process is difficult

	but if the physician is not satisfied then they should be free to leave if the onboarding investment has been neutralized or paid back. If a physician is insistent on leaving and suffers the non-compete, then they often have to move out of the state. patients lose their physicians, must establish new care with a new physician and must often wait months for availability. The hospital is more than willing to have the patient seen by a non-physician practitioner creating health disparities for those patients. Patients suffer from non-competes."
Jamie	"Non-competes clauses are bad for physicians and for patients. In my state, one of the largest hospital systems has forced sonic physicians to move out of state because they are forbidden to work in any parish where there exists this hospital has presence. This is bordering on monopoly. Two years ago, a sub-specialized physician had to move to the neighboring state. He not only loses out—the patients suffer, too. Just because a physician is not a good fit with a hospital does not mean everyone should be allowed to suffer. I understand the hospital wants to make its money back, but they need to be more reasonable. They also need to self-reflect on why the physician is leaving in the first place. The non-compete and physician exit is sometimes the symptom of the disease."
Matthew	"I am a pulmonary and critical care physician who specializes in the care of patients with rare, life-threatening diseases. Non-compete clauses are restrictive and detrimental to our patients. If I, for example, were practicing in an environment that is not serving my patients adequately and had an opportunity to leave to another regional facility and build a program that improves patient care, then I should not be restricted in my ability to do so. Hospitals and medical centers don't own the patients that they care for and patients should have the right to follow their physician to another location if that is overall and their best interest. This right is impeded by non-compete clauses."
Sunshine	"I am a hospital -- employed family physician in Carencro, Louisiana. I am bombarded constantly with messages and requests, almost to the point of begging, from my employer about access. More access for patients, more appointment options, more physician availability. These requests are not in line with the current non-compete clauses most employers place in physician contracts. Physicians who are shackled by non-compete clauses often relocate their clinical practice or discontinue clinical practice altogether, which further strains the access to healthcare problem. Prohibiting non-complete clauses is what we need if we truly desire to not add to the problem of access to healthcare."

K	"I am a physician for a local hospital group in Louisiana and a proponent for the FTC to ban non-compete clauses. This organization offered me a position at their clinic and without much hesitation, I naively reviewed the contract without an attorney (something you don't get taught to do in medical school) and took up the offer to work for a local hospital group. After a year with this organization, I found that that within the contract, they are able to unilaterally change my compensation. They did so by claiming "CMS changes" and made my working environment much more likely for me to experience burnout by urging that I need to continue to see more patients all while decreasing the protected time I have to do administrative work such as answering patient messages, going over labs with patients, and completing my patient notes. A group of urologists in the group all left last year with all moving out of state so that they do not violate their non-compete clauses. This forces our talented physicians to leave our state which already has limited number of urologists in the area so patients end up being the ones at loss due to decrease assess to these group of specialists. I believe that the organization knows that it is able to keep its physicians captive through their non-competes therefore does not care about improving work conditions, leading to a high rate of physician burnout and suicide rates. The argument about keeping trade secrets is just an excuse as all physicians who come onboard are all hoard certified physicians who have successfully been trained for many years in their respective residencies. No additional "trade secrets" are being obtained by us physicians by working to take care of patients for whom we have been trained to do prior to coming into this organization. I hope that the US and FTC will continue to fight for us in regards to banning the non-compete clause for all employees."
Anne	"Physicians need to not be excluded from the non compete ban. For too long physicians have been pushed around and under paid by hospitals who do this because they can't leave. Physicians deserve to be able to go to better positions in their area like anyone else."
William	"Any non-compete period should be accompanied by equal severance. If my employer prevents me from working elsewhere, they should pay me whilst unemployed"
Lauren	"I am a practicing OB/GYN physician in Shreveport, LA. Upon finishing residency in 2020 when the job market was scarce for new hire physicians due to COVID, I was offered a position at LSU Health Science Center in Shreveport as a faculty member, whose primary role was to provide education and supervision to residents and medical students. I was put into a non-negotiable, vague non-compete clause with NO expiration date. In fact, because of the new Ochsner partnership with LSU, all contracts in our department were being rewritten to include non-compete clauses. Physicians that had been there for at least a decade, requiring no new investment in their practices were now being forced to sign non-compete contracts. I needed a job. I was in a large amount of debt with accumulating interest during my four years of residency with a minimal salary. Honestly, I could not afford an attorney. So naively I trusted that the people that had been training me for the past 4 years would not take advantage of me in a contract. I did not have the ability to seek advice on "how" to negotiate a contract with my mentors since my mentors were the ones who wrote the contract. In October of 2020, there was an opportunity to join a practice at another hospital system in the Shreveport community that was more consistent with my career goals. By this time, I finally had the money to hire an attorney to review my LSU contract. He felt that the non-compete was too vague and not enforceable. I decided to move forward with changing jobs as I was confident that my new employment was not in violation of the non-compete clause. Weeks later, I received a letter from the LSU Board of Supervisors (a state funded entity!!!) demanding that I decline my new position and leave the Shreveport/Bossier community or they would proceed with a lawsuit against me. On January 7, 2021 I received a notification of a request for a preliminary injunction demanding that I stop work immediately. On April 13th, I was put on trial to defend my right to continue to practice medicine in a community that was my home. Thankfully the judge ruled in my favor to decline the preliminary injunction, but the trial regarding violation of the non-compete would be scheduled for a later date. (The judge concluded that that my presence in the community was a benefit to the public.) It was not until July 2022 that the judge ruled that I could continue working and that I had not violated my non-compete clause. During this time, my colleague and I formed a group of approximately 300 female physicians across Louisiana to help keep each other informed and to unite across the state. What I have learned from these connections has been astonishing. Physicians are consistently stating that they have been put in non-negotiable, non-compete contracts by Ochsner. Not only are the contracts not negotiable but the regions that are restricted are increasingly covering the entire state of Louisiana and some counties in Mississippi and Alabama. Ochsner is notorious for unfair treatment to employees and physicians at the expense of the patient along with strong concerns of committing Medicaid fraud. When physicians learn about the fraudulent nature of Ochsner and they want to leave, they are literally forced to leave the state. This further contributes to a huge health care shortage and disparity for our patients that we care so much about."

Cindy	"We support a ban on non-compete clauses, especially in physician contracts. Employees should have the right to choose their employer just as much as an employer has the right to choose an employee. Unfortunately, when you have non-compete clauses in contracts it basically restricts the employee, in this case physicians, to do what they believe is right for themselves, their families and their patients. What if the physician loves caring for patients but no longer thinks that the employer is providing a safe environment for his/her patients. The way the non-compete clauses are included in the contracts requires them to literally relocate their families outside of the community that they are currently serving, if they no longer want to be affiliated with that particular employer. It basically robs employees of their right to make the best decision. It also allows the employers to make decisions that they know might not be in the best interest of the employee, in this case physician, but they know that the physician doesn't have a choice but to accept it or MOVE. This policy is breeding monopolies and robbing sonic of die most hardworking and intelligent people of their personal rights."
JOHN	"I am in complete agreement to ban non-compete clauses in contracts. It's a restriction to free trade."
Noah	"Please include physicians in particular in banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals in my state prevent physicians from practicing in underserved areas and establishing private practices. Noncompetes decrease access to care and allow business minded people/administrators to greatly influence medicine. They also greatly increase the cost of medicine by preventing competition in the market, would you rather have an MBA dictating what doctor you see or have access to the best doctors in your area? The idea that a noncompete increases access to care is laughable, immoral, and a bold-faced lie. I've watched it happen the past 4 years in my community. The staggering cost of care increases is due the growth of hospital administrators, CEO salaries and the like. I've attached a graph below showing little to no growth in physician pay in 50 years, with exorbitant amounts spent on administrators, from an article in 2015. Please do not listen to those benefiting from imprisoning physicians in noncompetes."
Patti	"Noncompetes hamper employees from gaining additional employment as well as changing employers. This practice is unfair and should be outlawed!"

Matthew	"I am a physician . I have known many colleagues who had to leave town because of non-compete clauses with various groups. It is simply cruel to make a health care worker leave town simply because you do not want them to compete with you."
Sca	"Please ban non compete agreements"
Jason	"Please support individuals over organizations. Freedom from the powerful helps everyone."
James	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No P201200 I support this rule. Non-compete agreements are antithetical to a free market for both workers and consumers."
Cameron	"Free tech workers from these barbaric and outdated legal shenanigans. Americans should be free to work wherever they choose and not need to have the permission of some mega corporation to do it."
Wendell	"Non-competition agreements are anti-consumer. There is no doubt of this. And worse, non-competition agreements are anti patient, in the health care field. Requiring a non-competition agreement to work in a health care field requires a physician to abandon their patients if they change jobs. It goes against the requirements of all physicians, dentist and health care workers,"
Catherine	"Noncompetes restrict my ability to stay in a region and sometimes a state to practice psychiatry. This leaves patients without access to care in many places. Large companies taking over healthcare extend the areas that I'm unable to practice, even if I have not worked at any of their satellite locations during the term of my contract"
Heath	"I support this rule to stop the use of non-compete clause's"
Nikita	"To Whom It May Concern: I respectfully support the FTC proposal of banning non-compete clauses. Non compete clauses cause the employee to operate in fear of these repercussions if they are trying to fairly leave their place of employment. I work within one such organization. It states that I would be unable to work in every county where the organization has a location for two years. Unfortunately, this would then mean that I would not be able to work in the entire state and some of the surrounding counties in neighboring states for two years. I would have to completely leave the state if I were to choose another job, which would be unfair to me, as well as the state, as it would lose an entire family that would pay taxes and contribute to the state and it's economy. The ban will help incentivize companies to improve and keep workers in their locale and continuing to contribute to the continuity."

Jason	"As a physician , non-compete clauses adopted by major health care organizations ultimately harm patients. If I were to leave my employer for whatever reason and said employer had me under a non-complete clause, I would not be able to establish a practice where my patients already are. Any doctor and any patient can tell you that continuity of care is an important factor in optimizing a patient's health and strengthening the doctor-patient relationship. Were I suddenly not able to practice where my patients are, that puts patients at risk the worse health outcomes."
Anonymous	"This is an excellent idea. Healthcare has been hijacked by large health systems. When the health systems don't deliver on promises to physicians for program expansion and equipment, the physician has no recourse other than to move her entire family to another state due to the non compete clause. Patients lose doctors in these instances, and in many cases these are physicians with 10+ yrs of taking care of complex conditions. Then the patient has to start all over, only to repeat it in another 5 years when the "new" physician leaves. Health systems are too powerful and too large. Healthcare administrative offices are bloated and are no longer held accountable by the physicians. The administrators do whatever they want, knowing the physician with school age kids won't leave, disrupt their Child's schooling, leave their church community, and leave their volunteer hobbies. I literally have a noncompete that is so restrictive that I can't even practice as a doctor outside of my specialty. Also, with the non compete the physicians get paid less, with the large health system not responsible for any raises, knowing that the physician can't go anywhere. All the while paying the administrators handsomely."
Meeta	"Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Shane	"As a physician , I strongly oppose non- compete clauses. They are anti-American in terms of traditional freedoms in a free-market system. They limit patient access to doctors who have disputes or who are simply unhappy with their employer and who would like to leave their current job. Non-competes should be banned."

Brent	"The proposed rule should include a section prohibiting employers from preventing CURRENT EMPLOYEES from working for other hospitals/employers in the same capacity (CRNA)."
Sandy	"I think that you should be allowed to work wherever you want. My doctor left his hospital system because of poor working conditions. Because of this, I had to travel thirty more minutes to get to his office. This is wrong."
James	"Just because I work for one hospital system in my city should not result in my being forced to leave town if I must leave or desire to work at the other. MD w > 40 yr experience"
Laura	"Non-compete clauses are a hindrance to the medical community. It reduces the number of choices patients have to access medical care and also limits the ability to hire highly qualified candidates for the medical industry. I have multiple physician colleagues that have had to leave the state due to their noncompetes, placing further strain on an already underserved community. I have also been unable to hire the most qualified candidates for the company I currently work for due to noncompete clauses. Especially in areas where there are severe physician shortages, noncompete clauses should be banned to prevent further reduction in access to physicians."
Evans	"I relocated to my home state of Louisiana after two-years in practice in Florida. I came here because of a non-compete in south Florida that would have forced me to move to the north of the state. Once I returned home, I joined a colleague from residency for practice and have not looked back since. I can say that in the two-years of practice in South Florida, I would receive threatening letters from my hospital administration saying that they would sue me if I left their practice to join another group, even though I had never signed a non-compete. I came to the group that I currently work with, because they did not enforce a non-compete. In medicine, we often train to do great things. However in a profit-run healthcare system, we are often limited in our practice and scope by our employers we are beholden to. Without having a non-compete, I am free to use my skills to their fullest potential and I am able to take on side-projects as well as consulting and teaching opportunities which allows me to give back to the community more than to just my employers bottom line. Simply put, I will never lend my services to a group that expects/plans to hold a non-compete as part of my contract. I think the community and providers alike are able to grow and mentor and mature in their professional development by pursuing interests outside of their primary employer. Ending non-competes benefits the community, patients, and providers alike. The only individuals that want non-compete contracts in place are administrators that place their corporate interests ahead of the community and the physicians that allow them their livelihood. If we want healthcare to flourish, we need to end non-compete clauses for physicians. As a state we will be able to recruit more physicians and allow for better healthcare delivery for all."

Richard	"I support this proposed rule, but I think it should do more. It should also ban other tools employers use to retain workers, such as TRAPs and mandatory training repayment clauses. Companies can use these other methods to the same effect as non-compete clauses, and so this ban protects workers less than is ideal."
Zachary	"I support the proposed rule by the Federal Trade Commission. Employers, particularly in healthcare, should not be allowed to engage in these non- compete practices."
john	"i believe non-compete clauses should not be allowed. When you are not permitted to work in your hometown due to a clause like this, it can force you to move."
Stephen	"I have been subject to this policy and was forced to move out of state to find a new practice. In 2013 my contract with then HCA ended. We could not agree on a contract going forward. The competing hospital across town was interested in employing me but when I disclosed that there was a non- compete, were not willing to take that on. I had to take my kids out of school (pre-K through 4th grade) and move out of state. I took almost a year to finally start working again by the time licensure, and other state requirements were met at the new job. The hassle we had to go through with getting the kids into schools was incredible. Requesting all the information needed by the school systems over the summer when most are at minimal staffing and not having a permanent address forced us into private schools which led to additional costs. The patients that I had been taking care of then needed to find a new provider (urogynecologist). I am sure that they either just gave up or for those that could travel to ind someone of similar specialty in other cities or neighboring states."
Sean	"I fully support banning non-compete clauses from physician contracts. I previously worked for an organization in Baton Rouge that incorporated a standard never-ending non-compete clause in each newly hired physician contract. For two years after

	termination of employment (for any reason), the clause forbade providers to relocate to any parish bordering East Baton Rouge, any parish that the organization had an established office building, or any location the facility drew patients from. This clause limited relocation in most of Louisiana and include parts of surrounding states. The clause remained in each physicians' contract for the duration of their employment. . . . I worked for the organization for 6 years before leaving and witnessed the organization use the clause to threaten physicians if strict loyalty to the organization was not observed. . . . I was contacted by many "trapped" colleagues seeking advice on how they too could get out of the organization and stay in Baton Rouge. To this day, I firmly believe and tell people that leaving that organization remains in the top 5 greatest accomplishments in my life. . . . My quality of life and ability to care for my patients is significantly better without non-compete clause."
Donald	"Please end the unfair practice of non-compete clauses in the case of medical professionals which are being used to capture and keep medical professionals captured within medical business organizations and large hospital systems."
Sara	"I am writing in support of a rule to ban non-compete agreements. A friend's daughter was recently the victim of such an agreement. She ended up taking her former employer to court and winning, but as of yet he has not paid a penny of the judgment against him. There is an inherent inequality of bargaining position between an employer and an employee that makes such agreements inherently unfair."
Vicki	"There's laws have ties the hands of self employed physicians making it extremely difficult to compete with large hospitals. We cannot recruit physicians if these laws continue to be upheld. Physicians and patients are losing their ability to choose"
Bethany	"Non compete clauses are unfair and cause financial hardship when enforced. I currently have a non compete that was not a part if my employment contract, but was attached to an incentive package for high performing individuals. This non compete will make it next to impossible to leave and find employment within my field of work for the 12 months following my departure. This will in him mean I will either not have gainful employment or health insurance for that year because I will not be able to afford health insurance without employment. There are other ways to prevent information sharing, such as NDAs which don't impeded or prohibit gainful employment but simply require that you not share confidential or proprietary information and if you do, you are in violation and subject to consequences. This is a much more fair way of preventing such issues without causing hams to individuals."

Jeremy	"These types of clauses have plagued die mental health industry for many years. No reasonable person would accept the prospect of not being able to support themselves and make money as a practitioner for up to 2 years after leaving an employer. This means if I were to fully adhere to the terms of the non-compete clause that I can no longer feed myself, pay bills, or even go to the doctor. Additionally, even if one were to ignore the dangers of accepting such terms, it has the effect of poisoning the employee/employer relationship, which I will now briefly explore. Non-compete clauses are an underhanded way of forcing you into subservience by forcing you to stay at employers you may eventually want to leave. It erodes mutual trust and is a desperate attempt at maintaining the hierarchical structure that many of us who sought out professional degrees and licenses wanted to rid ourselves of. These types of clauses should be banned nationwide, and considering three states have already done so, we have data to back up such a sweeping decision, and thus I fully support this new proposed rule as a LPC/LMFT."
Katherine	"Of the 12,591 physicians in the state of Louisiana, approximately 40% are employed. If all employed physicians are subjected to limitless noncompete clauses we could lose an unacceptable and unmanageable number of physicians in our state. . . . Our opponents will say that noncompete clauses protect the significant investment that helps their doctors to be successful. I can tell you that that is not true. I started my practice in 1998 and have employed four doctors in 20 years. I have also served on the St Tammany Parish Hospital Board of Governors for 4 years and have a great understanding of the employment of physicians. I have never included a noncompete clause in any of my contracts because I believe in the sanctity of the doctor-patient relationship. My investment consisted of guaranteed salaries and benefits and individual and shared overhead expenses. I had a return on my investment between year two and three. Every doctor brought their own training and knowledge with them to the job. They paid for that training in medical school and they own it. What I did include in my contract was a pay back clause that required that if they left the group before the investment was repaid then they had to reimburse me. This bill does not prohibit that practice so that doctors and corporations can still recoup the money they invested. To say that striking a non compete would be a 'bad business practice' has nothing to do with regaining investment and everything to do with limiting competition and maximizing profit to the detriment of the patient. In summary, If Covid has taught us anything it has taught us the

	importance of having enough doctors in our communities. Emergency rules were instituted to provide temporary licenses to physicians from other states to address the healthcare crisis and provider shortage. We should not allow a noncompete to force a single doctor from our state. We should not allow a noncompete to prevent a physician from speaking out about safety concerns affecting their patients We should not allow a noncompete to put profit before patient care. This must stop."
Janna	"Non-compete clauses benefit huge corporations and are anti-worker, and anti-capitalist. For example, I have a non-compete clause that forces me to stay in my current job. Selling our home, finding a new school for my daughter, finding a new job for my husband, and buying another home are almost impossible tasks. Or, my daughter could stay in her school and my husband could stay in his job, and I would have a 90-minute commute each way for 2 years if I wanted to leave my current job. That's not an option. I would essentially never see my family for 2 years. So, I stay in a job that I don't like, that hasn't given me even a cost of living raise since 2019, despite rising inflation. I am a pediatric endocrinologist. There are only about 10 of us in the state of Louisiana, where I work. You would think that I would be able to easily move to a better job, a job that pays a salary that keeps pace with living expenses, because there are so few of us with my training Nope. Because of the noncompete, I am forced to stay where I am. Leaving my family for 2 years is not a realistic option. And my bosses know that. Conditions will not improve unless workers have choices."
Sarah	"I am a victim of Non-CCs. I worked for a company for 12 years. I started at age 24 and left at age 36. One of the requirements for the job was signing a non-compete clause. Which stated, "employer can not solicit anyone for internet advertising for a period of 2 years whether voluntarily or involuntarily termination". This impacted my entire life. The company did not fully explain the clause to me. I was 24 years old. Even though I have a college degree, at age 24. I wasn't business savvy enough to know about clauses or what that would entail for me in the future. Non-CCs should be against the law."
Scott	"This is a long overdue proposal, but thankfully, one that has finally arrived for serious consideration. The idea that a corporate entity, whose motivation is entirely driven by the bottom line, has been allowed for decades to strip both patients and physicians of their constitutional right regarding freedom of choice is frankly Kafkaesque. There exists an inherent double bind that a physician faces in contemplating whether or not to sign a legally binding contract which includes terms that ethically conflict with

	the fundamental tenets of the Hippocratic Oath. In addition to abolishing these so-called "non-compete clauses" in contracts, other onerous requirements should also be eliminated, such as "relative value units" (RVUs) and value-based bonuses tied to meeting specific targets, which dehumanizes the patient-doctor relationship into a sweatshop factory assembly line."
Carrie	"This is crazy. It's one thing for a large scale, unique company that has a limited pool of qualified employees to have employees sign non-compete clauses, but for small employers and companies who provide basic services that don't require unique high-level training, it just doesn't make any sense. It infringes upon an individual's freedom of movement, freedom of choice, and ability to provide for themselves and their families."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Maine | Statewide Impact

Maine Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual ME Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual ME Worker Earnings

	"I am a family physician practicing in rural Maine. I have been practicing for nearly 30 years. My past two employers, a regional hospital and a FQHC community health center, demanded non-compete clauses in their contracts in exchange for my employment. I tried with much effort to have these damaging clauses removed without success. The effect of such clauses on patient care, continuity of care and overall health of an aging and very medically needy population is overwhelmingly palpable. I have been forced in essence, to abandon my patients of decades, to practice 35 miles from my community for 2 years. I was also not able to let my patients know where my new office was. For many, it would not have mattered since they did not have the resources to travel that distance. Thus, they were forced into a health care market to try to find an impossible find...a new doctor. My community has a severe shortage of doctors and patients have had to wait for months to a year to be seen by someone who is not a doctor, does not know the decades of health events they have endured and I have been forced to drive outside of my community instead of being able to continue providing care within my own community. I strongly support any rule that eliminates non-compete clauses from doctors' contracts. I have had many colleagues who have paid thousands of dollars to lawyers, hospitals, clinics in Maine, because they wanted to provide care for their established patients in their community. Non-compete clauses are an extreme barrier to healthcare! To impose these barriers only hurts patients. We have a huge doctor shortage in Maine, especially in rural Maine and non-competes just compound the problem. Please, please, do what you can to eliminate this barrier to healthcare and get rid of non-compete clauses in doctors' contracts. Our patients deserve better! -Shannon
	"Non-compete agreements deny citizens their freedom and put unfair restrictions on their lives, their liberty, and their pursuit of happiness. It might be one of the most unAmerican things companies are allowed to inflict on their employees and the fact that it has taken congress this long to address it is abysmal." -Ryan
	"I am a practicing psychiatric nurse practitioner in a very rural area of northern Maine. I moved to this area to provide services to those hampered by lack of access to care, particularly specialist care. I participated in the HRSA loan forgiveness program which was developed to encourage clinicians to provide this care to the underserved in rural areas. In completing my contracted obligations my family and I decided to stay in our area and continue to serve the area as the need is great. Unfortunately my contract included a 1 year non-compete limiting my practice to further than 60 miles from any of the former employees clinics- a 250 mile difference. For the population in that area of my non-compete- this provided undue hardship in obtaining mental

	health care. Former patients, that have the right to chose their providers, were prevented from continuing their treatment with a trusted provider. The vast majority of those seeking outpatient psychiatric care had to travel more than 2 hours for that care. In the setting of our country's mental health and substance use crises- non-compete clauses further the hardship our population faces. Ultimately- this increases the cost on patients, but also the burden on more acute settings as outpatient care is simply limited. In summary- non- compete clauses lead to health care monopolies that unfairly limit access to care and discriminate against those in rural America.” -Shelly
	“ I am a software engineer and startup founder. I started a startup in California in 2015, and we never issued a single noncompete as far as I know. I moved back to the East Coast and considered joining a startup in Massachusetts in 2020, but declined altogether when they presented me with a noncompete agreement. I now live in Maine and work at a FANG-adjacent public tech company, and wouldn't consider interviewing at a company not based in the state of California, due to the possibility of noncompete enforcement in other states. This only benefits California, at the expense of the country. Ban them nationwide, for any income. Why is California the only place in the U.S. with a bit of innovation? Because they don't enforce noncompetes. That's it. Get this done!” -Maxwell

Nathan	Dear Chair Lina Khan, Please issue a final rule to ban noncompete agreements and defend that rule in court to the full extent of your power. It is high time that this "free market" economy be free for the people and not just corporations. Sincerely, Nathan
Margaret	I am a primary care physician in a rural, underserved area. In 2022 my department imploded and we went from seven providers (four physicians and three nurse practitioners) to two. I gave my notice after a meeting with a vice president who later was fired after multiple women, including me, filed complaints about his behavior. I had hoped to stay and serve my community for my entire career. My colleagues and I all have non-compete agreements. Even though our hospital dismissed literally thousands of patients, and is not taking any new patients, it will aggressively enforce our NCAs. None of us are taking trade secrets with us, we are not "stealing" patients from the hospital because they have already been dismissed - but the hospital won't allow any of us to care for these same patients within a 25 mile radius for the next year. NCAs aren't just exploitative - they prevent the provision of desperately needed services including healthcare. NCAs should be illegal except in very narrowly defined circumstances, and employers should have to prove that the NCA won't adversely affect the community. I'm happy to discuss this further if you want to hear more. Thank you,
Michael	Please end non-complete clauses. They are anti-competitive and harm workers. Workers need to be able to bring the skills they've spent years acquiring to new employers without repercussions.
Stephen	I agree with banning non-compete clauses both moving forward and retroactively signed agreements. These clause are a detriment to the American Worker getting his/her/their fair worth. Non-competes are clearly not capitalistic in any way. Let the fair and open market decide ones worth.
david	Hello, The first run movie theatre I was managing in 1991, the Orpheum Foxboro, in Foxborough, Massachusetts, closed forever as a first run venue on November 7 of that year. It has never run a first run movie since the not to compete agreement between the former owners and the owners of the theatre complex in the town of Sharon, Massachusetts. The then owner of the Foxboro discussed with me whether the Foxboro could stay open as a "second run dollar house", because the not to compete agreement forbade competing as a first run venue. The theatre now has been converted to live performance, but had been showing first run since 1927. Thanks, David
Michael	I am in the middle of a non-compete battle that has gone on for 18 months and cost me my job, my savings, my time, and added debt. It is because non-competes are not regulated any company can sue you and you have no choice but to take on thousands in legal fees. In my case, my company had a non- compete that used the language substantially the same role (my new job was sales, my old

	job was marketing/tech), I moved across the country, and my field has thousands upon thousands of competitors (which is important for Maryland standards). They also lied in court documents on what they do as a company in order to claim competitors. Finally they cut my pay drastically. In theory, their stance I should work for whatever they want to pay me, even if its not what I agreed to. Anyways, keeping them unchecked is terrible and puts all of the focus on legal which is unfair. I followed mine but its going to take 3 years to try to fight it. Unfortunately, unchecked power to a company in this regard makes them obsolete.
Casey	As a Loan Originator I have been deeply effected in a negative way in the form of compensation from the non compete clauses in our contracts. Furthermore, the consumer loses out as they don't receive the competition for their business and in some cases are confused by our industry thinking that they have to work with the lender who holds their mortgage application and cannot seek out the Loan Originator who left as they are typically not provided that contact information. Generally, Loan Originator's are commissioned employees so when we are not allowed to solicit customers we had to leave behind we lose a tremendous amount of income. Income which could be spent in the economy. Company's may provide the software and platforms to store the applications, but it is the Loan Originator who builds the business relationships to bring those applications in the door. The customer should have the choice to work with whomever they choose - regardless of which lender holds an application on them. Non competes harm the Loan Originator, they harm the applicants ability to choose the best deal for them, and hence harm the housing market and economy.
Margaret	I fully support this new rule to ban the non-compete imposed on employees. I believe it restricts their capacity to innovate new solutions and stunts career growth. I also think it reinforces large, megalithic companies to maintain dominance and control marketshare.
Jason	I just watched this story about non-compete agreements in the NYT: https://www.nytimes.com/2023/04/11/opinion/ftc-noncompete-clause-rule.html. This is a travesty and must be unconstitutional on some level. We are a so-called "land of the free" except when it comes to our employment apparently. Corporations have been given too much power to do as they please in the name of profit, and that dogma continues to cause unnecessary stress, pain, suffering, and misery amongst people who just want to support themselves. Yet another example of how *ed up and broken this country is. Our citizens deserve better. Our workers deserve a government that stands up for them, not fattening profit margins. This practice must be banned, and banned immediately. Also, it doesn't help the US achieve climate goals when these workers are forced to drive hundreds of miles away from their homes just to avoid the absurd non-compete radius! It's just so damned stupid, and ending this is a complete no-brainer, win-win, best case scenario on so many levels.
Christopher	I write to support the non-compete clause rule to stop the use of non-compete clauses. As an emergency physician, it is impossible to truly go into independent practice. Meaning, I cannot "hang out my own shingle" as it were like an old primary care physician might have in past eras. Since working in an emergency department means I have to work for an entity like a hospital or free-standing emergency department or a group that works for one of those entities, then I have little say if an employer wants to insert a non-compete clause into my contract.

	Likewise, it is not feasible to move my family outside of a non-compete zone each time I would like to change my employment situation, especially when other healthcare entities are around that should provide the exact type of competition to ensure that employers are ensuring decent working conditions and salary, etc. I write with strong support for eliminating non-compete clauses. Thank you
Lisa	As a family physician in rural Maine I signed a noncompete clause upon residency graduation in 2011. I went on to get married to a man involved in his family's local business and we have 2 children who are enrolled in the local school system. If I want a new job, I would have to pull my children from the school they have known as well as ask my husband to consider leaving his job. Non compete clauses for healthcare providers hurts communities that are already short on healthcare services and physicians. It benefits the larger healthcare organizations only
Del	I have been a software engineer for over 40 years. For nearly the entirety of my career most of my employers have required I sign some form of non- compete agreement; the agreement allowed for no modifications by me, but could be modified over time by my employer. While I have no problem with reasonable NDAs, non-competes have had a chilling impact on my perception of how I could shape my future. I am in favor of having non-competes removed from all forms of employment. While works I create for my employer are by and large the property of my employer, my skills are my own. To deny me the use of my skills, wherever and whenever they were derived, deprives me of liberty and the pursuit of happiness and purpose.
Andrew	Please ban non-compete clauses. Entrepreneurship is the heart of this country.
Andrew	I support an FTC ban on non-compete clauses. They stifle the neethest, and most entrepreneurial, workers.
Hans	Non-compete clauses in physician employment agreements can be detrimental to patients, physicians, and the healthcare industry as a whole. Non- compete clauses in physician contracts can be problematic because they limit a physician's ability to practice medicine in a particular geographic area or for a certain period of time after leaving their current employment. These clauses can make it difficult for physicians to continue practicing medicine in the same area or specialty if they decide to leave their current employer. There are a few reasons why non-compete clauses in physician contracts can be particularly harmful First, they can limit patients' access to care. Non-compete clauses can restrict a physician's ability to practice medicine in the same geographical area for a certain period of time, making it difficult for patients to access the care they need. This can be especially problematic in rural areas or areas with a shortage of healthcare professionals. If a physician is unable to continue practicing in a particular area, patients may have to travel farther or switch to a different provider, which can be inconvenient and disruptive to their care. Second, non-compete clauses can limit competition in the healthcare market. This can lead to higher costs for patients and insurance companies, as well as reduced innovation and quality of care. Non-compete clauses can also drive up healthcare costs by limiting competition and preventing

	the free market from driving down prices. This can be especially harmful for patients who cannot afford high healthcare costs. Non-compete clauses can also limit the ability of physicians to negotiate for better working conditions, wages, or benefits. Third, Non-compete clauses can stifle innovation in the healthcare industry by preventing physicians from sharing their knowledge and expertise with other healthcare providers. This can hinder progress and limit the development of new treatments and procedures. Finally, non-compete clauses can be particularly harmful to physicians who work in underserved or rural areas. These physicians may be the only provider in the area, and a non-compete clause could prevent them from continuing to serve their community if they decide to leave their current employer. Overall, non-compete clauses in physician contracts can be harmful to both physicians and patients, and can limit competition and innovation in the healthcare market. Sonic states have taken steps to limit the use of non-compete clauses in physician contracts, while others have not.
John	As a technology worker, I have been subject to numerous noncompete clauses throughout my contracts. Some of these have been draconian and have prevented me from working freely for whomever I wish post-employment. I believe that non-compete clauses are unfair to employees and represent unfair competitive practices. I support this rule.
COLLEEN	I was a patient of Dr Pond at DFD Russell in Bridgton Me. She has now left the practice and was told by CEO of that practice that she would be sued if she saw any of her previous patients. I am now stuck at a practice with awful customer service, unknowledgeable PA, and complete chaos at that practice that takes 45+ minutes when you call with a question. I have the right to choose my doctor and DFD Russell is not allowing me to do so. This is not right between patient and doctor and needs to be fixed. Thank you!
Nate	Non-complete clauses for health care professionals serve no purpose other than to entrap employees and to prevent their ability to advocate for themselves. A physician at hospital isn't holding any trade secrets that would damage the hospital if they started working at a different system across the street. Especially in a time of severe Healthcare worker shortages we should not be prevention their mobility.
Philip	I write in strong support of the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. There is no circumstance under which an employer should have any influence over a previous employee after the employee leaves the company's service. If a company wishes to retain proprietary information, it should be prepared to retain the employee by making continued employment more attractive. The "open-source" movement has convincingly demonstrated throughout the software industry and far beyond, the need for proprietary information is highly overblown. The excessive control of "intellectual property" has become a drag on the economy, has reduced competition and innovation, and increases costs for consumers. Removing the destructive practice of non-disclosure agreements will be an initial step toward increasing the flow of information and promoting innovation and competition in the US economy. I urge you to adopt the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule.
Anthony	Fantastic and I love it!

Susan	As an RN and a new NP, I support the ban on non-competes. It is refreshing to see something done that actually helps healthcare workers. Thank you
Neal	This would address the power dynamic between companies and people. People and the economy would benefit by introducing this subtype of competition.
Joshua	This is long overdue. Non-compete clauses stifle competition and unfairly limit employee's to a geographical region. Many times this region is completely arbitrary and forces workers to either accept poor working conditions or relocate or have onerously long commutes. I fully support the ban of non- compete clauses.
Kevin	In rural Maine communities where access to your doctor is already limited, many hospitals require that their physicians sign a non-compete agreement which 1) forces a doctor to leave that community to practice, and/or 2) disallows that doctor to see any patient that they saw while with an organization after leaving. Generally the terms of these non-compete agreements last 1-3 years. By doing this doctors who want to change jobs, potentially accepting higher paying positions or even to become solo practitioners are discouraged from doing so as patients that they have established with (sometimes cared for over many years) are not allowed to see them, without threat of that physician being sued by the organization with whom they have terminated their employment. For example, my partner is a family practice doctor who has worked within several of Maine's health care systems over the past 12 years. She grew tired and frustrated with the amount of time she was allowed to spend with her patients. Family practices run by hospitals for the most part are pushing doctors to address fewer problems in favor of seeing more patients. At one point her medical director explicitly told her to "Give B-level care.". In addition to this physicians who have 4 years of medical school and 4 or more years of residency are being replaced by nurse practitioners who have only a fraction of the education and experience. Often hospital systems will require that a physician sign off on and take ownership of an NP's work. Essentially putting that doctor on the hook for a significantly less trained individual and often less informed care. Hospitals can pay the NP's less but patient care suffers. She finally had enough with a system that continually prioritized money over patient's health and decided to pursue direct primary care. She approached the organization's CEA asking to be released from her non-compete (she had been with this organization for only a year), and was told if she saw any patient of that organization or any patient at all within 25 miles of where she worked they would "come after her". She eventually set up her own practice 25 miles outside of the radius of the hospital, and has had to refuse patients that she has previously seen. The numerous effects of this being, she is no longer practicing within a community that she has been in for more than 10 years and commutes outside of the community to see patients. She has had to turn patients away that she established with while with this organization, essentially putting their continuity of care at risk in addition to removing their choice of doctor. These non-compete agreements in the healthcare setting are harmful to the community, harmful to the physician, and harmful to the patient and clearly only serve to keep patients paying the organizations who enforce them. Within the past 10 years Maine's laws surrounding non-compete agreements were updated to be more favorable to serve public interest, to mainly protect IP or trade secrets, and not to limit an individual's ability to accept other job opportunities. Unfortunately there is an explicit exception to physicians and medical workers. Please consider the ban of these unlawful non-compete agreements that hinder a physicians ability to do their best work for the individuals that they serve. I support this Non-Compete Clause Rule. Thank you Kevin

Leah	Non-compete clauses restrict employees from the benefits of accumulating skills relevant to their success; they are effectively penalized if they want to compete within their fields of expertise. This is antithetical to the simple right of the pursuit of happiness. It is incompatible with the spirit at the very heart of capitalism. Businesses have for too long enjoyed the advantages that non-compete clauses afford them to restrict their employee's growth in order to guarantee their own profits.
Hannahlore	This is clearly a blatantly unfair and counter-productive practice. This treats workers as basically serfs, and we are supposed to be a free society?
BenJamin	Yes yes YES! This is an amazing Idea! I fully agree, please put this through!! Thank you FTC!!
John	Non-complete clauses hurt physicians and make it more likely for doctors to leave a state or underserved area. Voiding non-compete rule changes needs to be applied to non-profit hospitals.
Melanie	My husband has been in the sales industry for over 20 years. In that time he was forced out of every industry he worked for due to noncompetes. With the change came a pay drop because he did not have that specific industry experience. We claimed bankruptcy twice just even though we had barely any assets and lived modestly. If he made more we could not only pay for our kids college, we could contribute to the economy by repairing our house, traveling locally, eat healthy and go to the doctor or dentist (even with insurance it's too expensive so we avoid it). Thank you for your time and consideration.
Richard	As I was told when I sought my own legal counsel after being confronted with a noncompete clause, these clauses are not enforceable. Employers know this and have known it for decades, nevertheless, one after another, employers have jumped on the bandwagon, adding noncompetes to their employment practices. Why? To intimidate their own workforce and scare them from pursuing a better life and higher wages for themselves. By extending the practice out of its origins in executive ranks, and into the ranks of hourly wage workers, companies have succeeded in preying upon individuals who are much less likely to seek their own legal counsel, and therefore unlikely to be aware that they cannot be bound by such contracts. These arrangements constitute an act of intimidation against working people. Their very existence is a violation of workers' rights and fair labor standards. The only just course of action is to abolish them.
Jim	I can understand enforcing a non-compete rule if the employee has certain secrets obtained while working for their employer. It has no place however when applied to workers who have no such knowledge. Non-compete agreements should be few and far between.

Kim	Non-competes should absolutely be banned for all except, perhaps, high-level professionals in specified industries. For these, a non-compete should be tailored to address only narrow matters of risk to the employer for a limited time period and in a specified territory. The freedom to move about in our economy to find gainful employment in one's area of expertise should not be curtailed by employers as broadly as it is today. And general employees should not have to relocate if opportunities exist in their community.

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Maryland | Statewide Impact

	"After working as the senior program director of a local tutoring company for 10 years, I, along with the rest of the tutoring staff, was asked to sign a non-compete. . . . After spending around $300 to meet with a lawyer, I was able to negotiate my non-compete so that the geographic region was less restrictive; however, many of my coworkers were younger than me, didn't have the resources to hire a lawyer, and therefore signed the non-compete without negotiation. When I left the company less than a year later to start my own business, I was prohibited from working in Northern Virginia for 6 months, which was a potential source of many referrals. Furthermore, the non-compete restricted me from communicating with families, so I was unable to provide closure to students & parents with whom I had longstanding relationships." -Krista I.
	"Non- competes have severely affected my family. My husband is a veterinary neurologist and we have multiple times now had to consider moving to a different state entirely to avoid his non-compete when he wanted to look for work elsewhere. We had to uproot our entire lives to get away from them. As a small animal veterinarian noncompetes severely limit my ability to have a balanced home and work life. Entire portions of the city are blocked out so to quit your job, you would have a commute of over an hour. It's unacceptable and the practice needs to be stopped" -Kristen A.
	"I am writing to respectfully request the FTC adopt the proposed rule . . . and stop the abuse of this anti-competitive and anti-worker contract device. I live in a small rural town For us, non-compete clauses mean a single proprietor can be the sole provider of a service, often at any cost or quality. Former employees must travel long distances to find employment opportunities and people who wish to start another business in town are barred from doing so. Non-compete clauses are inherently anti-worker and should only be used in a limited, prescribed way. I especially appreciate the agency's interest in clarifying the differences between non-compete clauses from NDAs and non-solicitation clauses, particularly when these other mechanisms are de facto non-competes. I am not a business owner. I work as a substitute teacher . . . I just read the article in the April 11 New York Times and I felt compelled to comment." -Linda B.

	" I am writing to urge you to expand the recent rule change to abolish non-compete clauses for franchisees. As a former franchisee myself, I have experienced firsthand the devastating impact of non-compete clauses and how they can be used to retaliate against franchisees who speak out and advocate for their rights. . . . I was terminated from my franchise and am now being sued under the non-compete clause of my former agreement. . . . Non-compete clauses in franchise agreements create a lopsided contractual agreement that harms franchisees and limits their ability to move on after their franchise contractual obligations have been fulfilled. Franchisees invest their resources, finances, and time into their businesses, and should not be forced to live in fear of retaliation from franchisors." -Tiffany C.
	"I'd like to explain my personal situation to convey why it is so important to do away with these non-competes. I am a physician specializing in Neuroendovascular Surgery at a large hospital outside of Washington, DC. . . . I am married with three young children, and we live in Bethesda, Maryland. . . . If my work situation were to deteriorate due to a myriad of possibilities such as decreased salary or benefits, a negative change in administration of our department, or other unpredictable detriments that are beyond my control, I would have to leave the DC area to get a different job. . . . The non-compete not only negates my personal freedom to work where I want to work, but it also negates the freedom of my wife and children, since de facto they would be forced to move out of this area just because of my non-compete. These non-compete rules should be abolished. I applaud and support the effort of the FTC to accomplish this important goal." -Edward G.

A	"Strongly agree with removing the non compete"
Dr	"Non-competes keep physicians in emergency medicine tied to their job without any ability to leave for personal or professional reasons. It stifles competition, prevents whistle blowing and keeps physicians in positions of low pay, increased stress and mental bondage. It should be [sic] eliminated."
Sharon	"I strongly support efforts to ban non-compete agreements. This unfair, exploitative practice has grown substantially over die years, depressing wages and die hurting the economy. A ban is overdue and desperately needed."

Emily	"It is shocking to learn that companies can prohibit employees from seeking better wages and working conditions under threat of lawsuit. Americans should have the freedom to move freely between employers. If companies want to retain their workers they should do this through improvements to wages and working conditions not threats of lawsuits and financial ruin. Non-compete clauses [sic] should've illegal in all normal situations."
JL	"I agree with the FTC regarding banning non-compete clauses. Employers can use the non-compete agreements to limit [sic] ones ability to change job with a specialty feed like healthcare. It limits one's ability for upward mobility within an industry or similar industry and is an unfair practice."
Crystal	" As a physician , I could not be more thankful for the FTC's proposal to ban non-compete clauses. It ultimately affects patient care by limiting the number of locations that physicians can serve their patients. Patients often lose out on long [sic] tenn relationships with doctors because their doctors are forced to move long distances, sometimes out of state, just to seek another job opportunity. I also believe this ban will help people in all industries, as it will allow for more fruitful negotiations and will no longer force employees to remain in toxic work environments. Thank you again to the FTC for taking a stand for the working public."
Amrana	"Non-compete clauses prevent the federal government from better competition through procurement contractors because the incumbent contractor can prevent key employees from moving on to a successor contractor. This prevents the government from obtaining qualified contractors and sometimes, lower overall contract prices. If the current contractor is problematic, and is also retaining experienced employees, the tax payers pays for lower quality management for the amount of money being paid. On the employee side, the contract employees that are prevented from moving to a successor contractor are also prevented from job opportunities, job security, or better pay or benefits. Both tax payers and contractor employees lose without this non-compete clause rule."
Richard	"Non competes are fundamentally inappropriate. They prevent physicians from finding jobs with a good fit and adequate compensation without completely uprooting their families They only serve to increase revenues for hospital systems, and do not promote the best patient care."
Anonymous	"This rule is long overdue and should be enforced as soon as possible. The [sic] commission should also consider forbidding companies from asking if a prospective employee or applicant has signed a non-compete agreement,"
John	"US Anesthesia Partners have an onerous Lu binding non-compete clause. They area national anesthesia provider that buys privately owned anesthesia practices. As part of the buy in Maryland, any physician that was bought out must essentially leave the state of Maryland in order to practice should they leave US Anesthesia partners. The buyout was a terrible debacle. A large number of anesthesiologists have left the practice as the call burden and decreased reimbursements were not worth the work. At the same time, any per diem anesthesiologists hired to fill the void were paid for from the physicians pool of money, putting on an added drain to their currently low reimbursements. Those that left were forced to leave the state due to the non- compete clauses."

Beverly	"Please ban non-competition clauses in the workplace. My husband has been affected by this and made it difficult for him to make enough money to support our family. It's ridiculous. Competition is good for businesses and leads to innovation, higher wages, and better working conditions. Thank you."
Meera	"I would like the non compete clause to be made illegal , i.e. not be enforceable in existing contracts as well. I support legislation to remove it. I therefore request the FTC to act decisively to eliminate the validity of these clauses."
Charles	"Top executives with access to tactical business plans or business secrets can be prevented from stealing and transferring content from a company by NDAs. This can work equally well for lower level members of companies, where guarded content can be more specifically identified. Employees not privy to company trade secrets should never have non-competes imposed. Otherwise, "non-competes" prevent individuals from having employment in fields of their expertise after opting leaving a company. With this impediment, there is little leverage to exercise employee rights, or to press for redress for poor working conditions."
Laila	"I write in strong support of the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses are bad public policy. They are bad for working people because they suppress wages, suppress competition and workers' wages. And they are bad for the economy as a whole because these non-compete clauses stifle innovation."
Kia	"As someone who has been negatively impacted by the non-complete clause of my employment, I will support this proposal. I do, however, caution about sharing proprietary information with subsidiaries of foreign corporations, especially those with ties to China. We still need to maintain US competitive advantage in science and technology against companies who have shown to steal proprietary technology. "
Pazit	"Thank you for considering this new regulation. I support the FTC's effort to ban non-compete clause in employees contracts who are top level executives! "
Adam	"It is the responsibility of employers to maintain a competitive pay schedule and work environment. Non-compete clauses unfairly burden workers with restrictions the should be illegal. A non-compete clause is nothing more than a monopoly practice. It is a fonn of invented servitude that has no place in American society. Non-compete clauses violate the spirit of the free market and make workers into slaves."

Perish	"Me and my community are strong supporters of banning non compete clauses. They are clearly unethical and hurt Labor! workers. Please do the right thing and ban these non compete clauses."
Justin	"This would be an incredible step in the right direction for American workers. It will raise wages and increase competition. I heartily approve!"
Tyler	"This is an important step in promoting competition, which die heartbeat and invisible hand of capitalism. We cannot both live in a capitalist society and also not take steps to empower individuals to maximize their earned revenue. If this change is not implemented, I fear a greater need for government subsidies at the current rate of inflation..."
Mitchell	"The FTC's proposed rule concerning non-compete agreements will, I believe, if adopted prove beneficial in health care and behavioral health settings. Specifically, while additional research of how these agreements are used, including in health care settings, appears to be needed, die FTC's rule, if adopted, likely will help to support persons with behavioral health conditions (mental health conditions and substance use disorders) by removing one potential barrier to behavioral health provider hiring and mobility. As noted below, the behavioral health workforce has been subject to shortages in many areas. Persons with behavioral health conditions often are unwilling or unable to fmd treatment due to concerns about cost, insurance coverage and being unable to fmd the right provider. Under such conditions, removal of any actual or potential barrier such as noncompete agreements can only have a salutary effect on behavioral health patient/client care."
Jonathan	"I was initially skeptical about this rule, but the more I read about it, the more solid the case became with me. I had no idea how ubiquitous noncompete clauses had become in lower level job categories - I always thought of them as applicable only to high-skilled, high-paying jobs. But die application of this practice to fast-food workers, hairstylists and security guards a) is such business oven-each that it calls for a strong regulatory response, and b) greatly magnifies the economic impact."
Edward	"Non-compete clauses (NCC) unfairly promote restraint of trade and reduce consumer choice. If the goal of any particular NCC is to protect intellectual property there are better mechanisms to do so. NCCs are particularly odious in healthcare where they interfere with the patient - provider dyad. And they make even less sense in Emergency Medicine, where the providers do not select their patients. Emergency Medicine providers should be free to offer their skills to the public unencumbered by an employer's desire to maintain market share. Quality of care should be the metric, not quality of the bottom line."

Thomas	"I support this new rule 100%. You're current/previous employer should not be able to limit your work options in anyway."
Emily	"I support die curtailment of requirements that employees sign non-compete clauses.I understand that corporations may want to prevent fonner employees from sharing some proprietary information with new employers, and there must be a way of doing so without curtailing the freedom of these employees to move between jobs. Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC estimates that banning non-compete contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion per year."
Joan	"I fully support this. Finally, putting some control into die hands of workers. I was recently let go from my job in sales. I have a noncompete for one year and 100 miles. This is die only job I ever had as an adult. Competitors would gladly hire me, but are afraid of being sued. It has been one of the most stressful and depressing experiences of my life. Trying to figure out what I'm going to do. For me it's not about taking my customers with me, but just being able to get a job in what I know. Even if you can't make it all noncompetes. Maybe you can ban them when people get let go. I really hope this goes through and sticks."
Rebecca	"I urge you to do away with non-compete clauses. I live and work in Maryland. I stayed at my current job for over 10 years. I had 2 young children when I started. My noncompete clause of 15miles for 3 years was highly restrictive. Taking a job 15miles from current employee requires a minimum of 40 minute commute from my home. Working that far away from home is difficult when you have children, but especially if you have young children. When your child gets sick at school, the school requires the parent to pick them up within 30 minutes. These two restrictions (having to be far from current employer but close enough to pick up kids from school in an emergency) made it so I could not take any other job. In 10 years, my current employer only gave 2 raises, each of 5% or less. I also was never given additional vacation time. This was despite me providing national and state data from a reputable source that my compensation was not up to average. My current employer was well aware that I had very little options of leaving and therefore she had no reason to increase my compensation. My kids are now old enough that I felt I could take another job. My employer actually asked me if I was sure I wanted to leave since I would have to drive so far to the new job! I start my new job in April, 2023. I will commute 50 minutes each way. The same company I am being hired by has a location 15 minutes from my house. But my current noncompete prohibits me from taking this position for 3 years. Non-competes put an unreasonable burden on employees; they prohibit fair compensation and competition."
Christopher	"I'm writing in support of the proposed restriction on non-compete clauses in employment contracts. As a worker in the tech industry , non-compete clauses have been an aspect of employment contracts throughout my 18-year career."

	While seldom-enforced, I have had to account for the unnecessary risk they introduce to my career choices and their subtle influence against entrepreneurship and innovation. Eliminating these clauses, even for high-income workers, gives Americans greater freedom in their careers while removing hindrances to innovation. It is both pro-worker and pro (new) business."
Kathriel	"Non compete clauses are anti competitive and prevent workers from freely changing jobs and improving their salary or workplace conditions. As a physician i have been harmed by non compete clauses when trying to change employers. They are applied broadly even in fields where there is zero possibility of competition with the previous employer."
Bethany	"To Whom It May Concern, I am a nurse anesthetist working at a critical access hospital, employed by a for-profit anesthesia group (North American Partners in Anesthesia - or NAPA). My employer has an extremely restrictive non-compete clause in my contract, preventing me and my entire department (doctors and other certified registered nurse anesthetists) from working at this hospital for two years if NAPA leaves the hospital. This is a disservice to the public. If NAPA leaves this facility and forces every anesthesia provider to leave with them, patients will ultimately pay the price, and safety will decrease. A key tenet of patient safety is continuity of care, and changing an entire department out for new staff who are not familiar with the environment in one fell swoop is dangerous. Please kindly support this new proposed rule to help both workers and patients. Private equity firms, such as those with an interest in NAPA, should not be permitted to gamble with patient safety and control workers' livelihoods at whim. Thank you!"
Nancy	"1100% support the ban of non-compete Agreements the release of any existing agreements. These are completely unfair for the employee. An at will employee allow for the employer to terminate for any reason and you are still held under the non-compete. In my case I was required to sign one and within a week of employment knew that I could not work for the company. I left prior to 90 days, and I am being bullied and threatened to pay them to release me from the agreement (6 figures). The rights of the employee need to be considered."
Eddy	"Noncompete clauses should be removed from all physician contracts including nonprofit organizations. It severely limits a physician's ability to change employment/practice. It leads to physicians stuck in a job that they don't enjoy leading to physician burnout and/or they decide to leave the area in general leaving a physician shortage. We should not have our hands tied behind our backs when we are trying to take care of patients"
Graham	"I work for Johnson & Johnson as a medical device sales representative . Non complete clauses are used to keep us from taking better paying jobs in the area, and being able to hold large companies like ours to account. Without the ability to safely move to other competitors within our skill set, it becomes a regional race to the bottom of salaries while we watch company profits rise."

M	"No one is mentioning the damage that Non-Competes cause when the employee is either laid-off or released from employment without cause, as most companies today employ an "employment at will" philosophy. So a company can say that they no longer need or want you without reason, but you can't go work for anyone else in the same field within your own home market. That should be illegal. I'm in the media field , and most programming, on-air and sales talent are required to sign a non-compete clause. This is why so many media people have to uproot their families to seek employment in other cities, or force the employee to live apart from their family. This puts undue stress on everyone, especially the children. And media companies have let so many people go as either a cost-savings measure, or simply because they want to try to get better "ratings". But to then tell the employee that you can't look for work in this field in your own market? That's ridiculous and should definitely be banned."
Adrienne	"There are many predatory companies out there such as NAPA (Anesthesia) that use noncompetes as a fear mongering technique to retain staff. I believe noncompetes should be done away with, then companies will have to be held accountable and use other methods to retain staff."
Christopher	"My wife and I are both equine veterinarians . In our profession non compete agreements are usually for such a large mileage radius and time frame that they require you to move and sell your home if you leave your job. This ultimately gives your employer the ability to control where you live, to force you to pick up your family and move, to take your kids away from their friends and family. How is this fair? Also clients have a right to use the veterinarian they feel comfortable with and should not be limited by an employer either. Non compete agreements must go."
Theodore	"I'm a software engineer of twenty-five years experience in the field. Through most of my career, I've had non-competes at the jobs that I work at - these have kept me from looking for employment within the industries in which I've gained subject matter knowledge, and have forced me, each time I change companies, to go into a wholly different industry. Further, when I was laid off in April 2022, my former employer attempted - unsuccessfully - to prevent me from getting ANY job within the software engineering field due to an overly broad non-compete - even when THEY had terminated my employment. Non-competes are evil. They need to be banned."
Rajesh	"I Strongly support FTC efforts to abolish NON Compete clause. Its how employers, business partners and Law manipulators black mail employees, partners and so on. USA is a free country and people should be able to decide their destiny and not fall prey to predators. Competition leads to innovation, lower prices and better results!!"

Mark	"AS ONE WHO HAS BENEFITED FROM THE PRESENCE OF NONCOMPETE CLAUSES IN THE CORPORATE HEALTHCARE SETTING , ITS FAIRLY CLEAR TO ME THAT THESE CLAUSES IN PHYSICIAN CONTRACTS BOTH DRIVE UP THE COST OF HEALTHCARE AND INJURE THE PUBLIC."
Susan	" As a CPA in public accounting and, as a partner at three different firms over the last 25 years, I have had to sign the same non-compete that all employees sign in addition to the non-compete in my employment agreements and partnership documents. The non-competes have varied from firm to firm with one being very restrictive and actually listing out the firms I could not go to for four years. These clauses have also hampered my ability to have clients and staff follow me if I went to another firm. I agree that this reduces competition and strangles the pool of available talent. CPA firms are already struggling to find talent and these non-competes lock staff and partners in place at a firm where they may not be happy."
Chris	"Please ban the non-compete clause rule. It is not only hurting hard working individuals, but society as a whole. GDP will increase, and the labor market will be increased for those with particular skills that are in high demand (e.g., doctors and nurses). Thank you."
Manesh	"Please ban Non-competes for physicians and healthcare workers. They simply cause patients to lose their long-standing physician when their physician has to move out of the non-compete area and disrupts patient care."
Andrew	"The non compete clauses for employees and subcontractors in my experience is a way to prevent those people from using their talents to make a living in the area or chosen field of their choice, even though the skills and experience brought with them from the employees and contractors own experience was the reason the companies hired them in the first place. If a contractor is hired to do a job for a specified company, that is, and contractor with their own business and they were to bid on and take that exact business away from the prime contractor, then that would be unreasonable and should be subject to a non compete."
Elizabeth	"I signed a non compete when I was 23 years old. Fast forward 16 years later, re-reading the non compete it is extremely one sided for the benefit of the business owner and no one else. The biggest negative is that it stipulates that clients cannot choose to work with me for two years (I cannot accept their business) even WITHOUT me soliciting them. So the non-compete has made a decision for someone who was NEVER part of the contract to begin with nor are they aware of its existence. It seems illegal. I think voiding non competes that impact the lives of those impacted (clients) makes sense."
L	"I agree with this rule. Since workers are nothing but numbers in a column anyway, we deserve the right to control who has access to the labor we provide."

Erkeda	"Non-competes have ruined many physician's lives. Simply because you may want to disconnect from an organization with the skills that you have earned, they can restrict you from making a living in an area that you would like to. One company that I worked wanted to enforce a non-compete with the entire world due to its telemedicine set up. Noncompetes are predatory. Please end them for all."
Nathan	"I am a technologist for a large company servicing the defense industry and other government agencies. I support the banning of non-compete clauses/agreements for more fair and ethical competition within industry."
Anton	" Physicians spend longer than almost any other profession honing their craft to be able to offer patients the best care. We should not be excluded from the non-compete legislature."
William	"Workers are being treated like garbage"
Thomas	"I am employed and not subject to a non-compete clause. However, I have relatives in ordinary jobs that are subject to such a clause. I strongly support the proposed rule by the FTC. It supports a free market economy as well as personal freedom."
Saumil	"I am a physician who works mostly inpatient. Thus, I do not control which patients I see; if I move to another hospital, it will not negatively affect the business of my current employer. And yet, I am bound in my contract by a non-compete clause. This leads to high levels of physician burnout and dissatisfaction as we are often tied to a job that we would like to leave, but we cannot (for multiple reasons) move outside of the restrictive covenant area. We should do away with non-compete clauses, especially in situations where they do not make sense."
Rebecca	"I was under a non-compete agreement at a group psychotherapy practice in Towson, Maryland which stated that any clients with whom I worked at the practice could not follow me were I to leave the practice (and could not work with me elsewhere for five years following my exit of the practice), that I could not provide psychotherapy services at any other practice while employed with the practice (regardless of whether I was provided with enough referred clients to cover my bills), and could not work in any other practice- -group or private- -within two miles of the practice for a period of two years following exiting the practice."
Alison	"This is a crucial step in allowing professionals to practice without undue temporal or geographic restrictions. As a medical professional I wholeheartedly support this effort to end non competes."

J.	"I'm in favor of the proposed rule. Workers should be able to move, even as they acquire skills throughout their career. NDAs should be enough to protect companies from losing their trade secrets."
Kurt	"I strongly support eliminating the use of non compete agreements by businesses when hiring new employees. I believe it limits the US productivity and hurt's employees. If full removal of non complete clauses can not achieved, at least set a limit on salary so that entry and mid level employees are excluded."
Colin	"Its about time we do away with these sorts of agreements in the workplace. Industry won't be harmed by valuable, mobile and desirable employees being given their fair opportunity to trade in the value of their labor. These agreements exist purely to devalue the worker within the context of their relationship to their employer. If we're going to allow industry, especially our nationally critical industries, to operate with IP protections and favorable tax conditions, we might as well balance the board and force them to view their employees as the assets they are."
Dietrich	"I am writing in strong support of the proposed rule that would make non compete clauses invalid. These clauses have tangibly negatively impacted my family, materially harming our ability to leave abusive work environments because we are prohibited from working within our field of expertise under a different employer. They are used in a way to punish anyone seeking to leave employment, regardless of whether there is a legitimate business interest."
Delnora	"This needs to apply to NON PROFIT hospitals so that doctors don't get left out and stuck with unfair non-compete clauses that hurt patients access to care. There's no good reason this shouldn't broadly apply to all."
Dr.	"Commissioners, As a retired applied physicist , I have observed the dampening effect Noncompete clauses have on an individual employee's job prospects while re- enforcing the power of employers to exploit workers. . . . In essence, it would appear that current trends create a class of less well trained, less mobile 2nd class employees into our society at a time when the goal of seeking the common good has been forgotten."
John	"I strongly support this non-compete clause nile because non-compete clauses are often used to keep employees trapped in jobs when there are better opportunities for career advancement and/or increased income available elsewhere. Where there are distance restrictions in the non-compete clauses, employees often have to commute hours to and from a new job, creating more stress and taking additional time away from family and/or other activities. While non-compete clauses in contracts for company owners and senior executives who have strategic information may make some sense. for the majority of a company's employees, there is no justification to restricting their ability to leave for a better job when the current job is not meeting their needs or is negatively impacting their well-being."

M. James	"Prohibition should also apply to non-solicit clauses whereby business A prohibits business B from hiring its employees."
Nathan	"These agreements are blatantly anti-competitive and anti-worker on their face. They never should have been legal in the first place. Preventing a worker from freely choosing their own employment is a page straight out of the feudal era."
Joanna I	"I support this rule change."
Tobias	"I support the proposal to outlaw noncompete clauses. It seems to me that it is often impossible to change jobs without either working for a competitor or changing industries all together. A total career change is often not a realistic option for most people since they would need new training and often have to start at a lower wage. A non-compete clause can be an insurmountable barrier to seeking better employment. This can remove the incentive for employers to treat their employees fairly and raise wages with inflation since the employees are not able to seek employment elsewhere."
Jared	"I strongly support the ban of non-compete clauses. This would promote fair wages in the engineering profession. I am a professional engineer and my employer recently forced all of its employees to sign a non-compete clause after they had several talented people leave and go work elsewhere for better pay. This non-compete agreement will make finding another job very difficult unless I relocate to another part of the country, because my employer has worked for almost every local client in my specialized field of work. My employer has also performed work in many other areas of the country that I would be able to seek alternate employment with my skills. My employer has verbally stated that they have entered into informal agreements with other firms in the area not to hire each others people to prevent engineers from negotiating higher wages."
James	"I am an academic physician (cardiac surgeon) and have held leadership positions at several nonprofit academic medical centers during my career. I strongly support the NPRM and urge you to implement it forthwith. . . . Noncompetes depress wages, limit physician mobility and prevent continuity of care for patients. . . . Generally, younger physicians lack the fiscal and legal resources to effectively challenge restrictive covenants, prospectively or retrospectively. The cost and time requirements to renegotiate restrictive covenants are likely prohibitive, especially when an individual physician is opposed by a fully resourced corporate, legal department. . . . Practices and hospitals should foster retention through innovation, positive and progressive culture and trust, rather than a captivity culture and restrictive covenants. Physician burn-out is a major challenge and noncompetes importantly contribute to physician burn-out. Physicians who exit health systems with restrictive covenants may leave patients unable to access an established and trusted physician, resulting in loss of care continuity, fragmented care, costly reestablishment with other provider(s), and potentially inability to access clinicians of similar quality."

Jonathan	"As a young cardiologist , I have personally suffered significant hardship both medically and financially because of noncompete clauses. As a young professional I made the mistake of trusting my new employer and believed that 'this will be the last job I will ever have.' . . . Over the course of two years with my current practice, I have been the recipient of repeated repeated work place bullying and harassment. . . . I've built a substantial practice in two years with my current employer and I am forced to look for an opportunity outside my two year restrictive covenant which is massive, Frederick County. I am considering extending my commute to over an hour just to better my work life. And I have a new two month baby girl. I could try and bring a civil suit against my practice, but I also need to work and provide income for my family, plus who would hire a physician that sued his former employer. . . . A restrictive covenant will benefit my employer, but hurt me and all my patients whom I've cared for a treated. I am in full support of changing the noncompete laws and make them illegal."
Kay	"After 50 years practicing law I have concluded that I never saw a noncompete provision which seemed justified by the facts. An employer's truly proprietary intbnation or methods can be protected contractually by specific description without handicapping an employee's right to move."
Randolph	"Hurrah for an agency that is actually doing what it was set up for. And hurrah for an administration that supports basic pro-worker regulation."
Thomas	"Please make non compete agreements unenforceable."
Zachary	"I support the ban on Non Compete Claused"
Monica	"Non-compete clauses restrict innovation and people's ability to change jobs for no good reason that can't be served by non-disclosure agreements. Low- wage workers especially should not have to worry about these clauses, but it's really not clear why they should be used in any situation. I hope the FTC bans them in virtually all situations."
Matt	"This is a great start, but I think that savvy employers see this coining and are trying to get around it with Non-Solicit agreements; which work as another avenue to stifle people from shifting to a competing organization, or any organization that utilizes the same talent pool. My employer forced me to sign such an agreement saying I could not try to hire a previous co-worker or contractor (or accept a job offer) for up to 2 years following termination of my employment."

Angela	"FTC should ban non-compete clauses and reverse all non-compete clauses for all employees"
Nil	"Please get rid of this restriction on nonnal workers, I cannot look for a job within 100 miles of the hospital."
Rachel	" Physicians should not be held to non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses penalize the individual physicians, and contributes to burnout by taking away opportunities career advancement. There is no tangible reason to exclude non-profits and behemoth health systems from complying. . . . [I]f a physician would like to leave their hard earned job . . . it is a David v. Goliath fight. Please do not disparage health professionals to preserve corporate profit and greed."
Peter	"Contractual non-compete clauses frequently impair free market employment opportunities and are used by businesses to limit competition. Non-profit organizations commonly use non-compete clauses to protect their market share, and this is especially true in the health care industry. Our own regional non-profit hospital used the non-compete clause aggressively to interfere with my medical practice's ability to offer subspecialty medical care to a patient population we had served for nearly 50 years, even though arbitration ruled the contract invalid."
Elizabeth	"I strongly support the proposed rule and think it is in important step forward. As a health care worker we see that these non compete clauses directly impact patient access to care by limiting the movement of health care providers within a certain region. Health care providers (in particular physicians) are often forced to move if they want to change jobs liar any reason and therefore that community is losing a provider who would have otherwise stayed in the area and continued to serve that population. Large health care systems often have the most restrictive and unreasonable non compete clauses and they compromise a large share of employers for health care providers. I encourage the FTC to move forward with the proposed rule."
Benjamin	"Non-competes are used by employers to retaliate against employees and is a way for employers to stagnate wages for families and those unable to move or travel to acconunodate a non-compete"
Erika	"I strongly encourage the FTC to enact the rule banning noncompete clauses. Particularly is working in a region with heavy traffic or a profession with few employers, noncompete agreements absolutely entrap an employee at a job that may or may not be a good fit for them. This ban will force a shift of workplace culture, where it is more fair for the employees, and the free market can then work as intended. Speaking as a veterinarian who has worked in both generalist and specialty position, I think this is a good move all around."

M	"I strongly support the ban on non-competes. As a finance professional that is subject to an incredibly restrictive, nationwide non-compete, if I were to leave my job I would be prohibited from working for another financial institution anywhere in the country, even if that position fell far outside my existing role and area of expertise. The mere fact that employers can prohibit the type of company you work for, even if you took a new position that was drastically different from your role today, is excessively restrictive, monopolistic, anti-competitive and unfair."
Cristin	"I am a nurse practitioner at a telemedicine company with a non-compete clause. The non-compete clause prevents me from working in leadership at another company for 6 months if I decide to leave. This is very prohibitive as I could not even work in other areas that my current company does not focus on. As a nurse practitioner, I am getting paid substantially less than my physician counterparts for the same job, but I feel I'm unable to move elsewhere since my pay would be likely be less since I would not be able to take my leadership experience somewhere new and benefit from a higher salary. My time and investment is essentially being punished since the non-compete clause prevents me from growing and pursuing other employment opportunities."
Ameer	"I think both sides of the aisle can agree that healthcare is far from optimal. As a physician myself I see the struggles that both patients and physicians face operating within this system. One of the most problematic things with the current structure is non-compete clauses in contracts. There is currently a national physician shortage, but greedy CEOs and trustee boards that run hospitals are more interested in profits than patients. These non-compete clauses limit able-bodied and talented physicians from treating patients due to an arbitrary number of miles written in their contract. Additionally, there is no stipulation for when this clause is activated. People can be let go by the hospital and still required to honor the non-compete clause. This is asinine given that physicians would be asked to uproot their families and move just to work and treat patients. This rule needs to change for the good of patients and physicians."
James	"Non compete clauses are harmful to dual doctor families in military where 1 is a civilian."
Suzanne	"I've been a practicing veterinarian for 10 years. I am currently employed by a corporate practice which has 3 local clinics. My contract states that if I leave my position as associate veterinarian I cannot practice within 5 miles of any of the 3 clinics for 2 years after termination of the contract. That encompasses almost the entire county where the clinics reside. As someone who aims to start their own small business it prevents me from working in a very large territory close to where I live."
Ebony	"I support the noncompete proposal ban. I am a physician and all of my work contracts have included extensive non-compete wording that make it nearly impossible for me to change employers in my immediate geographical area. . . .

	Perhaps if the noncompete were banned this would force employers to fair treatment, competitive wages so that they can retain employees."
Mohammad	"I as a tax paying worker strongly support this bill. For long enough competition has been stymied and wages has been purposefully down for majority of American worker by big companies merging and back door deals. American dream has been a mirage for majority of working class people while a minority gathered more and more. This bill protects competition and in line with anti trust law. It will help to revive middle class and upper middle class. Current working contracts in most of the time prevents you from seeking job in like 50 mile radius once you leave the contract for 2/3 years. Its so so prevalent that most time you will not have any other options if you don't agree with this. Every American should be free to choose their job and not to be forced to uproot their family just to change their job."
David	"am in favor of the FTC's proposed rule to bar non-compete clauses."
M	" As an experienced physician who has worked in many settings, including public, non-profit, and private practices, I want to express my opinion that in all cases the employee suffers from non-compete clauses where they exist. If I accept a job, establish my family in a particular town, enroll my children in the local schools, and develop relationships with the community, I should not have to worry that if the job does not work out for some reason that I might have to completely uproot my family because of a non-compete clause to continue to earn a living in my chosen profession. I fully support this clause and request that no special carve outs are given to "non-profit" hospitals or any entity that might hire physicians or other medical professionals."
George	"Getting rid of Non-compete agreements is ESSENTIAL. Not only does it help employees who have left a job to find new work in their field immediately, but it's also GREAT for small businesses like mine . There are very few people who are qualified for the kind of work we do, and most applications for work end up being declined or the work is unsatisfactory. . . . We know many people from previous jobs before we started our business that would already know exactly what is required, yet because of NC clauses, we cannot hire them. This is downright absurd, especially because we are a very small business (4-5 people) and there's no way we could compete with a multinational corporation anyway. There's really no reason for non-compete clauses to exist. It hurts both small businesses as well as their employees who must sign these agreements."
Alex	"My non compete clause has mined my career and hurt my chances at success. By forcing me to stay in a company that doesn't value me, I have been shut off from opportunities to advance my career. My industry is very limited and there are only 3 companies that offer the same services we offer so there isn't opportunity for me to leave my company and find a place I have experience with without it being in violation of my noncompete. This has hurt any chance of true career growth."

Tim	"Please END these archaic and anti-worker practices!"
Taranjeet	"Please ban the non compete clause. It is literally forcing physicians like me to relocate or entirely pushed out of a state in each job that I chose to do and then leave. It is die biggest exploitation of physicians by physicians and corporate groups in the name of protecting their practices, it is as predatory as it gets!"
Kirtana	"I support this FTC proposed rule as non-compete agreements do more harm to entrepreneurs, employees, clients, and the overall business market(s). These agreements eliminate clients' autonomy when selecting goods and services. Specifically, in service oriented professions, the establishment of a client relationship is developed over time by the servicer through the foundation of trust, empathy, and personalization. The servicer invests tremendous time and effort in developing and maintaining said business relationship(s). In the event that the servicer leaves a particular company/employer, both them and the client should be able to choose whether to continue the business relationship and not be bound by the confines of a non-compete agreement. This is of even more importance in wellness professions such as massage therapy, yoga, physical therapy, where the client and servicer closely work together on very personal issues related to health and well-being. Further, non-compete agreements perpetuate the falsehood of the scarcity mindset in which we foolishly believe that there area finite number of clients/business markets. That is far from the truth as evidenced by die fact that not all clients/consumers use the same goods or services and instead make choices that are in alignment with their personal values as well as the business values of the servicer."
Roseanna	"I strongly support the Commission's efforts to eliminate non-compete clauses."
Nicole	"I support banning non-compete clauses"
Sara	"I am a physician and am in strong support of the non-compete clause rule which prohibits non-compete clauses. Many physicians are subject to this non- compete clause in which they cannot practice within a wide radius of any site of work, which often goes not just for their main location of work but all clinics and hospitals in the health system. In many cases, this precludes practicing in an entire state. This has significant impacts on patient safety--I have heard many stories of physicians feeling that their hospital was developing policies and procedures that led to unsafe care (such as inappropriately low staffing to patient ratios) and wanting to leave, but being unable or unwilling to uproot their entire family and move out of state to continue working as a physician. So the unsafe patient conditions continued."

Arshad	"Non compete clauses hinder patient care by restricting physician from moving one practice to another. They unfairly target physicians. Physician may have to leave a city for 1-2 years to be able to practice again. They should be revoked"
Talha	"I am a physician working in rural Pennsylvania and I am in full support of prohibiting noncompete clauses. My employer makes it very difficult to bring updated standards of care to the population that I take care of and leaving and starting my own independent private practice small business is challenging because my noncompete clause does not allow me to stay in this area if I were to quit. I hope the FTC will strongly consider banning noncompete clauses and allow me another physicians to take better care of our communities."
Arifa	"As an OB/GYN physician I believe non compete clauses are detrimental and unfair to physicians. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. I am in favor of this proposed rule and hope the FTC will extend this to non profit hospital systems also."
Joshua	"I am speaking to non-compete clauses from the viewpoint of a health care provider (physician). Noncompete clauses harm physicians and other providers, harm patients, and ultimately impair the ability to provide medical care in a community. . . . I am a physician who has been in active practice for more than a decade in multiple roles. Noncompete clauses prevent physicians from working in their same specialty in the same area - unlike in industries, physicians do not learn specific skills which would be advantageous to companies such as engineers learning protected secrets. Our primary role is to take care of patients and serve the health of our communities in myriad ways. The same goes for physician assistants, nurses, nurse practitioners, pharmacists, respiratory therapists... the list goes on. The medical community has freely available education and paid education in spades, and for the vast majority of employees, information gleaned at one practice is not sensitive enough that a noncompete needs to be in place to protect industries from transfer of information. Instead, what these do is shackle providers to a given hospital or corporation - stifling price competition among industries and leading to individual burnout from being trapped in jobs that are nonideal for personal reasons (e.g., wishing to stay in the same area for family). This is the opposite of an open market and offers multiple avenues for manipulation by employers. Furthermore, I am aware of multiple physicians who have not taken roles due to noncompete clauses, and others who have been directly harmed by them (i.e., not leaving a position where their work conditions are non-ideal and/or pay was substantially below market average). I agree with the proposed rule by FTC that it is an unfair method of competition for employers to enter into non-compete causes with workers. I strongly endorse removal of non-compete clauses and wish to thank the FTC for its proposed rule."

Randy	"Please protect workers and ban all non-compete agreements. People own their skills and knowledge, they are not die property of their employers."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Massachusetts | Statewide Impact

Massachusetts Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual MA Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual MA Worker Earnings

	"I've been in sales in the insurance industry for over 20 years. Due to a non compete that I have signed literally 20 years ago, I and have missed multiple opportunities where I was offered positions with greater salary and benefits that would greatly help advance my family situation. The noncompete also greatly reduce my ability to negotiate with my present company for an increase in salary due to the fact that they understand that the noncompete basically limits any potential of leaving [...] Like freedom of speech, citizens should be allowed to choose their path and not be held hostage by a non compete that they signed years ago because they needed a job." - Ante S.
	"Please ban non-competes. My parents are hard-working Americans who both were able to climb out of poverty by getting into sales my father in car sales, my mother in real estate. During the 2008 financial crisis, and then repeatedly throughout the wavering market since then, non-competes have dogged my parents and made their lives miserable. At one point, because of non-competes my dad needed to commute 3 hours to another state just to make enough money to pay off his debts and keep our house. Non-competes only serve corporate interests at the detriment and even exploitation of regular Americans. How is it a free market if people are trapped by their employer?" - Aristana S.
	I am a physician who has been employed by several large academic medical centers over the course of my career. My last position had a non-compete clause that forced me to leave the state when it became apparent that the job was not as advertised. The way the clinic was set up in this system there was no continuity of patient care. All patients got passed between doctors based on who had open slots in their schedule. The idea that a non-compete was necessary to keep me from leaving and bringing patients with me was ludicrous. The system made sure I had no attachment or continuity with my patients. I strongly support revoking non-compete clauses as it will strengthen the bargaining position of all workers. - Stephen W.
	I am a scientist working in renewable energy. I am currently subject to a non-compete clause. It has the potential of actively discouraging me from founding new companies or seeking work at potential competitors. This harms my earning potential and harms the country by preventing me from working where I would be most effective. I strongly support this rule. Please end this exploitative practice. - Zachariah N.

Tanja	I support the FTC's proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM). While I can see non-compete clauses playing a role in the contracts of C-suite executives, imposing non-compete clauses on ordinary workers and employees serves only one purpose: restricting worker mobility and hence their ability to seek higher wages, salaries and/or benefits. The result is depressed wages, salaries and benefits to the detriment of the impacted workers and their families, the sector's workers in general and the American economy more broadly. As their prevalence has grown across sectors and into the lower ranks of organizations' job categories, non-compete clauses hurt especially lower income workers, who are often people of color, women and other groups of marginalized and discriminated against people. The FTC's proposed NPRM is a step in the right direction of restoring workers' rights and their ability to pursue decent work and working conditions.
Stanton	I strongly support a ban on noncompete agreements. It is just one of the ways that employers exercise unjust control over their employees. The only exception I can think of should be if an employer pays for an employee to get training. It would be wrong for the employee to immediately take that training and use it for a competitor. I support a one-year noncompete agreement from the end of the completion of such training. But a year after the completion of the training, no NCA should apply.
philippe	I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. Involuntary non compete agreement except at the executive level are a modern day form of post civil war 'contract' offered on employees with no benefits received.
Jay	Please ban these unfair business practices. It is, as said by one of the people interviewed in the video, un-American to deny people the right to seek better or different employment, even after a worker is laid off. I read that the Chamber of Commerce and powerful business lobbies are fighting the proposed ban. As the video said, the millions of workers adversely affected by non-competes should have a voice too. I urge you to ban non-competes for all but high-wage specialized positions. Ordinary workers want to work. Our country faces labor shortages. Non-competes hurt the economy and real ordinary people simply trying to better their lives through work. Thank you for your consideration.
Russell	The attached submission is provided by over 100 lawyers and paralegals from around the country in response to the Commission's request for comments. We provide this submission in the hope of avoiding the potentially severe unintended consequences we foresee that may greatly overshadow any expected benefits of the proposed rule. We also identify an incremental path that we anticipate would accomplish most, if not all, of the Commission's objectives, with far less risk to workers, companies, and die economy. The signatories wish to express their great appreciation for the Commission's consideration of this submission and for taking on such an important and fraught issue. We offer any other assistance that the Commission may find helpful, including providing additional real-world experience or assisting in the drafting of language for guidance or a revised rule.

Lisa	There needs to be a middle ground. (a) Yes ban non-compete clauses for "non-intellectual work" (eg all front line workers such as service providers like hair stylists, retail workers, etc.). (b) Do NOT BAN non-compete clauses for "intellectual work" (i.e., where there is significant proprietary knowledge that the worker has been entrusted with): examples of these are lawyers, doctors, sales managers, etc. As owner of a small business that employs intellectual- knowledge workers, it would gravely harm my business if the people I train to do highly intellectually intensive work then just go off and use what I taught them to start their own business. My non-compete clause is for 6 years and is essential.
Bridget	I have been blocked several times attempting to further my career outside of my current company. I have 3 college degrees and 26 years experience in my field but my knowledge and talent are wasted not being able to advance to build my career and secure appropriate pay
KRISTEN	I support the new rule banning non-compete agreements. These clauses, especially when used for non-executive roles, have the effect of limiting competition for workforce talent, and thus depressing wages. In many cases, they are "sprung" on workers and potential employees after a position has been accepted, and the employee is not compensated for agreeing to limit his or her future opportunities. Employers have many tools to protect against IP and trade secret theft, but non-competes are overbroad and anti-competitive. Non-compete agreements restrict competition, and reduce innovation, by not allowing the free movement of employees among competitor companies, and die creation of new businesses. They should be banned. I support the new rule. Kristen

Amanda	Non-competes are just another way of stripping workers of their rights Please rule on behalf of the workers and not the money-hoarding management.
Jennifer	I work in the veterinary industry and with almost 50% of veterinary hospitals being owned by large corporations, veterinarians are often required to sign non-compete

	agreements. Generally, there is a time and distance requirement imposed as well, anywhere from 6 months to 2 years and up to 100 miles from their current location. Over the past 3 years, our industry was pummeled with an increase of pet ownership during COVID lock downs. The average veterinarian now sees an additional 1000 patients per year, skilled support are underpaid and many left the profession, and we are dealing with a MAJOR mental health crisis as well. Why should a corporation be able to hold a DOCTOR of ANY KIND as indentured to them if they would like to pursue or improve their work life? Also, during COVID, veterinarians were asked to help vaccinate people, were allowed reciprocity, but could be sued if they were compensated for their knowledge and skills by their employer? This is a rewrite of the indentured servant. What happened to free commerce and the land of opportunity?
Margaret	Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes --- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone.
Julian	I am Julian Jocque, a Senior Software Engineer with 7 years experience. In that time, I have worked for 3 different companies and the non-compete clause of my most recent employer is directly impacting my decisions on whether to talk to ex-coworkers about building somethings different and better. I believe I can run the business I worked for better than they can, and I believe that a number of my ex-coworkers agree with me, but for the next 12 months I cannot directly approach any of them for fear of being sued for poaching and other anti-competitive laws. Quite honestly, I fear legal repercussions from merely making this stance publicly known. Competition is good for the overall efficiency of the free market. It's ridiculously one-sided that a company can tell me not to compete with them and that is it not reciprocal in that they are more than free to continue competing against me. Either corporations are people or not, the laws need to make up their mind. On the way out, my business underhandedly slipped in an arbitration agreement and strong-armed employees into signing it against their best interest. I stood up for myself and quit. The business refused to clarify whether signing die arbitration agreement was required for continued employment at the business, because they were well aware of the legal troubles of doing so. These sort of anti-labor, anti-worker, pro-business, pro-corporation laws have got to go. I immediately started my own C-Corporation after leaving my most recent employer with the express purpose of making money, and it is vile, repugnant, and morally reprehensible that I am unable to use my own hard earned, post-tax dollars to try to compete and grow that money as quickly, and aggressively as I want to. I will never include such a disgusting and terrible clause into any contracts I would ever sign with any employees I may have in the future. I, Julian Jocque, owner and founder of Jules Jules and Julian, formally oppose the legality of non-compete clauses.
Gina	Non-compete clauses are poison for families and people starting out in their careers. Here is my experience: I. At my publishing-adjacent internship when my career was starting, my employer asked me to sign a contract that included a non-

	compete. This employer was not hiring full-time people so there was no hope of advancement there, and signing the non-compete would have meant I couldn't work in the publishing industry within several miles - that is, it would have precluded me from working anywhere in New York City, the home of publishing! I was able to get this clause removed from my contract, but that just goes to show how willy-nilly employers are about using these clauses. 2. My dad was able to start a small business because his first employer did NOT have a non-compete. As a result, my dad has been in business 25 years offering a service in an essential industry. He does compete with his employer in that he is a small, nimble operation compared to their slow behemoth. As a result, the clients have more options regarding who they want to work with! 3. My husband is a doctor and has a non-compete. If he wanted to change jobs, we would have to totally uproot our lives: sell our house, change our son's school, leave our friends, etc. His non-compete governs our family's choices. His employer should not be able to wield that much power over our futures. It's unjust.
E	Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am strongly in support of this ban on non-compete clauses.
daryle	Dear Federal Trade Commission, Please, please, please ban die non-compete clause. I am a 52 year old surgeon in Springfield MA and have been in practice at my small hospital for my entire 20 year career. For financial reasons I joined up with a group in Hartford CT (30 miles south of here) in 2016. That practice has gone in a different direction over the last 2 years and I just want to keep my own practice the way it was. My merger contract with them includes a 15 mile non-compete area that I should not have agreed to but did not understand its significance at that time. I can't stay with the current group, I have local group that is willing to offer me MORE MONEY to stay here, but I can't with that clause. I have 3 children - 11 years old, 7 years old, and 4 years old - and do not want to have to move them from their friends/school to take a job farther away. We live in a rural area and there are not many hospitals around here. 1100% agree that ALL PEOPLE should be able to compete for the best/highest paying positions that they can to support their loved ones. PLEASE BAN THE CLAUSE. IT WOULD MEAN THE WORLD TO ME AND MY KIDS. I APPRECIATE YOUR TIME.
Martina	I worked as a computer programmer, developer and computer analyst for over 30 years. I was compelled to sign non-compete contracts with most of my employers. These contracts caused me to think twice before leaving my employer to seek better wages, a shorter commute or better working conditions. I believe my pursuit of happiness was thwarted by such contracts. I felt enslaved with no recourse. This feeling deflated my loyalty to my employer. My creativity was dampened. How can a business prosper when their employees harbor sour emotions?
Marcia	I just watched the NYT opinion video demonstrating die inequity and ubiquity of these non compete agreements. It's time to vote to stop this craziness. Let people who can work and are willing to work be free to do so!

Thomas	My friend is a local journalist. He has a non-compete as a term and condition of his employment and it limits his ability to make more money elsewhere. You could tell in how his demeanor changed when talking about this proposed rule change that it will make a significant financial and moral difference to him. The way non-competes are used in this instance constrains liberty for one to benefit another and should be banned.
Adam	I do not believe that this rule should be applied to physicians or general medical practitioners. There is no clear "trade or industry proprietary information" that such a practitioner could feasibly bring with them to a competing employer, so it should not be applicable.
Eric	I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. These clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them.
Catherine	It is vitally important that the FTC protect the rights of average American workers to change their jobs without mandatory onerous noncompete contracts. A hairdresser should be able to go to a different salon near their home to work. This noncompete clause rule stifles basic freedom. Get rid of it!
Peter	I write in favor of this Noncompete Clause Rule. Noncompete clauses remove the person's right to employ their labor as they choose: to exchange their labor or withhold and transfer labor as they will. Without this right, a worker is reduced toward indentured servitude. A free or private market cannot function well unless all parties are able to function as their own agents. To hobble the agency of workers in favor of employers in favor of their employers is to interfere with economies local and national Banning noncompete clauses from hiring contracts will strengthen the communities where these employees live and work.
Louai	Yes please, ban Non-Competes. They are damaging to workers and remove considerable competition from the market.
Peter	I am strongly in favor of banning non-compete agreements. Employees are rarely in a position to decline a job offer despite the presence of a non-compete, even if they know a non-compete may hurt their long-term earnings potential. Employees who switch jobs more frequently have better long-term earning potential - companies know this and use non-competes as a means of coercing employees into accepting what they would not otherwise. Non-competes also stifle competition; in short, they help individual corporations at the expense of workers and at the expense of the economy overall. Getting rid of them is long overdue.
George	Please vote to ban non-compete clauses, they are used to trap workers in low-wage jobs and just avoid the need for actual pay and reform.
Allison	Non-compete clauses give large healthcare the upper hand and take away the ability of patients to choose their doctor. Please rid non-compete clauses.

Philip	Great idea, I fully support this as a software engineer.
Aurimas	Please abolish non-compete
Katherine	It is unconscionable that non-compete clauses keep workers trapped in low-paying jobs, toxic work environments; or workplaces located far from their homes. The purpose of the non-compete clause has been perverted; no worker at a fast-food restaurant, hair salon, or family medical practice possesses a trade secret that would harm their employer if they sought a better job. This rule benefits employers, and employers only, as it suggests that the employee's work is so valuable to the company that their departure would be harmful, while making it impossible for the employee to actually capitalize on their worth.
Elizabeth	I agree with this ruling. I've been forced to sign non-competes for access to employment that are so egregious in timeframe and breadth of work that they are likely not enforceable, but that wasn't the goal. The goal was to intimidate workers into not looking for other jobs because the work conditions were so poor, but they felt trapped because they were forbidden to work employment in their field of specialty if they quit. For laborers that are highly specialized, non-competes can make it so they do not have the ability to work in their specialized field and therefore cannot find work that would be able to support their financial needs.
Margaret	Individuals should be free to leave a job and apply for another in the same field. That kind of freedom is basic to being an American.
Sandra	I can't believe we stop people from working wherever you can either be happier or make more money or maybe a lot less travel. What happened to freedom for the worker to work where ever they want? This should not be allowed to have an owner tell you you can't work at the competitor's business. They do not own their workers!! Everyone should have the same rights to work anywhere.
Juan	I'm a physician, and it's a common problem in healthcare. Many organizations, especially those that are for profit and owned by private equity, will make you sign non-compete agreements. It can have big negative impact on the healthcare availability in certain areas and it can have very negative effects on a physician's ability to earn a living. Non-competes have more negative than positive effects. Please pass regulations that forbid them.
Juan	Hello, I am an Emergency Physician in Massachusetts and I completely support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements. These are abused in the healthcare industry routinely and serve no purpose in the healthcare industry other than for the purpose of suppressing competition and fair wages. We are already an industry where many areas of the country have monopolies or oligopolies in the hospital systems, and in the physician groups that staff them. Eliminating the possibility of non-competes would help these issues somewhat, and this industry could use all the help it can get.

Adrianna	I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. The most innovative ideas come from those who are in the workforce on a daily basis. With non-compete clauses we are ultimately hindering those ideas from coming to life.
Lucas	Given the shrinking ability for many people to make a living selling their labor where they choose, I believe non-compete clauses should be banned and deemed a method of unfair competition.
Monisha	Should be eliminated for the sake of communities struggling to find medical providers
Abhijit	This non-compete should stop as it is against all fair practice and benefits only hospital systems and large predatory practices. It is already not acceptable in some States.
Emily	As a young veterinarian, my first job after internship was in a small animal general practice. I had a 10 mile non-compete in my contract. When I left due to concerns regarding the hospital's practices often deviating from the standard of care, my next job was nearly an hour away from home due to the non-compete. This not only was a hardship for myself, a mother of young children, but also for my community where there is still a stark deficit of small animal general practice veterinarians.
Jeanne	Your employer should not possess your brain power and knowledge.
Mohammad	Please ban non-compete! It's not fair to get advantages to companies to decide our own salary and future! Specially when working for toxic work environment
Lorraine	Non-Compete Clauses should have never been allowed. They should be outlawed forever. These clauses give too much power to employers that already have too much of it, and that seek to limit employees' opportunities to make a living. It's hard enough to make a living, hard enough to find a job working for actual human beings, but who do these people think they are trying to say who we can work for? Ridiculous. Please end this oppressive craziness.
Terry	non-competes are antithetical to a free market and allow only the few to control the ability to innovate and create by not allowing talent and ideas to flow. Abolish non-competes
Jamie	I've been in a specific trade for 35 years, however due to many factors the business closed. The new employer is forcing a non-compete which would prohibit me from working in this industry during employment and for 12 months after I leave their company. I have no other experience so this would force me out of any employment options. The clause is unfair to expect myself and others like me to forego all of the years of training and experience and risk it all on a new job working out. The company would have all the leverage, essentially owning me, because they know I cannot work anywhere in our field for a year. I need to support my family. At 53 years old I can't afford to retrain in a different industry. Please do not let the non-compete continue to destroy capitalism.

Holly	I received a great job offer from TripAdvisor in February 2022 that came with a $50k pay increase, remote work, and a better fit for my goals and lifestyle. I spent weeks pursuing this opportunity and considering the offer and decided to verbally accept it, only to find out when they sent the formal offer letter that I'd have to sign a strict non compete clause that seemed open to broad interpretation and would potentially prohibit me from working for a wide variety of "competitors." It was impossible to figure out upfront which companies they considered to be competitors, and the clause was valid nationwide. It would have ultimately caused me too much stress and potentially limited my opportunities down the line, so after much debating back and forth I ended up turning down the offer. I've been sad ever since and have spent the past year wondering how my life could have been if I'd felt more comfortable signing the offer.
Harish	Non-Compete Clauses are very bad for innovation. It favors legacy companies which lobby to keep themselves relevant for as long as possible in a rapidly changing tech landscape.
Laura	Please eliminate the non-compete clause rule. I work for a small firm which required me to sign a non-compete. It bans me from working in the entire industry for a period of time, so I couldn't work in the same field if I left my job. I feel trapped in my job, with no options.
Laura	Please eliminate non-compete clauses. I am a worker who was forced to sign a non-compete 10 years ago and have no prospects for job mobility.
Terry	I am delighted that the FTC has taken up this question. Noncompete clauses should be illegal.
Irene	This will be essential in improving the work environment for Healthcare workers, preserving patient choice in terms of being able to keep their physician and improve staffing. It will keep needed physicians in the community who may otherwise have to leave.
Ariel	As a doctor, I wholeheartedly agree with banning non-compete clauses. In the medical field it tips the balance in favor of large companies that may contract with hospitals, medical facilities, surgery centers etc. These large corporations then hire doctors, coerce them to sign non compete contracts which effectively limits working at the very facilities where they dedicate their lives to and then if working conditions under the company are poor or the company terminates their own contract with the medical facility or the medical facility terminates the contract with the company, the doctor is then unable to work at that facility for themselves or another company that may have more favorable conditions. The relationships between the doctors, patients, other hospital staff for which the doctor has developed is now in jeopardy as is their livelihood and they have to start over despite their personal and professional dedication. The doctor has no leverage to improve working conditions etc for fear of losing their employment while companies have lawyers at the ready to threaten lawsuits in other states far from the doctor's state of unemployment since often these are national companies employing workers across many states. So they threaten to make the worker to obtain legal representation in another state and pay the company's legal fees if the doctor attempts to break the non compete clause.

John	This is great. Finally - the government pursuing a law for workers. As an engineer, I should have the opportunity to work anywhere I want to grow my career, improve my work environment and provide for my family, without the professional handcuffs of non compete agreements!!
Larry	Eliminate Non-Compete clauses in employment contracts completely. These clauses are common in my industry and they are completely ineffective in stopping employees from leaving. Clauses such as these are just put in to invoke fear, and serve no positive function for the employee. Get rid of Non- Compete clauses
Breanna	As a veterinarian, I am in complete support of this proposed rule and hope it goes into effect. Non-competition clause are common place in my profession. I've seen them place undo limitation and stress on my colleagues who end up stuck in unreasonable employment agreements. As doctors, we deserve better!
Margaret	Non-compete agreements are akin to indentured servitude. These hurt individuals, families & the community through financial de-stabilization of adults. I also disagree with research clauses that say employers own your inventions & ideas. These laws are modern versions of fiefdoms where employers own their employees.
Lora	We need to get rid of non-compete nonsense. And I will give you an example: I had the world's dumbest conversation with my old job's I IR department yesterday. Three weeks ago. I put in my notice at my old job. The company was a small startup focused exclusively on making a type of molecule called fusion proteins, for the purpose of treating rare diseases. They weren't doing well generally, they'd made some bad decisions to take risks, and the risks happened and their programs were significantly delayed as a result. My boss was doing unethical crap, trying to approve for human use a batch of parentcrals (injectable drugs) for rare disease patients that had bits of other people's skin, glass shards, etc. in the finished vials. The quality department tried to tell her that's not acceptable, she was determined to steamroller them into submission. She'd already bullied the project manager into it. She'd already lost two hatches to quality issues and didn't want to fix them. I wanted no part of this crap, because I have ethics and moral quandaries about injecting immunocompromised patients with mystery "particles". I found another job working for a large company that worked on cancer treatments, heart disease, diabetes, neurology and inflammation (note: NOT rare diseases), and put in my notice. I started the new job and posted on LinkedIn that I was happy to share I'd started a new job. Then I got an email from the previous job's HR, who knew precisely why I was quitting because I'd told them in the exit interview. BR said they'd heard I was working for a competitor which was Not Allowed per the

	terms of my non-compete. I pointed out that not only was I working on a completely different type of modality and molecule (antibody-drug conjugates instead of fusion proteins) and a completely different set of diseases (oncology instead of rare disease), but nobody in the whole entire very large company was working on rare disease. They were aiming for blockbusters, not small niches. It wasn't even remotely the same business strategy. HR shrugged and said they didn't understand all the science stuff, this is just what "someone" told them. Okay, well, your someone is wrong, good luck to you. Now I have to spend a bunch of money before I even get my first paycheck to have a lawyer write an expensive letter explaining that the entirety of the worldwide pharmaceutical company is not actually a competitor, you can't ban someone from working in their field just because you want to intimidate them from whistleblowing, and you also can't force someone to work for you just because you have a lousy reputation and can't hire anyone who is actually good. I happen to know this only because I took a class as part of my MBA about contract law, but most people won't know that and would actually be intimidated. The CEO certainly doesn't want to have it spoken out loud in a courtroom where it's public record that he doesn't know how chemistry works anymore, or the reason why I quit, or anything else that would certainly reflect badly on his organization, so he isn't actually going to take me to court unless he's really lost his marbles (which is entirely possible I suppose), but he can certainly be a pain in the neck and cost me a lot of legal fees in the meantime while lawyers explain to him the meaning of "tortious interference" and "respondeat superior". The problem is, it could take years for the lawyers to explain it to him and for it to go to court, if he decides he wants to pursue it. And more years for me to get any resolution. In the meantime. I could be out of a job if the new job decides this is too much drama for them. For years. Even though he's full of crap, it won't matter, and I won't be able to keep a roof over my head. I can do everything right, and still be out of a job that I spent four years of undergrad and five years of graduate school and 20 years of experience working towards. Just because some jerk wants to abuse the courts and punish me with this nonsense. People need to be able to leave abusive situations. And make no mistake, abusers will abuse anyone they can get tangled up in their systems, by any means necessary, and they aren't satisfied to leave their abusive manipulative behavior at home. Non-competes are just another way to abuse people they have power over, because treating people well isn't actually an option in their sociopathic brains. We need to not give people tools to abuse others, including at work.
Lisa	I am writing to voice my support for The Non-Compete Clause Rule. Talented workers should not be commanded to agree to non-complete clauses in their terms of employment. They have every right to use their talents to secure an income for themselves after departing any employer
Susan	I am writing to support the elimination of non-compete clauses that hiring contracts, not simply for low-wage workers, but for white collar workers as well. While the goal of ensuring trade secrets within a company remain confidential when an employee resigns, the broad-scale sweep of these clauses is insidious. It should be applied, if at all, only to those positions where sharing trade secrets is a legitimate concern, and time-limited in those cases.

Seth	Non-compete clauses have often been used to hold workers back. While it is reasonable that a worker should engage in competitive action while still employed, forcing a worker to be unable to seek alternative employment is a form of forced servitude. From tech workers down to entertainment venues, non-compete clauses have limited innovation and expansion. It has limited wages and forced workers to be dependent upon a single employer. Let's eliminate non-compete clauses once and for all.
Aurash	I think in a free country with a free market non compete clauses are immoral and antithetical to the American way of life
Ellen	Non compete clauses should not be allowed or enforced! It amounts to treating American labor as slaves! Stop this practice!
David	I recently lost my job back in December and eight years ago I signed a non-compete agreement. I have to tell any future employer that I'm subject to a non-compete agreement so my future prospects are focused around changing industries with the same type of work, which definitely puts me at a disadvantage. Having this rule change would significantly reduce my burden of finding a new job, as the type design industry is very small due to my former employer owning a huge amount of the market.
Chuck	Non-competes are anti-competitive for both the company that enforces them and for future employers who could benefit from competent, ethical employees. If you need a non-compete to keep competitors at bay by limiting the workforce, then you should consider whether your company is competitive in the marketplace long term. If you want to deny my skills to the marketplace after you've decided not to engage them any longer, then pay me for the duration.
scott	As a worker and independent contractor, I want to voice my support for banning non-compete clauses. They stifle innovation by restricting the free movement of labor. Additionally, for very consolidated fields they effectively divide the work force between only two companies. Consider for example advanced micro devices and Intel. When non-compete clauses are used, if a worker wants to work on computer hardware, they now have no other options other than their current employer.
Stephen	Non competes are awful. I am being sued right now. For going into business on my own in Boston Massachusetts By my former employer who says I signed a non compete In 2003 20 years ago. After the company was bought and sold 6 times. And my job title changed 5 times In two thousand fourteen they tried getting me to sign A employment contract. And I refused. I am fighting them in court. Hopefully I will prevail but first spending over a $100000 to defend myself. Small startups like me have to refinance my house to pay the Lawyer fees A corporation I worked for is a billion dollar corporation. And they just keep trying scare tactics to make me back down They went as far as trying to get a preliminary injunction. Ordered against me. And the judge refused but I still have to spend. A $1000 an hour to defend myself. Please please Help us little guys Get a Fair shake.

Patti	Non-compete agreements are a restraint on trade and constitute barriers to workers' freedom of movement in the economy. They do not respect the free market.
Yinett	I support the removal of the non-compete. I find that they are overused and serve to limit the earning potential for many. Some corporations/ companies make their non-compete predatory by having long periods of time, more than six months—resulting in people changing careers or having inconvenient job situations.
Deborah	I have always been against non-compete clauses. It benefits corporations at the expense of workers. It is unfair. People should have the right to work and compete in a truly capitalistic society.
Carolyn	Forcing medical professions to sign non'-compete clauses to get Employment is both unjust and unwise. Please stand against it. Licensed physicians should be able to serve their patients in the community wherever they see fit and without such undue limitation. Americans deserve doctors who are not in economic bondage to hospital bureaucracy and do tours deserve to be as free as other people as to where they choose to work in different phases of their careers. Controlling doctors in such a way would likely lead to other sanctions on what they could or could not do medically for their patient. The no compete clause is abhorrent in a democracy and must not be forced on our doctors.
Dee	non-compete clauses area modern version of slavery, entrapping workers in contracts that prevent them from looking for another job in the same field. No one should be forced to put up with bad treatment by an employer who required them to sign a contract with a non-compete clause.
Christopher	Non-competes have been weaponized and are completely inappropriate as currently applied. Confidentiality rules cover technology development and 'client' lists. Mobility is essential to personal development and realizing one's potential and passion.
Michelle	Companies shouldn't have the right to tell us who we can or can't be employed by. Whatever happens outside of work hours has nothing to do with them, and they don't have the right to control an employee's other sources of income. It is an extreme overreach of power that belongs in the hands of the people, not predatory companies.
Steven	I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other medical facilities that use non-compete clauses are detriments of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. Non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them.

Mario	What I learn while working is more important than the salary I receive. It is what assures future earnings. Non-Compete agreements make me steals from me the ability to use what I learn. It makes an employer a Master and me a Servant. Please get rid of this. Thanks.
Bill	Non compete have gotten out of hand. They now transfer power to companies, who hold most of it already and severely limit a workers ability to ply their trade or craft. They are punitive, a worker cannot face die power of a corporations legal department should they face that because of a perceived breach of non-compete. Elimination of the non-compete clause would force companies to change how they interact, pay and negotiate with workers by transferring power hack to the individual. Companies would be more likely to pay better and provide better working environments in order to hold onto valuable people. Get rid of them, if companies are really interested in a level playing field then give the power back to the employees.
Gabriela	I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. Please pass this ruling so that workers have the right to obtain jobs with better pay and/or working conditions without having to move far away or change specialties.
Diane	I support this ban.
Kandasamy	I support the FTC's rule to prohibit employers from entering into non-compete agreements and to require employers notify employees that any prior agreements have been rescinded. As an employee in the technology industry, I am routinely subject to non-compete clauses as part of employment agreements. Although my employer is located in a state that has banned the practice, they continue to require employees to sign non-compete clauses to employment contracts. Even if one's employer does not actively seek to enforce the provision, it's existence makes a new potential employer reluctant to offer employment, lest they get sucked into a legal morass or have to delay employing someone. Overall, this depresses wages in the industry, benefiting employers at die expense of employees. The American system relies on free markets including for labor. The system that employers have put in force through non-compete clauses, agreements not to hire each others' employees etc are clearly limiting die freedom of the labor market leading to depressed wages.
Rishita	Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage.

Curtis	I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. In the Computer Science field, an employee could have learned computer programming as early as junior high school, gotten a computer science degree and interned at multiple companies before obtaining a job with a salaried position. Their salaried role did not give them the skills so why should their current company receive proprietary ownership of those skills for any amount of time? In many computer programming jobs, the employees do not receive any training from the company on the plethora of computer science topics necessary to do a computer programming job because most companies bypass training my only hiring senior developers. So again, why should those companies have exclusive rights to an employee's skill for any amount of time. How could it a company truly claim to be an at will employer if an employee can not use their core competency at another company?
Carole	Non-Compete Clauses are unfair and restrict employees and small businesses from going into new jobs or new products. Non-compete clauses are anti-democratic and monopolistic and stifle innovation. End non-compete clauses now and allow the free movement of employees to other businesses in their fields to make a better life for themselves.
Robert	I wholeheartedly agree with banning noncompete documents. Several years ago, I was out of a job. Through a former employer, I was connected with another small company who we had a working relationship with. At the time, they knew I was going to be underpaid for the position they were offering me, a project manager position. I knew that the company was not in the best financial situation so I accepted the position with the expectation that my salary would be brought up to the current rate for that position once funds became available. Over the next year they raised my salary but still it was well below the normal pay rate for someone in my position. That small company was bought out by a larger company. As I was ending my first year after the buyout, I was told I would get a substantial raise to get me to the proper salary range. That did not happen. Instead, over the course of the last few years, my salary increased 10% each year but I am still far below the average pay for someone in my position. Although I see many similar open positions at other companies with salaries twenty to thirty thousand dollars higher than my salary, I was forced to sign a noncompete so I cannot apply for those positions. In my current position, I am not privy to any company secrets. I do not deal with intellectual property in any real way. I am locked into a position with a company that knows I cannot easily leave so they have no incentive to pay me a fair salary for the job I am doing. Please end noncomplete clauses.
Thomas	I am an outside salesman for a lumber company. My customers are mine but the company up until this year would make me sign I nomially sign a compete contract to keep my pension alive. BUT THIS YEAR THEY DID NOT MAKE ME SIGN.. I heard from President Biden that these were being banned. So it made sense why they did not make me sign one. A big thank you to our President.
Michael	I speak in favor of the proposed rule. I have personally been negatively affected by non-compete clauses due to the asymmetric leverage between my previous employer and myself. The only experience I have had with these agreements has

	been an effort to stifle my opportunity by a company that had no business interest in my competition but merely wanted to reduce the effort required to retain their workforce. I was threatened with a law suit for leaving a company to take a job in an unrelated industry.
Nicholas	In alignment with the concept of fair and equitable business and employment practices, I completely favor banning non-compete agreements.
Lou	As a technology executive I have worked in both Boston and Silicon Valley. The difference between them is stark. In SV, where non-competes have long been banned, there is a notable positive impact on the rate of innovation. Reducing the 'friction' in changing jobs does increase employee turnover, which might be seen as bad for employers, but in fact it is a benefit in many ways. First, it makes it easier to hire! If you absolutely need a top specialist, and are willing to pay for them, you have a much broader pool of candidates than in Boston. Also, employees moving around more increases the pool of people those employees know. if you area well-run, attractive company, this means your existing employees will be more qualified to recruit people to join you. Second, that higher rate of employee motion has a dramatic impact on creativity and skill sets. By working at other places they are learning new tools, new processes, and new skills, that your organization may not have been aware existed. This increases creativity and innovation in your firm, and productivity. Third, making it easier for people to leave benefits well-nm organizations. We all know that demotivated employees can have negative impacts far beyond themselves. They slow teams down, lower morale, etc. Sometimes people just aren't going to be a good fit anymore. When that happens too often employers only have the tool of firing, which is expensive, disruptive, and often makes other employees nervous. It is to everyone's benefit if your employees know that if they want to leave, they can leave easily. Because that means that the employees that stay for the long term want to stay. They aren't trapped by a non-compete. In my opinion this is one of the best regulatory changes the FTC could make. It will have long-term benefits for innovation and productivity nationwide, and will have many short term benefits for employees and well-run organizations. Thank you for proposing this rule, and please implement it without delay.
Carolyn	Non-compete agreements stifle innovation for businesses and contribute to wage stagnation for workers. They are fundamentally anti-American and anti- Capitalist, not to mention anti-worker. I currently have a non-compete agreement. I work in marketing and do not know any "trade secrets" about my company. My current company is experiencing stagnation due to poor leadership and my salary is not keeping pace with the market or with inflation. If a competing business will pay more for my skills and experience than my current employer, why should I not be allowed to work for them? This competition is what makes a capitalist society thrive. This is why I support the FTC's proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses.
Cintra	It is past time that this issue be addressed. People's careers have been ruined because of this clause. Yes! I am in favor of this new law.

Jessica	This clause is unjust. Workers who are mistreated should be able to move to other jobs in the same sector without retaliation
Sam	I support the actions taken by the FTC to ban non-compete clauses and thereby help to raise salaries
Sarah	As a physician, non-competes hinder my ability to care for patients. In the climate of dissolving private practices, merging Physician's Organizations and large hospital conglomerates, non-competes do not make sense for physicians to be able to stay within the same community when changes occur.
Richard	As I read through the proposed regulation, it is written so broadly as to cover Government Ethics laws that prohibit government employees from appearing before a Board that they have served on. For instance, Massachusetts State Ethics rules prevent a member of a Board of Assessors member from representing a third party before the Board of Assessors after leaving the Board. Under the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, such Ethics rules could be outlawed. The proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule needs to be amended to exclude Government entities, and to exclude private organizations with similar ethics considerations (Arbitration agencies, attorneys, etc).
David	Non-compete clauses are ineffective for employers, and prevent some workers from reasonable gainful employment. They should be banned.
Noah	I strongly support this rule. As a physician, I have worked to gain my knowledge for years and now cannot use it when and where I wish. I do not possess secret information on a business. It is purely a tool to drive down wages and benefit and trap us in jobs.
David	Non-compete clauses limit employees future job prospects and potential earning potential. If you constrain a person ability to work then the individual will suffer and the overall economy will suffer. These should be banned nationally.
Al	Please support ending this unfair practice and restore die freedom to work anywhere.
Nathalie	As a physician, I strongly oppose non competes and refuse to work for any organization that has one. Given the ever increasing shortage of medical professionals and the growing need for quality care, non competes stifle one's ability to practice freely. Having parameters set on where and for whom one can work and in what period of time makes these types of job opportunities something to run away from rather than being a place where quality care can be delivered. Life circumstances change and physicians should have the freedom to change with them.
Gregory	I strongly support a ban on non-compete clauses. It traps people in jobs they hate and encourages poor employer behavior. It stifles free job markets.

Chris	Non-compete agreements are anti-competitive (by definition), monopolistic, and anti-worker. They deprive companies of top-tier, experienced talent and they deprive workers of the most relevant job opportunities where they can have the most impact. Non-competes should absolutely be banned.
Rob	I am writing to express my opinion that the FTC make non compete clauses illegal for all employee contracts. Non compete contracts suppress wages, competition and innovation by artificially supressing the freedom of the American worker. It is a clear restriction of individual liberty. Noncompete clauses systemically drive down wages, even for workers who aren't bound by one. Every worker stuck in a job represents a position that isn't opening up for someone else. And if employers know their workers can't leave, they have less incentive to offer competitive pay and benefits, which puts downward pressure on wages for everyone.
Nancy	I very strongly support die FTC's proposal to ban non-compete agreements.
Matt	I would like to applaud the FTC for their proposed rules that call for the prohibition of non-compete restrictions. As a professional who has been in the workplace for over 30 years, I have been subject to a non-compete agreement for my entire career. During this time, this form of legal handcuff has served more to restrict my ability to grow professionally and monetarily than to protect the intellectual property rights of my employers. Simply put, non-competes have become a yoke upon the neck of American workers, a mechanism by which companies trap employees into retained servitude and a blunt forced instrument used to stifle free market competition. I expect during this period of public comment that corporations and their lobbyists are applying undue pressure upon the FTC....A few facts: * If you don't agree to sign the non-compete, you simply won't get hired. It is not a voluntary agreement, but rather a one sided contract agreed to under duress. * Companies can protect trade secrets and intellectual property with other legal means. California, where non-competes are prohibited, proves this. * When hiring new employees, companies look for ideal candidates: people who have the skills and experience most pertinent to their product or industry. The applicant who checks the most boxes wins. If you are competing with another job candidate who has more pertinent experience in the company's designated line of business, you will most likely lose out. And that's precisely what non-competes do, they restrict your employment options to entirely new markets or industries where it is by definition more difficult for the job candidate to find success. * This is doubly troubling in situations where companies lay off employees, where the employee is now desperate to find new work but severely constrained in their ability to obtain viable employment. * Companies have resources to enforce non-competes. Individual workers often are afraid to fight non-competes given the financial cost of defending their inalienable rights to work where they want. I have worked for companies who have brought the power of their Amlaw 100 law firm against employees attempting to find employment with a perceived competitor, and in all these cases do you know what I've never heard be brought up by these Executives? Concerns about intellectual property. It's always been about trying to prevent precedent. "If we let this person go work where they want, then all our employees will try and do that." If companies truly desire to increase employee retention. I have an alternative suggestion. Concentrate more on creating a working environment where employees would like to work and less about enforcing legal traps that make them feel like they have little other choice.

Jen	Physicians go to years of schooling and most take on high debt in order to serve others. Of all the professions, physicians should not have non-competes.
Lorie	I support the non-compete clause rule. I'm in high tech in a state in which non-competes are enforceable. My non-compete says that I cannot go work for any company that would have the same prospective customers as my current company. So no matter the industry, if the customers have computers, I can't work there. I know that it's probably broad enough that a judge wouldn't enforce it, but I'd have to pay a lawyer and go to court to fight it.
Ralph	Non-competes do nothing to protect corporate secrets but do prevent workers from using their knowledge they have acquired over their lifetime and leveraging that experience to work for the employer willing to pay them the value they offer to their employers. Please eliminate the non-complete clauses.
David	I am currently 63 years old and was laid off from a company that I had been at for less than a year after being recruited from another company. I have experience in the market and my former employer is not releasing me from my non-compete limiting my market/career opportunity at this late stage in my career. I was a Sales Director selling an technology SaaS software product as an individual contributor. I support eliminating Non-Competes at all levels of an organization. I am likely forced into retirement even though I have a powerful skill set, industry and product knowledge in this space.
Adam	I have seen firsthand how noncompete agreements suppress competition and harm employees. Please see the attached document for more details.
bill	I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses even though I have not been personally affected by them. It is obvious to me, a retired English teacher, that these clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. I am against harming working people in order to enrich corporations.
Micah	I would like to applaud the FTC for its proposed ban on non-compete clauses. The surest sign that the FTC is onto something is that the only people who have come out against the proposal are employment lawyers, lobbyists and HR officers--none of whom are ever expected to (or would) sign non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses perpetuate a fundamental imbalance of power in a relationship that is overwhelmingly tilted in favor of employers. For any company with more than a handful of employees, it is a de minimis cost to pay lawyers to write (or for that matter cut and paste) the text of an employment agreement that restricts the employee from working in a similar role in the future. But for a prospective employee without extensive legal training, the cost to hire a competent employment lawyer runs into the thousands of dollars every time you need constructive support with pushing back against restrictive employment contract

	provisions. And in the vast majority of cases, prospective employees lack the legal literacy, financial resources, or negotiation leverage to even consider pushback against non-competition clauses--which employers of course know and exploit. It is also perverse that in our highly specialized economy, where companies prize highly specialized industry experience when hiring new employees, these same companies then seek prevent their employees from capitalizing on their highly specialized experience when looking for new opportunities. For a device that is often framed as a tool for employee retention, more frequently non-competes are detrimental to morale, and therefore long-term employee retention. To advocates of non-competes who say that non-competes encourage companies to invest in their employees, I would ask: do non-competes encourage employees to invest in their employers? Beyond the ethical failings of non-compete clauses, the commercial and ethical problems they purport to solve are routinely addressed by other mechanisms. The biggest concern frequently mentioned by advocates of non-compete clauses is that they protect valuable intellectual property. But there are numerous mechanisms used to prevent the theft of IP: information security policies, software and hardware (such as preventing employees from downloading files to external hard drives, or maintaining logs of access to code databases); employment agreements that nearly universally forbid the theft of IP; the threat of criminal prosecution; the threat of civil prosecution; the fear of irreparable reputational damage. If, on the other hand, a company's IP is so ephemeral and simple that it can be "stolen" without the theft of any files, can it truly be considered intellectual property? Non-competes are also considered a way to prevent former employees from soliciting clients to switch their business to a competitor. Again, employment agreements routinely include non-solicitation clauses, and they are enforceable via civil proceedings. In my experience working in professional services (management consulting) for 12+ years, I have signed multiple employment contracts with non-solicitation clauses and have worked with numerous colleagues who have also signed them. I am not aware of a single example of someone violating such a clause due to a mix of a sense of ethics, fear of civil action and concern about reputational damage...the arguments for non-competes are based on the idea that they are trading off one economic good (the free movement of labor) for another economic good (protection of a company's trade secrets). Maintaining non-competes because they protect companies from the "harms" of solicitation of their current employees by former employees is to argue that we must sacrifice the free movement of labor directly (via non-competes) so as to further constraint the free movement of labor indirectly (via the solicitation of current employees by former employees). This is hardly a compelling argument. Fundamentally, non-competes are a way for companies to tilt the scales so that labor in their industry cannot maximize their compensation, while doing little to protect the theft of genuine trade secrets. They should be banned. The sooner the better.
Dana	This is a necessary change. All noncompetes do is hurt the average person, upend lives, and are emotional blackmail to keep employees from leaving a company. It is wholly ethically wrong to keep people from leaving a company and not letting them get a job in the same industry without forcing them to upend their whole family to move outside a non-compete zone.

Andree	Looking forward to this bill. Down under yoga, for example, have opened many studios locations saturating the area and trying to enforce non compete rules. Employees should have the right to teach where ever they want without fear of being sued by big yoga studios.
Kory	Federal Trade Commission, I am writing you briefly to support the ban on non-compete clauses in healthcare. I work in the Emergency Department, and many nurses and doctors are forced to sign non-competes in this environment. There is no defensible argument in favor of non-competes in this or most healthcare settings. No patient goes to a particular Emergency Department because they know the Emergency Physician there, or the Radiologist, or the Pathologist, or the nurse. These non-compete clauses allow employers to maximize profits at the expense of safe staffing and resources to the detriment of patients and healthcare workers alike. It is not surprising to me that the American Hospital Association opposes this ban on non-competes, because without them they would experience more pressure to adequately support their staff and patients.
Mike	Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system: however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. To be clear, there are nuances to this discussion and a blanket endorsement of the FTC proposal. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the

	hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed.
Inci	There are SO many laws that protect employers and their financial success. They have the means to have a legal counsel on board to protect their interests. They have the non-commitment of at will employment to their employees. Employees do not have any of those safety nets. Their main strength - their only negotiation card is what they know. If they are laid off this card is the only one they have on hand. They don't have a legal counsel, and they don't have the comfort of multiple revenue / income streams. Getting rid of non competes is one step in equalizing the playing field. FTC can help equalize the playing field and support tax-payers employees (who effectively fund FTC's salaries through their taxes). There are many more things the FTC and other government organizations can do to help level the playing field by empowering employees / workers. Unions, advocacy groups are two simple examples. Could these have a negative effect on employers, adding costs and conditions that are potentially advers to their businesses? Yes BUT if they haven't made accommodations for this scenario over the decades where they had free reign that is not the fault of the employees. That is the fault of poor management and an inability to plan and prepare for multiple scenarios. Unless they intend to pay full salary to anyone they want to impose a non-compete on, they should understand and accept that they may, at times bear the consequences. Failure to plan, adapt and be mindful of their blind spots mean / may mean they are not good business managers to begin with. And yes, it is ok if some of those companies fail, close, adapt or downsize as a result of their inability. Considering these factors, it would behoove the FTC to side with the employees / workers and eliminate the non-compete clauses in the industry. In doing so they would help employees retain their competitiveness, and not have employers retain a competitive dominance when negotiating with employees. This position of dominance and inequality is equal to stifling competition between labor and employer.

Matthew	Non-compete clauses have no place in medicine, science or our economy.
Inci	Companies always always have legal counsel to back them up. Workers hardly ever have legal counsel to back up their interests. We already don't have a strong union culture to protect workers interests. Preventing employees from seeking new employment once the company has decided to leave them off is really not fair. The company should either release them from a noncompete or pay them a full salary for the duration they want the employee to not compete. This is only fair.
Laura	I'm deeply concerned about die American Hospital Association's advocacy for a physician exception to this proposed ruling against non-compete clauses. The free movement of labor, particularly in the health care sphere, makes it incumbent upon hospital systems to provide safe staffing, fair wages, and to uphold promised working conditions. It is to the benefit of all Americans who need health care (arguably, then, all Americans) to allow a free labor market for all workers, physicians included.
Austin	NDA's should be reserved for sensitive, public service roles, and executive-level positions. NDAs for rank and file employees limit competitive markets and creativity, and hamper an employees ability to self-advocate in the job market.
Prem	Non compete documents stifle innovation and freedom by holding possible legal against for using job experience in a new role. These agreements are often required for employment and put employees on a state of fear for simply changing jobs.
Faiz	I think it would be great to make changes to abolish noncompetes. Noncompetes create systems that disadvantage workers and impact healthy competition in the job sector. Workers who have better opportunities or are unhappy at their job can be effectively forced to stay in a form of indentured servitude unless they are willing to uproot their lives and the lives of their families. Thank you for reevaluating this unfair work process that greatly disadvantages workers.
Kevin	Physicians spend a extensive time training in very specialized skills non competes force them to leave those communities without a physician and shatter the patient doctor relationship... physicians should be allow to stay in there communities and take care of them
Kevin	A company being able to put a strangle hold on what you do in your free time severely hurts growth in this country. I should be able to work to support myself and work on personal ventures without risk of retaliation. I personally have had to put a small business on hold because my employer won't let me be a part of it due to the small chance that there is overlap. The company currently has complete control over my creative autonomy.

Anna	I am an Endocrinologist. The non compete clause should be made illegal. Physicians should not have to uproot their families to be able to find alternate employment prospects. The non compete clause is severely restrictive and prevents physicians from being able to change jobs in search of better prospects.
Jacob	Strongly in favor. As a personal trainer non-compete highly limits my ability to do any side work or maintain clients of my own outside of my normal employment. Severely hinders my ability to fully utilize my skills and time.
arlene	It is both absurd and a form of slavery if a worker can be prevented from using their skills to obtain employment. This is just another corporate move to oppress workers. Nothing more, nothing less
Ethan	In general I am in favor of the proposed rule, as increased competition is good for both workers and the general public. Further, there is no meaningful justification in most cases for non-compete agreements. I am in favor of potential exemptions involving senior level executives for limited periods of time (<1 year), provided the non-competes are sufficiently narrow in scope. In my opinion, if non-competes are allowed in any situation, the non-compete signing employers should be forced to provide pay (at a rate equivalent to what could be obtained from a prohibited business), for the duration of the period.
Cristina	Ban non-competes! This is an unfair practice that hurts labor and innovation.
Cristian	I strongly support banning non compete agreements, as they lead to uncompetitive practices such as stagnant salaries, in addition to being vague and hard to enforce uniformly and in an equitable way. I'm glad to see this issue getting the attention it deserves.
Scott	Please act on banning non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements are anti-competitive and based on spurious justifications driving down employees' wages and forcing them to stay at jobs that do not treat them fairly, since they have banned employees from working for competitors. Businesses can use non-disclosure agreements to prevent employees from sharing confidential information justly, but they have no right to dictate where people can work after their employment with them ends.
Umbereen	As a licensed physician with >20 years experience & a former Chief Medical Officer for 14 centers caring for >85,000 New Yorkers, I see no benefit of non-competes in healthcare and a lot of harms. Before and during the pandemic, several hospitals failed on their disaster preparedness, PPE supply, as well as in their overall response. There were several instances of hospitals firing healthcare workers who spoke up on safety or simply tried to get PPE on their own. Other hospitals were exemplary in their preparation and response. Healthcare workers put their lives at risk to show to work on behalf of the country and several thousand died from COVID-19 while serving at the frontlines of care. Inability choose your employer or work conditions due to non- competes is unsafe and unjust. Doctors in particular spend 10-15 years in school & training and have independent licenses and should not be limited to just one hospital in an area. Let the free market work such that excellent & safe employers get the best staff Hospitals that are unsafe should experience consequences of their operating choices.

Luke	Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am not a professional economist, but this rule sounds like a good idea to me. The impact of preventing workers from switching to jobs they prefer is a clear issue with die status quo. I do wonder how it would affect the job market for less experienced people (eg recent college graduates) since companies may be less willing to train them if they know their investment in training them may benefit someone else. However, I think it's reasonable to ask diem to protect that investment with carrot rather than stick. That is, there are other ways of getting your employees to stick around besides threatening them with legal action.
William	I support this proposed rule - my industry is rife with non-competes and I would like very much to not be bound by this anticompetitive practice.
Austin	I am writing in favor of the proposed nde. Non-compete agreements have become the nonn at most companies essentially ensuring that workers cannot shop their skills on the open market, depressing wages and giving more power to employers with increasing margins.
Susan	Non-compete clauses lock employees into their current jobs by denying them the ability to seek a better job in their field. In this situation, they are unable to move up in their professions or to leverage the skills and work experience they have spent years developing. Often, these clauses are not about actual competition, trade secrets, or intellectual property, but are used to enable companies to keep workers in powerless situations with no ability to seek a better job in the area in which they have accrued skills and knowledge. These clauses are applied to workers in service jobs like security guards, cashiers, and other positions where there is no intellectual property to protect. Using this legal fiction, companies tether workers to dead end jobs in which they can't move up, in which they have no leverage to negotiate better pay or working conditions, and in which they are forced to stay in hostile or dangerous workplaces. Non-compete clauses deprive employees of freedom of choice and of mobility in their work lives and have no place in a democratic society.
Alejandra	Hello and thank you for looking into the practice of non-competes that are plaguing our country. I work in the footwear industry, and have designed product for several large name brands where non-competes are standard practice and are often abused. At my previous brand, we were all forced to sign non-competes as part of our work agreement, and our contract stated that we could be held anywhere from 0 time to 1 year if we left for a competitor brand. This was at the director's discretion, which meant that depending on how upset a manager was at you leaving for another job, they could potentially jeopardize your ability to leave by hitting you with a longer non-compete. Our timelines were completely arbitrary and functioned as another tool for our company to keep employees from finding better opportunities. The arbitrary timeline also made it challenging as a lower level

	employee to negotiate when interviewing. It was difficult telling potential employers that they may have to wait up to a full year before I could join them. It is clear that this was designed intentionally to keep employees from seeking out opportunities, or to almost ensure they would be turned down if they found one due to the uncertain timeline of the non-compete. When I decided to leave my previous company for a competitor brand, I was hit with a 6 month non-compete. I was lucky that my new employer was willing to wait up to a year for me even though I was a low level employee, but I've seen several friends and coworkers turned down for jobs after being initially offered the role because of a non-compete, or even dumped by their new company halfway through their non-compete because they decided they didn't want to wait after all. You have to gamble that the other company will wait for you, or be upfront that they may have to wait up to a year or more for you to join them, which puts you at a huge disadvantage as a candidate. My non compete only required my company to pay half my salary during the duration, which was not enough for me to pay my bills and necessities. Because of my non-compete, I was unable to find freelance work in my field (where I have the most experience and would have the easiest time finding work). I was fortunate that I had previous waitressing experience and was able to make ends meet by working at a restaurant, but everyone else may not be so lucky. Which begs the question, why is it up to the employee to find a part time job to supplement their salary, when it is the employer that is forcing them to not work in the first place? Non-Competes disproportionately affect employees that are lower level, who have lower salaries and less bargaining power during the hiring process. A director asked a friend of mine why she wasn't happy about her 6 month non-compete and told her to relax and take it as a vacation. Her 50% salary was barely enough to cover her rent at the time. I believe that allowing companies to only pay half a salary for holding employees in a non-compete is the largest problem. If you aren't making too much, or your family is dependent on your income, making 50% can be extremely detrimental. It's extremely troubling that we allow companies to decide their employees can't work, and they are somehow not responsible for paying their full salary during this period. Companies say that non-competes act as a way to protect IP, but they are more regularly used as a way to disincentivize workers from seeking better opportunities at other companies, it allows brands to not be competitive with each other in offering good salaries and incentives for employees to stay. Non-competes put employees at a disadvantage and potentially dangerous financial situations simply for seeking better opportunities and looking to grow their careers. Companies should be looking for ways to build a culture that makes employees want to stay and build their careers with them rather than using slimey legal tactics to force people to stay.
Joe	My name is Joe and I am a professional Footwear Designer for a top tier sportswear company. Throughout my 7 career in the footwear industry, Non-Compete agreements have been strictly used by all participating companies. These Non-Compete agreements are made out to protect a companies best interest, but they act as a corporate excuse to hold employees hostage at their company, discourage their employees to look at competitive job opportunities as well as discourage other companies to hire external candidates. I have personally had career opportunities at other companies revoked solely due to having an enforceable non compete agreement from my current company. These Non-

	Compete agreements have also resulted in fewer job offers, lower work wages, zero job mobility, and lower job satisfaction. We can obviously see that these Non-Compete agreements have more negative impacts on each individual employee than it has positive impacts on the entire company. If Non-Compete agreements were banned from these corporate companies, this would create more job opportunities and career growth opportunities for individuals. It would increase competition within the industry and in return force companies to improve their employee retention rate, culture, workplace, benefits, and opportunities. I hope that this Non-Compete Clause Rule goes into effect so that myself as well as many other individuals in the industry impacted by Non-Competes can finally be set free by their company and pursue their careers how they choose.
Emily	I find it stifling to be under a non compete agreement as a yoga teacher. I regularly turn down interesting and well paid job opportunities because of it and know that many colleagues are in the same position. Consumers would also benefit from an end to non-compete contracts.
Couirey	I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!
Kushal	There should not be a non-compete clause for physicians. I support the Federal trade commission.
John	Non-compete laws do negatively impact the mobility of workers in industries such as tech from my experience. Some companies such as Amazon engage in these contracts and have clearly stated policies that employees should not go to a direct competitor. By implementing these policies, such companies are able to limit competition for labour and therefore avoid paying a fair wage in some circumstances. I have personally seen this play out in my career and that of my peers. Furthermore, and perhaps more significant, these clauses prevent the formation of new companies, including sole-proprietorships or consultantships, which in turn limits competition. For example, if I work at a robotics company, such a non-compete clause may prevent me, even if just from fear of legal action, from starting my own robotics company even in another business sector. Please eliminate non-compete clauses.
John	Yes please! There's been a slow slip into abusing non-competes to bully workers. Non-competes are anti-capitalistic, workers should not be forced by previous employers to restrict where they can and cannot find gainful employment. Previous employers should have no right to prevent my ability to feed, cloth, and house my tinnily.'
Christopher	Removing non-competes would be amazing for Engineers everywhere in the USA. They currently restrict career growth and are nothing but a detriment to Americas working class
Bill	I agree with the regulations for restrictions on non compete agreement

Samuel	I work in the technology industry, and non-compete clauses are very restrictive to my ability to compete in the market. My current employer enforces a 9- month non-compete agreement with no compensation if I were to leave the company. Being prevented from doing what I am skilled at reduces my economic mobility and places a large burden on myself and my family. Most states in America practice "at-will" employment, and it should work both ways. While my employer should be able to let me go if my services are no longer needed, as an individual I should be able to leave and find work elsewhere without restriction. I strongly support banning non-compete agreements and support the proposed rule change by the FTC.
Katy	Please adopt the rule! Any protection of trade secrets or other intellectual property should be done through that legal avenue as opposed to prohibiting employees from finding better employment
Ryan	Non-compete clauses, which prohibit physicians from practicing within a certain geographical area after leaving their current employer, have become increasingly common in the United States. These clauses can be incredibly damaging for physicians, limiting their career opportunities and impacting patient access to care. Firstly, non-compete clauses restrict physicians' career options, particularly in rural and underserved areas where there may be a limited number of employers. When physicians are bound by non-compete agreements, they may be forced to relocate to another region or even leave the medical profession entirely if there are no other job opportunities available to them. This can have a particularly devastating impact on the healthcare workforce, which is already facing a shortage of medical professionals in many areas. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can also lead to higher healthcare costs for patients. When physicians are prohibited from practicing in a particular geographic area, it limits competition and can result in higher prices for medical services. Patients in these areas may also face longer wait times and reduced access to specialized care if non-compete agreements prevent physicians from working in the area. Non-compete clauses can also have a negative impact on patient care, particularly when physicians are unable to continue treating patients they have developed long-term relationships with. Patients may be forced to find new healthcare providers, which can be disruptive to their care and result in a loss of continuity. In addition, patients may be left without access to specialized care or treatments that are only available from the physician they have been seeing. In recent years, there has been increasing scrutiny on the use of non-compete clauses in the healthcare industry. Some states have taken action to limit the use of these agreements, particularly in situations where they would limit patient access to care. However, the legal landscape remains complex, and many physicians may not be aware of their rights and options. Non-compete clauses for physicians in the United States are often motivated by profit and not healthcare quality, as they can help protect the financial interests of healthcare providers and organizations. Many healthcare providers invest significant resources into recruiting and training physicians, and they may want to ensure that they can retain those physicians for a certain period of time. Non-compete agreements can help to prevent physicians from leaving for a competitor, which could result in a loss of revenue for the organization. In addition,

	non-compete clauses can help to limit competition and increase profits for healthcare organizations. When physicians are bound by non-compete agreements, they may be less likely to start their own practices or join competing organizations, which can limit the number of healthcare options available to patients in a particular area. This can give healthcare organizations more leverage in negotiations with insurance companies and other payers, allowing them to charge higher prices for medical services. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can help to maintain a certain level of control over physicians and their practices. healthcare organizations may use these agreements to prevent physicians from taking on certain types of patients, offering certain services, or working with certain other healthcare providers. This can help to ensure that physicians are following the organization's protocols and procedures, which can help to improve efficiency and profitability. Overall, while non-compete clauses may have some legitimate justifications, such as protecting trade secrets or patient confidentiality, their widespread use in the healthcare industry is often motivated by profit. This can have negative consequences for physicians and patients alike, limiting career opportunities, increasing healthcare costs, and reducing access to care. In conclusion, non-compete clauses can be incredibly damaging for physicians and patients alike. These agreements limit career opportunities for physicians, lead to higher healthcare costs for patients, and can disrupt patient care and access to specialized treatments. It is important for policymakers and healthcare professionals to work together to ensure that non-compete agreements are used only when necessary and do not have a negative impact on patient care.
James	I am writing in support of the new rule, Non-compete clauses stifle innovation and allow larger businesses to stifle competition. My wife and I are interested in starting our own business, however that is made more complex because of an existing non-compete clause, which means we'd either have to wait a long period of time or move to start it. This prevents competition and gives an unfair advantage to incumbent businesses.
bob	I'm all for allowing employees to work where they want and when they want. Corporations can shop the world for employees however they choose. Employees should be able to shop for jobs the same way.
Nicholas	Attached is my full comment on the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements. Therein, I support the vast majority of the FTC's proposal and the reasoning thereof, but provide some comments on why I think the sale of business exception needs improvement. My first reason is that the current provision creates a loophole whereby smaller enterprises could restructure themselves as to avoid enforcement of the rule. My second reason is that medium- and large-sized enterprises would likely respond by restricting the transferability of the interests of part owner employees, who furthermore possess strong bargaining power, and thus reduce their labor mobility. I instead propose a "totality of the circumstances" test for what constitutes a significant ownership interest, which would consider various factors relative to the bargaining power and ability of the parties and the impact of the clause to assess whether the agreement more closely resembles an agreement relative to employment or a sale of business interest. The attached document contains a fuller explanation of these points. Attachments FTC noncompete comment

Lauren	A non-compete hurts families. A one income family has a harder time moving up the economic ladder, when the person working is in a non-compete contract with their employer. The benefit of the non-compete is only beneficial to the employer and not the employees. It is unfair for a law of this nature, because it hurts the individual citizen. Non-competes should be federally illegal. Please outlaw them for the sake of individual freedom and helping one income families prosper above capitalistic greed of profit.
Marc	Noncompete agreements should be banned to promote USA global competitiveness, innovation, and prosperity. Please put this rule in place to ensure no more noncompete agreements are used.
kelle	Oversight that protects workers is long overdue. Please ban non-competes as a first step toward ensuring that workers in the U.S. can earn living wages.
Carolyn	With all the poverty and the banks grip on making life miserable for the poor, bartering or setting up one's own business may be the only way out! Why should any underpaid working person be SUED by someone like #45 who in 2016 had 4,400 law suits out there tying up the courts and using MY TAX MONEY to get him to pay workers and stop trying to fraud people. So, the lawyers lose money... isn't it time that they actually PRODUCE something in the supply chain like farm rather than protect Monsanto and other drug companies? Everyone I speak to wants Laws that protect US, not corporations. THEY AREN'T PEOPLE no matter what Congress and the Supreme Court says. They are businesses just like churches. So, why can't they all follow the teachings of leaders like Jesus... all religions have these people. Read the book ROUGH SLEEPERS by Tracy Kidder and learn what a REALLY GOOD PERSON IS. They are all around the USA and yet FOX NEWS focus on the FEARTIATE/GUN people and BLAME the law abiding citizens or immigrants. Time to concentrate on GLOBAL WARMING as MOTHER NATURE will win. Please protect the people that just want to love, live and serve their world.
Stephen	One of the reasons I moved to another state for work is that my prior job had a non-compete that prevented me from interviewing in the area. Please ban non-compete clauses!
Stephen
Denise	I would like to express my full support for this rule and my appreciation to those FTC members and elected representatives who are on the side of workers. The non-complete clause is one of many tools employers are using unfairly and indiscriminately in the current neoliberal context, not to protect legitimate trade secrets, but rather to control employees and limit their mobility. Workers gain nothing from this practice while employers receive enormous leverage over their employees, amounting to exploitative labor conditions. I urge you to ban the use of non-compete agreements across all employment sectors, and as an educator, wish to applaud your intent to extend protections against this unfair labor practice to unpaid workers: in particular, I am thinking of students who are being told that they need to engage in unpaid internships and "volunteer" positions in order to move forward in their chosen field (another example of an exploitative labor practice). These young people, many of whom sacrifice much and often go further into debt to fulfill this expectation, need the FTCs protection as well.

Joan	This proposed rule is well grounded in law. It will improve life for workers and their families, increase innovation, and benefit the economy.
Ross	I support the new rule banning non-compete agreements. These clauses, especially when used for non-executive roles, have the effect of limiting competition for workforce talent, and thus depressing wages. In many cases, they are "sprung" on workers and potential employees after a position has been accepted, and the employee is not compensated for agreeing to limit his or her future opportunities. Employers have many tools to protect against IP and trade secret theft, but non-competes are overbroad and anti-competitive. Non-compete agreements restrict competition, and reduce innovation, by not allowing the free movement of employees among competitor companies, and the creation of new businesses. They should be banned. I support the new rule.
wanessa	As a pediatric practice owner I welcome and support this Rule and find it very timely. Non compete clauses benefit monopolies and substandard employers who can no keep employees without them.
Laurence	In the year 2000, I was the VP of Research at Dragon Systems in Newton MA, a successful startup in the field of speech recognition. In that year, Dragon was acquired by a Belgian firm called Lemout & Hauspie (L&H), a publicly traded speech and language technology company. Unfortunately, it soon was revealed that L&H had a corrupt management that had been "cooking its books" -- treating investments as purchases of goods, etc. [See various press reports in the WSJ and in The New Yorker, etc.] Within a few months of the acquisition, L&H had declared bankruptcy. Once I learned what was going on at L&H, I no longer wished to work there and I tendered my resignation. I then went to work at another speech technology startup outside Boston called Voice Signal Technologies. I had been advised by various lawyers that surely I wouldn't be sued for violating my "noncompete" agreement when the alternative was to continue to work for a corrupt management. After all, I had been "fraudulently induced" to sign an employee agreement and continue working at L&H by a misrepresentation of their financials. However, the lawyers were wrong. L&H successfully sued me, and Voice Signal was forced to fire me. The ability of even a corrupt company like L&H to enforce its noncompete agreement is indicative of the truth about noncompetes. The primary function of these agreements is not to "protect trade secrets" but rather to compel employees to continue to work even in unfavorable situations -- whether the problem is financial corruption, low salaries, or poor working conditions. Everyone in the technology industry knew this to be true. Only the lawyers and top executives cry out about their "proprietary rights." But, clearly, if their primary concern were protection of trade secrets, they could pursue the legitimate path of taking legal action against the person who had supposedly misappropriated intellectual property. Noncompete agreements are an infringement on the human right to decide for oneself whom to work for, whether we are referring to camp counselors, hairdressers, or computer scientists.

Lloyd	Non-compete clauses simply restrict talented people from working in their field of expertise, have adverse effects on the workforce and should be abolished. Confidentiality should be sufficient to prevent improper use of restricted information from a former employer.
Lorenz	Respectfully- I am a constituent in Newton, MA, and I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. I work in the field of information technology and am currently subject to a non-compete clause as I have been at previous employers. I know first hand that these clauses stifle competition and innovation while accomplishing literally nothing in the way of protecting employers' intellectual property or other proprietary information. Please ban this useless and harmful practice as soon as possible. Thank you.
Ateev	I write in support of removing non-compete clauses. My hope is that the removal of such clauses can give physicians and other clinicians more flexibility in where they work. This, in turn, can improve competition in health care markets and decrease health care prices. Hospitals and health systems will object. But I believe this is driven by a desire to protect their market power.
LY	I am in favor of a rule that abolishes employers' right to force workers to sign non-compete agreements. They are unfair to workers, if enforced most often take away a worker's right and ability to earn a fair living, and are not the right instrument to protect companies from the disclosure of proprietary information and company secrets. For that, firms should ask employees to sign non-disclosure agreements. But to force an employee to sign a non-compete puts an employee in an impossible situation where s/he must sign to take or keep a current job and then when leaving that job - often even involuntarily - unable to take another similar job for which s/he is well qualified because of this agreement. In this current labor market where we have an overall shortage of workers and many firms are experiencing challenges in hiring qualified candidates, this also negatively impacts employers who want to hire replacement workers.
Scott	I wanted to indicate my support for a ban on non-compete agreements. I have had a 40+-year career as a community revitalization specialist, helping funders and localities to design, implement, and evaluate initiatives aimed at improving the social, physical, and economic conditions in disadvantaged communities. In the middle of my career, I worked for several years for a firm based in Maryland. After I had been working for that firm for two-and-a-half years, the owner of the firm tried to require me to sign a non-compete agreement. That agreement would have prevented me, if I left the firm, from working with any of the firm's clients — notably including clients that I had worked with before joining the firm and some prior clients that I had in fact brought to the firm. I quit that firm, rather than signing the non-compete agreement. If I had signed it, because the non-compete agreement's definition of "prohibited clients" was so broad, upon leaving the firm it would have effectively curtailed my ability to work in my chosen field for a full year and would have imposed a substantial financial hardship. It is time to eliminate these onerous restrictions on the ability of individuals to pursue their chosen careers. Thank you.

Kate	In 1998 my husband turned down a job offer with a software company because their non-compete clause required him to affirm that he could earn a living without doing software development. The company in question had a history of attempting to enforce their non-compete clause. Although the courts never allowed enforcement, handling the lawsuits was an expensive nuisance for their former employees.
Colleen	The freedom to change jobs is at the core of economic liberty and to a competitive, thriving economy," said Chair Lina M. Khan. "Noncompetes block workers from freely switching jobs, depriving them of higher wages and better working conditions, and depriving businesses of a talent pool that they need to build and expand. By ending this practice, the FTC's proposed rule would promote greater dynamism, innovation, and healthy competition." This says it all and I support this change. A dynamic US economy means individual workers must have autonomy to compete for jobs, improve how business is done and become entrepreneurs to compete with current businesses.
Scott	I am a 65 year old physician executive who was just terminated without cause from my last employer due to a company reorganization. As a term of my employment I was asked to sign a non-compete clause that essentially excludes me for two years from working in position with any company that is delivering primary care services to patients on a Medicare Advantage plan. This essentially excludes me from working within my area of expertise. It doesn't even matter if they are competing in a geographic area where my former company is not operating. The basis for the non-compete is the company's belief that there are many trade secrets and much IP that I have that would irreparably hams their business interests. I disagree with that assessment. They have posted so much about the company on social media and the turnover is so high that most everyone I speak to outside the company fully understands the business model. The only proprietary information might be their financial status, P & L , etc. which was never shared with me or most other employees. I fully support the proposed ban.
Antoniya	I have been mistreated at my previous job and it is unfair to be able to terminate the contract with them be able to leave and negotiate are more fair pay, and be free defamation from my previous employer.
Laura	I am writing to support this rule change. I personally was kept in a job where the firm charged $150 per hour for my services, but paid me $30. I wasn't aware of the market rate when I signed the contract and then, because of the non-compete clause was stuck working for that employer until I left the industry (test prep tutoring.)

Megan	Non-competes area terrible burden on workers. They can be incredibly broad, capturing massive industries or technologies. They can include lists of competitors that can be added to at any time. They apply to nearly everyone, not just those with sensitive information. These contracts essentially would prevent someone from working at companies that value the skillset you've grown, locking them in and hurting their career.
Kathleen	This comment is in favor of the proposed rule to prohibit non compete clauses. My son accepted his first job as a physician last year after completing his medical training with $150,000 in student debt. His first employer, a for profit hospital in Northern New Jersey required him to sign a non compete clause. He is an internist and not a highly paid specialist. The non compete clause prohibits him from going to work for a different medical employer within 10 miles. In northern New Jersey, 10 miles would exclude him from employment with most of the major medical centers in the area. It also inhibits his ability to obtain a higher paying position to help him pay off his student loans more quickly. After 7 years of medical training, new doctors enter the work force after age 30 and are behind their peers in other professions in beginning to establish their careers and financial lives. To be constrained by a non compete clause on top of heavy student debt and late career entry is further disincentive for young people to enter the medical profession. And, importantly, why should a doctor have to sign a non-compete clause? There is nothing proprietary about the practice of medicine. It's all public knowledge published in medical journals. Thank you for your consideration
Frank	I support the FTC rule. Non-compete clauses trap workers unless they are willing to take the extraordinary step of moving, and represents de facto collusion between management levels of different hospitals to suppress wages.
Jeffrey	As a physician, I can attest that noncompete clauses are harmful. Physicians generally have an extremely high threshold to departure from a job. Noncompete clauses add to that difficulty, because they force the departing physician to move generally long distances from the previous job. In addition, physicians may well have a significant number patients who wish to continue the treatment relationship, and the noncompete forces a rupture of that interaction. There is banter online about these proposed rules not applying to non-profit hospital systems. All hospital and medical care systems should be required to adhere to fair employment practices, meaning NO noncompete clauses. It should be noted that physicians in MA have successfully enjoyed decades of work without the threat of a noncompete clause in their contracts. The hospitals and medical practices in the state have not endured any harm from this situation.
Bonnie	Physicians should not be exempt from a non-compete ban. Hospitals with non-compete clauses in their contracts force physicians to uproot their families if they ever want to leave an undesirable job. As corporate medicine becomes more the norm, physicians are being forced to work longer and harder for less and less pay. We have no unions to fall back on. Many physicians are burning out prematurely due to terrible working conditions. Non-compete clauses just exacerbate all of these problems. Many physicians are leaving clinical medicine because of these types of issues, contributing to the national shortage of healthcare providers. Nonprofit institutions should also not be exempt from this ban.

b	As a 77-year-old retiree, the outcome of this rule doesn't affect me, but I know people who unhappy in their workplace but who do not leave. It may be that they have been asked to sign a non-compete clause. A company that wants to keep good employees should keep them through best practices, not through forcing them to stay with the company.
xxx	Five years ago my 30 year old daughter signed a non-compete clause when hired by a very small art advisory firm specializing in private collectors. When she left the firm, she was immediately snapped up for part-time work by two other firms who specialized in advising corporate clients. She was terrified that Firm A would take her to court over working for either of the other firms, but went ahead. She could not afford a lawyer.... Within two years she was named CEO of one of the firms, is now 80% owner, works her tail off to make this small business thrive, employs 2 part-time workers, and has helped hundreds of young visual artists win commissions as part of her forward-thinking plan to insure artists are paid equitably for their work when a corporation wants to design an engaging work space as part of a building renovation. She also currently earns 4x the salary of which she was paid at Finn A. If she had not stood up to this threat, she probably would have left her profession and these artists she promotes would not have had the income she stimulated. Non-competes stifle creativity, small business opportunities, and financial growth for both individuals and corporations. Capitalism is built on competition: Make the widget better, more innovative, and at a better price while paying workers a living wage. Please ban non- competes.
Marwan S.	An absolute necessity for physicians to be able to help their patients when and where needed without fear of legal liability!!
Karin	Non-compete clauses are completely antithetical to the idea of capitalism which businesses supposedly worship: they interfere in the free flow of labor and capital in the market. It is therefore pathetic that business is working so hard to prevent the "free market" from working the way they actually think it should by forcing workers to accept non-compete clauses in their employment. Workers in this country are exploited by business owners to a degree unheard of in other "first world" countries in this day and age. They are more productive and yet they have less vacation and sick time (if they have those at all), less health insurance and benefits (again, if they have those at all) and frequently have less recourse to justice if they are sexually harassed, union busted, etc. It is high time that they be allowed to have sonic reward for all the hard work they provide the wealthy in this country, high time that they be allowed to move freely between jobs. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth.

Richard	Non-compete clauses serve to protect wealthy corporate executives at the expense of average people Banning them would result in opportunities and better pay for millions of Americans, and workers could finally earn what they're worth.
dan	This is so obvious it hurts! Support!
Elizabeth	This is great. I'm a perfuming artist who has always struggled to make a living. I've had to juggle multiple part-time jobs. Many of these, such as Renaissance faires, have non-compete clauses in their contracts. It's completely ridiculous because there aren't that many competitors and performers need every paying gig. Please don't leave out those of us who work in smaller trades that don't fit into any standard demographic when you are making decisions.
Owen	Non-compete clauses are a one sided agreements that should have never been allowed. Training is what every human being has been through since the dawn of time and an employer should never own any part of a human being.
Les	I am writing to you, as a retired engineer, public school teacher, and college professor, in full support of your proposed rule ending non-compete agreements. I prefer that you maintain the strongest possible protection of workers from the unfair limits that non-compete agreements impose upon workers. I thank you for placing workers first in this important matter.
Barry	I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. A ban on non-compete agreements is a net positive for our county. Non-compete clauses, imposed on employees, restrict freedom. Employees may never get hack any time spent. There is more societal harm imposed on limiting employees' freedoms with non-compete agreements. Employers should be more competitive instead. Jobs are not marriages. These non-compete agreements may have arisen to protect intellectual property, but today they are used to enforce corporate overreach to limit employees' and US citizens' future job prospects. Non-competes are a net positive for corporations and a net negative for everyone else, such as employees, consumers, and communities. They are a tool in the shed for building monopolies, which are illegal. Intellectual property theft is a separate issue, and this shouldn't be a justification for non-compete agreements becoming a forced norm in the job market. Non-compete agreements are being abused too frequently in an attempt to leverage control over an employee's future job opportunities. Our society is built on competition. We thrive on competition. At-will employment should not be subject to non-compete agreements. Workers need protection from corporate overreach, such as non-compete agreements. Today, workers are likely to go from job to job between competing companies with the notion that they are building up skills, knowledge, and experience in a particular industry where a corporate entity has numerous competitors. Nowadays, in the 21st century, workers do not typically have long tenures, like 15+ years, with a single company. It is important that workers are able to secure employment to sustain their lives without carrying the burden of a non-compete agreement limiting their prospects, opportunities, and livelihood. Some companies are growing extremely large and omnipresent in many different markets, like Amazon, Microsoft, and Google. Amazon, in particular,

	started a business based on selling books and now has its feet in technology, healthcare, pharmaceuticals, entertainment, and shopping, to name a few. With such a large market presence, a non-compete is unfair to Amazon employees looking for other prospects as the number of competitors has a wide breadth. It is unfair for those workers to be subject to the terms of a non-compete agreement just so they can continue their career and livelihood in the industry for which they have been building experience. Commercial and corporate entities are asking for no-competition, which is in the name of the very agreement they propose, 'No competition.' This is really a wage suppression tool. Non-competes promote stagnation. Limitations on the future job prospects of American workers should not be granted gratuitously. This is due to the harm that they impose on our workers and society.
Thiagu	Non-compete clauses are routinely used by the competing hospital systems in Pittsburgh. They have been used to limit the ability of both physicians and staff to increase their value by switching jobs. There is no inherent proprietary knowledge that would be harmful to the health system and no benefit of the noncompete clause other than to serve as a way to tie the hands of their employees. The clause affects a 60 mile radius around the city and will force the employees to work outside the 60 mile radius for 1 year before being allowed to work for a different hospital system within the city. The purpose of this rule is to cause a significant hardship for any employee that wants to switch jobs. It is anticompetitive and the ability to abuse noncompete clauses should be removed
stanley	these agreements are not only unfair to the individual but also damage our economy
James	For a country that fought a civil war over slavery, the United States should not allow non-competes in any form of employment as such agreements are chains of modern slavery. Our country was built on free enterprise or labor mobility. As someone who lost the chance of a good paying job because of a non-compete, I have a persona animus against any restriction on my ability to offer my skills and expertise to make a dollar, whether as an employee or entrepreneur.=
Scott	I support the proposed ban on non complete agreements.
LAUREN	Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am in favor of banning non-compete clauses. They are anti-competitive and anti-worker.
Scott	I am a senior physician executive. I am being held to a noncompete clause that I was required to sign as a term of employment. I was terminated without cause by my company yet I am still being controlled by them as they vigorously apply the noncompete. I am having considerable difficulty finding a new position because of the rather broad terms of the noncompete. I've been looking for more than 3 months with only one potential opportunity in the works. It seems to me that if your position is eliminated your noncompete should not be enforceable. I would have much less argument with enforcing a noncompete if one were to leave voluntarily for another position. Nonetheless, I am against noncompetes regardless of the position in a company whether executive or lower.

Louisa	Thank you for getting rid of the NCA.
Mandy	Non competes are bad for workers. They give way too much power to employees. In the field of medicine, doctors are very poorly treated by employers who use non compete clauses to completely limit options.
Reggie	Please do this!! It has killed careers as companies sell off and force people out of entire industries due to no fault of their own. Workers deserve the right to shop their talents regardless of industry.
John	I'm a mid-level manager at a large health technology company, and have been subject to a non-compete since a private equity takeover a year ago. During this time, I've had two significantly-better-paying job offers rescinded upon those companies' learning of my non-compete. These should have been banned years ago.
Kristen	As a physician, I fully support removals of non-compete clauses from my contracts. An employer placing restrictions on patients I can care for within the scope of my license is absurd.
Maxwell	I fully support the FTC ban on non-compete clauses. I am a public school teacher in my late 20s and have been watching friends who are under these clauses at tech companies in particular lose the ability to get a better-paying job in their field due to these clauses, which has been especially difficult in the midst of rapid inflation, rent hikes, and 2% raises that fail to keep up. This is consistent with research showing that non-compete clauses keep workers' wages down. By creating this new policy banning non-compete clauses, the FTC will help workers be paid a living wage, which will help both individuals and the economy.
St	Please pass this to help millions of workers everywhere.
James	Dear Chair Lina Khan, James K. Hadcroft here. I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work and for being part of the solution. Please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, James Hadcroft Fahnouth, MA
Anonymous	I am a software engineer in Massachusetts employed by a very large (> 300,000 employees) corporation. About 10 years ago, the company I was working for was purchased by this large corporation and all acquired employees were required to

	sign a non-compete agreement as terms of the acquisition. I was not offered any compensation for signing the non-compete and I would not have been offered employment with the acquiring company if I did not sign. In this situation, the employer has all the power and the employee has none. In 2018, the Massachusetts adopted a non-compete regulation (https://malegislature.gov/Laws/GeneralLaws/PartITitle0(1/Chapter149/Section24L) but it has serious problems: 1) It did not change any non-compete agreements that were currently in effect, only future non-compete agreements. 2) It requires that the company either offer the employee 50% pay during the non-compete period "or other mutually-agreed upon consideration between the employer and the employee". The mutually-agreed upon consideration phrase means that the company could offer $1 to the future employee in exchange for signing the non-compete. Even though software engineers are often in demand by employers, I've never been in a situation where I could choose between several job offers. The request to sign the non-compete agreement occurs very late in the job negotiation process, often after the salary negotiation is complete and the job has been offered verbally. At that point, it would be very awkward to go through another round of negotiation about what is fair compensation for signing a non-compete agreement. Many job seekers would just sign the non-compete at this point or fear losing out on the job offer. Please ban non-compete agreements. Non-disclosure agreements and client/customer non-solicitation agreements are all that are needed to protect employers.
Josh	Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am a small business owner. I support the use of non-disclosure and anti-solicitation agreements, but fully support the ban of non-compete agreements. I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Josh Watson Springfield, MA
Peter	This is a great idea. Non-competes can hold you hostage in a bad or underpaid job at hostile workplace because you cannot market the skills you built at that job. It's anti-competitive and holds back workers.
Julie	I fully support the FTC's recommendation to eliminate non-compete clauses. My husband is a scientist who has worked in industry. As in most businesses, the only way to move up in position is to move out. This means that for many workers today, non-competes limit upward mobility. What's more as we now enter a period of lay-offs, initially at technology companies but potentially spreading throughout the economy, non-competes make it much harder for people to find a job in their field of expertise. This is a severe burden on workers who may have to move across the country, family in tow to find work if they can find anything. What's more, it also prevents people from using their knowledge while it is still relevant to

	advance discoveries in their field. Non-competes are just one more mechanism that enriches the upper level managers at companies at the expense of most of the company's workforce. This is especially relevant at the lowest economic rungs where franchise fast food restaurants are issuing non-competes maim* it virtually impossible for people with few skills to find a job. It is time to help level the playing field.
Glenn	Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. myself have been bound by a noncompete agreement in the past and understand the implications this can have, especially when early in ones career and seeking other opportunities for growth. Non compete agreements are unethical and have become far to normalized across many sectors. Even now as I write this message, I am deliberating accepting a job offer from a company because that offer comes tied to a noncompete agreement. I am currently unemployed and feel as though I have no choice but to accept this offer and shackle myself to this noncompete agreement. This should not be the case for myself or anyone else trying to earn a wage in this country. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Glenn Leary Quincy, MA
Luke	Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am a law student in Boston and I am all for competition in the all work places. I fully support this move!

Ronn	Dear Chair Lina Khan, I fully support your efforts to eliminate, or at least strongly modify, non-compete clauses. Each job I have had in my career has required me to sign a non- compete clause just to get employment. The power of companies to force employees to make decisions against their best interests, such as non-competes and forced arbitration, needs to be reduced or eliminated. I don't know whether this will stimulate entrepreneurship ... I'll leave that to economists to debate. I do know that this has been a matter of how I was able to earn a living and support my family. Non-competes need to stop. Sincerely, Ronn Faigen Original Comment Dear Chair Lina Khan, I fully support your efforts to eliminate, or at least strongly modify, non-compete clauses. A	Completely in favor forbidding noncompete agreements.

Kate	I am in full support of banning non-competes. I currently live in Massachusetts who attempted for years to ban them, and when it finally was about to go through, they stuffed in a bunch of things about garden leave OR a mutually agreed upon amount, so now every company just forces to you sign that you agree to payment of $1. Silicon Valley has thrived so much because non-competes are banned there, so if you ban them federally, it will only cause the US tech economy to thrive. I've been laid off from tech jobs before and even with them eliminating your job, you're still bound by a non-compete. This is very harmful to workers. We have no choice but to sign a non-compete or we don't have a job offer, and most cannot afford to do this, especially when every company makes you sign them anyways. Please ban non competes so that workers have the freedom to work where ever they'd like. It only benefits a company and harms the worker.
Irene	Non-compete clauses should be banned, including for physicians. The model of physician employment is shifting to hospital-system employers and private equity employers. The healthcare business environment continues to be increasingly toxic to physician-owned practices, bringing physician employment options, and risks for coercion and exploitation, in alignment with other types of employees. I am an emergency physician and I have seen employment options and autonomy for physicians shrink over my 20+ years of practice.
E	I do not agree with non-competes. If an employer decides to enforce one, the employer needs to pay 100% of the employee's salary or 50% of the CEO's total compensation for the entire time the non-compete is in effect.
Heather	I wholeheartedly support the effort to ban non-compete clauses. People should be able to change jobs whenever it makes sense for their situation. In my experience, companies have used these agreements to hold employees in low paying positions, and can offer minimal "consideration", which could be as low as to barely cover one month of rent, to enforce a year-long period where the employee cannot work in their field of expertise.
M	Please, as someone in healthcare who watches my co-workers be stifled and underpaid on a daily basis please pass this rule. This would directly impact workers all over the country but will especially make a difference in healthcare where MDs, RNs, and other professionals are trapped at a single facility at often underpaid rates. While this will affect the bottom line of hospitals, data is showing that since covid, hospitals are reaching record breaking profits while running with skeleton crews. Patients are directly affected by this everyday but as long as a profit is being made and employees are trapped from leaving for positions with competitive compensation. The people deserve healthcare that puts them first instead of profits, I believe this is a great step in that direction.
Neel	Not including physicians in this rule would be a travesty to healthcare. In a time where physicians are retiring in droves, we as a nation must make it easier to ensure physicians are treated with dignity and respect and not beholden to archaic

	non-compete rules that allow for poor working conditions for the stewards of our nation's health
Deepak	I say No to non compete. It will jeopardize physician approach to free market. I vote No to Non compete
Dorit	I am writing to express my support for abolition of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. - Non-competes May violate anti-trust laws. - non-competes interfere with workers pursuing their chosen profession. Specifically re: the practice of medicine: 1/10 physicians left medicine within the past years. The ability to continue in the same sort of position without unreasonable travel and/or uprooting the family could help retain more physicians in medicine. - for low-wage workers who cannot negotiate, non- competes often trap them in positions with minimal room for professional advancement
Sara	I strongly agree with the FTC banning non-compete agreements and the like. It's nothing more than modern day slavery. Making a person company property by limiting their options after employment ends. In a fair and free trade society competition is essential. The FTC needs to ban such agreements for the same reasons they ban monopolies and company policies to discourage or ban the discussion of wages. Ultimately, these types of clauses hurt not only workers by so severely limiting their options of further employment but also hurt society as a whole and encourage monopolies to exist.
David	Make this rule as quickly as possible, and then enforce it as thoroughly as possible. Banning non-compete clauses is long overdue: non-competes are obviously and inherently anti-competitive, it is literally in the name. Employers with legitimate needs to protect trade secrets or other sensitive information have other, more targeted mechanisms to address those concerns. Meanwhile, other firms should be prevented from using their disproportionate bargaining power over employees to limit competition in the marketplace. These clauses accrue real benefits to employers (otherwise they would not be opposed to this rule) while actively harming individual employees, consumers, and the wider economy of our nation. Not only should our social and legal system not protect that sort of contract, it should proscribe and prohibit it, as this rule proposes to do. I hope it will.
Jaxxx	Free Markets = Free Employees. My main issue is not a Mom&Pop Bakery not wanting a former employee stealing Mom's famous lemon muffin recipe and undercutting them at anew bakery nextdoor. My outrage is tied to the inability to achieve gainful employment by simply refusing to sign a mandatory and absurdly broad 'Agreement', especially for an employer who is large enough to leave legitimately zero options as the scope and range of their 'affiliates, vendors, customers, and competitors' are technically every other option in an industry. Let's take as an example, myself. Allegorized for anonymity, of course. I work for a Fortune 100 Company. One of the 100 largest companies in the country. Heck, they're above #50 and also one of the largest in the world. I was offered a position which I wanted and yes, I did sign a Non-Compete as the offer would have been rescinded if I hadn't. They're large enough to not be amenable to negotiating this agreement as they have plenty of candidates. It's their demand or they'll move on. This, first of all, wholly obliterates the concept that it's an 'agreement' as it's actually a mandatory condition that alone only benefits the corporation. So I sign this. Company is based in State1 and this is where the document states the courts for challenges would be. The position I took was a remote position where I lived, State2. Months later, I got an expected promotion as the first position was a step towards this promotion. This promotion came with a brand new offer letter. This offer letter states that a Non-Compete is needed prior to the new salary, but I never needed to sign a new one as my responsibilities weren't materially different, though maybe they forgot to have me sign it. Unsure. Regardless, this new promotion required relocation to State3, a 2,000 mile move. Remember, agreement lists State1 as the jurisdiction and I moved from State2 to State3 now. The company and industry have taken a HIT with the economic slowdown and they have already laid off a fairly large number of workers. I wasn't affected, but my (and all others on my team) have been well under the critically ridiculed 2023 forecast that CSuites set. I am, as well as dozens of others I work with, are legitimately worried for our jobs due to circumstances that we weren't directly responsible for. Now that I painted my situation, let's move on to the hypothetical won}, that brings me to write this: Let's say I am terminated for no cause other than layoffs stemming from suboptimal forecast performance. Not only would they have the legal ability to make me pay back 50-100% the relocation assistance (separate issue), but it would make legally susceptible to litigation if I used my experience and education LITERALLY anywhere else in the world, specifically every state in the US. Reasons: 1. Broad region/area. Remember, they're a huge company. Agreement states "every US State and every world Country where Company has developed markets, provided services, or sold goods in the last 2 years." In a technical legal sense, that leaves me with Syria to work. 2. Competition/Customers: Agreement states I can't work with or for "any Company affiliate, partner, vendor, provider, distributor, manufacturer, customer, nor any competing distributor, manufacturer, vendor" for 12-24 months. In my industry, it's nearly impossible to find another reputable company that this line doesn't encompass. We have a distribution catalog of 4,000,000 skus from our own manufacturing and 250,000 vendors. Any company or institution with more than 5 employees is actually guaranteed to have purchased through one of the many branches of my company. ESPECIALLY in State3 where I moved 2000 miles to for the job. I couldn't even find something safe moving back to State2! 3. Jurisdiction. Any challenges or injunctions go through State 1. I'd need to go in front of a judge in State1 just to plead my case and for every subsequent event. Thing is, I don't even know how this is covered if they courts find it unreasonable and want to amend. Will it only apply to State1? Will it apply to the area I worked in State3? What about where I started in State2? All 3? Am I even subject to this agreement after I was promoted and moved? After the new offer said "a Non-Compete must be signed and returns before the new position start date". Will State1 rule on State3's laws or on their own? How much will it cost in court and lawyers if they do come after me? In closing, while there are fringe cases of NonCompetes being used to protect against malice, the vast majority of the time they are used as a bribe to scare an employee into not seeking out better opportunities with purely innocent intentions. They make them extremely hard and confusing to challenge. And they, in a legally technical term, make it virtually impossible to obtain job that you're qualified and experienced in limiting your income. Emphasis on this point for no fault at-will termination.

Nancy	I support banning noncompete agreements for all employers and all levels of employees. I was required to sign a noncompete as a condition of continuing employment when another company acquired the company that hired me. Although the noncompete is unenforceable under Massachusetts state law, where I live, that law doesn't prevent a company from requiring that workers sign NCAs, and even though it's unenforceable under MA law, the fact that I signed can discourage other employers from hiring me. This renders 7 years of experience in my field as potentially useless.
Sophia	I support the ban on non-compete agreements as outlined in FTC-2023-0007. Competition is a critical part of this economy and this ban would protect millions of current and future workers from harmful practices.

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Michigan | Statewide Impact

	"Please, for once, make a ruling that will benefit the people of this country. Noncompete clauses are unAmerican and go against everything this country stands for. I personally have had to miss on opportunity because of a noncompete. If a company wants to keep employees my god they might actually have to compete for them" - David
	"I was required to sign a non compete with a car dealership after working for the employer for years, it covered the entire united states because they sold parts online, it covered a period of 2 years. refused and was let go shortly after with the employer using the at will option. Next I was asked to sign a non compete as a delivery driver for an electrical supply company, which covered working at any electrical supply house for any position in the adjacent counties. I had to sign or would have been denied the position. These are unfair and makes finding future work in a field with experience nearly impossible. I am in a situation where my kids are young and I have custody every other week. How am I to pay child support or feed my kids when i have to start over or change industries and start at low pay? How do I take care of young kids when I would have been required to drive hour or more for employment? These need to be illegal at best, severely limited at least." -Michael
	"I work for a large corporation that supplies equipment to many industries. I have been in this industry for over twenty-five years and with my current employer for nearly 5 years. During the hiring process I was given a non-compete to sign as a condition of employment. This non-compete had the longest time frame attached to it I've ever experienced (two years). In the years since the company has asked me to sign a new one claiming there wasn't one on file. Upon review of the new one I noticed significant differences from the original that took many of the benefits away from me in the event I was let go and could not find new employment in a timely manner. So not only am I required to sign a non-compete, but the company can also change it as they see fit. I have never liked the non-competes, especially the one I was forced to sign. My role does not involve any design or sales work and the two-year time length is exorbitant. Allowing a company to restrict my trade is heavy handed and unreasonable. Therefore, I support the Federal Trade Commission's effort to severely limit non-compete clauses." -David

	"Please, Please make this happen. I am in a non compete cause and it is terrible. I work for a(n) orthopedic company in Michigan as a Certify Orthotist. In our field you have to sign a non compete if you want to work for that company. Once sign you cannot change jobs for any reason. If you quit, you have to wait 2yrs or more to be able to apply for a new job within your home base. Some contract require 50 mile radius on top of the 2yrs from where you work before. Even if you get fired, you have to wait 2yrs until you can find work again within your home base. That means you have to move to another part of the state to find work. So please stop these non compete causes for the betterment of the people and business." -James
	"I strongly support the ban of the non-compete agreement. As a family member of a Chiropractor, I have seen how employers use these agreements to lock in new graduates who are eager to be employed. These agreements make leaving the practice impossible due to unfair mileage limitations & no end date on the agreements. Some employers don't compensate fairly and make leaving difficult. If they're a strong practice, they shouldn't be affect by healthy competition. I'm for eliminating them and evening the field for practice." -Sharon

A	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Erik	"No group of people including physicians should be excluded . It's archaic and morally wrong to limit job prospects including physicians"
Shannon	"Non-compete agreements limit opportunities for career growth and development. They stifle creativity and limit the potential for new products or services to be developed, which ultimately harms productivity and competitiveness in the market. Freedom and competition is the backbone of America! Vanderbilt had Rockefeller. Edison has Tesla. General Motors had Ford. The opportunity to use and your test your skills and abilities in the workplace of your choice encourages growth. When you feel trapped you simply just exist and do the bare minimum"
Sanjay	"As a resident physician, this is disheartening. I promise you, the desire of people wanting to become physicians and doctors is dwindling and this just another reason. America is bound to face a serious healthcare crisis if this is to go through and doctors are excluded. Please listen to my warning Regardless of what hospital administers would like you to believe, doctors are people too and won't stand for disrespect like this much longer"
Alsadiq	"Im against noncompete policy"
Imran	"Nearly a decade ago, I was served by one of the worst sweat shop in the country. They are now a public traded company. I was able to settle the case, but only because I had money and I was a student of University of Detroit Mercy b-school student. I have a lifetime gag order. The practice at this employer still continues until today - you complete all the forms, execute all the necessary documentations and one the first day of employment, they require you to sign additional paperwork - essentially you are giving up all of your rights. By this time, I had quitted my job, had student debt and a newly born at home, so chances of exiting first day without signing was impossible. I had the money to settle, but this company has destroyed thousands of lives. They have a prominent law firm and their is nothing anyone can do about it, not even the government. The next best thing is this newly proposed law. Thank you!! Thank you! Thank you!"
Bashar	"I am a physician and wanted to take a moment to stress how important that no professions are excluded from this proposed rule. As physicians, we are often employed by large health systems who often have direct competition from one or

	two large systems within a small geographic area. These systems routinely enforce cruel and often excessive non-compete clauses that force physicians who may leave their employment to move to a completely different city or town due to the terms of the non-compete which make it impossible to remain local and to be able to find employment without violating said clause. This is not only disruptive to one's family, but also negatively impacts the local community's health as many excellent physicians are forced to leave the area as a result. This only served to exacerbate a growing crisis of health inequity and disparity in our country. Physicians should be free to work wherever they are most appreciated and treated well, free of the bounds of these archaic and self-serving non-compete clauses."
Kootaybah	"As a physician, noncompete hurting the doctors in general, limiting freedom to practice the best medicine, put stress on the physician and his family. I would definitely support to eliminate the noncompete clause rule"
James	"I am primary care Family Physician, and I now practice in a Free Clinic in rural northern Michigan. I have lost many of the specialists I refer to and who would see my uninsured, under insured and financially poor patients at little or no cost to them. Why has this happen you might ask. The specialists were forced to join hospital systems, to become employed physicians, in order to maintain their ability to do procedures in that hospital. If they did not join the hospital system such ability would be revoked, limited, or restricted in other ways. Their contracts then included such non-compete clauses, which of course were glossed over by the hospital systems. Some time later the hospital system then required unacceptable and very questionable requirements on the specialty physician, the physician was forced to leave the community because she/he would not comply with imposed and inappropriate hospital system rules; because the hospital system invoked the non-compete clause. Therefore; I lost the ability to ask/sent my patient in need of specialty care, to such specialists and the patients lost their ability to access quality care in a timely manner. The entire system of access to quality and needed care is compromised by the existence of hospital systems to invoke such clauses on physicians. My kind specialty physicians willing to see patients in need from the Free Clinic suffered. My patients suffered from lack of access to the medical care they needed. I would think the FTC is getting push back from the lawyers from hospital systems large and small to allow them to continue this rule. However there are real patient care consequences to the control that hospital systems place on physicians. I hope the FTC sides with patients and patient needs, and not the hospital systems, and eliminate the ability to impose non-compete clause rules. James A. Applegate MD FAAFP Boyne Area Free Clinic Boyne City, MI Docapple2880@gmailcom"
Nolan	"I am writing to express my concern about the negative impact that non-compete clauses have had on my career as a medical professional, as well as on my I have been restricted from practicing medicine in my field of expertise due to a non-compete clause in my contract with my previous employer. This has not only limited my ability to earn a living, but has also caused significant financial strain on my family. Furthermore, these clauses are detrimental to patients as it limits the availability of medical professionals and forces them to seek care from less experienced practitioners. I urge the FTC to take action to address the negative impact of non-compete clauses on medical professionals and their families, as well as on the healthcare system as a whole. Thank you for your attention to this matter."

Adam	"Physicians should be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it limits their ability to negotiate their contracts. This would instead offers large hospital systems an advantage over physicians in the marketplace. This in turn would add to resident/physician burnout."
Alan	"Clinician shortages are rapidly increasing, in part due to lack of job mobility for clinicians. When clinicians aren't able to switch jobs to find better fits without having to relocate themselves or their families, they make hard choices, which can include leaving the profession or cutting back clinically. Additionally, noncompetes give the employers unfair leverage. If clinicians are afraid of being fired or otherwise retaliated against because they have a noncompete and are unable to move, they are less able to effectively advocate for themselves or their patients. This can include speaking out against unsafe or unfair working conditions, negotiating fair contracts that help prevent clinician burnout, advocate for safe staffing, or speaking out against patient safety issues."
Kurt	"Open up the market for real competition. Corporations don't need to be protected their exempt and non exempt employees do."
Joseph	"The non-compete clause allows very poorly managed companies to retain employees who could move on to better organizations who place more value on their employees. The clause encourages inefficiency and incompetence by forcing employees to move and uproot their families in order to better their lives."
Monika	"Non-compete law gives the employers right to take undue advantage of their employees. The employees are harassed and made to work at the employers terms and conditions. It should be abolished."
Dr Seymoure	"I have as doctor been bound by non-compete clause. It's been horrible and restrictive! Thank you , please change it!"
Lynn	"Non compete clauses hurt a person's ability to make choices for their career and their families. Non compete can force a person to stay in a bad work situation instead of allowing them freedom to find a good job situation. Non compete should be illegal."
Appa	"Non compete clause is equivalent to slavery. America is known for freedom and progress but this clause is totally anti American principles. I would like to see it go away."
Dr RK	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth and have a chance to EARN a living. Companies today are destructively short sighted. By denying its employees a fair wage and the absolutely American right to switch to one who will pay a fair wage, they are cutting their own throats. The average person can no longer support a consumer based society when they are constantly deprived of a fair wage and cost of living increases because the CEO and the shareholders are selfish and greedy. This has been going on since 1981 and if you are in favor of a consumer based society then removing this is a good first step ."

Ivy	"I am a veterinarian and I strongly support the proposed legislation to ban noncompete clauses. In my industry, many noncompete clauses would require a veterinarian to move to a different area just to practice their profession, and these noncompete clauses disincentivize practice management from taking good care of their employees. This results in significant harm to mental health for employees trapped in toxic environments, or in a clinic where they are unable to practice good medicine. I have been negatively impacted by a noncompete with a previous employer; due to the noncompete clause, I would have had to commute 4 hours (2 hours each way) in order to practice medicine in my region. When remaining with that employer became untenable, I had to sell my home and move to a new area, leaving my home and family. This resulted in a health crisis which I almost didn't survive. (The rate of suicide in the veterinary profession is 4 times higher than in the general population.) No one should be put in that position due to an unfair non-compete clause."
Michael	"Non-compete clauses stifle free speech and also attempt to create an indentured worker who can't exit their current employment for fear of being unable to find any work in the field they are experienced in. They should be outlawed as soon as possible."
Melissa	"Non Competes not only hurt workers... they hurt our patients. I am an employed OBGYN physician in Michigan and the hospital system I work for just acquired yet another hospital system in the state. The system is now so large that if I decided to leave this job I would have to leave my home state to continue to provide care to patients. I spent 13 years of my life working to get my medical license only to have it basically owned by my current employer. Even though rural Michigan is in desperate need of OBGYNs and I am willing to help some of the areas that are in need - I cannot because of the non compete clause that was thrown into my contract. Non competes need to be banned. Now."
Dakota	"This needs to end!!"
Aaron	"I think the FTC should put a ban on non compete clause agreements. I support the FTC's decision to ban non compete clause agreements,"
William	"Non compete clauses should be eliminated for all medical settings profit or non-profit. They directly do harm to patients by limiting their ability to see THEIR chosen physician . Hospitals and medical practices do not own patients and should not be able to limit patients choices in their health care."
Lindsay	"Companies shouldn't be able to enforce a non compete clause as it directly prohibits employee talent from growth and expansion. they need to focus more on retaining employees through internal company efforts vs trying to prevent them advancement opportunities."

Kyle	"I've recently signed a full-time contract that is the very happy result of two years of hard work as a contractor for an educational consulting firm. However, my full-time contract stipulates that I have to wait a period of 12 months before working at a competing firm. Like most people, I don't have the financial resources to go for a year without working, and while I'm very happy with my company itself, it's not hard to see that non-compete agreements essentially hold employees hostage, making them unable to consider offers at the very places where they're most likely to find them: competing firms. (Not to mention the leverage that competing offers can provide during contract negotiations, something non-compete clauses also remove.) The hypocrisy of large corporations pursuing right-to-work legislation while also supporting non-competes is as obvious as it is exploitative. I strongly support a full, retroactive ban on non-compete clauses."
Steven	"I support this change"
Scott	"Corporate America is quickly becoming an evil place. Non compete clauses have no place in this country. Ban them now. Can we please get back to normal? Thank you."
Kathleen	"strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Charles	"Having had personal experience with the destructive nature of non-competes, I wholeheartedly support this new rule. I had a non-compete with an employer that was overly broad. When I left for another company in a role that was truly non competitive, I ended up sued and jobless as the company I went to was sued as well. What I realized with non-competes and the legal system is that it does not matter if you are right but who has the most inexhaustible resources. I ended up "winning" in a court ordered settlement. The net result? I cost my former employer approximately $100K in legal fees to my $ 15K. I was jobless for 2 months, and my family took a financial hit that required 2-3 years to recover from in terms of costs, lost wages, and lesser salary than I would have. Non-competes are a form of labor slavery that could easily be solved with iron-clad legal NDA's."
Paul	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200: I strongly support the proposed BAN on entering into, attempting to enter into and/or maintaining a Non-Compete Clause in agreements between employers and workers. This ban should encompass all categories of employment, including not-for-profit entities. My rationale is as follows. From 1987 to 2018, I practiced internal medicine in my community of Petoskey, MI. In 2018 my group of seven physicians and two nurse-practitioners sold our practice to a large regional healthcare corporation which owns the local hospital. We had been part of a large multi- specialty group practice until 1999 when that group failed and we made our own single-specialty practice group. Our independent group maintained and grew the practice for 19.5 years, making it valuable to the corporation. This corporation had a non-compete clause in it's 2018 contract with us which we negotiated to a lesser stringent clause acceptable to us. When the contract came up for renewal in 2021, a more stringent and non-negotiable non-compete clause was in the contract, restraining individuals in our group from practicing in the area where for decades we had built and maintained the practice and created the value the corporation now owned. This is grossly unfair. By 2023, the group had lost a net of 1.1 FTE physicians, lost numerous employees and was in decline under corporate ownership. The corporation mismanagement had eroded the value of the practice we had built, yet it persists in restraining our ability to practice independently in the area. Again, this is grossly unfair, anti-competitive, and anti-free market. Furthermore, other physicians and practitioners employed by this group have left the area because of the non-compete clause, contributing to the loss of important medical specialty providers from our already underserved area. Please ban non-compete clauses. Thank you. Yours truly, Paul D. Blanchard, MD, FACP"

George	"This would be a huge win for most workers, so let's hope the fundamentalist activist judges on SCOTUS don't undermine yet another policy that would actually benefit citizens."
Paula	"Simply put, non-compete agreements are unfair to both the employee and to the business. • Employees might be dissuaded from accepting employment if asked to sign a non-compete fearing that future employment opportunities will be negatively affected. • Signing a non-compete means that the lower wage workers may have reduced economic opportunities and mobility to seek better wages and improve their working conditions. This affects women and minorities disproportionately. • Both employers and employees could find themselves in frivolous litigation • Non-compete clauses are difficult to enforce, requiring additional resources from the business • Non-compete clauses may reduce market competition by preventing workers from starting their own competitor companies"
Eric	"Non-compete agreements harm employees in every industry. They decrease labor mobility and encourage employee mistreatment. Please ban them."
Christian	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. They run directly against the foundational principles behind our market economy in order to stifle competition and trap employees. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements and then forces employers to alert all employees that these clauses are null and void. Sincerely, Christian Boyd Saint Joseph, MI"
Eric	"Please do away with this law, it forces employees to stay with companies that have below average wages."
Michael	"I am a physician. I have seen these used extensively in healthcare to prevent mobility. I myself stayed with a toxic and unethical employer, because I didn't want to disrupt my family. when I finally quit, I had to leave the geographic area. My employer could not find a replacement, and sonic of my patients had to drive several hours away for similar care. My absence at a surgery center caused a significant drop off in business leading to several people being laid off My children suffered through an unnecessary move. My personal health suffered from the stress of making this decision. In the city, I live in, a failed negotiation with a private equity corporation, caused an entire anesthesia department to lose their contract. While the company had no employment to offer them, they were barred from taking jobs in the very hospitals they had worked in for years. They were pawns in a negotiation which lead to dozens of people losing their jobs and relocating. Furthermore, the hospital was so short staffed that they could not cover required inpatient surgical care let alone elective procedures. These contractual clauses have been abused for far too long, and should be abolished."

Julie	"A non-compete clause for someone doing gardening and landscaping is ridiculous. These are not trade secrets, these are low-income workers committed to doing what they like in their community. Restricting where someone in this type of job can work if they leave an organization is unfair to the employee, especially if it's a smaller community."
Jamison	"I support the proposed non-compete clause rule. I work in mental healthcare and have noticed that the proliferation of these clauses and simultaneous growth in hiring independent contractors to provide frontline care in healthcare and mental health services is contributing to shortages of services in areas where an employer that is not investing in an area nonetheless prevents others who have worked for them from doing so simply by renting an empty office in an area and claiming to serve that population."
Jason	"Non-competes are un-American. I have no idea how these could even be remotely legal when compared to our founding documents. These clearly go against the pursuit of happiness as they limit one's ability to move jobs. We already have non-disclosures in place to protect any data or research. In addition, this seems to disproportionately affect lower level employees, how often are CEOs or SVPs bound by non-competes? Please abolish these."
Shawn	"While I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses, I am dismayed to see the move to exclude physicians from this movement. Physicians should be free to practice medicine in the best environment possible to provide care for our patients. Non-compete clauses are deliberately harmful to doctor-patient relationships and narrow the opportunities we have as doctors to engage in good patient care."
Sue	"I strongly support the elimination of non-compete agreements. They are hurting American workers who can not afford to fight these ridiculous limitations when they are simply trying to make a living. You are crippling our working Americans' rights to start new businesses and hurting our economy for decades to come. It needs to be stopped now."
Dagan	"I support the rule suggested, eliminating Non-Compete contracts or clauses within employment contracts. While executive level exceptions are potentially possible (EVP President or C-Suite level) they are typically negotiated in good faith between companies and knowledgeable individuals (or their lawyers) at the start of employment. The company I work for insisted on all employees sign a non-compete contract, which eliminates their ability to move employment in the industry of their specialty, thereby restricting opportunities for advancement. There was no negotiation in this process and was a clear message from the company, sign or leave the company. Employees are considered "at will" and this clause is a one-way advantage to the company to prevent an employ from advancing with the industry, especially when the company prevents advancement internally."

Barbara	"Non-compete rules are hurting workers and should not be required of people earning less than the highest paid/compensated employee of a company"
Julie	"As the President of a niche faith-based financial services company who does not support tying employees up with non-competes I'm firmly supportive of this new Non-Compete Clause Rule. Our industry competitor has long believed in tying up its employees with non-compete agreements and has pursued them aggressively with legal action when employees pursue other opportunities. Employees accept a job offer and compensation and are required to sign a non-compete cause. They later find that the employer can and will change the compensation at their leisure, can easily have a culture where employees are mistreated, yet the employee cannot pursue another competitor option where they have the opportunity to be more productive and earn higher wages for their family, in fear of getting sued over a non-compete. I have seen how this results in lower wages because the employees are handcuffed. The employers are not forced to earn the hard work and loyalty of their employees. Additionally, many non-competes are overly broad in scope and are intimidating for employees. Even though some may not be enforceable, the employee is fearful and cannot afford to risk their careers and household earnings to test it by leaving. Some non-compete clauses even apply after the employer decides to terminate the employee! At the very least most non-competes force employees to exit their trade or industry entirely, or pick up their family and relocate out of the restricted territory which is a significant hardship. If non-competes were eliminated market competitors would likely have to raise wages and/or have to have a culture of respect and professional advancement, one that matches the best worker to the employer and maintains an equitable voluntary relationship, not one that retains unhappy employees unfairly and suppresses their earnings potential!"
S	"Non-compete clauses are often used by employers in the healthcare industry to restrict the career advancement of their workers. This can lead to limitations in pay and position. Such clauses are often used as a means to keep workers in lower-paying or less desirable jobs by threatening legal action."
Ryan	"I support the ban of Non-compete clauses hindering the pay check to paycheck workers in this country."
Steven	"Noncompete clauses are an abuse of power."
David	"About one in five American workers approximately 30 million people are bound by a non-compete clause and are thus restricted from pursuing better employment opportunities. I believe that this is detrimental to our economy and these forms of contracts should be banned."

Michael	"Comment on Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200. I am in support of implementing the rule. I worked for a major US based industrial corporation and was presented with a non-negotiable non-complete agreement with my promotion to a business leader Directors role. The agreement provided a list of specific corporations that I was prohibited from joining globally for a two year period after leaving the corporation and in addition, included a statement that said any competitor of my employer. Additional companies were added to the document with each change in responsibility. My employer had a broad product line which prevented me from seeking employment elsewhere when my position was eliminated during Covid and has effected my livelihood. My employer also prevented me from taking any consulting roles unless i specifically told them who the companies were, which was not allowed under the consulting contract tenns. I have found the agreement to be anticompetitive because: 1. The bargaining power between employers and workers are unequal. 2. The non-compete clauses limited my ability to practice my trade. and 3. The non-compete clauses has effected my livelihood."
Suzanne	"Non-compete clauses hurt people. My brother was left without the ability to work and support his family out of fear of reprisal from a firm he left due to an untenable situation with his boss. He was in lower management in a field he had worked in for 20 years. The harm to the workers is far greater than any harm done to employers who have the means to hire and train new employees, while workers are left unable to feed their families. Workers or former workers should not have to live in fear of obtaining a new job."
Kelly	"I am in support of restricting employers' use of non-compete contracts. I was recently let go for no reason cited. I built a book of business from nothing to SIM over a period of 9 years with my old employer. No severance, and a 2 year non-compete that forces my customers to do business with other professionals even though they want to follow me. The problem was that I made too much money. I was a math equation (the employer reduced payroll significantly and absorbed my book). The noncompete protects the multi-billion dollar company who let me go, and leaves me stranded with no outlet to find an employer to match my income ($300k and climbing annually). I am scared to start my own business as well, as my ex employer is not afraid of litigation and I cannot afford to be sued."
Michael	"I have been left unemployed for the past 3 months now. My previous employer is notorious for their "Hire and Fire" campaigns, and target fresh faces (recent college grads, first time in this type of career, etc.). My self and others who have never worked in logistics and with 3pl's were forced to sign an overly broad noncompete at the start of hire or risk losing their position. Then after 3 - 6 months of making 100s of outbound dials and onboarding new customers, this particular company "cuts the fat" and fires most of their newer staff with zero notice; day of firings. How fair is it that I and others are bound to no longer work in a field that we are interested and may have a better opportunity with a different company."
Cara	"As a physician I support the elimination of non-compete clauses which stifle the labor market and add to the already astronomical amount of power that employers have over their employees."

Stefano	"I would definitely support the elimination of non-competes in healthcare. As a Hospitalist physician who do not take a patient census along with him if he were to leave my noncompete is solely being used as leverage by the corporation that owns our healthcare system. This is the experience of most physicians like myself. Non competes, especially in situations like my own, do not protect the employer in any way but are used as leverage to manipulate employees to remain in jobs with unfavorable terms. In order to promote a legitimate free market for medical professionals service non competes should be eliminated Non competes provide a illegitimate and unfair advantage for healthcare employers allowing them to take advantage of their employees in some cases when they cannot relocate geographically."
Braden	"This is such an important step in leveling the playing field and preventing uncompetitive behavior by corporations. Specialized employees with noncompete clauses are subject to intensely asymmetric bargaining power - the company can easily replace them, but they can't replace the company in turn (at least, not without changing their vocation or uprooting their life). This new regulation helps to fix that unfortunate fact. It's needed and long overdue."
James	"I support the elimination of new and existing non competes, it makes it very hard to hire potential employees in an already tough market, I have personally experienced lower wages due to a non compete. It ties up the courts and other resources with unnecessary lawsuits."
James	"I strongly support the elimination of non competes, they make it hard to hire new employees, they tie up the courts and suppress the wages of the working class, I feel that non competes should stay in place in the case of the sale of a business, but should not exist for the employees."
Justin	"I'm agree with banning non compete agreements. I am a victim. I worked as a self employed sub contractor. I decided to take a job with a corporate company that I had brought a lot of clients to because I was promised better opportunities down the road within the company. That was all a scam by the corporate company to still my business. After 10 years with zero training or added customers and a capped pay scale I was forced to quite. I decided I was going to make. Y own future by going back to being self employed. I now had to back out of an opportunity to operate on my own because the corporate company forced a non compete on my last minute and threatened my lively hood and my job . Do to court order out of St Louis Missouri where I have never been in my life. I can't service customers that I have serviced prior to the employment to the other company I can't make a living now in the Detroit Metro Area . Please help and if there is any one that can help me that would be great ."
Melinda	"I agree with eliminating non-compete clauses, especially for low wage workers. If companies want to retain workers, they should treat them well and pay them fairly!"
Andrew	"Non-compete clauses are bad for workers and bad for the economy, stifling innovation and competition. I strongly support this proposal."

Christopher	"As a physician, I am writing to oppose non-competes. They exacerbate the physician shortage and reduce access to care for patients. This is especially the case in rural and underserved areas. I am currently under a 1 year non-compete that prevents me from working in almost a dozen counties spread throughout my state. Due to a non-compete clause, I am currently sitting on the sidelines after leaving my prior job. I am unable to work at my preferred location in a rural underserved area where there is a desperate need for physicians. Non-competes facilitate unjust/unsafe work environments, and allow employers to abuse their staff and patients, leaving employees/caregivers without power to foster change or improve broken, abusive systems. Non-competes essentially tell employees, "Do what we say and you can never leave or we will make your life miserable." This is a mafia-style tactic. There is no credible evidence that a physician relocating takes anything away from that employer as the physician has already been trained, having paid for their own education and trained through an internship/residency. They are not stealing "trade secrets"; they come into their jobs already knowing their trade. The only thing employers lose is the employee themselves and this reflects a problem with work conditions which need to be addressed. Employers frequently look at patients as their property which will be "stolen" if a physician relocates across town. Patients are not property. There is no shortage of patients in this country. They are selling water in the desert. Non-competes have nothing to do with "competition"; they use as a tool that is wielded to exert control of employees and patients. It appears that the FTC's current proposal intends to exclude non-profit hospital systems. It needs to be emphasized very clearly that, if legally applicable, that the FTC proposal MUST include non-profits as large "non-profit" hospitals systems (which use the same business model as for profit institutions) are among the worst offenders. Eliminating non-competes would improve physician shortages and access to care—especially in underserved areas. It would improve work conditions, and patient safety. They are unjust and need to be eliminated in both for-profit and non-profit institutions. Eliminating non-competes would be a valuable step in improving healthcare in this country."
Abhinav	"Non competes for physicians need to be banned regardless of whether they work for a non for profit or for profit organization... there should be freedom to work for an organizations which gives the physicians a fair deal rather than having to be locked into working for an organization due to the non compete which may mean that some physicians have to move out of the area if they choose to change their job"
Govind	"I think this is a great effort to empower employees to freely choose where they want to work. Being a medical professional, this will empower me to maintain my patient base if I chose to switch to a different practice in the same area. I fully support this effort."
Nancy	"I have seen many young people and their families hurt by non-compete clauses, which often for families to uproot their children and move in order for one parent to escape a toxic work environment. A company I worked for forced us to sign non-compete clauses that weren't in our original contracts with the threat of firing. Corporations have too much power, and people are being hurt."

Austin	"I have worked as a sysadmin and as a information security engineer both roles that contain provide no operational knowledge that could be used against the org or as a benefit of a competitor. .it is common to see non-compete clauses in both for employer who hire IT directly and agencies that do IT work as a third party for organizations. These contracts make employees even in toxic and unhealthy work places afraid to apply to jobs local to them as they do not have the time/energy/money to deal with a possible legal battle even if they will come out successful in the end. Furthermore it may discourage employers from hiring employees with non-competes because the business does not want to get into a protracted legal battle. This further hurts the employee while providing little material benefit to the employer except employee control."
James	"I agree with the elimination of non competes, it makes it hard to recruit new employees, it forces lower wages, it keeps people trapped in toxic jobs and it ties up the court system."
Ronald	"Thank you for considering this situation. Health care professionals often have a different perspective on the vulnerable people they serve than do the large health care corporations that often organize their care. Increasingly - all decisions about health care are purely business decisions even in "nonprofit" health care corporations. Cun-ently I am board certified in family medicine, geriatrics and hospice and palliative medicine - the last two which is where I have spent my whole professional career of 35+ years serving in caring for frail, vulnerable and largely unprofitable populations. If my current employer decides that they do not want to further serve these groups - I am not free to stay in my community and try to find some other provider or entity that will continue to serve them because of the non-compete that is in my current contract. Geriatricians are extremely hard to find and recruit as are HPM doctors. We have had several positions open for about three years at competitive salary and benefits offers. Yet I would be forced out of my community rather than staying in spite of the need due to the non-compete situation. Thank you for considering ending this intolerable practice."
Rainey	"Non compete clauses are in direct conflict with the patient/doctor relationship especially in a setting where the physician is a direct employee. A patient should be able to follow their physician to a new facility within a reasonable geographic location and not be forced to "start over" with a new physician if the employee/employer relationship changes. Additionally, unlike a partnership relationship or private group where the physician may not be a direct employee but rather a member of a partnership(where this relationship would be governed by a mutually agreeable operating/business contract), an employee is does not have any direct control over termination or changes in the contract. Employed physician's cannot readily negotiate a new contract effectively with no leverage which is ultimately gained by having the freedom to easily seek employment elsewhere. And though they may not be "at will" employees directly, they are still subject to employment rules and regulations. It is unethical at best to force a physician to remain in a position due to a non compete clause simply so they can remain in the same geographic location and maintain their home and family. A physician should be able to "market" the skills that they have paid so highly to obtain, and they should be able to operate as a regular employee does. A non physician employee is able to seek new employment in the locale if the employer/employment relationship is no longer mutually agreeable. They are not forced to uproot their families, move, and re-arrange their whole lives simply to secure another position."

Bradley	"Years ago, my wife and her entire department were forced to sign a non compete clause at her work. It stemmed from her supervisor leaving her position for another company. For context, my wife has a skilled position that doctors will call to help fit patients with the product, they never call out to doctors, all calls are incoming. They either signed this document, or were told that refusing to would be considered a 2 week notice if they didnt. Months later, she was offered a job with another company that could use her knowledge to fit their products, these 2 companies sold different products, so we felt they weren't competitors. The owner heard she took another position, and hired a lawyer to sue us for everything she earned, unless she quit immediately. Without the funds to fight the cease and disaster order, she resigned. She was at the prior job for 22 years, and was told she wasn't going to make anymore than what she was currently making, but started the new position much higher than her current pay. It turns out the original company is paying their employees far under the industry standard, but those employees are stuck there, or do what my wife had to do, and take a year off from skilled trade they worked hard to achieve. This particular non compete isn't being used to protect the company's product secrets, development, or client lists, as these positions don't seek business. It's being used to make sure the employees can't leave for better employment with higher wages. And that's just wrong."
Adam	"I support this wholeheartedly. Non-Competes are plainly exploitative of workers from the highest to lowest levels. They keep skilled workers from finding new work without giving them compensation, and they're used to depress wages for low skilled workers by keeping folks flipping burgers from doing so elsewhere for higher wages. In addition, the ban on non-compete agreements was a big part of the success of Silicon Valley, allowing workers to be more efficiently allocated into projects that fit their skills and interests and provide them a fair compensation, rather than keeping them locked down by incumbent monopolies guarding obsolete tech."
Katie	"I support the proposed rule to eliminate non-compete agreements Particularly when applied to those who are not highly compensated individuals in their state."
Anne	"I believe that most non-compete agreements for lower wage workers especially in service industries are unnecessary as those individuals are using their skills and not proprietary or patent-protected information. That employers are so willing to handicap former employees is ridiculous, particularly when there is a labor shortage in so many areas of our economy, particularly for those employed in direct service and sales positions."
Diane	"Noncompete clauses are, by definition, anticompetitive and should be banned in general. In medicine, they are particularly problematic. I am a physician in a subspecialty and I serve a rural community. The employee physician contract for our practice includes a 60 mile, 2 year noncompete clause. We have a monopoly in our subspecialty in our geographic region, and we are short-staffed in terms of physicians. This means that should any of our doctors leave, they would not be

	able to practice anywhere within 60 miles for 2 years, and our community, already underserved, would be even more underserved. This also has the effect of preventing choice for patients. The patients must see this one practice regardless of whether they are happy with the care they receive, or travel unreasonable distances. The medical field is currently experiencing a crisis of burnout, and these clauses exacerbate this. Physicians who are unhappy in their work environment are forced to choose between their own well being and serving their patients and community. In my own practice, we are well aware of the harm that would be done to patients if any of us left, as there simply would not be enough doctors left to care for them. Most physicians feel a strong duty towards their patients and will put their own needs second to their patients, but at some point this becomes unsustainable. Practices which require these clauses know this physician tendency and exploit it. They can avoid improving working conditions because they know that ultimately, the physician will have to stay or feel they are abandoning their patients. There is also a current trend towards consolidation in medicine. Large hospital complexes are merging, and private equity is buying up practices. If noncompetes are allowed in medicine, as these mergers move forward, the prohibited area for medical staff will grow ever larger. Using my practice as an example, we have multiple offices. If we enforce a 60 mile radius noncompete, any physician leaving the practice essentially has to leave the state. This uproots families, disrupts education, and severs patient-physician relationships solely for the benefit of company revenue. In short, noncompete clauses eliminate choice for patients, allow employers to avoid improving benefits and working conditions, worsen physician burnout, and decrease patient access to care. Noncompete clauses should be prohibited. There should be no income level at which they are allowed."
Jeremy	"As a physician for 19 years, every contract I have signed had a non-negotiable non-compete clause. This has definitely kept me from looking for another job as I would not be able to practice in my community and would have to leave the area. In medicine, by stifling the ability to practice in an established location, non compete clauses harm the community. Furthermore, employers can erode working conditions further because they know physicians cannot leave which increases burnout. In my experience, elimination of non-compete clauses will not increase physician salary significantly since this is already monitored with MGMA percentiles. Rather it will require employers to improve their working environment for physicians. This will finally do something to help with burnout and ultimately help the community served."
Emily	"I urge the FTC to ban noncompete clauses in order to strengthen the American labor market."
Tom	"I wholeheartedly agree with this rule change. Employees have very little leverage when being hired and are forced to sign a non compete that is often overreaching and keeps them from moving elsewhere. I am similarly affected and am essentially barred from employment throughout my highly technical field."
Carol	"Non-compete clauses stack the deck against the worker by making it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you and by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry."

Andrea	"Hello, I am a physician who is currently under a non-compete clause that essentially prevents me from seeking employment without moving from my location. The type of medicine I practice does not threaten my employer with regards to my patients because I practice in hospital medicine and if I left I do not have a patient population base that would go with me. I also do not have proprietary knowledge that would be beneficial to another hospital system. I think that the non-compete clause essentially keeps us wage restricted because many of us with families and children in local schools find it hard to move to another location for employment. I strongly support striking down the legality for non-compete clauses. I personally see them more as they wait for companies to control employees, mobility and control wage increases."
Karsten	"Some argue the proposed rule will put pressure on small businesses. GOOD! Freeing up the labor market will force businesses to be run more efficiently. Will some businesses be forced to close? Yes...in favor of better run, better managed operations. Promote free enterprise. Promote competition. Pass this rule."
Philip	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I started in machine repair in 2000 and had signed a Non-Compete for 1 year. I left in 2002 and started my own business in 2005. In 2016, I was offered a job and became Service Manager at a company that did the same work without a Non-Compete. On 12-1-22 that company sold out. The new owner requires a Non-Compete to be signed. Unfortunately I signed it. 3 months later I was approached by another company to work for them for more money, they area competitor of my current employer. I'm in Michigan but the Non-Compete was written that Georgia laws would apply due to that is where the Parent Company is. After talking to 2 attorneys, one from Michigan and 1 from Georgia, they both said I may win a court case due to missing "geographic area" in the contract. I would never sign one again being it would stop any future opportunities I could have. It also stops fair competition. I had 95% of the knowledge when I started there. Customers followed me there because of how they are treated. They will follow when I leave. Non-Competes should be made not enforceable. They only hurt the employees."
Iris	"Eliminating non-compete clauses would be so wonderful for me and my co-workers. Currently, I would have to move to work for someone else, or drive a great distance from my home."
Geoffrey	"Dear FTC, The only thing non competes SHOULD be used for is protecting extreme trade secrets and preventing client poaching. 99 percent of Non Compete Clauses do not deal with these and place undue stress and burden on people. Please get rid of them Regards Geoff Foster"
Sars	"The ban on noncompetes is necessary and needed. It is dramatically limiting physicians especially those in primary care and wasting health care dollars on corporate entities."
Johanne	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking Matter No. P201200 From a broadcast sales person perspective, non-competes are unfair. On-air talent have agents to protect them and negotiate their deals. As sales people, we are given an agreement which includes a non-compete and told to sign it in three days or else your fired. How is that fair when they can change comp plans mid year, lower compensation, move accounts around etc. and then expect you not do what is best for your family and move on."

Ruth	"The Non-compete Clause Rule has been very detrimental for the ASD ABA programs Staff-mg issues since COVID 19 Pandemic have negatively harmed children seeking ABA services. Please support the ruling that would allow essential staff to work where they are needed with no waiting period."
Julie	"I absolutely support banning non-compete clauses. This especially harms providers in the medical field who often carry large student loan debt burdens."
T	"Please abolish non competes in healthcare specifically for physicians. It impedes access to care for all patients. Please INCLUDE NONPROFIT entities and hospitals in this abolishment. Nonprofit hospitals are now huge money making conglomerates and act with mercenary aggressive tactics. They should not be exempt. Physician burnout and suicide rates are increasing in part due to mistreatment and abuse in the work place. Most of these are under strict noncompetes and therefore cannot get a new job without uprooting their families This traps them and is leading to many leaving the clinical workforce entirely when we already have a shortage of clinical physicians."
Karin	"Abolish non-compete clauses and help the poor and middle class Americans. After all, Congress members do not have NCTs when they rush to get millions as lobbyists when they leave Congress. How is that not a direct conflict of interest? If it's fine for Congress members, it's fine for me. I don't owe a company my life."
DONALD	"There is no reason any business needs it's employees to be bound by a non-compete agreement other than restraint of competition. A non disclosure agreement would address any other valid concerns about an employee going to work for a competitor or starting a competing business. The non compete agreements cost American workers billions of dollars each year."
Drew	"Non-compete clauses are fundamentally abusive to workers, especially in an economy where the vast majority of power remains in the hands of corporations. For the few cases where there could be an actual case for the protection of intellectual property, NDAs (non-disclosure agreements) can be used. Non-competes provide zero value, except to chill the ability for workers to move to another job, or use their ability to move as leverage for negotiations."
Karen	"As stated before, large employers routinely used the burden of litigation to intimidate employees, seek revenge for the employee's perceived personal disloyalty. This is not used to protect any legitimate employer interest. I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, as proposed in Matter No. P201200. I'm"
Henry	"it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly bound to their jobs by noncompetes. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompetes to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompetes would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people — but the FTC hasn't approved the policy yet. Corporate lobby groups are bitterly opposed to banning noncompete agreements because they want to keep competition for the labor force as low as possible"

Kelly	"I am 100% supportive of this action. Noncompete clauses are anti-capitalist and anti-free market and anti-worker. Nobody should be an indentured servant in America, forced to stay forever with the same employer regardless of wages or working conditions because of an agreement that the worker has no ability to negotiate. Please, please, PLEASE implement this new rule."
Matthew	"I am restricted by a non-compete clause at my current workplace. I uprooted my life and moved across the country to be served a non-compete on the first morning of my first day of work. I was not aware that I would be forced to sign this document to work. I believe this is a common practice and gives the employer an unreasonable amount of power and control over the employee."
Bill	"I am a successful midcareer (40 years old) business professional. I work for a multi billion dollar company whose growth strategy is company acquisition. My role was previously with another employer that was purchased, and was also with another employer before that, which was purchased. So now I am in a legacy role, perthnning duties that are not done anywhere else in this huge company. I have the opportunity to create my own company to serve a client who requested I do so. This would not take my employers client, only the legacy services that the employer is unequipped to provide properly. However, my employer forced me to sign a very strict noncompete clause. I could request the HR department or legal department to grant me a waiver, since I will be performing services that the company describes as legacy and have stated they don't want to expand on. However, I also risk the chance of just getting fired for violating the noncompete agreement. I 100% support prohibiting noncompete agreements. It is not only in equitable, but it is stifling new business growth and the ability to best serve businesses."
Ryan	"Please stop undue influence by corporations and employers on our lives beyond employment with them. If we leave their employment, they should not get a say in who employs us. That is monopolistic behaviour and should be stopped. It is an attempt to remove our options in life and only benefits major corporations."
Thomas	"Non-competes should absolutely be banned. Businesses can protect their interests by using non-disclosures without handcuffing and preventing ex-employees from making a living. Not to mention the misuse of the justice system asking courts to grant injunctions on former employees. This is a tool solely used by the wealthy to unfairly monopolize employees. I can't even put my name on this for fear of employer retaliation."
Sabrina	"People should be able to get jobs in fields they are trained in after they choose to leave their place of employment or are fired!"
Sam	"I agree with the FTC that non-compete agreements hinder personal growth and income potential as you grow within your industry."

Holly	"We were forced to sign no compete clause or not get job in home health care. Our client wants to change health care companies because he is so unhappy with this company. He is a quadriplegic on life support. We we're told if he changes companies none of us can continue to work with him or they will sue us if we do. They have no other jobs in at least 75 miles to give us. Really client and staff get punished with this non compete clause. Patient would have a very difficult time trying to replace his entire staff."
Heidi	"Please vote to END non-compete clauses in contracts. It is not good for workers and in my field, it is not good for patient care and healthcare. Non- compete clauses need to be eliminated."
Julieann	"I strongly support the Non-compete Clause Rule because it supports workers' rights, even those who are not protected by a union. Please do not allow powerful hospital lobbying organizations to obtain an exception to the Non-compete clause rule for physicians and other healthcare workers. We work hard in dangerous conditions (ex: COVID-19 pandemic) and are subject to strict non-compete clauses. Most physicians are not protected by unions and health care systems take advantage of us. Please do not allow lobbyists to remove us from the protections of the Non-compete Clause Rule. We deserve the same protections as others to seek out better employment opportunities without uprooting our families to do so. Physicians are leaving the field in droves and non-compete clauses are just one more reason to leave the field to find better working conditions rather than uproot one's family to find another hospital far enough away to satisfy the non-compete clauses."
Meghan	"My employer is requiring a non compete with my next contract. If for some reason I need to leave this job, this will force me to up root my family. I am a subspecialty physician and my services are relatively hard to find. This would be a disservice to my patients."
Hugh	"I strongly support FTC's proposal to ban non compete agreements. The deny a person's freedom to move to a better paying position thus bettering his or her financial status."
Jonathan	"I believe I am in favor given worker and therefore patient safety in medical field. It is unethical to hold workers partially handcuffed from looking and obtaining better working conditions and pay due to non-compete clauses. Being a physician, I've had had to sign one with not being able to look or switch jobs within substantial area as per non-compete clause, which means I would have to move to completely new area and leave continuity of care behind for patients."
Farrah	"As a physician, I cannot work within 10 miles of my location. That means I would need to consider a job far away. I have two small children at home, this would be a huge inconvenience to my family and for my work life balance. Noncompete clauses are just for employers, but do not help working families."
Kirk	"I fully support any rule that removes employers ability to require non-compete clauses. Employees should have free will to change jobs and work for whoever they choose and in the process, increase their earnings potential."

Daniel	"Block the NON competes. I'm a massage therapist and wanting to start my own practice. However I'm locked into a non compete and all my clients want to come with me. This is costing me dearly."
Mary	"On behalf of my husband and our family i believe the FTC's ban Non-compete agreements because large establishments such as, massage therapy, or health and wellness facilities have been able to gain legal "hold" over entire cities in regards to new massage therapist attempting to establish their own small businesses. For example, my husband signed and agreed to a non-compete with his now former employer, knowing he would not "poach" clients from them, rather he used his time massaging their clients as practice to gain enough skill to start his own massage journey in massage therapy. Said employer has explained to my husband, that if ANY client who's EVER been seen at their business comes to him for a massage, even if he never massaged them, then lie would be violating his non-compete. Furthermore, said employer had informed my husband that he will need to call his former employer to check and make sure with the front office staff that anyone booking with my husband has never been seen at his former employers business before performing any sort of massage service on them. We understand not taking regular clients with him, that has never been his intention, but to have a non-compete with a 20 mile radius, and say any massage therapist who leaves their business has to verify they are not or have not been a client if Creative Wellness is outrageous. These large companies are making it nearly impossible for other therapist trying to create their own brand. It's unfair, and it holds "small fish" back from providing for their family adequately without the constant threat of lawsuits held over their head. This needs to end now!"
Benjiman	"I am one of the many people affected by non competes. I was coerced into signing one shortly before the owner the company announced he had sold the business. The new owners have made numerous changes that have drastically reduced my income as I'm a commission based employee. Now I am trapped in working conditions that I never would have agreed to with no way out other than to start over in a completely different industry. This is unfair and unethical. I should be free to pursue better working conditions and better pay. I encourage you to do what's right and allow the free market to actually be free."
Emily	"Non-competes serve no purpose but to punish veterinary professionals."
Matthew	"I fully support the much needed elimination of no compete clauses as they stifle employees ability to receive a competitive wage by controlling our ability to work ibr the same job within our community for higher wages or work multiple jobs to increase earnings. These rules give all the power to employers and limit our earnings and mobility. Please make this rule permanent."
Kurt	"The non-complete clause which I had to sign in order to be employed at my position which I held from 1989-2021 kept me from considering any other options. As a family practice doctor in an excellent group this was not an issue, but it certainly was for others in our town. One had to commute to Grand Rapids for a year before returning to Kalamazoo as a busy neurosurgeon. One relocated to South Haven for a year as an OB/GYN before returning to Kalamazoo. I was

	fortunate, but was I? I could never explore other chances for income. Who wants to run 30 miles away every day for a year? Please eliminate this nonsense. It seems incredible that it was ever allowed to become legal in the first place. Thank you."
Jessica	"I am writing this comment in strong support of the FTC's proposed ban on noncompete clauses. I am a family medicine physician. Like many physicians, every job I have held after residency has forced me to sign a non-compete clause. (One survey found that 90% of doctors were subject to a non-compete either currently or in the past). This has significantly hindered my ability to direct my own career path, and has harmed numerous patients as well. I worked as faculty at a medical school from for several years, and the non-compete in my contract restricted me from practice within the surrounding area, such that I could not work within the entire city should I end my employment there. I did not intend to leave, as academic medicine is my calling, and this location was near my family and friends. I bought a house, developed a robust panel of patients I loved. And then I found out that one of my colleagues was involved in practices that put patients in imminent danger, in many ways that I won't belabor here, and many layers of administration were covering it up. I elevated my concerns to multiple levels, including, ultimately, the state medical board. In this process, it became clear that I could no longer be a part of an institution that allowed this to continue. Because of my non-compete, I was not able to apply to any jobs that would have allowed me to stay in the area. I had to leave behind hundreds of patients with whom I had built relationships, sell my house, move over an hour away from my family. The non-compete did not protect any legitimate business interests of the university. I took with me no special training or trade secrets- in fact, I left behind a wealth of experience and expertise that significantly benetitted the school. Had my patients followed me, the institution would not have suffered in any appreciable way, as with the current primary care shortage, I could have taken three times my patient panel and they still would have had more than enough patients to go around. Not a single entity benefitted from this non-compete. I was personally harmed, but the biggest losers in this situation were the hundreds of patients that had to start over trying to find a new doctor. If doctors and other health care professionals were no longer bound by non-compete clauses, we would personally benefit by having the freedom to practice anywhere we desire, and employers would be incentivized to offer more competitive pay, safer working conditions, and accountability for their own actions. But moreover, society as a whole would benefit by patients being able to maintain relationships with their doctor if that person is able to keep practicing nearby and not forced out of town should they choose to leave their current employment."
Mitchell	"This is absolutely vital to worker's rights; banning Non-competes is a VERY good thing!"
Glenn	"I support the proposed rule regarding non-compete clauses. As someone who works in the tech industry I have seen the harm non- compete clauses cause me and my peers. They limit our ability to work in our chosen field of study. They stifle innovation. They limit earning potential. And lets not forget the stress and anxiety caused by the looming threat of litigation. Despite industry concerns, a ban of non-

	compete clauses would result in a more competitive and dynamic workforce which means greater innovation and economic growth. A ban would allow workers to make the best choices for their careers and encourage businesses to focus on retention through fair compensation and favorable working conditions. In other words, the freedoms American workers expect and deserve. Businesses can protect their intellectual property through legally enforceable confidentiality agreements, which do not result in the same damages to the workforce."
Justin	"Please support this clause!! It helps providers find better jobs in better environments without having to travel far distances to do so!"
Jay	"Please ratify this proposed rule, it supports the livelihood of all Americans."
Jonathan	"Thank you for proposing a rule to ban non-complete clauses. I support such a ban. Most people's main asset is their labor. Non-complete agreements interfere with workers choosing where to work, suppressing wages. They can also have other deleterious effects, preventing people from moving to somewhere with better working conditions. it's time that non-compete agreements to be banned."
Jamie	"Completely unethical and un-American."
Sherin	"Please end non-compete clauses in healthcare. We already have shortages of providers. This non-compete is another barrier to this. Let providers be able to deliver quality healthcare in their communities without needing to worry about non-compete clauses."
Lindsey	"I agree that non- competes harm the economy. Thank you for trying to fight this."
Manthe	"The Non Compete Clause is causing a vet near me to limit services and is causing potential clients (requesting her service) to not have her vet services available to them due to their location being too close to her former employer. It is preventing competition where she lives and where she would like to serve animals at!"
Mike	"I strongly agree with the new proposed Non-Compete Rule. I was responsible for placing a non-compete clause for a on-site staff of eye care industry consultants to prevent them from being able to work for another company that would allow them to work from home. I am retired now and I have come to see that this was not fair to the staff for holding them back from increasing their salaries so our company did not have to pay more to keep them."
Pamela	"I feel that the NON COMPETE clause that working people are required to sign to start a job is unconscionable. This clause denies working people work! I find it hard to believe the things i read regarding this clause. Its UNAMERICAN!"

Kevin	"I support eliminating or substantially limiting noncompete agreements. Noncompete agreements can be harmful to physicians. Medical practices are increasingly owned by large hospital systems and the geographic boundary mapped out by these agreements makes it practically impossible for a physician to leave that system without completely uprooting their life or commuting long distances. This promotes physician burnout and reduces patient access to care (as physicians who may have a panel of 2,000 or more patients have to leave an area when they part with an employer). The reduced access to physicians caused by noncompete agreements is even more severe on patients who are elderly or have chronic diseases."
Nicholas	"I work at a contracting company for IT. The company has a non-compete clause that prevents me from coming on as an employee with my client. The nature of this business is to profit off of contracts that I work. This contract is designed to restrict the autonomy of the employee and make them dependent on the firm for gainful employment. My employers use of non-compete contracts is frankly despicable, and done purely in the pursuit of squeezing a much income out of their employees as possible. In my opinion, all forms of non-compete should be retroactively made illegal, with the exception of cases where corruption or fraud is a legitimate concern. No company should have as much power over their employees as my employer does. If you would like more context please research the company EnhanceIT based in Marietta, Georgia. It is likely not the only company that does this though. Please feel free to contact me for more information on this company as well."
Mayar	"I am in full support of terminating don't compete for all businesses. It's is a selfish rule that ruined many lives."
Peter	"Hello, my name is Peter Kapelke, I am an ABC certified Prosthetist Orthotist which means I have passed the American Board for Certification Exam in the disciplines of Orthotics (providing Braces for upper and lower limbs, spine, and cranium), and Prosthetics (artificial limbs for upper and lower extremities). The use of non-competes has become the norm in our industry. While I am happy with my current employer, I was forced to sit out a year of work after quitting a job for an unscrupulous employer. The expense and time spent to attain my education and experience has not been reflected in gains in salary personally or for our industry as a whole. In fact, salary levels (not even inflation adjusted!) have decreased since 1996 since I began work in the industry. This is certainly partially attributable to non-competes. In economic terms, labor is a commodity, yet my education, experience, and labor in this industry cannot be put fairly on the open market due to non-competes. A simple change of job to improve my circumstance would require I move my family far beyond our current residence. I would have to pull my children from their current schools and social relationships. I would need my wife to quit her job and find another. My ability to improve my working circumstances, whether it be pay or wasonable demands of my employer - has been distorted greatly by non-competes. The United States must allow labor to flow to employers which best serve employees - financially, morally, and personally. In our industry the idea that 'trade secrets' must be protected from company to company is a canard. We all generally do very similar things - as clinicians and technicians. Please confirm and enforce this rule to end non competes."

Christi	"I am a registered thetitian by profession. Non-compete employment agreements are fairly common in my field of work. I support the FTC's ban on non- compete clauses. Workers area very valuable asset to a company. If a company desires the best talent and is willing to pay the wages and benefits that worker is worth, they should be allowed to do that. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth."
Lawrence	"I am a board-certified surgeon. I would like to state that I strongly support the FTC proposal to ban non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements are harmful to medical care and interfere with the ability of physicians to provide care to their patients. If an employer or hospital does not provide the resources for a physician to properly care for patients, non-compete agreements prevent a physician from being able to find another hospital or employer to partner with to achieve their goal of caring for patients. Hospitals and employers are protected by non-compete agreements because they know they do not have to meet requests health care workers ask for since employees are not free to leave without penalty. This results in a lack of economic competition between employers. This issue is further compounded by the fact that health systems and employers for physicians are often completely unwilling to negotiate or change the terms of a non-compete agreement. This forces physicians to accept the terms of a non-compete even when the physician does not agree with it due to the lack of employers willing to negotiate them. This also allows employers to word the non-compete agreement to cover a very broad geographic area, often encompassing an entire geographic region within a state that may be 50 miles or greater. Patients deserve the right to keep their physician. Continuity of care is paramount to safe patient care. Non-competes force physicians to leave geographic areas even if the new employer is not in direct competition with a former employer. Furthermore, if a physician were to try to leave an employer and remain in the often sweeping non- compete radius, they are often faced with huge penalties. As a result of the sweeping geographic radius of many non-competes that physicians and other health care workers are forced to sign, health care workers are left with no recourse if an employer refuses to improve the work environment to ensure the safe and effective care for patients. This lack of economic competition between employers results in continuously deteriorating working conditions for physicians and other health care workers. Often times, this ends up hurting patient care because the deteriorating of working conditions leads to burnout and can also lead to increased incidence of patient safety events since hospitals are disincentivized from addressing concerns that workers raise. We have a crisis in health care staffing and allowing non- competes to continue to stand will perpetuate the continued spiraling of this crisis. In the end, the enforcement of non-compete agreements ends up hurting patients because it may force the physician to completely leave the community that they wish to provide care to. Furthermore, the wording of non-compete agreements makes it sound as though the physician is gaining a lot of intellectual property by working for that employer when the reality is usually the complete opposite. When a

	physician accepts a job for a health care system, they are often sharing over 15+ years of hard earned medical expertise and/or surgical skills that will allow a hospital to expand the care they are able to provide to patients. The reasoning that it is the physician gaining the advantage by taking a job with an employer is false. When there are new advancements in medicine and surgery, employers can refuse to purchase equipment and ultimately leave the physician with no way to partner with another employer to make sure patients get the true care they deserve. Surgeons are thus prevented from being able to provide state of the art care to patients if hospitals refuse to support the purchase of equipment and since almost all physicians have non-compete agreements signed, there is no way to partner with another employer to get equipment to advance the care of patients. Not only would a physician face a penalty for leaving an employer for another employer, but many employers refuse to even consider hiring a physician due to the risk of litigation if the physician has a non-compete. Again this hurts patients the most by stifling innovation. The power often rests solely with the hospitals and employers. Furthermore, if a physician or other health care worker identifies issues that affect patient care within a health system after they have already begun to work for them, hospitals or employers often have no penalty for failing to address these concerns since the employees are trapped. In the end, the employee is forced to either quit or accept that their employer will not meet their request. Ultimately, this hurts our patients the most. Hospitals and employers have far too much power and often times only make decisions if they are economically advantageous to them. Non-competes should be banned entirely and previously signed non-competes should be non-enforceable."
Bekah	"I absolutely believe banning noncompetes will allow worker the freedom to seek high paying jobs. My employer uses them keep long term employees from to competition, even though the work environment is toxic. Even though they may lose, our company forces previous to spend money on legal fees to contest. Companies typically have deeper pockets."
STEVEN	"Noncompete clauses unfairly restrict a person from seeking employment that they are qualified for when they are no longer in the employ of the company instituting the clause. This deprives the person from being compensated fairly for the value they provide - both with the company requiring the clause because they now have a monopoly on that person's services within their corporate niche and do not have incentive to pay the person a competitive wage and it does not allow the person to pursue higher paying positions in their current area of expertise where they are able to contribute maximum value and be compensated more fairly with the new employer. This amounts to a situation related to indentured servitude. While not working for no money, they are working for less than their full market value."
Mitch	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, The looming threat of possible legal action stopped me from starting my business for years and caused massive headaches. I had signed a non-compete/Non-disclosure agreement with a company that had a hand in teaching me the skills that I have today, But that company eventually became so expensive to work with that it was not possible to continue. With the non-compete, All I could do was quit and wait. Non-Compete should be banned and I fully support it. There are tobacco shops in town that have all of their employees under non competes. Everyone is stuck where they are and no one is getting paid more. Employers have less incentive to treat their employees like assets because what are they gonna do? Work for the competition? Sincerely, Mitch Keizer Grand Rapids, MI"

Veronnica	"Non competes are often forced on a new employee and allow the employer to "hold it" against the employee in turn limiting the employees choices for jobs if they choose to move on. If you have an abusive employer, it forces the employee to put up with abuse verses moving on to a job that they may like better for a less abusing employer. I have an employer that uses this against me and I love my job and I am good at it but he is extremely abusing and over-reaching in my personal life and knows that I am not likely to leave because I am passionate about the mission of my job."
Madelyn	"I completely agree that noncompete clauses are harm both workers and companies. I hope this rule is established and support the FTC fully."
Allison	"I support the FTC in banning non-competes across all industries. The increased use of non-competes stifles employee salaries and benefits. Non- competes should be banned across all sectors, including the medical field and for physicians."
Jordan	"I live in Sturgis Michigan and have worked in the fire protection industry for 12 years. Saving has not been easy but have put money aside for years hoping to achieve my goal of starting a small fire protection business. My current employer is owned by an investment group, buying all the small fire protection businesses it can get its hands on, claiming customers as their own. I was forced to sign a non compete agreement years ago for a whopping $100. Can't even fill my gas tank. I have created a promising trustworthy relationship with my community and surrounding communities as well. I'm nervous my current employer will come after me and sue me. The non compete agreement was 8-10 pages long. I only make $24 an hour trying to provide for my family... pay bills...and start a business. Sounds a little excessive to me. This non compete makes me feel like I cannot succeed. I just want to do better for my family and be able to provide. The non compete consists of a geographical area of a 50 MILE RADIUS from home and Kalamazoo office. Many locals here are in need of services due to shortages of workers in our industry. Small business owners are struggling right now fighting off our high prices. I just want to help businesses get the services that they need in a cost efficient manner."
Alicia	"I support the banning of non-compete clauses. They pose an undue burden on workers, preventing them from pursuing FMV for their work and pursuit of career advancement, only serving to benefit large corporation"
Jean	"I strongly support the elimination of these non-compete clauses. They are anti-worker, anti-business, anti-innovation, and anti-economic growth. They tend to have a disparate impact, imposing relatively greater harm on lower wage workers. Economists have found that these anti-compete clauses have played a substantive role in the dramatic decline in real wages for lesser-educated workers. Given the longterm decline in unionization rates, the persistence of non-compete clauses have just further tipped the scales against workers. We as a nation talk a lot about personal responsibility and economic freedom, yet these anti-compete clauses make "pulling oneself up by one's bootstraps" that much more difficult. They are wrong, they were always wrong, and now we are in a position to eliminate them. I strongly support this proposal to eliminate these restrictions on worker mobility."

Tina	"I am a physician. In my unfortunately broad experience, non-compete clauses in medicine allow the employer to treat physicians poorly, understaff them, increase the size of their panels, cut reimbursement and RVU compensation, mainly due to the fact that they know that most physicians will not leave to work at a 10, 15, or 20 mile radius from their home. Physicians have no collective bargaining power and although the public perception is that we are paid enough to just shut up and work, the reality is that reimbursements continue to decline while the cost of business increases and staffing shortages for ancillary staff run rampant. Non compete clauses ensure that large employers can control an entire healthcare market by restricting the ability for an actual free market to exist. This decreases the ability of patients to find alternatives for care. Please don't get me started on facility fees and other things that overall increase revenue for the larger facilities without adding a single benefit for their actual health care. The tide needs to turn. The current health care consolidation and the chokehold that these organizations hold on the necks of physicians is both anti free market and anti patient. Thank you for your consideration of rescinding this awful anti physician, provider, and patient rule that has no place in healthcare. Only free market competition will level the field and improve overall patient care by physicians who work for a fair organization that treats them well because they value them and know they must show this by treating the physician or non physician provider and their staff as though they could lose them."
James	"Non-compete agreements are awful. Most companies create a work environment based around giving your all to the company and not forming a 2nd plan or escape route. You end up working for a company for years and years without a backup and then something happens with the company, they change things, essentially force you out, and then you can't go work somewhere else with the only true skill you know how to do? How is that fair and legal? What about the worker's rights? What about the human being's rights? I'm sick of companies having more rights than people. If a company goes bankrupt they can just file for it and later down the road open up another company doing the same thing, but people who have families and dependents can't go and do the same thing they've been doing for years? How are they supposed to provide for the people who depend on them? Why do companies get protections and people suffer? It's so backwards. This needs to be addressed."
Jennifer	"I support putting a stop to Noncompete Agreements in order to support our economy and working population"
Edward Carl	"Non-compete hurts workers by keeping them from accepting a better job offer in their home area. This is only benefiting employers, what trade secrets is a Taxi Driver or Hamburger Flipper taking to the new employer, or even a Doctor starting a new clinic or going to another local Hospital?"

Jer	"Non compete clauses forced a doctor I know to leave their patient panel. It took 6 months waiting time for the patients to see them. The patients begged this doctor to not leave the area. Since the public (corporate in disguise) hospital system, owned satellite clinics and multiple hospitals across the state, the doctor had to leave their area they had lived in for 25 years, and find a job 4 hours away. Every time the doctor wanted to see family, they drove 4 hours. Some of the doctors patients were so desperate, they drove 4 hours to see this doctor. Why should a public (corporate in disguise) hospital have a non-compete? They already get a tax break in exchange of HELPING THE COMMUNITY, don't they? How is controlling the market and reducing access to healthcare deemed helping the community. Not only should non-competes "non-exist" in healthcare, hospital systems should NOT be allowed to gobble up every small private practice NOR other hospitals outside of their origin. How is it helpful for a hospital to own 1/3 of the hospitals across the state? This is called a corporation. Stop the abuse of healthcare by these greedy corporate giants."
Bryan	"Thank you for doing this and being a proactive supporter of workers. As a physician, I am subjected to a non-compete that would essentially require me to move states in order to comply. I hold no additional trade secrets and carry no patient list that would necessitate having this agreement, but it is essentially non-negotiable from my employer. I've had partners essentially work themselves to a burnout because they have no other options (it's with stay with this healthcare system or uproot your entire family for a year). It's insane and unfair."
Adam	"As a healthcare provider these non competes hurt access to care for the public. If I leave one contract I can't work within so many miles of my old employer. As an a Certified Registered Nurse Anesthetist, I am not able to provide care elsewhere where it is needed."
RaDonna	"Non-competes are about protecting company secrets, they are used as a way to attack employees for leaving or as further rejection after being fired. I have been attacked by a former employer, that had laid me off, claiming it was a legality and they could do nothing to help me when another job offer came. I have watched co-workers be attacked for making the employer look bad when they finally decided to leave a toxic environment. They were spied on to see who their next employer was and how there was possibly a connection that could be construed as a competitor. They were told by the employer "we see them as a competitor, therefore if you accept the position, we will sue." And they followed through with their threat and began a legal attack on the new employer and my previous co-worker. Now non-competes are used as a threat tactic, claiming it's protecting us. I have not seen a non-compete work as it was intended, to protect company secrets. Companies should be able to find another way to protect their secrets without threats and controlling employees. This has to stop."
Jason	"Any rule that limits an individual's ability to seek better terms of employment elsewhere hurts the worker and benefits the oligarchy. Please ban non-competes now."
Andrew	"I am a victim of a non compete clause in Michigan. I was unable to change employment as a dairy farm service technician to better my pay scale. I was only a mechanic not like I knew the secret ingredient of a recipe. I was treated like I was a criminal. I was taken to court with threats that I would be sued and have to leave my place of employment. I think that non compete agreements are very unjust and should not be used"

Jonathan	"Hi there, 40yr old tech worker from Michigan here to say YES, please ban non-compete clauses to support workers, innovation, and more efficient labor markets. Thanks!"
Andrew	"Please BAN non-compete clauses, as they are unfair to employees."
Micah	"Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. To be clear, there are nuances to this discussion and a blanket endorsement of the FTC proposal. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the

	hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Michael	"I'm an ex employee of a company that forced me to sign the non compete and at the same time was told I'd never be let go ever because of family friendship. Well it happened and the day they let me go I t lol of them I'd be staring my own and they gave m verbal permission to do so! Well I did and they as soon as they found out weeks later I got a order from their lawyer demanding I refrain from doing so...and mind me the contract the lawyer sent me was only signed by me with no witnesses... I have work to do and they are holding me back lol! I never wanted t sign it because of this and I only did because I felt I wouldn't get hired if not!!! Thanks non compete statues and I believe it should be voted out to help the true blue collar workers earn a real living within a he land of the free!"
Buffie	"Noncompete clauses not only have a negative impact on an individual's ability to obtain employment within the same line of work as they provided for an entity, but it fluffier cripples the ability of services offered some of our most vulnerable populations. Within the mental health field, those providing therapeutic services to individuals with often severe mental and emotional disabilities are unable to continue providing services to the same individuals if they seek employment with a different agency, either as an employee or contractual employee. For example, a person with a mental health diagnosis including but not limited to post traumatic stress disorder, bipolar disorder, major depressive disorder, or any other diagnosed mental health disorder receives therapeutic treatment from a professional such as a licensed social worker or counselor, and the therapist leaves the agency, the current noncompetc clause is utilized by agencies to prohibit the professional from providing continued treatment to the same individual for whatever timeframe and geographical location an agency incorporates into the noncompete clause. The courts are left with the discretion to determine if the hind-mune and geographical location are appropriate to enforce the noncompete clause. This has been expanded to even prevent professionals from providing the

	same services via telehealth if provided within the same geographic location, even if the clients are not located in that area. Thus a therapist is not only prohibited from providing services to individuals with whom they had an established relationship with simply because they have changed agencies for whom they are providing the services through, but they are not able to provide services to individuals not seen by that agency, simply because they provide the service from their home office located in the same geographic area, even if it's to a completely different population outside that area. This is a broad scope of noncompete that is unfair to the employee. Also, the relationship between a therapist and a client is one that should not be limited by a noncomplete clause given the nature of the service. If someone is able to trust a professional to the extent they are comfortable enough to share personal details that have impacted their lives and the professional chooses to provide this service through a different agency, it is unfair that the client is not able to chose for themselves if they want to seek therapeutic services with that same professional in order to continue their recovery and treatment. The boundaries and limitations of a noncompete should not limit the ability for clients choice and instead the clients should be supported in their right to seek services where and when they choose and with whom they decide (ic person centered planning). As a professional, the decision to change employment should not create undue stress on ones self given the nature of the work is to help others, but a noncomplete clause leaves them feeling as though they've harmed the client as they are no longer able to work with them and often not even permitted to notify the client of their leaving, where they are going, etc. because the agency wants to ensure the client doesn't follow the therapist to a different agency. The client is left feeling abandoned and has to start the process over with a new therapist, if they agree to even continue therapy, but many don't because of the difficulty opening up with a therapist and trusting them is in it's self a therapeutic process. However, if the noncompete clause was not legal, the client would have the ability to continue their therapy with the same therapist, just at a different location and the therapist would be permitted to allow the patient the right to make that choice by sharing where they will be working and permitted to provide services to anyone able to been seen for that services regardless if they have provided services to any individual previously with a different agency. The noncomplete clause in this setting does more harm to our vulnerable population than it does to protect any agency from losing clients. A professional should have the right to provide these sensitive, but essential services to anyone, anywhere and at any time without being limited by a noncompete clause. The reality is these professionals are not seeking to harm an agency if they chose to move to a different agency, but to provide the services where they feel most valuable and equally compensated for their work. Noncompete clauses often prevent professionals from moving to a new agency or working for themselves, where they are able to make more income and better their own lives while helping the lives of others."
John	"Restrictive covenants are tantamount to wage suppression and nothing less. As a urologist (60%of us are employed by large hospital systems) my ability to practice freely and without constraint improves patient care as well as my well being. If I left my practice I would have to take my children out of their school, move them away from their friends and established extra cunicular activities solely due to the restrictive covenant in place that is remarkably onerous. I'd have to move out of state. The restrictions benefit the large hospital systems only. Please see the foley in restrictive covenants"

Robin	"This law should be done away with. The government should not be able to tell me where I can take my animal for veterinary services. This limits the Publics choices. Wrong wrong wrong."
D	"I support this proposal wholeheartedly. I have been unable to find work in my sector (educational management) since my previous employer let me go and enforced a NC on me knowing that I needed to find employment asap. Despite trying hard to stay away from any of their clients and contacts - I happen to know the same people they do - and have had a few leads offered to me by compassionate people in this difficult job market. The company continues to hound me with cease and desist letters and threats & I don't know what else to do. We are a single income family with 3 children to feed - I feel like I have had my hands tied behind my back and am unable to use my skills yo earn an income. I have not disparaged or attempted to undermine this company at all and they are using their power to try and crush me - all because they can. This law will protect people like me - and I hope it will end this merciless attempt to destroy the lives of people, especially immigrants like me, who simply need to earn a living."
Kathryn	"This is important to pass to help support workers. Non complete clauses are often excessive and requiring a worker to move their entire family to continue working and earning a living is not reasonable."
Glen	"I am a primary care physician in a city of 80,000 people. My non-compete clause prevents me from working for another practice in the city for a period of 2 years. This impacts the residents of the region who are already feeling an acute physician shortage not to mention keeps me from practicing medicine and fulfilling my life's calling. My alternatives at this point are to uproot my family of four teenagers and wife tbr a larger urban area versus find some work outside my field of practice, such as expert testimony or medical consulting, which are both less rewarding for me personally, and less acutely required by the residents of this region."
Sheena	"I am in an industry where non-competes are very nonnal and I have been at the executive level. I feel that these are not fair and hinder good talent. Companies should not be able to control their employees from performing in their areas of specialty for a period of time simply as a way to prevent them from leaving but if you are released from that company for any reason, even position elimination you are still stuck. Companies should work hard to earn and retain their employees not through the act of control. I understand a non solicitation agreement but I do not agree with a non-compete. I just signed one that will lock me in for 6 months if for some reason this position does not work for me. I've worked for companies who have been less than ethical and as an employee you feel trapped."
David	"Forcing physicians into non competes is a practice that is unfair and illogical. Banning non-competes is the right course and there should be no exceptions. There is not a good argument for why the majority of physician specialties are even relevant to have a non-compete. It is also an anti-competitive practice by organizations to suppress a free labor market."

Rajendra	"Agree with FTC that no compete clauses suppress wages. Employers should not have the right to restrict where an individual can work or practice there profession. Non compete clauses are un-American."
Michael	"A lot of non- compete statements out there just leave the contract over a barrel- - you can't leave because you aren't allowed to use your skills in the same industry, and if they fire you, you can't find work in the same industry. It's just not fair."
Eduard	"Yes this should absolutely be done. Businesses should not have the right to tell someone they can't work in this place. Almost all of the problems they say would be caused without these could easily be solved by non disclosure agreements. I have had 2 low paying jobs make me sign non competes and while competitors would raise wages. My store refused to. And I had no choice but to stay. It is unfair to deny workers higher wages. It is a clear violation of our rights and another case that shows this country favors corporations Banning non competes would be a massive step in the right direction for giving workers a fair shot. Noones asking for workers to get 100% what we want. Of course we have to give some things too. But this Is not one of them. Do not listen to businesses and listen to the workers for once please"
paul	"I have worked on both sides of noncompete agreements. They provide no real legitimate purpose other than hurting and preventing individuals fonn earning income to support themselves or family. Currently, I work for a roofing company selling roof replacements. This work is a one time transaction, either people buy or they don't. There would be no adverse effect to my existing company if I'm working for one of the many other companies in the area that they are already competing with. Its used as cudgel against employees. In some cases where you have a repeating customer base and employee leaves and attempt to pirate your existing account base that would be a concern but can be addressed separately. The noncompetes I've seen are extremely burdensome and clearly unfair to an individuals rights to earn a living. The real problem is that companies use them as vendetta's and threats against employees out of spite. I've seen them used as weapons to intimidate employees. companies holding back leads and work thats paid on a commission basis so the employee is forced to quit. Therefor being forced to find employment outside of hisler area of expertise. Finally, these noncompetes are almost never uniformly enforced by employers they pick and chose there victims."
Daniel	"As a primary care physician rooted within a certain geographic location to see patients, I can say non-competes are bad for communities trying to attract primary care physicians. They are also bad for patients and patient care. I have seen many patients who have been forced to change doctors because they were forced out of their community. Primary care is about continuity and long term relationship. Hospital systems don't make large profits off of primary care and physicians should be allowed to operate outside of hospital fiefdoms to continue to see their patients. There's no shortage of patients needing primary care, and if a community ever had a "surplus" of primary care physicians they would likely be a healthier community. I'm happy with my current position as an employee physician, however I have often seen scenarios of hospital systems taking advantage of physicians out of greed knowing that the physician is disincentivized to leave out of a care for his patients and non compete clause that would force him to uproot his family in order to continue practicing. Most new primary care doctors are burdened down with debt and are starting young families. They want to lay down roots in a community. However non competes contribute to burnout and primary care doctors leaving communities and leaving their patients to be without care. Non competes in medicine are bad for everyone except the hospitals' bottom line. The hospital lobby will claim is that it has patient interests at heart, but this is a fallacy. I implore you to ban non compete clauses."

Kathy	"Right now, noncompete agreements are being unethically used across the country to prevent workers from quitting their jobs for a better offer. Competition drives markets — and when noncompetes eliminate competition in the labor market, employers don't have an incentive to give their walkers better pay, working conditions, or benefits. One in five American workers have signed noncompete agreements — and it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly bound to their jobs by noncompetes. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompetes to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompetes would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people."
Susan	"This is the best rule Pve seen for workers in a long time. Too many employers have workers sign non-compete clauses to lock them into their jobs by prohibiting them from using their experience to obtain higher paying positions in the same industry. Most of these jobs are not high level professionals, they encompass workers at fast food restaurants, service industries and more. The only ones who benefit are employers who use these agreements to keep wages low and employees from leaving for better opportunities and benefits."
Nicholas	"I've been working for a computer company for almost six years, my employer has kept me from taking multiple jobs because of a noncompete clause. These jobs offer similar pay as what I make now, however they offer significantly better benefits. When I started working for my current employer I was single with no family, today I am married with two children and I am unable to adequately provide for them with my current pay rate and health care benefits that are offered. I have multiple certifications within my field and a Bachelors Degree in computer science. I received no assistance from my employer to acquire any of those. Yet I am unable to accept a better position within my field because of the noncompete."
Anna	"I support the abolition of the use of Non-Compete clauses for employees wholeheartedly! Non-Compete clauses give employers power and authority to dictate the most important aspect of your life (earning a living) even after your employment with them has ended. No employer should be able to drive me from the community where I was raised, where my extended family resides and where I own a home, so that my skills and talents as an employee can't be utilized by their "competition". It goes against basic human rights, free enterprise, and it is simply not ethical. As a medical professional and a human, I fully support a complete ban on any and all non-compete clauses for employees of all types! Thank you!"

David	"They should be done away with. I worked for a company that had a position just to find ex employees who may be breaking their non-compete. You should have kept your employees happy then they would not have left"
Elizabeth	"As a Michigan consumer, non-compete clauses limit my access to innovative, competitive business. As it stands now, should talented individuals choose to break off from established organizations with restrictive non-competes, they are often limited in their ability to join alternative institutions, but even more severely dissuaded from venturing into business on their own for fear of legal and/or financial retribution. Thus, non-compete clauses are a direct affront to the free-market, stunting commerce and squashing innovation. It is outrageous that a powerful business aimed with a non-compete can essentially establish a monopoly in a community. This is at the expense of consumers certainly, but moreover, non-competes hold employees hostage vulnerable to poor working conditions, inferior pay, professional stagnation, etc. Cultivating a culture of fear and restriction, bolstered by the safety of a non-compete, a powerhouse business is no longer held to a truly competitive standard. This leaves all involved — employees and customers alike — with fewer quality alternatives and arguably less quality overall. Healthy market competition is touted as a cornerstone of the American economy. Let's prove this is so by banning non-competes and allowing the best to rise to the forefront instead of blindly bolstering those who were simply there first."
alexander	"I am a veterinarian who is in support of banning non compete clauses as they exist only to benefit the employer. These rules are anticompetitive, stifle innovation and economic competition. They often result in employees staying with an employer in a job that they are unhappy with. Many employers have non compete clauses which extend to in such a large geographical area that veterinarians can no longer practice medicine in the same city. The arguments for maintaining non compete clauses generally boil down to the desire to not take away the client base from a particular practice. Non solicitation agreements and medical record protection laws are sufficient to assuage these concerns without limiting an employee's workforce mobility."
Liselle	"Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. It is impossible to move on in your field if you are blocked from looking for work or going back to work because of a non-compete clause."
Eric	"Support removal of non-compete clauses from physicians especially pediatricians at Tenet owned Children's Hospital of Michigan in Detroit, MI where we were told we would be sued for breaking away from University Pediatricians practice plan if we stayed with Wayne State University. Then, we stayed with WSU but UP never sued us BUT nearly 100 physicians were scared of being sued so they all stayed. Time to fly my brethren!"
Christie	"I support a ban on non-compete clauses because non-competes slow down innovation, disrupt the relationship between doctor and patient, and remove doctors from the workforce (in a time where we are already short-staffed). Banning non-competes is a good thing for patient care."

Sarah	"This ban is necessary. Employers hold non competes over employees heads to underpay them. If these employers would just pay their employees fair wages these would be a non concern. Especially for anyone in sales."
Lawrence	"I have been in a service industry for over 35 years. Every company I have worked for has had a non compete of 12 to 18 months. Time spent with each company has ranged from 1 year to 20. Many of these changes were the result of my competency and reputation in the industry (come work for me) While with them I watched them claim to pursue non compete compliance against others, for taking clients as they left. The basic understanding was I could not directly contact former clients. However every company I had joined wanted prior customer lists, so that their sales department could pursue the client. Many the clients these firms already knew of, just had not been able secure contracts with them. In 2022 I was released after almost 10 years with the company, no write ups in my personnel file. The terminating statement made was "they did not feel I was grasping the current program". Because I own my home, and my wife has longevity with her company, I have been forced to change industries. This change has reduced my compensation by over $15,000. With my 35 years of experience, I would have loved to start my own business. I understand some of the reasons for the non compete. But have several thoughts related to them. 1) I believe it should not be a one side agreement. They terminate justified or not, the contract should be voided. 2) The Customer / Client should be able pursue the vendor or service specialist they are comfortable with. If the employing service providing company cannot meet the customer needs, that customer / client will likely find another provider when the contract ends. If the employee is so critical the company business, the employer should be better engaged in employee retention. Creating a better work environment or compensation package so that the employee has no desire to leave, or be lured away. 3) Customers / Clients do not change vendors / service providers without cause, There are to many corporate processes required to justify a contact terminate to simply change vendors I agree with eliminating or modifying non compete agreement, restricted convents, etc..."
Erica	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can

	help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter."
Anne	"I am a veterinarian. When I was in my final year of vet school and looking for jobs I was offered a job that was excellent except for the non-compete clause. It was a great practice in an underserved area with only a few practices. The non-compete clause was 50 miles for 5 years. The practice was located in a rural area. The non-compete clause would prevent me from working anywhere in that region if I left the practice. I was not comfortable moving to a new location and new practice with this contract term in place. I ultimately did not take the job because of my concerns with the non-compete clause. I know other classmates that took jobs with these kinds of terms and have suffered great hardship either with having to move or drive long distances to be able to work or incur significant legal fees. There are not enough veterinarians to serve the public and non-compete clauses make it harder for us to leave practices and stay in underserved areas."
Melanie	"I highly support this proposal. As a practicing physician i can attest that non-competes have contributed in part to the burnout problem in physicians. By forcing them to chose between sustainable work and family geographic obligations this leads to emotional distress and even leaving the workforce."
Andrew	"Non-competes give organizations an unfair advantage over labor. These agreements are often forced as terms of employment, taking advantage of a person seeking new opportunities. This needs to be stopped to give working people fair opportunity!"
Nick	"Non- compete clauses stifle income growth and innovation and should be banned."
Ed	"I support removal of non-compete clauses, including those for physicians. As a now retired physician and physician leader, I was subject to a non- compete clause in both my clinical and leadership roles. The non-compete was quite extensive given the footprint of the organization. It essentially required me to leave my community and most of the State. The leadership non-compete was tied to severance. However the severance was only for one year and the non-compete was for two. The clinical non-compete did not exist when I started with this company in late 2014. In late 2020, in the middle of the pandemic the leaders of the organization determined that non-competes for physicians were what would be needed for the organization to preserve our employment and keep us whole. During this stressful time, when the opportunity to look elsewhere was challenging, the minimally veiled threat that job security was tied to a non-compete, resulted in very little push back. Almost everyone signed them. I retired before the end of the pandemic so I am not aware of what happened to those who didn't. It should be noted that in my leadership tenure we had many more physicians join us than leave. This included those who worked out their non-competes from other local organizations in other communities and then returned to us. We retained most of our employed physicians WITHOUT non-competes. Those who left did so because they didn't want to be employed by larger systems. They remained in the community and provided high quality medical care. When they needed hospital care, these physicians used the system in which they were formerly employed. Good for patient care. Good for the community. Good for the system. Again, NO non-compete. The way to retain those you want is to treat them with respect, compensate fairly, and make working with you the best choice for them. Forced engagement with non-competes, while penny wise in the short run is pound foolish in the long term."

David	"I have two thoughts on the non compete. When I was a device rep, there was a non compete I had to sign. This kept me from jumping to another company and potentially taking my customers with. In my 25 years as a rep, Whenever someone jumped to another company, it was rare that they took many of their existing customers. What this rule effectively did was allow the group I was contracted with to underpay me for my services. I have since moved on to be a Certified Nurse Anesthetists, working at a Critical Access Hospital in rural northern Michigan. We are expanding our surgical services and are in need of an increased number of CRNA's. I know of at least two CRNA's from another hospital that we are not allowed to approach, even though they have since left their prospective practices. As an OR based anesthesia provider, they will not be stealing any proprietary information, or taking patients from their previous employer as patients do not travel from one hospital to the next based on the anesthesia provider, but based on the surgeon performing the procedure. For rural Critical Access Hospitals, this makes it very difficult to provide safe anesthesia without the proper amount of personnel."
Larry	"Non-compete clauses continue to place downward pressure on competition and wages for workers. They should not exist as this only benefits an employer and can banns employees forcing them to uproot their entire lives to comply with them."
Chris	"Non-compete clauses in employment contracts area detrimental practice that should be banned. These clauses restrict the mobility and earning potential of workers, often leading to lost wages and reduced earning power. First, non-compete clauses disproportionately harm low-wage workers and limit their ability to secure higher-paying jobs. For example, a fast food worker may be restricted from working at a similar restaurant for a year after leaving their current job, even if they are only making minimum wage. This puts them at a significant disadvantage when trying to find new employment and limits their ability to improve their financial situation. Second, non-compete clauses are also often used to prevent highly-credentialed professionals, such as doctors, from moving to new employers or starting their own practices. This stifles competition and innovation in these fields, as well as limiting the options available to patients in need of medical care. Third, non-compete clauses can also be misused by employers to prevent workers from leaving for a better opportunity. This can lead to an overall reduction in worker bargaining power, resulting in lower wages and fewer benefits for all workers. A total and retroactive ban on non-compete clauses is necessary to protect the rights and earning potential of all workers. This ban should apply to all workers, regardless of their level of education or job type, and should be retroactive to cover all current and past employment contracts. This will give workers the freedom to seek better opportunities and improve their financial situation, leading to a more fair and equitable economy for all. In addition to the negative effects on individual workers and specific industries, non-compete clauses are also a symbol of the shift

	in power that has occurred in recent decades between workers and employers. Over the last —50 years, the balance of power between workers and employers has shifted dramatically in favor of employers and corporations. This has led to an unacceptable status quo where workers are at a significant disadvantage when it comes to negotiating wages, benefits, and job security. Non-compete clauses are just one example of the ways in which employers and corporations use their power to limit the mobility and earning potential of workers. This shift in power has led to a decline in worker bargaining power, resulting in stagnant wages and fewer benefits for workers. This not only harms individual workers and their families, but it also has a negative impact on the national economy. When workers have less money to spend, businesses suffer and economic growth is stifled. Additionally, when employers have too much power, they are able to maintain higher profits at the expense of workers, which contributes to income inequality and undermine the overall economy. In order to address this power imbalance and create a fair and equitable economy for all, there needs to be a concerted effort to strengthen worker protections and level the playing field between workers and employers. A total and retroactive ban on non-compete clauses is a step in the right direction, but it is just one of many necessary actions that must be taken to restore balance between the interests of workers and employers."
Chet	"As a practicing physician, given the employer-employee model of medical practice these days, I strongly support the invalidation of non compete clauses, especially as I do not construe anything that would exempt physicians and physicians in training from its protections"
Michael	"Employers I've known who force workers to sign non-competes have been scumbags, so for that reason alone I oppose non-competes. If we must have capitalism then the workers should at least be tossed this bone."
Summer	"I am writing in support of the proposed rule banning Non-Compete Clauses. Non-Compete clauses are utilized today in a widespread manner, and they often cover lower level employees who are forced to work in different industries or risk being faced with litigation that may have resulted in the non- compete being found illegal, which they do not even have the opportunity to find out because of the high costs of litigation. Employees cannot defend themselves against corporations who have general counsels the side of a small business with millions of dollars to litigate every manner presented to them. People are forced to accept the conditions of employment presented to them, which are often unfair and extremely harmful to people, their careers and livelihood. I believe the overuse of Non-Compete clauses in employment handbooks and agreements are extremely detrimental to employees, especially when many of them prevent employees from working in the very industry that they have been trained and have knowledge in. These employees to note pose a risk of competition to their former employees, it is away to intimidate and threaten employees into submission. I strongly urge that the FTC publish a final rule preventing the use of employee non-competes as soon as possible because this is an urgent issue."
Lisa	"Thanks you for trying to stop non-competes. These contracts limit my ability to provide healthcare/anesthesia services in my metro-Detroit home location. One company's contract had a 50 mile radius no-compete from any of their contracted facilities for 2 years. That would have banned me from working in almost all of lower Michigan. I would therefore be unemployed. The healthcare field does not have any "company trade secrets." How we care tin patients is universal ie. same medications, surgeries, procedures, etc... at all facilities."

Lisa	"I am for the non-compete clause rule. I am in independent contracting CRNA (certified registered nurse anesthetists.) Administration of anesthesia has no trade secrets. Anesthesiologists & CRNAs both do it the same way. Healthcare professionals are in demand & the shortage is real - everywhere Limiting where a person can work contributes to the shortage & impairs access to care. However, a no solicitation clause is different."
Syed	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. This rule/policy must be permanently banned. I am an expert in my field, with 30+ years of experience. But when I joined one of the company, on the day 1- they asked me to sign a `non compete" document, which prevented me to have another job in my field for a period after leaving the company. I had no choice but to sign the document. I already resigned from my previous company. On the day one, either I sign the document or I become unemployed. The company never disclosed that I have to sign a non compete clause during the processes of "multiple" interviews. It was presented to me on the day one when I joined the company. I had to find something else before getting back to my field."
Babu	"Non compete laws should be removed. They are preventing a physician to earn a living and preventing access to care for patients. It's morally wrong. It's a blatant misuse of our by hospital corporations."
Vera	"Noncompete clauses in healthcare are bad for both physicians and patients they essentially penalize physicians from voting with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems. They either have to be complacent to a system that places profits above patients or they have to risk unemployment/lack of job prospects in the very community where they've dedicated their time to. Obviously this is to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families."
Beshoy	"End non-competes"
Audrey	"Non-compete classes break up families."
Bradley	"Mom competes about absolutely be banned. I work in anesthesia, and if I wanted to leave my job, I would have to physically move my family to avoid the restrictions set forth in my contract. I can't take business away from my employer, so the idea that I would be "competing" with them should I leave is nonsensical."

Mohannad	"Do it"
Sarah	"Having recently started a consulting company in which I am providing statistical and data analysis advice to a number of different companies, I strongly support eliminating non-compete clauses. I have found companies wish to constrain even consultants where there is a minimal relationship on a per- contract basis using non-compete agreements just because it is standard in their state's hiring practice. This harms the ability of consultants like myself to have a full complement of clients and also harms companies looking for specialty expertise on a per-contract basis. However, I do believe that non- disclosure agreements remain important to maintain trust between consultants and clients that their proprietary information will not be shared with other clients. While I think non-compete agreements should be eliminated, I would prefer to see appropriate non-disclosure agreements continue to be enforceable."
Jonathan	"I am a private practice orthopedic surgeon in Michigan. I recently quit my job due to the poor decision making patterns of my prior employer. I signed a 10 mile noncompete that my prior employer enforced. The noncompete effectively blocks me from working in the practice of my choice and serving the people of my city that I seek to serve. I talked with a lawyer that informed me that my best way forward is to not fight the noncompete. But a ruling blocking all noncompete clauses could change everything. I would be able to work where I want and help the people that need me in my community. Therefore, I enthusiastically recommend this rule be voted into effect. My opinion is that employers need to be incentivized to value their employees so that they don't want to leave in the first place. Removing the noncompete effectively provides a proper incentive."
Kevin	"This should not even be a question. Non-compete clauses penalize workers by denying them the opportunity to change jobs and practice their skills and knowledge. It verges on a form of slavery."
Mary	"One in five Americans have been forced to sign noncompete agreements at the time they were hired, leaving these workers with lower wages and worse benefits. It's clear as day that noncompete agreements are bad for workers. Stop these attacks on workers for the greed of companies."
Mary	"This policy would raise wages and increase opportunities for workers. This policy needs to end!"
Janet	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am a consumer who has been affected by Non-Compete Clause in the major and minor ways. I believe that Non-Complete Clause is an unfair way to keep employers in control, lessen the control workers have on their own careers, and negatively impact clients. My doctor left the area due to a non-compete clause. I was not able to find another doctor with her compassion and specific skills. Yes, I found another doctor, but did not receive care commensurate with what she had provided me. Hairdressers are not as important to me as doctors. However, their employment is vital to them. Having a hairdresser move her place of employment far from my neighborhood does affect me, and affects her and her family. There is no valid reason for employers have this heavy handed control. Janet Osborn"

David	"This is outstanding. Thank you for doing this for our people and country. Corporations have too much power and no agency or party seems willing or able to address it. Very happy to see this proposal."
Paul	"From a healthcare perspective, the benefit that every American would see in improved care is so great it is difficult to put into words."
Paige	"This is excellent! As an employed physician x 2 different employers, I speak from experience. This idea that a physician has to uproot their life and move abandoning patients — because they changed employment is devastating for the doctor and the patients. Patients are not owned by any health system or business, they can seek care with whomever they chose. Forcing doctors to move miles away and transition to a different hospital, is devastating for all involved. Non-competition clauses force physicians to stay in unfair work environments with unfair pay because the cost to move is overwhelming."
Kartik	"Non compete are detrimental, especially in the healthcare field. We don't have the freedom to change jobs without uprooting our families, lives, and friends. Creates havoc for families and children, especially when they have to leave friends. It gives the employer and hospitals the upper hand in terms of negotiations and unfair treatment This clause also needs to include non-profit organizations because it should be any different when their CEOs are paid millions. Coming from a hospital employed physician."
Anne	"I am a hairstylist. My non compete agreement was almost a career killer. My old employer came after me with lawyers and bullying tactic. It was a horrible year for me and my family. I gave her 17 years of employment. And when I wanted to better my life all I got from her was a threatened lawsuit. Non competes effect so many commission based hair stylists. And the fear of breaking them keeps these poor people in bad work environments all the time. Do away with non competes!"
Stephanie	"Non-compete clauses negatively affect any field where they are implemented. Their only purpose is to take agency away from employees and their ability to move jobs for better pay, work/life balance, or opportunities. I personally am an emergency Veterinarian who is impacted by a non-compete clause. Corporate veterinary clinics have rigid contracts that an employee signing on has little to no say in what can be changed and the veterinarian is taken advantage of being a single person against a team of lawyers. It negatively impacts an already struggling profession. There are not enough veterinarians to patients in the United States and every veterinarian that leaves the field puts more strain on the ones who stay. Many veterinarians I know would rather quit the field entirely than continue in the confines of a non-compete from a job they are likely wanting to leave due to terrible work hours and work life balance. There is a high rate of suicide in my field. Partially because veterinarians fee trapped in jobs that do not align with their skills or desires and their inability to go across the street to a slightly different model of practice where they could be working in a place that aligns more with their ideals. I personally believe that the ban of non-compete

	clauses would positively impact the veterinary field and we would lose fewer doctors. It would positively impact doctors influence on their own lives, help with mental health and overall lead to better work environments that ultimately lead to better patient care for our pets."
Ben	"I am an Interventional Radiologist in Michigan. I currently am employed by a very large radiology group, the third largest in the nation. Over the past few years, our group has expanded and merged with numerous other groups in Michigan and now service 85 different sites. It goes without saying that our footprint is very large in Michigan. Our contract included a 3 year non-compete clause stating we can not work within 15 miles of any site serviced by our group. My current position has me located at one site in the middle of the state and I do not travel to any other site. With the size of our practice and the wide spread coverage throughout the state, I would likely have to move to a different state in order to change jobs. Obviously, this is undesirable for a family to be uprooted because I wanted to change jobs even in a sizeable state with many opportunities which are not possible given the non-compete clause in my contract with the third largest group in the country who services a very wide geographic area throughout the state of Michigan. I urge you to ban non-compete clauses in contracts. I believe ultimately this will greatly improve care through increased job satisfaction because physicians will be able to work where they want and for who they want and they will not be stuck at in a position in which they are unhappy or being forced to relocate. Thank you for your consideration."
Devin	"A company should not be able to fire you at whim, and then hold you hostage when you have separated to work in the area of expertise. People. Are. Not. Property. You should not be able to dictate the livelihood of an individual if they choose to leave or were forced to leave."
Rodger	"A non-compete cannot be ethically justified if an employer lacks legitimate business interest for it. Non-competes were originally created to protect trade secrets and other confidential information. While they remain prevalent for well-paid and highly educated workers, these agreements are increasingly more common even in underpaid industries, irrespective of job duties or access to confidential information. This original purpose is rarely present now and particularly in the case of hospital employment where trade secrets needing protections are very rare. In the medical community non-competes are employed to limit the ability of physicians to move freely even when all other indicators may suggest the alternative is better for both the Physician and the community. This variety of non-compete is often used offensively by the hospital against physicians doing business in any way that may be construed as competitive. The medical industry is marked with wide sharing of process improvement and best practices. Taken together these two facts result only in an unfair protective advantage to the hospital as compared to the physician who may have better avenues for self and or the community than they experience in continued hospital employment. For businesses, these restrictions block competitors from entering and expanding their businesses. Physicians often find hospital employment necessary at the beginning of their career for financial reasons after graduation and or to establish skills and reputation but they then find themselves prevented from taking advantage of improved circumstances and innovative ideas and business skills elsewhere for their own or community benefit. There is a range of studies suggesting that, in

	industries where enforceable non-compete agreements are used en masse, the whole labor market is slower moving, there are fewer job offers made, job mobility is lower and job satisfaction is lower. In general, noncompete contracts block workers from freely switching jobs, depriving them of higher wages, better benefits and working conditions, and depriving other similar businesses of a talent pool that they need to build and expand. By ending this practice, the FTC's proposed rule would promote greater dynamism, innovation, and healthy competition. Noncompete restrictions harm both workers and competing businesses. The legality of non-compete agreements of course differs from state to state. In most states, noncompete clauses are allowed so long as the scope of the restrictions are reasonable. Reasonable covenants not to compete are permitted in Wisconsin on freedom of contract grounds so long as consideration is exchanged. This may be why so many States have already banned non-competes. In California, North Dakota, the District of Columbia, and Oklahoma, non-competes are either entirely or largely unenforceable as against public policy. Other states, including Maine, Maryland, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Washington, have banned non-compete agreements for low-wage workers."
Kimberly	"We are from a small town with very little options. Our current non-compete covers such any area I cannot remain a part of my community to practice if I left my current employer. They use this as leverage against us to not negotiate fair contracts. The only ones who benefit from a non compete are corporations. It has nothing to do with good patient care."
Chris	"I urge you to consider banning Non-Compete Clauses, especially for anesthesia providers for a variety of reasons. I signed a non-compete as a new grad not really understanding the ramifications as a 26yo grad student. I spent 17 years with the company and they changed many things over the years without our ability to negotiate in response, yet I couldn't leave because of the non-compete. As a nurse anesthetist I do not have proprietary company knowledge, I do not have exclusive clients, nor would my leaving lead to a loss of business as they have the contracts with the hospitals. However, the Non-compete has caused wage-stagnation which has kept them in the lowest quarter of the region, allowed them to enact staffing changes (longer hours) without any means to object, and a loss of new recruits to make the working conditions easier. My non-compete has since expired but I asked to leave and work 43 miles away (non compete was 60mi) at a location two other former employees were allowed to go to. I was denied because I was deemed too valuable to them. So I took a position 62 miles away and have driven that far daily since I left in 2020 as other positions inside that area are now filled. My non compete lasted 24 months and was excessive in both duration and scope because my leaving would not hurt them directly. Since I left I know 16 providers have left in the past 12 months alone. ALL of them driving more that 60 miles and leaving my community short of essential highly trained nurse anesthetists. This impacts healthcare for me, my family, and my community as they continue to make new hires sign this restrictive covenant and have not hired anyone in the past 8 months. Please end these ridiculous clauses and open up the labor market to competition to allow the best work place to recruit and retain talent. I do support clauses for protecting client lists or proprietary company information as that is intellectual theft if used against a former employer for gain at a new employer."

Mary	"I have been impacted by non-compete clauses for most of my career. I'm in tech and they are very common in my industry. I invested heavily in my education to prepare for a career in tech. I have build a base of experience that many companies would value. My education, but mostly my experience are what make me marketable and enable me to earn an income. Non-compete clauses have been so detrimental to my ability to seaarch out better opportunities, higher pay, and better working conditions. At one point I had a non-compete agreement that was so detailed and air-tight that when I was layed off I was still not able to work in my industry for 1 year. Because changing industries is so difficult, I didn't work and had no income for 1 year. I have often wondered how these agreements can be legal since I've had no choice but to sign them (if I want to work). If I did not have to sign them I would have more MUCH more career mobility, I would be earning a higher income today, and there would be better working conditions and more innovation, in general, in my industry. I have considered fighting the non-compete agreements that I signed in court. I had a situation where I was offered a job that I wanted to accept but my non-compete prevented me from accepting. The company offering me the job was not a direct competitor of the company I was currently at, but the agreement I had to sign was so broad that my attorney felt strongly that I would lose in court if my current employer wanted to sue."

Ramin	"Physicians took an oath to put patients first, they also have a fiduciary responsibility to their patients. The corporate practice of medicine is illegal in most states. Noncompete agreements are in direct conflict with the ethical practice of Medicine because they put Physician's at risk of being strong, aimed into practicing unethical medicine, and into putting their employers over their patients. Physician should have a right to work and move freely just like every other person. Physicians are the value creators. There's no intellectual property or business value that is created by health system employers -they bring patients and doctors together, they are compensated, handsomely for that service, and they should have no further influence or jurisdiction over the practice of medicine."
John	"Non compete clauses are used to trap physicians in jobs removing their agency in decisions about relocating that may be based on any number of things included unhealthy working environments, burn out, limitations on practice, and family concerns. It is my fervent hope that these clauses are banned. They have unreasonable outcomes on employed physicians abilities to pursue happiness in their work. Furthermore, unreasonable non compete clauses deter physicians from practicing in areas they may be needed because many of my colleagues will not sign a contract based on the nature of a non compete. Removing these clauses will provide more latitude in physician choices related to their career and practice location. Furthermore it may have the pleasing side effect of encouraging physicians to practice in locations where they are most needed."
Gagu	"I was stuck on a former job with a non-compete agreement. This sort of agreement, should only be applicable to jobs that at lower level. At this level, these agreements serves the employer by keeping wages suppressed. Kudos to FTC proposal to ban these sort of agreement Thanks"
Stephen	"Slavery was outlawed in the United States, yet we still allow non-compete agreements, which enable a modern form of employment servitude. I fully support the proposed rule and applaud those responsible for advancing it as a new rule."
Chris	"I am in favor of this rule. Non-compete clauses as now used by employers serve no purpose but to limit the rights and power of those employees under them. Please take the necessary steps to provide a more level playing field. The employer/employee relationship should be mutually beneficial, not tilted in favor and power always toward the employer."
Steve	"Please Stop the Non Compete... I am 62 years old and only had 2 jobs for the past 40 years of my employment. I would like to take a job in my same industry but I have a non compete. I want to leave because of bad leadership but I am stuck. I only have a few years left for me to provide for my family and cant move"
Beeravolu	"I am opposed to No compete clause by corporate hospitals and practices. It defeats the purpose of free and fair competition and tramples on the freedom of practicing medicine"
Naomi	"I think it's a great idea to ban non competes. An employer shouldn't be able tell a worker what they are allowed with their time after they no longer work for them Non-competes also takes away bargaining power from employees. If an a person works in a more niche job they can greatly limit their job options. There should be no exception for ANY profession. The rule should be amended to include independent contractors and should still keep professionals and exempt employees because they deserve the same rights as everyone else"

Robert	"Just about every physician who has ever signed an employment contract has been affected by a non-compete clause. They are wrong and affects patient care negatively. Right now there is an issue that relates non-competes in Grand Rapids Michigan between Trinity Health and Orthopedic Associates of Michigan. This is affecting our ability to cover orthopedic patients in our ER and affects my ability to get my patients needed orthopedic care. This proposed rule cannot come soon enough."
Rayna	"Noncompetes have prevented me from leaving toxic work environments and seeking employment elsewhere. You don't really ever have an option to decline signing. It's predatory, and needs to be done away with."
Eric	"I fully support and look forward to this non-compete rule taking effect. Thank you. The healthcare industry in particular is filled with non-complete clauses that allow hospitals and clinics to underpay their workers or fester toxic or unsafe working conditions, holding their workers hostage with fear of their non- compete clauses. It is unacceptable from a mental health and work-life balance perspective for the doctors, nurses, and other workers. Please do not acquiesce to any healthcare industry lobbying and make sure that non-competes are banned for doctors and nurses, including veterinarians. It is about time the employers in that industry have to compete for talent on a level playing field. I understand that the proposed rule's scope is only to ban non-compete clauses, and does not speak to non-client-solicitation or non-disparagement clauses. A doctor does not necessarily have the right to poach a previous employer's patients. That being said, a doctor should have the right to advertise their new/current place of business and allow patient transfers if they happen to find the doctor's new location outside of any direct solicitation. I would request that the FTC clarify that when an employee leaves an employer, they are allowed to advertise their new work location, but not necessarily directly solicit previous customers/patients. To forbid advertising your new work location would effectively still be a non-compete clause. For example, you should be allowed to list on a business's website that you work there, and your previous employer should not be able to prohibit that. Similarly for online professional directories like Lirikedin or other professional memberships/associations, a previous employer should not be able to prohibit you from listing your new employer. For example, if a veterinarian moves from one clinic to another due to poor working conditions, they should be allowed to list on the new clinic's website that they work there, as well as list with the American Veterinary Medical Association or other professional directories."
Shelby	"It is unfair for employers to impose non competes on employees. Young professionals are being negatively impacted by these rules. I am for the ban on this policy. Please consider this highly."
Robert	"I personally have been impacted by this recently. I accepted a promotional position at a competitor of my previous employer. My new employer read my non compete and put in place processes so that I would not violate my non compete. My old employer ended up suing my new company and my new company didn't want to take on all the legal fees associated with "winning" in court and allowing me to continue working for them. So they ended up letting me go because of this. Now I am unemployed and starting from scratch. Non competes need to be removed and replaced with common sense regulation. There was no conflict between my old role and new role at the competitor and it ended up being that my old employer had deeper pockets than I am now unemployed."

Kari	"In any profession, a person should always have the right to seek employment elsewhere. I cannot think of any situation where a physician should not be able to leave their employer and be free to work in another establishment. As a patient, I want to know that the doctor I'm seeking medical attention from is happy in their profession. I'd say being forced to work somewhere or else, would cause subpar care."
Thomas	"Non-competes stop us from getting jobs when we get laid off. This needs to stop because we need to feed our families!"
Deborah	"This is vital for a number of reasons, in my view. They endanger workers. It removes any avenue to defend your right not to be abused by a Corp. or it's poor management. Why let wrongs be committed on the American workers in the name of greed, dishonesty & power imbalance. The greedy get greedier & the rest of us suffer. No more hiding!"
Jordan	"While I do not work for a business that has a non-compete clause, I understand the effect they can have on an individual's life. I can see that they cause harm not only to those seeking new employment after they leave a company, but to the local economy by stifling potential competition. I am in favor of the proposed rule by the FTC."
Seely	"Please ban non competes as they hurt so many veterinarians every year!"
Myles	"I am currently a sub-contractor with a non-compete clause. My options are to quit my profession or uproot my family and move to the other side of the state if I want out. I'm locked in with no way out, and can be terminated without cause at any time, but the non-compete still applies. I'm literally being forced to work for them or risk losing everything."
Sonam	"I am against non compete. It would be great if this rule is passed as it's currently harming employees as they are not able to get the market average salary, treated unfairly all in the name of non compete. Employers know that the employee is unable to resign to take a better position elsewhere and in the long run it hinders growth. Without it there will be a true exchange of salary and growth per any one person's qualifications and expertise."
steve	"from reddit and I agreed with the below statement. "Non-compete clauses should not exist. When threatened with regulation corporations claim they stifle the free market and unfairly restrict business. What are non-compete clauses but a restriction on the market of labor? Make them illegal and restore a tiny bit of the power back to workers.""

Scott	"Intellectual property is protected in US law in many, more-than-adequate ways. Non-compete clauses are a tool to suppress economic mobility of the workers. Regulating the ability of a corporation to exercise extra-market controls over its workers will improve the economic growth and stability of the workforce, putting money back in their pockets to then circulate for homes, cars, consumer goods, vacations, rather than lining the vaults of the uber- wealthy, stagnating our economic growth as a country."
Richard	"I am 100% behind removing non-compete clauses. Even though I'm not under one, I believe an employee should have the freedom to move about if another company offers better conditions, wages, benefits. I'm using the term freedom since we are a free country, and no business should ever be granted the right to restrict a citizen's civil rights. What I've seen over the years is companies that have these clauses tend to be lower paying. Now some of the higher end wage earners also fall under this, it should still be outlawed as it restricts the employees ability to move up. I know a few radio personalities that were let go from iHeart radio during the big purge they had. Those employees were barred from going to another radio station until the non-compete clause period ended. How does that help someone who was in radio for 20+ years if they have to wait months or years? Another example is tv news personalities. A local tv meteorologist decided to leave a local station due to pay, and the availability of the chief meteorologist position at a competitor station which had better pay and benefits. That said meteorologist was forced to stay off air for 1 year in any local market competitors. She ended up going to Chicago taking the same position offered in Lansing, MI due to not being able to be on air. Even some trucking companies are trying to add these in (that is my field), or else they'll black list you on or psp claiming you abandoned a load. It's time businesses have to compete with each other, and raise pay, benefits and working conditions to stay competitive. If a company cannot compete then they should fail if no one wants to work for them. We the people deserve to be free to choose whom and where we work, and no company should ever be given the upper hand with a decision that belongs to us."
Garrett	"I endorse this idea. I have found it stressful and non-competitive for companies to give non competes. The current situation of stopping employees from being able to seek any employment is a restriction of financial freedom and personal well being"
Carol	"People must be able to go on to a better paying job without threats from their former employer. It is absurd that individuals cannot improve their living/job situation without harassment from a former employer."
Cody	"Hello! I want to voice my support of removing the non-compete clause. I am personally working in the mortgage industry where wages and opportunity vary drastically depending on the lender or company you work for. The pressure should be on the company to keep and retain good employees not trap them. Removing this barrier would create more innovation across all industries, new opportunities in local neighborhoods with small businesses, and overall a win for everyone but the "big business" Owner. If maintaining your employees is a problem, the business should focus on getting better not attacking those who leave. I would love to create a small brokerage in a local community. Employ and impact locally however I live in fear that my "big box employer" Will come after me."

Paul	"Non-complete Clauses are very common for physicians. This leads to an inability to remain in the same community to continue to serve the same patients who have developed a doctor-patient relationship. When a physician wishes to find a new employer (i.e., a new health system or physician organization) they are forced to move out of the community. A common stipulation on health system contracts is a geographic barrier of 25 mile radius from the physicians work place. This traps a physician to one health system. If the physician has a family and home in the community they have no choice but remain with the same health system. Why is this done by the health system? It is the doctor-patient relationship. Most often patients stay with their known primary care physician. If the physician moves to a local competitor the health system will lose potential future insurance revenue due to lost services. The practice of non-compete clauses in healthcare leads to poorer work environments for physicians, earlier physician burn-out, and physicians leaving a career of direct patient care for non-clinical work which is not bound by the non-compete clause. Look at the Toledo Ohio community where the ProMedica Health System has become the dominant healthcare employer. The more dominant one healthcare system becomes in a community the more difficult it is for other health systems to flourish as the pool of healthcare providers is locked out of moving to the competitors. This leads to a lack of diversity of options for healthcare in communities. With the growing trend in having a shortage of healthcare providers the non-compete clauses that limited physicians' movement need to be eliminated."
William	"I currently work in sales for an Asphalt company in Michigan. The company had me sign a two year non-compete agreement to not work for any other asphalt company within 50 miles if I decide to resign. After two years with the company I have been disheartened at how poorly customers are being treated and how often product quality is sub-par. I would love to start my own business because I see this as an opportunity to provide a better service at a lower cost; However, the non-compete agreement stand in the way even though there is no trade secrets and too many customers in this market."
Ally	"I support and agree with this proposal. I would like to seek other employment opportunities but am not able to without moving or traveling far due to my non-compete clause. I believe it makes for more disgruntled workers and allows employers to show less values and appreciation for employees."
Lily	"I strongly support the ban on no-compete clauses. These clauses stifle innovation and growth and concentrate power away from workers. From a growth perspective and from a humanity perspective, no-compete clauses are harmful to society."
Nitin	"Good Proposal FTC, Appreciate this effort against BIG companies. This is really good news for employees like me, Please implement ASAP"
Duane	"Non compete clauses seem like a restrictive tool aimed to limit individuals who wish to move on with their skill sets. Organizations should have to compete for workers, not trap them into worker contracts that limit them beyond their term of employment. There are other tools available to protect IP and legally safeguard unique products or business practices. Please do what you can to eliminate non

	compete contracts that don't allow for the freedom of worker movement, particularly if employment has ended."
Vandan	"The ban on non-compete clauses absolutely should also apply to physicians. Hospital organizations and other similar interest groups have been using non compete clauses to hold physicians "hostage". They allow hospital systems to abuse physicians, leaving physicians only option to either put up with the abuse or move their entire family. A physician shouldn't be restricted from finding employment elsewhere if their employer acts in negative manner. Hospitals organizations should focus more on keeping their physicians happy rather than trying to trap them into their jobs with non compete clauses."
Saad	"I am in support of banning non competes."
Nipun	"The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency."

Joe	"As personal trainer non-compete contracts unfairly keep me from being able to increase my business by changing to a gym that will pay be a higher rate. Some companies make you sign an agreement that bans you from working within 50 miles of your former workplace fur up to 5 years if you quit. This makes it impossible to leave your current company and continue working in the same profession. This is totally unfair to personal trainers and puts all the power in the hands of large gym owners. Please abolish non-compete contracts as it will raise the ability to make a living for many in my industry."
Jacob	"I am in strong support of the actions Lina Khan has taken when it conies to noncompete clauses. I'm currently in school studying Computer Science. I plan on working in the field of Data Science after I graduate, which is an industry experiencing explosive growth. As somebody who plans on working in the tech industry in the future, this means I'll be able to have more chances at receiving competitive compensation for the work I'll be doing without an employer making me sign a noncompete clause. Noncompete clauses strongly hinder a worker's ability to seek out higher wages. They also hinder competition in the labor market. Bravo to Lina Khan for the proactive work she's doing at the FTC. I feel like my tax dollars are actually working for me, at least when it comes to the FTC. Thank you, Lina Khan and everybody at the FTC who has been pursuing this legislation."
Leslie	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am in support of removing non-compete agreements. I recently had an experience with an employer who lied during the recruiting process, promised a 40 hour work week and regular bonuses. This employer also required all employees sign a 3 year non-compete agreement, making it all but impossible to get another job in the same industry without moving due to the very restrictive terms used in the agreement. Once employment began, it became apparent that the job was actually 55+ hours a week and the requirements for bonuses made it impossible to achieve them. Additionally, the owner of the company verbally abused all of his employees and used threats and fear to try and motivate people but instead made the most toxic work environment I have ever encountered. I eventually had to quit the job for my own mental and physical health and am unemployed due to the restrictive non-compete. This company owner used this legal document to trap low level employees in jobs that stunted their growth and made professional advancement all but impossible. I fully support the banning of non-competes. There are other ways that companies can ensure that employees stay on past training periods such as making them pay back bonuses, etc. . I also feel that non-solicitation agreements are still important as it can take a lot of time and effort for organizations to grow their customer base and business network. If you area good employer that does right by your employees - they will stick around. Or they will leave and force you to become a better business. The need for competition is the entire reason that Monopolies are outlawed in the US."

Michael	"I am a physician. My family, my patients, and I have been severely impacted by a non-compete agreement. My goal as a physician has always been to practice medicine and care for the communities in which I have grown up and continue to live. I was able to do this until I was threatened by a now former employer regarding a non-compete clause in my contract. I had to drive over an hour away to find a suitable employment opportunity. This caused significant stress and increased risk of car accidents for my patients, who decided to drive to see me, and for me. A patient-physician relationship is a sacred bond. Patients' lack of access to a physician whom they have grown to trust can have significant and detrimental effects on their health. Patients should have the choice and access to be able to see the healthcare professional who they feel understands their needs. Healthcare professionals are NOT interchangeable. I strongly encourage the Federal Trade Commission to remove non-compete clauses from contracts to allow all of us as patients, whether current or future to have access to the care we need. I am happy to discuss this further if I could be helpful in any way."
Carol	"Banning noncompete clauses would be much better for employees and consumers as well as helping to further competition in the market. Presently I have to be careful due to a noncompete clause, which prevents me from reaching out to past customers even when I could actually help them."
David	"I am a primary care physician. Non-Compete clauses make caring for my patients mom difficult."
John	"I support banning Non-Compete clauses. It's ridiculous to try and control someone's life after termination of that employment after an employer fails to meet an employee's needs. Moreover, it's ridiculous to try and control someone's life regardless of an employer meeting an employee's needs. There should never be any circumstance where a person can't work because an employer holds a signature over them."
Karen	"I recently left a position where I was not only silently underpaid my base salary for two consecutive years and a victim of sexual harassment in the workplace for almost two years. I was just slapped a non-compete that was almost 7 years old when I left to go to a competitor, that had a head hunter find me! I was offered DOUBLE in MY BASE SALARY in addition to more opportunities, larger percentage of commissions, and a company that respects me and is thrilled to have me on their team. My former employer also threatened my new employer (which I have not started yet), to sue them for 10k for allowing me to work at the new company. It is ludicrous and unreasonable to have an employee not be able to better themselves and have to endure sexual harassment until I was forced to resign. The employer still employs the perpetrator. That is not legally fair! Please pass the bill to lift non-competes!"
Richard	"No more non compete "agreements", because they are not agreements; they are actually forcefully signed under duress of not getting a job, or a benefit, or separation pay."

Trevor	"We need freedom from the "non-profit" hospitals that restrict our work. Through their massive budgets and legal powers they are able to push out independent physicians due to their non-compete rules. Please remove the exception of non-profit hospitals and employers and the exception of not including physicians from the new non-compete FTC laws. We need freedom to be able to work where our patients need us instead of where a contract allows us to work. Our families and loved ones should not have to be separated from us for us to continue serving patients in our profession. I am tired of moving and am considering changing from clinical care to consulting after only 4 years out of residency due to the anti-competitive rulings in my state and in our country. We need competition to improve patient care for our family members and loved ones! Currently I am not able to accept a position at a critical access hospital that needs more care to take place under its roof to stay in business in Sheridan, Michigan. This community loves and needs a hospital and I am not able to work there due to a non-compete. This is of greatest loss to the patients of this community. Please listen to our pleas. Our patients need us to be free from these entrenched interest restrictions."
Suzanne	"I agree with getting rid of non-compete clauses which workers are forced to sign. Many of these workers are in low-wage jobs and should allowed to move into a better paying job if one becomes available. This helps not only the worker who gets more career opportunity but also their family and the local economy where they then spend their additional income."
Hassan	"Non-compete clauses are contracts between employers and employees that prohibit the employee from competing with the employer for a specified period after the termination of employment. Non-compete clauses have become a common feature of employment contracts in many industries, including healthcare. While non-compete clauses are often seen as a way to protect an employer's business interests, they can be harmful and disadvantageous for physicians. In this comment, I will explore the negative impact of non- compete clauses on physicians, particularly in the context of healthcare. I will also discuss the legal and ethical implications of non- compete clauses, and examine whether they are truly necessary to protect an employer's interests. The Harmful Effects of Non-Compete Clauses on Physicians 1- Limits Career Opportunities: Non-compete clauses limit a physician's ability to practice medicine within a particular geographical area. This can be a significant obstacle to a physician's career advancement, as it restricts their ability to seek new employment opportunities. Physicians who are subject to non-compete clauses may find it difficult to transition to a new job, even if it is in a different geographic region, because they may be prohibited from working in the same specialty or with the same patient population. 2- Limits Patient Choice: Non-compete clauses can limit patients' access to healthcare. If a physician is unable to practice within a certain geographic area, patients who rely on that physician may be forced to seek care elsewhere, which can be challenging, especially for patients with chronic or complex medical conditions. Patients who have built a relationship with a physician may also be reluctant to switch to a new provider, which can lead to delays in care and other negative outcomes. 3- Limits Innovation and Research Non-compete clauses can hinder innovation and research in the medical field. If physicians are unable to work with or collaborate with others in their field, they may be less likely to share their knowledge or to engage in research and innovation. This can slow progress in the medical field and limit the development of new

	treatments and technologies. 4- Limits the Rights of the Physician Non-compete clauses can limit a physician's ability to work and earn a living. They can also limit a physician's ability to practice medicine in the way that they believe is best for their patients. For example, a physician who disagrees with their employer's policies or procedures may be forced to leave their job and move to a different geographic region, or risk violating the terms of their non-compete agreement. The Legal and Ethical Implications of Non- Compete Clauses Non-compete clauses raise significant legal and ethical questions, particularly in the healthcare field. One of the key concerns is the potential impact of non- compete clauses on patient care. Patients have the right to choose their healthcare providers, and non-compete clauses can limit that choice. Patients may be unable to see the physician of their choice if that physician is subject to a non-compete agreement, which can lead to delays in care and other negative outcomes. Non-compete clauses can also limit a physician's ability to practice medicine in the way that they believe is best for their patients. Physicians have an ethical obligation to provide the best possible care to their patients, and non-compete clauses can limit their ability to do so. For example, a physician who believes that a particular treatment or procedure is in the best interests of their patient may be prohibited from offering that treatment if it is not approved by their employer. Non-compete clauses also raise questions about the freedom of contract. While employers have a legitimate interest in protecting their business interests, non-compete clauses can be overly restrictive and can limit an employee's ability to work and earn a living. Some legal scholars have argued that non- compete clauses are incompatible with the freedom of contract and that they should be subject to greater scrutiny by the courts."
Trina	"I am in support of the banning of noncompete contracts. They give employers an unfair advantage and undermine the free enterprise system of the United States of America. Thank you for your consideration."
William	"Banning non-competes is a great idea. The most ridiculous non-compete I had signed was in my early 20's I worked for a company that did Chess classes for grade school kids. I was an instructor for a while, a few years in I did sonic graphic design and layouts for the company and had to sign a "7 year" non compete. The information I had access to didn't change. The only change was now I was laying out the files that would become the worksheets that all the instructors were using. The work was no different from any other graphic design job I would do for another client except for the non-compete. To this day I haven't met anyone who has signed a "7 year" non-compete. After this I have worked on other educational programs as well as working on IPs for aerospace and medical industries and never had a non compete last that long. I believe in a total ban of non-competes based on how it can negatively impact the total pool of knowledge and talent in any industry thus slowing the progress of an industry. Thank you, William Stanigar"
Zach	"Hello, This ruling would open up so many doors for employees who feel trapped in industries and professions they have dedicated their working lives to. I have been coerce into signing non competes in four different skilled trades and companies. The latest is my current trade and company in contract line work. Our client company has had several mid level management personnel ask me to apply to their company. They would love my experience and skills put to work through their

	company, however the non compete strips that reality away from myself and my family. Better benefits, more time home, and better work life balance. The client company went as far as to read through the non compete to find a "loop hole", turns out my company found it first and amended the loop hole to ensure no employee from my company would have a chance to thrive at our client company. I signed a non compete in the past, as I could not have been hired without it, that stated I could not work for a competing company or open my own company in the same field within a 150 miles radius to our company office if I quit or if I were fired. This is from a pest control company where I earned a base $13.00 an hour. Middle class blue collar workers are taking the greatest hit while the companies that strong-armed us into these NCs are happily paying us less than we are worth knowing we have to either completely uproot our lives to find better companies in the same field or change trades all together. Middle Class men and women should not have to give up on countless hours of mastering a craft in order to make better living conditions for ourselves and our families. I pray that this ruling passes and passes quickly. So many men and women have better opportunities that want their experience, work ethic, and dedication to their craft. One piece of paper strips them of all of that. Thank you for bringing it to the table, it gives the working class hope"
Nick	"Non competes are unfair and stall careers. Get rid of them. Thanks!"
Lori	"I am in favor of banning non compete clauses in employee/employer contracts. These are an unfair practice that can cause harm to not only the individual employee, but to the community we live in. An example of harm against the individual: big box companies hire an individual from their competitor. The business makes an irresistible offer to the individual and part of the offer includes a non compete clause for an extended period of time. Employee accepts and starts the new job. Employee is then fired early in their employment. Business has removed an outstanding employee from their competitor but has destroyed an individual's career in that field (ie manager of a specific department at a big box store). 2nd example is a young veterinarian who lands her dream job at a clinic in her hometown. She is outstanding in her job for 3 1/2 years but has discovered that working in this clinic is not the dream it was presented as - 70 hour work weeks, on call 24/7, and what some would consider to be an abusive owner. But this vet's contract prohibits them from working within a 10 mile radius of the city for two years. There is a severe shortage (as in 0) vets working in their specialty area within that area. So they are prohibited from providing lifesaving care due to the noncompete clause in their contract. This vet is threatened with lawsuits if they practice within that 10 mile radius, which includes most of the population of this very rural area. This is life and death for animals and great heartache for the families who love them. And yes, this vet signed the contract with the noncompete clause, but there was no job without it. Especially in this time of worker shortages, I strongly hope that noncompete clauses are eliminated."
Melanie	"Non- competes hinder a workers ability to seek employment in a field that they are familiar with. I work in sales and my non-compete states that I cannot work with a referring business partner that I spent years developing the relationship. The partnership is based on my working hard to take care of their clients and the interpersonal relationship I built. Many times It is after business hours. My company because of this non-compete has employees fearful of finding another job with a competing employer who might be offering better pay, or benefits. A hard working employee should be able to work wherever they want without fear of a lawsuit. It is unfair to hinder that employee, it's the employee that puts in the work so that employee should be able to take their skills to another employer. Non-competes should be eliminated for all workers."

Simon	"We are a country of immigrants that moved to this land for freedom, the non-compete is the exact opposite of the origin of this country. Non-competes in my opinion represent oppression, the government nor an employer should ever have the ability to deter an individual from making a living or a better living; this is exactly what non-competes are doing. If abolished you will see economic growth as well as innovation, individuals stuck in situations will be able to not only look for better work but in many cases be able to open more efficient businesses of their own. Please abolish the non-competes."
Sean	"This is a wonderful rule! Americans have an inalienable right to work and earn a living. Taking that away from people is frankly immoral."
Sean	"This is long overdue! All Americans have an inalienable right to earn a living. It is inexcusable for companies to be able to take away someone's very livelihood via non-compete clauses."
kevin	"While I applaud the FTC's proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, I fear employers will simply migrate to Non-Disclosure Agreements or similar instruments to maintain their insidious and unabating fear of litigation. May I suggest a broader definition of a Non-Compete Agreement to include most Non-Disclosure or similar agreements? Otherwise I think decades of litigation will be spent over semantics. Why not be clear from the beginning?? Thank you."
Michael	"I am writing to support the proposed rule. Non-compete agreements, as they exist in practice, are bad for business and for employees. I recognize that companies are interested in protecting such things as client lists or specific trade secrets. However, many agreements go beyond that. The agreements I am currently bound by have vague language. There is no way for me to consider a particular position and verify that it would be allowable under my agreements. The employers are not obligated to identify the specific information, industries, or competitors I may not work for. My current agreement says I may not "... engage in or support the development, manufacture, marketing, or sale of any product or service that competes or is intended to compete with any product or service sold, offered, or otherwise provided by [my employer] ... that [I] worked on or supported, or about which [I] obtained or received Confidential Information." There is no well-maintained list of "confidential topics" that I can consult. The criteria of something being "intended to compete" is impossibly vague. I cannot know what might run afoul of this agreement. While a non-compete may be reasonable for executives and officers, it is unfair for employees. The only way an agreement would be fair is if the employer was required to provide a list of competitors they are concerned about or a list of specific trade secrets that may not be disclosed. With mutually understood constraints, I can know which employers I can move to, and they can hire me with the confidence that there will be no resulting litigation. However, that's not how today's agreements work."

CT	"To whom it may concern: Thank you for asking for public comment. Shortly after I started my medical career in the early 1980's, I learned about the non-Compete restrictive covenants in some work contracts. They were a new thing. These usually were not being upheld in courts-of-law and also were generally overlooked when an employee left their job. The idea was that your colleagues would not go down the street and set up shop to compete with your business, especially after you may have trained that individual. Now with very large conglomerate companies owning and buying hospitals and medical practices, things have changed. Promises are made to employees and not kept. Under the guise of these promises in order to keep a job they may have had for years, employees are required to sign a "Non-Compete" agreement when the practice is purchased by a venture capital group. What is more the courts are now upholding these coerced contracts. These generally effect doctors just starting their careers. For instances, a medical specialist I know would need to go out of state or move to the upper peninsula of MI at least 50 miles from the bridge to seek another position because of the restrictive Non-Compete clause signed by her to keep her job. The practice was sold to a "for Profit organization" just after this physician got settled in up north in MI. Commuting is out of the question and taking call would be impossible. Additionally, I've seen a similar "buy out" within three months of my daughter starting her job in a Veterinarian practice here. It is no small move to come to the upper part of MI. Home purchase, children in schools etc. I have learned that the same has happen to other Veterinarians in different practices in the area. While the distance of the restriction is less, the circumstances are similar, i.e. promises made, non-compete contract signature required to keep the job and nothing changes except the company takes money off the top. No new equipment. In rural up-North Michigan it becomes necessary for these doctors to do "fill in" work if they leave there position and they often need to work up to 66 miles away from their families. That is a ridiculous commute created unnecessarily by these non-compete Clauses. That is why I believe that the non-compete covenants are restraint of trade and a personal hardship imposed by big business on small families with few available options. These young doctors cannot fight this in the courts. They don't have the time or the money. They are just wrong."
R	"Non competes are an unethical way to keep workers from leaving jobs for more favorable working conditions. They should not be legal."
Tina	"I fully support this rules change. Having been a family physician in a rural area, and being forced due to a non compete clause to travel a significant distance to a new practice, this was a difficulty for me as a new physician. In addition, I had a very loyal patient panel who also did their best to travel to see me. This place a significant strain on the health care in the community. With primary care physicians being such a significant shortage allowing corporate medicine to utilize non-compete clauses is negatively impacting the overall healthcare availability in communities particularly those in rural areas."

Nikki	"A non-compete clause forced me to have to commute 70 miles one way and drove me put of practice."
Nathan	"I unequivocally support a stop to non-compete clauses. They are nothing but predatory and, from an economic standpoint, stifle competition in the workplace. They have helped stagnate wages and do nothing but hurt workers."
Meghan	"I support the ban on non-compete clauses in regards to employment contracts. As a board certified, licensed, physician assistant, who works as a part of a medical team it is unfair that an employer would be able to set the terms under which I could find additional employment, even if leaving a job in good standing. The fact that an employer can set the terms that can limit one ability to find additional employment, inhibiting one's ability to provide for their family regardless of their actual ability but only based on geographical distance is laughable."
Mary	"I work in a remote rural area. A company owned by venture capitalists bought our health system. The health system can not provide the care my patients need. My non-compete clause is 2 years and 50 miles! For the sake of myself and my patients' welfare, I joined a non-profit health system 1.5 hours drive away from where I live. I drive treacherous winter roads most days to provide my patients with the care they deserve. Many of my former patients have followed me. My sister the at age 18 due to a MVA during a winter storm, so I do not take this lightly. I have 4 school aged children who I refuse to uproot and move. Please pass the law outlawing non-compete clauses so for profit venture capitalists can not do this anymore!"
Kirk	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I have several friends that work in the construction industry or housing industry that have been stuck in jobs where they are unhappy and underpaid. This because of non compete clauses. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Kirk Trainer Ferndale, MI"
Rachel	"I am in support of passing this new rule, Non-competes only benefit the employer and prevent employees from perusing better opportunities in their field. Forcing an employee to stay in a job they no long want to be part of is counterproductive for both parties. Unhappy employees are not very productive. On the flip side if you treat your employees well and pay them fair, they will want to work hard for you. For businesses with intensive training who don't want a revolving door maybe a 2-5 year employment contract would be an acceptable alternative. They should not be locked into a non-compete with a specific company indefinitely.."
Cal	"Essentially half of the amount of money I could be making as a contractor goes to my contracting agency and I'm locked into quitting my job for a year to have the opportunity to try and get it back or take a position with less pay to get out of it. This new rule would allow me to change my income by at least 50% in the 6 months after it takes affect and then by another 50% a year later without changing my actual job position or duties."
Amy	"Thank you for addressing this topic. Non-competes have become pervasive in nearly all physician contracts now and I strongly believe they should not exist. They only serve to allow hospitals to treat physicians poorly, limit fair market influences, and compromise patient safety by trapping physicians in toxic jobs with worsening burnout. In the face of massive physician shortages, a pandemic that has spiked burnout to an all time high and thousands of healthcare workers leaving the workforce, non competes only worsen these effects. To understand, for a physician to leave a toxic workplace it first requires 90-120 days on average notice as well as 4-6 months to become credentialed at a new institution; add on top of that non competes that in order to change jobs force doctors to leave the city they serve, move their families (often out of state entirely) and it's clear the burden is unreasonable. I beg the FTC to do what is right and protect our healthcare workers who have protected our nation during this pandemic and do away with the toxic practice of non compete clauses."

Lauren	"To whom it may concern: I am highly in favor of passing the proposed restriction of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Non-competes prevent workers from seeking alternate employment for their own benefit. Companies should seek to retain employees by adequate wages and benefits, not by making it legally difficult to leave. Non-competes stifle free-market movement of employees. I have also come to understand that the AHA has recommended that doctors be specifically excluded from the non-compete restrictions. Employed physicians should not be treated differently than other employees and should not be excluded from this law. Physicians should be able to change employers if it is advantageous for them to do so - regardless of where they move to. If physicians are, in fact, excluded, hospitals should be required to pay full wages for the duration of the non-compete clause. This would prevent hospitals from taking advantage of its employees' inability to leave. There is no shortage of patients needing medical care. If hospitals are losing patients due to physician movement, the solution to that problem cannot be "legally require the physicians to stay where they are." The hospitals must employ and retain excellent providers and provide excellent medical care, and patients will gladly come for treatment. Thank you for your consideration, Lauren Verstraete, DO"
April	"I think we should get rid of non-competes. They make it impossible to leave bad working conditions."
Christopher	"Please help independent contractors/self employed individuals reach there true market value Banning non-compete clauses would definitely provide a competitive and fair market throughout the country."
Matthew	"in the past, I had a non-compete in place with an organization that was not able to provide the services they wanted me to sell. Because I had a non- compete in place, I had to hire a lawyer, at my own expense, to get out of the non-compete and continue my career. It was an expensive lesson to learn, and I will never take a job offer with a non-compete in place again unless it offers back end compensation for the duration of the non-compete period. Additionally, employers would put a clause in the non-compete that part of your salary is to pay you for agreeing to the non-compete. They don't define how much, but as non- compete's are removed, salary should not be removed from the employee."
Stephen	"Other than trade secrets of a specific company, if an employee is so integral to the functioning of an organization that them working for a competitor gives a company a specific disadvantage, shouldn't the company just retain that employee? Non-compete clauses seem to just put undue power in the hands of a corporation. If employees are indeed expendable enough to be released wantonly or treated poorly enough to leave, they can't possible cause such harm to the organization in their release."

Patricia	"I am a physician requesting that noncompete clauses be outlawed. Non compete clauses historically have protected businesses from training workers who then took their skills to another local business. Now, they are used to strong arm professionals into staying in increasingly toxic and frankly abusive employment situations without recourse. We have families and communities and simply cannot move our families and lives long distances to satisfy noncompetes. Noncompetes are unfair labor practices that must be outlawed."
Rebecca	"I STRONGLY support The FTC's proposed ban on NON Compete Contracts. Having been employed for 17 years, to be FIRED early January this year and told they would be enforcing my Non-Compete. It was completely crippling to me and these contracts not only hold you hostage, they can absolutely cause financial mishap for a person. They limit competitive ability for both employers, and employees. I had to hire an employment lawyer to force my previous company to release me from said contract."
Lucas	"This is outstanding policy that will directly increase socioeconomic mobility for everyday workers while raising the standards for products across the board as companies compete for the best and brightest laborers. In an age of ever increasing consolidation and anti-labor initiatives, pro-worker policies such as this are imperative to protect democratic norms and deliver an equitable future for both current and future laborers."
Renae	"I had no idea this was happening in what I consider the regular job market. I always thought the non compete clause was reserved for hi tech jobs. I had no idea this could happen to anyone! It's obvious this rule is being abused to keep people loyal regardless of their work environment & to keep wages low. It's actually quite ten-ifying to learn. It's an abuse that should not be allowed to continue. I see why businesses are fighting so hard to keep this rule in place. Why wouldn't they! It's got to be abolished. Please listen to workers, not businesses."
Chris	"I am a nurse practitioner, I have been laid off once as a nurse practitioner and spent five months trying to find work that would work around my noncompete clause. I ended up finding work as a regular nurse writing clinical guidelines, and that company lost a contract and I was laid off there. I'm currently under a two-year restrictive noncompete clause. I think they should be abolished. It has prevented me from furthering myself, and it has prevented me from getting wage increases. I think if employers don't treat their employees well, they should lose them to their competition. Nice to think about someone looking out for the little guy ."
Denise	"My family is in health care; patient care is impacted negatively by forcing physicians and nurse practitioners to move their practices out of the area instead of being allowed to provide continuity of care. The noncompete allows hospital systems to effectively lock in their providers benefiting no one else especially the patients."

James	"Physicians are locked into a location because they do not want to move and change the whole family dynamics because they continue to have noncompete clauses even after years of work and are held hostage to the organization no matter how they are treated."
Brenda	"I agree with the ban, our average wages are far below the cost of living. We as American should be allowed to improve our quality of life, as stated in the constitution. So in essence being forced to sign this contract should be unconstitutional."
Gabriel	"I strongly agree with prohibiting non-complete clauses. I am currently bound by a non-compete clause myself as an employer of a large health care system. I, like many other employees, carry no "trade secrets" or "company secrets" with me. The non-compete clause only serves to restrict my choice of employer. Employees like me are forced into long commutes or financial hardship to try to escape these anti-competitive contracts. Non-compete clauses are clearly suppressing wages (studies have borne this out). They lead employees like me to resent their employers. Please listen to employees like me, not to wealthy corporations, and ban non-compete clauses."
Kelly	"Non-compete agreements trap employees. They are solely for the benefit of the employer. These contracts overreach and are often not specific i.e. "cannot provide similar services" when in fact services are not similar and are not direct competition. Employers intimidate employees and employees are afraid to leave because they might violate the agreement. This leads to employees tolerating poor management and low wages while employers have the upper hand by threatening the employees with legal action which the employee often cannot afford. Employees are unable to improve their financial situation or are subjected to undue hardship by having to commute far from their home to a new employer outside of an arbitrary mileage mark set at the employers whim. This replaces "at will" employment and "traps" the employee instead. Non-compete rules should be abolished."
James	"I support the proposed rule. Non-competes limit a free market and hinder the ability for individuals to grow and excel."
Mary	"I believe a person should be able to leave a job if not getting enough money to pay his bills and feed his or her family. I know from experience it happens time and I worked two minimum wage jobs."
Nathan	"Non compete clauses artificially lower wages and make the marketplace less efficient by trapping people at their current employer."
Robert	"The Federal Trade Commission should ban the use of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. These clauses violate anti-trust laws because they work to limit competition in the labor market. We have a largely free enterprise economy. Workers at any particular company should continue to be free of any legal constraints to leave a current employer to seek a better position at another company."

Jamison	"I have never been subject to a Non-compete agreement, but I am a Soldier with 20 years of service. I'm preparing for retirement and entering the civilian workforce. I have a broad and specialized skill set that I hope brings me into well paying, white collar jobs. The idea of having to deal with NCAs frightens me, and makes me apprehensive to work with certain employers. Banning them is the right move."
Kuan Ting	"Noncompetes are anti business. I am in favor of making noncompetes illegal."
Laurel	"I agree with the proposed rule. I am a Certified Nurse Midwife and my current employment agreement contains a non-compete clause. This gives the employer far too much power, especially in subsequent contract reviews and salary negotiations. I agree with the current document's points, elucidating the reasons why non-competes are problematic, and the ripple effects to other workers and areas of the economy. I strongly support this proposal to end non-compete clauses."
Taima	"Non-compete agreements can be very harmful to workers and the economy, and I believe that banning them in the United States would be a positive step forward. Firstly, non-compete agreements can limit an individual's ability to find new employment and make a living. They prevent workers from using their skills and knowledge to earn a living in their chosen field, even if they are not competing with their former employer. This can lead to reduced job opportunities, lower wages, and decreased economic mobility. Secondly, non-compete agreements can stifle innovation and progress. If workers are unable to move between companies and industries, it can limit the exchange of ideas and expertise. This can hinder the growth and development of new technologies and industries, and limit the benefits that they can bring to society. In addition, non-compete agreements can be particularly harmful to low-wage workers and those in industries with high turnover rates. These workers are often the most vulnerable and may not have the financial resources to challenge or negotiate the terms of these agreements. Overall, I believe that banning non-compete agreements in the US would help to promote a more competitive, innovative, and equitable economy, and provide greater opportunities and protections for workers."

Daniel	"Unleash innovation and improve American competitiveness by letting workers accumulate skills and move to their most efficient place in the knowledge economy without being penalized."
Sameena	"I support a federal ban on non-competes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people. Physician employers also often change their contracts/impose pay cuts etc and then physicians have no leverage to negotiate due to restrictive non-compete clauses (and employers know that)."
Sarah	"Physicians play a crucial role in ensuring access to quality healthcare, especially in underserved communities. Non-compete clauses in physician contracts limit their ability to practice medicine in a specific geographic area after leaving their current employer, making it difficult for them to move to areas with greater need or to start their practices. Moreover, such clauses restrict competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher healthcare costs for patients. They can also limit the patients freedom to choose the healthcare provider they prefer, which is essential for fostering a robust and accessible healthcare system. Therefore, banning non-compete clauses for physicians could lead to greater access to healthcare, increased competition among healthcare providers, and lower healthcare costs for patients, ultimately resulting in better healthcare outcomes for all."
Kelly	"I support banning non-compete clauses because it restricts worker autonomy to find employment in the industry where they have experience. Work satisfaction and company culture need to align with an individual's goals and desires. Working in another industry or geographic location doesn't necessarily support 'life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness' for someone. I've seen families torn apart by one parent bound to stay in an area (a teacher) while he husband was laid off as a healthcare finance executive with a non-compete had to live 3 hours away from his family for years. It was stressful and disturbing how a company could restrict a person's ability to support their family in person. Totally not what our forefathers intended."
Catelyn	"Noncompetes are horrible to work with. Keeping noncompetes for truly privileged employees is fair. Yet Michigan, I see noncompetes from people making sandwiches at Jinuny Johns. Yes, the sandwich makers were apparently contractually prohibited from working any other foodservice job upon leaving JJs. Ridiculous. Even for the majority of office workers, they are not privy to actual trade secrets. Noncompetes hurt our workforce. Companies will not be materially affected by employees working in the same industry after leaving any specific place of employment. The spirit of noncompete clauses is to prevent trade secrets from being exploited, but employers use them to chain employees to jobs by threat of unemployment. My partner is a physician in Michigan and he is unable to work within a 60 mile radius of his previous employer, regardless of reason for leaving

	employment. What possible trade secrets could he be taking to other employers? He is one of the few physicians who will work in the city because of this contractual stipulation from this employer (who is one of the only healthcare providers in the city). So the citizens suffer because of an employment policy that scares talent and trained providers away. Banning noncompetes is a good thing!"
Isaiah	"Some non-compete clauses are written in a way that is mutually beneficial for both the employer and the employee. In my case, I have an agreement with my employer to pay my salary and some other benefits for 1 year after my employment is terminated, so long as I do not join a competitor during that year. This clearly benefits both of us. I would like this new ruling to take into consideration mutually beneficial scenarios like this one. Paid non-compete periods should either be allowed so long as they conform to reasonable mutually beneficial limits, or they should be allowed without limit so long as they are completely voluntary and nullable any time after employment is terminated."
Donald	"Upper Great Lakes Family Health Center (UGLFHC) is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit, Federally Qualified Health Center (FQHC) that, based on our current understanding, would not be subject to the Proposed Rule. UGLFHC is exempt from coverage under the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) because we are not organized to carry on business for profit. In the event our understanding of the Rule's applicability is incorrect, we offer the following comments. UGLFHC admires the FTC's efforts to address the potentially negative effects of unequal power between employers and certain types of employees. UGLFHC employs a variety of personnel, from clinical support staff like medical and dental assistants to nurses and licensed clinicians, such as physicians, dentists, and clinical social workers. Some employees are extensively educated: some have completed entry-level training programs. Some are highly compensated: some are lower wage. Given this variety of staff, not all employees present the same considerations with respect to non-compete agreements and we are apprehensive at the prospect of rulemaking that applies one standard to all employees. For example, UGLFHC has no objection to prohibiting the use of non-compete clauses with individuals that are, or would be hired as, low-wage earners. These employees experience the greatest degree of power imbalance in hiring and employment processes and are more likely to experience negative impacts from non-compete arrangements. In fact, Michigan's state legislature is already considering legislation that would prohibit non-compete arrangements with low-wage employees (as numerous states have) and we have expressed no concern with that aim or approach. The intention to improve fairness in employment practices for low-wage employees is admirable. However, highly compensated clinicians working at UGLFHC, like licensed medical, dental, and behavioral health providers are different from lower-wage employees. In most employment circumstances, these highly paid employees have significant leverage in negotiating their employment arrangements with little of the power imbalance observed with lower-wage employees. In addition, health centers often make extensive investments to establish a clinician's practice within their organization and reasonable non-compete arrangements provide some assurance those investments will result in stable services for health center patients. Additionally, our communities experience an ongoing shortage of licensed clinicians. Non-compete arrangements help moderate scarcity-driven competition which can lead to wages skyrocketing well

	beyond what would be considered fair or competitive compensation. These factors can be community-specific, which is reflected by the fact that not all health centers need or choose to use non-compete clauses. We strongly feel it is important for our organization who has a deep knowledge of the workforce landscape in our communities to have the flexibility to use reasonable non-compete clauses with highly compensated employees when necessary. We encourage the FTC to re-focus the Rule to more narrowly focus on lower-wage employees who have genuinely unequal power and thank you for considering our comments."
kathleen	"I am writing to state my views regarding non-competes between Franchisor and Franchisee. Although it is imperative that franchisees do not immediately open in the same spot a directly competing business, one that is a direct replacement to the franchised business, the non compete in the FA must be specific to this and not be so vague that anything even slightly related to the franchised business is considered a violation. Consider my situation. I owned an Honor Yoga Franchise from 2016-2020. Late in 2020 I had to file bankruptcy as the FA was up and due to disagreements with the operations of the franchise I did not want to renew. I opened a well-being coaching business that offered mindset classes that used mediation and movement classes, specifically not marketed or intended to be yoga but be an option for those overweight and unhealthy to slowly get back in shape. These classes were not the core of our business, but rather an entryway to our coaching programs, the bread and butter of the business. The franchisor, Honor Yoga, is now suing me for non compete violation. But my expectation of a competing business would have been a yoga studio, offering and marketing yoga classes, not a coaching business with classes similar but not yoga. This limits what an owner of a franchise can do for work after leaving the franchise for whatever reason. A non compete within a franchise agreement, must allow the franchisee to work in the industry, but not directly compete. It must be limited to specific direct competition. Many FA's simply state "competing business" and this is far too vague. If there is a non compete clause in a FA, it must be specific and detailed in the agreement so there is no confusion as to what is implied."

Minnesota | Statewide Impact

	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am a doctor in a pediatric subspecialty field. My contract with one of the children's hospital in my city includes a non-compete. My specialty is fairly small and thus I am generally required to work in a place with a large population. The non-compete essentially bars me from being gainfully employed within the metro area of my city outside of this institution if I chose to leave on my own. This means that I have essentially no bargaining power for myself unless I am willing to move to another city, uprooting my family and leaving our extended. I do not know if your rules will extend to 501-3cs or non- profits. This should be given consideration as some of these companies, like my hospital, are wielding these contracts the same way any for profit company would." -Ben
	"I'm a Service manager at a dealership in Minnesota, my employer forced me to sign a [non-compete] for what was initially 2 years and 100 miles covering service, sales, and parts....I managed to get it negotiated down to 1 year but the auto industry is all that's on my resume, no other auto shops or sales in the area use them by my employer uses them as employee retention claiming we have trade secrets but I have yet to find any reason our shop is run any different from any other auto shop. Under this clause I can't even go work a minimum wage auto parts store job and I have no other option for employment. Additionally in my pay plan is a clause that allows my employer to change it at will...There's no reason except using the non compete as an employee retention tool...Non competes for high paying executive jobs can make sense, but people like me on the lower end of the spectrum who aren't living in lavish conditions are being pinned down and held in place intentionally using these agreements when a simple non disclosure non solicit agreement would protect the [business] just fine." -Brennan
	"I am a veterinarian and have been subject to non- compete clauses throughout my 16 year career. When I was young, I was able to uproot my life to move to a new job outside my clause, but that is not feasible with a family. After leaving my most recent job, I've been forced to commute at least 2 hrswaltz a day, in order to follow the rules. I'm not willing to move and make my husband resign from a job he loves, and attempt to find daycare in a new location. As the breadwinner of our family, it's outrageous that I can't continue to do my job in the community we have been a part of for so many years. Other vet clinics in the area are desperate for help, yet I am not allowed to provide them with my much needed skills and experience. Truly just harming everyone involved. Non-compete clauses are outdated and harmful to so many industries, I encourage you to abolish them."

	"(I)am a physician and mother who worked 5 years at an academic center in a rural state. My non-compete was 35 miles. When I was ready to leave the university, I had to leave the state because of the non-compete. Our family left a home, friends, neighbors, and an entire support system that took years to build. Non-compete clauses can hurt parents especially, as we rely on our communities (family, services, neighbors, schools, colleagues) as we raise our children. Many physicians will stay in unfavorable work situations to avoid the toll of a move on their families and themselves. They end up accepting lower salaries and poorer working environments because of this." -Erin
	"I strongly support this rule and would be positively impacted. I work in the technology field, which is plagued by onerous noncompete agreements. Non-compete agreements negative impact innovation, because engineers are prevent from moving to new teams within their industry working on new technology to displace existing technologies owned by large corporations. With this rule change I would be able to actively change jobs within my industry and not fear of legal repercussions." -Cole

Alison	"Non competes force good doctors to leave even underserved areas to escape bad situations. Especially when private equity firms buy practices."
Amina	"I'm a physician in Duluth Minnesota, a small town of about 60k residents. This town has 2 hospitals and both have a practice of having non-competes to include each other in their contracts. This is such a disservice to the patient population of this community. Even those physicians who may not want to move from this community are forced to move from the city if they decide to quit their jobs at either of these hospitals. They are both also non profit hospitals. Almost all large hospital systems are nonprofit hospitals where their CEOs and other hospital admin makes million dollar salaries excluding bonuses. Why should physicians be excluded from this legislation? Please consider not restricting it to for profit hospitals, non-profit hospitals all make millions. It's a well known fact. Please include physicians and both non profit and for profit hospitals. Thank you Amina Adil MD"

Pradyumna	"Removing non compete clause is absolutely vital to improve employee wages and not forcing employees to forcefully relocate families due to geographical practice restrictions."
Laura	"Please put this rule in place. Without this rule, employers continue to use these clauses in contracts as an unfair business practice to reduce competition and depress wages."
James	"Non-compete clauses are not fair and rob workers of the right to fully participate in the market. Companies do not offer anything near reasonable compensation for giving up the right to participate in the labor market. Many years ago I passed on a good job because the employer had a non-compete agreement that laid claim to anything I might create or think of during the time of my employment. This did not seem like employment so much as ownership of me and my creations and thoughts whether I came up with them in off hours or not. It clearly wasn't fair to me and I passed on the job offer. Luckily, I was able to find other employment that did not include such a restriction of my rights. But after being out of work for a while due to my former employer failing and closing I was close to having no other choice for a while. This seemed and still seems unfair and just not right. I fully support the elimination of all non-compete agreements as they are clearly heavily weighted in the employers' interests and provide little protection or acknowledgement of the value employees provide. In a so called free economy they are a severe restriction of employees freedoms."
Anna	"I am writing in support of the proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are damaging to the economy, to communities, to new businesses, and to individual workers. Communities should not lose doctors, nurses, and other health care workers because those individuals are not free to open new practices or seek new jobs in their local area. Businesses should not be blocked from the labor pool by non-competes imposed on workers by competing businesses, but should be free to hire local talent. And no worker should face the choice between unacceptable working conditions or having to leave either their community or their trade in order to find acceptable wages and working conditions. California has fully demonstrated that banning non-compete clauses supports vibrant and innovative businesses. In cases where actual company/trade secrets are involved, of course it makes sense to have NDAs. But everyone should be free to use their skills, training, and experience in their field to make a living where ever they choose."
Anonymous	"I support this rule. Non-compete clauses and restrictive covenants have become a tool used by corporations to shackle workers, communities, and local economies. I work in healthcare, as a rural physician. Rural communities used to have multiple small physician-owned practices working independently but altogether caring for the community. But then corporate

	health systems began buying out these practices and now have a monopoly in our rural communities. These same corporations who claim to be non-profits squeeze struggling rural residents and laden them with medical debt, and overburden the healthcare teams into burnout. But when the healthcare providers like me seek to form our own practices so that our rural communities don't lose physicians we find that we cannot practice in our own communities due to non-compete and other restrictive covenants. My practice has lost five providers in the past 3 years because of this. Rural health is already under a lot of threat from multiple angles and these non-compete practices are adding one more burden that is worsening the healthcare workforce crisis that we are currently facing. Stopping non-compete clauses should apply to both for-profit and non-profit organizations because hospitals are non-profit in name only. Healthcare executives are after self-interests and not after improving the health of our communities, so they will naturally oppose this rule in the name of competition when the workforce trends show differently."
Edward	"I strongly support this measure to eliminate non-compete clauses. Workers of all industries should have the right to seek better employment opportunities at any time, and it should not be the burden of the employee to mete the impact of their departure on their employer. An employer who seeks to disrupt or delay an employee's move to a better job is doing so out of their own failures, not that of the employee. If they have concerns regarding sensitive information or an employee moving to a competitive business then they have other legal avenues to prohibit trade secrets from being misused. It is sad that non-competes single out individual workers when it comes to a situation that is negative for an employer but when it comes to supporting, recognizing, and incentivizing that individual to stay with a company they feel no obligation to provide for them."
Cami	"I don't know what else to say that if you ban Non-competes, you will save the financial life of this Trans Woman, the cleaning industry is ripe with these, i can barely work with them at every company and have insane and over bearing tees. I just want to work again, please, for the love of God, ban Non- competes."
Katie	"I agree with non compete clause. This is particularly important for physicians and physician wellness."
Sydney	"I am a Senior Supply Chain Consultant and I have had a terrible experience with non-competes. At my former company, I was unaware that I was signing a non-compete agreement during my hiring process. I had been at that company for about 2 years before I found another company that offered me a much better salary with a 401k and benefits that I did not have at my current company. I took the offer and let me current company know I was giving my 2 weeks notice. I was bullied, pressured and threatened due to the non-compete and was sent letters from the companies lawyers saying

	I couldn't go to the new company. I couldn't believe that in America, they allowed these non-competes which stops Americans from being able to find a better job and position themselves into a better life. This is the exact meaning of the pursue of happiness and in my opinion, this should not be allowed in America from an employee's perspective."
Dan	"The proposed rule addresses the long held imbalance of power between employees and employers, by returning a workers right to move to where they feel their services are most valued. While I appreciate an employers desire not to lose employees they have invested in, and avoid potential loss of clients to former employees that developed relationships while in the employment of these companies, the current balance of power disproportionately favors companies over employees with the specter of non-compete clauses hanging over workers simply seeking an opportunity to receive fair compensation for their labor, or opportunities to start anew. Abolishing non-competes is the quickest and simplest way to level the playing field, however if exceptions are to exist in the future, a reasonable balance in negotiating power should be required, such that at-will employee should never be subject to such agreements. Non-competes should only be carefully limited to specifically contracted situations, and employers must be required to pay employees full wages from the date of notification through the non-compete period to an employees date of departure, and such date of departure should never exceed a reasonable time period needed to replace that employee or a maximum of 180 days."
Maggie	"I strongly support the proposed amendment to limit the use of noncompete clauses. In fact, I think that power should be reduced even further than what is being proposed. Noncompete clauses only serve the interests of companies while harming workers, consumers, and communities. Women are also at a greater risk of sexual harassment due to noncompete policies as they are often forced to work under predatory employers in order to make a living."
Andrea	"Please know that I and many in my profession strongly feel these non compete clauses must be disbanded or severely restricted. Unreasonable non- compete clauses for veterinarians can cause one to have to move states because of non-competes severely restricting unreasonable ranges. These are anti- competitive for the job market and anti-capitalism"
Sara	"Non-profit hospitals and Healthcare organizations do not equate to "morally good". They are run like businesses often with the sole exception of not having shareholders. If anything, this makes the boards less accountable for their decisions. They should not be give an exemption from non-compete clauses. Limiting the freedom of physicians and other Healthcare professions to change jobs without leaving the geographic area (something that is likely given the ever-growing number of mergers and consolidations) has not and will not be a good thing for patients or healthcare as a whole.

	Having to stay at a job you dislike because you would have to move out of state if you quit, does not make you a better worker. Limiting your working hours to the bare minimum you need to financially survive does not improve patient access. Healthcare organizations and hospitals should be expected to hire and retain workers the same way every other industry is expected to by improving working conditions and offering fair compensation. The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage."
Kevin	"My wife and I work as caretakers at a condominium in Minneapolis. As caretakers we take care of the common area space in the high rise community and also live in the building for the convenience of residents so that we can be "on call" for emergencies. I work for the largest multifamily property service company on the continent, FirstService Corporation. A few weeks ago both my wife and I were fired from our jobs. We suspect this is retaliation from union organizing, and even though the company claimed we were fired over an "incident" with myself, my wife was fired as well because "we were hired at the same time". Now, my wife and I are not only unjustly without employment but also effectively homeless as we live in the building. We both signed Non Competes, agreeing to not work in the industry and being forced to show termination."
Jack	"At my company (an engineering firm in MN), Non-Compete agreements have consistently harmed both the business and the employees. In one instance, an employee who was effective in his role was given a different title, and moved to a different department, while effectively maintaining the same duties. All other employees with this title, were apparently subjected to Non-Compete Agreements, and he was told that he would need to sign one too. He refused, and was terminated. The company felt like they couldn't justify treating him differently from the other employees with that title, and he didn't want to relinquish his right to leave and do the work he had experience doing with a different company in the area. Because of the use of Non-Compete Agreements, the company had to scramble to replace an important employee, and the employee lost his job. Both sides lost. If he had surrendered his rights and signed the Non-Compete, he would lose a critical form of leverage that he has as an employee: the ability to leave freely if he is unsatisfied with the conditions of his work, or if a better opportunity should appear."

Gina	"As a rural physician , I support eliminating NCC. It is so hard to move a whole family then have the job non be what was promised but unable to move to the other place in town to try to maintain the family stability. Please end them!"
Lillia	"Strongly in support of this proposed rule. Iain a nurse practitioner and my company would like me to sign a non-compete clause which is borderline dangerous in my opinion. I have already suddenly been furloughed (without income) during 2020 for Covid, and to limit my other opportunities to support my family is ridiculous. I still have not signed this and may consider leaving my position if they don't amend the non-compete clause. As a woman working in healthcare, I absolutely think non-competes are inhibiting our ability to earn a living for ourselves and our families and support our local communities should we be called to another opportunity. Please eliminate non-competes!!!"
Nathan	"I just wanted to comment that I believe this is an important rule that needs to be made. It will help increase wages and will stop anti-competitive practices. Being able to change jobs is an economic liberty that everyone should have."
Jerome	"I'm a MN attorney and in my professional capacity I have dealt with non-compete agreements for employers trying to enforce them, companies defending suits initiated by other companies alleging that my client is employing someone subject to a non-compete and individuals who have been sued by a former employer based upon a non-compete agreement. In addition I have advised countless individuals about the validity and scope of non-compete agreements they will be subject to upon termination of their employment. Over the years I have observed the following: No client I have represented to enforce a non- compete or plaintiff employers I've opposed that were attempting to enforce a non-compete (contracts that restrict future employment) experienced actual damages, I would describe every situation as a power struggle; every individual I'm aware of who was forced to defend against enforcement of a non- compete experienced significant personal/professional disruptions and financial burdens because of this; and I can't say that I ever recognized a social value served by enforcing a non-compete clause. PROHIBIT THEM."

Will	"Oh, heck yes, ban non-competes! There's already laws on the books to deal with ex employees stealing trade secrets and confidential information, so the only benefit here is as an additional lever to get the employee to put up with insufficient pay or otherwise intolerable conditions. This is a great idea that will increase competition between employers to treat employees better! The market isn't just for products, after all."
Michelle	"As a physician , I strongly support banning non-complete clauses. They lock young physicians into practices/hospitals whether or not these institutions continue to align with a physician's goals. They give institutions free rein to abuse physicians. There are better ways to retain physicians than non-compete agreements."
Joshua	"I work in the IT industry and one of the most popular and growing methods of obtaining IT service is through what is called a managed service provider. Many of these providers including the one I work at ban me from working at another managed service provider a year after I leave the company. As more and more internal IT positions go away and get absorbed my managed service providers, I have been put into a position where if I quit my job or even get fired from my job I would not be allowed to work for a year after leaving. Non-compete clauses need to be banned. They hurt everyday working people and they only help large corporations who are already powerful enough and don't need the help of something like a non compete clause to maintain that power."
Clara	"I believe the non complete clause should be banned for medical care providers, including physicians . By allowing for non compete clause to apply to physicians, you restrict the free market in competing for physician talent. Non compete clauses for physicians have limited physician services in certain markets and May cause physicians to leave the labor market all together. Please ban non compete clauses for physicians."
Josh	"Non competes stifles innovation and limits the ability for individuals to control their own destiny. Although I have never been impacted personally, I have seen the results of over zealous enforcement of non competes ruin or severely impact many of my colleagues. Please consider passing this nile."
Concerned	"Non-competes are unfair and prevent employees from switching to a better job. Employers do not need to worry that an employee will leave, as they will need to leave the area. They are truly unfair and should be eliminated. We need competition!!"
ian	"i have worked for a company for almost 12 years and have made more money that i ever expected and i want to say that upfront because the reason i am for absolutely doing away with non competes has nothing to do

	with the money the environment that myself and my co workers are subjected to everyday has created so much mental stress, anger and frustration that everyone of us wants to leave purely to get away from the owner. we are constantly disrespected and threatened over commission deductions and increases to cost markups so everyone lives in a state of fear. i work in the automotive parts industry and parts break which is why we have automotive service shops all over this country. when one of our parts breaks it takes fighting and arguing with the owner just to be able to take it back and take care of the customer so there is zero customer service at the top. every employee understands that is flat our wrong and we need to warranty parts, but we should have to go through the brain damage that we get from the owner to take a $50 part back. i could go on and on with examples of threats and why the work atmosphere is literally toxic but there wont be enough text space. the main reason i believe non competes need to be illegal is restricting worker movement to get out of a toxic work environment and go work for someone who can be respectful and non threatening. die owner can also control our pay program and make adjustments that lower our commission rate at any time depending on which way die wind is blowing and we as the employee should have die right to go and work elsewhere for a fairer compensation plan without having to stay out of the industry and make money for a year which is the term restriction on our non compete. doing away with non competes can only be good for the American worker, but also for creating new business and growth which only contributes more tax dollars to the system. by restricting employee's rights only one person wins and that's the owner of the company that has their thumb over the employees I attached an email thread from die owner showing the threats lie sends out almost everyday to employees. no one should be subjected to working for someone like this Attachments 85ced7 1 e-7310-4726-be7e- d62cc158b301_Redacted"
Chris	"I emphatically support a ban on non-compete clauses. If we are to exist in a free market society then that market cannot be limited to the ultra wealthy and corporations themselves. Removing these onerous contracts would impact workers across all sectors of the economy and have an inundate boost to the market."

O	"Over the last few years, several non-medical financial institutions have been purchasing medical practices and using non-competes to control the medical system within several cities. As this continues, it will force good physicians to leave and slowly, those spots will be filled by less qualified physicians and non-physician providers, ultimately hurting patients. Non competes do not help protect practices, but rather force physicians to stay in bad situations versus the alternative of leaving an area they call home. They need to be eliminated in order to allow the our medical system to operate at its best. Simply Look at the fields of ophthalmology and dermatology in the last 5 years and you will find large PE groups purchasing practices, young physicians leaving those jobs, and several lawsuits scattered across the country including DC, Minnesota, California, and a myriad other locations trying to force young physicians to honor non competes even though their offers of partnership were not honored."
Daniel	"I strongly agree with the proposed clause to limit non- compete clauses. They hurt American workers. They are especially harmful to young doctors such as myself, do to the inherent power imbalance between large corporate hospitals and physicians, especially as entering into private practice is no longer a possible practice model for the majority of specialties. Non competes hurt doctors and patients."
Lori	"I would definitely be in favor of banning noncompete clauses nationwide. I would imagine most employees would favor this also. The opposition seems to be large corporate employers."

Joseph	"Hello my name is Dr. de Jonge and I am a resident physician . I am commenting to urge you to ban non-compete clauses as they stifle innovation and benefit the powerful. Please also do not exclude healthcare workers from this. Non-competes are not in the interest of patients. Healthcare workers make great sacrifices to serve our patients, don't let hospital systems limit our ability to serve with unfair non-competes. Thanks!"
Stuart	"I think that non-compete clauses are unfair to workers. They put unnecessary strain on the American economy. I think that the rule should move forward."
Lane	"This is absolutely a must. Why are we currently giving employers autocratic reach even AFTER employment? Why are we suppressing the first amendment after employment at all? Workers' rights must be greatly boosted."
Sagar	"It is a tragedy when communities and patients lose access to their specialist physician care and long-standing doctor patient relationships because of non-compete clauses. When a corporation makes a physician's employment conditions untenable, and forces that physician to quit (and then move, because of the non-compete clause), it is the patients that suffer."
William	"Please move forward with this rule change. I have received threatening letters from my former employer because I went to work for a competing company. I feel the non-compete is too long (2 years) and too restrictive. It is very, difficult, expensive and time consuming for individuals to fight these companies who threaten legal action under non-compete agreements."
Drew	"Please implement this for the good of all American laborers!"
Jane	"My employer has continually reduced my commission income on existing clients, but due to the non-compete, I am prevented from leaving to another company that would pay me appropriately and fairly. If the non-compete was cancelled, I would have the right to move to another company, but more importantly, it would force my existing company to treat me more fairly, as well as treating all other salespersons in our office fairly."
Steven	"As a physician , I strongly support this proposal. Hospital non-compete clauses inhibit medicinal professionals from changing employers or starting their own practices which help better serve patients in our community. The current environment of non-compete clauses in physician contracts limits our ability to better serve our patients by overly restricting practice areas, sometimes not even allowing physicians to practice in the same state for years after terminating a contract with an employer."

Steven	"Do not allow healthcare lobbyists to create a 'physician, nurse, etc.' exception. This would only allow hospitals to continue exploiting physicians at the expense of better patient care. Such an exception would be absolutely deplorable."
Shanda	"Noncompete clauses should be banned, including but not limited to healthcare."
Mary Ellen	"I have always thought "non-compete" clauses were totally ridiculous and an unfair practice. I should be able to leave an employer and go across town to another or start my own business. My daughter just graduated from veterinarian school and she had me read her first contract. "What is this non-compete clause," I said, "I would ask for that to be removed." "They all do it," she said. "Well, what are you supposed to do if this doesn't work out and you have already bought a house etc?" was my question. This is the stupidest idea in the world. I thought the USA had free enterprise and competition was part of that economic structure. So yes, I am all for getting rid on non-compete clauses."
Dimitri	"Hello- I'm writing in support of the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. I am a physician , working in an academic setting where I advise trainees as they receive their first job offers. Increasingly, health care systems are inserting such non-compete clauses into their contracts. The main consequence of this is that employers recognize that it is now much more difficult for their physicians to leave, which has made administration far less willing to address problems or otherwise make their system a desirable place to work. In short: it's easier to make it unattractive to leave than it is to make it attractive to stay. As a result, I have seen colleagues reluctantly leave the city (or even the state) where their family has settled, since they can't seek a better job nearby. These non-compete clauses stifle competition and impose significant hardship on employees and their families. They should be banned."
Ralph	"Non compete agreements just keep qualified workers under or unemployed. Obviously not good."
Leah	"As a physician I build relationships with patients. They chose to come see me when they are worried or suffering an ailment. They come for their regular exams and screening tests which is part of our shared decision making process. This patient-physician relationship is of the utmost importance in providing patient centered healthcare. However the organization controls my ability to change health systems and thus making me choose to possibly start over creating these therapeutic relationships or

	stay in a system that may not be best for my own well-being or career goals. If the non compete clause was removed providers could choose what was best for them and their patients and also maintain die years of trust built from working in a community as their physician. I feel this non complete should be removed as it is what is best for my patients and our communities."
Keith	"My Son and Daughter-in-law just moved from Minneapolis to Longmont Colorado. My daughter in law worked for General Mills in Minneapolis in the lab. She had to sign a non-compete agreement that she would not work for another food company for 1 year after separation. they are currently threatening her that she cannot work for another food company! she moved over 750 miles away! She also was not salary. I believe making around $24.00 an hour. She has 2 job offers and is scared but needs to help provide for the family and rent at $3000.00 a month! I told her to take the job and General mills will have to come after her if they are smart enough to find out! This is a real problem and i support doing something about it! Im alright with signing an agreement not to share company secrets but that is way different than not being able to get a job! Thank You. Keith Edwards"
Reid	"As a physician, I agree wholeheartedly with die striking down of the legality of non-compete clauses. This would allow for a more competitive marketplace in which doctors could "vote with their feet" in ensuring optimal patient care and maximal medical system efficiency are both honored. This is applicable in both areas with high physician density and low physician density. The banning of non-compete clauses empowers the individual against the overwhelming force of hospital corporations."
Kim	"I support the elimination of a non-compete clauses. There's enough business for everyone. Although I do support any no direct contact or stealing of previous company's customers unless they contact you first. And, no harmful disrespect, gossip or spoken about previous company. Everyone should be able to make it on their own merits. I was in an industry for 30 years and signed up with a company that had a non-compete clause. It was my livelihood/career. Unfortunately when 1 chose to leave they diligently reminded me of the non-compete. I was lucky enough to fight for my basic needs to continue my career and eventually was let out of the non-compete. It would have been devastation if I could not have continued in my long-time career (the only thing I knew how to do well)."
Bryan	"Please ban non-compete clauses. They're anti worker and only serve the interests of conglomerates that'll drop us workers like a bad habit."
Jesse	"I worked at a small union commercial paving company in the Minneapolis area was Senior superintendent/ Vice President, the owner was 70 and looking to sell. Our account manager had the idea to buy it but she

	couldn't get the SBA loan without assurances I would stay from the bank. They brought me into the to the room and explained it . I agreed because I liked my job and my men in that paperwork was a non compete agreement and dangling sweat equity ownership after the 1st year of employment and the fifth year of employment. Al's the first right to buy the company. So I signed because I believed everything would stay the same plus there was an opportunity for me and my family. I signed it December 10 2021 . We went thru first paving season together full of struggles due to i inflation her lack of leadership etc but managed to get all the work done in the busy paving season. Which ended November 23 2022. On November 28 2022 I was fired before I got my percentage of ownership without any reason . I' in an asset in our industry. I felt betrayed and she was throwing this non compete in my face with malice. So I signed the paperwork for her to get the company then I'm fired when I'm due sweat equity and this non compete making near impossible to find work near my home. These non competes are unfair and used as tools to suppress the working people of America and needs to be stopped immediately. I'm the one who's being run out of town for my hard work and ownership gets to do whatever they want. This is unamerican -and unfair I'm in 100% agreement on this ban it suppresses individuals and opportunities as well as higher wages. Thank you for your time."
Diana	"This rule should be approved, people should be able to work for the employer of their choice. If we don't have that freedom what other freedoms are going to be taken away? We won't be a democracy any more if this rule stands."

David	"Physicians must be exempt from any non compete clauses. They are exploited by hospitals."
Kimberly	"I am an Obgyn who has worked for 15 years in Minnesota at the same large company. The environment is so caustic that I and multiple other partners need to leave. The non compete affects not just us, our budget but our patients as well. Patients should be able to follow their doctor who is already close to where they currently live. Forcing us to move to take another position is not just about the physician but patient care as well!"
Kim	"I signed a contract for a dance fitness type of franchise in about 1983. I had a lawyer look at it and the recommendation was to start my own business using my own name. I think that was probably good advice because I was inexperienced and went out of business in three years. The contract had a non- compete clause rule which said that I would agree not to teach aerobics for about three year within the territories to which I had been assigned after I went out of business or sold the franchise. I complied."

	I never did try and start up another franchise for dance/aerobics. I went on to study and receive a B.A. degree in dance instead. My only issue with the non-compete case rule is that it requires a lot of written contractual type of business transactions for worker with a wide span training and/or experience. Business can be tricky in that there's also non- verbal agreements. Some of these franchises work out of church offices or church basements where they hold monthly meetings. Christian churches who teach and preach about Jesus Christ and Him crucified are well known for the verbal agreements of offering one's life up to Jesus in Faith because they believe He's God's only begotten Son. King James Version John 3:16 of the Holy Bible states. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." In contrast, breaking of a verbal agreement in business transactions because the manager says a franchisee can't prove there was an offer to take over summer classes in a territory where earnings might be large enough to keep a franchisee in business. This happened to me. I didn't write down a verbal agreement anywhere. I know we agreed upon it in the church. The manager was of a different faith than me. Possibly it as an object lesson. I don't know but it was particularly difficult because the manager pitted me against another instructor I knew for a long time. I went out of business. I paid cash for my franchise but the other instructor paid with loans. I guess with loans a franchisee has more written documents and proof of agreements, etc. I was frustrated but I tried to cope as best I could and even sought mental health counseling. It didn't help sometimes because the other instructor who took over the summer classes worked for the health insurer where I got medical care. It seemed like for years the names of these people would pop out and disturb my peace but I kept trying to keep my faith in Jesus Christ and Him crucified. I felt a bit crucified and would like to say that's the irony of the Non-complete clause rule. It's a Ruling that marks an employee as a non-profit earner but no the manager had a strangle hold on me there too. They worked in both profit and non-profit. I guess there's another old adage about being weary of a person who doesn't leave a mark on you. That's probably what Non-compete Clause Rule doesn't do it doesn't leave a mark on you so be weary. Let the Buyer Beware. Be ye Perfect as Jesus is perfect is another bible verse I recall."
Michael	"I am opposed to non-compete clauses in most cases. It is anti-competitive and puts specialized workers, like me, in an impossible position - either stay with your current employer, or move to an adjacent industry and take several steps back from a career perspective. With all the power with the employer, there is no incentive to treat employees well. In technically specialized industries like mine (Medical Devices), this is a trap for employees."
Patrick	"This new law allows a worker to leave an employer free to choose a new job....any job."

Rian	"Non competes serve no purpose but to suppress wages and restrict Americans freedom to choose a job that best rewards them for their work. These contracts should be illegal."
Stephanie	"As a physician , I am hoping non-compete clauses are removed. I am trapped in my job due to die non compete clause. I must move cities if I want to go to a different job. 117,000 physicians left practice this year and there is a shortage of physicians. Noncompete clauses contribute to burnout. Hospitals also do not allow fair market competition due to noncompete clauses."
Karen	"I would LOVE to see the onerous non-compete agreements removed from the insurance industry. The fact that any one person could actually move an account, can't say any disparaging things about the employer (even if they are TRUE), can't attract good people away from a poor employer that doesn't care a whit about their employees and makes their live's miserable during employment and afterwards should NOT be legal. Yet, some of the non- compete agreements I've had to sign in order to start a position, are that onerous. In my view, some of the one's I've had to sign could prevent me from making a living - something that should NEVER happen. That's paranoid on the part of the employer. If the insurance broker is that good at what they do, they should never go after an employee who leaves - for whatever reason. If they drive the employee out through bad mouthing, making up lies about their performance, threaten them with the lack of a paycheck, etc. then their non-compete agreement should be null and void - not enforceable. So I'd like to see the non-compete agreements for the insurance industry go away for GOOD!!! Then maybe employers would treat their employees with more respect. Without employees you are out of business!!!"
Rob	"Non-compete clauses are bad for physicians and bad for patients. The American Hospital Association does not speak for physicians. I strongly disagree with the American Hospital Association stance. I vote to abolish non-compete clauses. Robert Fraser, MD"
Lindsey	"Non-Complete clauses should all be deemed not enforceable. As a young professional, I was obligated to sign and non-compete- locking me into my current position before I really understood die possibilities of my career path. I now am locked into where I am now, or if I leave, cannot work within my same field and maintain my desired salary range."
Erin	"I am a physician and mother who worked 5 years at an academic center in a rural state. My non-compete was 35 miles. When I was ready to leave the university, I had to leave the state because of the non-compete. Our family left a home, friends, neighbors, and an entire support system that took years to build. Non-compete clauses can hurt parents especially, as we rely on our communities (family, services, neighbors, schools, colleagues) as we raise our children. Many physicians will stay in unfavorable work situations to avoid the toll of a move on their families and themselves. They end up accepting lower salaries and poorer working environments because of this."

Tom	"As a yoga teacher and psychologist I am in full support of the Federal Trade Commission's proposed rule that would impose a nationwide ban on almost all non-compete agreements between employers and workers."
Michael	"In favor of banning non-compete clauses. They cause undue burden on your average worker and are anti-capitalistic in nature."
Hannah	"I am writing in support of the proposed rule to ban non compete agreements. I work as a nurse practitioner in geriatrics. After working in the ICU as a registered nurse while going to graduate school, finding my first job as a new graduate nurse practitioner was not as easy as expected. I eventually landed a job as a geriatric nurse practitioner serving residents of long term care and assisted living facilities. After receiving an offer, I was also told I needed to sign a non-compete upon accepting the offer. I was quite naive about the new world I was entering as an advanced practice provider. I did not consider how restrictive this non compete measure would prove to be in the future. I was told by several that my employer took non competes seriously. After 3 years of working for this employer, I realized quickly that the non compete agreement was a clever trap to reign in cheaper and lesser experienced clinicians, and keep them from transferring to competitors within the geriatric field. This, despite offering no formal performance review process or merit increase. I had one salary increase in my 3 years of working there, and this only happened after raising my threshold to receive a productivity bonus. Essentially, it was a wash. I have a passion for treating the geriatric population. This non compete has impacted my ability to continue this work with an employer that serves both its employees and patients in the way they deserved to be cared for. It has allowed this employer to become stagnant and pay little attention to staff retention and paying fair wages."
Billie	"Please ban noncompete clauses. I am a physician . Non compete clauses only allow corporations such as large healthcare organizations to force physicians and other healthcare workers to stay in positions under disturbing working conditions. It essentially allows for forced labor. Additionally, it is harmful to patients in that it restricts access to good physicians in many areas of the country because those physicians have to move far away from underserved areas. It also leads to decreased choices and poor healthcare for those patients. Hospitals will spend millions of dollars to fight a ban on noncompete clauses rather than spend that money investing in their healthcare workers and direct patient care, which should show you how abusive die system is. I urge you to please ban them. Billie Jo Grieve MD FACS"

Erika	"I work in healthcare in Minnesota and have faced some very restrictive non-compete clauses. This significantly impacts my ability to find a job and also reduces the options to find a more competitive salary. The healthcare system is already losing workers and many of the clinics or hospitals are short staffed. This therefore reduces both the quality of care and access to care for patients. I believe we should not have non-compete clauses, especially in healthcare, because it is impacting our essential workers and patients."
Heather	"I am in full support of the FTC banning non-competes."
Laurie	"I support this rule. Non-compete clauses have gotten out of hand and make it too difficult for workers to switch to better-paying jobs."
Ryan	"As a physician , I completely support this proposed rule"
Thomas	"I'm glad to see action being taken by the FTC to get rid of this anti-competitive corporate behavior. Non-competes stifle worker mobility and have become so common place they are an unavoidable part of working for any major business. I support ending all non-compete clauses."
Charles	"The FTC should implement the ban on non-compete clauses as proposed. These clauses are unjust and destructive the to societal well being brought about by employment. It is contradictory to demand the unemployed work but allow these destructive barriers to employment to remain in the marketplace. Please ban them without exception."
Jonathan	"Non-competes may be responsible for stifling the ability of workers to freely leave corporations, move between areas, and negotiate a competitive wage. It is in the best interest of the government and businesses to discontinue this practice, as constraints on the labor market are not helpful to either the employer, who suffers an artificial shortage of viable candidates, or the government, who suffers an artificially lower tax-take born from the lack of growth in highly productive sectors, born from a lacking competition between companies. If the law should punish the transfer of trade secrets given in-confidence, then it should punish that activity. It should not punish workers, companies, and governments as well."
Mike	"Ridiculous concept! You can bet that these "rules" don't apply to the people who are coining up with them! Imagine if you told an executive that they couldn't leave their position for a better offer! It's truly preposterous."

Erik	"Please institute this change. As a practicing physician , I have seen noncompetes severely stifle innovation and mobility. They also unfairly harm providers who become stuck in jobs that are not working for them but they are unable to leave for a better job in the same area because it would violate their noncompete and we can't just easily switch professions. Noncompetes are an unfair limitation on an individual's ability to work for an employer of their choice and should be abolished."
Ryan	"A ban on non-compete clauses would be a win for The American Dream."
Vince	"Things began to get worse years ago. We were in the middle of another court case where  was suing someone that had left the company for allegedly violating their no compete clause. On this day we were called into another meeting where he looked at all of us and said...."I AM GOD we will do things my way. If you don't like it you can go work for somebody else." When asked if he would release us from our no compete clause he said NO. That's the kind of person that owns the company I work for. One of my coworkers told me that he said "I AM GOD" again in another meeting I wasn't there for that one. Myself and 3 coworkers are the only ones brave enough to step forward at this point. Our employer is a narcissistic, toxic, aggressive, degrading human being. Unfortunately, I was forced to sign a no-compete clause when I started working at  out of Minnesota. I dread going to work every day. This no compete clause is like a chain and I am the dog that can't escape my daily beatings. It's not just me as I mentioned I have 3 co-workers that are brave enough to step forward. Us four made over a million dollars last year and we still want out. All we want to do is escape."
Emelie	"In medicine, doctors have become employed service providers. It is unfair to subject them to a noncompete that prohibits them from working within a certain mile radius of any office owned by a practice for 2 years. Doctors cannot do no clinical work without losing their license in the meantime. And moving is disruptive to families in particular school children. in each area there are only a few health systems, job opportunities are. It plentiful (despite a doctor shortage). It is not fair to prohibit work in areas where people need to be. Especially when doctors spend a decade training and incur high debt. Nonsolicit of patients can be reasonable, but not compete is not."
Karen	" Physicians are leaving medical practice at an incredibly high rate. Each physician who leaves medicine in their prime represents a loss to our society. Noncompete clauses make it much more difficult for physicians to balance work life responsibilities and can push physicians out of medicine. There are no trade secrets in medicine."

MMaria	"Please complete this ban. As a physician and got all it is inappropriate."
Kyle	"I agree with the proposed rule to end the ability of employers to use non-compete clauses in employment contracts. My fiancé is subject to such a clause as a physical therapist and this harms not only her economic prospects but her patient's care. That is because many of her complaints about her current employer is how she is forced to treat multiple patients at a time, even if one of the patients is a fall risk. If she was able to find a new job nearby, not only would she be able to keep her commute distance low (the location of the clinic was a large part of our decision to buy a house in the area) and therefore keep our transportation costs down, but her patients could receive better care."
Michele	"Please end the non compete clause contracts so many workers are forced to sign. I recently met a young hairdresser who can't work within 30 miles of her former employer's salon for 5 years! It was her first job & she had no idea what she was signing when hired. This is not right. End the no compete contracts for low wage workers."
Penny	"I support the FTC proposed ban on noncompete agreements. These agreements don't allow workers to find better jobs with better wages and benefits. I believe workers should have the right to seek employment elsewhere if they are not satisfied in their current position. Companies have enough control over hirings, firings, wages and benefits. Workers need control as well."
Mitchell	"I know commentators have provided exhaustive commentary about the negative effects of non-competes. All I have to add as a physician is that I'm literally not allowed to serve patients in a 50 mile radius of my current hospital because of these arrangements. I would love to work with rural clinics that need psychiatric support, but my current hospital forbids outside employment. This is especially unfortunate since they don't provide any opportunities to nearby small towns."
Adam	"Non-compete clauses or contacts are a significant issue across many industries. They put workers at an unfair disadvantage when seeking employment from a corporation that requires them. In many cases, employees have no choice but to sign the non-compete and hinder their future career prospects should they choose to leave. Non-compete clauses/contracts must be eliminated"

Lia	"As a doctor that has practiced for 20+ years I have been limited to moonlighting or finding a better paying job throughout my career My hospital pays me <50% percentile because they know that if I leave o can't work anywhere close to my family This has affected my investment in my wellness and my productivity I think banning all noncompete would push hospitals to strive for excellence the same one they require and expect from us Thank you"
Michael	"Used to work for a Canon copier outlet that had a burdensome quota. Left employment for an office supply store. The fact that I could sell paper & generic toner prompted legal actions against us both."
Joyce	"After being held under a non-compete for 17years I am praying this ruling goes through."
Brian	"I can't thank you enough for undertaking this endeavor. I am a physician and an independent business owner who was previously employed by a large health care system as medical director for nearly a decade. The medical community has long lobbied to eliminate these horrible and un-American clauses that only function to prevent people from obtaining gainful employment. In Minnesota, after one health care system incorporated a non-compete clause 11110 their contract, they have all now incorporated them, making it nearly impossible for physicians and other health care professionals to change employers. This is highly problematic if a provider needs to move to another suburb, say to change school districts for their children. It is especially terrible in rural areas, where providers must move to another city or state in order to secure employment. All of our health care systems are overwhelmed by patient care needs - especially in my field of mental health. Each health care system has more patients than they can service, yet they still enforce a non-compete clause for mental health providers, which deprives their own patients from obtaining services from smaller, independent clinics that are in no way a threat to the larger health care systems. This is a disservice to patients and creates an undue burden on primary care providers, who are ill-equipped to deal with the challenges of patients struggling with severe mental illnesses such as schizophrenia and bipolar disorder. Obviously, these large systems are more concerned about retaining providers who bring in larger dollar amounts for patient care (surgeons, cardiologists, gastroenterologists, etc...), but since they must treat all providers equally, they force everyone to sign non-compete clauses across the board. The reason I say that a non-compete clause is anti-American, is because competition is the heart of capitalism, and America is built on small businesses. To forcibly prevent competition by law eats at the heart of the free market, causing irreparable harm to the economy through consummate legal wrangling. When you graduate from medical school with

	over a quarter million dollars in education debt, you are obligated to work and repay the money the government invested in you. But when all of the contracts you sign contain a non-compete clause, this is by no means voluntary, but compulsory, which subsequently transforms any willful employment into indentured servitude, as no matter how hard things get with contract changes, a global pandemic, staffing shortages and even mandatory furloughs (all of which we recently experienced), you are forced to remain with an employer who may not have your best interests in mind. or even the best interests of the patients. There are so many other ways to entice providers to stay within a health care system. I know about simply supporting their needs or using financial incentives, such as signing bonuses, retention offers, and phased-in vestment for pension plans? This is the carrot as opposed to the stick. Again, thank you for righting this terrible wrong."
Heather	"My husband has worked for 15 years at a small, family-owned fire protection company and has loved his job. Just recently however, this company was bought-out by a national company, and everything has changed. They forced employees to sign a non-compete agreement, even though we live in a state where those are prohibited. This corporation has also made moves to shut out any local customers that cannot afford their drastically increased prices. So now my husband has to explain to these long-time customers why all of a sudden prices have increased by 200%. For this reason alone, myself and my husband would like to start our own small business selling fire extinguishers in order to help out all of the customers who can no longer afford to buy from his current place of employment. But now before we can even get started, we have to hire an attorney to see what can be done about the NCA he was forced to sign. This shouldn't have to happen. We should be allowed to pursue our dream of having our own small business and not worry about being sued by a huge corporation...one that won't even consider taking on the small customers that we would be helping. Needless to say, I am in full support of the FTC's proposal to ban these types of agreements."
Lauren	"Non-compete clauses are a significant life altering piece of legalities aimed at protecting large companies, allowing them to undervalue their employees and treat employees poorly. If the employee asks to be treated fairly, the employee is forced to make a decision to completely upheave their lives due to the restrictiveness of the ability to provide/work to support their families. No one should have to sell their belongings, homes and relocate due to a job not working out."
Ryan	"As a future physician I think banning Noncompete Clauses would have huge benefits for the medical community as a whole. If an employer is not treating an employee fairly or how they view they should be treated they should be allowed to shop their skills elsewhere to see if they can find a better fit. The optimal fit leads to the optimal use of one's skills and noncompete clauses directly prevent this. Abolishing this will help remove employers who treat their employees poorly while also giving good employers a chance to flourish."

TJ	"The compete clause significantly impairs clinicians ability to practice freely, especially when there is significant shortages. Corporates cannot be allowed to dictate where clinicians practice"
Kaitlyn	"Non-compete agreements prevent workers from leaving poor working conditions. It's important to me to see workers mobility open up."
Elizabeth	"I am in favor of banning the non-compete clause. I am a healthcare provider and am subject to a non-compete clause. This means that if I ever want to stop working for my organization I will need to move, or commute out of my own community to practice elsewhere. It is antithetical to the idea of adequate access to healthcare, during a crisis in primary care."
Samantha	"I believe that companies should not be able to "force" people into a non-compete agreement. It hinders competition, growth for the company and employees, as well as a person's income. I had to sign a non-compete agreement once and it did affect where I could apply for jobs when I wanted to leave the company. My dad had a non-compete agreement and when that company laid him off he had to make a tough decision. He was only able to get severance pay if he continued to follow the non-compete agreement. He decided to not take the severance pay that he deserved and needed! Non-compete agreements hurt people and company growth."
Jessica	"Non compete clauses unfairly limit physicians . I work in a large metro area, and was limited in where I could work after the work environment I was in became toxic. There is no shortage of people needing primary care here. The "justification" of non compete as not taking patients makes no sense. In primary care we are booked weeks out. The non compete was only in the contract to try to force me to stay at the practice. They would not take it out before I signed."
Elliot	"Specific to the crop insurance industry , which is supported heavily by die US taxpayer, and administered by USDA's Risk Management Agency, is stricken with non-compete employment contracts on the private-sector side that provides agriculture grower support and service. The AIP (Approved Insurance Provider) private companies use non-compete widely for upper management, sales staff and claims adjusting staff. Even IT staff are restricted to pursue employment with another crop insurance company for a period of time when leaving current employer. Many of the covenants restrict employment up to 2 years to work for a competitor. The Federal Crop Insurance system advances quickly with necessary changes and new insurance offers as frequently as monthly as Congress and USDA react to

	natural disasters. Some of the best and brightest are contractually detained, as exiting the industry for 1 to 2 years would cause these individuals to lose expertise. The second tier, the independent licensed agent, is heavily restricted by non-compete contracts. This has created regional monopolies. New talented agents are held at compensation level that they could easily exceed with the ability to create their own agency or take a higher compensation offer from another agency. Rural America and America's farmers and ranchers need the best of best to deal with the risks that they face on a daily basis. Innovation and expertise is being thwarted by die viral use of non-compete employment agreements."
MICHAEL	"Non compete agreements depress wages and oppress workers on every level of the economy. If the talents or knowledge of an employee is valuable, that value should be compensated fairly. The market is not fair, if it is not fair to all of the participants."
Mark	"I am a physician in my final year of training, and I am currently in the process of finding my first job. There is a relative shortage of physicians with my skillset and in my specific field. I am astonished by the number of employers that try to include non-compete clauses in their contracts. In many of the towns or cities I am considering employment, I would be the only provider with my skillset. If honored, these clauses would effectively prevent thousands of patients from having access to cutting edge care--all in the name of corporate profits."
mick	"I have a very niche profession as a Competitive Intelligence Analyst in the extremely saturated cybersecurity market. I've been doing this for over ten years, and it is the only profession I intend to pursue. When I left one company to join another, I was threatened with legal action for months if I even spoke the name of my previous employer to the new one. It was extremely unsettling. I know that my current employer has taken legal action against colleagues that decided to resign and take a new position with a competitor. The company was successful in forbidding this person to take the new job for one complete year, costing this individual who knows how much in lost wages and legal fees. This is not acceptable. I fully support the eradication of non- compete orders between companies and employees."
Brandi	"I am a veterinarian and have been subject to non- compete clauses throughout my 16 year career. When I was young, I was able to uproot my life to move to a new job outside my clause, but that is not feasible with a family. After leaving my most recent job, I've been forced to commute at least 2 hrs a day, in order to follow the rules. I'm not willing to move and make my husband resign from a job he loves, and attempt to find daycare in a new location. As the breadwinner of our family, it's outrageous that I can't continue to do my job in the community we have been a part of for so many years. Other vet clinics in the area are desperate for help, yet I am not allowed to provide them with my much needed skills and experience. Truly just harming everyone involved. Non-compete clauses are outdated and harmful to so many industries, I encourage you to abolish them."

Victoria	"I support the proposed rule to ban employers from imposing non-competes on their employees. I am a veterinary student and we learned about non-competes because they are so prevalent in our industry - I believe about 85% of veterinarians' contracts have them. Veterinarians have some of the lowest income: debt ratios of any profession and adding a non-compete clause to contracts continues to exacerbate that issue. Oftentimes if you want to switch jobs you need to relocate, not just to another neighborhood, but to a completely different city, which can mean relocating your whole family. It also prevents veterinarians from starting their own practices where they live, which is a great way to increase one's earnings, and increase competition in the area, thereby lowering prices and increasing the quality of veterinary care. Veterinarians are also 2.5x more likely than the average person to commit suicide. I also fully support this proposed rule because it will help give veterinary professionals the freedom in their lives that they need to be successful and happy."
Greg	"§ 910.1 Definitions (b) (2) "Functional test for whether a contractual term is a non-compete clause" should be amended and broadened so that its second sentence includes language to the effect of: "The non-compete clause includes a contractual term that is a de facto non-compete clause because it has the effect of prohibiting the worker from seeking or accepting employment or executing job duties associated with employment with a person or operating a business after the conclusion of the worker's employment with the employer." It is important to include a direct reference to language to the effect of, "or executing job duties associated with employment" or else this rule will be immediately and completely circumvented via a contractual provision already in place and used to enforce non-compete clauses at Epic Systems Corporation. I have no doubt that similar companies would also adopt similar language to prevent their employees from achieving employment in their field of work. Background: I am a former employee of Epic Systems Corporation ("Epic"), based in Madison, WI. which requires all employees to sign a non-compete clause when they begin working. Their non-compete clause prevents employees from seeking employment at their competitors. My role at Epic was as a software developer working on improving a narrow aspect of their scheduling software. Epic's non-compete requires that former employees do not work at a list of their competitors. This list has thousands of entries, and includes many of the large, high paying companies in the healthcare software industry. The contract also prevents former employees from working for their customers. Epic's market share is so large that this precludes working at all large hospital systems in the United States. I have attached an old version of this list. I believe that this non-compete: * Substantially and adversely affects the ability of former Epic employees to be employed at the market value of their skills and services * Forces former Epic employees into work outside of the healthcare industry, where their

	previous work experience is less relevant Epic Systems Corporation employs at least two different strategies to force employees to abide by its non-compete. First, they require new employees to sign the non-compete clause for a term of 1 year after the last date of employment, and extend the clause to two years if they receive stock. In practical terms, the combination of a one or two year lock-out from any medical software consulting company, or any direct competitor, is a death knell for the former employee's career for one or two years. Many former employees have discussed "waiting out" the non-compete in less lucrative fields. The second, and more pernicious strategy, is that Epic has signed contracts with their customers, as well as with any consulting companies who work with their customers, which prohibit those companies from employing former Epic employees. Epic enforces this contractual agreement by not giving former employees access to key pieces of job functionality for their (potential) new role working for their customer. They do this by restricting "UserWeb" access."
Kacia	"I strongly support elimination of non-compete clauses. When non-compete agreements are enforced, workers are simply stuck in their jobs, even if their circumstances, or the job itself, changes. This is especially true for physicians. Highly trained physician specialists, who can only find jobs at tertiary care centers in dense urban areas, can essentially be forced to stay at the same job for their entire career unless they are willing and able to move their entire life to a new urban area outside the non-compete radius. This also stifles recruitment by other employers who would benefit from their expertise. Ultimately, non-compete clauses end up being harmful to both employees and employers. I urge you to enact this rule, and eliminate non-compete clauses as an option in employment contracts."
Emma	"Non-competes should be abolished"
Sina	"My non-compete kept me in a job that had me incredibly burned out because I couldn't work anywhere within 30 miles of my practice. My mental health suffered horribly, and when I finally left I had to drive 1.5 hours each way to stay outside the boundary for another two years."
Dr	"This rule is long overdue and within healthcare will have a huge impact on improving patient care, access and provider satisfaction. We know the healthcare system in the US needs to be changed and with the shift to value based care, a crucial component has to be the ability of patients to continue to see the physicians that have cared for them for years, and noncompete rules unfairly restrict patient access, limit a provider's ability to practice medicine effectively and cause undue hams and financial burden on essentially everyone involved. Please pass this post-haste!"

	handshake and at a later date, the owner had me sign a contract. The contract had a 50 mile radius non-compete. This effectively kicked me out of Utah since the clinic was in the Salt Lake City area. My second experience was in Minnesota. I moved from one clinic to another. The nature of how I left the 1st clinic made the non-compete null and void (I paid a lawyer $7500 for the privilege of learning this fact). Nonetheless, die new clinic placed me far away from the main site. This adversely impacted my productivity and my contract was not renewed. In my opinion, and based on my past experiences, non-compete clauses should be eliminated nationwide."
Jackson	"I wholeheartedly support a ban on non-compete contract language. As a physician , my career depends on the unique and personal knowledge in my head. A clinic, hospital or physician group only provides infrastructure, not intellectual property. I have been burned several times by a non-compete and I have also had a new company ban me from certain geographic areas for fear of a non-compete lawsuit (despite there being no basis for that fear). By banning me from going to certain locations, I lost business and had to seek new employment. Non-compete contract language should be banned from ALL businesses nation wide."
Joseph	"This proposition is especially important in the software engineering world, where the very definition of "non-compete" can get very murky. It's not uncommon for software engineers to look for work in fields that are familiar to them, and for companies to look for engineers whose work history aligns with the company's line of work. I understand the need for corporations to protect their intellectual property and investments in research and development, but non-compete clauses are not the answer. Agreements that hinder one's ability to find work in any way should be at least easily disputable, if not downright illegal."
Katelyn	"Hello, due to a non-compete that my previous employer was known to enforce, I had to leave my career for an entire year and take a job that paid about 1/4 of my wage. Most other coworkers who left the company end up paying approximately $20,000 for their right to work because our previous employers loves to sue anyone who leaves. I was sent a certified letter threatening legal action against me during my year off even though I hadn't even found a job yet. We are hairstylists, and having a non-compete like the one we had prohibits us from entrepreneurship or ever being able to leave the company without fear of being sued for $20,000. That is a ton of money for working families!! Please help us be able to thrive instead of work in fear and get rid of non-competes!"
Joan	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Thank you for reading my message. 1100% support banning of noncompete agreements. Noncompete agreements only benefit corporations and place undue restrictions on individuals. This creates a monopoly of sorts, which regulators try to block when companies try to merge, so why do noncompete agreements get a pass? These agreements handcuff individuals who could advance their income or opportunity by being able to move to a competitor. Individuals do not have the legal or financial resources to risk a violation of a noncompete, so they stay. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Brianna	"Non-compete clauses are the modern-day vestiges of indentured servitude. They are created by those in power to benefit those in power. And, in order for all of us to live in a more just world, those in power are going to need to give up some of their power Banning non-compete clauses is one step toward a more just world and a more equitable distribution of power. Ban non-complete clauses now!"

Megan	"I am a PA from Duluth, MN and I am hoping the NPRM is banned. Myself and colleagues have struggled with being forced to sign a non-compete clause when new hospitals or facilities open up in the area. We live in a smaller area with only 2 hospitals to choose from. Because of this, providers in northern Minnesota are grossly underpaid and forced to work in unfair conditions (understaffed, higher work load than feasible, and not given time or tools for continued education). This affects patient care and local economy negatively. I hope for the preservation and safety of the public the non compete is banned."
Jessica	"Non-competes are excessive and abusive to employees. As a professional, if I decide to leave my job or get fired, I would have to move my family to find another job with a 30 mile and 3 year non-compete which is what my original contract states. This doesn't protect the business as I'm prohibited from using trade secrets and from contacting previous clients anyways. It does nothing but cause us to upend our lives"
Nathan	"I think all non-compete contracts should be illegal and void. It greatly affects doctor/patient relationships when a Doctor is forced to move miles away when fired. This affects not only physicians but also veterinarians like myself. They have great negative affects on the family of any worker subjected to these horrible contracts, forcing children to move miles away from their friends and relationships that they have built for years. Both the AMA and Bar associations have called non-compete clauses as unmoral. I agree. The reason California has the best technology companies in the world is because workers are able to move from job to job or create their own company at any time. Innovation is greatly stifled if workers are prevented from capitalizing on their great ideas. The tech companies haven't suffered any from this either as they are the leaders in the world. These contracts only benefit the companies and not the workers or citizens."

Kate	"I support the opinion that non compete clauses should no longer be apart of employment contracts. Non compete clauses in Healthcare interfere with continuity of care which is extremely important in patient care. A non compete clause also reduces employment options with out having to completely up root your family. In addition it reduces work place competition."
Cole	"I strongly support this rule and would be positively impacted. I work in the technology field , which is plagued by onerous noncompete agreements. Non- compete agreements negative impact innovation, because engineers are prevent from moving to new teams within their industry working on new technology to displace existing technologies owned by large corporations. With this rule change I would be able to actively change jobs within my industry and not fear of legal repercussions."
Michael	"I strongly support the Commission in adopting the rule to ban noncompetes. I have often seen these abusive contractual limitations in employment letters for family and friends in low-level positions, such as entry-level sales associates on the floor in big box retail stores that sell hardware and home improvement materials. Also in engagement letters for college students in internships. These were people who had no access to any kind of important trade secret information, who were paid minimum wage or low hourly wages, and whose employers kept them below 40 hours/week to avoid providing benefits. Their noncompetes were completely non-negotiable and were abusive, terrifying blocks on their ability to look for better jobs to improve their situation. An exception to the rule can be made for high-level executives and people who sell their businesses, and trade secret law and confidentiality agreements can be used by employers to protect legitimate trade secrets. But ordinary workers should never be subject to noncompetes. Please adopt this rule."
A	"I am in support of NOT allowing employers forcing non-compete clauses on employees. It traps individuals to work for an employer and limits their freedom to take their skills and talents elsewhere if they wish. Most people need to job hop to get a raise, a non-compete agreement would make the ability to seek higher wages and a better life difficult to impossible depending on where they live."
Trevor	"Non-compete clauses unfairly restrict right to work. They also unduly burden me as an individual if a company decides to enforce a non compete clause, potentially coating me legal fees just to continue working. Please make non competes a thing of the past."

Matthew	"As a physician, non-compete contracts limit opportunities to engage in care improvement, impede collaborative efforts and negatively impact providing health care. In 2023, there is no longer a valid reason that non-compete clauses should be a part of physician contracts, much less any professional contracts."
Paula	"Seldom is a non-compete clause anything but injurious to the worker. I applaud this rule and support its goals."
Richard	"This is long overdue. I work in a field with a very limited number of employers, and I have been forced to relocate and change industries several times over the last 30 years because these agreements are standard It has cost me dearly in both monetary and quality of life terms."
Bethany	"My name is Bethany. I am a Licensed Independent Clinical Social Worker and work in Outpatient Mental Health Therapy in Duluth, MN. Iain currently bound by a non-compete clause. If and when I choose to transition to a new agency, this non-compete clause negatively impacts the clients who would want to continue seeing me for therapy. I would argue that it also negatively impacts the agency, as they would have to find therapists who often already have full caseloads for my clients to see. This often results in clients having lapses in care, which can lead to lack of follow through with the new therapist, thus leading to worse mental health outcomes. In addition, any research out there will tell you that the therapeutic relationship is the most significant factor in what makes therapy effective. When this is disrupted due to non-compete clauses, and an individual is transferred to another therapist, this is a setback at LEAST in the change/healing process, and potentially can stall progress altogether, especially when the client has difficulty with trust and building relationships. In addition, the pay for mental health can be abysmal compared to the cost of obtaining the degree. If mental health agencies were forced to offer more competitive wages in order to retain staff, this could likely mean that there would be less turnover from agency to agency."
Diana	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost die economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

Martin	"Support revised changes because they will allow for lower health care costs. As a consumer, this is very important because non-competition means higher prices."
Monica	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements."
Jamie	"I am in favor of abolishing these contracts based on the abuse I and other co-workers face on a daily basis. The owner of our company publicly threatens us, shames us with name calling, and abuses us if we even think about leaving his company to do our same job at a different business. This non compete contract has us unfairly imprisoned. I feel like I am in an abusive and dysfunctional marriage with my current employer. Many of us have commented in support of this ruling."
Carolyn	"Hospital non competes lead to physician burn out and many leaving the profession. Hospitals will use die fact that a doctor has community connections and doesn't want to uproot their families to push profit over humane working conditions. When physicians are over worked and cannot leave to practice elsewhere in the community everyone suffers, including patients."
Shirley	"I've heard & read about the negative impact of 'non-compete clauses' on departing employees...many who just want to improve their lives....I am for limiting the power of these businesses to impose such clauses."
glenn	"As a physician , I strongly advocate for a ban on these clauses. Not only are health care professionals handcuffed - with limited options on where to seek new employment, but patients also suffer as they need to find a new provider when theirs is forced to leave town because they desire a better employment situation."
Gary	"The veterinary clinic I work in was recently bought by a corporation in another state. Besides die suppression of competition, which is antithetical to a free market, the non-compete clause can stifle ones ability to stay in a community they are rooted in. I live in a rural area near family where I want to be. If I choose to leave the corporation, I have to leave my community and home to work somewhere away from home while a corporation in another state grows roots in my home that they have no interest in. Seems to infringe on my right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as well."

J	"I worked for an abusive boss and had job offers from other companies. I was forced to stay at my position due to a non-compete clause, even though the new employer did not directly compete with my current company. Threatening letters from my current employer's lawyers were sent to me and the new employer who wanted to hire me. I had no choice but to stay as I could not afford to quit. I stuck out working for the abusive person for a few years and the retired early. I would have normally worked 3 to 5 years longer and would have been able to save additional retirement money, but did not. This non- compete from the abusive boss will impact me for the rest of my life. Last year the abusive boss was finally walked out the door-too late for me but good for rest of employees."
John	"I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a formal rule that bans noncompete agreements. This should be banned in the USA as i see it only hurts the people of this country. Betsy	"I support the FTC taking action to limit the use of non-competes, especially for lower wage workers. This is a discriminatory practice that is limiting access to opportunity for many workers."
Heather	"the FTC should eliminate noncompetes altogether or at the very least severely restrict the conditions under which they may be applicable and enforceable. Other mechanisms such as non-disclosure agreements and patents already exist to prevent trade secrets from being disseminated. Companies are using this as a proxy to force retention in substandard working conditions, reduce wage competition, and restrict the economic freedoms of individuals. Companies should bear the burden of creating environments where employees choose to stay without coercion; if they are not capable of taking good care of employees, perhaps they should not be in business."

Emily	"I support the FTC to ban non competes. Imagine your child looking up at you, and telling you she wanted to be just like you and style hair for a living. My non compete as a hair stylist and regional director to 4 different salons said: I couldn't do hair for 2 years within 25 miles from ALL locations. Nor could I do hair of any client that T serviced for a year prior to my departure, within those same parameters- that included my mother. IF I decided to leave, I would be sued and have to also pay their legal bills on top of mine. I had to short sale my house because I couldn't pay my bills. I had to use my 401k (after being taxed) to support my family. Your see, I had bills that my income of over a decade in the industry afforded me. I had to start all over at the bottom of the totem pole. I had to apply and receive, welfare, even though I was able to work and make a living. If I went 25 miles away from the closest business, (doesn't mean from my home) I had to work there for 2 years and rebuild my clientele because they were considered "property" of the salon. Then what? After 2 years come back to the cities to start all over again just so I could work close to home? This is absurd!! I couldn't solicit my clients- Even the ones that had been referred to me because of MY work. The clients that I brought with me to that salon- I was not allowed to do their hair for 2 years within 25 miles of any of the salons. I received my education from a school- not a salon. Since when is coloring someone's hair a trade secret? I only did hair out of one of those 4 locations- why is it 25 miles from ALL locations? This is abuse of power. Modern day slavery. How is it legal that she hijacked my career? She destroyed my ability to provide for my family- a simple notion. The income threshold should NOT be tested. It will not change the behavior of the non-competes. Very young people walk into a salon with little to no education past high school. They are given a non compete to sign or they wont have a job- They don't know what it says and they feel the pressure to sign. This is signing under duress. Something that would be valuable for the stylist in court. If they had the money to have someone represent them- OUR LEGAL RIGHT. The companies have deep pockets and they stylists/ spa employees can't contend with that. We have to claim bankruptcy, short sale a house, go into foreclosure, or use up our 401K. Often times the stress of this, (speaking from experience) splits up a family. The children of this world are affected because a young adult chose the right to pursue happiness; unaware of the wolf in sheep's clothing, about to destroy their future if they ever decided to make a lateral career move. This is unjust. This is abuse. This should not only make non- competes illegal; The people behind such non-competes should be prosecuted."

Emily	"I cannot overstate my support for the elimination of non-compete clauses. I am over-the-moon happy that this action is under consideration by the Federal Trade Commission. I commend the dedicated FTC staff who have demonstrated vision and the bravery to bring this action forward to die benefit of employees and workers across many industries and professions. I have read many of the existing comments and appreciate others who also oppose non- compete clauses. I, too, have seen first hand in my own occupation (the medical profession) how such 'non-competes' keep physicians in unhappy positions or force unwanted relocations of families to find new work. Over the years, I had read that 'non-compete clauses' should not be allowed due to die restraint of a person's 'trade'. I believe that this is true. Please, please, please get rid of the non-compete clauses across the USA in private and public sectors!"
Jennifer	"I'm a retired RN & worked mostly in the state of MN during my 45 year career. Thirty plus years of my career I worked in hospitals under the MNA union contracts. But I also had a number of friends in other states & at hospitals who weren't under the MNA union contracts who were told they weren't supposed to talk about their salaries with others. These weren't non-compete contracts; but once these nurses did talk about their pay, it was found that there were huge discrepancies between hospitals for salaries, benefits, and workplace conditions. It also became apparent that men were paid more than women across the board, just because they were men! I don't know what I'd do in a non-compete contract back when I was just starting out in nursing (in 1969); but I definitely knew by the mid-'80's that what was being done back then was wrong. I can't imagine a non-compete contract working in a nursing field now-a-days either. I do worry about my kids & future generations being enslaved by such contracts, however."
Elaine	"Non-competes need to be made unlawful. They prevent competition and all for bad behavior by leadership. Please get rid of them"
Amelia	"I support the proposed ban on non competes because they help suppress wages, not just for high earning positions but also in low wage industries. In some cases fast food workers or janitors have to sign non competes, forcing them to stay at their jobs even when they many have opportunities to make more money at another company within their industry."
Anne	"My brother thought he had found his dream job. He signed the non-compete clause as required by this company. This job turned into a nightmare Due to the non-compete, he was not able to work in the same state. Commuting to another state for years to support his family caused lost wages and extreme stress on his wife and young girls. He eventually had to leave the field he had trained for which caused further loss in wages, impacts on his health, and even more stress on his family. And why? Not because he had any special information. It was just because the company wanted to control its employees and prevent them from finding better opportunities. RIDICULOUS!"

Patricia	"Non competes are extremely harmful to competition, creativity, and mobility. When they are used in situations in low-wage jobs they can limit someone's ability to have a stable economic life...They should not be allowed to continue. If employers cannot pivot, be creative and retain good employees that is on them. Workers should be free to find employment where they can."
Brett	"I am currently a physical therapist . Please ban the non-complete clause."
Tiffany	"I entered into a non compete in a buy out situation of my families company. I am still working for the new ownership but felt in order to get the business sold I needed to sign that non compete. It's a 3 year after termination non compete. I've been in this business for 15 years and it is all I really know. I regret this decision because I do have better opportunities that have come up. I am a single mom, with two kids. I sell powder coating and have a good knowledge in the industrial manufacturing field. These people pay not the greatest, add on tasks, their benefits package is bare minimum, but I am stuck because of the non compete I felt I had to sign in order to get the buy out done for my family (mom). I would be extremely pleased with the FTC to get rid of these restraints employers think they have upon their valuable employees. As a mom of 16 and 6 I want to explore my options for making money to provide for the well-being of myself and my kids."
Zach	"This is great news!! These oppressive non-competes are so widespread and overused. It especially cripples independent contractors. This is a critical step forward for worker's rights and hope you don't scale it back or leave any loopholes for businesses to hold people hostage. This is especially important when small businesses have such strict language in the non-compete that prevents people from leaving even when they discover unethical behavior by the company leaders. This is happening to my wife in Minnesota as I write this comment! Thank you."
Harley	"I am in favor of the FTC's non compete ban. Non compete agreements are detrimental to the average worker, preventing them from pursuing better paying job offers or from starting their own business in the same industry. I am directly affected by a non-compete clause I had signed as part of a job acceptance. I am now forming my own business in the same industry as my employer, and cannot do business within a 50-mile radius of my employer. That radius covers the hometown I live in. Even though we are in the same industry, we have very different target markets. I believe non-competes are unfair to positions that don't involve "trade secrets" or any other high level information."

Anonymous	"As a physician with a non-compete, we have had many physicians in our practice who want to go to a better practice and cannot as they have a non-compete. Even physicians who have been fired by our organization are not released from their non-compete. Non-competes limit competition and give the organization more power than they should have."
Jim	"Non-compete agreements for legitimate company protecting purposes represent less than 1% of the situations in which they are imposed on employees. I was the victim of one for four years and after ultimately being laid off, could not find a job in my field for five years at which point, I had to change careers. Morally, no company has control over your life once you leave or are asked to leave except in exceptionally rare cases where one has created a unique product. How judges have EVER sided with a company over the individual is insulting to any decent person because it harkens back to the days when workers were dehumanized. Well, we are Truman. Our futures are our own and unless a company can prove financial harm, employees should NEVER be bound by non-compete agreements. To prove the point, a sandwich shop franchisee uses these things in MN to prevent minimum wage employees from working for a competitor. That is an example of how egregious and repulsive these GD things have become."
Adam	"I am currently under a non-compete and think that they are a terrible idea. There was a time in the past where it was held over me and I was unable to take another job for a substantial increase in pay. My job had been eliminated and department closed down (my employer didn't even offer the service anymore) and they still would not let me take a position at another competing company doing what I had been doing. I consulted a lawyer and was even to the point of willing to move. The lawyer did say that they thought they could get me out of it if we went to court but would cost anywhere between $25,000-75,000 in fees. I do not have that kind of money sitting around. I ended up taking a different position with the non-compete employer and still was not the salary offered by the other previous position. I am still under a non-compete with this employer. In my opinion, this unfair practice, should be eliminated and should not be allowed."
Patrick	"I think it is a burden to a former employee to not be able to work for a competitor. Perhaps they just gained competency in that field and now have to wait out a year and go to a different field and wait 1 year before continuing to refine their skills. It puts that employee at a significant disadvantage in a competitive work environment. They also fear legal action by a well financed former employer should they break their non-compete."

	This is troublesome for the little guys who have no recourse to legal protection or hiring an attorney."
Stuart	"I am an employee of 8 years at a printing company in Minneapolis, Minnesota. I have been in the print industry all of my adult life and I am 47 years old. Upon hiring I was asked to sign a non compete. As a printer I have never heard of such a thing. It was never explained to me and was part of a string of paper work. I foolishly signed it. Months later as a coworker tried to leave he found out that he could not get a job at another print shop for 18 months. That is when I found out what a non compete actually was. I asked our HR department, when we had one as we do not anymore, if I signed this form and I did. Many others at my shop were unaware of what they signed as well. We all admit our mistake when signing but we do not hold any trade secrets. It was something that is unheard of to us. It is just a way to keep us working for them. To hang on to talent if they choose. I have been there 8 years now only amassing an extra 3 dollars per hour in pay since my hire. The non compete to me feels like I am trapped. And in a way I am. Other print shops have not hired other coworkers of mine because they do not want the hassle of having to go to court to fight it. I am VERY glad you are taking this up as it seems it is frequently used to lock down employees and not give them the ability to move on and find better pay. Thank You."
Andrew	"I support banning non-compete clauses. 1. They have a broader societal impact than just the employee and employer. The employee must weigh whether to move his/her family (if any) outside the non-compete zone, to change employment type, or to simply put up with an employment situation which is injurious to their physical and/or mental health. 2. They deprive the public access to the skills and advantages of a particular employee. An employee may leave and enter a business activity slightly different than their prior work, but sufficiently close in nature that a non-compete clause prevents the employee from transferring their skills to a new opportunity. Example: Mary works for a coffee roaster that does not provide any flavored coffees. She sees a market opportunity and wishes to start a boutique roaster}, which only makes flavored coffees. A non-compete prevents her from "any coffee roasting activities," and so she cannot expand into a new niche of the market, one which her current employer has not entered. 3. Non-compete clauses mean consumers may lose the ability to use the services of a specific individual- -one who is important to their well-being. Example: Florence has been treated for her breast cancer by Dr. Smith. Faced with a poor work environment, Dr. Smith's departure means Florence's health may be adversely affected; she now has to find a new oncologist, learn to work with that person, and the increased waiting time for access due to Dr. Smith's departure may mean her chemotherapy is delayed--reducing her likelihood of survival."

Nate	"Non-compete clauses should be banned and uplifted. I am currently battling with a former employer because of a non compete and it is the most ridiculous thing. Employers should have no hearing over where and who you choose to work for. If you are good at your job and you are effective that sometimes leads to better opportunities."
BRENNAN	"I'm a Service manager at a dealership in Minnesota, my employer forced me to sign a noncompete on disclosure/nonsolicitation for what was initially 2 years and 100 miles covering service, sales, and parts. Basically the entire auto industry, I managed to get it negotiated down to 1 year but the auto industry is all that's on my resume, no other auto shops or sales in the area use them by my employer uses them as employee retention claiming we have trade secrets but I have yet to find any reason our shop is run any different from any other auto shop. Under this clause I can't even go work a minimum wage auto parts store job and I have no other option for employment. Additionally in my pay plan is a clause that allows my employer to change it at will. My position is a high stress high turnover position claiming 5 managers in the last 8 years but I have no other option than this 7014ear position. There's no reason except using the non compete as an employee retention tool. Minnesota is pretty tough on non compete agreements but they're still vastly legal and enforceable, and even with my pay affording an attorney to challenge it in court is next to impossible. Non competes for high paying executive jobs can make sense, but people like me on the lower end of the spectrum who aren't living in lavish conditions are being pinned down and held in place intentionally using these agreements when a simple non disclosure non solicit agreement would protect the business just fine."
Patrick	"I support the ban on non-compete agreements. As a worker in the tech industry, I have been compelled to sign them, and always found the practice dubious. I agree with the sentiment that if a company wants to invest in their employees and ensure that the investment pays back, they will treat their employees well. The use of non-competes treats people like they are things, like they are property. Employees thrive when they are treated like people, with wants, and desires, and personal motivations. When employees thrive, businesses thrive."
Sandra	"Non-compete clauses in employment contracts need to be stopped. I am a physician who has seen significant damage to the medical profession and patient care due to such clauses. Too many excellent providers have had to move and leave their practices and patients when in an unsustainable, miserable work environment. If an employer is responsible and good to their employees there should be no need for a non-compete clause. Only the abusive employers need such clauses to hold on to providers/employees. We have lost so many in the medical profession to the regulations. The non-compete employment clauses only add to the onerous craziness of our health care system contributing to the burn out of the medical professionals."

Paul	"Non-compete clauses in employment contracts do exactly what their name states, prevent competition. And since a freely competitive market is at the core of our capitalist system, we need to support a freely competitive job market as well. I believe this policy will not only help individual workers better their lives, but it will also help employers value their employees labor for what it is actually worth."
Lois	"Get rid of noncompete contracts. This isn't a country of communism. If a person wants to leave a job, they can do that. Stop protecting die businesses for once. They have too much control over employees or what shit their product is, that it needs to stop. The employees shouldn't have to give up their rights when the company doesn't"
Mel	"One of America's mythologies is that it's an unfettered land of opportunity for those willing to work hard enough. Non-compete clauses in employment contracts are an example of where that mythology fails. They're a method of controlling labor for the benefit of large business entities, especially when enforced upon people making non-executive wages (massage therapist, general office staff, hair stylists, etc.). An argument could be made that some people really have "trade secrets" that should not be shared, but that's not most of the people to whom non-compete clauses apply. A job skill is not a trade secret. A personal example of non-competes causing harm. My aunt finally found a good rheumatologist, after years of insufficient care for a chronic condition. When he moved from Practice A to Practice B, he wasn't allowed to practice in the county where my aunt lives (where his old practice was), for a period of 1 year. My aunt's relationship was not with the Practice A entity; it was with her doctor, who she suddenly couldn't see anymore unless she drove to a different county. For a healthy person, this might have been doable, but for a woman in assisted living whose transport options were limited to her own county, this removed a trusted doctor from her reach, to the detriment of her health. She has a new doctor now. He's inattentive and doesn't have rapport with her. Her doctor could have retired or moved to another part of the nation and taken himself out of her orbit without the non-compete, but the non- compete in this case is what severed their relationship, to the detriment of the consumer. The doctor, a well-paid specialist, will be fine, but his patients suffered an unnecessary loss."
GEOFFREY	"One in five American workers have signed noncompete agreements -- and it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly hound to their jobs by noncompetes. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompetes to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompetes would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete

	agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people. Corporate lobby groups are bitterly opposed to banning noncompete agreements because they want to keep competition for the labor force as low as possible. BAN NONCOMPETE AGREEMENTS."
Emily	"I am commenting in favor of the proposed ban on noncompete agreements. I am a psychologist and currently personally impacted by an overly restrictive noncompete agreement that impedes my ability to serve my community, which has a profound need for mental health providers. My current employer has implemented increasingly unhealthy and borderline abusive practices in recent years including being unwilling to support needs imposed by my documented disability. I must leave my employer for my own health, yet they will not release me from the non-compete agreement. In order to leave my employer I must take a job with a long commute for a year, as the noncompete has both distance and time restrictions. This harms my clients who benefit from my care, the community that has a profound need for services, and harms me, my quality of life, and my ability to support my family financially. I have no trade secrets to steal and I cannot possibly provide enough competition to harm my current employer in any way as the need for care in my community is so great. The noncompete is simply a device allowing my employer to bully people into continuing to work for them and put up with their abusive practices. Noncompete agreements have no place in industries where there are no trade secrets to protect. They only serve to limit employees ability to hold employers accountable for maintaining healthy, ethical work environments. Quality employers do not need to strong arm their employees into staying. Eliminating noncompete agreements will help restore balance in employer-employee power that will promote increased fairness and standards across many industries."
David	"Non-compete clauses give unfair power to big hospitals corporations and administrators and diminish the individual rights of physicians. Given the bum-out crisis in our already-stretched physician work three, putting an end to non-compete clauses would be an important step in reinforcing physician well-being. As it stands now, non-compete clauses facilitate physician abuse by hospital systems."
Mark	"I couldn't agree more strongly with getting rid of non-competes. As an IT worker (not in CA), I've had to sign a ton of these. Most recently, my old company was bought by a competitor. When they merge platforms, a bunch of features/ideas are going to be lost. In addition, we had a bunch of ideas for improvements queued up for the old platform. In order to make a living in the here and now, I needed to sign a document saying all ideas I had ever had belong to the new company (whether they were going to use them or not), and I couldn't go to work for a competitor for 4 years. I can't imagine anything more stifling to innovation than letting a company basically put a wet towel over the implementation of any ideas generated by an employee if that idea was related to their business and they came up with it while they were employed at company X (even if they thought of it while at home). If I wanted to have the option of joining a competitor and implementing even ideas/systems that the new company wasn't even going to use, I would lose my current employment immediately. And if there hadn't been a bankruptcy and re-setting of contracts even that wouldn't have been an option unless I found a job in some other sector for 4 years. These clauses in contracts are inimical to a dynamic economy."

Daron	"In the best interests of workers and innovation please ban non compete clauses"
Jay	"I would love for non-competes to go away. There are times I feel trapped by not even really having the option to explore, or gather information about other companies, opportunities, and pay. It's potentially really stunting career growth. I would be in favor of this ruling."
Tabitha	"I am writing in support of the proposal to eliminate non-compete clauses. I am a STEM professional currently bound by a non-compete agreement with my employer. The phrasing suggests that I cannot work in any area where my employer does business for two years, even though my work for my employer has been narrowly focused. This is a considerable hindrance to any job search I might pursue. My employer has additional specific trade secret policies and protections in place for which I have signed agreements. I believe the trade secret agreements are adequate to cover any risk to intellectual property loss to my employer, and the additional highly generalized noncompete puts me as an employee at a significant disadvantage in the marketplace."
Luke	"Dear FTC and Chair Lina Kahn, Thank you for proposing a Ban on Non-Compete clauses in employment contracts. I work in pharmacy, which like many industries has experience significant concentration into a small handful of firms. Non-compete clauses trap pharmacists into terrible working conditions and prevents them from leaving and finding a better job. Please do everything you can to fully ban Non-Compete employment contracts across the entire country."
Dave	"I am a physician and owner of my own practice for the last 10 years. I had a non- compete clause when I left my previous practice and feel it puts an undue on physicians and often times their families. In my case I did locums for 6months 120miles away while my wife was home with our 6 and 8 year old boys. I believe that there is no reason a physician should not be able to leave a practice and not have patients follow if desired. We have our own pediatric now and employee 3 doctors/3 physician assistants/6 psychologists/3 occupational therapists—none of which have non-compete clauses. Healthcare professionals should stay in organizations where they are valued and retained out of a mutual partnership—not financial and career blackmail. Thank you. Dave Smith M.D."

Randall	"I write regarding the FTC's proposal to ban noncompete clauses. I am a retired attorney who at one time specialized in employment law. I attempted to enforce noncompete clauses, and I resisted them on behalf of employees. I can tell you two things from my experience. First, noncompetes are abused by employers and encourage employers to abuse their employees. They are often hidden in employment contracts. If the prospective employee asks about them, they are described as a technicality of little significance. They often appear late in the process of negotiating an employment contract, when the prospective employee has already mentally and emotionally committed to the job. And, employees who sign one may be unable to take another job in their field if they leave their job, no matter how unfair or abusive working conditions may turn out to be. Second, noncompetes are applied in a fashion that is almost arbitrary. Their enforceability varies by jurisdiction. Judges apply them, or don't, largely based on the judge's political and social biases. And all of this leaves employees in a legal quicksand that is much more easily navigated by the comparatively wealthy employer. Please abolish noncompete clauses."
Andrew	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I support this measure. Please pass this."
Karen	"Noncompete clauses hurts sales representatives . There are no competitive wages for us. It's -this" base salary and only 1-2% commissions. There isn't any negotiation involved. Also they can change the commission structure as they please. If you are unhappy with changes you can't leave the company and go to a competitor. We literally have to leave our industry for 12 months. Which is so stressful and hard on your career. Which makes life miserable for you and your family. Even if you take a different position within the company and you aren't making enough money to feed your family they will not let you leave and if you do they will sue you. This clause gives the employers all the power. For a single mom like myself it makes life really tough! Please ban this terrible clause! Please free us!"
Chris	"I fully support the proposed changes to regulations governing non-compete agreements. I have worked in several jobs in the healthcare sector which required as a condition of my employment that I sign a non-compete agreement. The first two positions were in retail pharmacies, followed by a more rewarding and enjoyable position with a medical records software vendor. The working knowledge of retail pharmacies which I gained in the first two positions were critical in building the skills and knowledge needed to succeed in that position. To be very clear, at no point would it have been necessary or even advantageous to leverage anything considered proprietary from those businesses in my current role. The critical knowledge that I gained was entirely around general business practice, and hands-on

	experience filling prescriptions for patients. Because my both pharmacies required me to sign a non-compete, I was very worried about the possibility that my previous employer could take legal action which easily could derail my employment and future. Fortunately this never happened, and in retrospect it likely never would have happened. In my opinion it would have been a waste of time and resources on their part. The simple fear of having an unnecessary and very broad legal arrangement which limited my employment prospects hanging over my head is something that I still deal with today. Every employer I've had in my adult life has also required this sort of agreement, so this is very much an ongoing worry. In summary, I find the current law which allows employers to hamstring former employees is both exploitative and unnecessary. It hampers not only innovation, but a young worker's willingness to be bold and take risks early on in their career. It is my hope that young women and men entering the workforce in future years will not have to confront this issue, as I did."
John	"The business that pays all the fees for licensing and training should be able to have that employee for at least two years. Employees should not have more authority than the employer when it comes to leaving employment and starting work with a competitor."
Nick	"I've been in industry for 20 years as an engineer and the trend lately has definitely been towards highly restrictive non-compete agreements. The employee is at a distinct disadvantage in every case, it limits compensation, and is used by organizations to restrict career growth of employees. I am in strong favor of the proposed FTC rule change to nullify these kinds of agreements."
Gary	"I worked for 30+ years with a $3 Billion private company who acquired over 50 companies in the packaging machinery industry. I left the company and took a position with a Company that did not compete with my old company, then my new company was bought by a parent company who did compete with a division of my old parent company. My old company threatened my new smaller company on a non-compete basis and I lost my position and have been unemployed since October 1, 2022. I cannot find employment in entire packaging machinery business because my former large employer has a division in many machinery building companies in the entire packaging field. Since I was in Sales, they feel that I am a threat to any company that builds packaging capital equipment machinery. So, most companies will not take the risk as the lawyers of the $3 Billion company have much money to keep me from working to support my family. Very Sad that I gave this former company 30+ years, I helped sell over 7700 machines. Hard to believe the treatment I am getting."
P	"Non competes should not exist in healthcare."

Anthony	"Fully support rule with no exceptions: Behind every unfair and illegal employment contract is a lawyer who drafted it. It's unethical for a lawyer to file a frivolous complaint, and it should be unethical for a lawyer to encourage a client to enter into an unenforceable contract. chilling their ability to get a better job and reducing their leverage to seek better wages or working conditions in their current position. no time to review the contract and no choice but to sign if he wants the job. Restatement, and noting that the initial evidentiary burden is on employer to show that the restriction is reasonable on its own as well as necessary for the protection of legitimate business interests)."
Jack	"I am in support of the rule limiting non-compete clauses. They are an unnecessary burden on individuals and the broader economies by greedy employers. The FTC should enact this rule as soon as possible."
Owen	"I know that large hospitals are probably advocating to make an exception for medical staff to be not included in the ban of non-compete agreements. I emphatically plead not to do so. Hospitals and healthcare companies use these clauses to reduce competition and restrict our ability to leave bad practices. They serve nothing but interests of billion dollar companies who don't want to have to work to actually retain their staff. Thank you"
Cal	"Non-compete clauses are inefficient taxes on career growth and innovation. They should be considered illegal immediately."
Leslie	"I support banning noncompete contracts. My family was impacted by a previous employer trying to enforce a noncompete. It went to litigation, and the noncompete was thrown out and my husband was allowed to work. We incurred legal fees to accomplish this. the main outcome of the noncompete appears to be to hinder Americans from providing services and providing for their family, or clogging judges and courts with litigation. Both a tragic and colossal waste."
Mindy	"I agree with banning non competes. There is too much power with companies (who continue to grow and monopolize communities) Eliminating the NC will help the employees."
Sandra	"I am a physician and in our space, noncompetes are a standard part of most contracts, and routinely enforced. Noncompetes benefit corporations and employers but deter competition and harm the individuals providing the actual health care and ultimately the patients and their access to care and to choice in their care. Hospitals and health care CEOs may tell you they will suffer, but in fact, who has the high salaries and profits? CEOs and especially insurance companies... not physicians. The market should be free for physicians to vote with their feet if their employer has policies or requires

	systems of work that the physicians deem unsafe or inappropriate patient care, or otherwise problematic, such as unfair compensation. We should not have to move - and leave our communities with physicians - in order to do this! Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. Physicians should also be able to speak out about issues of corporate profit and patient safety and quality care, or leave their jobs, without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families. Noncompetes effectively prohibit this. With physician burnout and people leaving the practice of medicine, the proposed rule is a prime opportunity to give physicians better incentive to focus on quality care in their communities, and be able to pursue fair compensation for it. A single physician leaving a large hospital system would not significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system: however, one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en bloc and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Physicians don't leave easily or take the decision lightly, regardless of noncompete clauses, so it would have to be something big and problematic to cause a large exodus. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. To clarify: I am in favor of ending noncompetes in both for-profit AND NOT-FOR-PROFIT health systems."
Joshua	"NCAs stifle employee mobility, career growth, and a healthy exchange of ideas. The only beneficiaries are the largest companies who can afford to over hire, leading to concentration of talent, uselessly."
Benjamin	"Banning Non-Compete Clauses is a great policy. They are only used to suppress competition and wages for workers. They also being massively abused for jobs that should not require them just to control the workforce. It's an abusive practice."
Nicholas	"As a physician I have worked in 2 large non-profit healthcare systems, both of which are one of the largest employers in their respective states, and one of which is a multinational corporation. Many of these nonprofit health care systems are very large entities who behave like many other large for profit corporations, including the prioritization of profits over patients, fierce competition with each other in order to capture larger portions of their market shares, and the use of unilateral contracts with their employees in order to limit benefits and to restrict movement within the healthcare sector."

	This has a negative impact on all involved, including employee retention, and disproportionately affects primary care patients and health care providers in rural areas. It is absolutely critical that a non-compete rule addresses nonprofit healthcare systems, as they contain a large portion of the health care sector workforce and have a substantial negative impact on tax-paying employees and communities."
Alex	"Remember the High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litigation in 2010, where several SF Bay Area tech companies illegally conspired to suppress wages by not competing with each other for talent? Non-compete clauses are a legal way to do the same thing. Non-competes harm the economy by causing inefficient allocation of resources, and harm workers by making wages artificially low. I support the proposed rulemaking by the FTC to ban them."
Ben	"I am a doctor in a pediatric subspecialty field. My contract with one of the children's hospital in my city includes a non-compete. My specialty is fairly small and thus I am generally required to work in a place with a large population. The non-compete essentially bars me from being gainfully employed within the metro area of my city outside of this institution if I chose to leave on my own. This means that I have essentially no bargaining power for myself unless I am willing to move to another city, uprooting my family and leaving our extended. I do not know if your rules will extend to 501-3cs or non- profits. This should be given consideration as some of these companies, like my hospital, are wielding these contracts the same way any for profit company would."
Edward	"Hello, I wish to express my utmost SUPPORT for this rule. I believe that non-compete clauses are incredibly toxic and damaging to prosperity. They are a perversion of the free-market, directly (and brazenly) removing the single-most powerful tool in the hands of employees to improve their station: the ability to leave their current job for one that provides greater reward to them (however the employee would define that). Non-Compete clauses directly suppress wages on an individual and economy-wide level by providing a legal framework for reinforcing monopolistic and -- more specifically -- monopolistic action. In addition, from the point of view of the country as a whole, non-compete clauses are immensely destructive toward economy-wide innovation. By their nature, such clauses restrict the flow of information throughout die economy by keeping experience and expertise "siloeed" within particular firms. This prevents wide- scale adoption of innovation and makes it less likely that a given technology, practice, or strategic position is available to a firm that may make use of it. From a personal standpoint, non-compete clauses are both present and deleterious in the medical field (the field in which I am fortunate to be working). Physicians straight out of residency are often shackled with non-compete clauses of one kind or another, locking them into disadvantageous "initial" contracts that leave them ripe for overwork, underpay, and (eventually) bum-

	out. The latter point in particular is relevant to American society given the significant shortage within the healthcare workforce. By restricting the ability of a physician such as myself to take up a better job, non-compete clauses prevent us from seeking out a career that would leave us less burned out. In the later stages of a physician's career, this would make them far more likely to just retire and leave the field entirely rather than seek out a different practice -- something a non-compete clause frequently legally prevents them from doing. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to follow through with this salutary and important rule. This will make a meaningful difference in the lives of many individuals, and leave the economy of the United States of America much better positioned to bring prosperity to all."
Michael	"Non-compete clauses encourage bad behavior by employers and are often used as a part of severance packages where the employer will decline to provide promised severance without the employee agreeing to non-compete language. This practice gives way too much power to employers both control former employee's fate and application of skills in finding a new role, along with the threat of loss of severance funds and health care provided as a part of the severance agreement. Making non-competes illegal is a good choice and will make the US a more competitive economy."
Mason	"I can't tell you how overjoyed I was to see this proposed rule. As a sales professional in the medical device sales space, the opportunities afforded to me in the call points that I work are severely limited should I choose to pursue a new job - my non compete lasts for a full year, which is ridiculous. Thank you for this. It will change my life and grant me opportunities that I wouldn't have had before."
Kirk	"Eliminate non-compete clauses and support workers"
Bethany	"I have been under a non-compete/non-solicitation now with two different companies where I was prohibited from calling my clients for a year. The second time was after only 4 months of work. I definitely support removing this clause as my ability to choose where to work and how to make money was limited in both of these cases."
David	"Please enact this legislation to prohibit noncompetes, specifically for medical practitioners, MDs, nurses, PAs and other medical technical specialists. I have worked in ophthalmology for 34 years and have known scores of younger and older MDs and optometrists whose livelihoods and family security have been unnecessarily traumatized by corporate medical entities who chose to inflict the threat of legal action to bind their employed practitioners to desist from seeking employment outside of their employment with the big entity. In a time when many medical practitioners are in high demand due to limited availability of care givers, many have to sit out for months or years and suffer the financial strains of doing so because of the

	avarice and predatory activity of the larger corporations. Case in point, a very large national LASIK company currently holds the majority of the country's full time refractive surgery practitioners (of where there are relatively few) hostage by noncompetes. I personally know of dozens who have had to move to different states to change work. Many of the noncompetes extend to most or all of the US states as well, wherever the company has other clinics. As a consequence, they can suppress the pay of the indentured staff, technicians, and doctors. Many have been threatened with lengthy or costly lawsuits if they dare to breach a noncompete. I believe it is wise counsel for the FTC to take a stance and protect the work force, if not for the benefit of the medical workers, at least for the safety and welfare of their patients who should be able to seek care from their desired medical practitioners wherever they want to work. Thank you for bringing this issue to consideration."
Kimerly	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and hams working people. This policy will make it easier tier workers to earn what they're worth! I think there are better ways to prevent industrial espionage and secret-sharing."
Gerry	"Non-compete clauses are a harmful and predatory practice that inflicts harm not only on workers but on American industry as a whole. There is a fundamental imbalance of power between employer and employee in the first place that gets exacerbated by these practices. At the VERY minimum, employers should be required to pay a worker for the duration of any non-compete clause to avoid them being able to take away the worker's means of support for potentially months or even years on a whim. To pretend that employers provide so much value to their employees that they should be able to retain the employee's skills without pay is ridiculous. Anything so valuable provided by the employer is already adequately protected by NDAs and patents, non-compete clauses are simply an additional power grab in a quest to kneecap wages and employment mobility in order to avoid fair competition on the free market. As such they should be eliminated completely."
amy	"I would support a rule eliminating the non-compete clause as it pigeon holes those of us who have one into our jobs and does not allow seeking employment at nearby opportunities in the same field. Making the market more competitive is a good thing for employees and requires employers to do their due diligence and offer honest, well paying jobs."

	“As a physician and in a rural underserved area I think doing away with noncompete clauses is incredibly important both to physician autonomy and patient care...A physician might want to serve a slightly different underserved population currently serviced by a competitor...This population may even need more care than their current patient population. They are not able to leave due to noncompete. Rural areas also struggle to recruit and retain physicians. Non-competes can scare off some potential physicians.” -Craig M.
	“This Sunday, I'll be leaving my wife and 2 kids behind in Mississippi as I go take a new position in the Cayman Islands. I'm doing this because in a small industry such professional mosquito abatement, it was almost impossible for me to get anyone to hire me because of my existing non-compete agreement...So, I'm moving internationally until my 2 year non-compete is up, then hopefully can come back to the United States....I signed [the non-compete] several years ago to get a raise and promotion. I needed the money then, so I didn't have much choice. I am in support of making these agreements illegal...” -Kris N.
	“I am a marine mammal trainer and our company had us sign a non-compete for up to 24 months, with a 40-mile radius. This field is very small...this would require me to change specialties or travel 1-2 hours more to work in an area that is outside of the agreeable radius. Please consider passing this ban to allow workers to seek out better paying jobs without having to move large distances or retrain.” -Jennifer P.
	“Non-competes are incredibly outdated...There is such a vast shortage of veterinarians now...the original purpose of the clause, used to prevent "stealing" clients, is no longer valid given the conglomeration of veterinary clinics making it impossible to find a job if the non-compete refers to any sites owned by the company.” -Emili M.
	“I have been a social worker and a pharmaceutical rep in the multiple sclerosis space for almost 20 years... I am still tied to this agreement and cannot go work for another MS company...I have been approached by other MS drug companies offering more money and promotions, but so far, I have had to turn them down because of the non-compete.” -Leigh A.

Indiana	"In my professional career I have been subject non-compete agreements. Each time, I've found these documents disgusting and anti-American....The excuse for implementing these agreements is based on the employees proximity to "proprietary" information that other companies may try to steal....I was never in possession...of proprietary information that, if divulged to a competitor, would financially damage the company to a significant degree if at all....[T]hese agreements are primarily used to obtain...absolution of responsibility for the employer at the expense of the employee instead of legitimately safeguarding industry secrets.... allowing noncompete agreements represent a shoddy framework for protecting these assets...non-compete agreements are primarily an intimidation tactic that uses financial insecurity as a bludgeon to keep employees aboard. The worst thing about non-compete agreement is the fact they represent an encroachment on the liberties of their employees.... The practice of these agreements are monopolistic, tyrannical, and spit upon the very principles of liberty to which our nation was founded. It could even be argued that these agreements represent a modern form of slavery: for what is slavery than an individual being powerless to determine where they can and cannot sell their labor, being beholden to another's whims instead? As such, the practice should be banned to encourage competition among industries for labor, to allow career growth of individuals to go unhindered, and to better reflect in our labor laws the principles of liberty."
Michael	"Non-compete clauses exist merely to prevent employees from leaving for better jobs. As a hospital physician, I have absolutely no proprietary information. I don't have a patient pool that can travel with me because I am dependent on what comes through the emergency department. But I am an at-will employee who cannot work anywhere else in my county for two years if I were to quit due to wage stagnation and worsening conditions. There's no legitimate reason for a non-compete to be in my contract but I can't find a job as a physician in my county without signing one. If anything, it's bad for the community, because if I leave the county will lose another physician.
Caitlin	"As a physician, this rule will help and prevent doctors who want to change jobs from having to move to another city or state to be able to do so. In this day and age of physician shortages, all a non-compete clause does is limit the ability of institutions to hold onto good physicians. I am all for the banning of non-compete clauses."
Vivek	"The non-compete ban rule is a great idea, since companies or organizations try to control the life of their employee and try to have more power over somebody than necessary. If the non-compete ban passes, there will be more competition among prospective employers to hire the desired talent. This is necessary to increase accountability of employers.”

Lindsey	“I am ObGyn in Mississippi. In a rural state where resources are often limited, patients deserve to be able to maintain a relationship with their doctor. Our state has small, scattered cities where some types of healthcare are offered. Physicians shouldn't be required to stay in an unsafe or unfriendly work environment or move their entire family several hours in order to continue practicing.”
Spencer	“Excluding physicians from the non-compete ban would be unbelievably unjust and incredibly harmful to physician morale. It is already clear that the healthcare industry doesn't care about patients through its profiteering, allowing hospitals to control physician choice through extortion by means of requiring complete upheaval of one's entire family when a hospital ultimately decides to take advantage of you for the last time would be extremely disheartening. It is clear through hospital turnover that even with non-compete in play physicians are still deciding that employment conditions are not acceptable, imagine how many more physicians feel that way but are unable to act based on fear of the effects of a non-compete. Don't cater to lobbyists, non-competes are harmful for physicians, do the right thing and let workers make their own decisions. Force hospitals to ensure good working conditions and make hospitals a place where doctors WANT to be.”
Stephen	“I fully support this action. As a physician and healthcare worker, this rule does not allow us to care for patients across healthcare systems. It limits our ability to not only earn income but imposes a major barrier to exiting a position that we may not be entirely content with. This is especially important as private practices are being bought out, and healthcare companies are increasingly being bought and becoming part of a single hospital or single private equity group.”
Alisha	“Unnecessary, affects livelihood.”
Spencer	“I fully support removal on non-compete clauses in contracts. Employers must find a suitable way to meet employees needs without holding the non-work aspects of an employee's life hostage. This would also drastically improve competition amongst desired skillsets and improve employee compensation.”
Christopher	“I am in favor of the proposed FTC regulation. As a physician, there are often restrictive covenants in our contracts which restrict our ability to change practices within a certain geographic area. These unfair limitations keep a doctor from leaving one practice and joining another one. Forcing one to leave the current geographic area, especially if the doctor is a specialist which is hard to replace, results to harm to patient care. I believe that there should be no restrictions in physician contracts that restrict changing practices in the same geographic area. The current laws limit competition and lead to unfair situations which compromise the healthcare of others. Therefore, I would encourage the FTC to pass this rule for all workers, regardless of income or occupation, and bar non-compete agreements in all contracts.”

Wendell	“This new regulation would be fantastic. As a physician , there are often restrictive covenants in our contracts which restrict our ability to change practices within a certain geographic area. These unfair limitations keep a doctor from leaving one practice and joining another one. Forcing one to leave the current geographic area, especially if the doctor is a specialist which is hard to replace, results to harm to patient care. I believe that there should be no restrictions in physician contracts that restrict changing practices in the same geographic area. The current laws limit competition and lead to unfair situations which compromise the healthcare of others. Therefore, I would encourage the FTC to pass this rule for all workers, regardless of income or occupation, and bar non-compete agreements in all contracts.”
Joshua	“I am wholly in favor of banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Having had to sign contracts with these clauses before, I wholly believe that they unfairly inhibit American workers from finding other gainful employment in a given area. It's time for this madness (which is wholly antithetical to the free market) to end.”
Mohammad	“As a physician I believe this is [non-compete ban] needs to pass. Part of the reason why there is such shortage and lack of American healthcare is due to non-compete clause. Non-compete also decreases competition between institutes and in turn there is no real drive to improve quality of care in certain specialties. Abolishing non-compete is the right step in alleviating some of the burden and shortage in healthcare sector.”
Jason	“Non-compete clauses should be banned from both for profit and nonprofit health systems . These clauses adversely affect physicians' spouses and children in the event the physicians find the employer is not a good fit.”
Stanford	“I am strongly against non-compete clauses. If an employee of mine is dissatisfied, has a better idea, or simply doesn't like the environment they envisioned, then shame on me for not asking, not participating, and not noticing. The ability to compete is the backbone of capitalism and free enterprise. I am one of the few independent physicians still in practice ONLY because I would not join a group with non-competes.”
Brittany	“As someone in a very specialized profession, the non-compete clause gives few options for additional work without relocating very far distances. Companies should be confident in their benefits, pay, and overall treatment of staff rather than forcing new hires to sign legal documents that limit their ability to advance in their career without uprooting their entire life. If the job is fulfilling for staff, then they will want to stay. I am in favor of revoking the non-compete clause.”
Michelle	“I currently work under a non compete, and I can verify that it is affecting my ability to seek other employment. I am prevented from working as a recruiter for any company for 2 years if I leave my current company. Given recent changes in how our work product is computed, I will likely be let go in the very near future. Until this week, as long as we had production sufficient to cover our draw commission balance we were "in the good", but now the uncollected amounts don't count. Since we get draw commission and have to pay $300+ a month for "tools" - online resources - most of us at the company are in the hole. We can't go work for another recruiting company because of the non-compete."

Bridget	"I am in support of outlawing non-compete clauses. Non-competes are far too bias[ed] towards business and industry and removes citizen's rights to their pursuit of happiness as enshrined in our Declaration of Independence. They simple go against the basic foundation upon which our country was built. Non-disclosure agreements should be enough to protect proprietary info with impeding an employee's ability to find a better situation within their chosen industry.."
Evan	"Noncompete clauses in healthcare work only in the interest of corporate entities, disincentivizing physicians from tailoring their offerings in response to the changes and needs of the healthcare market. They serve to suppress physician compensation and flexibility in serving their community by adding friction and financial burden to potential alternative employment opportunities. This friction adds bloat to the already top-heavy healthcare market. Please do not consider any exception to a ban on noncompetes for healthcare entities suggested by corporate interests."
Herron	"I support ending non-compete agreements. I have had difficulties hiring employees for fear that they could be sued by their former employer. I also have been subject to non competes which I feel prevented me from receiving better job offers."
Michael	"PLEASE BAN THEM. Non-Competes have prevented us from starting our own business, and our former employer is spitefully using them to keep us from being financially stable."
Jeremy	"...Many of these non competes written by massive hospital systems serve to ruin the lives of physicians by creating huge swaths of the country in which physicians would be unable to practice. A doctor should not have to leave...[the] area at the behest of corporate hospital system."
Harold	"I agree with the aim of this proposed regulation...wish that it could be codified as law. Non-compete agreements are typically signed during the hiring process and are particularly onerous to the worker who is later discarded by the company for any reason. It is bad enough to be unemployed, but worse if you cannot apply for work with prospective employers in your field because of a non-compete signed years earlier."
Bethany	"I fully support eliminating the non-compete clause. I have 2 Nurse Practitioner colleagues who are having difficulty finding employment due to a non- compete. Given the healthcare disparities in the state we reside in (Mississippi), this is especially disheartening. They are essentially going to have to travel over an hour away from their home to work, even though there are many open positions in their area. Non-competes are barring access to healthcare and need to be eliminated.”

Robert	“I am writing in support of a potential ban on non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements limit an employee's ability to work for a competitor or start a competing business after leaving their current employer. This is harmful to employees and the overall economy. Non-compete agreements limit career opportunities, stifle innovation, and can be used as a tool of oppression by employers. Employees may be unable to pursue career opportunities they are otherwise qualified for and may be unable to leave a toxic work environment. Non-compete agreements can prevent the development of new products and services, which can ultimately hurt consumers. Employers may use non-compete agreements to intimidate and control employees, creating an environment of fear and mistrust. Instead, employers should focus on creating a positive and supportive work environment and not restrict an employee's ability to pursue their career goals.”
Jeff	“Abolishment of non-compete agreements would be a win for workers across the United States. I am 100% in favor of their abolishment.”
Blake	“I am in my third year of medical school , and I have already seen the negative effects of non-compete clauses on doctors and nurses. I fully support making non-compete clauses illegal.”
B	“Non-competes are oppressive and give corporations permission to create toxic work environments and mistreat employees on many levels. I am told if I choose to leave the toxic healthcare environment, I can expect a lawsuit simply because I want to work in a healthier environment and use the skill set I have worked hard to achieve. I am in full support of banning non-compete agreements so I can find joy in working once again.”

	"I've been both a regional director responsible for internal HR and an HR consultant. I have ALWAYS been appalled at the use of NCA's! My company used them only to prevent the possibility that proprietary information / processes would be taken to a competitor, but never to stop a person from getting a job and making a living. We usually used an NDA instead of an NCA, and that was sufficient protection for our company. What is so appalling about NCA's? Very simple. They essentially say that you have legal rights -- but oh by the way if you want a job you have to sign those rights away. Employees are trapped into signing them if they want the job. "Sign away your legal rights or you can't get a job." What on earth is the point of saying people have certain rights but then make them give up those rights in order to get a job? PLEASE! Redress this wrong and disallow NCA's! NCA's are the 21st century version of "the company store" -- a trick that traps people into giving up otherwise legal rights if they want to hold down a job. NCA's are one element of predatory capitalism and should have been stopped years ago. Thank you for tackling this festering and difficult issue!! -Nancy
	""I'm a barber and violated a non compete about 6 months ago. My non-compete radio is miles for 1 year. Sounds reasonable, but not really. I live in Kansas City where barbershops are sparse. Working in the city area is less than a 5 mile radius and is the only place to make money. If I worked outside of the 5 mile radius, that would put me in the suburbs where barbershops are extremely limited and charge as little as $16 a haircut. I'd roughly make only 20-25k a year in the only industry I know. I worked for my previous employer for two years in a toxic environment. I told my employer how work was affecting my home life on more that one occasion and she did nothing. I was micromanaged and in -trouble" for something on a weekly basis. How was I to know that I would be working in a toxic environment when I applied? So ultimately, I decided in order to be happy and make a living wage, I'd have no choice but to violate my non- compete. She came after me in no time flat. Now I'm paying legal fees and at risk of going to court and losing my job for 6 more months. What's the point here? I go outside of my non compete, lose the clientele I worked so hard to build. Those clients are nobody's property. If they want to follow me wherever I work, they should be entitled to do so. And if I'm working in poor working conditions, I should be able to work where I please. For two years, my job and employer affected my mental health...If a job is affecting your mental health and home life, how can this be legal? And let's get the ball rolling on this so we can all be free to work where we're happy in peace!" -Ally.

	"Non-competes are harmful to employees!! Very long story short. I worked in the audio/visual industry. I, along with the entire company, were furloughed in June 2020. July of 2020 I found a new job with a competitor and three days in lie sent over paperwork for a non-compete I don't remember signing in 2011. Since it was Covid they couldn't afford to fight for me and I was fired. Tried mediation but after I paid for the mediation and the date was set, he came in as wouldn't mediate anything. I sued to get the non-compete reduced from 3 years, he counter sued me for damages and attorneys fees. The three years is up in June so we dropped our suit since it has dragged out this long but he won't drop his. We also told him if he does win damages that I can't pay that I will file bankruptcy. They said they will still carry through with the suit." -Jeff
	"I am in favor of outlawing all forms of non-compete. I was recently terminated by my employer under their "workforce reduction" umbrella. I have been in this industry for 17 years. At the age of 47 it is difficult to enter in to new industries. I have had several offers from other companies in the same industry I have been a part of for nearly two decades, but all of these companies are a little worried about the non-compete. Coming from a small rural area it is hard to find jobs that pay even close to what I have been making for the last two decades. The non-compete is very disruptive to my livelihood." -Jeremy
	"Good morning, I happened across this proposed rule by chance while reading my daily legal highlights for the construction industry. I think this is a wonderful idea and long overdue. I have seen countless instances through my 33 years in the business where employers use these these clauses to bully their employees, force workers to stay in hostile and unhealthy work environments, and use it as a tool to keep the wages at a level that is below their competitors. I am a bit different and it may surprise you that I am a business owner and the only non family owner in a family business. I did not get my ownership by birth, I got it my the sweat of my brow and working my way from job superintendent all the way to Vice President and part owner. I was naive enough at the time they offered ownership purchase to sign a non compete agreement. I actually paid for my stake in the company while the incompetent son was given most of his. I have watched him work less hours, take more time off, and cause undue stress to other office workers all for the same pay as I was making. When I asked to get out they happily pointed out the no compete and stated you will have to leave your home area if you want to quit. Fast forward 11 years and they realized their key people were getting offers from others much more fitting to their skill level. They decide to offer a very small amount of stock to these individuals to cover up the fact that they would now be required to sign a non compete. I urged them not to sign but the allure of the "ownership" was too much for these people to overcome. Now they wish they would have listened. The original owner didn't think his non compete was broad enough at 200 miles from the office so they changed it to 200 miles from either of the two offices which are only 65 miles apart but that pretty well covers the state of Missouri and a good portion of Oklahoma, Kansas, and Arkansas. I told them it was too broad to stick and their response was "they will need the money to fight it" These people are the poster

	children for banning non compete clauses. I am anxious to see this proposed rule become law for the people who work here and other similar employers. Thank you for your time in reading this." -Sean
	"I worked for a toxic hair salon for 6 years with a non compete. The only reason I was able to leave was that my mileage requirement was lower than the rest of my coworkers. The owner uses this to bully people into staying by using the non compete as a scare tactic. Knowing that they can't afford an attorney to fight it. There are no trade secrets in my industry that require this to be a part of the hiring process. In fact it keeps people from being able to leaving a toxic environment. Please pass this." -Becke
	"A non-compete has me, a below minimum wage tipped worker, facing a $10,000 lawsuit. The company tricks you into signing it without really explaining it during hiring paperwork; They unreasonably enforce it for 50 miles. This non-compete has effected my ability to do my passionate livelihood, make a livable wage, and now I might have to file for unemployment since they terminated me over the non-compete... and I'm not even employed by any competitors. When I asked the Employer for a copy of the Non-Compete for my records, they refused. I have to wait and see if they do file a lawsuit and hire a lawyer to recover my own paperwork I have legal rights to." -Olivia

Elizabeth	"I am extremely in favor of banning non-compete agreements. I am bound by on at my current job and it has kept me from being able to seek out other job opportunities with higher pay. I feel so trapped and stuck in my current position and my non-compete has me too afraid to look for something better out of fear of legal repercussions. Please ban non-competes!"
Deborah	"As an optometrist , a contract I had was so broad that if I quit I would either have to drive an hour or move. Over the years they kept adding stuff that I never should have put up with such as taking away 2 1/2 days from one site, adding them to another. They added all their fees to the new location but saw " no reason to remove" those days fees from the other location and in fact then shortly raised all those fees. I complied as it was cheaper than moving."

Kat	"Totally agree to ban non-compete clause. I have known people forced to stay with bad employers, like slaves, because they could not afford to not work for 6-months or more. And what a joke when it is applied to hapless hourly workers."
Gavin	"Please ban non-compete agreements! They are terrible and only serve to give employers more power over employees that don't even work for them anymore!"
R Scott	"Do away with these, immediately and permanently. They are inherently unfair and biased in favor of businesses. Workers deserve equal footing in negotiation and freedom in marketing their skills to a better employer."
Loren	"As a physician I find non-compete clauses to be in opposition of freedom of practice for highly trained individuals. They have, in effect, become a tool of ensure that physicians do not have negotiating power against the larger healthcare corporations that we support. I began practice 4 years ago and, during that time, have served my organization and community dutifully. I have a family, children in school and friends in the area. I moved to a new city to start practice after a total of 10 years in training The standard contract offered by virtually all healthcare companies includes a non-compete clause which specifies a geographic region around your practicing hospital and a period (often 2 years) during which you cannot be employed. When these were originally written they were to avoid a physician taking clients away from a practice and moving to another site however they have, in effect, been used to subjugate physicians and prevent them from moving to another company without uprooting their life. This is an unfair practice as modern healthcare and insurance coverage agreements nullifies the original intent of the non-compete agreement. Since network coverage has financial ramifications for patients, a physician leaving a practice (in virtually any field) is unlikely to bring any substantial portion of their patients with them. However, healthcare companies can make it extremely uncomfortable to move jobs by ensuring that you cannot practice locally or be recruited to a local competitor using the non-compete clause. This unfairly restricts career prospects for physicians and limits terms of negotiation between physicians and their employers. Since physicians do not, generally, have unions and healthcare companies have a vested interest in preventing local competition for their workforce - the non-compete clause that is present in virtually all contracts becomes a unilateral cudgel with no recourse by practitioners. It is unfair and should be eliminated."
Drew	"I believe this will be beneficial for the competition in the job market. If enacted will this rule retroactively nullify previously existing Non-Compete clauses?"

Grant	"I have personally been affected by a non compete clause and was not in a position to afford a lawyer to fight the non-compete. There were plenty of jobs in my area that I could have used my skill set for, but due to the clause from my current employer at the time I could not leave or I would not have a job. After 1 and 1/2 years of searching I was able to find something far enough away that it was not classified as a competitor but if not for work from home I would have had to move to seek better employment."
Jacqueline	"I support a ban on non-compete clauses for physicians. My general physician (who is a woman) is leaving her current practice and is under a non-compete for a year. I have to now find a new physician for the next year. This is frustrating and annoying. As a woman I feel more comfortable with having a woman physician. I finally found a woman physician who listened to me and respected my requests. I now have to go through this process all over again - or hope I don't have any issues for the next year. Physicians being under non-compete clauses are bad for patient health."
Richard	"I have worked in the Cremation service industry for 33 years. I have recently left employer I was with for 15 years. They are claiming the entire United States as their territory so I cannot work in this industry for 2 years? This is crazy. Their are anti monopoly laws for a reason. They think because they are a multi billion dollar company they can bully people"
Gary	"Noncompete agreements should be banned nationwide. They are extremely unfair for most wage earners. It is also anti capitalist and suppresses wages for average workers."
L.D.	"Non-Compete Clauses at times seem to make sense, especially given the sensitive nature of certain trade secrets in the business world. However, as pointed out in the Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, adequate trade secret protection is provided under other subsections of existing US Federal law. I agree with the conclusions provided in the notice, and additionally, would like to comment that in states like my home state of Missouri, where certain non- compete agreements may be assigned to the purchaser of a business in a merger or acquisition transaction under current state law interpretations, these agreements are extremely unfair, as they were not established at their inception between the original parties to the agreement. A merger or acquisition changes so many things for an employee, including the company culture, its standard business practices, the management the employee reports to, the human resource systems by which an employee will be evaluated by, and many other aspects of the employee's work life that may or may not be for the better. I caret think of a rational example where an employee would sign a non-compete and expect it to remain both enforceable and assignable in the event a business is purchased by new owners who come in and flip the existing company in a completely different strategic direction. The employee and their family are then expected to endure the consequences of such a merger or acquisition transaction, including change in job roles, decreases in income, changes in work hours, etc. under the premise that "Well, we (the acquiring company) paid for it." I can't imagine a single merger and acquisition

	transaction where the decision on whether or not to purchase either the assets or the stock of an existing business would truly change based on whether or not the assets acquired included the existing intangible value of that company's non-compete agreements. Even if such weight was given to existing non-compete agreements, how could any business say with any certainty that enough employees subject to non-compete agreements wouldn't switch careers in a way that the contracts' value wouldn't evaporate? The continued existence of a non-compete can't go so far as to force employees to stay against their will, so how do these agreements provide value to the public interest? It is my hope, that at a minimum, a non-compete agreement is limited in enforceability only to the extent it is made in good faith, for more than the consideration of at-will employment, and is truly between the original owners or company managers serving at the time of the agreement and the employee only. These agreements should not have lives past the lifetimes of the original owners and transfers of business interests can bring material changes to a business that no employee can expect to be able to assess at the time of signing one of these agreements. Thank you for your consideration."
MaryAnn	"Yes to this - rule has been a long time coming!!!!"
Jean	"I believe the FTC should pass a rule to prohibit the non-compete clause in work contracts. Workers have enough disadvantages when dealing with employers, especially since so few of them are unionized. Nothing could be more American than workers seeking better employment and no one should stand in the way."
J	"Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model...Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. To be clear, there are nuances to this discussion and a blanket endorsement of the FTC proposal: As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations.

	Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not- for- profit and for-profit hospital systems. As a physician who has been impacted personally by non-compete clauses and the multiple downstream effects, I respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Kimberly	"Noncompete clauses unfairly limit the opportunities of hardworking essential professionals. As a physician who works in a very needed specialty (psychiatry & addiction medicine), I would have to move my family or travel significant distances just to maintain my employment. My specialty is needed everywhere, and people are suffering everywhere —please allow me & my colleagues to not need to uproot family, schools, homes, spouses life to make a change in my employer. These decisions are never taken lightly."
Jay	"I am a physician currently affected by a Non-Compete Clause (the contract of my last hospital employer). The restrictions of the N.C. are: I cannot practice any medicine in a 50 miles radius (of the town where the hospital is located) and for 2 years. The hospital clearly threatened me (with litigation) not to speak to patients, give them my phone number, or instruct them where I was working next. The hospital clearly stated that they considered the patients (I treated in my busy practice for 8 years) were a property of the hospital. The financial success of the hospital is directly related to patients getting medical care at that institution. The hospital is afraid that if patients see me at another practice, they will lose revenue. The N.C. that is used in the Medical field is not good for patients. Patients are not commodities. They are people just like you. me, our family members, our neighbors. When they find a doctor that they received good medical care and trust, they want to have their care with that doctor, not the hospital. The success of the practice I led was due to me and our team, my outcomes, and how we cared for patients, not the hospital. This non-compete is specifically designed to force a doctor to leave this geographic location or suffer 2 years with a financial penalty (less income- currently I am working part time outside the non-compete radius). This is bad for patients who want me to take care of them. This is bad for physician families. ICI leave this location, my wife has to quit her job. My kids would have to leave their schools/friends/church that they love. Physician marriages have a higher incidence of divorce at baseline. As a culture/community, we would all agree that the priority should be on patients, families, and kids. Life is hard enough already. The power these large organizations have in medicine is excessive and beyond what is good for our communities. My success as a physician isn't related to a building or an organization. I could work at a hospital with the best

	administrative leadership team in the USA but if I am a bad doctor, I will still have a unsuccessful practice. Patients would not want to see me. True success of a hospital system is not related to threatening people with lawsuits if they leave and start another practice in the same town. If the hospital is successful, then why are the employees (physicians, nurses, staff) wanting to leave? It is only the failing hospital system that needs to utilize the non-compete clause to threaten employees. When in the history of our country has stifling competition led to worse opportunities for patients. Competition is healthy for the systems that need to improve and innovate. Should Hospital systems that don't care about patients, don't care about modern standards, but only care about revenues (at the expense of everything else) survive? Don't we as a community want more options versus less for our friends/family members/neighbors? The hospital I left is a major employer in a small Midwestern town. They have 1 other hospital for competition but with the non-compete clause it transforms their power into a monopoly. This hospital has a revolving door of staff because the administrative leadership views the staff as components on a market that they can buy. If they need another surgeon, they just recruit one with a financial offer. The leadership does not care about patient outcomes. Every young physician that I recruited to be a partner over 8 years would quit (move away after-2 years because the hospital would not invest in helping doctors improve the care for patients). Without real competition the hospital can survive because patients would have to drive hours for the next hospital. I would love to be a resource for anyone or team at the FTC working on this to give more insight or to help this cause. Please contact me at my cell phone:. Jay Bridgeman MD, DDS Columbia, Missouri."
Stephanie	"My spouse has a non compete with a company that was acquired by another, larger company. If this larger company can enforce this non compete, it will directly affect the marketplace in my area. When the acquisition occurred, it removed services and employees from a sector of business that will no longer be serviced. If these employees are not able to support other related businesses, there will be a direct loss for consumers. And for new business. Let's get rid of the non compete and let capitalism truly be driven by innovation and not money."
Lara	"The field of medicine has been destroyed by a thousand cuts, do not compete clauses are one of the deeper wounds. These clauses are predatory and unjust and hurt physicians and patients alike. Physicians who have are part of a community they care for, must often choose between deplorable working conditions and uprooting their families and abandoning their patients, because of these restrictive clauses. In the years I have been a physician, I have seen them appear, then strengthen, and then become outright audacious, as the corporate health care administrators and lawyers have become more and more aggressive and emboldened. Usually, the clauses even go so far as to imply that the hiring entity somehow is the one that has allowed you to practice medicine and as such would incur injury if you were to compete against them. This is particularly insulting, since none of these slimy business people helped us to work our way into medical school, get through medical school, get through extensive medical training and certification hurdles and they certainly don't respect our practice of medicine, ethics or oaths! Why should I be beholden to them, when I sacrificed decades of my life in

	order to practice medicine? Why shouldn't I be allowed to practice medicine in whatever locale I choose, as long as I have earned the privilege and satisfied the licensing requirements? I have even been presented with contracts that stated I agreed to remain 60miles from ANY location that the healthcare business operated, owned, was affiliated with OR planned to open. I actually laughed out loud at that contract and refused to sign. Sadly, I know many new doctors who do sign these exploitive and unethical terms because of financial stress or the need to secure J-1 visa status and so on. This is why it is a predatory practice. If physicians were allowed to remain within the community they have been practicing in, without the threat of do not competes and legions of corporate lawyers coming after them, their communities would be all the better for it. Their mental health and the stability of their family life would be improved. The ability of these health care organizations to dominate the local markets, drive doctors out of practice and out of town, would be curtailed and true competition would arise. This would be competition for who was providing patients with good medical care. This NON-compete clause rule, proposed by the FTC, is long overdue. It is a just move and one that can truly change the broken healthcare system for the better for the American Physician and the American Public that needs us!"
Carson	"I am strongly in favor of banning non-compete agreements. I am currently under contract which imposes a 1 year non-compete clause after the termination of employment. Not disclosing confidential information is acceptable and understandable, but I will be prohibited from, "research, discovery, development, manufacture, importation, marketing, promotion, sale, or use of one or more Competing Products". Breach or threatened breach of this contract can, "will cause COMPANY to face irreparable injury which may be difficult to quantify monetarily". I will also be required for two years after termination of employment to inform any Future Employer a copy of the agreement and advise COMPANY of Future Employer and my obligations to the contract. The contract is incredibly vague to where any other employer tangentially related to my area of expertise could be considered a competitor and thus I am disallowed from working there for a period of one year after employment termination at current company. This will result in either me staying at current employer for a period longer than I would like to maintain my salary, or potentially take a large loss in salary to transition to a completely unrelated role in another industry for a period of at least one year. These effects limit employee mobility and fair compensation, and thus loss of tax revenue for the federal government, states, and municipalities. Banning non-compete agreements at the federal level will level the playing field among all employers so no one is particularly at a disadvantage and employees are free to move between companies to achieve competitive compensation Banning non-competes will not affect companies ability to seek recourse for disclosure of confidential information inappropriately by previous employees or protected by intellectual property. Non-competes are explicitly designed to make it difficult for current employees to switch between companies and to suppress wages, which I view as antithetical to a fair, competitive, and capitalist marketplace. Attachments Employee Agreement 2023"

Andrew	"I this this is a big step for worker's rights, non competes prevent a competitive marketplace and stifle work prospects"
Phil	"This is one of the most unfair business practices there is for employees. I have worked in the broadcast industry for 30 years. Non-competes have done nothin but drive good people out of the industry. Too often the non-competes I have seen, have had very little to do with protecting proprietary information. They are meant to keep people from looking at and taking higher paying jobs in the same industry in the same city. It rewards lazy or poor management. Non-competes force people out of the industry or forces them to move. This is a long time coming Please see this through."
Kristen	"I was terminated by a large hospital organization suddenly with a thriving, full Pediatric practice . Patients depended on me. My contract has a non- compete that only applies if I am terminated without cause which is a point of argument right now. I filed in arbitration as per my contract against my employer. My lawyer and I believe the non compete does not apply in my circumstances and that the noncompete is overly broad, restrictive, and harmful to the public (my patients). I started seeing my patients mostly gratuitously in their homes so they would not go without the care they wanted and needed. My patients need me and depend on me and do not feel they can find another Pediatrician who provides the same care I have for them. Many of my patients are complex with high needs and are not easily transferred to another pediatrician. They trust me. I refused to let them down. Right as my case was headed to arbitration, my former employer filed in court for a TRO to stop me from practicing medicine all together under the premise the noncompete does apply. Judge granted it without allowing me to testify at the TRO hearing. We fought. My patients spoke up. Families were ready to testify about their needs and the harm that they would be done if I could not care for them. The judge did not allow ANY patient testimony, no evidence about the office issues leading to my termination were allowed to be heard and my employers lawyer repeatedly hammered home that I had to abide by this noncompete because I was causing harm to this GIANT hospital system by seeing 350 children out of the 5300 in the practice and over a hundred thousand in the hospital systems clinics. The judge awarded the order and I was told I cannot talk to patients on the phone, text patients, zoom visits or provide any pediatric care within my non compete area. Patients are angry and panicked. I'm worried every day about my patients and how I can continue to care for them. The original noncompete barred me from engaging in the practice of medicine entirely not just as a pediatrician in primary care. That means I cannot practice ANY medicine in the area even though practicing as in an Emergency room is not a competition with my former practice which provides primary care only. It's disgusting. I'm still fighting because I love what I do and I will not abandon my patients but it's not looking good for me and these patients.. In a city like St. Louis with 3 large hospital systems, specialists cannot leave Washington University if treated poorly and underpaid/undervalued or unhappy because they cannot move to one of the other organizations due to the no competes in their contracts. There is no recourse for an employed physician

	against a toxic work environment and concerns of patient care and safety issues. Patients should always come first and that is not happening."
Kathleen	"I think noncompete clauses give the employer too much power over the life and future of its employees. This is especially harmful for professionals like physicians."
Louis	"I agree with the proposal to get rid of Non Compete laws. I am currently in a non compete that is preventing me from changing jobs."
Mark	"Non-compete clauses are a severe hindrance to freelancers like myself. I have run my own business for over 30 years and if one restaurant (for example) hires me to design a website for them and wants me to sign a non-compete, that's ridiculous. I can't design another restaurant's website for 2 years? No, that's dumb. Every company uses these because lawyers just throw everything at the kitchen sink into their boilerplate BS legal docs. Even when the effect is utterly anti-business."
Amrita	"I urge you to ban non-compete clauses. They harm workers who are unable to find a job with better pay and make it unable for those who experience harassment on the job to look for other employment. Employers already have a significant power differential over employees. Please save employees the right to leave a job and look for another one."
Cameron	"Please ban unfair non compete clauses, they are detrimental to workers and industries."
C	"Thank you for considering a ban on non-compete agreements. As a pediatrician who is employed by a large health system, my non-compete has adversely impacted my career path. My partners and I have all considered leaving our positions on many occasions, but the terms of our non-compete make that nearly impossible. We are unable to simply leave the practice of medicine for one year so that we can start over in a different office after our non-competes have expired. We also do not desire to move our practice to a far location, as we anticipate the loss of many patients as well as a poor commute with greater inconvenience for ourselves. Furthermore, as physicians who have received 7 years of training specifically to become pediatricians (4 years medical school, 3 years residency) and incurred $100K+ in debt to do so, we are not in careers that simply allow us to pivot and pursue a different career path. Due to all of these challenges, my partners and I find ourselves continuing to work for a medical system with a toxic culture, 40% pay reduction in the past 2 years, and really no feasible way to leave. I am aware that one argument in favor of physician non-compete agreements is that a physician who leaves a medical practice to join/start another is also taking with them proprietary information. I would argue that the greatest asset that I could

	take with me if I were to leave my health system is my own medical knowledge and experience taking care of patients. This is not proprietary information and nothing that has been imparted to me specifically by my health system. If the FTC enacted a ban on non-compete agreements, my partners and I would have the freedom that MANY employees in other professions have to pursue meaningful employment, either in private practice or with another health system. We would be able to finally leave our toxic culture and pay reductions in order to pursue options that are better suited to our talents. Thank you for your time."
Calvin	"I think this is an important rule that needs to be implemented especially for healthcare providers such as physicians and doctors. Too many times we are forced to adhere to noncompete causes and contracts that are extremely restrictive and outlandish (e.g. 20-50 mile radius from the last job) which is really detrimental to continuing patient care. Because of this, employers/hospitals really do have the upper hand and will leverage this to continue to not pay physicians at fair market value and to essentially "trap" these physicians into terms/contracts that are terrible for the physician. Doctors fear that they cannot continue their established lives with their family (spouse job, kid's school, etc) if they choose to leave their job. The other reality is that noncompete's are detrimental to continuing patient care. Too many times we have seen that when a physician left and was forced to abide by a very restrictive noncompete, patient care was lost and/or established with another provider that does not know that patient very well. This can drastically change treatment of that patient especially if they were stable on their current treatment plan."
William	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. These provisions effectively remove highly talented people from the job pool, thereby harming us all."
Edward	"I agree with doing away with Non Compete and even non solicitation agreements. They are too restrictive and make it impossible to make the living that I am accustomed to making, should I decide to change employers."
Natalie	"I am 100% in favor of banning non-complete clauses. I work in the beauty industry and am being held back from starting my own business and making a significantly higher profit. My current non-compete clause states that I cannot work within 10 miles of my current establishment for a year after leaving, resulting in me having to go to a completely different town to work in if that were to happen."
Victoria	"I support this proposed rule to ban non competes in veterinary medicine. Living in a small town can mean you could be trapped at a clinic that you have no idea when signing on is a truly toxic work environment. If the non compete exists you could then be forced to drive >100 miles in many cases to find work if you choose to leave. In an industry with a shortage of veterinarians already the fact that this still exists is ridiculous."
Ms.	"It is beyond ridiculous that average workers in sandwich shops, factories, and offices are forced to comply/sign non-compete contracts to work. I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban these "agreements", which are in fact not agreements at all. They are conditions imposed by employers.. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."

Jason	"Do not be swayed by the hospital associations and private equity groups' attempts to exempt healthcare workers from this proposed rule. Non-compete requirements prevent physicians from leaving terrible management situations for better opportunities to care for patients. How fair is it for a physician to have to move out of a county/drive 50 miles/up root their families/etc just to practice their highly specialized skill? A non-compete stifles productivity, limits consumer choice, and overall is only a tool which is used to harm an individual should they exercise their right to change employers. Please include physicians in the proposed rule change."
Venu madhav	"Please end the noncompete clause in the physician contracts."
Kalyan	" Doctors should not be exempt to non-compete as this unfairly disadvantages patients. Doctors should be freely mobile to join new institutions and broaden access to care without being held back by no compete clauses. Non-compete clauses only serve large Hospital non-profit entities and corporations who seek to lower doctor salaries and disadvantage patients with lower quality care and decrease access."
Adam	"I just got laid off and my non-compete hurts my ability to be hired in my industry. My vote would be to abolish non compete agreements m so everyday workers become more valuable to organizations and so we can still find a job after being laid off in our industry. Many of us have only been in one industry so a non compete can be a death sentence in the jobs market."
Autumn	"Please make noncompetes illegal. They are decimating the physician workforce in many communities."
Michele	"This is long overdue. Large hospitals or employers use this option to hurt employees or professional employees. It is a way to reduce salaries and limit competition. Please make mom-competes illegal."
Walter	"In response to a request for public comment on "Non Compete" clauses. To whom it may concern: I am writing to encourage the Federal Trade Commission to make "Non-Compete" clauses unlawful. I am currently a practicing physician in a town of approximately 40,000 people. Our town is home to two hospitals and a large multi-specialty physician group. Like many towns of a similar size, we struggle to recruit and retain quality health care providers. As is a nation-wide trend, physicians who come to our area are expected to sign a contract containing a "Non-Compete" clause. This gives the hospitals in our town far too much leverage over employed physicians. For example, if a physician comes at odds with their employer hospital, and wishes to seek new employment, they must leave the town entirely. We then, as a community, are left without a physician who may have

	otherwise stayed to serve the community in mother capacity. There are many rural areas across the country that face the same struggle to retain health care providers. In our city, we seem to have a revolving door of physicians that come and go on a two to five year cycle. Patients are constantly left scrambling to find new physicians after their familiar ones leave. There may be situations where care can be enhanced by allowing like-minded physicians to unite as specialty groups. `Non-Compete" clauses stifle physician collaboration by preventing physician group formation. This is anti-trust issue. One that inhibits innovation and progress. Sadly, I have seen "Non-Compete" clauses tear apart families. It is not uncommon for physicians to be married to other professionals who have jobs that are dependent on geography. If a physician loses their job, they are then faced with the choice of giving up medicine as a profession or forcing their spouse to give up their job. The community is then deprived of two productive professionals. In conclusion, "Non-Compete" clauses are frankly Un American. As Americans, we should not be restricted in our ability to earn a living and make a difference where we choose. This is a basic freedom that should be insured by law. Thank you for thoughtful consideration, Walter Coats DO, FACC Interventional Cardiologist Jefferson City, MO"
Nick	"I support this move. Many young engineers are entering the job market and realizing that they are significantly limited in their job options if they would like to leave. The non-competes, recruitment strategy, and the unforthcoming details of sonic positions mix to make many companies predatory of young engineering graduates."
Dillon	"I have been under a non compete agreement with the same company for almost 10 years. In the past 8 years I have not had a raise in pay and have been told there won't be a raise. The ban would help me and the employees that I work with make more money by either getting a raise or being able to go work for another company and or being able to start my own company. With that being said, I am in favor of banning non compete agreements. It would definitely boost more entrepreneurs to start their own companies and make more money to support their families like I would love to do."
Joe	"Controls Engineer here, Non-Compete Clauses are a method of extorting tech-savy employees into being dependent on a given employer. They are unethical and prevent the 'free market' of at-will talent from moving elsewhere to other opportunities."
Katy	"Please ban noncompete clauses and include physicians! We are committed to serving the greater good for our patients but are forced to endure awful working conditions in many locations, severe staffing and equipment shortages, unpaid time, and threats of retaliation as a result of our noncompete clauses. We can't change jobs without uprooting our families. We have sacrificed so much of our family lite and Mental health to take care of people only to be treated poorly by those who employ us. We have the highest suicide rate of any profession now. We are facing major physician shortages. We continued working and helping during the pandemic despite pay cuts. Help us take care of ourselves so we can take care of you."

Daniel	"Good afternoon, my name is Daniel...from Central Florida, now living and working in Missouri. My education and career path has taken me to work in the private English tutoring world. Yet, throughout this work, I have been hounded by non-compete clauses which have prevented me from working with certain groups of students at certain times, and have meant that, on multiple occasions, I have had to leave my loyal clientele base behind since my contract with the private tutoring company has been the only method by which I am permitted to have or remain in contact with these clients, less I breach my contract. I am a very capable teacher, and the results of my work show in a student's abilities and grades, both of which improve under my tutelage. Yet, as a result of non-compete clauses, I am unable to keep many of my clientele for the long term, and would lose that clientele should I leave for a better paying opportunity at another company. For all the work I put in to my students, I am underpaid, and the families I work with agree with me in this regard (yes, I have talked to them about it). Noncompete clauses limit my ability to provide comprehensive tutelage services for my students- both by stripping me of better opportunities, and by limiting my ability to remain in contact with potential clientele once I am released from my private contract. To see the end of this toxic practice would benefit both myself and my students (since I might be able to dedicate more time to my students should I be able to take a better opportunity), and would even give me access to more potential students, as I would be able to dedicate more of my time to teaching, an industry I care much about"
Daniel	"As a medical resident in radiology graduating from an ACGME approved fellowship in 16 months, I strongly approve of the proposed non compete clause rule applying to physicians, regardless of their employer. After I graduate, if I move to a town where there are 2 radiology practices with strict non- compete clauses I would be forced to move to another city if the first job is not a good fit for myself or the employer, since a non-compete clause would bar me from working for the only other employer in town. This 1) disparages physicians from working in smaller towns with limited employers and/or 2) unfairly punishes physicians by forcing them to stay with an employer that may not be a good fit or treat the physician well. There is little if any trade secret information within healthcare organizations that a physician would be able to take with them to a nearby employer, which is a primary reason to instate non compete clauses. Additionally, non competes clauses are used against physicians by employers to coerce them continue working within potentially toxic workplace environments because the only alternative is to uproot their families from their communities and move to a different town outside the area of non compete. For these reasons I fully support the proposed non compete clause rule and urge that it apply to physicians as well."
Don	"The FTC's ban on non-compete clauses is good for workers. It will help improve working conditions and raise wages."
Thomas	"I am fully in favor of the Federal Trade Commission's proposed rule to terminate the effective outcomes of any existing non-compete agreements between employers and employees, thereby making them moot and ineffective. The decision to work for one company or another needs to remain with the individual being paid for his/her services, and holding an employee hostage in a position is an unethical business practice. No employer should have the right to prevent an individual from working in their profession for a competitor who may offer a less-stressful work environment, a more lucrative benefit package, and/or a better salary. I fully support President Biden's position that such non-compete agreements are unfair to employees and should be banned by federal law, and if it matters, I wish to state for the record that I am a retiree from the workforce."

Michelle	"My fiancé works for an employer who has a very strong non-compete section in his employment agreement. He has been told by his employer that he cannot work in any technology position for any company in the state of Missouri for two-years following his departure from the company. This has made it impossible for him to accept job offers for better positions and more money. Attachments Employment Agreement"
Sreekanth	"As a physician, I strongly support removing non-compete clauses. This clause gives hospitals monopoly over physicians and limits their ability to work at multiple places"
Robert	"I was laid off as a nurse in the enteral medical device field . I had no choice but turn to another specialty within the nursing profession because of the non-compete clause. STOP NON-COMPETE!!!! Allow workers to work where they want when they were never given a choice to be fired or laid-off"
Stefan	"I am a physician who has been affected by noncompete. In my personal experience, hospitals will not even consider negotiating more reasonable noncompete rules because they know everyone is doing it and doctors don't have other options. These need to go away or have limitations."
Concerned	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. I have worked in the banking industry for 15 years. I have seen first hand how Chief Banking Officers push veteran bankers out of their positions because they (CBO's) know that the veteran bankers cannot work for competing banks do to the non- compete clause. I believe this is an unfair, life altering practice which allows a former employer to continue to control the ability of a former employee to work and provide for their families."
JARED	"I am against non-compete clauses. Get rid of them."
Kwasi	"The executive action of this regulatory change would be a massive boon for laborers across the country. It is very common for my profession, physicians, to be inappropriately forced out of our metro areas because of unreasonable 15-50 mile non-competes. Effectively eliminating competition for any surrounding hospital system for our services. This also breeds complacency on employers' sides to give negligible benefits and foster toxic work environments where physicians with large debt burdens are held captive or else risk uprooting their families to continue to practice medicine/surgery. The long-term impacts these non-competes have on patient access are heavily understated. As we enter an era of American history rife with income & wealth inequality, an eroding middle class, and dismal population growth prospects due to financial insecurity of our upcoming working classes, this FTC proposal would be a significant mark in U.S. modern history of an administration's attempt to change the tides for the masses."

Jennifer	"I fully support banning non-competes. They infringe on individual liberties and give too much power to administrators and executives. Frankly, telling a hardworking person they either remain working under a power-hungry boss or else move their family to an entire new city/region contains hints of slavery. As a physician who has worked tirelessly to obtain my education and training, followed by years of work as a general pediatrician in a small town, I deserve the basic freedom to provide for my family and care for my patients should I choose to change employers."
Kimberly	"I agree with overruling noncompete clauses. I currently work under a noncompete that is not paying the standard RVU rate and I cannot go to work for any of the competitors in our area for a year. I would have to completely uproot my family and move my kids to another school to change jobs which is unfair."
Cynthia	"I am a consumer/employee under a non-compete and believe they should be outlawed for the exact reasons proposed under this new rule. They should be Federally banned with MINIMAL exclusions for only those with an absolutely necessary reason for a non-compete. I am not able to pursue positions within my industry that are competitive offers due to my own non-complete and they are enforceable in the state of Missouri and should not be."
Jareer	"As a physician, the non compete has hurt families a lot. If a physician leaves a practice, most of the time he has to move out to another city, causing his family , kids to suffer. This non compete has benefited the big corporations and destroyed many lives. It needs to go!"
Semra	"Non compete agreements hurt individual business owners and entrepreneurs. Please end non-compete to support a free and open market!"
Josh	"The non-compete agreement from an employee's standpoint really makes you feel trapped. I have been working at pest control company for about 5 years. When I was first hired there was no discussion of a non-compete agreement throughout the hiring process. After I had worked there for around 6 months, they ask me to sign the non-compete or really lose my job. So, at that time what choice do I have? I have a wife and daughter to provide for, so I NEEDED my job, so I was basically forced to sign a prison sentence. I understand the company wanting to protect their assets but keeping me from better myself and creating my own assets possibly with another company just seems unfair. If I were to leave my job now and remain in the industry, I would have to move almost 3 hours away from all my family members such as parents, siblings, and grandparents. I would have to move away from my entire family support system just to be able to work. Nobody tells the business owner what they can and can't do, they get to make their own rules and do as they please. I have nothing wrong with them benefiting from building a business. I think they deserve the financial abundance for taking a risk on themselves, but I shouldn't be penalized or not denied the same opportunity. On another note, the company I work for has been using chemicals in a manor that is unsafe to employees, customers, and is purely violating the laws and labels set by the department of agriculture and EPA. But what can I do about it? I want to leave but I'm scared that I might lose my job here and not be aloud to go work for another company and really penalize myself for trying to do what's right morally. Please put a stop to this dictatorship that the business owners have over their employees and allow us to be free to live and make choices to better are families and situations."

Dallas	"It is about time that non-competes were abolished. Support this decision 100%."
Ellis	"I have been working under non compete for the last 25 years. If not for the non compete I would have and still would state my on business and be contributing 8 to 15 million dollars annually to the economy's taxable income."
Thomas	"Noncompete for doctors is essentially forcing them into an unethical dilemma. If the disagree with their employer and feel they have to leave their employee arrangement they are forced to abandon their patients because of the noncompete. Bad for patients. Bad for doctors. Bad for American healthcare."
Christine	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal. They are the exact opposite of a free market system and capitalism. In addition, non compete clause only helps further an organization developing a monopoly which is also a problem. Getting rid of noncompete clauses helps drive costs down, prevents monopolies in an area by encouraging competition. It also improves patient care and patient access to doctors. Especially if a health care system is doing something wrong, a noncompete clause just encourages that wrong behavior to continue. Competition is the foundation of our economy. Why noncompete clauses were ever considered legal is beyond me."
Dr	"I am a physician who practices in the states of Illinois and Missouri. I am in favor of banning all non-compete clauses from workers contracts both in medicine and at large. But I can specifically speak for my own field which is hospital medicine. I have myself been subjected with non-compete clauses which are overly broad and detrimental to my ability to find gainful employment. I have been threatened by hospital administration in the past with having my ability to practice medicine be denied by a court injunction DURING COVID if I were to practice within 30 miles of my current hospital. But my city is barely 3 miles wide. Non-competes are anti-worker. These are anti-physician. If you care about medicine in America, you will ban non-compete clauses for Doctors and all other medical staff"
Adthe	"I am in favor of the proposal to ban non-compete agreements. This proposal helps workers to earn a better living by allowing them to take their talents to companies that will pay them their worth. Traditional non-compete agreements are oppressive and limiting, and prevent workers from supporting themselves effectively."
Theresa	"Non-compete agreements, also known as non-competition clauses or restrictive covenants, are provisions in a contract that limit an individual's ability to work for a competitor or start a competing business for a specified period of time after the termination of their employment. While these agreements can offer some protection to companies by preventing employees from taking sensitive information or client relationships to a competitor, they also have several potential drawbacks and criticisms. Infringement of individual rights: Non-compete agreements can be seen as limiting an individual's right to work and pursue their chosen career. In some cases, these agreements can prevent people from working in their desired field or force them to relocate to find work. Stifling innovation: Non-compete agreements can also be criticized for stifling innovation by preventing employees from using the knowledge and skills they have gained in their previous job to create new products or services. Lack of fairness: Non-compete agreements can be perceived as unfair, especially when they are used to restrict lower-level employees or those who do not have access to confidential information. Vagueness and overbreadth: Non-compete agreements are often written in broad, vague terms, making it difficult for employees to understand exactly what is prohibited. This can also lead to disputes about what constitutes a violation of the agreement.: Non-compete agreements can create financial hardship for workers who are unable to find employment in their chosen field or start a new business due to the restrictions imposed by the agreement. As a educator for nurse practitioners and DNP students, I play a critical role in preparing future healthcare providers to deliver high-quality patient care. I am a registered nurse (RN) with advanced degrees and specialized training in nursing education. I use my knowledge and experience to impart the clinical, theoretical, policy, and practical skills necessary for students to become effective practitioners. I have taught in a variety of settings, including universities, colleges, and healthcare organizations. I am responsible for creating and delivering course content., leading class discussions and clinical simulations, and evaluating student performance. In addition to teaching, I also participate in curriculum development, program evaluation, and research. To be an effective nurse educator, I hold excellent communication and interpersonal skills, a deep understanding of nursing theory, practice, policy, and a commitment to continuous learning and professional development. It is also important that I am able to inspire and motivate students, encouraging them to take an active role in their own learning and to apply what they have learned to real-world scenarios. As a nurse educator I play a vital role in shaping the future of healthcare by preparing nurse practitioners and DNP students to provide high-quality patient care. Through my teaching and mentorship. I help to ensure that the next generation of nursing professionals is well-prepared to meet the challenges of the rapidly changing healthcare landscape. That is why I am critical of the non-compete agreements for nurses with advanced degrees and doctors as these non compete contracts can be a contentious issue, where they may restrict the ability of nurses and doctors to work in their chosen field and can limit an individual's job prospects and earning potential. In President Biden's State of the Union address, which is a yearly address given by the President of the United States to Congress and the nation, Biden outlined the Biden Harris Administration legislative agenda and priorities that included criticism of non-compete agreements (here is the link: https://www .nbcnews.com/video/biden-criticizes- noncompete- agreements- in- state-of- the-union-address- 163 12787776 1) Finally, Vice President Kamala Harris's home state of California, has banned non-compete agreements for certain types of low-wage workers and other states also have more lenient laws. Ultimately, the laws and regulations surrounding non-compete agreements should be banned by governments and should be changed through the legislative process this year to accomplish this legislative priority of the Biden-Harris Administration. As Biden said, let's finish the job!"

Megan	"Physicians should be included in the banning of non-compete clauses."
Ally	"I'm in the hair industry completely in favor of banning non-competes. I worked at my barbershop under a toxic employer for 2 years before deciding that my job was making too much of an impact on my mental health. I chose to go against my non-compete after unsuccessfully finding a job where I would make enough money to support myself. I am now at risk of paying my old employer money I do not have to keep my job. This is completely one sided and unfair."
Susan	"Noncompetes constitute an unfair method of competition and therefore violate Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act."
Robin	"Mental health clients should have the right to choose their provider. They should be able to stay with the counselor that they have built a rapport and worked with to create a better life for themselves."
Matthew	"My wife and I are physician scientists at an academic university in a medium sized metropolitan area. We were both required to sign "standard" non-compete agreements for our first faculty contracts that were not negotiable. These are very extensive and essentially would prevent one or the other of us from working as a physician within the metropolitan area the two years. The express purpose of these non-compete clauses is to prevent competition between our institution, the other major academic institution, and other practices in the area for physicians so as to reduce salaries and benefits. We do not have "trade secret" information. If one or the other of us becomes unhappy with our job (but the other is happy) we could still be forced to both move to new jobs outside of the metropolitan area because of these non-compete clauses. This likely would case a lot of stress for us as a family. This is also a new phenomenon, more senior physicians do not have them."
Sheena	"As a physician I feel it completely ridiculous that you would allow hospitals to lobby to exclude physicians from this rule. For years Healthcare corporations have been using non-compete clauses to tether physicians to their organizations because the physician is not able to them go elsewhere to practice without disrupting their whole life and uprooting their family. There is no reason physicians should be exempt from this new rule."
Chris	"Corporate America needs to stop holding current and former employees hostage. There are already laws against corporate espionage, if the employee reveals proprietary information from their previous employer."
Jacob	"I am a physician at a large tertiary care center hospital in the Midwest. Although I personally do oppose non-compete clauses in general based on philosophical grounds, I want to specifically comment on the American Hospital Association's statement on the proposed FTC rule change. They claimed to speak for their associated physicians when they came out opposing the new rule, and I want to specifically say that no physician I know employed by a hospital agrees with this position. The fact that a large industry trade group would claim to represent all hospital employed physicians is totally absurd, should be illegal, especially when the majority of the employed physicians do NOT support non-compete agreements."

JEFFREY	"I support the elimination of non compete clauses including the elimination of noncompete clauses for physicians. Please do not exclude physicians from this important legislation."
Mark	"I desperately needed a job. I signed an employment agreement which included a broad 5 year noncompete clause. I was fired after 15 months without any negative explanation. I now feel extremely restricted in finding new employment. When I disclose my agreement in interviews, many employers will now rightfully reject me. I don't believe these types of agreements are fair. They restrict workers too much. Please adopt these new rules against noncompete agreements."
Kim	"I agree that non-compete clauses should be eliminated from employment contracts. They prohibit employees from bettering themselves, typically imposing distance restrictions that would require the employee to relocate to a different area to explore new employment opportunities. This oftentimes is impactful as many employees reside in the same area as extended family members and require this family network to assist with the raising of their children. Please pass this rule!!"
Randi	"Non-compete's are predatory on the worker and shouldn't be allowed to exist. In the time I have worked for companies that have formal non-competes I have only ever seen them used as a way to prevent the employee from finding a job as a form of retribution. They are hurtful to people that hone their skillset over years of professional work that could benefit the nation by being able to work in the field they have become experts in."
Kishore	"Non compete clauses inhibit freedom of work. We must make these illegal. Hospitals cannot be an exception to this ban. Physicians must not be subject to non compete clauses since non compete stipulations impact patient care."
YOUNGER	"In early 2022 I missed an opportunity to join a local medical device team that is thriving in my area due to its vendor agreement in my area, while my current team is failing mostly due to insurance acceptance and Covid shut downs. Not having a noncompete would have offered a substantially better income opportunity and mentally my stress levels would have decreased tremendously. My only other option was to have moved 70 miles away and leave my elderly sick and struggling parents alone with no help."
Hunter	"As a Kansas City, Missouri Resident I strongly support the ban on Non-Compete Clauses."
LisaLisa	" Physicians should be included in the noncompete Exclusion. We have to work and should not be tied down. Noncompete are unfair."

Christopher	"Non competes penalize employees and let systems and corporations claim vast territories requiring professionals to move to another city or even state to get a job. This effectively penalizes employees for leaving a job even if it is due to employer issues. Please end non compete clauses."
Mia	"Non competes often force people to remain at jobs they do not want - that may be economically or socioemotionally disadvantageous - because of non compete clauses. It is not reasonable for employers to say "if you want a job now, we will make you locally unemployable should you leave in the future." Circumstances change, jobs may turn out not to be as promised/expected, etc. Workers deserve to be able to change their employer if they find a more desirable option."
Michael	"I applaud the FTC for their efforts on banning non-competes. The non-compete only is used as a scare tactics by employers. I work for a company that hides their non-compete in their new hire paperwork that all employees are required to sign to be hired. They title the document "Employee Confidentiality Agreement" and in the middle of the document they have a paragraph called non-compete. They also do not disclose the "Employee Confidentiality Agreement" until you start the position. Most employees do not even know it is there or what it is. I was involved with a situation that a large healthcare provider hired a salesperson. Once the employee started with the company things were not as they promised and they were not paying bonuses as they said they would be. I hired the employee at a smaller regional company not expecting that the larger healthcare organization would pursue the non-compete well knowing the situation. They did pursue the non-compete and sent the employee a letter that she could be sued. Even worse they sent a letter to us threatening to sue the smaller regional company if we did not terminate the employee. The owner did not want to have to go through the possible legal cost to defend this in court. Well knowing the likelihood, the large corporation may not go through with it or that they would not win the case in court. In other situations I have had employers that would terminate or RIF employees and offer a severance package for a few weeks only if the employee signs a non-compete. This again is bullying the employee into something that only benefits the employer. The little guy is forced to agree just to be able to take care of their family until the can find a new job often in a different industry. My point in all this is that the non-compete hurt the employees from their ability to grow professionally and when companies use their money to bully the little guy it is unfair practice. These companies have many laws and rules that protect them from unfair competition, monopolies, and protection from trade secrets. We the employee have little protection from the companies bullying us with non-competes and limiting us from having the ability to improve ourselves professionally or financially. I again applaud the FTC for proposing this rule and hope that they will act quickly to abolish employee non-competes agreements."
Charla	"I completely oppose do not compete clauses. Especially in the medical field . It is hard enough living in a rural are to find a consistent doctor without them relocating every few years."
Jarrold	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I doubt anyone will actually read this message, but I feel it is my duty as a citizen of the great USA to engage in these requests for public comment. I have never had a career position in which I wasn't forced to sign a

	noncompete contract. Especially early on in my career, these contracts had an outsized effect on my willingness to change employers or start a new business that could have provided superior services for less money. I didn't write the below, but I agree with it wholeheartedly. Thank you for your consideration in this matter. I'm writing today in support of your alert to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Jarrod Holder Saint Louis, MO"
Kevin	"I have been forced to sign two non-compete agreements for two separate employers over the course of the last 20 years. Once when I was promoted into a higher level position (as part of the mandatory paperwork for accepting the promotion) and the other when I left the company in order to receive a percentage of my earned early retirement compensation that the employer attempted to deprive me of "unless I signed the non-compete. Both of these employers agreed to pay me for a period of time when I left, but for only half of the time that I was required to stay out of that or a similar line of business. This has cost me approximately $350,000 in lost wages by being banned and blacklisted from an industry where I have spent most of the last 39 years. My only option now is to make 1/5 of what I was making before, forcing me to borrow money, max out credit cards, and leave some bills to go unpaid. COBRA alone is costing me $1,908.17 per month. Something has to be done about this, it is wrecking peoples lives while these companies are reaping the rewards of locking previous employees out of their livelihoods. What gives them the right to continue to hold previous employees captive and starve them out of a living? Please end this practice as soon as possible and do not allow powerful lobbyist to water your actions down. No employer should have the right to keep "previous employees" from earning a living and supporting their families in their chosen field. Thank you, for addressing this issue. I would be more than happy to testify or tell my personal story regarding how these non-compete agreements have left a trail of destruction in my life and the lives of many others that I know."
Jennifer	"Physicians be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. Non-compete agreements allow large hospital systems a large advantage over physicians in the marketplace and make it difficult to leave unfavorable work or negotiate better terms. There is a large increase in physician burnout and physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Non-compete clauses eliminate competition, leading to fewer benefits and overall worse working conditions for physicians Eliminating the noncompete clauses will help improve healthcare access for patients as hospitals and corporations can no longer restrict where physicians can work. I have seen many physicians unable to practice anywhere from 6 months to 2 years due to their non-compete clauses, as they are unable to leave their current location due to multiple reasons. Given the shortage of physicians, it seems unreasonable to restrict physicians from providing patient care when they are attempting to find better working conditions. Sincerely, A practicing physician"

Lucas	"I agree I, should not ever feel arbitrarily stuck to an employer and not be able to change jobs in my region of living without possible legal implications. If my skillset is within a certain realm it would make it possible to be sued finding a new job that offers better benefits, compensation, or better work environment. We should have full control over where we work. I am in, complete agreement. Non compete clauses should be banned and employers should not be able to force you to sign one. They should be held legally liable if they do."
Steven	"I worked for a company that pressured us to sign a non compete an i did like the rest of my coworkers. Now we sold to a competitor non competes transfer. How can a company sell you with out letting us know that we are for sale an hover over our heads a non compete. There are not really any secrets in trades most people can learn about trades at shows an YouTube.. in my opinion. I was there for 5 years helped the company grow as did all the people. It doesn't seem right people that don't want to work there can't stay in the same business without worrying that they may have a lawyer sending letters to then or a new employer they might rather work for it's wrong . It's like owning an selling a persons future"
Tiffani	"Please push this ban through! It absolutely hinders the ability of an employee to support one's family, to have the freedom to further one's craft, and prevents employers from creating a culture that makes an employee want to stay."
Ronald	"As a provider, I am in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses. I work for a small Healthcare system . Over the years, I have witnessed many physicians work for our facility for one year. After that, he or she returns to work closer to home because the non-compete clause is satisfied. This limits good continuity of care."
Elaine	"I am writing in strong support of the proposed non-compete ban. I am a physician and non-competes can make it impossible for physicians to live and work where they live, and need to uproot their families and interrupt care for their patients in the process. I personally am stuck in a job paying far below my market rate because a job change would involve a long commute and I am concerned my employer would come after me legally if I took a job in my city. Thank you for your consideration!"
Kelly	"A non-compete is a jail for providers. A friend was in an orthopedic group that was bought out by a hospital. After working for them for a few months he could see that he didn't like the way they were running things (read: they prioritized money over patients). instead of being able to take a job at the other hospital in town, he moved to another state to work for a year before being able to move back home to work for the other hospital. I don't know if you have ever spent time in rural America, but this is in a town of 35k people. Do you know how hard it is to get a specialist who did their residency at Mayo to a small town? It's nearly impossible. If my friend wasn't from there he wouldn't work in the area. Unfortunately, after getting a taste for coastal life, after a couple of years, he moved away again to a city of 2 million people, and we lost one of the best doctors in our area. The AI-IA says non-compete clauses are wonderful and their doctors love them. That's like Colonel Sanders saying that he has the happiest chickens. It makes no sense. If the AHA really follows it's own mission statement, it would have no problem letting providers choose where they want to work instead of trying to hold them hostage. Thank you for your time."

Daniel	"I support ending non-compete clauses. This includes ending them for physicians . The AHA supports non-compete clauses for physicians for the sole purpose of increasing their profits. Please end non- compete clauses and improve access to healthcare for our population."
Daquan	"I am subject to a previous employers non compete and I am miserable. My new job doesn't violate the agreement, but I still have to keep my job a secret. I left due to threats and harassment and if they knew I was still in my profession they'd wring every last dollar out of my pocket with a frivolous lawsuit. Would they win? No, but they would be satisfied with running my pockets dry by dragging things out for however long it took for me to go completely broke or leave the field forever. Non competes have no place in todays world or todays America It only exists as a tool for the powerful to dictate where and how the working class citizen can or cant work - even after the have parted ways. These agreements box innovators in while creating a host of opportunities for the employer to violate the employee's mental, emotional, or even physical health while keeping them trapped at that work location unless they wish to start their hard earned career completely over - which often means being sent to the very bottom of the compensation ladder in a new field."
Mike	"Very needed new rule. Will help keep needed primary care providers in rural areas instead of them being forced to move to provide for their families if they do not want to work for their current employer."
Abbie	" Nonprofit hospitals are that in name only. Physicians regardless of where they are working should have the legal protection from predatory employers who try to control their livelihood through restrictive noncompetes. It's bad for everyone, especially patients, when doctors aren't free to work in whatever setting they deem best. Failure to act will also exacerbate the looming doctor shortage."
Lori	"I 100% agree with limiting non compete clauses. They are unfair and encourages bullying if an employee wants to leave and work in the same field but are prevented from doing so due to a non compete. At least they should be limited to 5 years employment or less and then they should become null and void"
Penny	"Non-compete agreements are oppressive to workers. My 60 year old husband was released from employment in the field he has worked in his entire career. lie was asked to sign the non-compete 3 years into his 8 years of employment with the company. If the non-compete is enforceable, he will have to make a career change at an age where he is nearing retirement and this will create a huge financial hardship. If he tries to fight the noncompete in court he will be required to travel from Missouri to Kentucky to go to court where his former employer is headquartered. These oppressive practices by employers must be stopped."
Bonnie	" Physicians should not be excluded from these regulations. Forcing them. To non-competes is bad for patients."
Ross	"I agree with this action. I believe that non-competes are unfair, especially to younger employees that are starting to figure out their career. I think the clause should also prevent employers from getting around the new requirements. For example, sonic employers might require new hires to sign a two year service contract."

Janet	"My husband's workplace refused to let him leave and go to a competitor. They said they would take him to court if he went to that particular company because the owners were enemies. They basically have held him hostage and it damaged us quite a bit financially. That business opportunity made many of the first workers wealthy and much better off than we are now. I hate the company he works for. Others have left and gone on to different companies- and the owners had no problem with them leaving. It's only because my husband wanted to go to the "enemy." Chesterfield, MO."
Renee	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements"
Kelley	"One in five Americans have been forced to sign noncompete agreements at the time they were hired, leaving these workers with lower wages and worse benefits. It's clear as day that noncompete agreements are bad for workers !!"
Christina	"As someone personally affected by this, I feel that contractors and employees that are not full-time or benefit provided and have not been sponsored in their training should be able to market their services without the restrictions of a non-compete clause. This not only limits opportunity and income for the service provider, it also limits access to instructors and providers to other areas which may include underserved or underprivileged populations. Non-compete clauses particularly for positions requiring extensive training often result in employment that does not meet the cost of training, equipment and ancillary support, such as continuing education, subscription services etc. this is further compounded when the employee is a W-2 and cannot write off these expenses."
Jeffery	"I am a physician in rural Missouri. Non-compete clauses cause good physicians to leave health manpower shortage areas. The public suffers greatly. Most of the time the physicians are leaving due to unethical practices by hospital administration. They are not leaving due to financial reasons. We have lost 25% of our physician workforce due to non-compete clauses in the past year. Very sad. The hospital has more attorneys to fight the physician and it is better to just leave. I fully support eliminating non-compete clauses in contracts for the public's sake!"
Doug	"Ban non-compete clauses now."
Yonatan	"I strongly support this proposed rule. I am a physician in a niche specialty. I currently have a non-compete in my contract and it effectively prevents me from working anywhere else, unless I want to move my family to a new city. This would force my wife to find a new job and my children to switch schools/daycare. The other alternative is that I remain unemployed for 2 years. My subspecialty is in an ICU, and therefore I don't even have patients that I could take away from my employer if I were to leave - my job is essentially shift work. I have limited ability to renegotiate pay with my employer because of this restriction. I attempted to ask my employer to remove it from my contract and they flat-out refused. I strongly support abolishing non-competes as described in the rule. I wanted to attach a copy of the non-compete I signed, but I am worried my employer would consider that "disclosure of trade practices"."

Yonatan	"I've already submitted a comment but I wanted to submit another. As I've read more news stories about this proposed rule, I'm struck by the frequent complaint from companies that eliminating non-compete clauses will hurt their business. They're not wrong, but this is the whole point. As it stands right now, businesses hold an unfair advantage over individuals, and it's my hope that eliminating non-compete clauses will lead to a re-balance. Workers don't get much choice in this matter as many companies refuse to negotiate - my current employer refused to remove the clause under any circumstances, but there's no appreciable harm to them if I left, other than the fact that they'd have to recruit somebody new."
Brendan	"Any non- compete law that excludes physicians from its benefit hurts patients at the benefit of large corporations and is an acting to the extremely high level skills and knowledge that physicians possess. What an absolute mockery of a bill to exclude physicians from its benefit. This is no different than the years of abuse physicians have endured at the hands of corporations empowered by poor governmental regulations designed specifically to hurt physicians and in turn hurt patients."
Daniel	"The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families In sum as a board eligible orthopedic surgeon, I emphatically encourage the FTC to strike down non competes / restrictive covenants. They are unethical and antithetical to the American way of business."
John	"I am willing to share the wording in some of my employment contracts. They sound like a slave contract. There's no intellectual property involved, no special project bid, just an agency that skims 40% off your rate to cut you a paycheck. They also forbid you from accepting a permanent position with health insurance and retirement benefits. The agency never offers any benefits, so you can see how evil and harmful they are to individuals and the country."
Austin	"I fully support the non-compete clause rule. Non-compete clauses allow employers to limit the freedom of Americans to change jobs as they see fit. It denies citizens the freedom to make the choice best for themselves and their families. If firms want to retain employees, then they should focus on providing a salary and benefits that meet or exceed market rates for that position not trapping employees. Why do businesses get an advantage over workers in the labor market?"
Melissa	"It is time to ban non-competes. At a minimum, it is an outdated way to keep an employee from leaving a badly run job. If an employer has to legally threaten you from joining another business, it says way more about how poorly their business is run than the competitor. Lastly, in healthcare, it's the patients that suffer, as physicians are forced to leave a city or entire region to escape a terrible job, & that rejoin them loses out on great expertise & compassionate care. it's time to ban non-competes."

Trent	"I am strongly against any non-compete agreements. In these trying economic times, it is unjust to force employees to choose between working for an employer they want to leave or taking on a financial burden while waiting to switch to a better job in their field. If corporations are so worried about losing their employees, they need to work to create a more desirable workplace. Americans should be able to work for a company they choose, not one they are forced to work for."
Gary	"I am one person against a huge organization. This huge organization is so afraid of my potential ability to compete with them that they forced, or somewhat bullied me (I could have said no I guess) to sign an exit agreement that added more language to the no-compete. This exit agreement was thrown out at me with two weeks to review. I shouldn't have signed it as it limits me in so many ways. I signed the agreement as they had all of these wonderful plans to celebrate my retirement and I wanted to be able to take it in without this hanging over my head. I signed it three days before my last day. There was already "no compete" language in the contract that would have lasted for a year. They extended it for two years, and it limits my ability to work, to innovate, and to help save lives and help businesses. So, banning these no-competes would not hurt the previous employer, in my opinion. It only opens the door to so many entrepreneurs, allowing for healthy competition, creativity, innovation. The no compete limits these advances for society and business! The Non-Compete that I am being forced to comply to is limiting• 1) My ability to even have my hobby (which is directly related to my career) 2) Squashes innovation and the ability to advance ideas The no-compete allows the big organizations to harass. Everyone in this industry is forced to sign these no-competes. They say that "we will not hire you unless you sign it". And it is true. Every employee is forced to sign these, when it may only be designed for someone like myself that may actually have a creative and competitive impact, which should only help everyone! Keep in place confidentiality agreements. End no-competes in every way possible. If the huge organization wants to keep you, and they actually value you, then they must pay to keep you!"
Katie	"Whole heartedly support. Today employers can terminate you with a reorg and still hold the non-compete, rendering you completely unable to work."
Jon	"I've worked with a group of physicians at a large health system in the Kansas City metropolitan area for 15 year. The standard non-compete for this physician group made it so that no physicians could practice within a 200 mile radius for 2 years after employment. Physicians that wanted to practice medicine in underserved and rural communities were not allowed to do so unless they wanted to uproot their lives and move themselves and their families out of state. Non-compete agreements like this are contributing to nation wide shortages of healthcare providers and it is literally making us sick."

Gareth	"I strongly support this rule change. Non compete agreements are not an agreement, they are arm twisting by corporations that do not want a free market. They are inherently non-capitalistic."
Kara	"I am in full agreement for removing non-competes. As a healthcare provider , this significantly impairs us from finding a new job within a reasonable distance of our homes if we wanted to change. Or if a company you work for loses their contract with a facility (renewable yearly or every other year), then you cannot apply to work for the new company that won the new contract at the same facility if you wished to stay there. There are many reasons why non-competes are unfair to healthcare providers and create monopolies in communities."
Corinne	"Yes! Brilliant!"
Robbie	"Non-compete clause restricts physicians and access to care. It is detrimental to the healthcare of underserved patients in rural and suburban areas. It is difficult for physicians who have to move to find a new job instead of looking for another employer closer to home. Other employers do not require it, why do hospitals require this? The US already has a shortage of physicians and this makes it worse. Hospitals should not worry about patients following the physician as they have contracts with insurance and patients insurance usually dictates where they go and they can attract better talented physicians by offering better benefits to physicians."
Keith	"The non compete clause allows hospitals who employ physicians to abuse the way physicians are treated and it allows hospitals to force physicians to accept major changes to the physician's contract at any time and without any notification or discussion. This causes significant stress to physicians and adversely affects the way physicians practice and the physician's emotional and physical health. Physicians are forced to see more patients without the necessary supporting staff. This adversely affects patient care. The non complete clause should be ended immediately"
Tim	"Morning, non-compete should be banned. I have done what I do for a living wage for 30 years. I decided at the company I worked for was not treating me right so I put my two weeks notice in and they then pushed me out the door that very week. Now with the non-compete I can not go to work for another company that provides the service nore go to work at any of there customers places of business for 18 months. This limits what a can do for a good living wage. It's not right. My name is Tim and I worked for American National Skyline .thanks for hearing my story. I hope the ban passes as I then can move on in my life and make better money to support my family of 4. Thanks"
Kent	"I have been on both sides of non competes at the EKEE levels. I do not feel they are fair and restrict American ingenuity. I hope you stop noncompetes."

Tonya	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Brian	"I emphatically believe that non-compete clauses should be completely banned, this would be good for US workers, our economy, and our country as a whole. Out of literally EVERYTHING that our entire government has been doing in the last many years, this announcement by the FTC' made me the most excited and glad. Non-compete clauses were originally envisioned to apply only to high-level corporate executives who knew trade secrets and future strategies, and could greatly damage a company by immediately signing up with a competitor. This is NOT what non-compete clauses are now. Now, non-compete clauses are simply a way for companies to gain immense and permanent leverage over their workforce. The single best way for a worker to improve their working conditions is often to change jobs, or to be able to threaten to so do. This is certainly what I have experienced in my career. Non-compete clauses often make this impossible. A common type of non-compete clause is that you cannot work in your profession within a 30 mile radius for one year, for example. This is the type of non-compete that my wife, a primary care physician, is subject to. If you are the main breadwinner and are supporting a family, who on earth can afford to stop working for an entire year?? (It's not like there is going to be another job exactly 31 miles away by the way). It is quite common for people who have a non-compete to need to relocate to another city away from their family for a year, in order to work. What if you have ailing parents or very young children, or both?? The point is that, although the non-compete might say one year or two years, it might as well say 30 years. There are many, many people who quite literally CANNOT LEAVE THEIR CURRENT JOBS, EVER. This is not even addressing the question of, what on earth is the justification for these non-competes to be allowed to exist and apply to so many workers in the first place? I am sure the business community is lobbying hard to keep them. I can certainly understand why; there is nothing better than having employees who are not allowed to stop working for you!! Do not listen to them. There is simply no reason why companies should be allowed to have that power over people, it is insane. Now, you might say, just don't sign a contract that has a non-compete clause. Well guess what. They all do. Industries where non-competes have proliferated, I am sure that every company uses them, so you can't avoid them. This is certainly true in medicine. When my family was relocating back to the city where my wife grew up, and my wife was looking for a job, EVERY SINGLE job she looked at had a non-compete clause. She interviewed at four or five major medical groups. Every contract had a non-compete. The job that she decided to accept, she negotiated hard to try and get them to adjust or remove the non-compete. They absolutely would not budge. Why would they? They know you can't do better at a competitor since everyone has non-competes in this field. After being there for two years, she has decided to leave this job, because of extremely poor working conditions and horrible management. I am sure that the bad working conditions were directly related to the fact that... YOU CANT LEAVE!!! Her employer actually said this explicitly at one point. She gave them notice she was leaving, and some time later it seemed like they were ignoring it. She reminded

	them that she was leaving on X date, and they said "Oh, we didn't think you were serious." They know it's so impossible to leave the job, they just figured she would decide not to. She did have the option to leave because I also work, but she is going to have to not work for a year. Besides being a senseless burden on our family, this is also a great loss for the city we live in. My wife is a primary care doctor, and the region where we live has a shortage of primary care doctors!! The whole situation makes me quite mad as you can tell. I am so glad the government may finally do something about this. Do NOT listen to the business community about how important the non-competes are. Critical company information can be covered by non-disclosure agreements. There is a whole field of law regarding intellectual property. There are plenty of ways to accomplish the legitimate goals of a business to protect its rights in an employment contract. This is not what these companies want. They want workers who are forced to keep working for them and cannot leave, permanently. It's very easy to see why, and why they will fight like crazy to retain the right to lock up their workers like this. Not being able to leave your job, unless you want to move to another city away from your family, I mean this is just un-American. I low did we even get to this point? Please do the right thing and BAN NONCOMPETES!!!"
M.	"Besides the mistreatment of workers that noncompete clauses enable they are at their core anti-competitive. hi today's market the shortage of labor of almost any skill level is a major concern. This method of restricting labor mobility can be and is used to 'stick - it' to the competitors. Company 'A' can go on a hiring spree, provide terrible working conditions that creating low morale and productivity that can be used as an excuse for lay-offs (or quitting) and remove a skilled worker from the market. Offered as an example are the huge layoffs in the tech sector blamed on Covid "over" hiring. What are the chances that that many CEO's were that heavily short sighted about their future labor needs? Just maybe sonic were worried about the competition getting a step ahead. Cheal insurance."
Quentin	"Get rid of non-compete agreements"
Wade	"As a manger in the tech industry for 2 years, I support banning non-compete clauses by employers. It leads to suppressed wages and a lack of competitiveness in the US workforce."
Scott	"To determine the legitimacy of non-competes, we must understand their purpose and fitness for application in a free market society under US law. A non- compete, by definition is just that; a barrier to competition or entry. Referencing the law.comell.edu. the Sherman Antitrust Act... "Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 is a federal statute which prohibits activities that restrict interstate commerce and competition in the marketplace. It outlaws any contract, conspiracy, or combination of business interests in restraint of foreign or interstate trade." So... Right from the

	start, a non-compete clause is a violation of the law vis-a-vis the Sherman Antitrust act. But... There are always exceptions where there is sufficient argument to the contrary supporting public interest or individual rights. To that we need to ask... Why the non-compete clause is included in contracts? The argument in favor almost always consists of protecting trade secrets and customer lists. But... In most contracts with a non-compete clause/agreement, there also exists non-solicitation and non-disclosure agreements. With these present, the purpose of a non-compete seems to not exist except to restrain competition or create a barrier to entry vis-a-vis 'trapping' a worker, forcing them to change profession/business, or forcing them to relocate. It is often argued that irreparable harm will be caused by the worker continuing, were that the case, the restraining business would be in a position to offer compensation in exchange for the worker being denied their right to seek gainful employment; surely some sum of money is worth avoiding 'irreparable harm'. Any non-compete clause owing to irreparable harm, ought require the restraining business to compensate the restrained worker. If we are to consider non-compete clauses as legitimate in contracts, they must prove their value supporting public good or individual rights; not exclusively for the benefit of the restraining business. Without that proof, non-compete clauses are nothing more than a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act for the benefit of the restraining business to the detriment of public interest."
Robin	"Physicians should NOT BE EXCLUDED from this new policy!! It might be better for the hospitals and administration, but it is NOT better for patient care. Please do not tie our hands on this."
Julio	"Physicians should not be excluded for the non complete. Please reconsider."
Clinton	"I support the complete ban of non-complete clauses related to employment. It would be best if the ban were as broad and complete as possible, as this would be simpler to understand and enforce, for both workers and firms. The evidence shows there's no net benefit, even in situations where one would expect there to be benefits. So, I see no good reason to retain the practice in any context. As a tech worker working outside of California, I was personally impacted by a non-compete. In retrospect, my reduced mobility reduced my lifetime earnings substantially."
A	"Agree with removing non-compete clause for doctors. Why should we be limited when it comes to helping our patients?"
K	"I support the ban of Non-Compete Clauses. These clauses prevent skilled workers from leaving bad employers (low wages, limited benefits, poor working conditions). Employers are generally capable of providing sufficient pay/benefits/conditions that would encourage employees to stay. If they cannot, then employees should have a right to leave without restriction. In my experience, employers that are opposed to the non-compete ban are the employers that do NOT treat workers fairly, and that use the non-compete against them. I see this often in the home service industry, specifically with smaller trades like pest control or carpet cleaning In these industries, the clients are generally loyal to the brand, not the technician. I understand that the employer may lose money by training these technicians, then having them leave to use their skills in another business, but I do not believe it causes a significant enough loss to warrant limiting someone's right to choose where they work."

M	"I am in full support of banning non-competes. As a physician, not only is it harmful for my personal career growth, fair wages, and autonomy, but it also can affect the patient/consumer by not allowing accessibility their preferred physician and continuity of care. The doctor-patient relationship is crucial to disease management and care compliance."
Anupam	"Removing the non-compete clause for healthcare providers (physicians) is paramount for improving healthcare access. How is it that there is no non-compete clause for hospital administrators, who can easily change jobs and share trade secrets from their prior position but physicians are bound by draconian laws requiring them to move out of town to change jobs? Removing non-compete clauses will create a competitive environment and would mandate that employers cater to retaining employees and improving their work conditions, and this will help customers i.e. patients . Capitalistic institutions like hospitals take unfair advantage of non-compete clauses to feed their bottom-line. It's time to end it to improve healthcare delivery to patients."
Scott	"I support the ban on non-compete clauses"
Joshy	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing as a physician to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses have long been used to restrict competition and give employers unfair leverage during contract negotiations, resulting in a number of negative impacts on the health care industry. I quit my job earlier this year at a "not-for-profit" health system and have been unable to work at my preferred practice due to noncompete limitations. This system refuses to let me out of my noncompete. My patients are not getting adequate access to medical care in an environment where there is a physician shortage. First, non-compete clauses often result in mandatory relocation of physician families, which is disruptive and costly for both the physician and the patient. This disruption can lead to a lack of continuity in care, as the patient must start over with a new physician and the physician must build a new rapport with a new patient base. This can also lead to a lack of patient access to specialty care, as physicians may be unable to practice in certain locations due to non-compete clauses. Second, non-compete clauses can also limit competition and drive up costs, as physicians may be unable to practice in certain locations due to non-compete clauses. This limits the ability of physicians to compete on price and quality, which in turn can lead to higher costs for patients and a lack of access to care, especially in rural areas. Finally, non-compete clauses can also limit the ability of physicians to practice in the areas where they are most needed. This can lead to a shortage of physicians in areas with the greatest need, resulting in an unequal distribution of medical services. For all these reasons, I strongly support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. This move would be a significant step forward in promoting healthy competition, protecting patients from unfair practices, and ensuring access to quality care for all."

Karen	"Consideration of individual employee interests above that of companies and corporations is long overdue."
PETER	"I SUPPORT YOUR PROPOSED BAN OF NON-COMPETE CLAUSES IN CONTRACTS. I AM A PHYSICIAN AND HAVE BEEN EMPLOYED BY BOTH PRIVATE AND CORPORATE ENTITIES. THE NON-COMPETE CLAUSE HAS BEEN A POINT OF CONTENTION IN EVERY CONTRACT I HAVE ENTERED. PLEASE GET THIS REGULATION THROUGH SO MY CURRENT NON-COMPETE WILL BE VOIDED AND OTHER PEOPLE ENTERING INTO CONTRACTS WILL NOT HAVE TO DEAL WITH THIS UNFAIR PRACTICE. THANK YOU"
James	"Sample comment: I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Faith	"I am against having a non complete clause when regarding employment."
Whitney	"Noncompete clauses absolutely suppress wages and limit the ability of workers to earn a living should they ever want to change employers. This is no different for physicians ; in fact it is often more important given the student loan burden and often have multiple relocations throughout their training already. I am firmly in support of abolishing noncompetes, and it is important that this apply to physicians as well."
Lauren	"As a physician , I am very anti non compete clauses. They are anti- American in my opinion. We should allow the free market to have competition between employers help employees find their best job. Happy employees make happier companies. I'm a physician and this rule makes it really hard for physicians to switch jobs without hugely uprooting but also other Healthcare organizations have a harder time filling vacancies. Please ban the non compete. Let's let the market push companies to improve their positions and let employees find the best job they can thrive in. There are a multitude of reasons why someone would not want to our could not move (significant other's job, elder care responsibilities, local resources for kids (medical, special needs, etc). Staying at a toxic job for the wrong reason benefits nobody. This also disproportionately affects lower income (don't have legal raises to figure out loopholes) and dual working households (and thereby women) as there is less flexibility with careers. The companies will adapt and will need to be more competitive and treat employees better to survive. Better working conditions and retention efforts will go farther to retain a happy, skilled, and productive workforce that non compete rulings. Not surviving because they have trapped people in their positions. Eliminating non compete clauses would also

	allow for more upward mobility and career progression. In some fields you sort of have to change jobs or at least have an offer to get promoted and climb the ladder. As a woman physician, i know so many women who are feel stuck in a job but are afraid to leave because they don't want to disrupt kids' or spouse's situations. But if they were able to get a new position without relocating, this would help them get promotions or new titles that they might be passed over as an internal candidate. Please please please! I know the argument exists about trade secrets, etc. There are other ways to minimize this (NDAs, among other things). Overall, again companies would adapt and I think less of these arbitrary roles would foster more creativity and progress than stifling mobility and decreasing job changes."
Daniel	"Please ban them. How can it be that the knowledge a worker possesses can cause such severe damages to the company and yet the worker's value in pay be less than the value of that knowledge? This implies that the value of the labor of the worker, what work they actually do with the knowledge, is nothing. The disparity between the damages companies claim from non-competes and the compensation they give their workers is the proof of wage suppression and abuse."
Cliff	"I am a registered voter and physician in Missouri. I strongly support this elimination/limitation of non-compete clauses to apply to pre-existing and present/future contracts. This should be applied broadly to a wide variety of sectors and types of workers, including physicians, nurses, and other healthcare workers like myself who are taken advantage of especially when employed by large multi-hospital associations that effectively limit competition across large cities."
Erica	"As a barber, non-compete clauses are harmful to my industry. I have only seen them enforced when an employer has felt personally "wronged" by the employee/ex-employee. It is used to intimidate and control employees rather than protect the business. It creates a wedge between the employer and employees. Barbers work very hard to establish relationships with our clients and it is unfair to treat clients as property of a business."
Ryan	"Non Compete conditions are overall unfair for the growth of your career preventing you from branching out to better opportunities within your field."
Charlie	"Physician here. Please ban noncompete clauses with hospitals. This hurts doctors and patients. In my region I've seen this play out over and over again at huge detriment to Physicians and patients. I practice in a rural underserved area, but noncompete still exist, and it causes physicians to have to leave the area and leave patients with even worse access to care. Occasionally a physician will decide to stay in the area for family and his patients in the hospitals will make them pay an incredible price in retaliation and will not tell patients where the physician is opening up their practice if it is in the region. These noncompete only benefit one entity, and that's the hospital. They are so incredibly harmful to physicians and patients. This needs addressed years and years ago. I'm glad that @FTC is finally looking at it and hope that we can do away with these noncompete clauses and improve working conditions for physicians and help patients with continuity of care and access of care."

Eric	"Physicians should be included in the new rule that bans non-competes. It banns patients when physicians aren't allowed to practice medicine because some hospital system is afraid of losing a couple of patients. Include ALL workers, or include none."
Federico	"This is a wonderful regulation and i am completely in favor of enacting it. As a tech worker I've seen several colleagues damaged by these clauses -- signed when they were fresh out of college and didn't know any better -- and forced to move into different industries since they were unable to advance in theirs due to the non-compete. Since I've always worked for California companies I've never had to even think about these agreements and nor should anyone else. Excellent work and please push forward with the enactment of this regulation."
ken	"This is in regards to the noncompete clause, particularly as it relates to physicians . A noncompete clause, especially after one has been in practice for several years, is completely unfair to the practicing physician as well as to patients. This clause creates excessive unilateral power to the organization that is imposing the noncompete clause. Trying to reverse such a clause as an individual is very difficult if not impossible. A physician who has been in practice for any duration has established a treatment bond with his or her patient. To tell that physician to go somewhere else and start over is completely unfair to both the physician and the patients being cared for by that physician. Why has such a unilateral control system been allowed to be perpetuated for so long? It takes a significant amount of time and usually several years for a physician to become established in a community. Having a reputation as a highly qualified physician who gives excellent care and sought out by patients does not develop overnight. I am a casualty of the noncompete clause with a hospital system. In what was my 18th year of practice, our group joined a hospital system in our community. So by the time we had joined the hospital system, I was already well established in the community. Ten years later, the hospital made a unilateral decision to end my employment not based on any patient care issues. I had a reputation as an excellent quality and caring physician with my patients as well as in the surrounding communities. If not for the noncompete clause, I would be still practicing in this community and seeing my patients with whom I had established a long term bond of caring. I have had several job offers both within as well as outside the noncompete zone. To take a job outside the noncompete zone would be like starting over again. I have received several high paying job offers outside the noncompete zone, but simply being well paid and not being able to continue seeing my patients seems pointless to me. The noncompete clause is completely unfair to physicians as well as to patients. I wholeheartedly support any FTC decision to end the noncompete clause."
Mark	"Please ban all non-competes. I support this proposed rule. Non-competes give power to business entities to control their employees, and do not let the employee make the best decision for themselves."
Clarice	"I support the ban on non-compete clauses. I had to sign a non-compete agreement as an entry-level employee many years ago. Two years later the company I was working for downsized but the non-compete agreement remained in force. After months of looking for work, I was fortunate to find an employer who was willing to pay my expenses to work 200 miles away from my former employer's

	offices, but I still had to travel over 100 miles to that location every week until the term of the non-compete contract expired. This created quite a hardship. For eight months I was required to drive to that remote location every Monday, live in a hotel away from my family for 5 days, and then drive over 100 miles home every Friday. It was a big strain on my marriage but it was my only option unless I wanted to get a much lower-paying job locally. My understanding is that non-compete agreements were originally required only of C-suite employees who are compensated at a much higher rate than entry-level and other staff employees. In addition to that higher level of compensation, they are usually offered generous severance benefits which ease the financial strain of them being limited options for continued employment. Lower-level staff and entry-level employees are not often offered severance sufficient to cover them while seeking new employment if they are offered any severance at all."
Shanna	"Physicians should not be excluded from the proposal to eliminate the non-compete clause rule. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. To be clear, there are nuances to this discussion and a blanket endorsement of the FTC' proposal. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as

	nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Tara	"I ask the commission to enact this proposed regulation and put an end to the abusive and coercive use of noncompete clauses to control employees and limit fair competition. The current practice, if allowed to continue, harms the economy overall while unduly punishing former employees by preventing them from seeking gainful employment."
Felix	"This rule is so important for the well-being of our healthcare professionals. Doctor's should NOT be exempt from this excellent rule. For profit healthcare systems use and abuse non-compete clauses to underpay and exploit physicians after they are trapped in their system."
Miles	"Non competes should be ILLEGAL. It is beyond unfair to have a subject matter expert accept employment and be bound to the employer, typically even if the employer changes owner ship and or management."
ANNIE	"My husband had to sign a non-compete in his field otherwise he would be fired. He had to sign this after working for the company 15+ years. There was no employee choice in the matter. This has become a detriment to our entire family as we are unable to move closer to our elderly parents as their health deteriorates since he cannot compete in the field where he has 30+ yrs of experience. This creates monopolies as well and keeps the employee a prisoner. After completing 3 year non-compete, my husband's age will become a detriment to finding employment as well. We feel all non-competes contracts should be completely banned in the US."

Ellie	"I am Highly in favor of banning non-compete contracts. I have signed one without fully understanding the scope of it's hold on my professional development and this non-compete, whether enforceable or not, has me extremely apprehensive of seeking other job opportunities that would increase my income."
J	"Non competes should be a thing of the past. People should have the right to work where they want to without control from companies. For people with families, these non competes are especially onerous because it is hard to move jobs to another city when you are settled with children. It basically creates an environment where companies are able to exploit employees who are unable to move. Or even if employees do leave, it greatly restricts where they can work which is unfair, if not unmoral."
Molly	"I do not believe physicians should be excluded with the new regulations regarding non competes. Physicians have now become employees of the health care system. If they are excluded this will dramatically impact their ability to advocate on behalf of their patients. In addition, patients who have strong relationships with their doctors won't be able to follow up with them."
Sridhar	"I am an employed cardiologist currently working with a large corporation in the state of Missouri. I relocated to this area less than a year ago and have purchased a home to live in. All such moves and relationships are made in good faith however, the facts on the ground can turn out to be different from the facts promised during the hiring interviews. The local politics, which play a significant role in the provision of medical care in any area also plays a role in the way things play out over 1-2 years. My restrictive covenant (non compete clause) would force me to move out of state making it impossible to seek suitable and sustainable employment in the local market which will both affect me emotionally, financially as well as rend asunder the free choice my patients should have to seek their own directed medical care and force them to abandon relationships which are built during the provision of care. The American Hospital Association does NOT speak for me or my cardiology colleagues in stating that their letter addressed to the FTC is on behalf of the majority of cardiologists. The non compete clause also runs contrary to the American ideal of an individual being able to work for a living without having to move cities or states to find new employment. It also significantly supports larger corporations with large bankrolls to support bloated administrative staffing needs and ostentatious executive salaries at the expense of physician and patient care and relations. Some members have suggested a limited distance non compete which is a reasonable option however this (if considered and allowed) should be a definite short mileage range from the primary location of employment only. In addition, there should be no clause for economic damaged to the organization which would ensure that physicians are treated fairly and reasonably by the employing organization. Physicians enter into such employment contracts with the best of intentions and non complete clauses make the contract negotiations unfair and significantly affect the ability for negotiation of a fair contract after having spent over a decade in training and education to better the American populace. In short, all individuals should have the ability to work without the fear of having to lose their local family, friends and relations based on the whims of a larger organization which has its own economic health as its only focus."

Tom	"I am a physician . Every physician I know is Forced to sign a noncompete clause in order to be hired. This significantly limits competition in the marketplace and ability to move to a better opportunity. It also is well known by the employer there for many of our request for improvements are denied, they know that we have very little option to change jobs. When I heard about this movement by the federal trade commission, my first reaction was this is the best thing that can happen to encourage competition and improve workplace environment, treatment by employers. I strongly encourage the government to move forward with eliminating all noncompete clauses."
William	"Two years ago my wife and I moved to a Kansas City to allow her to start a residency in Emergency Medicine. I had to leave my job as a university professor and seek work in the private sector. My current job has a non-compete written with such broad language that it would prevent me from working for another company doing data analysis or analytics work which is my primary skill set. Additionally, it includes no geographic limitations, includes a two year wait period before beginning new work, and is written in such a way that it could be interpreted to prevent me to return to teaching. Whether such a broadly written non-compete is enforceable is immaterial. It is clearly intended to intimidate and nap employees in their current job. When beginning the job I asked to sign a non-disclosure agreement instead but was told that any job offer was contingent upon the noncompete agreement. During my tenure at the job I was asked to interview by a client company but had to turn it down on the basis of the noncompete. Noncompete agreements are blunt instruments that are wielded coercively by those who have the most leverage in employment - namely the employer. There are other mechanisms that would address many of the concerns of employers such as nondisclosure agreements. My case demonstrates that employers reach for the broadest possible protections at the expense of their current and future employees. I strongly support the FTC's proposed rule and hope to see it enacted in the future."
Joshua	"I am strongly for banning non-compete agreements within employment contracts. When an employer can offer employment with a condition of "you may not work for another company in your field" after termination of employment, it effectively prevents an employee from leaving the employer even if another employer offers significantly more competitive benefits. This has the effect of allowing employers to provide less competitive benefits over time, depressing wages and other benefits of the employees. If employers are allowed to include non-compete agreements in their employment contracts when they are not allowed to enforce them, then the presence of the non-compete clause will continue to have a chilling effect on employees to the same effect as if they were allowed to enforce the non-compete."
ANDREW	"I am in complete agreement with this preposed rule. Non compete clauses harm employees and only benefit big business. This will allow for greater innovation witch helps the economy. That is why non compel clauses should be banned."
Salvatore	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, My name is Salvatore... I am a physical therapist in Missouri. I currently work at an outpatient clinic. Some of the best therapists I have worked with have been hamstrung in starting their businesses or advancing. People who would be perfect for directorial or leadership positions have refused

	due to non competes. because of these non competes employees are unhappy while being retained by these corporations. It kills freedom, advancement and encourages burnout. I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements.:
Pawan	"I have always believed that a covenant not to compete in some industries is unconstitutional and simply unamerican. I work in medical field and the reality is that most patients already face access issues to obtain healthcare. A non compete clause further reduces access and can hinder a citizens right to life and liberty. Many states already have abolished these clauses to be part of contracts. It's about time that all states are required to comply with a push from federal authorities."
Krista	"I am an outpatient Internal Medicine physician (ie. PCP) in a large health care group practice in St. Louis, Missouri. I signed a non compete 3.5 years ago, when I joined my group as I had no other option. Every physician job I applied for had a non compete. Every physician job that any of my physician friends applied to also had also had non competes. I hired a lawyer before I signed my contract, however my organization was unwilling to budge on the 1 year 15 mile radius and additional 6 months of notice you were required to give your employer before you left (ie a total of 18 months to get out of a job and move onto next one). Now, I have decided to quit my job due to untenable workplace conditions (poorly trained staff, toxic office manager, 50% reduction in pay with quadrupling of work load..1 could go on) What I learned about having a non compete during my 3.5 years of employment, is that when you do not have the ability to say 'I quit' you have absolutely no negotiating power. A Nurse Practitioner in my office had similar complaints about working with incompetent support staff however she does not have a non compete. As a result, the NP was able to rid herself of the incompetent staff and that staff member was then put to work with me. Another example: my organization promised to pay my maternity leave; however they did not. When I questioned this, I was nearly laughed out of the conversation by my administrator and told 'well you won't be able to quit!' and they quickly rattled off the 1.5 years of pay I would loose if I did. They knew that the money I would loose by not being able to work for a year and also during the additional 6 months notice period, meant it would be nearly impossible to leave my job. Medical knowledge is no trade secret. It can be taught in any medical school around the world. My patients do not so much get to choose to see me as their insurance decides if they can see me (ie. if I left for another med group, they could only follow me if their insurance allowed it). Yet, because of my non compete I am not able to work in ANY capacity as a doctor (that includes ill free clinics and government run clinics like those at the VA) that have no overlap with my private patient panels. Interestingly, the health care administrators who are my 'bosses' interestingly DO know company secrets. Their skills are not codified in a licensing body but things they learn on the job. In contrast to my experience, several health care administrators (including the one

	that explained to me I could not leave), have left my organization. They have left with 2 weeks notice and have taken better jobs at neighboring local St. Louis health care organizations for higher pay. Who suffers from the non compete? The ripple effects are endless. Of course, the physician and their family, who are often forced to move out of state or endure an unnecessary commute. However, our communities suffer even more greatly. My dear patients who will not be able to see me for a year, they suffer. The city of St. Louis, scarce of doctors, now loses a doctor to a different city or, as in my case, to the four walls of my house. I am only a generalist, a PCP, however due to non competes in the last year St. Louis City as lost at least two long established neurosurgeons and three shoulder specialists (that I know of) to different cities far away. This is a great loss for the St. Louis region. Any organization that uses non competes will try to convince you that they arc the only way to keep their work force viable. I However, keeping an able bothed work force in legal shackles, versus creating a fair work place, simply unamerican."
Maitri	"Banning non-competes would create better working environments for all employees and allow healthy competition in the work force and more incentive to create positive working environments which would only help strengthen gaps in the workforce. There was a mass exodus of healthcare workers as a result of the poor working conditions created by the Covid 19 pandemic when many hospital systems were generating their highest profits. Banning non competes would incentivize healthcare workers to return to the field and fill in an ever enlarging gap in healthcare in the US. Additionally, many of the highest profiting hospital systems are "non-profit" in name alone. Excluding them from the ban would only hurt independent practices that are struggling to stay afloat. If an exception is created, it should be for independent practices that already struggle competing with large healthcare systems. There is a massive healthcare crisis in this country and excluding physicians and non profit organizations from the ban on noncompetes will only exacerbate it, creating an even more strained healthcare system when you and your loved ones need care. Please vote to ban non-competes among all large employers and all professions whether they are non profit or not."
Maitri	"Non-compete clauses have become increasingly common in various industries, including healthcare. However, when it comes to physicians, non-compete clauses arc not only unnecessary, but also detrimental to patient care, exacerbate existing physician shortages, and grant unfair leverage to employers while stifling market forces that could bring about positive change. Therefore, non-compete clauses should be banned for physicians, including not-for-profit health systems. Firstly, non-compete clauses for physicians hinder patients' access to care. Healthcare is a unique field where patients' health and well-being arc of paramount importance. Patients should have the freedom to choose their healthcare provider based on their preferences, needs, and convenience. Non- compete clauses limit this choice by restricting physicians' ability to practice in certain geographic areas, which can lead to reduced access to care for patients, especially those in underserved or rural areas. In times of physician shortages, non-compete clauses can further limit the availability of physicians, making it difficult for patients to find appropriate care, resulting in delays or gaps in treatment. This is particularly concerning in situations where continuity of care is crucial, such as chronic disease management or ongoing medical treatments. Secondly, non-compete clauses contribute to the exacerbation of existing physician shortages. The United States is facing a

	significant shortage of physicians in many regions, with rural and underserved areas being particularly affected. Non-compete clauses can exacerbate this problem by limiting physicians' mobility and their ability to practice in areas where their services are needed the most. For example, if a physician is bound by a non-compete clause that prevents them from practicing in a nearby rural area, it can result in a lack of healthcare services for the local population, further widening the gap in access to care. This can have serious implications for patients who may have to travel long distances or face delays in receiving timely medical care. Thirdly, non-compete clauses grant leverage to employers and hinder market forces that could drive positive change in the healthcare industry. Non-compete clauses are often used by employers to restrict physicians' ability to negotiate better working conditions, higher compensation, or improved patient care practices. These clauses can effectively limit physicians' bargaining power and negotiation abilities, allowing employers to evade market forces that would otherwise necessitate positive changes in the healthcare industry. As a result, physicians may feel trapped in unfavorable working conditions, leading to burnout, decreased job satisfaction, and ultimately compromising patient care. Lastly, non-compete clauses should not exclude not-for-profit health systems. Non-profit health systems, like their (Or-profit counterparts, often use non-compete clauses in physician employment contracts, despite their mission to provide accessible healthcare to their communities. Exempting not-for-profit health systems from a ban on non-compete clauses would create an unfair advantage for these institutions, allowing them to restrict physicians' mobility and limit competition, which could adversely affect patients' access to care and exacerbate existing physician shortages."
Tina	"Please allow physicians to choose the best fit for them. Do not let non-compete clauses determine this. Physician burn out and physician exodus is real. Please allow us to pick where we want to work so that we are treated better by the hospital systems. It's time to make changes."
Tina	"I support this!"
Diane	"Physicians are employees and should ABSOLUTELY be included in noncompete clause reform. Why would you exclude such a hard working group of individuals?"
Charles	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. Eliminating the noncompete clauses will help improve healthcare access for patients as hospitals and corporations can no longer restrict where physicians can work. I urge the FTC to reject the MIA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, Charles Shipley, DO"

Justin	"Non-competes are anti-competitive. Ban their use by employers."
Liza	"I am a physician and facing a 15 mile non compete in my contract. Putting finances aside, if I am unhappy at my job for any reason I will be effectively trapped and unable to find a new job without moving my family. I work in academics and the only other academic institution is within the non complete. Beyond this, the next job opportunity for my specialty is 5 hours away."
Daniel	"The killing on non compete agreements is a good thing. There are many options to ensure you employees don't jump to your customers and clients. This is very logical and I support this. Those staff that jump to another job usually leave due to the boss. So fix bad bosses to solve the issue and not with non competes."
Guramrit	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban nonconnpete agreements. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements I have personally been impacted by this from my employer which had big mental set back for me and also was a hindrance when I was seeking new opportunities. I eventually had to find a job in a separate industry but would have loved to stayed in the same industry but the non compete document was a prevented me to do so. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements...Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Seth	"I am currently spending the next three years on a paid non-compete, non-solicited, non-communication contract, and unable to work in the industry I've already worked in for almost 30 years. By contract, I legally could end up in court with my employer by even making comment to the FTC. I suspect many under similar agreements readily available on-line and used by corporate lawyers similar to my past employers legal counsel will not comment due to fear of legal action. I applaud the FTC for desiring to ban all non-competes and look forward to earning a much higher income and contributing to the US economy."
Zachary	"This should cover all types of employers. It should not exclude nonprofit organizations. If it were to specify the type of employer, many unfair exceptions will happen. Specifically, in the healthcare industry, if nonprofit organizations are exempt from this ruling, it will exclude the majority of physicians since many health systems operate as nonprofits. And physicians are arguably the most hurt by these noncompete agreements."

"The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. Julie	"As a pediatric radiologist I support legislation to ban non-competes from contracts, including contracts with non-profit hospitals. After 10 years of post graduate training (4 years Medical school and 6 years of residency/fellowship) I am a highly sub-specialized physician practicing in the midst of a national physician shortage in my field. Because of the nature of my work, the majority of children's diagnostic imaging is performed at children's hospitals. Every single contract I have reviewed contains non-competes. The strictest I was asked to sign was 2 YEARS, 25 miles range from ANY facility within the group that performed pediatric radiology. This was in a small city where that type of contract effectively prohibits a radiologist from finding a single job in their specialty within the entire city/county metro area. I would have had to move to a completely new city to find a job in my field. I have family, children in school. How could a job ask a physician to sign something so onerous and have legal ground to do so? Additionally this type of practice significantly hurts physicians from receiving fair market compensation for their skills because it keeps employees fearful of seeking employment elsewhere even when they are being underpaid. In radiology I interpret imaging studies. I do no self promotion, I cannot bring in new business or clients for my employer. I interpret the exams performed at the hospital during the hours of my shifts. If I leave my job I have ZERO ability to take patient information to a new position. I have ZERO ability to harm my old employer by taking away their business. I don't have ownership stake in the equipment so I certainly can't take that. The only person noncompetes hurt is me- they restrict my ability to practice a skill I spent 10 years acquiring and let predatory employers keep their physicians scared. The hurt the children of my city who need high quality diagnostic imaging because there are so few people who have my job that when they are all under non-competes they cannot move to the hospitals that need them the most."
Hisham	"Yes time for this unfair clause to go away. The best way to regulate a free market is to free it!"
Brandon	"I agree that non-competes stifle wages. Indeed, this has been their function. To exclude medical practitioners and other higher income earners from non-competes essentially sends the message that they do not have the same rights as those from other fields. They already cannot bargain with their patients or even set their own prices for their services. Please rid us of this indignity."

Jacob	"As a physician , I fully support this rule. Non-competes are used too often by large hospitals and corporations to unfairly restrict our practices and fix salaries. This will help bring parity and fair practices to a large portion of the labor market."
Steven	"I am a chiropractic physician associate that has witnessed firsthand on three occasions the crippling effect of non-complete contract limitations (e.g. excessive mileage radius requirements up to 30 miles, legal fees, direct response from employers stating "their intent is to lock me out of the region, etc.). Geographically, each change in employment would require relocation which adds to the cost and starting a business would fall short due to the post employment waiting period. My current employer misrepresented the office as a stable environment in which the staffing was not a revolving door and my patient flow would allow be to treat throughout the care cycle for continuity. Upon signing the contract, the owner changed the treating model adopting a market management approach outside what chiropractic physicians are trained, ongoing employee turnover to included other physicians, no continuity of care, a hostile work environment to include sexual misconduct and discrimination. I have considered leaving but the current non-compete would require a 10 mile radius and/or a two year waiting period to open or practice in the area. In short, I have to choose between accepting the conditions or completely relocated since the closest major city is 140 miles away; closest town over 10,000 is 38 miles away. My situation is a prime example where the failure of a business owner directly impacts my income, lifestyle, family stability, business ownership, and advancement within my profession. It is my hope, the federal trade commission opens the door to a free market through mandating the elimination and release from non-compete clauses."
Trevor	"I am I full support of this potential rule. Non-competes are structured with an assumption that the company hires an individual, provides training, education and invests in the employee. Therefore, the company should have protection if the employee were to leave, ensuring the employee is unable to use the knowledge gained to compete against them. In reality, employers often hire employees with a vast amount of existing knowledge, using their knowledge to better the business for profit. There is not a regulation requiring the company to share the profits made from ideas or knowledge of the employee. Non- competes are a one sided protection benefiting only the company. Especially when it pertains to specialized fields, non-competes can limit the pool of employee candidates in certain areas of expertise. We are already living in a world of limited staff-mg and supply chain. Healthcare is also experience staffing shortages. A non-compete will inhibit a person's ability to leave a company where they were not being treated well and force them to seek a different line of employment if they were to leave. A non-compete provides all of the advantages to the employer while forcing an employee to decide remain in servitude or refrain from seeking a different opportunity in which they are seasoned. Non-competes should not be legal unless it is accompanied with reimbursement equivalent to the amount of time paid to the employee, if they were forced to seek employment elsewhere. There is also little to no protection for the employee if they were involved in an involuntary termination or layoff. Again, it is a one sided protection, only giving benefit to the company, not the individual employee."

Thomas	"As an American living and working in Singapore I completely support this and will vote for politicians that are in favor of giving the employee a fair equal playing field when it comes to employment."
Erika	"As a freelance designer , coming out of college, it has been difficult and mentally draining applying to 100s of jobs that the only jobs I can get are through freelancing. I freelance in graphic design, UX/UI, and product design. One of my clients, a startup, is asking me to sign a non-compete agreement. While I would love to work with the startup, the non-compete agreement they propose would put me out of business with my other freelance clients. Non- compete agreements would block me from seeking new opportunities/work. I'd have to potentially claim unemployment in the future because my client range would be limited. Please ban non-compete agreements!"
Iris	"Indentured Servitude was supposed to be abolished in 1917, yet here we are. This is nothing less than LEGALIZED INDENTURED SERVITUDE. As long as this exists we are a country of slaves. This has no place in a country which dares to call itself a Democracy."
Manuel	"I fully support this new rule. Non compete clauses are often leveraged by large businesses and welled aggressively against individuals without the resources to defend themselves in court even if they are innocent of violating the agreement. The entire concept is anti-capitalist and harms our competitive marketplace economy. It is in the interest of both the US economy and national security to pass this rule."
Carter	"I believe this bill would be a great step forward for our beautiful country. While I personally would not be directly affected, I know that many Americans have suffered due to non competes, and I family hold that they keep everyone back. Citizens deserve competition just like the corporations and organizations they work for, and workers ought to have the freedom to choose wherever they work so that they can better themselves and the lives of their families and friends. They deserve a larger chance at achieving the American dream that we all strive for. Passing this would be one of the greatest steps taken toward the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness for the American worker in years."
Chakradhar	"I am a physician and I wholeheartedly agree with banning non compete clauses for physicians. No other job has these draconian measures enacted by hospital administrators. Removing non compete clauses make it easier for patients to see the doctor they like/trust and makes it a level playing field."
Wyatt	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Exempting physicians from prohibiting a noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations. It could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. This, in turn, hurts patient care."

Wyatt	"I strongly urge the FTC to pass FTC rule DOCKET: FTC-2023-0007, this would mean the world to me. As a Physician almost any contract I will take currently has a non-compete. It puts us in the position where to change jobs my family has to move, my children have to change schools or I have to commute up to an hour each way for up to two years. Non-compete clauses trap workers, hurt families, and hurt the economy."
Murali	"To whom it may concern: It is high time that these ridiculous and ANTICOMPETITIVE non-compete clauses be done away with. They only serve the interests of monopolies, while harming workers, consumers and communities. Especially huge suffering for patient communities in rural and underserved areas if you don't practice the way your employer wants to benefit their pocket rather than helping poor patients. Please stand firm in implementing these necessary new rules. Thank you."
R	"Please abolish non-competes! These can be crippling to physicians , forcing them to stay in a sometimes toxic (or even unsafe) work environment just for their family's stability. Non-competes force physicians to often leave their communities, depriving patients of a doctor they have a relationship with, and in underserved communities it can truly have a negative impact to be down even one physician. Many physicians have families, and non-competes often force physicians to stay in jobs that affect the welfare of their family, or uproot their family entirely in search of a less toxic work environment."
Michael	"My background is in restaurant management and pest control , and in both industries non-competition agreements abound. There are a few key points that I think should be considered as part of this proposed rule: 1- Non-competes inhibit upward mobility within an industry. In many instances employees have to make a change in order to "move up" within an industries. We see this evident when we look at almost any high level executive within firms. These individuals have made strategic moves throughout their careers to place themselves at the top of their industries. This should not be limited, as it encourages individual growth. 2- One of the main arguments against this rule is that non-competes protect employer investments. This is simply thinking only on short term gains, rather than longevity. As employees make lateral moves, WITHIN an industry, their level of expertise increases. As their level of expertise increases, their ability to make quality contributions to the industry also increases. Therefore, non-competes promote stagnation, not advancement. This is bad for everyone within an industry. 3- The heart of this country is life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This is the land of opportunity. The land where it doesn't matter what hand you are dealt, you can still pull yourself up by your bootstraps. Non-competes limit one's ability to do this, as per the previous arguments listed. Finally, we often discuss minimum wage and how we should allow the market to regulate itself. Non-competition agreements, at their core, limit the market's ability to do this by artificially moving the balance between supply and demand. For the reasons stated above, non-competes end up being a burden on our economy and free market."
Teresa	"Employees should have the right to leave a job where they are not paid a competitive wage and enter employment with another company involving the same work where they weren't happy or surviving without fear of retaliation by their former employer i.e. fear of being sued."

Donovan	"Non compete clauses applied to human labor is unamerican and unconstitutional. Removal of non competes needs to also apply to physicians and hospitals too. No exceptions."
Mark	"I am an Asset Manager that does not have any proprietary knowledge or trade secrets. I analyze financial data and ensure Federal IRS compliance of properties in the affordable housing industry. My company forced me to sign a non-compete after I was hired. I am now handcuffed to this company and unable to get raises or fair wages from my company; while multiple other companies are looking for my skill set and willing to pay substantially more. I should be able to take care of my family when I present no financial hams at all to my company. Please ban non-competes to allow employees to be compensated fairly for the work they do."
Jared	"Please complete the necessary action to ban all present and past non competes. This would greatly expand innovation and motivation for the current workforce. Non competes discourage cutting edge development due to companies stealing ideas of the workers. They also keep companies from appreciating talent buy compensating those that are striving. This culture creates more of a slave labor trapped environment ". Who would strive for no piece of the pie? It keeps leaders from starting new business and driving American competition. It also lets companies rig price fixing If companies take care of their employees, they have nothing to won}, about."
Susan	"Non-complete clauses in my husband's employment contracts have cost my family tens of thousands of dollars over the years. For us, a middle-class income family, banning non-compete clauses would offer opportunities for my husband to advance his career without these major financial roadblocks. It would also save the government on unemployment benefits during the time workers are not allowed to work in their own field. Imagine that, wanting to work, being great at your job, being wanted by another employer, but being forbidden to change jobs. It's the opposite of the American dream. Thank you for your time."
Clayton	"Like myself, many Emergency Physicians are independent contractors. Our contracts allow the hospital to have us removed from the schedule, without just cause. Non-compete clauses typically prevent us from working at another hospital within a ridiculously wide radius, and are written into both our arrangement with the hospital, as well as the company that hires us. If the company has all the hospital contracts within a large area, this can cause undue hardship, preventing us from finding work in our field! Please make non-compete clauses illegal."
Keisha	"I wholeheartedly agree with the FTC's proposed non-compete clause rule. I work as a physician here in the USA. I, like many of my colleagues, are passionate about caring for America's sickest citizens. What I have noticed, is that patients unfortunately are not receiving the best care, partly due to large medical corporations (i.e. hospital systems) taking advantage of its employees. As many physicians have become employed physicians, hospital administration and leadership have exponentially increased their own profits without improving the compensation and working conditions of it's "front- line workers." Burnout has been repeatedly discussed as one of the largest issues facing our ever-worsening physician shortage in this country. One significant way to reduce burnout is to allow the free-market to apply to healthcare institutions. Adoption of the proposed changes by the FTC would allow more competition between healthcare institutions to recruit and retain the most talented physicians to care for patients."

Keith	"I started in banking out of high school, I worked my way up in the company and had a limited skill set or education outside of banking I was forced to sign a non-compete for $500 or go home at 30 years old or go home. I had a young family so I had to promise my entire life to this company and be at the mercy of them. I sold my soul to the company store. (Terrible) practice and thank you for this rule"
Keith	"Yes, Yes, Yes!! Quit letting big business control the little guy! I signed a non-compete at 25 years old in the banking business. I am 43 years old and still bound by this agreement. If I want to stay in banking , I have to quit my job and either leave the industry or move 50 miles away. I have no experience but in banking and can't move due to family obligations. The company has full control of my entire life, working environment and wages. The amount of control should not be legal. All the big businesses are opposed and that is exactly why it should be banned. It is completely one sided. These are one sided contracts that only benefit the wealthy."
Bradley	"I support this initiative. I interviewed with a new potential employer and was not considered for employment because of an overreaching non-compete contract at my present employer. I am being held hostage at my current employer. I have a specialized skillset that I acquired before employment at my current place of work yet I am still being prevented from improving myself by finding a better paying job doing the same thing for another employer."
Jennifer	"I am a physician in southwest Missouri. Before signing my employment contract I had it reviewed by an attorney who explained the non-compete portion of the contract to me, but also informed me that it is standard practice for physician contracts in this area and they are non-negotiable. Ultimately we decided we wanted to stay in the area and I accepted the contract with the non-compete clause. Since beginning my employment 6 years ago my practice has grown exponentially and I have created a great reputation in the area. However, the hospital system I work for has changed various terms of my contract, reducing my pay rate, eliminating bonuses, etc. At this point I would like to pursue other opportunities but I know that due to non-compete terms of my contract my only option would be to uproot my family and move to a market outside the terms of my non-compete agreement. If the rule is passed, I believe I would have a much better opportunity to negotiate my true value to an employer."
Thomas	"Non Compete Clauses should go away."
Scott	"Non competes have run rampant in my industry. (Pest control) Non competes trap employees in their company. Employees like myself learn to love the industry and want to stay in it but are forced to either stay with their company no matter the working conditions or move out of state. Most folks in my industry can't afford to just pick up their lives and move out of state to stay in their field of expertise. These corporations are making money hand over first at the expense of their employees. Too often corporations are taking full advantage of their employees and a non

	compete takes the only power away from the employee, the power to leave and work elsewhere. It needs to be stopped! Give the power back to the working class!"
Imran	"I am a physician w/more than 20 years of practice. Although not subject, personally to a noncompete clause, I have had numerous colleagues whose ability to pursue their professional and personal desires was constrained by noncompete clauses. I have never seen a hospital or clinic persistently suffer from a physician leaving if those entities remained desirable places to work. Noncompetes allow employers to act in a poorer way towards employees that a market free of noncompete rules would correct."
Bruce	"My name is Bruce Fearon MD. I retooled my career from Family Medicine into Venous and Lymphatic Medicine 17yrs ago. I am reaching out to additional physicians to learn about this extremely common medical condition and to learn how to treat these conditions. Unfortunately, I have to invest in them for 4-6 months teaching them and paying them the entire time before they can function on their own. There is absolutely no incentive for me to teach anyone anything I know and practice , only to have them move into the neighborhood and compete against me. I understand that lower paid healthcare services such as Ultrasound techs need to make money to support their family, but high paid individuals over 120K including midlevel providers should not immediately be able to leave and compete given all that I have invested in them. I believe that a certain amount of time is required to pay back the investment say 2-3yrs or they can buy out their obligation. A physician leaving during their first year would owe 150,000$, or if it is during their second year say 75,000 and after 3 years there would be no pay back required. I spent a great deal of money investing in myself, buying and training my personnel, etc. I also think that we should be allowed to add punitive payments for stealing our highly trained personnel to be paid by the physician (not the medical assistants or Vascular techs). I am certainly willing to help expand the care that I offer and would be even willing to finance and assist in the physicians own efforts to have their own autonomy (kind of like a franchise but with a time expiration (5yrs)) so that they can eventually own and run their own business. To outlaw restrictive covenants on high paid and professional individuals who require advanced additional skills and expert training will severely restrict the growth of my industry and I have to believe the same would happen to many other industries. If a physician that I train wants to leave early then they will have to move outside my current demographic drawing area. Each specialty will have maybe some different range of distance. The more specialized you are , the greater the distance. I would think a basic Family Medicine physician might need to move 20-25miles for 2-3years. In my case, practicing venous and lymphatic medicine I would think 40-50miles would be required (even though I currently draw from 60miles in any direction). Each industry will have a different argument and a different need so I would restrict this to highly paid individuals: the more narrow a niche - the greater the range might be required. A tremendous amount of education and training occurs in the private sector beyond College. Businesses will slow down their hiring and you will constrict supply chains and the economy with a complete outlawing of Restrictive Covenants. I recommend you pick a common ground so that you can sell it to both sides of the political party. I have seen some low level employees making under

	80,000 who were made to sign a restrictive covenant and I do understand the idea of lifting some of these absurd contract rules- Highly paid employees with key knowledge etc. as I have said are a different matter. Thx for reading."
Lancer	"Please consider exempting small privately held medical practices with less than 100 employees from this Non-Compete Clause Rule. In general it will likely be harder for small companies to grow and achieve economy of scale to compete against larger companies if their employees continually splinter off to form smaller companies. Medical student loan forgiveness is eligible through employment by 501(c)(3) health care medical practices (e.g. not-for-profit hospitals) but is not eligible through employment by private medical practices. This is disadvantageous to the private practice of medicine and may be part of the reason that today there are more hospital employed physicians than privately practicing physicians. Please consider either including medical student loan forgiveness eligibility through employment by private medical practices, or exempting small private medical practices from the Non-Compete Clause Rule so that they have a tool that enables them to grow and more fairly compete with hospital employed medical practices."
Patrick	"I worked under non-compete clauses for my entire 34 year career. I became one of the best people in a very niche market. Since I was not able to sell my services to the highest paying employer. I had to wait until some of my employers went out of business. This meant I went through many years of no increase in salary as the employer was just trying to hold onto his business. In a non-compete the employer holds all of the cards. If any employer wants to enforce a non-compete the employer should be liable for both parties legal costs and should have to pay the employee their salary plus ten percent for the length of the agreement. This would allow employers that believe it is beneficial for their business to have this type of agreement and also allow the employee a way out without a financial burden. Patrick Robb"

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Montana | Statewide Impact

	"I think it is fundamental to abolish non-compete agreements. They are inherently "anti-free-market." As a future physician, my goal is to cover critical access hospitals in small towns. I want to live in such a small town for a long time. However, if (I) choose to break away from the hospital, I cannot practice medicine in the town at all due to the non-compete. I would be forced to move elsewhere and the town would lose a physician. After a global pandemic and, frankly, the disaster that is the current American Medical system, we need to do everything we can to support healthcare workers. In my opinion, strengthening the free market within healthcare will do nothing but improve things and drive down prices from increased competition. Non-compete clauses should be completely abolished." -Justin P.
	"As a small business owner and employer of 15 highly skilled individuals, I whole-heartedly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. Limiting an employee's ability to seek and take a different job in the same sector has substantial negative implications for equity, mobility, and labor rights, as it can lock an employee into a job or an organization without the ability to advocate to an employer for their needs. Non-compete clauses also disincentivize employers from being flexible and responsive to employee concerns about workplace challenges, since there is the constant threat that if an employee doesn't like something and chooses to quit, they won't be able to find another position. I understand the concern from the business side about employees taking trade secrets and other sensitive information and skills with them to a competitor. However, there are other legally binding contractual mechanisms that ensure that employees must not take proprietary information to the competition. Non-compete clauses are an additional and unnecessary burden on employees and the labor pool, and should be limited in most or all cases." -Kristal J.
	"I am a university professor who... can move to another job if I become unhappy in my current position. Happily, I have not chosen to exercise that option ...The cliché for blackmail is "Your money or your life," spoken at gunpoint. Non compete clauses are a way that employers force employees to choose between a salary and quality of life, where the non complete clause takes the place of the gun — the instrument of coercion. Employees are forced to sign non-complete clauses when they exercise their right to move to a new job. The FTC has a mandate to help ensure a level playing field in the dance between employers and employees. I urge the FTC to curtail or eliminate the use of non compete clauses to rebalance a situation that has clearly spiraled out of control." -G. P.

	"My wife and I are strongly against efforts to stop the non-compete rule. It is a way for big business and the chamber of commerce to keep workers in a condition of near servitude and financial bondage. They believe that freedom is something to be possessed only by big corporations and the wealthy. We strongly urge that the FTC should not fold against the all-powerful business community." -Robert and Georgette
	"I am an orthopedic surgeon in a small rural town. Our proactive was acquired by our local catholic hospital system in order to improve the financial model and attract young providers to replace retiring doctors. Unbeknownst to us, the catholic hospital system was in negotiations with a larger hospital system from out of state. That merger ultimately was completed. After hying to work with the out of state hospital system for nearly 2 years, it became clear that I could not continue my career with them. I tried to negotiate a separation that would nullify my noncompete agreement and allow me to continue to care for my community, and operate in THEIR hospital. The situation sounds like a win-win for everyone. However, because I was considering joining a competing entity, who has no presence in my community, the out-of-state system refused to wave my non-compete. This has forced me to move my practice out of a small, rural community. It has also negatively affected the finances of the one local hospital, leading to layoffs. If there were no non-compete clauses, my rural community would have BETTER healthcare and a more vibrant medical community." -A. R.

eric	"Please stop non-competes from enforcing oligopolies in this country. As a practicing physician, this adds another layer of complexity and cost to my already difficult business."
Lauren	"As a primary care physician, I am in support of banning non compete clauses. These clauses absolutely impair free movement of employees and, I believe harm innovation and patient care. In the small rural community that I serve, my non compete clause in my contract necessitates that as not work in a 12 mile radius for the 12 months after a I leave my position...This absolutely creates such a disincentive to physicians, that it does encourage exploitation of us as workers. We are a critical workforce under huge strain since the pandemic, please ban non compete clauses."

Physician	"I am psychiatrist from Montana, the state with one of the worse shortage of psychiatrists and highest suicidal deaths rates in US (3rd place from the top after Wyoming). However, to stay in Montana after leaving local hospital is difficult because of Non-compete clause in a contract. Non- compete has to be banned in healthcare at least in states like MT, where population in such need of mental health. This will improve access to MD psychiatric help!"
Lee	"I support the ban of non-compete clauses. I work in healthcare and the non-compete clauses used by bigger organizations are a burden to the healthcare systems especially in rural areas where providers are hard to recruit. Keeps people from staying in die community if they choose to leave the larger organizations."
Janelle	"As an independent contractor this is a necessary change. Please keep businesses from preying on individuals and flouting labor laws. This is very important. Please do the right thing!"
Nathaniel	"I would strongly support the ban of noncompete clauses in contracting. I am a physician in a rural area with only one hospital that employs essentially all the providers in our town. I have a noncompete clause in my contract and if I were to not be an employee at die hospital any longer then essentially I would have to uproot my life and leave the town entirely and move somewhere else to practice medicine. This would leave a huge gap in specialty care coverage for my patients in this town and put an undue burden on me as I would have to make a major change in my life. The hospital in our town is the only employer however so they force all there medical providers to sign these knowing that this leverage over their employees will keep them working at their facility and to work for lower wages as they have no alternative. It is truly an unfair practice by our hospital to lower wages and reduce employee bargaining power that needs to end. It is not just the providers who are harmed but this reduces the number of qualified physicians who want to come to this rural area and provide much needed medical care for the community leaving the community members having to travel great distances to get care they need."
Nicole	"The practice of non-competes scaling down to the middle- and working-classes is insidious and shackling In a world where cost-of-living is absurd, a non-compete handcuffs workers to two things: stasis with little room for income growth or having to change careers entirely. This is not only unfair, but devastating when rent takes up most of our income. If a competitor is willing to pay me for what I'm good at, I can use that as internal leverage or jump ship. This is happening a lot in the content media world, where non-competes for staff writers and editors (already the little guys) constrict our movement and eventually our voice. Please destroy the non-compete in American culture. It literally pulls competition right out of the competitive marketplace for the people who have the most to lose."
David	"Noncompete clauses in employment contracts harm workers by reducing wages and preventing them from finding new and better opportunities. About one in five workers are subject to noncompete clauses, which heavily favor employers and prevent workers from seeking new opportunities within a set amount of time after leaving their job. These provisions reduce competition by keeping workers at one company from working for another or starting a competing business, basically undermining the most critical power non-union workers have—the ability to quit.”

Logan	“I really hope that this regulation goes through. Non compete clauses cause me a lot of headache in the industry I work in. In the file I uploaded below it says that die punishment for breaking die non compete clause is not getting paid.”
Anne	“I am a psychiatrist in a rural area of Montana. Noncompete clauses in healthcare decrease patients rights to choose who they see for care and decrease access. My healthcare organization would like to implement a noncompete clause in our contract. There are no other major healthcare organizations in our community and therefore no competition. However, if I decide to leave this organization, I would have to leave my community and therefore leave them without access to a psychiatrist in this area.”
Brian	“Non competes are restricting economic independence of individuals for die benefit of corporations. In veterinary medicine , it has simply become egregious. The FTC should examine the impact on this sector even if broader reform of regulations aren't passed.”
D	“I am a National Board Certified Health and Wellness Coach and I live in Montana. I provide health coaching services remotely and have had clients from various states in the US and other countries. In 2021 I became a contractor for a direct-to-consumer telehealth company that serves patients in the US. I started in a contractor role, where I was guaranteed a minimum number of hours of work per week (10 hours) and no benefits. Yet, as a contractor, I had to agree to devote my time and attention to this company and forego providing telehealth coaching services through any other business without the prior approval of the company. The contract also included confidentiality, non-solicitation, and trade secrets clauses, along with a non-compete clause that was supposed to last one year from the termination of my employment, regardless of the reason for the end of my employment. I was able to negotiate keeping my small private practice, and perhaps seek other work, but only with a particular type of telehealth company (those providing health coaching through an employee assistance program); I could not work with other companies that provided telehealth coaching more broadly. I was also able to negotiate a reduction in the non-compete post-employment period to six months. I had to do all of this negotiation for a contract that did not guarantee that I would be able to work the number of hours needed to secure a living wage, with no guarantee that I would be invited to work part-time or full-time in the future, and where my opportunities to seek additional work were severely limited. After thirteen months, the company eliminated my department. All of our clients were given exceedingly short notice that their health coaching services were being terminated. The original contracts non-solicitation and confidentiality clauses prohibited me from reaching out to any soon-to-be former clients to offer continued services if they so chose. In addition, the non-compete clause prohibited me from applying for work with any other telehealth company offering coaching services in the US for six months post-employment. Upon notice of termination, the company

	required that I sign a severance agreement. I was able to negotiate a small concession. I was still prohibited from reaching out to my former clients due to the confidentiality provisions of the contract, even though these individuals could no longer get these services from the company. However, the company said it wouldn't sue me if I sought work with other companies that provided services similar to the health coaching services the company no longer provided. I considered myself fortunate to have been able to negotiate a few minor changes to a contract and severance agreement with a non-compete clause. Most people don't know they can push back on a contract. The time constraints put on signing a contract (in this case 48 hours) increases the sense of urgency to accept whatever you are provided with, and the act of negotiating can cause a sense of fear that your job offer might be retracted if you try to negotiate the offer. Finally, there was an unanticipated obstacle that arose during my post-employment period. Many applications for other positions asked if I had signed non-compete agreements with other companies. I answered truthfully and never heard back from those companies, losing out on even the possibility of an interview for employment."
Klaas	"A non-compete clause in a contract prevents one from doing what he is trained to do if he gets terminated from one position for whatever reason and also forces one to keep the job he currently has regardless of working conditions. This is unfair to the employee or independent contractor that has signed such an agreement usually as he's unaware of the non-compete clause."
Nick	"Due to the healthcare shortage, non compete rules should be eliminated to allow patients to have physicians stay in their area."
Christy	"I am a LMT in MT that had worked for a chiropractor office that required to sign a contract for employment that included a no-compete for 2 years post employment within 7 miles of the establishment. Unfortunately, the entire city is approximately 7 miles in diameter which has now blocked me from continuing to offer a non-invasive approach to pain relief to the community I have grown to call home. In my opinion, an individual has their own right to choose how they spend their money on a service regardless of the location; especially when it involves their own bodies. I am against non-compete clauses."
Brendan	"I do not want non-compete clauses for Americans! It's a ridiculous matter to stop a hard working individual from doing what they want to do!"
Michele	"For years, Physicians have been restricted by contract limitations. Restricting these limitations would allow us to care for more patients and improve the current crisis of limited access to care."
Robert and Georgette	"My wife and I are strongly against efforts to stop the non-compete rule. It is a way for big business and the chamber of commerce to keep workers in a condition of near servitude and financial bondage. They believe that freedom is something to be possessed only by big corporations and the wealthy. We strongly urge that the FTC should not fold against the all-powerful business community.”

	"I am a hospitalist physician in an area that needs more doctors. My employer does not allow me to work at competing hospitals. I do not have a personal patient panel. Allowing me to work at the competing hospital would not affect the hospital but would allow me to serve my community in a greater capacity. Please get rid of non-competes in hospital medicine." -Asit G.
	"I currently work in the IT sales industry....Most non-compete terms are twelve months or longer. Because the scope of our business touches almost all technology and all accounts in a given [area], it is very difficult to change employers without losing substantial income for a period of 1 to 2 years. This keeps us from leaving the current organization....Our gross earnings decline on an annual basis, but we simply do not have any negotiating power. Non-compete agreements also limit individual and family mobility. Limiting or removing the powers of non-compete will help employees operate in a free market. While costs to businesses may go up, those costs should go up universally and level the playing field. Right now, millions of Americans will support the elimination of non-compete contracts." -James B.
	"I would like an end to non-compete clauses. I work in the fitness industry and would like to be able to have more flexibility to pursue other opportunities." -Vanessa D.
	"While these clauses are pervasive across so many industries, they are especially pernicious in local TV. In my experience, they are part of boilerplate, multi-year employment agreements and are never a point of negotiation. The massive media companies that now own most of the local TV stations in the U.S. use a take-it-or-leave-it approach with the noncompete issue — even in employment situations that pay less than $40,000/year... For employees already paid low wages, the idea of having to hire a lawyer to navigate that is daunting. Even the threat of enforcing the noncompete is enough to make some abandon the new job they've secured. Ending these anti-competitive, anti-worker arrangements would be truly welcome." -David

Adam	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. They are anti-American, restricting the liberty and pursuit of happiness of millions of Americans."
Lucille	"We should not be prohibited from providing patient care . Patients are not owned by health care systems. Last I checked that was banned in the 1800s."
Nicole	"I support ending non competes. I personally was bullied intimidated and was threatened. I'm a single mom of 5 and my ability to earn a living to support my kids was taken away."
Brad	"Non-competes should be illegal. People spend years honing their skillset working in specific verticals. Non-competes effectively handcuff the average person from moving to another company where they can use those skills. It makes it very difficult to move to another industry where they have no experience and often have to take a pay cut. In my last company, the environment is toxic. It's so hard that people have filed lawsuits or sought counseling due to the trauma... Their Non-compete is so restrictive a person stays with the company until an eventual breakdown. A better solution is a simple non-solicit of employees or customers. If I go to another company, I will not take people or customers I work with away for x time. That makes sense. Most agreements have this anyway."
Virginia	"I am writing in support of the Non-Compete Clause Rule."
Tina	"There should be no non-competes for physicians as it leads to moving talented MDs out of the area."
Mike	"I have been in my industry for over 30 years and moved up to c-suite level. I left a job after 15 years to join another company with a very narrow focus and was asked to sign a very broad noncompete...After 6 months they decided to let me go...I was never giving a reason for termination. I never had access to their customer list on the "broad" scale, they never trained me on anything. I brought all my experience to the company and helped them with process improvements and once I finished, they let me go. Now I am stuck for 2 years from earning a living in all of North America in an industry which is all I have ever known...I believe a noncompete should not be enforceable when a separation decision is made by the company, especially when no reason is given."
David	"While these clauses are pervasive across so many industries, they are especially pernicious in local TV . In my experience, they are part of boilerplate, multi-year employment agreements and are never a point of negotiation. The massive media companies that now own most of the local TV stations in the U.S. use a take-it-or-leave-it approach with the noncompete issue — even in employment situations that pay less than $40,000/year, a common salary in local TV. I've heard from colleagues that media companies have threatened to enforce noncompetes not just inside a TV market, but in other markets where the company owns a station where the journalist would be a competitor. For employees already paid low wages, the idea of having to hire a lawyer to navigate that is daunting. Even the threat of enforcing the noncompete is enough to make some abandon the new job they've secured. Ending these anti-competitive, anti-worker arrangements would be truly welcome."

Hussein	"Non-compete clauses are unfair for physicians . We should not have to move our families far away to other cities for better jobs. This will force hospitals to treat their physician also, since a lot do not care about us."
Seth	"Non-compete agreements should not be legal in the USA. I once had a non-compete that was effective in a 100-mile radius. It was a contracting firm and worked with most businesses, [which] the non-compete also covered. If I wanted to get a job in my field, I would've had to move away from my family. I felt like a prisoner in my own job..."
Kathy	"Any policy that restricts a worker's ability to make a living should not be supported by the government. The FTC needs to put an end to this practice."
Tim	"Pro-worker policies are necessary for a fair economy. Banning non-compete clauses is the least we could do to level the playing field."
Joshua	"I am strongly in favor of eliminating non-competes, particularly "evergreen restrictive covenants." In addition to limiting options for employees and having to contemplate moving a family just to change employment, there are additional considerations in healthcare. Non-compete clauses have the additional effect of limiting options for patients and limit the ability to maintain the physician-patient relationship. For this reason, non-compete clauses in healthcare harm the public interest. Finally, both the American College of Surgeons and the American Medical Association have repeatedly pointed to the ethical issues associated with restrictive covenants."
Alastair	"The liberty and freedom to choose where and whom to work for is fundamental to economic prosperity. Non-compete clauses limit the ability of a worker to engage in capitalist ventures, but ultimately also in the pursuit of happiness. When businesses apply such clauses de rigueur it de facto amounts to one-sided blackballing in an industry, constraining the abilities of the worker to do their best work. The application of these clauses must therefore be eliminated or constrained in the extreme (such as in matters of national security)."
Heather	"I have been involved in a court battle over a non-compete for over a year and a half. My previous company let me go and had slid in a non-compete with some stock options they offered me several years ago. After growing their business and

	net revenue over 10-fold the leader decided to turn it over to his best friend who was also working for the company. They eliminated my position...but when I tried to and did acquire a job...back in the industry they immediately filed a lawsuit and have used the courts and their deep pockets to keep me from...competing against them. After spending over $100 thousand of my own money and limited earnings I've had to...give into their demands...."
Jeff	"Non-competes are modern day legalized slavery. The employer controls all aspects of an employee's life with them: Where they can live, work, and provide a living for their families...I have personally been hauled into court after leaving an abusive company to enforce a non-compete. The prior non-compete limited me in such a way I could not continue my career. Far too long employers have been able to act as slave masters with lawyers as their overseers cracking their whips of litigation. Non-competes hurt, are punitive, and abusive to individual careers, families, and the economy. As long as non competes exist we cannot call ourselves a free market capitalist economy."
Sharad	"I read the FTC Chair's op-ed in the New York Times today and writing this in support of the strong arguments she puts forward for eliminating the non-compete clause in employment."
Tim	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! PLEASE ban non-compete clauses ASAP!!"
Kelsey	"I support this clause. I was partnered with my family for my entire working career (starting before I was 16yrs old) until 8/31/2022. I worked over 20yrs with my family thinking that I would continue until I retired. These plans changed due to a spine injury I experienced from over lifting The field that this occurred in was document destruction. There was constant lifting and I ended up injuring myself with a permanent lifelong injury. I approached my family to explain that I could not physically do this job any longer. They did not receive this message well....It was a year long legal battle over petty stuff that we ended up agreeing on. After the final offer was accepted by me, my partners threw in the non-compete...During the process of the exit and legal battle I ended up contacting a competitor that my family has known since he started his company and it's been a decent relationship with fair competition through the years....If I did not have the non-compete I could've found a job that I was familiar with in the same industry. Although, I basically had to start over at the age of 38 with four kids and my working wife relying on me for income. I found it difficult to find another job in a new profession without college degrees. It took me over three months of constant looking and interviewing to land a job. The pay is almost 130,000 less then what I was getting before...if I didn't have the non-compete I would've been able to find a job in the same field that I left and would've been an equal salary from my last profession."
Andrea	I am a Home Instead franchisee owning 1 franchise and employing approximately 65 individuals in the community. I am writing to discuss how the

	noncompete agreement that I was required to sign in connection with the signing of my franchise agreement negatively affects my business and me. In August 2021, our franchisor — Home Instead, Inc. — was purchased by Honor Technology. Inc. — a private-equity/venture-capital backed entity....Honor is attempting to fundamentally change our franchisee-franchisor relationship and business model in a way that I do not fully support. I am now in an involuntary contractual relationship with an entity that I did not choose and would prefer not to be. But because of the noncompete agreement, I effectively am unable to leave the relationship, even when the term of my existing franchise agreement ends. Since last I signed what was already a one- sided, franchise agreement, the franchisor has removed its obligation to provide franchisees with any support.... I do not support any of the changes. I have two choices when my franchise agreement ends: I must renew my contract on completely new, non-negotiable terms or, because of the noncompete agreement, I must completely leave a business that I have spent 16 years building. If I choose the latter, the noncompete clause in my franchise agreement requires me to walk away from my existing business, and it severely limits my ability to create or own another similar business. The economic penalty of not renewing is just overwhelming, thereby forcing me to renew with an entity and agree to terms that I would not otherwise do. As such, I ask that you consider banning post-contract non-compete clauses in franchise agreements. Thank you for your time."
Scott	"I would agree wholeheartedly with the FTC's recommendations. Workers have rights which are getting harder and harder to uphold with the adversity of monies by big companies combating their rights to higher wages, safe workplaces and the right to fight terms against them which are outright wrong."
Adam	"I am in support of a ban on non-competes."
Joshua	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am writing to support the ban of non compete agreements. Non competes are often used to trap skilled workers, and to remove them from the industry. They offer nothing to the employee and can remove any amount of leverage in negotiations with a company under the threat of completely ending their career."
Michael	"As a Healthcare professional and member of a private health group, I am entirely in support of this movement. The Healthcare workforce is already handcuffed in many ways with financial freedoms and flexibility taken out of the hands of its doctors, advanced practitioners, etc. Non-competes put up a large roadblock for us to seek "greener pastures" and hold us captive by leadership unwilling to invest in positive changes unless we want to uproot our lives and move to a system outside the geographic confines of the noncompete. This ban would effectively force leadership to prioritize adaptation and evolution in the workplace. This would lead to better compensation, better work conditions, and most importantly more accountability top to bottom. Let's make this happen."
Alice	"Thank you for your wisdom in recognizing that noncompetes stifle the economy and hinder both workers and business. Noncompetes unfairly tilt the economic

	playing field in favor of business owners and away from laborers, as well as being an unnecessary stifling of liberty. Businesses are free to hire whomever they wish; employees should equally be free to work for whomever they wish. With this freedom, labor moves to where it is most efficient and effective for all.”
William	“My position in a company is about to be terminated due to a downturn in the company's financial situation...Still, the company will not nullify or waive any non-compete clause in its employee’s contracts. This seems outrageously unfair and stifling to the ability of employees to market their expertise, learnings, and skills (the acquisition of which has come at great cost and sacrifice to the employees). Please rule in favor of making it illegal for companies to write and enforce contracts with non-compete clauses. Employees deserve the fair opportunity to market their skills and educational talents, especially when their jobs are eliminated through no fault of their own.”
Tim	“Since when does a company or business "own" a humans right to work. It is ridiculous to think that a non-compete clause is legal and enforceable. The FTC has to put a stop to this nonsense. Americas should have the freedom and the right to choose when and where they work. No company should be allowed to limit a persons freedom and right to leave a job and work someplace else of their choosing. Free market economics pertains to people too, not just companies and Wall Street. Fix this FTC!”
Robert	“This unfair labor practice has been financially a strain on me for many years of my working life. Most recently it happened when me and two other colleagues were forced to leave a company...When I left in late January 2020, I had to sign a 2 year non compete and I have not been able to work in the industry FOR TWO YEARS! The company has been watching my LinkedIn profile very closely to make sure I do not work in the industry. How can this be fair? After being out of the industry for two years so many things have changed, and that puts me in a difficult position trying to compete for jobs.”

	"I work for a casino gaming manufacturer in Las Vegas. [Our] industry has mandatory non-compete agreements which prevent employees to accept a position at a competitor for 6 months Gaming is a very specialized industry so the non-compete agreement very much prevents gaming employees from advancing within the industry." - Jared T.
	"As an employee in the broadcasting business. I've been adversely effected by non-complete clauses in my contracts. Once, I got laid off from a TV station in Las Vegas Nevada and the non-compete in my contract stated that even if the station terminates my employment without cause, I was still required to wait one year before working in the profession that I've been doing my entire adult life. My three choices were to either move, switch careers or be unemployed for a full year. That puts an economic strain not only on myself, but on the state of Nevada as I exhausted my unemployment benefits during the waiting period." - Ken S.
	"I want to express my support for you banning of non-compete clauses in employee contracts; when I heard this on the radio I actually jumped up and down. I am a physician assistant and have been subjected to non-compete clauses my entire career. Their only purpose is to strong arm employees into accepting lower wages & any other unpalatable request of an employer as you cannot move to another job without leaving the city in which you live. I am willing to wager that there is not a single physician, physician assistant, nurse, or nurse practitioner who have ever benefited, as an employee, from a non-compete agreement." - John B.
	"I work as a physician in rural Nevada where it is tough to recruit a physician. If I decide to leave my current hospital employer I cannot work within a 30- mile radius. This will leave thousands of patients without a physician. Non-complete clauses do not just hams physicians, they harm patient care." - Justin H.
	"I work in the Las Vegas area, in the sales industry for Purcell Tire. We are the only company now in Vegas that uses a non-compete agreement. [...] The company allows hostility, unprofessionalism, and uses dangerous business practices. They pay well below industry wages, and when spoken of my concerns multiple times, they quickly remind you of your non-compete clause and you are stuck. Unless of course you move out of town with family, or per-sue a new career at 45 years old and hopefully start with good pay." - Jason T.

Judith	"[...] I believe that Non-Compete clauses are unethical and unfair. I support banning them. I have not been subjected to them. I worked for a very small company, and am now retired, but I have a lot of friends who still work and they should not be prevented from finding better jobs by prior employers. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Anonymous	"I fully support the actions of the FTC in eliminating non-compete clauses as a condition of employment. If the purpose of the FTC is to encourage healthy competition in the work place by discouraging monopolies and binding contracts, then this change is exactly what our country needs to push innovation and a free market society. My background is healthcare and I have seen numerous instances of non-competes that have led to disastrous and costly litigation, and even more costly contracts having to be made to hire providers and staff (including locums and travelers) Eliminating the non-compete from American business is what our economy needs right now. It is the right thing to do and I am encouraged by the FTC's announcement regarding this rule. I look forward to seeing the fruits of this labor grow into fruition."
Nikola	"I am a physician , as is my wife. Job change is an extremely common phenomenon in the physician world. 50% of orthopedic surgeons change jobs in the first two years of their career. Non-compete clauses are a one-sided concept that benefit hospitals and health care organizations, but hurt physicians. Physicians sacrifice a significant amount to train and then move for jobs. If a job does not work out for whatever reason, they are then not allowed to work for a certain period of time (often 1 year). This can lead to significant financial strain as we are faced with very high levels of debt from our training Having to uproot a family and move because of this rule is also extremely traumatizing. I believe that removing non-compete clauses would lead to a more free market for employment and would benefit many many people."
Dave	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

Erica	"Non-Competes should be non-existent."
Cade	"Non competes are exploitative in their very nature. In some states where they are even illegal, companies still ask their workers to sign these 'agreements'. This is so they can gain more control over their workers without any incentive for the company to improve benefits in order to keep workers. This should absolutely be banned, and I really hope Lina Khan keeps looking for more ways to end the exploitation of the American workforce that is so important to our economy."
Geoffrey	"I am a geologist and I work for a small consulting company based in the Western US. My contract contains a non-compete clause with wording so broad that it can be construed to forbid me from working in any geological capacity in another job. With an MSc in Geology and 15 years experience in the field, I do not have alternative options that would allow me to maintain my standard of living. My only options for continued employment would be to either take a full year off work, wait until my employer terminates my contract or hope that they do not choose to litigate if I decide to leave for another job. Non- compete clauses are unfair and should be banned. Truly trade-secret materials, processes and equipment are already protected by copyright, patent and other intellectual property protections. An individual's expertise should belong to them, even if that expertise was gained during employment...it is still the individual who put forth the effort and devoted the time to develop knowledge and skill, even if the resources were provided by another. Non-compete clauses are harmful to employees, burdensome to the justice system and a general detriment to society as the block free movement of skilled workers to where their skills are valued. They are fundamentally anti-capitalist."
Leif	"I was directly effected by this in 2008 when Home Depot purchased a company I worked for called Hughes. They cut my pay by 2/3 then sued me in Federal Court for going to work for a competitor. So the decision they wanted to force me to make was accept 1/3 of previous pay or be unemployed. Completely unreasonable. Has truly affected who I am and the trajectory of my life since. I am no longer the same person. I never even signed the Home Depot non-compete. They made the one I signed for a completely different owner, one that I could trust, stick as if it were their's Leif John Bymoer"
K	"The non-compete clause should be abolished for employees to provide economic freedom to the greatest number of citizens. The improved salary growth would benefit the working class by redistributing wealth to the working class. State and federal governments would also win by increasing taxable income. The government is much more efficient at collecting income tax from the working class than from corporations. Removing the burden of the noncompete would clearly be a win for government and the working citizens. The small group of wealthy corporation and business owners are the only group that might lose a small portion of their wealth. I currently have a 5 year and statewide noncompete which came about when a large national corporation bought out my little business. I then became an employee of that corporation. The large national corporation has not fulfilled its promises but had stated that it will enforce the noncompete. Local employment counsel has given the opinion that I could certainly fight and probably win a non-compete case but that it would probably cost 500k and I would not be able to work for 6+ months while the case was tied up in court. There is no way I can afford to fight the giant corporation as a private citizen. I do not enjoy financial freedom under the oppression of the wealthy few that run the large corporations."

Ellia	"Non-competes are unethical for attorneys because it violates the public interest by limiting the attorney's professional autonomy and the ability of clients to choose their lawyer. This is the same thing for physicians . Just like lawyering, it limits the physician's professional autonomy and limits the ability of patients to choose their physician and violates the physician-patient relationship while also inappropriately reducing the quality of care that the patients require. The initial intent behind noncompetes was to allow the employer to reap the benefits of investing in their employee. The idea was that the employer worked hard to create the patient base. However, for inpatient physicians, this is definitely not an issue as most physicians do not solicit patients in the inpatient setting. For clinic physicians, patients are often seen by the remaining physicians. Now, the noncompetes are meant to create indentured servitude - basically requiring a person to continue current employment vs. move and prevent current patients from receiving your personalized service vs. work in non medical field. In addition, noncompetes are being enforced in areas of physician and physician specialty shortages making it even more difficult to provide appropriate care for our patients. Moreover, it's an excessive restraint of trade that reduces the quality of care for patients. Therefore, I support a ban on non-compete clauses including a ban on noncompete clauses that detrimentally affects the physician patient relationship because non-competes slow down innovation, disrupt the relationship between physician and patient, and remove physicians from the workforce (in a time where physicians are in short supply). Banning non-competes, especially physicians, is a good thing for patient care."
g scott	"As we seem to be replacing kings and dictators with Corporations and Plutocrats...I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Michelle	"There should be absolutely no non-competes. Not for patients, not for employees, and not for doctors. This prevents patients from getting adequate healthcare, and keeps doctors and employees in toxic work environments where they can be mistreated, underpaid, and taken for granted. If they have the courage to leave that toxic work environment, they can no longer create income in the field that they spent thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of dollars going to school for. This is absolutely absurd, and completely unethical. End non-competes now!!!"
Lenny	"The non-competes and restrictive covenants negatively impact the quality of life of veterinarians and are used as a poor, lazy substitute for actually driving wellbeing and engagement."

Jeffrey	"Outlawing non competes would significantly improve quality and access to health care. The problem with health care in America is there is not enough competition. There should be completion to improve the quality and access care not the other way around. I am strongly in favor of over turning non competes."
Mohamad	"Non-compete clauses are detrimental to the growth of medicine and care of patients. New physicians like me want to serve a community but then can get pushed out from a city because of signing a practice or hospital straight out of residency. Capitalism is about competition, when an employer knows the employee cannot look for a better job in the area, this hurts the quality of the services on every level. Please consider outlawing non-compete clauses. Thank you"
Bryan	"Lets be honest, this practice of making employees sign noncompete is a way for the employer to control the employees and give them very few options to get out of their job. for employees like myself that have spend years in the same industry, it makes it hard to progress and develop and grow yourself because you are limited to the opportunities at your current employer. if you are an individual contributor, and are ready for a manager promotion, you will only get it if your current employer has a spot available and wants to offer it to you. if your a manager and you are ready for a director position, the same rules apply. you are unable to find a growth position outside the company because you are in fear of legal action if you go to another company. a company can keep your salary low because they know you cannot go to a competitor that is growing and expanding And also, think of companies that are growing and expanding and have better products and services. they are unable to find the best talent and pay them what they are worth because they are tied up with a contract. Getting rid of this unfair practice is the only way to go. The only people that I expect will be against it are the companies that take advantage of the rule."
Megan	"This should be passed, everyone is allowed to earn a living and to provide for the area they are working in. I am an owner dentist and I hired a doctor who has a non compete, she only worked around 45 days and yet they have a probation period with her and she realized it wasn't a good fit. They want to hold her accountable for 5 miles! They told me I had to fire her since she was in violation of her contract. I have no ties with them whatsoever but they decided to file a lawsuit for interfering with their business. 45 days there is not much a dentist can do to steal patients, staff or and protect information. If the business was honest and did good work then it shouldn't matter how a solely dentist can persuade patients to leave. We have not solicited any of their patients and in fact have turned patients away and sent back to their original office. Non-competes are unethical and a way of coercing an individual especially when faced against a larger company. America should be a right to work country and non compete should not be enforced."
Andre	"Non-compete clauses overwhelmingly benefit employers by suppressing wages. A federal ban would incentivize companies to retain workers by actively being a place workers want to stay, rather than simply being the only feasible option. A federal ban would empower employees and restore their freedom to work where they are valued."

Peter	"I moved to America one Saturday in 2016. On the Monday morning, starting my new job (having transferred from the UK office), I found myself signing something I'd never heard of until that day - a Non-Compete Agreement. In a country known as the "Land of the Free", this thing called a Non-Compete seemed to be somewhat at odds with that idea. Non-Competes trap unhappy employees at companies they don't want to be at. They destroy competition, and let companies keep salaries low. They cause a drain on talent (as the only way an employee can move company, is to move to a different industry). America, please, please, please do the right thing, and ban Non-Competes."
June	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. These types of clauses are unfair to workers."
J	"I have recently resigned from a position as a dermatology physician assistant in Carson City, Nevada. This is a rural area in Northern Nevada with an aging population and tremendous need for dermatology health, namely skin cancer detection and treatment. I delayed this resignation for several years due to a non-compete that prevents me from seeking other dermatology positions, despite a corporate change-over that led to a hostile work environment, lack of management support, and failure of the management/company to address patient safety concerns. The non-compete clause present in my contract prohibits me from working in my specialty field (of which I have over a decade of experience) anywhere in this Northern Nevada community. While a 25- mile radius may not seem significant (particularly for those in larger urban-to-suburban sprawl regions), in my case it effectively eliminates all potential options for employment within the dermatology field unless I were to relocate myself and my family. More importantly, this means that now my community is that much more lacking in available healthcare. I will effectively sit at home for a year in order to avoid legal action from my employer, a period of time when my skills could be utilized to provide medical care in my community. Non-competes are bad for providers and even worse for patients/communities. They have no place in medicine."
Nyomi	"I'm against non compete, I believe it takes away people's rights."
Jonathon	"In regards to Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200, I support this rule. Non-compete clauses are prohibitive for a free and fair labor market. It is pure hypocrisy that I, as an employee, may be fired at will by employer, while I am prevented from quitting my place of work and joining a firm that more highly values my productivity. Non-compete clauses fundamentally shift the power to the employer, suppress wages, and, ultimately, discourage economic productivity. Non-compete clauses are an unfair practice, and should not be legal. I support this the passage of this proposed rule."
V	"I am an anesthesiologist that is subject to a non compete restriction because of my former employment contract. I live in a city where we have a shortage of

	anesthesiologists. Because my former employer was very aggressively threatening to sue me for working in my city, I did not work for 6 months. During that time, I consulted with multiple lawyers about my options to work in my city and not violate my contractual obligations. I found a job that did not violate my contract and on day 1 of my orientation, I received an threatening email from my former employer. After 24 hours had passed and they realized I was not going to respond to their communication, I received a cease and desist letter from their attorneys. The contents of the letter were completely false. They were accusing me of violating my contract in multiple ways and none of it was true. Luckily, I had an amazing lawyer who sent a strong response that contained actual facts and my former employer backed off...for now. I believe my former employer knew I was not in violation of my contract. I believe they thought they could scare me into stopping my work. I believe their goal was to bully me and to use me as an example to discourage others from also leaving. I spend time away from my family and my job to respond to their bogus complaint. I spent money to consult with multiple lawyers in order to find a job that was compliant with my old contract and to respond to my employer's threats. All of this time could have been spent taking care of patients in my city who are having surgeries delayed due to the shortage of anesthesiologists. My attorney said that non competes are supposed to be used as a "shield" to protect business, not as a "sword" to harm employees. My former employer and the attorneys for the company are intentionally acting in bad faith. The reason I left the company was due to their poor leadership and the toxic work culture they created, and their treatment of me and other physicians who have left are a great example of these qualities. They are preventing highly trained physicians from treating patients who need medical care. The people of my city are being harmed because of the unethical business practices and the aggressive application of a non compete restriction by my former employer. Non compete restrictions would never be necessary if companies respected their employees and treated them fairly."
Brant	"This rule must absolutely not exclude physicians. I have witnessed time and time again the power imbalance between physicians and healthcare administration. Patients are often neglected, despite a physician's best efforts to provide evidence based treatment. Large corporate healthcare bullies physicians into providing limited care for patients and then uses non compete clauses to dissuade physicians from seeking other resources or avenues to support their patients. There is no situation in which forcing physicians to leave a market and drop care for known patients benefits patient's. Lack of continuity of care is a large burden on patient's and health systems currently use non compete clauses as a punishment to dissuade physicians from staying in one place or building up a healthy community."
Michael	"I have been in various engineering jobs over the last 40 years. Non- competes stifle innovation and workers rights. This due to the argument that you shouldn't be able to use skills in which you spent your life honing for another company."
Geoffrey	"I have an existing non-compete with a company that hired me in December of 2021, I was released without notice or reason in July of 2022. I was employed for

	8 months but have a non compete that lasts 18 months. I have lost out on two positions I have gone through the interview process on. This one single piece of paper that makes no difference has kept me on unemployment for an additional 4 months. Now it's been so long since I held a job I can't even get an interview. The best part is the only 2 protections for me in the clause my former employer failed to perform. But I would have to spend thousands just to prove it and get them to release me. I have reached out diplomatically and they will not release it. Even under Nevada law to maintain this they would either need to continue paying me or pay my benefits. But unfortunately they refuse to do either. Best part is the non compete locks me out of 44 cities"
Sandra	"I live in Nevada which has a serious shortage of physicians. My non-compete clause makes me unable to practice anywhere else in my community, and it makes me as a physician LEAVE THE STATE if I choose to leave my present practice. It is also used as a tool to prevent me from speaking out on patient safety issues. Please get rid of them."
Nichole	"Please do not let hospital systems or large employers decide where we can and can't live!!! We dedicate our lives to helping people and they end up owning us, and deciding where our families can and can't live. This is not about patient care, this is about control."
Dacey	"As a physical therapist working in a small town with no the next closest town/city 1-2 hours away. (Winnemucca Nevada) I am currently unable to move/change jobs with in my own town. There are 3 other clinics however my non-compete does not allow me to move jobs with in my own town. I was unaware of how restricting this would be. It is to the point that I would have to move to another town in order to obtain another job or fight this through a legal battle. I like my employer most of the time, but having to opportunity to change jobs, or create a competitive wage market with in this town would be ideal. I feel like it is unfair to hold people to these agreements stating that in order for you to continue working for us, you must sign this. Job retention should be based on employee and employer beneficiary. The non compete only benefits the employer if you must sign to keep your job. In a small town the options are limited, and the other practices do not have job postings frequently. The state of Nevada has done so for hourly workers, but the medical field is something that also needs a ban on this. With so limited amount of workers per geographical location, and limited job opportunities, I should not be held to an agreement that only supports my employer through retention. Even if the ban does not satisfy all workers, some specific fields should be not aloud to enforce these including, the medical field, hourly workers, construction, front line service workers, or any other essential workers. I fell that the nda agreement supports more methods of protecting company secrets than a non compete. Non competes only limit worker mobility and voice. Essentially forcing family's to stay in a certain location until their house sell, even if they enjoy the area they live in. I would have to sell my home in order to find other work because of this. My employer is the first to mention I can't work any where else because I have such agreement. I feel my job title should not be a determining factor for who I can and can not work for. I completed this degree to have options."

Andrea	"I heartily support this proposed rule change by the FTC! We need this kind of support!"
John	"I agree that non-compete agreements should be banned. I should be able to work for anyone I want and nobody should be able to prevent me. This is just another way businesses are harming workers."
Lori	"I support the ban on non-compete clauses. People should have the freedom to change jobs as they need. Not being able to causes a hardship on families and allows an employers to cause this hardship if you choose to not work for them any more regardless of the reason for leaving. If an employer wants to protect their information then they can place a clause about that in an employment agreement instead. Please pass this bill to eliminate these clauses."
Jordan	"The NPRM would universally increase wages for all employees and independent contractors. In the business of anesthesia , large private equity anesthesia groups seek to buy out smaller anesthesia groups and end up forming a monopoly within a city, state, region, etc. These near monopolies keep wages, benefits, and culture stagnant. Even worse, this puts our patients at a disadvantage. Due to my personal non-compete contractual obligations in Las Vegas, NV, I would be unable to practice anesthesia in 11 of the 15 total acute care hospitals with surgical services in Las Vegas, NV. This almost forces people to leave the city/ area to find new employment, which is also bad for the city/ state."
James	"I support the FTC's efforts to eliminate the corrosive effects of Non-Compete clauses on our society and economy. The idea of Non-Compete clauses is incompatible with free and open competition for workers and has a negative pressure on wages that is inconsistent with the notion of the at-will employment doctrine which is the prevailing rule in 49 of 50 states. If an employee can be fired at any time for any reason or no reason and then be boxed out of the labor market in the location in which he or she lives, then the employment is not truly "at-will." It is my hope that the FTC acts to eliminate the use of these anti-competitive devices. The time has come. I also echo the comment of the National Employment Lawyers Association (I am a member of that organization)"
DAVID	"As a physician working in a community that is poorly served, I very much support this rule. Current non-compete causes force physicians to leave our state if they want or need to change jobs. This worsens our state's physician shortage, and discourages providers from moving to the area. These non- compete clauses do not improve patient care, but rather work to depress wages and limit competition. I strongly urge the FTC to implement this proposed rule change."
Hrishikesh	"Don't exclude doctors from non compete clauses."

Ashley	"Non-competes are an unfortunate scare tactic that employers use as a stranglehold on employees. NCA hold employees hostage and are not beneficial for individual growth and enrichment by allowing the individual to seek new opportunities. If an employee is seeking other opportunities, the employer is already at a disadvantage, as that employee is losing dedication/devotion to their current employer. I am in the signing phase of my contract and currently has a 5 mile radius for one year, looking at a map of 5 mile radius, basically is the entire metropolitan area of where I live. But as a new graduate healthcare worker, I am left with no choice."
Jacob	"Non compete clauses end up being anti free market and it prevents competition in important fields such as healthcare. I would be unsurprised if it is hurting American healthcare getting rid of non compete clauses will boost American healthcare"
Deaudre	"Ban noncompetes. I know someone moved for a job that tried to enforce a noncompete from 5 miles of 9 offices, offices they only ever worked in 1, that blankets the town. Worked less than 90 days. There is public legal paperwork for this. They sued them a new doctor. Noncompetes should have no radius, the internet and access to advertising completely obliterates radius as was originally established. This stopped doctors from being able to find proper mentorship. It's disgusting. Noncompetes are killing the access to care for patients. No doctor, nurse, physician, hygienist, PA, etc should ever have a noncompete. Patient care and access trumps corporate interests. It is killing competition. It stops a free market. It is killing access for young dentists and physicians. Going to school and getting 500k in debt and being unable to practice in a city you moved to for a job. This keeps happening across our country. Patients and doctors and providers over business interest."
Darlene	"I think this is a fabulous idea. I have been an independent contractor within the multi level marketing arena for 25 years. I work hard. I invest into the marketing and advertising of my products and services. I spent $200,000 US launching a US company into Africa. Another company - I invested $100,000 and when I wanted to give my organization to one of my leaders, the company based in Dallas Texas slapped me with a 5 year non compete. It really was blackmail. Non compete is the nice work for it. My team is my team. I spent the dollars bringing them. I invested in expenses. When I leave that company, I should be entitled to invite those that I personally brought to the company, to come with me to start over. If the company was good for people, what are they afraid of? People wouldn't want to leave. I agree that I shouldn't have any right to the team they brought and down through the organization - but the PERSONALLY sponsored people I brought - I invested in them. They are not OWNED by the company. They should be allowed to decide whether they would like to come with me to work with another company. I was severely limited in being allowed to create and earn income. The owner of our company, was also forced to sign a 3 year non compete, prohibiting him from doing any business in the continent of Africa, thus severely limiting our ability to do business."

Michelle	"An unfair non compete had me trapped in a hostile work environment and when I asked out of my noncompete I was wrongfully terminated. I am a single mother of four and need enough income to provide for them. By preventing me from working at a similar shop with similar pay my livelihood and my children's are affected severely."
Omid	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete"
Boyd	"Having a non-compete clause in contracts is blatantly there to punish employees. The more educated and specialized your talent is the harsher the non-compete is. The argument that they do not want trade secrets to be passed onto a competitor as the basis for a non-compete doesn't hold water. If you don't want your proprietary information leaking then you have them sign an NDA. They are free to move employers but they can't talk about sensitive information from past employers. What really needs to be part of the rule is the prevention of business colluding to still act like non-compete. If business have gentlemen agreements to not hire each others former employees, especially in very limited markets or companies, then they can still create and enforce a non-compete without it being in a contract. This rule must absolutely include language that prohibits this type of behavior."
Taylor	"I am a software development consltant specializing in Yardi (Asset Management) software. I have had to refuse multiple jobs within the last 12 months now because of too restrictive non-compete and/or non-solicitation clauses. One industry-leading company who contracted me for work is currently trying to make me sign a 7-year non-compete! I see this as complete paranoia and oppression. Needless to say I have refused that work, but it would be nice to have protections in place for me to take that work so I can support my family without selling 7 years of my soul to company's who can't find talent for themselves because they're too busy suing and oppressing the most talented and technical individuals in our indudstry. I don't have as much money as the top consulting firms to fight a legal battle over some dispute. The agreement is attached where you can see the first clause. I refused to sign this contract for fear of legal implications of being sued by a company that is 100x the size of me as an individual."
Joel	"The idea that one company has a monopoly on my labor, or the contents of my kinesthetic or output of my functional memory recall is absurd. A non-compete assumes my labor did not provide the value to the company I am "competing" against in the first place. They don't get to pay me for labor, and then not pay me to not perform labor. A non-compete must offer commensurate pay for the actions you are being restricted from performing, or it is unenforceable. This is not a problem of intellectual property, simply labor."
Lisa	"I strongly support the FTC's propisal to ban non-compete clauses. They are unfair to workers and stifle fair competition."

Benjamin	"Please ban non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements are like handcuffs to an employee where they are restricted in seeking new opportunities even if their current employer is not willing to fairly compensate them for their career development. I was in this situation and it caused me tremendous stress and anxiety because I was trapped with my employer who was not willing to compensate me for my career development, but seeking a new job within my industry was restricted by a non-compete agreement. I don't have trade secrets or proprietary information, it was just to limit my ability to work for a competitor. My non-compete covered the entire state that I worked in, so I would have had to move out of state if I wanted to seek new employment opportunities and this created a whole new set of challenges that kept me from moving. My salary was stagnate as a result of my employers non-compete and my only options were to move out of state or move into a new industry where I may not have experience. Personal relationships in my life were affected by my limited work mobility. Protecting trade secrets is fine, but forcing employees to enter anon-compete agreement to limit fair competition is unfair and destructive. I was lucky enough to able to find a new job that didn't conflict with my non-compete agreement, but I'm only one year into my three year restricted period and may still have trouble finding employment if my current employer were to let me go for economic reasons. Please ban non-compete agreements for the benefit of American workers."
Mary	"What was originally supposed to protect technology, is now used by every corporation to abuse their employees. It is long past time to give employees their rights back as human beings and Americans."
Shaina	"I am a practicing physician and in an era of DEEP shortages of healthcare providers, non-compete clauses are exacerbating the problem. We need to remove the anti-competitive and are preventing workers from leaving jobs with unfair structures, poor management, inadequate pay, and unfavorable working conditions, among countless other reasons. This rule would open up the market so that employers would have to compete for workers and therefore would need to improve the quality of the positions."
John	"The AHA has recently sent an 18-page letter requesting that physicians be excluded from the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. This is unethical and highly revealing of their desire to keep myself an my colleagues from being able to move freely in the job market. The AHA already hold nearly all the cards (see Jung vs. AAMC) and are deeply fearful of the impact this will have on their vast power. We physicians deserve to have equal job market mobility that is afforded to other professions. Please help return balance and ignore their selfish request."
Sandra	"About one in five workers are subject to noncompete clauses, which heavily favor employers and prevent workers from seeking new opportunities within a set amount of time after leaving their job. These provisions reduce competition by keeping workers at one company from working for another or starting a competing business, basically undermining the most critical power non-union workers have

	the ability to quit. This is unfair. It sounds like collusion and price fixing - it should be illegal!"
Mazeyar	"Hospitals are able to mistreat and enslave doctors due noncompete clauses leading to poor patient care. If we want hospitals to do better for their patients and employees noncompete clauses need to be eliminated. Otherwise they have no incentive."
Dan	"A non compete has stopped me from opening my own surgery practice in town. I'm basically an indentured servant to private equity who I hate."
Samantha	"I am writing in strong support of eliminating the non-compete clauses for everyone. As a physician in an underserved area, I have been affected by a non-compete but importantly so have patients. When faced with these clauses in contracts, I have found employers unwilling to negotiate the terms forcing you to sign a contract where you will have to move away from the area in order to continue in your profession. I am now practicing >30 miles from my previous location in a very small suburban/rural area. Patients that I was seeing at my previous location now do not have a choice of provider as there is only one person in the entire city that is board-certified and fellowship-trained. And, many of these patients do not have the means to travel for care. This greatly impacts patient access to care as well as the quality of the healthcare (as there is no competition so no motivation for any practices to improve their outcomes). Additionally, patients that had established a doctor-patient relationship with me now have lost their ability to easily continue their care without their choice or consent. As for me, I felt trapped working in a position that was not in line with my values because I knew that if I left the most likely scenario meant uprooting my family and moving out of state. This put me in a position of mental anguish because as the bread winner of my family I did not feel like I had any other options for making a living but to stay in a position that did not match my patient care goals. These non-compete clauses empower corporate America at the detriment of the individual physician and their patients. Once signing on with a group with a non-compete, physicians lose all negotiating power for working conditions and compensation because the organization knows that it is unlikely that they will leave. I strongly oppose non-competes and I do not believe that any clauses currently in contracts should be upheld as most of these clauses were not fairly negotiated forcing physicians to sign the clause if they wanted that job for geographic, family or other reasons. Based on what I have seen and experienced in the medical field with non-competes, I do not believe that they should apply to any position regardless of the field. If a company is willing to pay you fairly and treat you well, they should not need a non-compete to lock you into that position."
Lali	"Get rid of them"
Scott	"The recent concerns raised by the American Hospital Association notwithstanding, noncompete language in worker agreements infringe on individual workers rights, including physician worker's rights, and are anti-competitive. Often, noncompete clauses in agreements are agreed to by workers as part of routine onboard processing, and leave workers without proper legal recourse, they not having completely thought through the future implications of such. I strongly encourage and support significant government reform of the existing legal noncompete framework."

Malcolm	"I support doing away with the non-compete clause. It's totally anti-worker, anti-democratic, and probably unconstitutional!"
Michael	"I work in the durable medical equipment industry . I am the General Manager of a local operation. I am under a non compete and so are my sales reps. My experience and the experience of my sales reps are in the industry and if we are unsatisfied with our company he have to leave the industry completely to get another job. I was recently told by my leadership that the big DME companies work together to try to honor the non compete agreements in the industry. Of course they do. These policies prevent workers from using their skills to get a better job and more pay. It also allows these companies to not have to do things to take care of their employees so they don't go to competition. If there was not a non compete agreement the companies in my industry would have to provide better environments for staff to retain them. The best companies would be able to recruit the best people from the industry. This allows the good companies to provide better services to the community and it puts pressure on the bad companies to make positive employee changes. Changing jobs can be such a difficult thing for people to do. Changing industries is even harder. Non compete contracts enslave people to some of the worst companies because some people just are not able to leave their job and the industry where all of their skills are. We need an open market of skills. This will immediately change the way big corporations handle their employees. It will create an environment where people are given their worth in a job. I'm sure my billion dollar company is lobbying hard to prevent this from happening because they don't want to compete for people. We cannot let this continue. I will also add that we all know hiring has become very difficult and especially in the medical industry. A lot of people have left the industry all together. 10 years ago you would only hire people with experience. Now it's rare to find someone with industry experience. A lot of that had to do with the fact that when the experienced peole leave their job they leave the industry all together because of the non compete. It I were to leave my job as a manager of an industry I have worked in for 20 years I would have to leave the industry and leave behind a lot of the skills I have built up. What good does that do our society?"
Jason	"I am employed by the only company now in my industry from Las Vegas that uses a non compete clause and is enforced for 2 years at the time of departure, and 100 miles in diameter(which is ALL of Las Vegas). We are also the lowest paid in the industry, and corporate makes you very aware that if you decide to leave the company and try to work for a competitor, they will sue. My back is against the wall because I want to improve my compensation(commissions) with more customers, but my employer has very little interest in improving our image, reliable equipment, and pay better wages for better quality personnel. Many promises for 2 years on changing our negotiated commission program for the better but yet to deliver. I really feel the only way to progress, is to change employers but, my non compete stands and I have no choice but to accept the lowest pay in the industry, and struggle everyday due to lack of quality personnel and equipment. Non compete clauses should be banished so that an employee doesn't feel stuck working for a bad company that puts you in a corner with no options. Work here or you'll be forced to start a new career"

Cristiane	"Patients are suffering for lack of physicians because of this cannot compete imposed by big corporations! The population needs MORE access, no restrictions!"
Phillip	"Noncompete provisions are commonplace in employment agreements within the healthcare industry. Physicians, Dentists, Nurses, and Mental Health Care providers are commonly restricted from pursuing opportunities for career advancement, including ownership opportunities due to restrictive Noncompete provisions. This disproportionately affects younger professionals, rendering the practice somewhat predatory as these Noncompete provisions may have long ranging effects on one's career and earnings mobility. I HIGHLY encourage the FTC to ban non-compete clauses, if not for our broader economic interests by creating a more competitive labor market, but for workers in the healthcare industry that is growing ever-more corporate by the day, effectively out-leveraging individual providers, and limiting the autonomy of healthcare providers in their career decisions."
Nicholas	"Non-competes stifle the earning potential of people across many sectors of our economy, and are often used in bad faith to suppress wages by discouraging movement from one employer to another. Originally, it seems, that these non-competes were only intended for people working in industries with closely guarded trade secrets, in order to prevent them from taking those trade secrets from one employer to another, but now, they are even being used to prevent choice and mobility even in remedial employment situations. There is no reason someone working at a Subway should not be able to quit and go work for Port of Subs down the street because of a non-compete. That notion is absurd, and is obviously being leveraged against working class citizens in the worst possible way. The notion that one employer should be able to dictate what someone does with their labor flies in the face of our entire free market system. It prohibits entrepreneurship in those with the know how to branch out and do things on their own as well. This is a 'no-brainer'. The non-competes are not serving anyone except the worst possible actors."
Rajashree	"Support removal of non-compete clause for physicians"
Tammy	"Non-compete clauses are completely unfair to the employee and should be illegal! If a company takes care of their employees and their customers there is no need to have a no-compete clause! My son works for a company and had to sign a non compete clause. He is being paid below the standard pay for his position and has been offered better paying jobs but is unable to accept them due to this clans. Please do away with this clause."

CATHERINE	"I support banning non-compete clauses. I am currently employed with a non-compete clause in the healthcare field and unable to leave my company due to that reason unless I switch careers. I have not receive any raises despite rising inflation. Competing companies are offering positions making 15% more than my current salary."
Troy	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. I was a victim of a misapplied non-compete contract clause and know first-hand the damaging effects. Not only did that harm me in pursuing my profession, but it had a negative impact on the people in my community - they lost the services of a medical specialist. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."

New Hampshire | Statewide Impact

	"I'd like to voice my full support of this proposed rule to eliminate all non-compete agreements. I'm a software developer and have had these at many of my jobs over the last 30 years. I've always felt bad about signing them because it always felt wrong that a company could restrict where I work especially if I was laid off/fired. I don't see why a company I no longer work for should have any say in where I work. It never passed a smell test for me even before I was old enough to understand the issues better. The high tech companies in silicon valley were found colluding around wage-fixing and the practice of non-compete agreements goes hand-in-hand with such practices to keep engineers from finding better positions. This should not be allowed at all." - Greg
	"This is an essential rule for everyone, including the families who depend on their income. Not only do NCCs keep people trapped in jobs when they could be doing better, they can prevent people from finding work, even if they left involuntarily. When my husband and I were in our 20s back in the 70s, had a new mortgage and a new baby, he was working as a plant engineer for a food company. It was only when he was laid off that we realized the impact of the non-compete clause he had signed. It took months for him to find a comparable job, because other companies didn't want to deal with the legal issues that could arise, because the NCC was supposed to be in effect for 3 years. We were lucky we didn't lose our house, but not everyone is, and no one should have to go through that kind of stress." - Jean
	"As a family physician this has caused much grief and obstructs my desire to work and provide care for underserved populations. I am a NHSC scholarship recipient and due to non compete clauses was unable to continue working in the town I served due to its rurality. This created a maternity desert in the region I served. Now in a more metropolitan area, there has been an exodus of physicians in the area due to non compete clauses that has caused worsening access to primary care, specialty services, including behavioral health and substance use disorder treatment. Employers use these clauses to pigeon hole clinicians into indentured servitude and creates poor power dynamics that influence negative behaviors, dissatisfaction in work, poor patient experience and ultimately worse patient outcomes" - MarieElizabeth

"I work for a labor union and, as someone who works for an organization that both handles human resource issues and is committed to workers' rights, I strongly support this proposed ban. The current non-compete regime is both compromises the ability of workers to maximize the value of their labor and skills and limits the ability of businesses to efficiently recruit the best workforce possible for their needs. Further, the historical disparity in bargaining power between workers and employers in the US means that these agreements can be forced upon prospective employees with relative ease while putting a disproportionate burden on employees seeking to stop their enforcement by requiring that the employee seek relief through the civil justice system, an often costly undertaking. Finally, the fact that NCCs are enforced differently on a state-by-state basis makes their enforcement unpredictable complicates interstate commerce by limiting the mobility of workers across state lines. The proposed ban would therefore not only increase the fairness and equity in the system but render it more efficient by allowing workers to take their skill and labor to states where they can more easily maximize their value."

Muhammad	"Non compete clause is meant to extort their employees. Have a potential to stuck to malignant working conditions or displace the family to go the the areas where non-compete does not apply. I have seen non compete as aggressive as 75 miles radius that is ridiculous. This clause need to be addressed and taken care oft: Will help thousands of families."
Colene	"Non compete clauses create an undue hardship on employees who wish to leave for alternative employment. Noncompetes block workers from freely switching jobs, depriving them of higher wages and better working conditions."
Josh	"I would appreciate the abolishment of non-compete clauses. In the past, they have kept me from pursuing better paying jobs and prevented me from being able to buy a home, even in my late thirties."
Charlotte	"I believe the non-compete clauses in contracts between workers and their companies are un-American and should be illegal, because being obligated to one company for most if not all of one's career results logically in that employee losing some of his or her rights, such as the right to a better salary or better working conditions. Being unable to search the market for a better job at a similar company is akin to involuntary servitude. Yes, the employee CAN leave the job - but then is unable to get another one for, in some cases, several years. This is extremely good for the company but extremely bad for the employee. California has banned non-compete clauses statewide, and it hasn't hurt the businesses run in California. Just look at Silicon Valley, for example."

Suzen	"A person should not be required to sign anything for employment that limits their ability to take a better job for better money, better working conditions etc. If it would improve their life and/or their Families!"
Eric	" Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. As a state legislator, I have also introduced legislation to restrict the use of noncompetes, specifically with New Hampshire house Bill 366, an act prohibiting certain noncompete clauses and nondisclosure agreements regarding free software projects and the sharing of open source software: https://gencourt.state.nh.us/lsr/search/billTcxt.aspx?id=187&typed Unfortunately, the NH House's Executive Departments & Administration Committee found this bill Inexpedient To Legislate. So it looks like we will have to look to the federal government for assistance on this issue instead. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements"

Merry	"Non compete is just wrong. No wonder the corporations want to keep the status quo. Don't let corporations take over our career decisions and livelihoods. Fight back and don't let corporate America get away with limiting your career decisions."
Evan	"As a highly skilled worker in the technology sector, I support the FTC's plan to make non-compete clauses (NCCs) illegal, thereby eliminating them from US commerce. Even without non-compete clauses, there are many other methods to guard trade secrets, litigate contractual breaches, and retain crucial employees. Non- compete clauses have a number of negative impacts: - Employees are handcuffed to negotiate salaries when under a NCC - An employee with a key specialization in their field is unable to apply their skills to that field - Companies are unable to find skilled workers that are not under a NCC - Companies in are unable to compete on a national and global theatre The effect of these impacts is a considerable stagnation, if not a de-evolution, in any sector in which NCCs are used in a wide and free manner. Healthy, active competition is a cornerstone of capitalist markets, so the regulation of this threat to healthy capitalism should be embraced by corporations and workers alike. Meanwhile, an alternative to the NCC, the non-disclosure agreement (NDA), has the same protections of a NCC without these negative impacts. A key argument offered in favor of NCCs is that acting upon the breach of a NDA only comes after major damages have been

	done. This argument does not hold water, as the same can be said about the breach of a NCC. One who is likely to breach a contract, whether it is a non-compete clause or a non-disclosure agreement, will be facing the same consequences of that breach. The order of effects is the same in both cases. Another key argument is that the breach of a NCC is more visible and therefore preventable than that of a NDA. This is a weak argument, given the breach of a NDA would often precede the signing of an employment agreement that would constitute the breach of a NCC, or even more crucially, would not require an employment contract at all in order to breach it. Thus, a NDA breach is more frequent, and just as easy to spotlight if a law team goes looking for it. In any case, the post-damage nature of both NCCs and NDAs makes them interchangeable when it comes to their positive effects, while the FTC has correctly highlighted the negative effects of NCCs to US commerce and technological advancement. US Corporations would be wise to support the FTC's pending decision to eliminate NCCs as the positive impact of doing so greatly outweighs the benefits of keeping them in place. We could expect to see positive impacts throughout US commerce by eliminating them, impacts that benefit both the global competitive advantage of US companies, as well as the ability for skilled labor to make themselves useful in commerce."
Victor	"Please give strong consideration to eliminating non-compete clauses for physicians. This practice hurts doctors and especially hurts patients who lose opportunities for continuity of care. Thank you."
Eva	"I strongly support the proposed ban on non-compete clauses as detailed in Matter Number P201200. I have been subject to them for much of my professional medical life, and in my personal experience they have hampered and/or delayed me taking jobs that would have improved not only my work/life balance, but also my delivery of care. Medical professionals live under a constant, quiet threat of litigation should we choose to leave a position but wish to remain in our own communities. Other types of workers are not subject to these constraints, which are frankly un-American. Trying to figure out my non-compete situation cost me over $5000 in legal fees last year alone. I have heard the hospital argument that getting rid of non-competes will harm the workforce during a time of crisis. This is nonsense and anti-competitive. Hospitals should be focusing on how doctors/nurses/allied health professionals can best treat other humans, and still feel human themselves. I waited tables in college before attending medical school. If I felt my hours or working conditions could be improved, I left and went to another restaurant. In the same town. There was no clause in any employment paperwork I signed forcing me to think twice about my choices. I finally struck upon a job that I enjoyed, gave me a living wage, and valued me as an employee, and so I stayed, working hard for them for three years. This is the situation for most workers in America, and it should be the situation for medical professionals. Please do not bend to hospital lobbying, and instead listen to the collected professional voices here. Non-competes are unfair and should be banned."

Chris	"Non competes are inherently unfair to the employees / doctors and mainly benefits private equity groups and large hospital systems. They certainly don't benefit patients in any way as they interfere with patients ability to continue care with their trusted physician if the physician decides they want to switch jobs"
Patrick	"I'm currently sitting here on month 16 of my 18 month non compete. I'm not able to work in my trade and it's mostly not worth it to work until the 18 months is up. I took a job during the 2008 recession when I was desperate and was locked in die first day. Any trade secrets at the job, I taught to my employer. Why do we allow these to exist still?"
Jack	"I fully support this as a physician. To be blunt, if this does not go through I will be looking for employment in a country more favorable to its physicians."
Brendan	"I am in support of this! Let's make it happen and rebalance some of the power between corporations and their employees."
Kelly	"I fully support this and hope this rule is put into place as soon as possible. There is no appropriate place for a non-compete in the work force in 2023. Employees should have the free ability to seek better employment opportunities that meet the changing financial and personal circumstances within their life without the damaging impact from a non-compete. I urge the FDC to adopt this rule and immediately require employers to adopt this."
Jonathan	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. As a hospitalist and addiction medicine physician I feel the physician shortage crisis with every shift I work. We can't let these petty laws further degrade patient care."
Lisa	"I support the ban on non-compete clauses."
Bethany	"Eliminate non-competes! Allow physicians to participate in capitalism and be able to change jobs without having to move their families if they want to change their employer. No other health care providers (RN's, NP's, PA's) have non-competes."
Brenda	"I support a ban on noncompete clauses."
Ann C	"The freedom to change jobs is (or should be) fundamental. Non-compete clauses are immoral. Treat your workers well, and you will build their loyalty and benefit from their capabilities. Treat them like widgets, and you deserve to lose them to a human-centered (or at least better-paying) employer or their own personal development."
TRAIRONG	"I was hired to help build the company under an employee agreement that 1) I would receive financial benefit if company was sold/acquired and 2) contained a non-compete for a period of 2 years. After helping grow the company for 7 years, bringing in new customers and setting up systems to significantly sales in new

	territories, the owner (who I later discovered played a central role in the Enron financial collapse) cancelled my agreement, citing a new direction (to avoid having to pay under #1 above). As a result, the non-compete, #2, kept me from working with the market that I developed for the next 2 years, so I'm now unemployable and living on my savings while the company will be sold and the owner will benefit. I consider the maneuver unethical, although I believe it is unfortunately legal. However, the non-compete effectively prohibits me from continuing my livelihood in markets that I developed. This is WRONG on several levels."
Thomas	"The U.S. Federal Trade Commission's proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) is a step in the right direction towards protecting the rights of workers and promoting fair competition in the marketplace. Non-compete clauses have been shown to limit the mobility of workers and restrict their ability to seek better employment opportunities. This can lead to lower wages and fewer job opportunities for workers. The proposed rule would prohibit companies from using non-compete clauses in employment contracts for low-wage workers, which would give these workers greater freedom to find new jobs and negotiate for better pay. Additionally, the rule would require companies to provide notice and a copy of the non-compete clause to workers before they are hired, giving them the opportunity to understand the terms of the agreement and seek legal counsel if necessary. The use of non-compete clauses has been shown to disproportionately impact low-wage workers, who are less likely to have the resources to fight back against restrictive contracts. By limiting the use of these clauses for this group of workers, the proposed rule would help to level the playing field and give more workers a fair chance to succeed. Additionally, this rule would also benefit the innovation and competition in the market by allowing ideas, and professionals to flow more freely. Encouraging companies to compete on the basis of their products, services, and work environment rather than on restricting the movement of employees. Overall, the proposed rule is a positive step towards protecting the rights of workers and promoting fair competition in the marketplace, and would be a beneficial step towards the overall growth and prosperity of the country."
Gregory	"I am 100% in favor of a ban on noncompete agreements. In my experience, companies use them to try to limit employee labor market mobility, even for positions that don't really pay much. Basically - anywhere they want to scare employees into staying at a job."
James	"Non-competes do nothing but suppress wages by preventing workers from going out and seeing who will pay them the most for their services. Ban them!"

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

New Jersey | Statewide Impact

New Jersey Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual NJ Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual NJ Worker Earnings

	"As a physician, non-compete restricts our abilities to treat patients. There's already physicians shortage, nurses shortage, and other healthcare workers. This is a free country and non-compete is anti-American freedom." -Emad A.
	"As a lifelong technology worker, I've had to argue with employers over non-compete clauses at every stage of my career. I've never had access to any real trade secrets or propriety information. Rather, these clauses have been designed to prevent me from contracting independently or seeking other opportunities in the industry. A rule banning non-competes would, for me, represent the most pro-labor change in my 27 years as a working adult." -William H.
	"Although I am an independent contractor, I was asked to sign an employment agreement in 2010 with a lighting company for whom I have been working since then. The agreement has a non-compete clause, and despite the restrictions it would put on any future job searches I might undertake, I signed it anyway because I felt that I had no choice. I am in favor of disallowing these agreements because of the way they prevent me and others from looking for employment elsewhere." -Philip M.
	"Thank you so much for proposing this rule! I am bound by a non-compete clause in my job at an academic publishing company. Because our field is so specialized, it would be hard to find another job anywhere EXCEPT at a direct competitor. (I also have a significant physical disability, which further narrows my options)...I will probably have to stay where I'm at until I'm ready to leave the industry, or leave work altogether. (Since I'm only 35, I hope this day is a long way away.) This rule, if passed, will enable the happiness and financial security of many talented, experienced workers." -Krista T.

	"I want to start my own accounting firm, once I leave current job. But due to noncompete agreement, I need to wait for 3 more years. It will be good, if government remove noncompete rule so that everyone get equal opportunity to fulfil their dreams. People will also get quality services at reasonable prices." -Jay K.
	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses...The yoga studio where I practiced and hope to teach, lost their business due to Covid. It was finally re-open by a previous teacher. Yoga studios and teachers were desperately needed. I pursued a part time teaching opportunity once a week in hopes to bring back a stronger yoga community....I invested a lot of my own money and time to become a teacher. This employer had not invested one dime in my newly found career. I resigned after 5 months. But because of the non-competition agreement, I am not able to teach Yoga within a 10-mile radius privately or at any other location....My teaching opportunities should not be stalled, nor should I be held hostage. Currently, I have 7 months remaining in my non-compete contract. By banning this rule, I will no longer be prohibited to seek employment or teach yoga in my community where good teachers are desperately needed. I see no reason for a non-compete contract when it's doing more harm than good. It harms the entire profession and the community. Why should I as a teacher or the community suffer?" -Evelyn A.
	"I'm a nurse practitioner and currently under a contract for a 3 year non - compete. It is a very unfair practice for us nurse practitioners in states that still require collaborative agreement with a physician. It's an unfair bargaining chip and essentially makes it very difficult for us to leave a bad job." -Catherine B.
	"I'm in a Sales job in NJ and I am bound by a non-compete/covenant not to compete clause. My employer forced this on all of its workers years ago. It was quite clear that if you did not sign the non-computer clause, you would immediately be dismissed. The company has raised their prices by multiple times since 2019, averaging 7-8% a year and 7% in 2023. They use "increased labor costs" as part of the excuse to raise prices, yet annual raises for most employees were 3% and under and us in sales get no increase in salary. My employer is using employees as an excuse to raise prices and then pocketing the increased revenue. Please make non-compete clauses a thing of the past and allow employees like me more bargaining power for better wages." -Scott R.

Affan	"Forbidding noncompete agreements will be great for the American people."
Faith	"People should not be prevented from work in a company that is competitive with their previous employer."
Purvi	"This is a great move to prevent the exploitation of employees. It will help employees from unfair trade practices. The market needs fair competition for employees. Also, the length of non-competes like 1-2 years is unreasonable as to how employees will sustain financially in that time period."
Ruchit	"Non competes are barbaric bordering on enslavement. They should not be enforceable."
Bilal	"I was working for a physician practice that was drowning in lawsuits as a physician. I had to leave that practice for ethical reasons. However I couldn't stay in my city because of my noncompete even though I promised I wouldn't take any patients with me and the other practice was open to receiving me. Instead I had to pack up and uproot my family to another state. My marriage has fallen apart and I am struggling in my location. I was basically held hostage by my old practice as a physician who was trying to do right by my patients and my morals."
Marvin	"Amazing Great work."
Matthew	"Please pass this extremely important protection for workers and to ensure that patients have access to the very best care available!"

Paul	"I fully support the ban on noncompete clauses. They are antithetical to a competitive marketplace and place undue power in the hands of employer that hold all the power to decide what is and is not in violation of the non compete clause. In part this stems from the resources and legal teams that employers wield and the typical worker does not. Employers claim that these clauses protect intellectual property but this is ridiculous at face value since intellectual property can be shared (illegally) wherever a person is employed. Further there are already laws against intellectual property theft and thus non compete clauses are not needed to protect IP. Employers (at least my employer) also suggest employee pay would go down to balance 'risk" they take without noncompetes but this is also ridiculous as competition for workers would drive wages up and increase worker bargaining power. Employers might also benefit as they will be able compete for the best employees without costly waiting periods. In my own profession in biotechphanna I was forced to sign a no compete clause that is vague enough it could exclude me from working in my profession at all for 6 months if I want to stay where I live. I have a family and want to have roots. This places unfair pressure to stay at a job regardless of whether it best for my career and livelihood. My wife is a physician and faces the same issue. If she leaves the position she is just starting she will be excluded from working anywhere convenient to where we live. Not mention that the patients will lose the option to keep the same doctor if they like her. Shouldn't there be fair competition in that regard to? So the best doctors find the best workplaces and patients choose the best doctors for them who are in the best places... seems like this would improve medical care more broadly. I hope the FTC does not listen to the corporate lobbyists that are unleashing their attack dogs and boat loads of money to defend noncompetes. It would be nice if the government did something for us workers and helped level the ever growing power differential between workers and corporate employers."
Darin	"An entrepreneur cannot quit a company and invite friend-colleagues to join without violating a non- compete rule. It is up to each of us to decide what paths to take in life. Communication isn't detrimental to a company. Communicating does no harm. It should be protected by law. Doors of opportunity open and close throughout our lives. A non-compete clause allows a corporation to limit life opportunities by restricting communication."
Miguel	"I strongly support the proposed rule on non-compete clauses. Allowing people to move freely from one job to another promotes growth, creates opportunity & is just good business practice. Restricting someone's capability to move because of a non-compete has negative effects, such as driving down wages, suppressing the formation of new businesses & even restricting workers that may not even pose a 'threat' to their employer by leaving to work at the 'competitor'."

Daniel	"As an independent contractor in the healthcare industry, having a non compete exponentially restricts my income as well as forward mobility. This prevents capitalizing as a worker on wages to provide for my family."
John	"Invalidating non-compete agreements will stimulate the economy, support individuals who are laid off, and drive marketplace competition. Pm in support of this rule!"
Bradley	"Please do not water down this rule. These requirements of employment are detrimental to millions of Americans including some of my close friends. Ifs like we continue fail to understand that we all do better when more of us have the freedom to do better. Here in Hudson County, NJ there are many examples as I know there are across the land, and that's why this fully loaded rule is so important. Thank you, sincerely."
Nicholas	"I support the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hinder the ability of workers to seek better employment opportunities and negotiate for higher wages, which can have a lasting impact on their careers and livelihoods. Additionally, non-compete clauses have been shown to reduce competition, hinder innovation, and limit entrepreneurship. These clauses can discourage workers from leaving their current job to start a business or join a competing company, ultimately limiting the range of products and services available to consumers. Furthermore, the use of non-compete clauses has been shown to be particularly harmful to low-wage workers, who are often unable to negotiate the terms of their employment and are more likely to be subject to abusive clauses. This can create a cycle of economic insecurity and limit the opportunities available to these workers. The proposed ban on non-compete clauses is a critical step toward creating a more equitable and competitive job market."

	By limiting the use of these clauses, we can empower workers to pursue better opportunities and foster a more dynamic and innovative economy."
Robert	"Gentlemen, It is with great delight that I have learned about this proposed rule on non-compete clauses (aka restrictive covenants). As a physician, I have been bound by some sort of non-compete clause for the past 25 years. My employer has essentially tied my hands. If I want to change jobs but stay in the same geographic region, I cannot practice for 2 years without facing litigation and/or significant financial penalty. As a result of this non-compete clause I am a prisoner. Furthermore, my employer does not have to be as competitive or reasonable as you are their prisoner unless terminated or you retire. I am in fact paid below fair market value at this time as they know my options are limited unless I want to relocate to another county or state and try to re-establish myself. Furthermore, I must meet extraordinary metrics to receive my full compensation. An example is Summit Health. Now, Summit Health (Summit Health, WestMed, CityMD & Urology Group of NJ) has been acquired by VillageMD. The issue of the non-compete clause should have been looked at more diligently by the DOJ. As the new VillageMD (Summit Health + VillageMD) has a presence in even more markets, it makes it that much more difficult to relocate out of a geographic region (something that I cannot do as I have school aged children). Furthermore, the longer you have been in a job and the older you are the harder it is to move and re-establish yourself. The proposed rule, if adopted, must apply to all regardless of their employment status. For example, the rule must apply to both employees and partners/shareholders. There cannot be differentiation especially in healthcare. The days of the small single specialty group practice are gone as Commissioner Kahn's husband can attest to. Almost every physician is either an employee of a hospital system, large single specialty group or multispecialty group. Many large single specialty and multispecialty groups are owned by private equity, an insurance company (United Healthcare-Optum or Cigna- EverNorth) or a large entity such as CVS, Walgreens Boots Alliance or Amazon. A practice does not own its patients. Patients have every right to go to whomever they want to. If a physician leaves, some patients will follow that physician and some will stay with the practice. Therefore, non-compete clauses in medicine must be banned. It is the patient's right to make a decision on what they want to do if the physician they were seeing leaves a practice and possibly joins a competing practice. Just like it is a client of a law practice's right to make a decision regarding future business. Do they stay with the attorney or do they stay with the practice? It is incumbent among the FTC to pass the proposed rule on non-compete

	clauses without any restrictions on type of employee, i.e, employee, shareholder, partner. Restore the competition that is so needed in healthcare. Make healthcare organizations compete for employees and not take them for granted. Restore the competitiveness in the physician/physician extender job market. I am certain that you have heard similar testimony from other physicians that are bound by non-compete clauses."
David	"Why are hospitals being held to different standard then private practice doctors. This will just drive another hole in the coffin of doctors who can practice independent of hospitals and is completely unfair."
Jason	"Dear FTC, While generally not in favor of additional regulations, noncompetes need to be restricted. I have personal experience with this. In late 2015 I resigned from my role at a sporting goods apparel company to take a much more senior role at a fashion organization. My noncompete was written in such a broad way that my employer was able to use it punitively to sue me for breach. In fact the noncompete was written in such a way as to essentially say that any direct competitor or any company that the employer retrospectively decided was a competitor would be treated as such...In fact even when the employer terminated employees, they were told that they had to submit any job offers to the employer for review and the employer could at their discretion enforce the non-compete, they were not paid to sit on the sidelines until enforcement happened. This led many people at all levels of the company to lose potential positions, while they sat on the sidelines uncompensated. Companies argue that noncompetes protect their interests. That is the case, but in fact they are often used as tools of control to do exactly what they say: prevent competition. They prevent employees from competing fairly in the jobs market. Most employees cannot fight a large company in court. In my case my new employer took on the burden. If not entirely banned these documents should be highly restricted and much more protective of employees rights as they come close to turning many workers into indentured servants. I would be more than happy to testify about my experience with these predatory documents. "
Jason	"I am in favor of "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200.""
Charles	"I am in support for this rule. When employers put in non-compete clauses, they have no incentive to make their workplace desirable after initial hire. In this scenario, employers have the potential to

	abuse the clause to keep workers from working elsewhere either because it is prohibitively expensive to move, or because the industry is niche. Either way, non-complete clauses are an encroachment on a person's freedom to work for whom they want, and in this way is cause for preventable suffering. Additionally, non-compete clauses are an impediment to the labor economy. Removing these barriers not only makes labor more liquid, but it will bring more money into the hands of the working people, who make up the majority of the US. The risk of knowledge loss assumed by employers is a valid concern. However, in many cases, the cost of switching jobs already so high (time spent searching, time taken off for interviews, money spent on networking services such as linkedin), that a reasonable person would not want to switch jobs right after learning all necessary knowledge. They would likely want to stay so they can apply what they learned in the field. There likely is something wrong about the job if an employee should want to leave shortly after learning what they need to know. Finally, for industry secrets, there are other legal instruments employers can use to protect their intellectual property. Non-Complete clauses can be applied too broadly upon the masses not to protect IP, but as a tool for leverage against the worker, creating an already uneven playing field more skewed."
Naeem	"As a resident, soon to be a physician, I strongly believe excluding physicians from the new FTC non- compete rule will be detrimental to all parties involved, including the patients. From a capitalism point of view, America was built on free trade, labor, and entrepreneurship, and limiting the need to compete for better physicians will stifle progress and innovations that would otherwise contribute to the overall profit of the American healthcare system. Additionally by excluding non-competes to physicians, the availability and accessibility of physicians to provide top care will actually be more difficult, preventing many hospital systems from seeking flexibilities in recruiting more top physicians, exacerbating the quality of care the patient deserves. I implore you to not exclude physicians from the non-compete rule, as this will exploit and violate the very nature of the industry this country is very reliant on."
Mohammad	"I and my wife are both physicians. We know many people that work in healthcare. The persistence of hospitals and private equity groups placing non compete clauses for most healthcare workers drives down our salaries and our abilities to compete for better working conditions. Hospitals and private equity know that their workers cannot easily get up and leave and work 50 miles away. We have families and homes. They know the hospital next door won't be a competitive threat because their workers can't work there. This same line of thinking applies to so many fields of work. If we indeed believe in a free market then non compete clauses need to go. If your employer wants so badly to keep you they will offer you what you are worth."

Dipan	"Non-compete clauses, also known as restrictive covenants, are agreements that restrict a physician's ability to practice medicine in a certain geographic area or for a specific period of time after leaving a practice or group. However, non-compete clauses can be harmful to physicians in several ways. First, they can limit a physician's mobility and flexibility in their career. This can be particularly problematic for physicians who are seeking to relocate for personal or professional reasons, or who are looking to switch specialties or fields of practice. Second, non-compete clauses can restrict a physician's ability to provide the best possible care to their patients. For example, if a physician is not allowed to practice within a certain radius of their previous employer, it may be difficult for them to continue seeing and treating their established patient base. This can lead to disruptions in care and potentially harm the health of the patients. Forcing patients to see a doctor they have no relationship with is harmful and should be left up to the patient based on the principles of patient autonomy that employers must comply with. In addition, they are further restrictive because they include hospitals, outpatient facilities, and outpatient offices. Finally, non-compete clauses can create barriers to entry for new physicians entering a market, which can lead to reduced competition and potentially higher prices for medical services. Non- competes limit a physician's ability to practice and provide care, and may have negative consequences for patients and the overall healthcare system. They must be deemed un-enforceable. Please help."
Denise	"At a time when we have lost large numbers of physicians to retirement, burnout and COVID, non-competes only make it worse. Many don't allow physicians to even stay in state because they cover hospital systems that engulf large areas. They are bad for medicine and bad for patients"
Jorge	"These non competes were used against me when I was 5 month into my new job by my previous employer causing me to lose my job and impacting my family. It was done out of spite. Please pass this rule to make these contracts illegal!"
Dina	"Please get rid of non-compete clauses altogether. They are just another means by which employees are prevented from upward career mobility and are often ambiguous and confusing on both sides."

Waseem	"I am a physician in New Jersey - the most densely populated state in the country. Non-competes are detrimental to patient care in New Jersey because even a small geographic restriction like 15 miles tied with general restrictions in the workplace (must live within 30 minutes of the hospital for emergencies in most hospital bylaws) can force a physician and his/her office staff out of the employed workforce."
David	"Non competes are anti-free market. We're either capitalist or we're not, throw out all non-compete clauses"
Edwin	"I wholeheartedly support the FTC's proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses in all employee contracts. The noncompete clause stifles competition and helps employers take advantage of their workforce by prohibiting employees from seeking better paying jobs in the same field for a competitor. I personally have been negatively impacted by the disadvantageous noncompete clause in my employment contract. I work in sales for Stryker Orthopaedics and over the last year have been involved in trying to create a union for our sales force. We have not been able to create the union to date. In the meantime Stryker has retaliated against me for union involvement by reducing my compensation by 38%. Basically they are trying to get me to quit. However, because I have a non-compete clause in my contract, I am prohibited from joining a competitor who is willing to pay double of what I am currently getting. Stryker Orthopaedics wants it both ways which is completely unfair to the employee. I hope this rule is enacted soon. It will help level the playing field between the employer and labor. Thank you for considering my comments in your decision."
Pinakin	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete clauses. I'm my experience they are rarely used to actually protect any trade secrets or legitimate business interests of the company. Rather, they are used as a means to deter an employee from leaving a job where they are being treated unfairly. I am a physician and was previously employed at a multi specialty private practice group. After many months of back and forth the group failed to offer me partnership terms in accordance with what I had been promised when I started. When it became clear the we could not reach a compromise I was threatened with legal action (based on the non-compete clause in my employment contract) if I left the group and attempted to find another job in the area. Ultimately, I ended up starting my own practice and shortly thereafter my former group filed a preliminary injunction in an attempt to restrict me based off my non-compete. I prevailed in court and was able to practice without restriction; however, it required many sleepless nights on my part and hiring a good lawyer, which cost me roughly $50,000 out of pocket. Non-compete clauses used in this way should be banned as they stifle competition and can harm the public by restricting highly skilled workers that serve their respective communities."

Seema	" Please ban non compete clause for doctors. It is anti competitive and gives x too much power to hospitals and limits options for patients and gives too much power to hospitals owned by big businesses. Thx"
Ann	"I strongly recommend the FTC not allow noncompetes. It is so very unfair to workers and doesn't allow them a possibly better work situation and therefore, a better life for them and their family."
Joshua	"I agree with the proposed rule change. There are no trade secrets or insider information gained through employment to make it reasonable to restrict employment within a certain geographic distance. It puts undue hardship on employees and is an unfair practice to make it unreasonable to leave an unfavorable work environment."
Hemalatha	"I support to ban non-compete clause"
m	"non compete clauses are inhuman and derogatory"
Stephen	"Why have them when they cannot be enforced. It just creates stress for the employee if that situation occurs."
Patricia	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently."

	Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Hemali	"There is severe national shortage of Radiologists and all physicians in the USA. A non compete makes this problem only worse."
Sejal	"Excellent proposal. I work in the medical field and when you change jobs you can't really even openly tell your patients where you are going out of fear. Patients should come first. Not to mention there are mileage and time constraints on health system non competes. So if you leave you are forced to move or commute far away, 10 or more miles. It's detrimental to patients and unfair to doctors as well. They keep you trapped and you almost never get a raise. Newer graduate residents are making more than I am even with my 5 years of experience. Absolutely BAN noncompetes"
Adam	"I support banning non-compete agreements entirely and wholeheartedly support this proposal."
Chris	"I strongly support the FTCs proposal to ban non-compete clauses - as we've seen in years past when oligopolies can come together and work to stifle freedom of choice for workers, they are able to suppress our wages and rest on their laurels to profit their shareholders and cost to American innovation. This proposal will make stronger by making our workers stronger and letting workers compete in the industry, up-leveling their skills along the way, is how we will innovate in all sectors of our economy and make America stronger."
ramadevi	"even its included for part time jobs that restrict the employee right to earn"
Brian	"This is a terrific suggestion. Currently under a non-compete myself trying to find a new opportunity, and being limited in a difficult job market is extremely frustrating. The non-solicitation should be considered as well as a wage driving tactic."

Curt	"Dear FTC, I am writing to express my support for ending non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements are often used to restrict the mobility of workers and limit their ability to find better job opportunities. This can have a negative impact on the economy, as it reduces the number of available jobs and limits the ability of workers to find better wages and working conditions. Non-compete agreements also limit the ability of businesses to innovate and compete in the marketplace. By preventing workers from taking their skills and knowledge to other companies, businesses are unable to benefit from the new ideas and perspectives that come with a more diverse workforce. Finally, non-compete agreements can be used to unfairly limit the rights of workers. By preventing workers from leaving their current job, employers can use non-compete agreements to keep workers in positions of low pay and poor working conditions. For these reasons, I believe that non-compete agreements should be eliminated. Doing so would create a more competitive and innovative economy, while also protecting the rights of workers. In my current situation, I brought my clients whom I've known and worked with for years to my previous company, clients which my previous employer never had. After multiple quality issues and damaging my reputation with my clients I decided to leave that company and join a new company that can better service my clients. However, my previous employer now states these clients are theirs and I am violating my non-solicit agreement by continuing the 10 + year relationship I have worked hard for servicing my clients. This is completely unfair and unjust. If my previous employer would have introduced me to these clients or had a previous relationship I would understand, but this is not the case. My clients no longer wish to use my previous company as a supplier, and they want to continue to work with me, but the lethal threats from my previous employer make all of this very uncomfortable. No one wins here now. Sincerely, CC"
Matthew	"While working as a part-time tutor, I was made to sign a non-compete agreement that was very unfair. The agreement prevented me from working in towns near the tutoring center. The agreement included many towns that were quite far away from the center, and even included towns from which the center never had any students from. This is very unfair to people trying to make money, especially during trying times. The center was in Parsippany, NJ, but included towns, such as Denville, NJ and Fairfield, NJ, which were way out of the scope of the tutoring center's student base. I was present when the owner was discussing this with a tutor who was also a lawyer (I was able to hear them through thin walls.). He insisted that this agreement was way out of scope but she went ahead with it anyway. I doubt that this agreement would have held up in court. That said, it is a usual intimidation tactic that employers can use. Additionally, the owner tried to keep me on as essentially an unutilized employee solely to keep the non-compete current. This is another intimidation and unethical use of non-compete agreements, especially tin part-time or contract employees."

Victor	"Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC estimates that banning non-compete contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion per year.["
L.	"I am a full-time employee that is the main earner for family and I am the one that carries health insurance to cover my two young children, as my husband is self-employed. I work for a company that is the selected contractor for a University. Recently the University ended the contract prematurely and is terminating the contract with my company putting 400+ people out of work. I have been gainfully employed for 9+ years by my company and have received many accolades and 'above target" annual performance reviews consistently yet I am going to be laid off as a result of the contract being lost, regardless of the exemplary work I have put forth. I was offered to retain my same position, by the newly selected competitor company, at a higher salary, however my existing non-compete is barring me from legally accepting this position. My non-compete restricts me for 12 months from accepting a similar position in my field of expertise, which is what my extensive experience positions me in to succeed in, and will restrict my ability to retain employment and earn a paycheck to pay my mortgage, provide for my children and have health insurance for my children. Please pass the ruling to ban pre-existing non- competes and abolish new non-competes."
GARI	"Hopefully this becomes law. I am currently a physician and restricted from working for another practice for a period of time and must be so many miles away from current location. It does prevent me from accepting employment that may become more suitable."
Peter	"FTC's job is to make sure corporations do not take advantage of the public. As such, I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle

	innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Stephen	"Hello, FTC Commissioners and Staff: I have been practicing commercial law for over 40 years and when representing employees, I've consistently tried to have the non-compete clauses removed; rarely, I have been successful leading to the question why my clients would want to accept an Employment Agreement with such severe constraints. The answer is simple . . they wanted the job that was offered and could not find another job that met all their criteria. More recently, my son-in-law, a highly skilled surgeon, has been considering leaving what can only be described as the "corporate practice of medicine that monetizes a person's state of health" where he works. He wants to open an office nearby his home, but is prevented from doing so for two years following his departure unless he renders such services outside a 10-mile radius of his employer's principal practice location. Quite apart from being overly aggressive, it is clear that the restriction has an immediate financial impact given that he has been offered a position that would be substantially more beneficial for him and his growing family of 3. Having said the that, I might be persuaded that a prohibition like a non-compete might be proper for a person who, for example, is an R&D employee at a high-tech company for 10 years and invented a cure for alzhiemers disease. However, even in that scenario, it would be highly likely that the company for which such inventor worked took a patent on the cure and would be, ipso facto, protected going forward if the inventor moved to another company. To close, people from across the world, from the time my father's family departed Italy in 1905 to "find freedom in America", have come to this special Country where they knew they could enjoy freedoms of all kinds. I respectfully urge the Commission to adopt the proposed Rule that prohibits non-compete clauses that have no place in this Country that allows just about anyone to start any legally permitted business, but that guaranties no success. Thank you. Stephen M. Aspero, Esq."
Diane	"Physicians are overworked and taken advantage of by many hospital system employers . This nde gives these hospital systems even more power, by taking away the physician employees ability to earn a living. They either have to tolerate whatever employer working conditions are imposed, or they must uproot their family and move to a new area. It is unfair to physicians, who already face huge debt from school, and who only want the right to work if they leave a poor working environment ."

Savneek	"Noncompete should be abolished for doctors and healthcare providers as it is a serious public health issue. Hospitals, ignoring peoples health and choices can kick doctors out. Abolishing the noncompete will prevent the monetization of hospitals and will benefit public."
Rajeev	"As a doctor bound by noncompete i feel this will help patient care. My job immobility forces one to choose between the best continuity of care for my patients and continued job/salary dissatisfaction with my current employer. Please ban non competes."
Michael	"Simply, non-competes have no place in our current work environment. Non-competes interfere with normal collective bargaining Special instances can be made for those who hold trade secrets or other IP knowledge, but the vast majority of people who are currently affected by the laws, and must abide with their strict non-competes, hold no such delicate information. These workers should be exempt from the current non-compete laws. I am writing today for my friend who is a family physician who is living through a non-competes contract and the only people who are suffering are the patients that were under their care. In this case the non-compete laws have not only impeded my friend and her new practice, but also affected her patients, who are now forced to find a new doctor because my friend can no longer treat them. It does not take a lot to see how unfair these laws are, and I support any laws that will curb or end these unnecessary non-compete laws."
David	"As a physician, non compete clauses hamper my ability to practice and treat patients with whom I have developed a long term, trusting relationship. As healthcare changes, private practice has become a rare setting due to a multitude of factors. Physicians are now employees of large healthcare organizations or private equity groups. Often, both of these entities will prioritize profits over care and physicians feel the need to change environments in order to practice quality care. The non compete clause cause physicians to abandon their patients and move miles away in order to continue to practice. This is unfair to the physician, and even worse for those patients left to fmd another physician or get assigned to another physician not of their choosing. Non compete clauses are solely utilized to indenture employees to large business entities, which in the case of healthcare is a detriment to both patients and the physicians who care for them. I trust the FTC will abolish this antiquated and unfair practice for all workers in this country. David Bandola, MD"

Eric	"I am in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements."
Eric	"I was fired unjustly 11/2021 for declining the Covid vaccine. My medical and religious exemptions were both denied. In addition to this, I was required by my former employer contract to abide by the two-year 10 mile restrictive covenant. This greatly hindered my ability to find employment, and I was out of work thr approximately three months. I could only find part-time work for a fraction of my former salary. Had I not had the noncompete clause, I could have found a full- time job almost immediately. please remove this unfair restriction on physicians, employment, and allow us to freedom to go and work where we please. Thank you so much."
Bindu	"Done. "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" - i's a very important ruling and I whole heartedly support the notion that this should not be there on any of the contracts"
Anthony Tsang	"This sounds and feels like a terrible idea for the everyday worker. Employers should not be given "cover" when they are abusing the workers. This includes unqualified firing and any other related abuse."
rona	"As a healthcare provider, it's absolutely insane that a company can dictate where you work and bind you to them. In this country, we have freedom, freedom to work wherever you want to without threat of monetary persecution. We were the health care heroes during covid but now you want to exempt us from protections other people can get? Have we not sacrificed enough?"
Patricia	"It would be fair to include healthcare franchisees in this proposed rule change- eliminating the non-compete. A healthcare franchise really gets very little beyond setup guidance from a Franchisor. It's a human capital business and local employees& local management are the core components in an operation — no 'secret sauce.'" Franchisors develop their structures as if there is something special - there is not. It's the quality and integrity of the owner and their management in business operations. When disagreements arise, or hoped for cash out by Franchisor and squeezing franchisees into compliance with increasingly onerous fees / franchisees are trapped inside a non-compete."
Maureen	"Non-compete clauses should be banned. They significantly impair employees' ability to advance within their careers, secure a better financial future for their families, and work within the communities they live in. By severely limiting an employee's ability to change jobs, restrictive covenants let employers turn their employees into de facto indentured servants. This practice is simply unethical. While corporations try to justify this practice, the truth is that they use non-compete clauses to suppress competition, restrict their workers' negotiating powers, and force employees to agree to onerous employment terms or stay at a place with awful working conditions because it is so hard for them to get a job anywhere else without uprooting their families or completely switching careers. This applies to all fields of employment - retail, construction, hospitality, technology, finance, government, education, manufacturing, social services, medicine, art, and everything in between. There should be no exclusions or carve outs from this ban. Every single US citizen - regardless of their chosen career - should be allowed to seek better fortunes without being subject to a forced period of unemployment when they try to do so. The US government owes its constituents at least that much."

Ruby	"I support this!!"
christopher	"Non competes make life unnecessarily difficult for people"
Mark	"I'm very supportive of this rule. I've been in the healthcare/pharmacy industry for 16 years and it's very hard to find something within the industry that doesn't hit against my non-compete. Even consulting work isn't allowed. I live in an area outside of NYC and my parent company is in the mid-west (after buy-out of local company), and I could earn substantially more from a different company by finding something more local. Like most people who have success leaving the company, they have to find a lower paying job for a year that is not relevant to their work just to be able to get out of non-compete clauses. And they wind up back in the same industry anyways. I hope this goes through."
Renee	"Get rid of non-competes"
Jennifer	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses for any profession. I've been a practicing veterinarian for 13 years and have had to move states three times in order to be able to practice veterinary medicine. I am a veterinary specialist that only performs anesthesia/sedation of animals. Most veterinary non-competes are broad based and when I consulted legal representation I was advised that I could not practice any type of veterinary medicine in the area of my non-compete. This meant I either had to commute an hour to an area I could practice or

	move from the area. Even to provide care to low- income areas like vaccination clinics, I had to go outside of my non-compete area to provide this service. The logistics of living with a non-compete can be crippling for some individuals especially if they are limited to a geographic area or have families. Not many individuals can afford to uproot their lives and families to a new geographic area and subsequent costs associated with it. Since doctors are unable to leave practices or start new practices, the variety of care is limited to the area and costs are dictated by a few large hospitals in the area. This is debilitating to many members of the veterinary profession and is contributor to the high suicide rate and mental illness in the industry."
Zygmund	"Urge FTC to ban noncompete clauses in employee contracts for any wage workers, any workers earning less than a million per year. This is an Unamerican practice that must stop asap."
Sally Jane	"Noncompete agreements have been seriously overused without public awareness, and I appreciate the FTC's interest in ending this practice for most, if not all, workers. A narrow exception may be made for executives getting great severance packages or "golden parachutes", but for almost anyone below the "C- suite" level at most, it is an attack on people's freedom to improve their situation, to explore new directions, to share the full extent of their skills and knowledge with whomever they choose. Trade secrets are still trade secrets; but a person's own abilities must be useable in any manner one chooses after departing previous employment. Any diminution of that ability must come with a hefty negotiated price tag to which an employee may not mast agree. End of employment is just that; end of employment. It implies that employee and employer go their separate ways, with neither having further claim on the other."
Sally Jane	"Noncompete clauses may have been reasonable in a very narrow set of circumstances decades ago, but they have become real restraint on people being able to change jobs, improve their work situation, and build their career. There is no legitimate reason for most entry-, low-, and middle-level employees to be restricted with a noncompete clause. I strongly support the proposed FTC rule."
Charles	"Do not let the AHA fool you into thinking that non compete clauses are vital to healthcare. As hospital systems consolidate and start their own medical schools as a way of indoctrinating and deepening the pool of physicians they can hire, the abuse physicians and patients take from these institutions will only get worse. Non Compete clauses are vital to keep hospital costs down, period (meanwhile administrative costs spiral out of control). There is NO benefit for physicians, employees, OR THE PUBLIC. Indentured servitude or a "take it or leave it" scenario only stands to benefit the hospital bottom line."

Neelam	"I support getting rid of noncompete for physicians. No other field limits their top talent in this way. It makes working for a hospital a nonstarter for many in my field"
Matthew	"I've often been forced to sign a Non Compete when starting a new tech sales job. Besides pricing, which has been largely commoditized, I never had access to any code or trade secrets and no one ever took them too seriously. The company, based in Barcelona was not paying me my commissions and so when another company with a competing product recruited me I left for the other company. As the 4th or 5th person to leave the company to go to the other I suppose they wanted to send a message and make an example of me. Even though the 2 companies did not really directly compete they sued me in SDNY for breaking my non compete. My lawyers proved that i never shared any secrets and that the companies only competed on one product, not as direct competitors. However, I was restricted from calling any colleagues whom I had contacted in the past so I was let go from the new job as I was unable to perform to the best of my ability. My lawyers refused to go to trial as I could not afford the cost of preparation. I reluctantly signed a settlement where both sides admitted no wrong. But I lost my job, am still out of work and I lost my life savings of over $150,000K in legal fees. Their overbroad, unenforceable Non Compete ruined my life."
Jared	"In today's work environment, when it's often very important to have prior experience in your industry of business and field of study, a non-compete agreement does not allow an employee the proper ability to negotiate their current employment and reduces their ability to seek employment elsewhere tbr any multitude of reasons. Some employers take this to further extremes by designating absurd business territories in which an employee cannot operate after leaving, even if these territories are not completely accurate."
kelly	"Dear FTC. I am a practicing physicians with 12 years of post high school education, $485,000 in student debt from medical school alone. It is standard to sign a non compete clause for every physician in any special team currently. I signed a contract right out of residency and the job was not what was portrayed to me. I am the sole provider of my family and in order for me to continue to provide for them My choices were as follows: 1) stay in the horrible job where I was burnt out after the first 3 months 2) quit the private practice and uproot my family and have to move

	completely out of state away from all my family with my newborn child or 3) change my practice, IE limit my scope of practice, which would require a long commute on top of the already long hours. I chose the ladder and currently drive an hour and a half each way before and after my 24-hour shift. These clauses do not protect the employer and only make it impossible for the employee to can meet a quality of life for them and their families. I became a doctor so that I can take care of others and serve other people and serve my community. I knew that I would be sacrificing many years of time with my family during my education, gaining debt, and going even further into debt while my cohorts are making money and moving up there ladders and their appropriate professions. I did not realize that I would be forced to make a decision between being able to provide for my family or stay in a job that was just so sucking. I have another year left of my non-compete before I can practice close to my home and not continue to put myself in haim's way from having to drive an hour and a half after being awake for 24 hours taking care of other people."

Blerina	"As a physician, a mom of 3 little kids, and a recent graduate, I absolutely think that physicians should be included in this regulation. I moved my family for my current job almost 3 years ago. We bought a house, my husband found a job and kids started school. Now I need to renegotiate my contract (signed for 3 years initially) and my options are essentially to accept what the system I work for gives me or move out of the state. I work for a large system...and they have many offices, hospitals and centers all over the state. Their non compete clause says 2 years and 10 miles of my job but doesn't specify which site, which essentially requires me to move out of state (and excludes NY as well since it's just over the bridge). I tried to address this when I first signed, to no avail. If I decide to move, I'd have to sell the house, my husband would have to find a new job and the kids new schools. This is not easy/feasible and they know it which puts me at a disadvantage. After all the years of sacrifice, debt, and long hours

	I continue to work, I don't think it's fair. Pm only trying to provide for my family"
John	"I just want to add my fervent support for getting rid of non-compete clauses and am in full support of the federal government finally taking action against soul-crushing, environmentally devastating, economically depressing businesses and corporations. We must inscribe directives, rules, and laws like this into the constitution and have the US House and Senate endorse and pass hills that enshrine these types of worker protections into federal law, and this be done at the local, county, and state level, as well. I am happy about recent actions taken by the NLRB, but more must be done to put union busters in jail and prison, from CEO's and other executives to supervisors and managers. And the same aforementioned legal avenues must be applied to forever enshrine worker's rights and protections into our constitution and laws at every level of government. Enough is Enough. We also need a 30 dollar an hour minimum wage and a Green New Deal to slow and reduce the advance of the climate crisis, before it is too late. We're done hearing excuses, and if action isn't taken at the federal level (and not some IRA nonsense that actually increases GLIG's or breaks even and lies about reducing Greenhouse Gases by 40% and expands oil and gas excavation on public lands and pushes EV's which harm the environment instead of clean, efficient, free mass transit), serious considerations by the masses must be contemplated and enacted, which is not the preferred avenue. Christina	"I support getting rid on non compete clauses. Non compete clauses trap physicians in terrible jobs. Non competes undermine under served communities by forcing doctors to move."
Tony	"Noncompete clauses are examples of the way in which large employers use their enonnous oligopoly- market power to disadvantage and underpay workers across the board. Such clauses are grossly unfair and must be eliminated for good. Furthermore, in order for workers as a vital class in our economy to have anything approaching comparable power with large employers, ALL WORKERS SHOULD AUTOMATICALLY BE IN A PROTECTED LABOR UNION."

Robyn	"Please put this to a vote already and stop delaying. Noncompetes reduce competition in our country and impose unfair restrictions on employees, often resulting in hardship or having to move our families. Please ban noncompetes immediately. Please contact me if you would like to read my 8 page extensive, overreaching and purposely vague noncompete contract, in which I faced losing my job and therefore my house if I do not continually sign it every 3 years. If I leave my job I would have to move my family and kids out of NJ and away from their grandparents in order to get a job. Thank you."
Zach	"Dear FTC, Thanks for letting citizens engage in dialogue with you. This started out as an agreement statement, but morphed into a plea to bring back Federalism. I agree with banning Non-Complete agreements. Corporate power is basically unchecked and this gives more power back to the people. We should have more freedom to change jobs. Please also prepare your jurisdiction arguments, as the partisan Supreme Court will seek to invade your regulatory space. We know the court is partisan and influenced by Dark Money. Sheldon Whitehouse has made that clear. Also consider writing rules to prevent an increase in price more than 10% per year on household goods and medications, as well as rules address corporate price gouging in all sectors. Corporate profits must be presented alongside unemployment numbers so the public can more effectively measure how the economy is doing. Look, we know that corporate consolidation has allowed the 5 corporations in each Sector to refuse to lower prices even though the supply chain isn't as bad. Do whatever it takes. Reevaluating right to work laws. Finally, I would encourage you to ban corporate donations to politicians or any political party. It is an unfair business practice to buy political influence because small businesses and normal people can't match that power. The Republican Party of Kentucky just got money from Pfizer for a new building; this means Pfizer's interests are put before the public. It is arguably deceptive and fraudulent that politicians are more beholden to corporations than their own constituents. With unlimited corporate money, we the people are defrauded (i.e. cheated) of our own representation. Hence, such regulation of these business practices falls under your jurisdiction. Between existing consumer protection laws and the 14th Amendment equal protection clause, you have the power to save us. The stakes are dire. The Supreme Court is poised to make it very easy to sue strikers, and they are overstepping their jurisdiction to hurt the public. Use your jurisdiction to protect us."

Michael	"Companies are taking advantage of physicians and sting anthing them to staying with only one medical institutions. Non compete clause are contributing to physician shortages and inability to negotiate contracts. This new proposal to ban non compete clause will be a blessing for both patients and physicians. We need to remove corporate interest from healthcare and focus more on the patients."
Wesam	"I fully support the ban on the non-competes as it hanns the employee greatly and allows employers to mistreat their employees knowing that they don't have many options with regards to a new employer since the non-compete hangs over their head. The non-compete also does not allow employees to help other companies grow if they cannot switch over and also harm the employee by not giving them exposure to other work environments if they are stuck at the same employer due to non-compete. The sooner that non-competes are banned and become illegal the economy will grow and employers will be forced to hire and recruit more."
Marina	"Approving this and getting rid of non compete clauses would be a huge win for patient choice and health care quality. It would also start to address the burn out of physicians in the field that is driving many to leave medicine."
James	"I believe this is a long overdue discussion that needs to be voted into law as it is against everything that is American. As long as companies have protections for client lists and confidential information I feel former employees should be allowed to work wherever they have an opportunity to. I personally have been denied opportunities due to very restrictive non competitive agreements that I was forced to sign just to keep my current job. So I was never given a fair choice these practices are exactly why I started my own businesses and never forced people to stay! I believe good leaders attract good people and you should force people to work with you by limiting potential opportunities for your employees."
Suma	"If it's not fair for other skilled professionals, It will never be fair to physicians as well."

Chetan	""Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" I am a physician, who has had to deal with serious effects of restrictive covenants. One restrictive covenants, had a limit of 60 miles, forcing me to find a job 70 miles away. Another one prohibited me from practicing in the entire county forcing me to relocate. Nationwide the large Hospitals (both for profit and non profit) use restrictive covenants to seriously prevent and kill any competition. The result is that they are able to create a virtual monopoly. 1. This limits the quality and options of care for patients (who are often disabled and poor). They cannot travel long distances to see the doctor who has been taking care of them or to see someone who is not employed by the hospital. 2. It drives up health care costs as it kills any potential competition. 3. It give so much control to hospitals (both for profit and not for profit entities), that they can force their employees to engage in practices that they employee may not be comfortable with. 4. It drives down wages on one hand. This Simultaneously create a shortage for the patients. 5. The personal toll on Physician and their families is tremendous as they have to relocate if they leave the job. I had to move 5 times."
Adam	"The ban on non-compete clauses needs to be supported. These practices ruin wages, innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth. I support the ban!"
J	"get rid of non-compete"
Jessica	"No compete contracts should be illegal. Workers have a right to work where they want to uncontrolled by past employers."

Leslie	"I strongly support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. The well-being and needs of patients should be paramount in this issue, as well as the freedom of medical professionals to serve them without being locked-in by unjustly restrictive clauses of institutions whose priorities, policies and conduct are subject to change. Best outcome and access to care for patients is not served by putting the general interests of hospitals and other facilities before patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. Healthy competition between corporate entities and local physicians should increase the quality of care by all parties, whereas non-competes stifle this additional motivation to provide quality, patient-centered care. In summary, non-compete clauses are harmful for patients and medical professionals alike and give corporate entities unwarranted control over those whom they purportedly exist to serve. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Ernie	"Sounds like many thousands would benefit from this."
Rahul	"Non-compete clauses are bad for patients' mental health. To have to choose to take a job and have an income but then uproot oneself if it does not work for an employer is destabilizing to say the least."

Deepak	"A fantastic rule that will force professional employers (physicians, lawyers) from taking advantage of new graduates with significant debt and young families."
Lisa	"I agree that non-competes and or restrictive covenants should be eliminated' Furthermore, any current non-compete and or a restrictive covenants should be made null and void. I accepted a job 5 1/2 years ago. In my second week of employment, I was told to sign a non-compete and a restrictive covenant. When I complained that this was not explained to me when hired, I was told I don't have a choice. My new boss said, "if you don't sign it, you will no longer have this job". Over the last 5 years, there have been many lost opportunities due to this restriction. We should all be entitled to the freedom of working, growing and moving up in our careers. The only ones who benefit are the already wealthy business owners who enforce this. Please get rid of this and restore our American rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."
Naomi	"I'm an anesthesiologist. As such no patient is coming to see one specifically, therefore by definition the only thing im preventing competition of is my physical self. My contract says that for 2 years after they stop paying me they can still control me and where i can work. How is that legal? As physicians increasingly become employees of large groups these clauses trap us. Leaving a job would necessitate uprooting my family and possibly leaving the state. Can you imagine someone working in finance (where clients follow their representatives and people learn trade secrets) being given these restrictions?"

Suliman	"I strongly supports the ban on non compete. I am a veterinarian who worked for a big corporation and I had a 50 miles non compete for 2 years. I live in New Jersey with my family and young children and I had commute to Delaware and Pennsylvania for 2 years to be able to change Jobs. At least in my experience, the non compete is used to force professionals to stagnate in jobs they hate and suppress their growth."
Kate	"Massage Therapy (MT) employers often require employees to sign non-compete agreements (NCAs). The very existence of these agreements prevented me and a colleague I worked with from seeking employment freely, whether in order to get better pay or other terms and conditions of employment--even though I had not been asked to sign an (NCA) with my employer, and even though in the state I worked in as an MT, Virginia, these agreements were largely construed in favor of the worker, and struck down entirely as invalid by the courts, even if only one part of the NCA is deemed too broad or restrictive. My first spa job was at a private spa. I had already taken 600 hours of vocational training, passed a national licensing exam and criminal background check, all at my own expense, and had given a practical massage demo that my employer determined was good enough to work at the spa. The spa hired me without requiring me to sign an NCA, even though they said they usually required employees sign an NCA, a paperwork oversight, apparently. Years later, a coworker who had not signed an NCA either, and who had worked at the spa for 1ft years, was having disagreements with the new manager, went to work at another spa in the area. The employer said they would sue her for "stealing clients" and for violating the NCA, and she had to hire a lawyer in order to get another job! The spa claimed she had signed an NCA, yet couldn't produce a copy (because the employee says she never signed one!), and that she would be "stealing" the spa's clients. Her lawyer, hired at thousands of dollars of expense, said that not only didn't they have an NCA, even if they did "it's a free country" and she is allowed to change jobs without penalty, and, importantly in the context of personal care services such as Massage, clients can choose a personal care provider and the clients are allowed to go to another place of business to follow the personal care provider of their choosing. Yet, instead of providing better pay or terms and conditions of employment to get an employee to stay, and thus keep those clients with the provider they prefer, the employer attempts to legally strong-arm the employee into staying. This threat had a chilling effect on this employee and to me and others at the job

	who began to fear repercussions for wanting to change jobs. And many of us increasingly wanted to change jobs. Our effective compensation declined during the course of our employment. At no point was our pay (commission per hour worked) increased, and instead it dropped. First, they started taking points off the commission to pay credit card fees. Even though they took fees from our pay for every hour worked, regardless of whether all of our clients paid in cash. Then they started requiring us to participate in quarterly marketing events when we were required to work without additional compensation (wage and hour laws only require payment of minimum wage each week, not payment for all hours worked, and payment of overtime over 40 hours, and that threshold was not met, as our regular workweek was only 32 hours.) Then they started giving discounts, including the then-ubiquitous Groupon marketing scourge on employees everywhere, and they reduced our compensation by 40 percent for the dozens of clients presenting Groupon coupons at a loss of thousands of dollars. Other things reduced our compensation. They eliminated the employer match for the 401 (k). All of these cuts despite the fact that each employee was gaining thousands of hours of experience in the field. After my former coworker had to hire a lawyer to leave, I decided it was time to move on and look for another job. I knew I hadn't signed an NCA, and I wouldn't "steal" clients, ethically. I applied for and interviewed with two other local employers who interviewed me, and for whom I gave successful demo massages, according to the feedback. Yet, in the end, the hiring decision was bumped up to the spa owners at each spa and they both told me they couldn't hire me because of the NCA. I told them I didn't have one, and they said they wouldn't hire me because if they did, then my employer could then sue them. The prevalence of NCAs in the personal care field is designed to prevent employees from having a solid case to negotiate better wages and terms and conditions of employment, or to search for those things elsewhere, and chills the employees from leaving to start their own businesses. This is true, even though the employees are hired with all of the requirements to legally work in the field, and they are not given any proprietary training or information by the employer. (Spas will of course direct employees on the way to set up a room, or the order of a massage service, or specific scripts to greet clients with, but the heart of the work--skills, training, professional responsibility, and just doing it--all of it comes from the employee and their own pockets."
Wendy	"I support the move to prohibit non-compete clauses. They are destructive of workers' rights and freedom."

J	"Please Ban Non Compete clauses. It is Unlawful and is forcing me to stay in a job I don't want to be in."
James	"As a Physician, I am writing in strong support of the FTC's proposal to abolish non-compete clauses in all employment contracts (including those between high-wage employees who may also be nominal shareholders of privately or publicly-held for-profit entities). Unfortunately, non-compete clauses are ubiquitous in our employment. Not only are they anti-competitive and hinder our economic liberty, but they also serve to perpetuate inequalities in healthcare. It is not uncommon for a Physician to decide they would prefer to work for a non-profit entity (e.g., hospital system) or governmental entity (V.A.) instead of a for-profit entity after spending many disillusioned years working for the latter. Non-compete clauses often prevent such career changes among Physicians, and in the process deprive traditionally medically underserved communities the benefit of receiving high-quality healthcare from experienced Physicians in the latter years of their careers. The implied and often written threat of costly litigation directed towards Physicians who wish to pursue other career opportunities while continuing to provide care for patients, as well as language in our contracts that unequivocally and aggressively state that Physicians will be responsible for the legal costs incurred by our employers in entering non-complete clauses against us, represents an attempt to intimidate us while perpetuating existing hierarchies. This abuse must stop."
Benjamin	"I am a veterinarian and an co-owner of a large specialty hospital in NJ. I previously worked for BluePearl Veterinary Partners, now owned by Mars. When I signed soon after completing my residency program I was presented with a contract that detailed a 50mile non-compete radius. Being a young and naive veterinarian, looking to get a job in my desired living location of NY city/northern NJ, I signed the contract. After working for BluePearl for 13years and being subject to multiple manage mishaps, I decided to leave BluePearl. Due to my noncompete I had to take a job in southern NJ so that I did not break my noncompete. This caused me much stress and lost time with my family as I had to drive 90-120min each way to work in a specialty center in southern NJ (I live in northern NJ). The insane noncompete radius was unacceptable but I did not have the time or the financial resources to fight it and this is what companies

	like BluePearl bank on, is that the signees will not have the wherewithal to light these crazy noncompetes. Unfortunately BluePearl is just one of many veterinary companies that have non-competes, ranging from 10-50 miles. I sat out the two years of the noncompete and worked in southern NJ and now that I am free of the restrictions, I have opened my own veterinary emergency and specialty hospital in northern NJ. We DO NOT have noncompetes for our employees as my partners and I feel very strongly that is an employee of our feels that it is time to leave, then we want them to work where ever is convenient for them, not forcing them to travel insane distances away from their family. We are not afraid of ex-employees taking "secrets" or divulging our business plan to others. I am in strong support of the Federal Trade Commission striking out non-competes, especially in the veterinary industry, or at least ensuring that non- competes are limited to a less than 10 mile radius."
Marilyn	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. Amber	"I fully support the ban on non-competes. Having experienced great financial loss due to having signed one under pretenses that they would "never" actually act on one. After 10 years of being with a company recruiting physical therapists, and after learning I was being paid 40% below market, I left for a better opportunity. I gave the company 5 weeks notice to ensure a smooth transition. All that goodwill did was allow them time to file an injunction to prevent me from starting with the new job. With threats of having to pay their alleged "$50k" in legal fees, while being out of work now, I was forced to settle and agree to not work in my industry for a year. The end result was lost income from being out of work, $15k in lawyer fees to simply defend myself, and over $200k in which I was working so grossly underpaid for years at the company before resigning. They use their Noncompetes as a retention tool to scare employees into never leaving or to leave their profession in which they will need to begin a new one where they will not have the same marketable salary. Only a select few, including myself, had the courage to leave. They are the exact

	reason why this ban should exist. There are so many other healthcare workers trapped at this organization because Fox takes every opportunity to use people like me as an example "see what we did to her, we won and the same will happen to you". Noncompetes make sense when an organization truly has trade secrets. Fox would not fall in this bucket. The reality is that the model they deploy is simply outpatient in the home. There is nothing proprietary or special that gives them a competitor edge, other than how they misuse their restrictive covenants. However, no one goes through with litigation because no average worker can afford to fight Goliath. I will never get back the lost income or trauma I endured in a year long battle of them. Please support this ban."
Michael	"My wife and I are physicians and want to support a ban, at least in the field of medicine, of non-compete contracts. It is truly unfair that a medical practice can require in an employment contract a distance (in miles) and/or time duration whereby a physician cannot join another practice, work for a hospital or start their own practice. Many situations may arise during a medical employment contract where a physician morally, ethically and/or financially cannot continue to work in their current setting but is restricted in leaving unless another position is many miles away. I would consider this to be indentured servitude, and is unreasonable and unfair. It is also not in the interest of the patient population nor patients who have been in treatment with a physician for many years and have a mutually beneficial relationship."
Wendy	"I support the move to prohibit non-compete clauses. They are destructive of workers' rights and freedom."

Young	"I strongly support this new proposal as non compete clause allows employers to tolerate lower quality standards for competitive job practices and force employees to balance sacrificing uprooting family for new job or tolerating poor job practices."
M. J.	"I strongly believe that non-compete agreements, esp with low skilled work (but also with high skilled workers) are detrimental promotion and advancement. It allows companies to profit at the expense of providing a good work environment."
Jason	"Please, I really need this bill to get pass."
James	"I strongly support this initiative to ban non-compete clauses. These clauses have no positive benefits for workers, and only serve to keep these workers trapped with an employer who then has less incentive to pay them fairly or treat them right. Employees should be free to work in the industry that matches their skill set without the threat of legal action against them based on a non-compete clause."
Erin	"I was forced to sign a non compete and then was let go from my job right before Xmas 2022. I now can't work in the field I've been in for six years for at least a full year. How am I supposed to support myself? These need to be illegal."

Lance	"Non compete clauses have nearly destroyed my family's finances twice in my life. They are a tool for employers to bully their employees and little more."
Anmol	"I support getting rid of noncompete agreements. They're non-competitive, exploitative, and give too much power to the employers to upend their employees' lives in case the employees decide to leave their job."
Brian	"Non-compete clauses stifle innovation and productivity growth. In order to fight the current inflation environment, it is imperative for productivity to increase. GDP and nominal wage growth is impacted largely by productivity increases. Allowing labor to freely transition into different roles and companies will unlock innovation that has been trapped through non-compete clauses."
Mary Kate	"Excluding physicians would be asinine. It is the entire reason we need this law. Physicians being able to switch hospitals in the same city is important for hospital growth and competition. Hospitals should want to retain physicians and reward them for doing good work for patients. Instead, the non compete clause traps many physicians in a health system they may not want to be in however have to stay in due to family obligations. This can very much lead to a stagnant, uninspired physician workforce. Moving between institutions is freedom, and non-compete clauses bind physicians to institutions they may not enjoy!"

John	"I recently sold my Wealth Management Practice and part of it was to sign a 5 year non compete, which greatly restricts my skill set that would be welcome by other employers"
Ken	"This practice needs to be banned. Large corporations especially have far too much power without stifling workers ability to change jobs in their chosen field. More over it's a form of forced labor in a way."
ATUL	"I fully support banning the non-compete clause in any employment agreement. I became a victim of a non-compete clause in 2007 when I accepted the new job offer and resigned from the company. The CEO insisted that I shall reveal where I was going. The company where I had taken the job was acquired by a more prominent company just a few months earlier. My old employer decided to pursue a non-compete clause where it had less than 1% of revenue from the product while the prominent company has more than 75% of its revenue coming from selling the same technology software. My role was in sales and the lawyers portrayed to the judge that I had knowledge of all company's secrets. Host my preliminary hearing and was out of a job for 3 months. Employers are abusing the non-compete clause and using it as a vendetta to go after innocent employees who are just trying to make a better living. This practice is exploited in the technology field (except CA) as well as in healthcare (including dentistry) heavily. It shall stop at the earliest. No one should go through what I went through with no income, no health insurance, and a huge lawyer's bill in five figures."
Dana	"Dear FTC, I am writing to express my support for a ban on noncompete agreements for physicians. As a physician, I have seen firsthand the negative impact that these agreements can have on both individual doctors and the healthcare system as a whole. First and foremost, noncompete agreements can limit a physician's ability to provide care to patients. These agreements can prevent doctors from moving to new job opportunities and serving new communities, even if they have the skills and qualifications to do so. This can be particularly harmful for patients in rural or underserved areas, who may not have access to the same level of care as a result. Furthermore, noncompete

	agreements can stifle innovation and competition in the healthcare system. By preventing physicians from bringing their knowledge and expertise to new practices, noncompetes can limit the exchange of ideas and the growth of new models of care. This can ultimately harm patients, who may not have access to the latest treatments and technologies as a result. In conclusion, as a physician I strongly urge the FTC to consider banning noncompete agreements for physicians and other workers. These agreements can have a detrimental effect on patient care and the healthcare system, and a ban would be an important step towards protecting patients' rights and promoting healthcare innovation. Thank you for your consideration. "
David	"I have been hurt by non compete agreements in the past. I recently joined a company that had me sign a two year non compete clause. I work multiple hours off the clock to gain the knowledge I need to be effective, so non compete agreement's are great for employers and not fair for employees. If I'm fired all my work is frozen and goes to waste and I'm struggling to provide for my family. Non disclosure agreements work just as well. In fact, I signed a non disclosure agreement with my last company who competes directly with the company that had me sign a 2 year non compete! Please overturn these unnecessary agreements that only favor the employer and causes hardship for employees. These agreements are unnecessary and hamper competition and wages. Today company politics are so bad and employees find themselves in a bad situation if they join the wrong organization or if the organization is purchased and the culture changes."
Syed	"Non-compete clauses in employment contracts restrict an individual's ability to work in their chosen field, limiting their earning potential and stalling professional growth. These clauses also restrict competition and innovation within industries, as they prevent new ideas and techniques from being brought to the market. Furthermore, non-compete clauses are often unfair and unreasonable, particularly for low-wage workers who may not have a choice but to sign them. The widespread use of non-compete clauses ultimately harms both employees and the economy, making it necessary to ban them in order to promote fair labor practices and a thriving business environment."

Kal	"Non-compete clause rule allows companies to hold employees hostage. If all companies had non compete agreements signed by their employees 20% of the work force would not be able to find a job in their industry. Companies can protect proprietary material with agreements but should not be allowed to own a employee."
Heidy	"The FTC should absolutely ban non-competes nationally! Non-competes favor large corporations and stop regular citizens from Pursuing increase in salary, benefits, and improved lifestyle. Please ban non-competes!"
Walter	"Do away with non-.compete clauses. Big business desperately need to be shackled and constrained. Corporate amerika has ruined this country in my lifetime. I got to witness the downfall of the greatest experiment. Give the young people, your kids, a chance at a decent life and not one of subservience to corporate overlords."
Christopher F.	"Frankly, I prefer to work with people who like their jobs. NPRM is now used so maliciously a bus driver can't leave to drive for Uber-Eats without threat of lawsuit"

Rajesh	"The hospitals abuse the non compete clause and take away the benefits of the physician staying the community. Also reducing the abuse of the physicians by the hospital systems. This will improve availability of physicians and increase the competition to acquire the best talent without avoiding the talent. Thanks"
Eileen	"Slavery was supposed to have been abolished in this country, why are you keeping it alive by allowing non-complete contracts?"
Jaclyn	"I am strongly in favor of this rule. Employees who are treated well, paid appropriately, and who are overall satisfied in their employment position do not resign from their positions and seek employment in nearby locations. These non-compete clauses prevent unsatisfied employees from seeking improved employment situations without that requiring a major life change (such as physical relocation or an unreasonable commute). It is therefore an unfair and coercive practice, especially given that an employee cannot accurately predict their satisfaction in a job prior to signing a contract."
Amy	"Non Competes are in democratic and, in the healthcare industry, are particularly damaging for patients where they can disrupt continuity of care. Having a healthcare worker or provider who knows you well can save your life. These practices can and often do disrupt that. Patients have a right to continue to receive care from those who know their care and shouldn't lose that. No one wins here except organizations who wouldn't lose their employees or clientele if they themselves competed in a better way by offering better wages and/or services."

Hagar	"I am writing to declare my support for the proposed non-compete clause rule Limiting competition and potential worker opportunities with this unfair tactic only promotes employer authority and limits competition. America is a country built on the entrepreneurial spirit and we are faced with many looming problems that require technical and innovative solutions. By trapping talented employees, bosses are not only stunting individuals career opportunities, but stunting America's innovative potential. Additionally, in some states non-compete clauses are already illegal, but some businesses are taking advantage of workers ignorance and making them sign such clauses that have no legal authority. By requiring employers to inform employees that non-compete clauses are not in effect, this will eliminate this danger. This rule will be a boon for workers seeking better opportunities, higher pay, and create a more competitive economy in general. I support this effort and hope that the FTC passes this non-compete clause rule."
Geralyn	"I am retired so not affected by this situation directly, However, I do not have a college degree but was able to move from company to company, many times to a competitor throughout my career in order to gain a better opportunity and always make more money and attain better benefits. This practice is completely wrong and gives way too much power to employers to keep people from bettering themselves in the service of corporate greed,"
Jon	"Noncompete agreements don't make for a free and fair market. They should be abolished."
Bill	"Companies should not be allowed to have non compete or non solicit rules, as especially in some parts of the country/certain regions, it can make it almost impossible for a person to find another position. I certain understand restricting trade information or trade secrets, but restricting someone to not be able to work for another company can make it almost impossible to continue a career. Or if you're going to decide to allow a non compete to prevent someone from job hopping, at least let it be phased out so that if someone is there for a couple years, they're then free."

Kelly	"I support the FTC's proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses."
Cleo	"I agree that non-compete clauses should be disallowed under the new rule proposed by the FDA. This will ensure workers have the ability to change jobs without threat of lawsuits by former employers. Some employers have incredibly restrictive non-compete clauses, necessitating workers to change states or even coasts to work in the same industry. This should be illegal and I agree that the FTC should end the ability of employers to force non-compete clauses on employees."
John	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" I am a physician who is from Pennsylvania. Due to a noncompete. I had to leave an underserved area in critical shortage and need for physicians during the pandemic and relocate my family to New Jersey. These non-competes need to be completely eliminated as they worsen healthcare, worsen shortages in underserved areas and impose unnecessary harm on physicians. I will never sign a noncompete again."
Nicholas	"Non complete clauses are modern day indentured servitude. They serve to keep wokers compensation down and allow works to have poor working conditions. Any exclusivity an employer has to a period of time of non compete should come with financial compensation for that period of time."

J	"I support a ban on noncompete agreements. Taking a job offer thr an inferior position to avoid the potential long-term implications of accepting a better job accompanying a career-limiting contract is discouraging at best. American society no longer thrives on a single-job career model. Most private sector opportunities don't offer sustainable long-term benefits of pensions and incentives. The population has adapted. Non-compete agreements keep employees from seeking better opportunities and reaching their potential. Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200"
Rose	"My 41 year old daughter has Down's syndrome and she is supported by a woman employed by Med A Quest out of Egg Harbor Township, NJ. My daughter's services are paid for by Medicaid. Originally, they charged $.74 per mile but have raised it to $3.50 per mile in addition to the hourly rate they charge for the woman's services out of the budget allowance provided her by the Medicaid. This cost drastically reduces the allotment to my daughter's budget that she can use for other necessary items. My daughter loves this woman but I no longer want to use Med A Quest. Sadly, she signed a noncompete with Med A Quest and they will not let her out of the contract. I would like to self-hire this woman but am not able to due to this awful contract. I also am employed as a Support Coordinator providing services to families like ours. Another family also uses Med A Quest and would like to self-hire this woman. These contracts are paramount to slavery and the woman is not free to work as she chooses. Please intervene and disallow the use of these noncompete contracts especially in the home health aide scenarios as I have described."
Beth	"I believe that non competes are unfair and not uniformly enforced in many organizations. They limit the opportunities in a very changing business and economic environment for employees to seek out new opportunities in their chosen field of expertise and have the options for better pay and working environments by staying relevant in the field they know and worked on their expertise for years. Please strike down Non Compete enforcement"

Roman	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. I and my patients have been personally harmed by non-compete clauses. After my previous employer made a number of "cost-saving changes" by eliminating clinical staff, we had an exponential increase in near miss dangerous events in our clinic. I tried to fix things, found I couldn't and our administration wasn't interested in helping, and I resigned in protest. I was unable to establish a clinic as I was planning in the general vicinity due to a non-compete. This would not have even been competitive with the hospital system, as the hospital had a four-month wait list for my specialty, and my presence would only have alleviated access issues. Instead, I was forced to move and work further away, a bit too far for most of my patients, who repeatedly reached out to me (unsolicited) via social media and email addresses they found online, asking me to help them and detailing their plight with the former hospital office, which quickly deteriorated further in care. Everyone ended up worse off, the patients most of all. I had to leave an area I enjoyed working. And it didn't make a difference to the hospital. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban non-compete clauses."
Kathleen	"I am a pediatrician with 20 years experience in New Jersey who has been practicing at a private practice as an employed physician for 14 years. This practice does not accept Medicaid patients. Through volunteer work at a local homeless shelter (HomeFront), I have developed a desire to provide care to an underserved population. I have been offered a job at a local practice that has 91% Medicaid patients. However, due to my non-compete (which was actually changed from my original contract) of 1 year and 10 miles from my current practice, the partners at my current practice are not allowing me to take this job as it is within 10 miles from my current office. The practice I want to work at with the 91% Medicaid population services the Trenton, NJ area, an area which has seen the closure of two other Medicaid based practices recently. Clearly this practice is not a competitor of my current practice which services a primarily affluent area. The partners at my current practice are preventing me from working for this underserved area because if I leave my current practice they will make less money, not because I will be in competition with them, but because it will "look bad" that I leave their practice and because I see a very large volume of patients for them and they profit at least half of the revenue from those visits. Non-competes should be abolished as they hurt the public good as well as individuals rights to pursue a job with personal meaning"

Susan	"I support eliminating non-competes. They unfairly limit workers from selling their time and services at the going rate and artificially limit mobility in the workforce."
Stephen	"Non-compete clauses are extremely harmful under the current system and have gone from a legitimate way for a company to protect it's intellectual property to a means of controlling worker's ability to seek employment in the free market for the purpose of leveraging lower salaries and reducing employee turnover. Non-compete clauses are not the only way that businesses can protect their intellectual property these days, and no other option requires the ankle-breaking of the free market system in terms of the worker finding the most equitable deal for their skills and labor. These abuses by an outdated system are the new company-town for the modern American worker. Decades can be spent building up expertise in a field that would be useless outside of that first company because they would be legally prohibited from using it. That is a market-breaking power that exerts an unjust and often inescapable influence on workers far exceeding other standards for employee protection. It's time to remove this system of control to let the American worker work freely and proud again."
Narayan	"Please remove non-compete clause put up by employers. This helps in great way."

Samir	"I am a physician and am burdened by a non-compete. I was a partner in a group when I and two other partners found out that two of the senior partners were stealing from us. They had created 3 different LLC's and are siphoning revenue off of the top. We have since sued them, but originally when becoming an associate at the practice we had a 20-mile 5 year non compete from each office that we signed. Because it was over burdensome, we tried to negotiate that down but we're unsuccessful. Now we have sued the practice over the non compete as well as financial damages, and we are beginning litigation. Non competes have a role in intellectual property, but certainly not in the physician setting where patients choose their own physician. Non competes hurt the communities in which they affect competition. They allow for employers to restrict choices of potential employees and reduce competition. Had my employer not had a non compete, I am sure they would have behaved in a manner to try and keep us, as opposed to cheat us and assume they have us locked in. They lead to a sense of unhappiness without choices and do nothing to protect the general public."
Rajshree	"This should be illegal. In no other profession is it done. Also APPS practice medicine without any restrictions in any specialty without any repercussions."
David	"I support the Non-compete Clause Rule. I am a member of a private practice radiology (physician) group. Like many specialties, radiologists generally get few if any dedicated patients or referring physicians who would travel or refer long distances to remain with that doctor. Our interactions are generally infrequent and rarely involve direct interaction with patients or other physicians. When I joined my group 20 years ago, I took on a non-compete agreement that lasts 5 years, with a 12 mile radius. At that time, I could have moved or commuted an extra 30 minutes and still have gotten a job that would not require me to move my family elsewhere. The practice has now grown tremendously and extends through much of New Jersey. If I leave, or when I retire from my practice (posing no threat of competition whatsoever to the business) I may have to move out of state to continue practicing. Non- compete clauses in many professions, including much of medicine, serve primarily - sometimes only - to compel employees to remain with the company unless and until conditions are such that the employee can relocate their family elsewhere. This frequently occurs in situations where the employee poses no reasonable threat to the business's viability. On a bigger scale, this makes the entire environment less competitive and less efficient. This asymmetry is not good for the local or national economy and very, often places onerous burdens on employees with no real value to the business imposing the non-compete clause."

Arthur	"I would not be able to get a job immediately if burdened with a non-complete"
Rachel	"I support banning non-competes because I've seen them cause emotional and mental harm in veterinary medicine by entrapping employees. Employers in veterinary medicine should look to utilize NDAs and non-solicitation clauses instead if protecting IP is the primary goal. Non-competes protect the employer and often enslave the employee."
Robert	"On balance non-compete clauses are onerous and unfair. They usually reflect completely unequal bargaining positions between applicants and employers and on the whole have the effect of reducing working people's incomes and customers' options for no good reason. Please forbid them."
Jessica	"Some towns are so small that the only place a person with no marketable skills or no access to transportation can get a job is whatever abusive chains happen to be in these small towns. By allowing non-competes, you are making it impossible for someone to find a new job if necessary. It's not enough to say that our time is only worth $2.13 but you also want to limit where we can work? When the service industry completely collapses in the next few years, you can look back on this being one of many reasons."

Andrew	"Non competes inhibit one's ability to provide for themselves and others with the skills they have cultivated with their own experiences. It is a detriment to productivity, capitalism and competition."
Christopher	"Just a regular salaried worker here. This would help many people find jobs easier and eliminate the unnecessary overhead of avoiding "competing" companies when job searching. Not only that, but the sharing of skilled workers across an industry is good for the health and growth of the economy as a whole, as it will allow workers to use the skills they have honed over-time in the positions that would most benefit from them, leading to more efficiency and higher quality in the work being done. In an age where the US is constantly pressured to maintain world peace, it is essential that we enact and prioritize laws and rules that support the growth of our economy over the short-term gains and interests of competitive corporations. I am in full support of this proposition."
Amos	"I have been a medical doctor for over 40 years. Initially in private practice and for the last 10 years as a hospital employee. All of my contracts with the hospital have included non compete clauses. I believe these hinder good medical care and only benefit the hospital chains. They certainly do not benefit the doctor and eventually hurt patient care. When I wanted to change employer to a different hospital, I could not because of my noncompete clause that although was only for 15 miles, it included every office and hospital in the state. I, therefore cannot practice my speciality in neurology and multiple sclerosis anywhere else in New Jersey. I wanted to open up a new MS center in an area that did not have one but could not because this clause. There reduces patient care where it is needed. I know of many other doctors who are in a

	similar situation. This clause also prevents completion for top MD talent between hospitals and eliminates our bargaining power. No such problem for my doctor friends in California. These onerous clauses should have been eliminated long ago. I don't believe this is a partisan issue. It's BIG business versus the people. Please fix it."

Emil	"As a physician who had to suffer from two non competes, the removal of non competes would benefit patients and our society as a whole. The non compete contract serves to keep good physicians from staying in the area that they work and patients they serve and puts an undue burden on all. Some work environments are unbearable but due to NC the employee will suffer because they need the paycheck and they cannot relocate 10+ miles radius from where they currently work. Some NC cover an entire state which is unfair. Please get rid of NC and allow freedom for physicians to work where they want for the time period they want to work"

Ashish	"I agree that non competes should be banned and it is great step by FTC. The rationale: 1. Discourages small organization setup and support much larger players with deeper pockets 2. Hinders freedom and fair competition; the basis for democracy is freedom and non competes go against that 3. Usually the employees are forced into these due to lesser negotiation power and many do not move out due to fear of no opportunities outside 4. This ban will help us create a level playing field for smaller players 5. This ban will help best ideas to thrive and encourage fair competition 6. We should not give up this fight cause people who like non competes have deeper pockets and they will definitely stop this from being implemented."
Justin	"1100 % support this rule change I am currently in a non compete and the way it is worded is so fundamentally wrong on so many levels. They also make me sign my state rights away for the state my company resides. Not sure how that is even legal with interstate commerce and constitutional law of each state. I tried to mark it up and change the terms and frankly said sign it or no pay increase and no job it is basically blackmail sign or get fired."

K	"Please ban the practice of non-compete agreements. They put employees in unfair and disadvantageous situations. In most cases employees cannot afford to hire a lawyer and/or are not in position to negotiate with company. Non-compete agreements not only hurt employees financially but their threat of being litigated is also traumatizing and as a result many employees are forced to let go good career growth opportunities. I have personally encountered this twice in my professional career and had it not been for non-compete agreements my professional career would have reached greater success and I would not feel stuck with an employer that has no respect for work-life balance and has deployed many practices that are unfair for employees. The negative environment at work and the sense of being stuck is also negatively impacting my family life. I feel non compete agreements are form of modern day slavery and it should be abolished. Thanks to FTC and other decision makers for your attention to this issue. Please ban non-compete agreements!"

Patricia	"I was so relieved to hear you are considering banning Non-Compete clauses. I was under one for 25 years. It was updated about 20 years in to make it even more binding. Signing it was one of the most stressful decisions I ever had to make. One feature of my contract was that I couldn't go to work for a company in an industry that might someday one to work in. NCC inhibits movement and growth for labor, putting all the power in the hands of the employer and limits the options for the work force, with real life consequences for the workers - an inability to change jobs for greater pay or opportunity or start a business in a field that you chose, trained for and have dedicated your time too. Workers are not just carriers for the company's intellectual property. They have their own skills, talents and specialties that they develop during their working years and must be allowed to grow. I see that now employers who don't even have IP, whose businesses sell the skills of their employees (like hairdressers) have NCCs, eliminating the employers risk by putting an unreasonable, life-limiting hold on the workers. The opportunity costs of this practice are great. The burden on working people is great. Let employers protect their IP through Non- Disclosures clauses. Let them hold on to their employees by creating lucrative and healthy workplaces. But please, outlaw NCCs. Thank you."
Margery	"Please pass this. I support every part of this."

Muhammad	"There should be no non compete rules. This has to be removed"
Sunjay	"I applaud your plans to ban non-compete clauses. However I ask that you include physician non-compete clauses in your ban. Non-compete clauses contribute significantly to physician burnout and significantly decrease an employer's incentive to treat their employed physicians well. Imagine you are an employed physician. You and your spouse move to your dream town, your dream house. Your young children start school and are thriving with many close friends. However all of a sudden your relationship with your employer sours. Maybe they want you to spend less time talking with your patients and want you to claim through patients more quickly. Maybe they are threatening your employment status because you spoke out about unsafe or unethical practices. Whatever the reason, leaving this job would require uprooting your entire family. Most of us go into this field because we want to take care of people. We want to do the right thing. But medicine has become increasingly corporate, and the care of the patient is losing out to the pursuit of the dollar. Non-compete clauses are just one of the many tools used to make it harder for physicians to take care of patients in the way that they want to."
Robert	"I fully support getting rid of non-compete agreements! They put an unfair amount of power in the hands of corporations that already have too much control over how we live our lives."

Joseph	"I agree and support the banning of the non-compete clause. This has prevented by way of fear and intimidation for potential employees and employers from changing positions for the better. It gives the impression of being locked into forced labor for a company. Should one leave they are forced to change paths o something one might not have the natural skills for the tasks at hand. This places unnecessary mental stresses on the individual. I'm currently in the automation field as a VP of engineering and sales, locked into where I am."
Kaylee	"Pro removing non competes!"
Ahmet Cuneyt	"I am more than excited to see that FTC is acting towards banning those non-compete clauses present in the employment contracts. I think I am a good example on this, my company (which I worked at for more than seven years as a scientist with a PhD degree) decided to alter its business model and change its physical location (from New Jersey to a southern state), I did not want to move from New Jersey to the new location and as a result I voluntarily separated my ways with my company at the end of 2022; and now I am facing a 1 year long non-compete that prevents me from earning a salary and practice my experiences and expertise."
Bhavesh	"Please stand firm in implementing these necessary new rules. Competition is good for both innovation and consumer, not to mention skilled workers losing job making less money paying less tax, and putting more burden on the government. Non-Compete rule needs to go."

Ron	"Non-Compete Clause should be made illegal. It constricts the power of capitalism. If anything, it should only be applied to extremely well compensated employees, like CEO, CFO, etc only."
samer	""Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" on your comment, I am supporting ending non compete clause"
Alexander	"Noncompetes only benefit the company. They limit my ability to even make fair market value for my services if I have committed to a company that then chooses to not raise my wage over time. Eliminating noncompetes will put more money into the hands of workers. I support banning noncompetes."
Nabeel	"Non competes hurts a free market. Get rid of it please"

Megan	"Iain strongly against non-compete clauses. I work in food service management, and in my area there are only two main companies - Compass and Sodexo. If one of them excludes me from working for the other, my job prospects decrease to the point I likely need to move several states away."
Emanuel	"The proposed ban on non-compete agreements by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is a crucial step towards protecting workers' rights and promoting a more competitive labor market. Non-compete agreements, which are often included in employment contracts, restrict employees' ability to seek employment with a competitor after leaving their current job. Such agreements limit job mobility, reduce the bargaining power of employees, and hinder innovation by preventing workers from using their skills and knowledge to contribute to new companies. The ban on non-compete agreements would allow workers to move more freely between employers, enhancing competition and promoting a more efficient allocation of talent across the economy. Moreover, non-compete agreements are often used by employers to suppress wages and restrict employees' job opportunities. Workers who are bound by non-compete agreements cannot negotiate better terms or compete for higher-paying jobs, as they are locked into their current position. This can lead to lower wages and slower career progression for employees. By banning non-compete agreements, the FTC can help to reduce the power imbalance between employers and employees, and encourage businesses to compete for workers based on fair wages, benefits, and working conditions. Overall, the proposed ban on non-compete agreements is an important step towards promoting a more competitive and equitable labor market, and protecting the rights and opportunities of workers."
Peter	"The Federal Trade Commission has just begun collecting comments in support of its new rule to ban non-compete clauses in labor agreements. I support the proposed Federal Trade Commission rule to ban the use of non-compete clauses by employers. That is because non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats employees, by allowing a former employer to sue if an employee goes to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC has estimated that banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion per year. That would greatly help both those workers and the U.S. economy."

Stephanie	"Remove this unfair clause, it affects physician livelihood in their neighborhoods!"
Kanad	"The AHA wants the benefits of physicians expertise but treat them like property. The non compete clause must extend to physicians"
Jodi	"Done. "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" Non compete is grossly unfair to physicians who strive to care of patients and should not be limited by non compete but the level of service they provide to people. ."
Kim	"Physicians, as much as any other profession, should not be limited by restrictive covenants as it reduces availability to patients of skilled professionals; especially in densely populated states where restrictive covenants can vary a physician from practicing in nearly half the state. This not only severely restricts the physician, but restricts patients from getting the best care. Many states have acknowledged the detriment of these policies and they don't hold up in court making them illegal will help the medical practice by allowing unfettered movement and practice."

Carole	"Nonprofit hospital should not be able to dictate where their physicians can work if they chose to leave their institution. This is akin to forced labor in professionals who need to stay in a community because of family obligations and can not move out of the area but need to make a living."
Hank	"Non compete clauses in the physician realm are completely anti-competition and anti capitalist and are very restrictive to the physicians. The hospital and insurance companies already have a huge bargaining advantage over physicians which these non competes only strengthen."
Nicolas	"Non-compete agreements are manipulative and unfair to workers, especially those with specialties in fields. I support banning them."
P	"NC are very bad for Employees. I have had several employers hold NC over my head to get me to do things I would otherwise refuse to do, i.e. exceed DOT hours, fake logs, fake drivers time cards etc. Waste Management is one of the worst companies with this but not alone. Almost ALL Waste transporters hold NC over both drivers and managers. I have left the industry for 2+ years as a result of refusing to put a driver safety at risk and had to quit, forcing me to go into another field to support my family while the NC time was still enacted. And if you refuse the NC, your refusing the job entirely..."

Christopher	"This is long overdue in my humble opinion. I work in IT, and this is very prevalent if you work for an internet service provider. Employers want to prevent you from working with their customers if you leave the organization. As an employee, I want the option to work for whoever I choose. It does give organizations an unfair advantage. My field is rampant with this abuse of power, and I hope to see that change as soon as possible."
Alexis	"Non-Competes are hindering our workforce with national consequences. We are seeing shortages of trained personnel across the country and a massive exodus in far too many specialties. How are we supposed to move forward with our careers when these corporate jail sentences are chaining us to dead end jobs at the threat of litigation?"
J	"Restricting someone's ability to earn a living in a field in which they have expertise at the benefit to corporations is unethical and downright dirty. Please abolish non compete agreements and allow workers to earn money in their fields. Protecting corporations over people has been a priority of this country for far too long. Do the right thing."
Sarah	"It's clear that business like non-compete clauses because they create an imbalance in power. It's honestly astonishing that anyone can say with a straight face that it's good for the economy. It's only good for wealthy lazy businesses that want to bully employees into staying. What ever happened to the land of the free? it's a foolish argument to claim that companies need the noncompete causes so as not to lose costs of training just to have someone poach their employee— the obvious solution is pay your employees well enough, and treat them decently, and they won't want to leave. Why was that not the solution? Why did companies instead choose to impinge upon the freedom of their employees? Is it easier to suppress people than treat them well?"

Michael	"I recently left a fulltime job and the field that the job was in where I was bound by a noncompete agreement which I was forced to sign after being in the role for over two years as a condition of continued employment when the company I worked for changed ownership. The non-compete was for a two year period and included being unable to work in the same field in any state bordering the one I was working in. This is despite the fact that anyone hired in my role was hired because we already had the skillset needed to do the job. Myself and my coworkers do feel that this was introduced to both suppress wages and as a tactic to force us to stay with the company. Further, courts within the state I lived in were known for routinely siding with the company/employer in legal challenges to noncomplete agreements, which I believe was also leveraged against myself and my coworkers. I also do not believe any practices/protocols used by that employer were proprietary, actually our tasks and practices were standard in our industry. I support the FTC banning noncompete clauses nationwide and believe it will lead to more competition and spur innovation. Thank you for your time and consideration."
Billy	"As an employee of the rapidly expanding online sportsbooks and casinos throughout the US, I can say companies are using non-competes to suppress wages and destroy career growth of employees. This is especially the case for organizations such as PointsBet. At the start of my employment the organization kept reminding all staff about terms of the agreement and how we could not seek employment with direct competitors. These agreements are far fetching in geographic scope and terms. It encompasses the entire industry - both online and brick and mortar operations. Additionally, when it comes to your annual reviews, companies are using this as a way to not have to offer you a pay increase and will keep you at the same rate essentially until you quit. As for the terms, they are typically 1-2 years. If an organization wants you to be out of work for this long they should be offering garden leave. Most employees are not able to afford a lawyer to negotiate the agreement at the end when you're terminated. I believe a company shouldn't be able to ban you from working within your industry across the entire country. This is unethical and the only one profiting is the executives. If they want you to sit out for a whole year, then you should be getting your salary plus benefits. Please considering removing non-competes for employees to have career mobility within the industry and compete for better higher paying jobs."

Igor	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. "
Ami	"How can anyone stop people from making a living. This definitely needs to controlled and or cancelled!"
Kirill	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. It's plainly put too much power in the hands of the employers, and employers have not been paying competitive salaries for the past fifty years."
Paul	"Non-Compete clauses area horrible practice. It completely destroys an employee's ability to get a new job in their field, making all of their experience that they've EARNED completely useless. On top of that, it creates a hostile and toxic work environment where the employee feels trapped. This doesn't ensure loyalty or promote healthy working habits, and in fact accomplishes the exact opposite. A trapped employee is not a productive employee."

Dan	"Non compete clauses cause employees to be afraid to seek promotions and explore opportunities if a company is going in a direction different than the employee feels comfortable in. It essentially bars an employee from being valued higher at another company and takes employee freedoms away. Explain how an employer can be at will however an employee can not be at will due to a non compete clause. I've seen candidates lose opportunities for advancement at companies due to non compete contracts. However I see the same candidates get let go due to restructuring and held out of getting another job in the same field all because of non compete contracts. Non compete clauses put everyone at a disadvantage because they restrict the ability to have free will to choose where to work and who companies can hire."
Fred	"Non-competes are un-American. Our system is based on capitalism, free markets, competition. How do non-competes fit into that world? They don't."
Keith	"Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban or strictly limit noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements I was shocked to learn that ordinary fast food workers are made to sign noncompetes. Either ban such clauses or restrict them to a few "key" employees who possess significant Intellectual Property of the employer. "

This ban will help us create a level playing field for smaller players 5. This ban will help best ideas to thrive and encourage fair competition 6. We should not give us this fight cause people who like non competes have deeper pockets and they will defmitly stop this from being implemented."
Justin	"1100 % support this rule change I am currently in a non compete and the way it is worded is so fundamentally wrong on so many levels. They also make me sign my state rights away for the state my company resides. Not sure how that is even legal with interstate commerce and constitutional law of each state. I tired to mark it up and change the terms and frankly said sign it or no pay increase and no job it is basically blackmail sign or get fired."
Raymond	"It certainly is a one sided clause protecting a company with total disregard for the advancement of its employees. It is as bad as the "at will" clause that many companies have where they can fire and individual for no reason at all."

Rosemarie	"I don't think this is fair to the employees. People just want to better themselves. I think this clause should be eliminated"
Jatin	"Abolish non compete rule"
Nancy	"In the "Land of the free" we must be free to pursuit the employment that gives us an acceptable quality of life towards health and happiness."
K	"Please ban the practice of non-compete agreements. They put employees in unfair and disadvantageous situations. In most cases employees cannot afford to hire a lawyer and/or are not in position to negotiate with company. Non-compete agreements not only hurt employees financially but their threat of being litigated is also traumatizing and as a result many employees are forced to let go good career growth opportunities. I have personally encountered this twice in my professional career and had it not been for non-compete agreements my professional career would have reached greater success and I would not feel stuck with an employer that has no respect for work-life balance and has deployed many practices that are unfair for employees. The negative environment at work and the sense of being stuck is also negatively impacting my family life. I feel non compete agreements are form of modern day slavery and it should be abolished. Thanks to FTC and other decision makers for your attention to this issue. Please ban non-compete agreements!"

Amit	"Do Not succumb to AHA's lobby to exclude physicians from the non-compete clause."
Patricia	"I was so relieved to hear you are considering banning Non-Compete clauses. I was under one for 25 years. It was updated about 20 years in to make it even more binding. Signing it was one of the most stressful decisions I ever had to make. One feature of my contract was that I couldn't go to work for a company in an industry that might someday one to work in. NCC inhibits movement and growth for labor, putting all the power in the hands of the employer and limits the options for the work force, with real life consequences for the workers - an inability to change jobs for greater pay or opportunity or start a business in a field that you chose, trained for and have dedicated your time too. Workers are not just carriers for the company's intellectual property. They have their own skills, talents and specialties that they develop during their working years and must be allowed to grow. I see that now employers who don't even have IP, whose businesses sell the skills of their employees (like hairdressers) have NCCs, eliminating the employers risk by putting an unreasonable, life-limiting hold on the workers. The opportunity costs of this practice are great. The burden on working people is great. Let employers protect their IP through Non-Disclosures clauses. Let them hold on to their employees by creating lucrative and healthy workplaces. But please, outlaw NCCs. Thank you."

Muhammad	"There should be no non compete rules. This has to be removed"
Sunjay	"I applaud your plans to ban non-compete clauses. However I ask that you include physician non-compete clauses in your ban. Non-compete clauses contribute significantly to physician burnout and significantly decrease an employer's incentive to treat their employed physicians well. Imagine you are an employed physician. You and your spouse move to your dream town, your dream house. Your young children start school and are thriving with many close friends. However all of a sudden your relationship with your employer sours. Maybe they want you to spend less time talking with your patients and want you to claim through patients more quickly. Maybe they are threatening your employment status because you spoke out about unsafe or unethical practices. Whatever the reason, leaving this job would require uprooting your entire family. Most of us go into this field because we want to take care of people. We want to do the right thing. But medicine has become increasingly corporate, and the care of the patient is losing out to the pursuit of the dollar. Non-compete clauses are just one of the many tools used to make it harder for physicians to take care of patients in the way that they want to."

Joseph	"I agree and support the banning of the non-compete clause. This has prevented by way of fear and intimidation for potential employees and employers from changing positions for the better. It gives the impression of being locked into forced labor for a company. Should one leave they are forced to change paths o something one might not have the natural skills for the tasks at hand. This places unnecessary mental stresses on the individual. I'm currently in the automation field as a VP of engineering and sales, locked into where I am."
Kaylee	"Pro removing non competes!"
Ahmet Cuneyt	"I am more than excited to see that FTC is acting towards banning those non-compete clauses present in the employment contracts. I think I am a good example on this, my company (which I worked at for more than seven years as a scientist with a PhD degree) decided to alter its business model and change its physical location (from New Jersey to a southern state), I did not want to move from New Jersey to the new location and as a result I voluntarily separated my ways with my company at the end of 2022; and now I am facing a 1 year long non-compete that prevents me from earning a salary and practice my experiences and expertise."

samer	"I am supporting ending non compete clause"
Alexander	"Noncompetes only benefit the company. They limit my ability to even make fair market value for my services if I have committed to a company that then chooses to not raise my wage over time. Eliminating noncompetes will put more money into the hands of workers. I support banning noncompetes."
Nabeel	"Non competes hurts a free market. Get rid of it please"
Megan	"I am strongly against non-compete clauses. I work in food service management, and in my area there are only two main companies - Compass and Sodexo. If one of them excludes me from working for the other, my job prospects decrease to the point I likely need to move several states away."
Emanuel	"The proposed ban on non-compete agreements by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is a crucial step towards protecting workers' rights and promoting a more competitive labor market. Non-compete agreements, which are often included in employment contracts, restrict employees' ability to seek employment with a competitor after leaving their current job. Such agreements limit job mobility, reduce the bargaining power of employees, and hinder innovation by preventing workers from

	using their skills and knowledge to contribute to new companies. The ban on non-compete agreements would allow workers to move more freely between employers, enhancing competition and promoting a more efficient allocation of talent across the economy. Moreover, non-compete agreements are often used by employers to suppress wages and restrict employees' job opportunities. Workers who are bound by non-compete agreements cannot negotiate better terms or compete for higher-paying jobs, as they are locked into their current position. This can lead to lower wages and slower career progression for employees. By banning non-compete agreements, the FTC can help to reduce the power imbalance between employers and employees, and encourage businesses to compete for workers based on fair wages, benefits, and working conditions. Overall, the proposed ban on non-compete agreements is an important step towards promoting a more competitive and equitable labor market, and protecting the rights and opportunities of workers."
Peter	"The Federal Trade Commission has just begun collecting comments in support of its new rule to ban non-compete clauses in labor agreements. I support the proposed Federal Trade Commission rule to ban the use of non-compete clauses by employers. That is because non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats employees, by allowing a former employer to sue if an employee goes to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC has estimated that banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion per year. That would greatly help both those workers and the U.S. economy."
Stephanie	"Remove this unfair clause, it affects physician livelihood in their neighborhoods!"

Kanad	"The AHA wants the benefits of physicians expertise but treat them like property. The non compete clause must extend to physicians"
Jodi	"Done. "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" Non compete is grossly unfair to physicians who strive to care of patients and should not be limited by non compete but the level of service they provide to people. ."
Carole	"Nonprofit hospital should not be able to dictate where their physicians can work if they chose to leave their institution. This is akin to forced labor in professionals who need to stay in a community because of family obligations and can not move out of the area but need to make a living."

Hank	"Non compete clauses in the physician realm are completely anti-competition and anti capitalist and are very restrictive to the physicians. The hospital and insurance companies already have a huge bargaining advantage over physicians which these non competes only strengthen."
Nicolas	"Non-compete agreements are manipulative and unfair to workers, especially those with specialties in fields. I support banning them."
Alexis	"Non-Competes are hindering our workforce with national consequences. We are seeing shortages of trained personnel across the country and a massive exodus in far too many specialties. How are we supposed to move forward with our careers when these corporate jail sentences are chaining us to dead end jobs at the threat of litigation?"
J	"Restricting someone's ability to earn a living in a field in which they have expertise at the benefit to corporations is unethical and downright dirty. Please abolish non compete agreements and allow workers to earn money in their fields. Protecting corporations over people has been a priority of this country for far too long. Do the right thing."

Sarah	"It's clear that business like non-compete clauses because they create an imbalance in power. It's honestly astonishing that anyone can say with a straight face that it's good for the economy. It's only good for wealthy lazy businesses that want to bully employees into staying. What ever happened to the land of the free? it's a foolish argument to claim that companies need the noncompete causes so as not to lose costs of training just to have someone poach their employee— the obvious solution is pay your employees well enough, and treat them decently, and they won't want to leave. Why was that not the solution? Why did companies instead choose to impinge upon the freedom of their employees? Is it easier to suppress people than treat them well?"
Michael	"I recently left a fulltime job and the field that the job was in where I was bound by a noncompete agreement which I was forced to sign after being in the role for over two years as a condition of continued employment when the company I worked for changed ownership. The non-compete was for a two year period and included being unable to work in the same field in any state bordering the one I was working in. This is despite the fact that anyone hired in my role was hired because we already had the skillset needed to do the job. Myself and my coworkers do feel that this was introduced to both suppress wages and as a tactic to force us to stay with the company. Further, courts within the state I lived in were known for routinely siding with the company/employer in legal challenges to noncomplete agreements, which I believe was also leveraged against myself and my coworkers. I also do not believe any practices/protocols used by that employer were proprietary, actually our tasks and practices were standard in our industry. I support the FTC banning noncompete clauses nationwide and believe it will lead to more competition and spur innovation. Thank you for your time and consideration."
Paul	"Non-Compete clauses area horrible practice. It completely destroys an employee's ability to get a new job in their field, making all of their experience that they've EARNED completely useless. On top of that, it creates a hostile and toxic work environment where the employee feels trapped. This doesn't ensure loyalty or promote healthy working habits, and in fact accomplishes the exact opposite. A trapped employee is not a productive employee."

Dan	"Non compete clauses cause employees to be afraid to seek promotions and explore opportunities if a company is going in a direction different than the employee feels comfortable in. It essentially bars an employee from being valued higher at another company and takes employee freedoms away. Explain how an employer can be at will however an employee can not be at will due to a non compete clause. I've seen candidates lose opportunities for advancement at companies due to non compete contracts. However I see the same candidates get let go due to restructuring and held out of getting another job in the same field all because of non compete contracts. Non compete clauses put everyone at a disadvantage because they restrict the ability to have free will to choose where to work and who companies can hire."
Fred	"Non-competes are un-American. Our system is based on capitalism, free markets, competition. How do non-competes fit into that world? They don't."
Keith	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban or strictly limit noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements I was shocked to learn that ordinary fast food workers are made to sign noncompetes. Either ban such clauses or restrict them to a few "key" employees who possess significant Intellectual Property of the employer. Smrita	"I am a physician and am horrified that physicians, and only, physicians are excluded from this legislation. In this time of a severe physician shortage, limiting physician working abilities is very foolish. What exactly is the big deal when a physician leaves a hospital and opens up a clinic across the street? It seems the hospital is usually more worried about lost revenue rather than actually delivering patient care. I feel that physicians are being treated more and more like slaves to corporate medicine. Often we face toxic work environments in hospitals and in practices, and it is terrible to have to re locate one's entire family in mid life just to accommodate profit focused businesses. Why not let the PATIENT, the most important part of the medical equation, decide whom he wants to get care from? It is traumatic and harmful to destroy the patient-physician relationship for the sake of money. Physicians are the only ones who have taken the Hippocratic oath to put patients' care over anything else. Let the physician do his job without unnecessary chains and restrictions in a time when physician shortage and burnout is real."
Amy	"I am a licensed Optometrist and noncompete clauses are unfortunately very common across the US for myself and many of my colleagues as we sign contracts to work. These noncompete clauses can be very restrictive and prevent us from working across large mileage areas in the event of leaving a job to go elsewhere. In some cases, large medical practices that have multiple office locations restrict you from work within a certain distance from ANY of the practice locations, which often translates to a huge section of the state that you can no longer seek employment. These restrictions are unfair and many times employees choose to stay at an unfavorable job since they will not be able to find employment anywhere within reasonable commutes from their home. I support ending noncompete restrictions for US workers. I believe ending these restrictions will create healthy competition between employers, who will need to offer fair wages and benefits."

patric	"For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement."

Melissa	"I am a community development professional currently under a Non-Compete that I was told was required paperwork, but signed unaware of the extent of its latitude. There was never a meeting to review the terms and implications of the agreement. This agreement blocks me from seeking related employment in a 200 mile radius for two years. I am the head of my household and have two small children. My company does not offer adequate or affordable health benefits for my family. This is an issue for multiple staff members. However I have very few options for leaving in order to find better benefits for my family, due to the non-compete. I understand why they did it to protect the company, but they are doing so at the expense of employees with families. This impact on families is unfair and unacceptable. By banning these agreements, the government can directly help families to advance and prosper without needing to spend government resources."
Matteo	"Non-compete agreements are dishonest, unrealistic, and stifle the spread of new ideas in an egalitarian manner."
Anita	"Please overturn this restrictive covenant that limits workers."

Agdel	"non profit hospitals are oppressors and mistreat physicians; main contributors of physicians burn out . They pay them lower salaries than many other work places. In the contracts the put strictly non compete clauses with the sole benefit of them. How are they really trying to get away with the non compete clause that is oppressing and abusive to physicians. Many of those non profit hospitals pay millions a year to executives and higher administration, paying lower salaries to physicians They should be included in the total ban to non compete clauses"
Sam	"I think this is a great idea and I'll tell you why. First, non-compete literally means to not compete which is clearly anticompetitive. Second, this wouldn't simply raise wages, it could also expand worker benefits. Money is the simplest way to attract or retain talent; however, benefits are another way to do the same thing. Meaning this rule could potentially raise worker pay, and give workers more vacation time, better health care, etc. After all, if someone is unable to offer an employee a pay raise they could offer additional vacation time as an alternative. Another example is child care, many Americans need but cannot afford child care. If an employee does not have a non-compete clause they will be free to find an employer who can pay them enough to afford child care or offers on-site child care, maybe even both. Now some might say non-compete clauses are necessary to protect company secrets. I however think large corporations with some of the most well compensated and highly skilled lawyers have heard of non-disclosure agreements. Which could easily do a much better job of keeping company secrets, like proprietary recipes, secret. It would also keep workers from having their wages artificially depressed. Some might also say non-compete clauses are the best way to retain talent. On the other hand many employees could be retained by allowing them to work remotely at least part of the week. They could also be retained by, again, higher pay, paid leave, maternity and paternity leave, child care assistance, etc. While this rule change won't solve the major problems in America, but, it can help people and might even save lives. This change could give people enough money to pay their bills and put food on the table. If this change can save one life or lift one person or family out of poverty then it's worth it and needs to be implemented."

Beth	"Non competes should be illegal. As an ER doctor patients won't follow me, so I can't steal a practice's patients, but if I don't stay at a current job it's unfair to make me have to move if there are other hospitals nearby."
Mo	"As a new graduate trying to look for jobs, the non-compete is very unfair; you feel that you can't leave a job if it turned to be not good so that you don't have to sell your house and move to a different area. Deval	"If you can not have non compete for teachers No non compete for administrators No non compete for nurses But the person who puts his or her self on frontline you guys out non for compete Stop this open corruption "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200""
Rachel	"As a physician, I support a ban on non-compete clauses. This will allow me to continue taking care of members of my community in need even if I choose to change employers. Americans deserve the freedom to choose where they work, and to work in their own communities."

Sunil	"I would like to see the non compete clause gone for all employed physicians. This causes a significant burden on physicians and limits competition and pay. In our location, the hospital group's mandated a non compete for 2 counties... so if leave you have to uproot your family, leave your friend circle, change kids school or leave family behind. The other Opium. Is over an hour commute each side daily and this limits family time with your loved one. What fairness is this?"
E.	"I strongly support getting rid of non-compete clauses in workers' contracts. People need to have the freedom to pursue better jobs if they can get them."
Catherine	"I urge the Commissioners to vote YES on the Non-Compete Clause Rule. So many laws favor employers over employees, and this is one of the most egregious. It harms recently-terminated or -resigned employees by imposing ludicrous restrictions on their next employment opportunities, and it harms all workers in industries that use these unneeded, sinister rules by punishing workers who leave, thus disincentivizing workers from finding better pay or conditions, thus allowing employers to keep pay low and conditions barely acceptable. Millions of Americans are harmed by these "non-compete agreements"; it's time that stopped. Please vote YES on the Non-Compete Clause Rule. Thank you."
John	"Non-compete clauses should not be allowed if the annual cash salary is less than one million dollars."

Katarzyna	"I am sure you know this: general non-compete clauses, especially for low-paid employees, are a tool to keep wages low and prevent employees from leaving in search of a better position elsewhere - therefore they are anti-competitive, and un-American. In a capitalist society, we are supposed to be free to trade what we have: in the case of employees, trade time and skills for money paid by the employer. Non-compete clauses severely limit that right, tilting the balance of power in the marketplace towards the employer. Non-competes depress economic activity and take away bargaining rights from the employees. I am sure you will be under enormous pressure from the Chamber of Commerce and other lobbyists to keep them. They have more power, and more incentive, to lobby for them. Millions of Americans suffer as a result. I am a naturalized American citizen. America's freedom was what made me apply for the US citizenship. The proliferation of non-compete clauses in regular employment contracts undermines core American values. I really hope that we will now see America's political institutions (well, an executive agency of the US government) do the right thing and eliminate them."
M	"As a physician, I strongly support the proposal to ban noncompete clauses. Healthcare management has changed in recent years and as medical practices have been acquired by PE and VC, physicians have been hit with extremely restrictive noncompete agreements. This has left me personally feeling trapped, forced to continue working for a company that I do not feel is in my best interest. Due to the threat of noncompete clause enforcement, I am completely unable to improve my working conditions by changing jobs, opening my own practice or even reverting to the private practice model we once used. We are completely beholden to the PE-owned management companies who continue to cut into the profits of physicians and medical practitioners. I do not feel that these companies should have any right to impede my use of my own medical education and skills as a doctor. I pursued and developed this skill set prior to working for the company, and I am still, individually, working to pay off the loans for that education."
Irina	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a

	large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter"

Oleg	Non-competes hurt worker ability to advance their careers, support their families and sometimes simply stay gainfully employed. These noncompete agreements should be wiped out for all employee groups, but top executives. For those with access to overly sensitive information - temporary and narrow non-disclosure agreements could be used instead
Rajeev	Dear FTC, I am writing to express my concern about the use of non- compete agreements for physicians. I believe that these agreements are harmful to both patients and physicians and should not be allowed in the medical field. First and foremost, non-compete agreements restrict the ability of physicians to provide care to patients. These agreements often prohibit physicians from practicing within a certain geographic area for a period of time after leaving a practice, which limits patient access to care. This can be particularly detrimental in areas where there is a shortage of physicians, as it can further limit the availability of medical services. Non-compete agreements also limit the ability of physicians to negotiate fair compensation and working conditions. Because physicians are often required to sign these agreements as a condition of employment, they are effectively prevented from seeking better opportunities elsewhere. This can lead to physicians being underpaid or overworked, which can negatively impact the quality of care they are able to provide. Furthermore, non-compete agreements can inhibit the development of new medical technologies and practices. By preventing physicians from leaving a practice and sharing their knowledge and expertise with others, these agreements can stifle innovation and progress in the field of medicine. In conclusion, I strongly believe that non- compete agreements should not be allowed for physicians. These agreements are harmful to both patients and physicians and can negatively impact the quality and accessibility of medical care. I urge the FCC to take action to prohibit the use of non-compete agreements in the medical field

Chris	“Just because you can do something does not mean that you should do something. Attempting to take the ability of a person to make a living caring for another human being is absolutely reprehensible, akin to killing a mosquito with a hammer Non-competes should be abolished completely unless compensation at the current rate of pay is offered and accepted. Otherwise its just legal bullying.”
Cris	The overall nature and goal of this proposed rule is respectable and understood but requires careful and delicate balance currently absent. Blanket removal of a non-compete is extremely tumultuous and perilous to the balances of the free market economy. Low-skilled entry-level workers being prevented from taking on like kind of jobs is the problem at the core and where this legislation should focus. However, many states already look down on overly bearing non-competes and in some they are almost entirely unenforceable. The main parameters that should be considered are as follows: 1. Does the non-compete apply to a worker making less than $50,000? 2. Is the employee that it is being applied to working in a very general capacity and not hired for any specific special skill? 3. Time: Is the non-compete effective as soon as the employee works the first day? 4. Is the NC over 100 miles radius? 5. Is the NC overly general and simply stating cannot work in the exact function or role? Non-competes with the above elements are the problem and probably the basis of this proposed rule. To the contrary, what if a business has a NC that simply states an executive of over 1 year tenure cannot SPECIFICALLY work for any competitor within a 25 mile radius and may not disclose specific proprietary and sensitive company information, or cannot elicit this particular list of current clients or clients of a certain revenue to a competitor. Without these kinds of considerations such a rule or overly broad ban would bring serious economic and socioeconomic adversity to unmeasurable magnitude. Sonic common-sense consideration and exclusions/provisions should carefully be brought into account.

Billy	"As an employee of the rapidly expanding online sportsbooks and casinos throughout the US, I can say companies are using non-competes to suppress wages and destroy career growth of employees. This is especially the case for organizations such as PointsBet. At the start of my employment the organization kept reminding all staff about terms of the agreement and how we could not seek employment with direct competitors. These agreements are far fetching in geographic scope and terms. It encompasses the entire industry - both online and brick and mortar operations. Additionally, when it comes to your annual reviews, companies are using this as a way to not have to offer you a pay increase and will keep you at the same rate essentially until you quit. As for the terms, they are typically 1-2 years. If an organization wants you to be out of work for this long they should be offering garden leave. Most employees are not able to afford a lawyer to negotiate the agreement at the end when you're terminated. I believe a company shouldn't be able to ban you from working within your industry across the entire country. This is unethical and the only one profiting is the executives. If they want you to sit out for a whole year, then you should be getting your salary plus benefits. Please considering removing non-competes for employees to have career mobility within the industry and compete for better higher paying jobs."

Alexis	"As a victim of a healthcare based non-compete, I wholeheartedly support the proposed ban on these corporate traps. Like many new graduates in the medical field, I signed on with a company who made numerous empty promises. One of which regarded the non-compete clause which stated; "You are prohibited from being employed 50 miles from any hospital or surgical center served on behalf of the company for a term of 18 months". What I was not prepared for, was the company's strategic increase in facilities which I was to perform services under this contract. In the short span of 2 years, I did Neurophysiological monitoring for 24 facilities, making my expertise, experience, and license unusable in five states. Three of which I never personally stepped foot into. When working conditions fell apart regardless of my requests for adequate sleep following 36 hours straight of working on call at my designated stroke hospital, time for meals or breaks within 18+ hour work days, and a reasonable travel distance within the area the company demanded I relocate to, I was met with threats from HR regarding my non-compete if I were to leave. When the company cut my salary in half without my consent and requested to leave in search of a living wage suitable for paying my new rent within company's demanded on-call radius, I was again met with threats from HR. My contracted salary breach on the company's fault was not enough to protect me from corporate greed. Working conditions became so intense, I was placed on migraine medications at the recommendations of my doctor and require I three separate trips in the ER for medical conditions related to stress, inability to eat or drink while tied within tens of hours long surgeries, and pain from transporting equipment between many hospitals, up to 2 or 3 facilities a DAY. Again, as my health deteriorated under intense working conditions, I requested to be released from the company in face of the company's numerous contract breaches. Again I was met with threats from HR and now their legal team. I was a licensed and experienced professional in a field that currently only has a few thousand active working personnel across the country and I was limited in my capacity to serve my local community. This is a failure of the health system we are seeing across the country as medical professionals are leaving their respective fields in droves. Personally, I was forced out of Neurophysiology into a similar field that will not cover my required continuing education credits. Meaning, when my non-compete is over, I will effectively be license-less. This single company has cost the entire medical community a valuable member and this is NOT a unique situation. Non-competes make experience, licenses, education and hard earned degrees, expensive residencies/trainings. and so much more absolutely invalid. I have seen firsthand the beginnings of this fallout and the repercussions on the quality of healthcare as a whole. It also holds employees in stagnant wages, unable to attain better

opportunities and perpetuates horrendous working conditions. While I understand the value companies seek to retain by enacting non-competes, they have been aloud to monopolize specialties which increases prices directly to the consumer. Additionally, Professionals should not need to completely leave their heard earned credentials or move across the country to continue serving their local communities. In the end, Non-Competes are the reason these systems are failing. While corporations might make some extra money, is it worth the cost of professions as a whole? Is it worth condoning the working conditions these companies have gotten away with, because their employees have no other options?"

juan	"I am a professor of mathematics at a University, 79 years old, and live in New Jersey, after having lived in Uruguay and then in Venezuela for many years. I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses proposed by the FTC. Such clauses are unfair to us workers in all fields; they hold down worker's salaries and favor big corporations. The proposed policy is a step in the right direction."

New Mexico | Statewide Impact

New Mexico Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual NM Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual NM Worker Earnings

	"As an educator and a mom, I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!" - Mary
	"Please hear my voice as a 74 year old Veteran. I very strongly support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The incontrovertible fact is that non-compete clauses are very, very bad medicine. I urge in the strongest possible terms that the FTC should adopt the proposal to ban them." - Jeffrey
	"I am writing in SUPPORT of the proposed rule as it relates to Veterinary Medicine in southern New Mexico. In the Dona Anna area of southern New Mexico Veterinary care is scarce. We rate as 12 on the scale of 1-100 in accessibility to care- -which falls in the " nearly inaccessible" range. I belong to an organization attempting to build consortiums of care with existing Veterinarians, where they would each agree to cover on part time basis the uncovered areas of Dona Anna. However, they all state they cannot due to having signed a non-compete. The non-compete is restraining their fair exercise of their practice of veterinary medicine for an area of over 80,000 households. This inability to access routine Veterinary care caused by the non-competes, causes animal abandonment, animal euthanasia, and dog and cat uncontrolled growth. Access to routine care for animals needs to be provided and the non-compete used in our area is prohibiting the building of consortiums of Veterinarians to do just that. I strongly urge the passing of the proposed rule" - Michael
	"I work for a home health care agency employed as a home healthcare community liaison. I am subjugated to a non-compete contract. Unfortunately for me, my work environment is horrible and I would love to be leave and be able to work in the field I am knowledgeable in. I am forced to continue to work in a toxic work environment where my direct supervisor is very abusive." - Jay

Justin	"Noncompetes make it extremely difficult for physicians to practice without the potential of having to uproot their family if they move jobs. This is unnecessary and completely archaic. In New Mexico, we already have a shortage of physicians. We are luckily a state that make non-competes unenforceable. This should be done at the national level."
Alexander	"Non competes are unfair and asymmetrical. They create an unfair power dynamic where an employer can force an employee to move away from their property, friends, family, and support in order to leave a toxic work environment. These agreements always hann the employee. As a physician, large healthcare systems enforce noncompetes that can encompass an entire state if they prevent a physician from working within x miles of any facility owned by a huge healthcare conglomerate. This drives more physicians out of the profession and worsens the availability of healthcare. I fully support abolishing noncompetes as an uncompetitive and anti-worker entity."
Janessia	"I am working under a noncompete here in the state of New Mexico. I see no future for advancement, increase in my wage and unrealistic expectations. I have received multiple offers to do my specialty in the community. The offers are for other companies in the same field that I am in. The offers from other competitors are more money and advancement position. I tried to bring light to my employer and they quickly advised of my non compete. I bring a lot of business to the company I am employed with but I work a 90hr plus work week every week. My employer even has me working, sending emails to internal staff and customers. I want to advance and help but I feel trapped. So trapped that I have my primary care doctor and specialist doctors writing letters to my employer to decrease work hours."
Janessia	"Noncompetes enable skilled talent to work. Employers become very intolerable and hard to work with no chances of promotions or ability to grow in a career. Employers begin to harass and become very hateful just because I left their hostile toxic workplace."
SHELBY	"Non-competes hurt healthcare. Particularly when it comes to hospitalists, radiologists, pathologists and other specialties that do not necessarily rely on marketing or loyal patient base to service a community. If I leave my practice (it's a toxic group that is slowly decaying due to some vicious and greedy older partners) I have to sell my house and leave the state. 2 other partners have had to do so this year. Rather, we would prefer to work at another group in town with better corporate practices and higher quality patient care opportunities. The older partners always remind us that the group is required to sue anyone that takes another position within 50 miles for a 2 year period. It feels terrible to have to keep working with them, and I think the group would quickly dissolve (or be forced to quickly improve its practices) if does had the option to leave and work elsewhere in town. Thanks for your consideration. Shelby Bennett, M.D."

Rhonda	"Ban non-compete"
Rhonda	"BAN NON-COMPETES"
Ella	"I write to speak against non compete clauses, as I believe a contract between employer and employee should extend only for the duration of the employment. A worker cannot make demands on a company beyond their duration of employment. These clauses prevent healthy competition and entrepreneurship."
Justin	"Please stop the use of NTC! NDA and IP laws protect the interests of businesses. NTC just suppress wages and advancement of the people."
Sean	"I am a medical coder that is affected by a non-compete agreement. There is very little information in the coding field that is proprietary to one company. Non-compete agreements are harmful to employees who wish to leave a company and work for any other organization. Coding companies in the Physician Revenue Cycle are often nationwide and this unfairly limits employment for coders."
ellyn	"Absolutely need to get rid of the Non- Compete Clause. It is unfair to the employee seeking new employment with little damage to the employer in comparison."
MELISSA	"As a veterinarian, non-compete clauses are industry standard. The majority of non competes prevent veterinarians from working for 2 years within a 5 mile radius. I commute 45 minutes a day now to be out of non compete range and I currently work as a private contractor providing relief services to avoid signing yet another contract with a non compete. With the huge shortage of veterinarians in our country, eliminating non compete clauses will help keep veterinarians employed in their home communities. I fully support ending non compete clauses in workplace contracts."
Rob	"I've been an IT consultant for over 20 years and have at times worked for employers in between being involved in startup companies. Non-compete and non- solicitation agreements being forced upon me have stunted my ability to pursue relationships with clients that I myself cultivated for employers, after leaving to start my own business. Sometimes, due to be laid off by the employer in question. These agreements should have never been allowed in the first place and eliminating them now will absolutely allow startup companies to be more successful. Professionals should be permitted to call on former clients and caplitalize on established trust, no matter where or for whom they are working Furthermore, employers use these agreements almost as a form of extortion, as requirements to be hired. Sign it or you can't have the job, oh and by the way it lasts for 2 years after you leave our employ. So if we let you go, you can't

	compete with us. Asinine and par for the course. Also, the agreements are used as bait for signing severance pay agreements after being laid off. Dispicable. Ultimately, it is a form of intimidation perpetrated on people just trying to earn a living and create opportunities and jobs for others. These agreements are not agreements at all. They are unfair tactics only available to corporations with attorneys orchestrating threatening language designed to inhibit people from positively impacting our society and economy, and they should be made illegal. Where do I sign. This is LONG overdue."
beth	"Time to do away with the non-compete clause! Why should industry have a say over an individual's choice of employment? The law has for too long sided with the owning class against the interests of workers. The non compete clause serves to keep wages artificially suppressed so that business owners can rip off their workers. It's got to go!"
Leah	"Non-competes are hurting American workers, our economy and our citizens. They are a way for companies to keep wages and benefits low and punish employees who look for what they deserve in compensation. These clauses lock talented workers, who want to work, out of the marketplace. This is nonsensical and only hurt small businesses and communities. Please prioritize workers and communities over big business interests and ban non-compete clauses. Thank you"
Sara	"Please get rid of this ridiculous rule! The power balance is already so skewed in favor of corporations in current society."
greg	"This is a no-brainer for workers. Non-compete rules need to go bye-bye. It's that simple."
greg	"Non-compete agreements need to go Bye-Bye because they have an adverse-negative affect on peoples mental health when they are trying to improve their lives. Did anyone think about peoples mental health? I did."
Janet	"Noncompete clauses hurt workers."
Enrique	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost New Mexico's economy. I know of people who work in the health industry like secretaries and marketers who are subject to non compete agreements. They can't leave their employer and work for any health related employer within 25 miles and for two years, which is very restrictive. We are extremely happy to hear about this rule. It will change many lives. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Shiri	"I support this rule. Our economy works best when workers have more choices, and this is even more true now when there is a shortage of workers in many industries. I am a veterinarian. There is a tremendous shortage of veterinarians. Non-competes limit veterinarians employment opportunities and pet owners' options. Non-competes for practice sales and non-solicitation agreements for former employees are adequate to safeguard a practice owner's investment."

Matthew	"I have been subject to a non-compete agreement with my last employer. Thankfully when I left that organization which was no longer supporting me and went to work at another company, I was able to continue to work in my field without the non-compete being enforced. I was worried that if the prior company chose to enforce the non-compete that I would not be able to earn any income and would not be able to make my mortgage payment, feed my family, and pay for my older children's college tuition. I am a licensed Mortgage Loan Originator, and have been working in this field since September 2004. I started working for the company with the non-compete in June of 2021. Over the prior 16 years I had built up a stable of past clients and referral partners (mostly local Realtors in the Albuquerque, NM vicinity). These individuals refer me people who need to obtain a mortgage loan in order to buy a home, and sometimes to refinance an existing loan. One of the reasons I was recruited by the company with the non-compete was the fact that I had this group of people who did send me referrals which generate business for me and for my employer. Enforcement of the non-compete would have meant that I could not take any more referrals from my past clients or referral partners for a twelve month period of time. That is patently unfair. I had built this group of people who know my work over a 16 year time period, and now because I moved for a new employer, I would be banned from receiving and acting upon these referrals to continue to make mortgage loans as I have done since 2004. The employer with the non-compete did not create those relationships with my past clients and longstanding referral partners, and what their non-compete amounted to was in effect a taking. It is an unfair practice that stacks the deck against employees in favor of the employer. It holds over the employees' heads the prospect of financial ruin in the event that the employee needs to move to a different company. I am attaching a copy of my former employer's employment agreement. The effective non-compete clause is in Section V, Paragraph G, found on page 4. It states that, "Employee agrees that while employed by Company AND FOR A PERIOD OF TWELVE (12) MONTHS)...FOLLOWING THE TERMINATION OF SUCH EMPLOYMENT [emphasis added] s/he will not work directly or indirectly by providing services that involve the origination, procurement, or referral of residential home loans, for any person or entity, including himself or herself, who is actively engaged in originating residential home loans in any county, or county adjacent thereto, in which Employee has originated at least 2 loans in the six(6) months preceding the termination of Employee's employment with the Company." That means that for a twelve month period after leaving that employer I could not conduct the business of my career which I have been engaged in since 2004. Mortgage loan originators are licensed by individual States, and if enforced, I would not be able to originate any loans in Bernalillo County or adjacent counties for a period of 1 year. That would effectively destroy my career and cause a financial calamity for my family. I still worry that the former employer might decide to enforce that paragraph between now and August of 2023. I support the Non-Compete Clause Rule which would end this unfair practice. Attachments Employment Agreement

Faith	"Please prevent employers from entering into non-compete clauses with workers and please rescind existing non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses prevent workers from leaving jobs, they decrease competition for workers, they lower wages for both workers who are subject to them as well as workers who are not. Non-compete clauses also prevent new businesses from forming which stifles entrepreneurship, and prevents novel innovation which would otherwise occur when workers are able to broadly share their ideas."
Tom	"I highly support the Non-Compete Rule proposed. Our country needs to become balanced in the opportunities it can offer for ALL people. The employers of this country have reaped the harvest of profits partly by being selfishly stingy with the labor force in any way they can think of. This is what is killing capitalism. This is what is killing new start-ups and healthy competition. This is causing the uproars we see presently in multiple facets of our society. Spread the opportunities, spread the possibility of wealth for all and we will be a happier country. The insighttUI companies will see this and attract employees who WANT to work for them which, in turn, will nourish their business and free up much energy to improve their product or service through employee innovation, effort, and overall morale instead of devising cutthroat tactics to keep their fellow citizens (other businesses as well as employees) down. Thank you. This could be a win-win game-changer."
Andrew	"I was very pleasantly surprised to see this rule banning noncompete agreements has been proposed. Noncompete agreements help big corporations control their workers, and they hurt regular people. They also sound a bit boring and technical, not a hot topic that I see people yelling about on social media. And of course, obviously, we live in a society where the game is rigged, with lots of unfair and unjust practices and systems in place to make sure that the rich stay rich, the poor stay poor, and wealth and power remain right where they are. Based on the foregoing, what I would've expected the FTC to do about noncompete agreements would have been either nothing at all or some sort of pathetically inadequate half-measure. I wouldn't have been surprised to see a proposed rule that, for example, stipulated that noncompete agreements longer than 6 months can only apply to 10% of a company's workforce, excluding independent contractors, and not taking effect until the year 2028. But no! This rule is legit! It's no half-measure. This rule is trying to actually solve the problem, instead of trying to give the appearance of doing something about the problem while placating the powerful interests that benefit from the status quo, like I would've expected, like usually happens. So who know, maybe there's still some hope for America."
Manuel	"Non-compete clauses should be banned. If companies took care of their employees they would never need these NCC to restrict employees opportunities"

Amar	"As a physician, I fully support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. These clauses stifle competition and artificially limit patient access to needed health care."
Ericka	"I work in the healthcare industry and we, and by proxy our patients, are hindered frequently by non-complete contracts."
Matt	"This is the best change possible for professionals and the public. More competition, especially right now while there isn't much, is a good thing."
Alex	"I am writing to urge you to consider passing legislation that would prohibit companies from including noncompete clauses in their employment contracts. I believe that noncompete agreements are detrimental to both employees and the economy as a whole, and that a law prohibiting their use would be beneficial for everyone. One of the main reasons why noncompete agreements should be banned is that they stifle innovation and competition. By preventing employees from taking their skills and knowledge to other companies in the same industry, these agreements limit the ability of businesses to learn from each other and improve. This can ultimately harm consumers and the economy. In addition, noncompete agreements can make it difficult for employees to find new employment after leaving a company. This can be especially detrimental for low-income workers who may not have the financial resources to wait out the restrictions imposed by a noncompete clause. Noncompete agreements also restrict employees from starting their own businesses. Entrepreneurship is an important driver of economic growth, and by preventing employees from starting their own companies, noncompete agreements can limit the overall development of the economy. Another issue with noncompete agreements is that they can be challenged in court and are not always enforced by courts. The agreements can be seen as a restriction on an individual's right to work, which can create uncertainty and confusion for employees and employers alike. Finally, noncompete agreements can negatively impact company morale. When employees feel that their employer does not trust them or value their contributions, they may become disengaged and less productive. For all these reasons, I strongly believe that companies should not be allowed to use noncompete agreements in their contracts. I urge you to consider passing legislation that would prohibit their use, and to help protect the rights and livelihoods of employees and the overall growth of the economy. Thank you for your time and consideration."
Neal	"Federal Trade Commission, The proposed rule on non-competes is a common sense move to safeguard the welfare of the American people while improving the efficiency of the labor market. This move is long overdue and I strongly encourage the commission to adopt this rule. I broadly support the reasoning, evidence, and arguments of the FTC Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) as articulated by the FTC's Notice of proposed rulemaking Non-competes deprive workers of economic freedom, economic opportunity and deprive competing businesses of applicants; these are simple, mathematical, indisputable facts. The net effect of non-competes when extended across our economy is to deprive our

	economy of dynamism and reduce wages while breeding complacency and disregard by owners and managers. Non-competes greatly extend the control employers have over their employees and reconfigure the employer-employee relationship to a more coercive arrangement. Because I personally have not been subjected to a non-compete, I have had significant flexibility in my career. This flexibility allowed me to change employers several times while remaining in my home town which in turn has allowed me to continue to provide support and care for my aging parents. But many of my colleagues from my alma mater do not have this freedom. But even I am impacted by these non-competes which depress wages across the labor market, which is then used as a benchmark for salary at my own employer. There are, of course, no shortage of economists who postulate that non-compete agreements are consensual, negotiated agreements that mutually benefit both parties. These postulates may have a basis in microeconomic theory, and perhaps these postulates may approximate a salary negotiation with a C- Level executive, but they have no basis in reality for the vast majority of American workers who have zero ability as individuals to negotiate against the policies held by entire industries. I have been very encouraged to see that under the current leadership the FTC and the Department of Justice are finally paying attention to the plight of common people and taking aim at the anti-competitive practices of corporate America. I applaud the FTC for their work restoring American competitiveness, thank them for their service, and encourage them to move forth with the proposed rules on non-competes. Best Regards, Neal Martin"
Rob	"Greetings, Please consider a look at the travel nurse industry. I'm an RN who has completed 3 thirteen week contracts in the last 18 months. Once I have worked for a hospital as a traveler, I'm effectively barred from working for that hospital in any capacity except thru the travel nurse company who originally sent me there. Although I've never seen one, there are contracts between the travel nurse agency and the hospitals. There is language that requires the hospital to pay the agency large 'fines' should the hospital hire a nurse who previously worked there thru the agency. Note that the hourly wage for agency nurses is higher, but the benefits and security are far inferior. Gracias,"
Melba	"Noncompetes limits employees from finding better work environments and more pay. It empowers the employers to treat workers unfairly and forcing them to work in toxic work conditions. Also it suppresses wages. Please ban noncompete contracts"
Guillermo	"I want to thank the people behind this effort. It helps those in a low socio-economic state to look for job offers that make the most sense for them. This gives the citizens rights that companies have been trying to remove for years. Thank you"
Kester	"I am a retired lawyer. I represented many small businesses some of which requested I, as their lawyer, prepare noncompete agreements for their use as part of the employment agreement between them, as employer, and their existing and prospective employees. Uniformly, these clients/employers were seeking to

	stop employees from using the power of their freedom to seek better terms of employment elsewhere. The client/employers objected to the costs they incurred when their employees used the threat of leaving and going to work for another competing employer, often the only negotiating advantage/leverage the employee had when negotiating for better terms of employment. In order to escape the noncomp, the employee had to relocate to another city or state; the law in the jurisdiction in which I practiced law required noncomp agreements be limited to a "reasonable" geographic area. No person I ever encountered was financially capable of testing through the litigation process the strength of the noncomp agreement they had signed in order to get a job. The unfairness of the employer advantage over the employee seeking to improve her/his economic position by changing jobs, indefensibly tilts the contest between the employer and the employee to a contest between the economically well-heeled company and self-improvement objectives of the not-so-wealthy individual employee. Thank you for your consideration of my input on the subject of noncomp agreements. Kester L. Oman"
Deirdre	"Non-competes are generally over-used, in ways and in arenas where they are wrong for many reasons addressed in the proposed regulation's background document and the comments of others. I write to support the INclusion of physicians (and other medical and dental personnel). Doctors should not have to choose between dropping all their current patients and uprooting their families to change their daily employment situation. Treatment continuity, children's educations, spouses' employment and social lives would needlessly suffer from such dislocations. Moreover, hospital systems and medical practice groups should not be seeking to constrain the spread of medical advancements. (Presuming, of course, that an individual's taking of the Hippocratic Oath doesn't cease to apply to them when they become a practice shareholder or a hospital administrator.)"
George	"I implore you to carry out The Biden administration's proposed ban on non-compete agreements. A person under a non-compete must completely change their profession to move beyond their present employment. They must leave behind all expertise in their present area or be in violation. The non-complete agreement is tantamount to slavery! They stifle innovation, progress and free enterprise!"
S	"Please oppose non compete clauses. As one very pertinent local side effect, they prohibit the establishment of 24 hour emergency veterinary care in southwestern New Mexico, a large area, that makes it near impossible to get care for many residents after hours, on weekends, and especially bad, on long holiday weekends! Please forbid non compete clauses, that are doing incalculable harm in my state. Thank you."
Cindy	"The non compete needs to be eliminated as this keeps us from pulling the limited resources of Veterinary staff together to provide 24 hr emergency access for our animals. There is a great shortage of Vets in our state and the US, this helps us best use what we have for the betterment of our pets. Help make this stated better for animals and drs."

Kristen	"Dear Commissioners, Non-compete clauses are an unfair labor practice. They limit workers' freedom to find gainful employment, or start new businesses. They depress wages and stifle our economy. They are especially egregious when applied to low wage workers. I fully support the proposed non-complete clause rule."
Rodrigo	"Ban non competes please"
Rolinda	"Dear FTC regulation commission, The non compete non contest contracts need to be illigalized asap. These contracts prevent United States citizens from having an ability to thrive. It forces people in a situation to barely survive. No person can thrive on fifteen dollars an hour. No person. Yet these companies want you to sign your life to them for fifteen an hour and sign a contract stating you will do nothing else but be their slave for a non livable wage. It forces citizens in to poverty and keeps them there long term. Companies want you to go to college for 6 years and then pay you sixteen an hour. This is not right. The No contest contracts force people to be nothing more than a person to run the machines. No more No less. How can we elevate as people if we are forced to be mindless button pushers for corporations that operate on the principle of making profit for shareholders and nothing more. Shareholders care about one thing. Cash. Don't continue to allow people with money to step on and belittle those who struggle to thrive. Allow the American citizens to thrive and do not condem them to poverty. Make non Compete contracts illegal and null and void for every company in the United States."
Dylan	"Non-compete agreements limit employment choice, decrease eligibility for capable employees, promotes anti-worker sentiment, is detrimental to market health, and artificially enforces stagnant wages. Considering the Biden administration has done its best to fuck up worker protections in the past, this is the least you could do to try to help working people."
Paul	"BAN NON COMPETES. My wife was a physician with zero power to improve service as the hospital insisted on noncompete to bind employees and prevent doctors from seeking better situations. i have also seen this affect patient choice. Patients do not easily follow their preferred doctor, if a physician is forced to drive hours each way to continue offering patient care outside the noncompete zone."
Kathe	"Noncompete clauses have no benefit for the citizens in any area of business. In human medicine, where there is a shortage of providers, citizens in need of healthcare are left searching for providers, often with the added burden of extensive travel. In the area of veterinary medicine, another area in which the country faces an extreme shortage of providers, citizens with companion animals and livestock are left without access to necessary veterinary care. In addition, the existence of non-complete clauses in veterinary medicine, prevent the available veterinarians from working in collaboration to staff emergency veterinary facilities that no single veterinarian or practice can operate on their own. Again, citizens are left with no option but to travel long distances at great personal expense to obtain critical veterinary care for their animals or to have the animal suffer needlessly while they wait, often weeks, for an appointment with their personal veterinarian. I am in full support of prohibiting non-complete clauses in all areas of business."

Mark	"Non-competes should be banned, employers should not be allowed to enforce them, and I fully support this proposed change by the FTC. In November 2022, I attempted to leave my company for a promotional opportunity with a significant increase to pay. Not only was it growth professionally, it would have the potential to change long-term trajectory and future earnings potential. My company invoked a non-compete which I was unaware of. I had reviewed my initial offer letter multiple times and could find no mention of any language suggesting a non-compete clause. The non-compete clause was not part of my initial offer, nor was it disclosed as a condition of employment. I am a junior hospital administrator, or an Assistant Chief, in a community of about 150,000 people in a largely rural, underserved state for healthcare. My hospital's parent company embedded the non-compete in the bonus plan which was presented to me after starting, and after agreeing to the initial terms of my offer letter which included the salary and bonus potential as a percent of salary. It was deceptive and dishonest and coercive. I had been with my company in this "developmental" role for more than 18 months without any conversations of progress or advancement with corporate recruiting. In fact, I had been passed up for promotion at least 3 times I was aware of. Through my own work, professional networking, and relationship building I was introduced with an opportunity to take an operations role (COO) at a new, smaller hospital in the same community. It was growth, a pay raise, and most importantly it ensured I would not be forced to relocate with my family anytime soon. I was not allowed to leave and I was threatened that I would be sued. Later it became clear I was free to leave, but I couldn't stay in the community. I'd have to move and likely out of state to find a new job. Non-competes, and especially mine, have little to do with competition and everything to do with power and control. The company controls the employee and has the power of a bankroll to threaten litigation costing the employee time and money lost. Doctors in NM are already protected by a law banning non-competes because it isn't good for healthcare; it forces talent to leave markets and potentially compromises the safety of patients. It also takes talented, experienced administrators to run hospitals. Forcing people to leave the community they live in to grow professionally, and where they want to raise their families, is not good for the community and the patients seeking care in these underserved states."
Ken	"Non-competes should not be allowed except in very rare and strict circumstances. Typically they can be overly broad, capturing massive industries or technologies; They can include 'lists of competitors that we can add to at any time'; They apply to nearly everyone, not just those with sensitive information; These contracts essentially would prevent working at companies with the exact skillset you've grown through years of education and work."

John	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. One in five American workers have signed noncompete agreements — and it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly bound to their jobs by noncompetes. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompetes to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes --- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone. Corporate lobby groups are bitterly opposed to banning noncompete agreements because they want to keep competition for the labor force as low as possible. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompetes would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people."
Adrya	"Non-compete clauses benefit only the employer, at the material cost the employee. I was bound by a Non-compete once. It held for 18 months, within a 200-mile radius of that employer. While working there, I watched as they sued a former coworker for violating it. She lost the lawsuit. She was a single mom, and they made her pay thousands of dollars, for trying to use her well-earned skills to feed her family. When I chose to leave the same workplace, I was faced with a choice: completely change industries for a significant payout, move away from my friends family and home to be outside of the protected radius, or get sued myself. I took switching industries, and my career has yet to fully recover, nearly 5 years later. Employees are already at the weaker end of the power balance in an employment arrangement. Working Americans should at least have the freedom to leave a bad job without having to sacrifice their well being or career trajectory. Please do away with this unfair practice."
Cody	"A friend and colleague recently emailed me this document on the NPRM. I am a Business Development Professional with 30+ years of experience. My father and I owned a business for 15 years and then decided to sell. This was June before covid hit. By October after finalizing everything I was finally able to get a job, which was difficult, but took what I could and was hired by a company out of Illinois. I had to sign a non-compete which would last 12 months after separation of employment. My current pay with them is extremely under market. I was able to have another company want to employee me based off of references. More money, almost twice what I'm making, benefits and vehicle but once they looked at my non-compete they would not hire me. I work in oil and gas and would of been working for another company in oil and gas. So because of this I'm stuck with what I have, work in another industry, or not work at all for 12 mos after. None of these are good options. With that said all of the business I have brought to them has been from my personal relationships not theirs. My customers should have the right to follow me wherever I go if they choose. When I have built the trust and work ethic that they appreciate I should be able to try to bring their business to a new company if they choose. Everyone prices are different so who knows if they would move to another company in the first place. With that said I am in favor of getting rid of non-competes. I has hindered me as well as many others I know."

Julian	"Please ban non compete clauses. The fact that these are allowed is completely ridiculous. I am a physician and the fact that I have to ask for permission to work at another institution that needs help, or work at an urgent care across town is insane. Especially at a time when we have a physician shortage and need physicians to help people. This does not only affect physicians but many other workers. It limits wages and stops people from being able to have a second job especially at a time when we need labor. I hope that non compete clauses are banned completely. This is good for the economy and capitalism. The fact they were allowed in the first place is anti-capitalism. Thank you"
Raul	"Non-compete clauses are just a sophisticated method to repress the talent and creativity of employees. When someone can figure out a way to offer a better product or service to the community it shouldn't be illegal to allow that person to do it."
Alexandria	"I agree with this proposal!!"
Betsy	"In a country where the name of the game is competition in business, why is such a thing as a non-compete clause ever allowed??? One more case of the worker being manipulated and probably often not receiving his full worth in salary or benefits, but can't move on. Long overdue for this kind of hurtful nonsense and uncaring worker policy to be abandoned."
Jennifer	"Please kill this rule. It hurts competition for employees, driving down wages. This is abusive and is used for punishment purposes. I know this because I was a headhunter for many years. Kill it."
Rebecca	"Please end non compete clauses in contracts. a Non compete hampers free trade and stifles wages in workers. It prevents people from a livelihood."
FREDERICK	"Bottom line. Non-Compete = indentured servitude outlawed after the civil war in the 13th Amendment. Corporations and small businesses pay handsomely for top level execs loyalty but chicken feed to the people that do the heavy lifting. Employees and consultants whose ideas are patented by an employer should also receive compensation for their efforts for as long as the patent is viable unless it is not used, in which case after a set period(3years seems reasonable) it should become solely the employee's to do with what they please at no cost to him or her. This would incentivize the production of many drugs and other products that aren't produced because a company makes more money keeping it off the market. The free flow of workers and ideas would greatly improve our scientific advancement across the board. It would make America greater and the world better."

Richard	"I believe non-compete clauses should be used very rarely for senior executives that possess trade secrets or other information that could significantly harm a company."
A. Christine	"I think non-compete clauses should only be allowed for very high-paid individuals whose jobs are directly tied to trade secrets, and with a reasonable time frame such as a year."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

New York | Statewide Impact

New York Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual NY Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual NY Worker Earnings

	"I am an Emergency Medicine physician and frontline healthcare worker. Non-compete clauses are very common in physician contracts. They bind physicians in increasingly poor working conditions or force them to move their families to other states and cities whenever they need to escape a bad working condition. [...] Most days at work I do not get a bathroom break let alone a food break and I am not permitted access to water in my work...so bad to the point of denying basic human function. Physicians having freedom to switch jobs could ultimately translate into better care for patients." - Katarzyna F.
	"I have worked as a software engineer in the United States for the last 15 years. Every single position I have ever been offered has immediately required that I sign a non-compete. [...] In every single case, the non-compete was initially written in such a broad way as to make it impossible for me to reasonably find any work as a software engineer in the city in which I live (New York City), for a 1-2 year period after I had ceased working with the firm." - Robert C.
	"I work in a specialized field of Optical Engineering. Several years ago, while working for Corning, my employer requested several of us top performers to sign a Non-compete agreement. I hired a lawyer and had numerous meetings with Corning legal counsel to make sure I understood the ramifications of my signing the agreement. I would not be allowed to work in my field for a competitor, customer, or myself for two years. The agreement would allow Corning to determine if any job I was to take would violate the agreement. In my narrow field, Corning could determine that any work I did would be in violation. They told me that they would never do that, but they would have the right.[...] Most people signed as they were denied promotions and room for advancement." - Joshua C.
	"I have been subject to non-compete clauses in my work at Starbucks. For people like me surviving on minimum wage jobs, noncompete clauses prevent our ability to earn a living which oftentimes does not even cover our rent without working 60+ hours a week. Thank you for taking the time to read this and solicit public comments. I truly believe this rule will help many Americans and begin to bridge the immense wealth gap that continues to expand between workers and the corporate elite that benefit from our labor." - Martha R.

	I am a physician employed by a healthcare organization, and I was unable to sign my contract with them unless I submitted to their demands that I agree to a non-compete. This hospital is in a rural and underserved area, and the non-compete disallows me from practicing within a 35 mile radius of their facility. Unfortunately the organization is poorly run and as a result is unable to provide adequate staffing for me to provide the services that I have trained for as a specialist. I could leave my current employer and work for the other local healthcare provider which maintains adequate staffing, but my non-compete prevents me from doing so. Instead, I am left looking at moving my family so that I may find a job elsewhere. At the same time, this will leave my current underserved area with one less specialist physician to serve the community. All due to the greed of a non-compete. These non-competes are counterproductive for improving health care quality across the country and NEED to be made illegal on a federal level. Thank you." - Michael K.
	"I am a business executive with fifty years of experience in for-profit and nonprofit organizations. With the minor exception of the top corporate officers - CEO, CFO, etc. - i have never seen a non-compete agreement used for any purpose other than to deny departing employees the opportunity to join a competitor to the organization they are leaving. <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - That non-compete agreements are routinely forced upon the lowest level of staff - kitchen and wait staff in fast-food chains - is unjust. - That non-compete agreements are used as a condition of employment is also unjust. - That employees are forced to sign non-compete agreements without benefit of counsel is simply unfair. Finally, i believe that a non-compete without payment of (former) compensation during the term of the non-compete is illegal. To deprive an individual of compensated employment with the companies most likely to hire the individual is a form of slavery that must be outlawed." - David S.
	"As a veterinarian, I can personally assure the FTC that such restrictions have caused both death and permanent disability of pets. [...] Hospitals are so overwhelmed that they are not accepting new patients, turning away emergency cases, and imposing extremely long (several months or more) waiting lists for appointments and/or scheduled procedures. [...] If a veterinarian at a given hospital wishes to change jobs locally (i.e., not pack up and leave) in a region underserved by veterinarians, is it fair for that person's current employer to force that person to either stay put in a job they wish to leave or move away? Is it fair for pet owners who cannot get their pets in to see a veterinarian (even on emergency situations) to have the veterinary hospitals who refuse to see their pets remove other options for care via non-compete clauses? [...] Please get rid of this horrible clause and lets make sure pets and their owners get what they need, when they need it." - Curtis D.

Dana	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them. American medicine was built into the best system in the world by the work of independent physicians beholden only to their patients and not to some corporate entity like a hospital system or insurance company. Non-compete clauses serve to prevent physicians from making the transition from employee to private practitioner. Destruction of the private physician practice is detrimental to patient care. Please ban non-compete clauses in physician contracts."

Moises	"I work as a physician assistant in dermatology in an underserved area of NYC. I am bilingual and of the same decent of community being serviced. If I should decide to leave my current employer (which I work as an independent contractor) I have a non compete which restricts me from practicing in this same community for years and from informing the patients prior to my departure. This is restrictive to me as a professional and is restrictive to the patients that would feel abandoned and unable to continue care with their preferred provider."
judith	"We need careful and complete negotiations and good contracts for working people at their jobs. Please protect working people."

Steven	"Non-compete clauses cause an imbalance of power between employers and employees and is the opposite of a free-market. Non-compete clauses further entrench companies and make it harder competition to thrive."
Sean	"This is much needed in healthcare. Many hospitals in my area (including my current job) prohibit me from working in the area for a year if I were to leave. This hurts my ability to leave or negotiate for better pay. The current proposal needs to be expanded to hospitals to help with healthcare shortages and give some power back to the employees."
Reena	"I support the FTC ban on non-compete clauses. As a physician , these stifle the ability of doctors to switch practices or be able to open their own practice in the vicinity of where they have built their practice."
Laura	"BAN non-compete rules. Non compete rules are anti-worker, anti-American and anti-equality for our citizens."
Gregory	" I support ban of non-compete clauses"
Charles	"I have six brothers and sisters who are all in the late stages of professional careers. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses because I can only imagine the troubles they could have suffered working with compete clauses in the tech industry (two of them, and one not far from Apple when Steve Jobs notoriously organized a number of "competitors" to not make job offers to each other's employees), real estate development (one), health care (two) and academia . For my nieces and nephews embarking on professional, trade and artistic/communications careers, I do not want these clauses to hold down their wages, stifle innovative work, and harm working people like them to fill the wallets of the wealthy. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth, and I urge the FTC to adopt it. Thank you."
Asad	"Non-compete clause is a means for the hospitals to take advantage of physicians who have local ties to a community and they are unable to find better opportunities within that community. It creates less competition and is against the free market rules that allow businesses to compete based on the quality of service and competitive salaries at market rates. Where I work, there is almost twice (if not more) of the salary difference between hospitals. I suggest to the FTC to get rid of the non-compete clause so this is one less tool for big hospitals to manipulate their employees on. Thank you!!"
Jeffrey	"As a health care provider I am extremely interested in moving this forward as we are subject to `non competes" on every contract. This disincentivizes us to take jobs when we are now in a health care chasm of employees! PLEASE PASS THIS legislation as it will heal the shortage of health care providers! Thank you"
Lynn	"I believe non-competes should be abolished. In these days when markets are national or global, workers are forced to switch industries altogether to avoid violating such agreements restricting the "location" of work. If non-competes must be allowed, then companies must provide full salary for the period of non-competition. Non-disclosures should be sufficient to protect proprietary information. Not allowing workers to change jobs is just a way the companies to suppress wages and competition."

Lena	"I am in favor of NON computer clause. Please get rid of them. They are beyond restrictive especially for those of us in urban areas"
LenaLena	"Please get rid of non compete clauses"
Meghan	"I support this proposed rule. As a physician , non-competes are inherent to contracts and often non-negotiable, especially if the position is with a large institution or academic center. Businesses advocate for non-competes stating they "help the institution fulfill its mission to improve patient care, medical education and research by ensuring stability of the patient-physician relationship". Non-compete's not only dictate a geographic off limits zone but also restrict employment at specific institutions, regardless of location, effectively expanding the reaches of the non-compete. This imparts undue hardships on the employee, who must decide between staying at a job they aren't happy with, seeking a position easily 1 hour away or considering to remain unemployed until the non-compete duration is over. No one should have to consider any of those options if they've become unhappy in their position. Furthermore, the greatest harm comes to the individuals we care for. It's no secret there is a deficit of physicians and wait times for a doctors appointment can be 6 months away. There is a clear, exuberant surplus of patients that no practice will ever worry that it won't be able to fill it's schedule in the scenario that a physician's patients decide they want to follow their physician to a new location. Non-compete's harm patients by limiting their access to care and taking away their right to chose their physician. It's a fallacy to say that medical non-competes protect institutions from instability related to loss of clientele; The Association of the American Medical Colleges predict that there will be a shortage of up to 124, 000 physicians by 2034."
Alex	"Non-compete agreements are destructive, plain and simple. It prevents employees from accepting jobs that offers more money and/or more freedom. Corporations have used non-compete agreements to lock in their employees and pay them less than their competitors (this is what Iain currently experiencing). If an employer is free to fire anyone at anytime tbr any reason, then an employee should be free to work for anyone they please is they offer them what they want."
Anonymous	"I am strongly in support of the ban on non-compete clauses, and think that non for profit hospitals must be included in this as well, as these function very similarly to for-profit institutions with regards to their physicians. Non compete clauses are not aimed at the benefit of physicians or patients."
Jonathan	"I support getting rid of non-compete clause rule. As a fourth year medical student and business administration master candidate, I believe a free market will improve healthcare overall."

Veronica	"Good day. I am a single mother of two and work a 100% commission sales job at Johnson and Johnson with a book of business that has taken 12 years to develop and is strongly client relationship based and has an extremely refined skill set that doesn't translate well to other professions. In 2022 I took an 18% pay cut caused by a commission rate change from 11% to 9%. The changes occurred seemingly overnight and the company was months delayed in releasing our quotas that are an integral part of the way we are compensated. I work demanding and unpredictable hours in an operating room and have a tremendous amount of responsibility at home with generally an equal ability to manage and flourish in high stress environments. For the first time in my life, this compensation change left me so emotionally distressed, in full due to the helplessness that I feel being held captive by my 18 month non-compete. My employer could confidently slash our pay to industry low commission rates with no fear purely based on our non-competes. Please help us receive the pay we are entitled to by ending non competes!"
Elizabeth	"Refuse the allowance of non-compete language for any non-C-suite employee and even then it should be for a limited time. One of the keys to American culture is its economic mobility. This is anti-American otherwise."
Stephen	"I support the banning of non-compete contracts. These are yet another infringement on individual rights by corporations who seek to wring every last dollar out of their workers. To apply these to any job but the CEO type of position for which they were intended is absurd. FTC, please ban them and help improve workers' lives."
Patricia	"I support modifying the NPRM. These changes are long overdue. Non-Competes foster stagnation of wages. It also can allow employers to abuse employees by holding this clause over their heads. Not to mention the vast changes in the dynamic between employment relationships over the years. When I first started out my employer portrayed this relationship as a family and a job for life. By the time I was forced out 30 years later, employees were a liability and replaceable by cheaper labor overseas."
Bill	"I am in favor of repealing the non-compete for workers who would be making a life-changing choice for their career. As a Union Organizer in the Plumbing and Pipefitting industry, I speak with people who have signed a non-compete and feel trapped with their current employer. Often, I can offer the individual a substantial increase in pay and/or benefits by simply joining and coming to work for one of our signatory contractors. These are hard-working people who aren't getting rich, nor are they being paid what they are worth. Typically, these workers have little to no health insurance coverage for themselves or their family, if they're lucky they may have a 401(k) which generally isn't matched, and they are being paid $10 - $20 less per hour than their peers in the same industry. They are losing out on $20,000 - $40,000 in just wages each year, not to mention the benefits being lost. This is certainly reasonable to assume that this imposes an undue hardship on the employee. These are not people who have trade secrets, nor are they trying to put their employer out of business. These people are trying to provide a decent life for themselves and their families. But because they signed a non-compete, they fear being sued if they leave their employer."

Rishi	"Non compete should be banned as it promotes unfair practice and takes away money from workers and prevent them from starting their own business"
Estelle	"I agree that non-compete clauses should be banned. They hurt workers and small businesses."
Trevor	"Noncompetes interfere with the functioning of the Market and should be eliminated."
Adam	"Non-competes stifle competition and suppress wages. Please do away with them"
AnnMarie	"I was the daughter of a small business person. I know what it is like to be an owner, employee, salesperson. I think the US gov and multinational corporations should be guiding and supporting folks who want better wages and working conditions in order to be happy and to like/love their work. So muscle up corporations - if you do not want your employees to share your so called secrets - then provide those better wages and conditions so that people will want to stay with you."
Emily P.	"It simply shouldn't be the case that a single employer can determine or substantially limit the entire course of an employee's future career trajectory within an industry after they no longer employ that person. The abuse of non-compete clauses represents not only an unjust constraint on a worker's future earnings, but their ability to exercise choices like moving or seeking better working conditions elsewhere if they wish to stay in the same career field. An employer shouldn't be able to dictate that if an employee wants to remain in the same industry, they simply can't leave or quit because they won't be allowed to work for another employer without facing devastating financial consequences."
Michael	"I write in strong support of the proposed rule. The rule is necessary to restore the balance of contracting power between employers and employees in light of several decades of reactionary judicial rulings at the state and federal level curtailing, among other things, the void for public policy and unconscionability doctrines. Further, it promotes competition. Competition creates incentives for employers to increase productivity, which is good for producers, consumers, and the economy as a whole. The rule is a win-win for the American public."
Brian	"Please enact this ban. As a board certified emergency physician spending the last eight years in a rural hospital network, I know first hand how non-compete clauses strongly favor large employers and allow abusive and exploitative practices by employers at the expense of employees. Non compete clauses restrict our ability to search for better wages and improved working conditions unless we uproot our homes and families, disrupting our sense of community, to seek employment hours away. Protect employees, restore our freedoms, and enact this ban as soon as possible!"

Gabriel	"I support a ban on non-compete clauses. They unfairly put more power in the hands of the CEOs and owners of the businesses, causing the workers to suffer"
Craig	"I totally agree that non-compete contracts should be a thing of the past. Both as an employer and employee I have always seen these as only hurting companies and their employees. It's difficult to hire good talent and employees feel as though they are locked into an contract. Companies can restrict raises, withhold promotions and discriminate in Sniffle ways and the employees have no recourse accept to take a job outside their expertise for at least a year most likely at a lower income rate. Additionally companies looking to hire these individuals are restricted from doing so when many good matches could be made. They need to end, I think they especially hurt black and brown people and potentially LGBTQ individuals."
Michael	"I write in full support of the ban of non-compete agreements. As a legal professional in the intellectual property field, I constantly see how these agreements handicap workers from fulfilling their potential and how the agreements prevent the public from benefitting from advanced skill sets. Employers have other ways to induce employees to stay, such as higher pay and better work environments. Please do not let powerful business lobbies dictate the terms under which labor can operate in the marketplace."
Mary	"I enthusiastically support the ban of the non-compete clause. Over my 32 years in practice as a physician in NYC, I have lost access to numerous colleagues who had to leave the city when they left their employers, due to the ridiculous radius required by their employers' non-compete clauses. The most heart-breaking was the pediatric special-needs dentist who was a magician with nonverbal and handicapped children who had to move to CT to satisfy the distance requirement in the non-compete clause that she signed as a young, naive new dentist. Most patients could not travel so far and there was no one to replace her for years. It's about time to ban this greedy, competition-killing clause! Thank you!"
Anna	"I'm writing today in support of the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are antithetical to our free market system. They hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. Non-compete clauses make it harder for someone to leave a job underpays or mistreats them, allowing former employers to sue if they go to work for another company in the same industry. It's unfair, and it's un-American. Banning non-comete clauses will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth. Please, do the right thing and support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. Thank you."
Sarah	"I fully support FTC proposed ban on no compete clauses, including hospital non competes for healthcare workers and doctors."
Mark	"As a mechanical engineer for almost 40 years, I have been constrained by non-compete clauses several times. This practice by companies who employ engineers is unfair to employees, detrimental to the overall economy, and destructive to engineers' careers individually and as a community. It doesn't take much imagination to gasp the positive ramifications to our whole economy if employees are able to more freely start new, competitive companies when the previous company has not afforded them workplaces that were sufficiently agreeable to retain them. Such is the rightful challenge to every manager and company that endeavors to be competent, inclusive, positive, capable, nimble, effective. Eliminating non-competes holds the very potential to improve the whole management breed in America. This is no small thing. This glaring need has gone unmet for too long. In Germany an industrial giant like Siemens understands that when their engineers avail themselves to their excellent training, they are ultimately aiding some of their future competitors. They consider this a cost of doing business, and they realize this is ALL good for the German economy. It's also an embrace of "education" that we would do well to emulate here in the USA. Apparently California has NOT enforced a non-compete clause since 1872! Despite this, somehow Silicon Valley (not the bank) has managed to lead the communications tech sector arguably worldwide. That goes a long way toward neutralizing the supposed fears and complaints of any feckless management that endeavors to maintain, without evidence, they need a non-compete hand on the throat of their employees in order to be competitive. That's simply not true, if the California example (the eighth largest economy in the world!) is considered. Engineers perceive the obvious requirement to honor and keep proprietary such things as trade secrets and customer and supplier lists. Furthermore, Professional Engineers have formal training and proficiency in these matters. Company secrets must be kept confidential by ethical engineers when they change companies; that's a non-issue and it's also covered by their Confidentiality Agreement with their employer. Therefore there is no need for non-compete clauses in any conventional employment agreement. Whether or not non-compete clauses can even be enforced by a former employer, they are a nasty and dark cloud over the head of an employee who wants to, or needs to, move forward from a past company. How many newly unemployed people are willing to risk a whopping legal expense by attempting to hire on with a competitor? Not many, in my experience. I've been terminated by employers who alluded to the threat their non-compete clause imposed on me. This put me in the very unfortunate position of both being unemployed AND not being able to put to use the very expertise I had just acquired, at great cost, in the performance of my previous job • for the next two years or whatever. Two years might as well be ten when there's mortgage or rent to pay, and other expenses. Employers in the USA are already able to exercise excessive control over the lives and well-being of their employees through "right to work" laws, the ability to terminate for any reason or no reason at all, arbitration (which they can ultimately control) in resolving labor disputes, and the presence (or absence) of health insurance coverage which can be all-important to a person or a family with an illness. It's laughable when an employer who has terminated you offers COBRA health insurance coverage, as if you can afford a $1200/month premium without a paycheck! The many ways an employer can determine actual health outcomes of even a limner employee in America is downright punitive. Eliminating non-compete clauses in employment agreements in the USA is long overdue. Let's get rid of them immediately. PS: American employers also impose on their engineers the mandate to surrender all inventor's rights to intellectual property (patents) in their standard employment agreement, which only adds insult to the injury of non-compete agreements. That's another injustice engineers suffer — and a fight for another day and hopefully another FTC proposal in the very near future! Please take my additional plea into consideration as well. Thank you for this excellent proposal; this is very exciting and brings me great hope!"

Victoria	"Non-compete clauses are a tool an employer uses to control an employee after they leave the position. There are situations where the employee comes in and the job is not what the contract claims to be, so they wish to leave after a short time. They may have spent money to move and have depleted savings, or may be tied to an area due to family/health or other personal reasons. They end up tied to a job that isn't a good fit, endure unreasonable commutes, or become unemployed as a result. These contract clauses offer zero benefit to the employee and all the restrictions."
Henri	"I support the new FTC rule to ban non-compete agreements. If companies want to prevent employees with critical knowledge from leaving, they must offer commensurate compensation."
Alexander	"Please strike down this rule. It makes no sense for the worker"
Erica	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 No one should be prohibited from working in their field of choice, regardless of where they have worked prior. Job security being a thing of the past is difficult enough, but then for companies to 'LIT to keep people from working at another company in their industry is antithetical to an open society. Please remove this antiquated process that only benefits employers."
Mazen	"I believe non compete is designed to suppress the salary of employees who are unable to move to better positions and income if their company doesn't provide the opportunity"
Omar	"To whom it may concern: Thank you for considering adding physicians to this policy. It is high time that these non-compete clauses be done away with. They only serve the interests of monopolies, while harming workers, consumers and communities. Physicians do not compete with hospitals. They serve communities. Please be sure to include them when implementing these necessary new rules. Thank you."
Daniel	"Noncompete agreements are an egregious abuse of physician employees, trapping them in toxic work environments or forcing them to relocate. Noncompete clauses are unfair, unjust and should be banned."
Jacqueline	"I reside in Westchester County, NY and I am writing to express my support for the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"

Joseph	"Please eliminate non-competes except for their original intent, which was to prevent employees with confidential information from exploiting trade secrets. If a company has undertaken expensive training of an employee, who jumps ship once trained, that's a different situation, and requires another clause to protect the company from being used as a free training program by its competitors. I used to be a small-business owner, and trained my employees extensively at no cost to them. Almost all chose to stay with the company because I paid them competitive wages as their skills improved. This isn't a huge conundrum. Unfortunately, many businesses want to make this seem more complicated than it is. If you treat your employees well, and continue to pay them fair wages, they are not going to be in a hurry to leave. If a particular industry requires extensive specialized training before an employee can contribute to the company's bottom line, there are other ways to protect a company."
Neil	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. A company should not be allowed to rule your life."
Elizabeth	"Great! High time. High bloody time! Jane Jacobs said that breakaways - people leaving a company to start their own business - are a major source of economic development. With non- compete clauses, people cannot do this, and the United States will lose out to countries where they can. And that's not even talking about jobs where a non-compete clause makes no sense. (Well, except for keeping people working at low wages For that it makes perfect sense.) Trade secrets for nurses? Investments in training security guards?"
Joshua	"I think banning non-compete clauses is a good idea. I am a small business owner , selling used books, ephemera, and media. Our business, and that of our colleagues in this field, thrives on the active interconnectivity between each other. The booksellers I know that have employees have been successful as they've been able to hire (some) employees who have experience and enthusiasm for our field of work. I cannot imagine why an employer would even make an employee sign a non-compete clause, and I think it is inherently anti-freedom and is dangerous to the growth of small businesses. Thank you for your time."
Richard	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Noncompete agreements are even being used to prevent low-wage workers from leaving exploitative conditions. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Nolen	"I'm a project manager at an Interior Design & Home Staging company in Manhattan; we're the largest staging company on the East Coast. After I accepted

	my job offer and went in to file paperwork, I was very briefly walked through what this non-compete means (the details were not made entirely clear; I believe they left it intentionally murky) and it was buried deep in the new employee rules and regulations packet I needed to read and sign at my onboarding. I personally am very against these agreements because, as mine states, I cannot work with "a competing staging company" or for any of the clients of my current company. Again, we're the largest staging firm on the east coast and have a lot of clients (we do over 100 stagings per year). Essentially, I am completely shut out of working in the industry in NYC as there are only a handful of other staging companies that can pay me a living wage to do so."
Denise	"I completely am in favor of this -people deserve to get great jobs without any issues."
Liam	"To Whom it may concern. I am a lifelong landscaper. It was my family business since a very young age and it's all I have ever done and plan to do. I worked for a massive amount publicly traded commercial landscape company to supplement my seasonal incomes. I was informed that due to their poor financial performance, my job was no longer in their budget and I could accept a job at a much lower pay rate. I refused and went to work for a different company in a different industry. I was sent a cease and desist and told that I cannot landscape and reminded that I can be tolled and violated/penalized and just about owned by this massive 4 billion dollar company, until their non compete can no longer be upheld. They sent me a fresh copy to remind that they even own "post employment inventions of mine" and that I will be unable to work in the only profession that I know and can support myself and my family by working in. They've even stretched it and maintained that I cannot work in the non commercial industry or do anything with the lifelong background and skill that I had built and developed, up until they decided that they didn't want to pay me what I was making anymore. I worked there for 14 years and made them much more money over the years than they or any other person there can comprehend. Understanding that with what I know, I could cause them financial harm, I am aware that some level of decency and moral restraint is needed to ensure I don't cause them harm. However, seeing that they're a 4 billion dollar company and made sure I could not file for unemployment, made sure I can't landscape and that I would need to pay a lawyer just to find out what I can and can't do, I am urging the FTC to proceed with this ban. I think there is a distinct difference from being unethical, criminal and stealing or intentionally harming a company, and a single human being whos struggling to make financial ends meet, being able to work in the trade that they have worked in their entire life. Please throw away the non compete. It's unconstitutional, unreasonable and intended to ensure profitable companies can control people like myself, for years after they put them in a bad financial position. Thank you in advance for your consideration"
Darragh	"I am 100% in favor of banning the non-compete clause in employee contracts both future and current. Preventing individuals from lawfully pursuing their chosen field of work anywhere near where they live is detrimental to them, their families, the places they live and practice in and ultimately detrimental to the larger society. This is a heinous practice that should be banned immediately."

Lesley	"By all means, ban these anti-competitive clauses in employment contracts!"
Rachelle	"Non compete agreements prevent family physicians from staying in a community when their employer implements policies the physicians disagrees with. When the local Catholic health system stopped women from getting certain forms of birth control several physicians tried to look for new jobs in our community with different employers. Because of their non compete agreement they ended up moving from an underserved area to a larger community."
Johanna	"I currently have a 30 mile non compete as a physician at a large health system. I am crippled by this. I have a family and to take a different with better salary and work situation I would need to move my family to a new place entirely which is terrible. I strongly support this effort to ban non competes which do not help workers, they only help suppress them."
Johanna	" Physicians need to be able to move in the job market just as other workers. Hospitals trap young physicians with families into staying with their non competes for absolutely no reason. Please please please do not make any exceptions to exclude physicians at non profit hospitals from stopping non competes. Non profit hospitals are actually profiting off trapping us."
Michael	"Please eliminate this archaic and unfair clause. Give the worker freedom and the economy the boost it needs by allowing people to choose their jobs."
Hallie	"Please include physicians , and all medical caregivers including nurses and techs, in this non compete clause. They are essential to the health of your community, literally. If they are not covered under this law, they will have to move out of the community in order to serve patients if they wish to change jobs, even if the reason they are leaving a position is to stand up for patients against the steamroller that is our current medical system. The American Hospital Association (AHA) is lobbying against this law, in a self-serving manner. They want easier control over physicians and healthcare workers, punishing them, and forcing diem to move out of the area if they need to change positions."
Karen	"Non compete contracts should be ban due to the reality that these organizational contracts are hindering professionals from earning a living. Or forcing a professional to move out of state to work. After completing a contract an additional non compete for another year is added on. Now are these professionals to earn a living. By moving to another state? Non compete contracts need to be ban!"
Samuel	"1. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable, unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a dine where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. Noncompete agreements are unAmerican. Competition is a core tenant of capitalism Eliminating noncompete agreements will only lead to better pay and job satisfaction for physicians and better continuity of care for patients who won't have to lose their trusted physicians. Politicians need to side with the people who elected them and not the AHA and other special interests who line their pockets."

Michael	"NCA's reduce wages for those that are subject to them and those that aren't. NCA's are an anathema to those wishing to sell their labor for the highest price. Please support this rule change."
Michelle	"Hospital associations are trying to lobby to exempt physicians from the prohibition on non-compete clauses. DO NOT DO THIS. Physicians must be accorded the same liberty as other workers to seek alternative employment arrangements without uprooting their families. Non-compete clauses are toxic to a healthy economy; they enable employers to exploit and under-compensate employees, including physicians."
Barbara	"I am strongly in favor of the proposed rules banning non-compete clauses."
Sarah	"Non compete clauses hurt workers and their families. They make it harder to effectively do your job and create unfair work environments. There is no scenario I can envision where a non compete is helpful or good."
Annie	"Non competes min a physicians ability to freely practice. Lives have been ruined over noncompetes. Please abolish them for all hospitals"
Michael	"Absolutely agree with banning these, so many physicians are unable to leave their jobs without having to move, as their restrictions are so severe, including wording, such as any future sites, it is always seems like a violation of anti-trust type laws, given that we are so worried about mental health and burn out, this would help significantly alleviate those factors."

Mr	"I am Physician looking to relocate closer to home after the birth of my 2 daughters. Non compete clause restricts my ability to obtain a new job. Within 20 miles or become an employee of any instutution with a site within 20 miles. There not that many options up here only 2 major players. I am loosing a good job opportunity, that would allow me to help and underserved community for the fear of counter legal action."
T	"In small-mid sized cities, there are specific locations where medical offices and ancillary services have been located near each other historically. Non- competes have restricted a physicians ability to open or join a practice in a location where it would be more convenient for their patients to have labs and/or imaging done. Patients often rely on the convenience of these facilities being located near their physician's office. When physicians are prevented from practicing in a certain geographic location where the majority of these ancillary services are offered, it can force patients to travel longer distances, costing patients time and money."
Sean	"Please do not allow for carve outs for this law specifically against physcians . Corporations will ask to exclude physcians from this law. Please do not allow patients to be harmed by constraining the rights of their physcians. Burn out among physcians will only worsen if corporations are given unfair power over physcians. If burn out increases patients will suffer."
Joan	"The non-compete clause means that I cannot follow my favorite physician when she left a heal practice. She and I had developed a rapport that I have not been able to repeat with any other physician."
Margarita	"I support in making it an across the board bad. Whenever there are exceptions, companies will find a way to exploit them. We should give employees in all sectors an opportunity to work in their communities without fear of retribution."
Angelo	"I've worked in the staffing industry for over 22 years and have always felt non-competes are extremely unfair and have made it difficult for me to take the risk of switching jobs even if felt making a move was in my best long-term interest since there is always a ramp up time from leaving one sales job to another. I truly hope that non-competes are banned all together since it affects such a large population of the US workforce."
Krysten	"Citizens should be able to choose to work for anyone, companies should not be allowed to tell you where and when you can use your skills. Workers need to have more protections so they can support themselves and their families. I support the ban of non-competes."
Vincent	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms."

	Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A concerned physician."
Horacio	"Non compete clause are a detrimental to the average worker preventing them or limiting their scope. All the valuable skills one gained will also be limited and those who try to obtain these skills will not want to improve and society will have less efficient workers."
Nixi	"I am a physician, serving an underserved population in rural New York. My employer required me to sign a non-compete / restrictive clause that says that I need to move at least 35 miles away from the nearest facility that is affiliated with them. Because they are affiliated with a hospital network with branches across the state, this means that, were I to leave my present position, my services would not only be unavailable to my current patients, whom the hospital treats as if they are property rather than persons who need the care of their physician... but I would also likely need to move out of state. I would need to pursue state licensure in a new state, become conversant with the laws of that jurisdiction, etc. It may even be a better deal for me to take a two year sabbatical and deprive the community of my talents and service, until I could return to work with the underserved patients whom I love in my current community, rather than to pay the outrageous 2 years worth of salary that my hospital system is using to compel me to remain in my current position. This isn't, for me, about money. It isn't about my upward mobility. It is about being available to serve the patients who look to me as their physician. I serve a very particular population who have difficulty accessing high quality compassionate care, and they would be deprived of my help if I were to need to leave this employer. I could pay the hospital system the 450k that they would require to satisfy the non-compete, but then I would deplete my resources for opening my own clinic to remain here and serve these patients. I signed because taking care of these patients mattered to me, more than my own financial well-being. I'm staying at this employer despite certain adverse circumstances, in order to serve these particular patients. I don't even know that I would certainly leave my current employer if there were no such restrictive clause... but if there were not, I would be in a better position to bargain, to make circumstances better for me and for my patients."
Luis	"I'm in favor of this rule to ban the non-compete clause"
John	"They never should have been allowed in the first place. Make them illegal, and retroactively!"

Monica	"I am writing in support of this and that it should apply to non-profit organizations, hospitals, and physicians along with other healthcare professionals. Many healthcare non-competes are very restrictive and prevent professionals including physicians from fairly seeking other opportunities, especially as many require physicians to move in order to obtain a job in the same specialty due to incredibly restrictive covenants including radius and duration. In many cases, physicians who wish to seek other opportunities do so in order to advance their careers, pursue leadership positions, obtain research opportunities, etc. In other cases, it may be working conditions such as unsafe patient conditions, poor hospital quality, or burdensome work unrelated to direct patient care. By allowing physicians and other professionals switch jobs freely, it would also improve patient care, hospital quality, and incentivise hospitals to invest in their employees. In our current healthcare environment post-pandemic, our hospital systems are on the verge of collapse and healthcare professionals are leaving the field in droves. This is unsustainable and by allowing professionals to seek fair employment and opportunities near their home, perhaps we can retain this talented and highly skilled workforce."
Anne	"If finalized in its current form, the Proposed Rule would ban the use of non-competes by independent medical practices, like mine, but because several types of entities are excluded from the FTC's authority, non-profit entities (e.g., many hospitals and health systems) would likely not be subject to the ban. This would further exacerbate the imbalance of power between private practitioners and hospitals, and in some parts of the country, could represent a tipping point for the very survival of the independent practice of medicine, such as mine. It would make it impossible for me to recruit a physician who practices as non-profit hospital but the hospitals could poach doctors from my practice because they would not be subject to a non-compete. It is unknown whether the FTC has considered the deleterious ripple effect of a ban that would not apply to non-profit entities. Simply stated, if the FTC does not have the authority to impose the ban on non-profit hospitals and health systems, it must exempt independent medical practices from the ban to avoid the unwitting creation of a monopsony in regional health care markets. These large health systems are already trying to buy up our practices and now they would have a hiring advantage."
John	"Abolish the non-compete!!!"
Suman	"Must Ban Non-Compete overall"
Yishan	" Physicians are currently beholden to their employers more than other professionals, due to hefty student loans, lengthy notice requirements (my contract is 90 days), non competes, and certain professional obligations. We are also non unionized. This makes abuse of physician time by employers very prevalent, and is a huge contributing factor to physician burn out. The quality of care received by patients then suffers. As the pandemic and the subsequent exodus of healthcare workers out of this industry shows, if this country wants to have high quality healthcare, it needs to also take care of it's caretakers. Banning physician non competes is a great place to start."

Marvin	"I am a 68 year old nearly retired physician . My previous job was with a multispecialty group, with branches over a 100 mile radius. I was trapped. My job was bought out by a health care/ venture capital company, and I and my fellow physicians lost all control of our medical practice. My son, an orthodontist, had a job with a multispecialty dental national chain. He was trapped. He wanted to set up an office 19 miles away from the chain's office, but the contract said 20 miles. He had to start a new office 25 miles away for nearly double the money. My other son is a physician, also in a multispecialty group which has now been bought out twice. He wants to get out, He can't The restrictive covenant clauses should all be outlawed, with no limitations by position, income, etc."
Noah	"Dear FTC, I cannot express how happy I am to see the news about this potential rule change. The rule change is truly critical to workers, individuals, and as well, to the practice of medicine and patient care. First and foremost, I beg you not to differentiate between "high-wage" and "low-wage." I am a physician in a large group and would be considered a "high-wage" worker. I am severely adversely affected by a non-compete clause. I would have to uproot and move my family, and also re-establish my brand and practice in order to change jobs; this is not a fair or tenable situation. I could not even work with a much longer commute, because I could no longer be close to the hospital for emergencies. As well, with a wage-based cutoff, some physicians in my group would be subject to a non-compete, and some would not, making the cutoff truly arbitrary. Medical systems and groups are now large conglomerates that are beholden to profits; the groups have deprioritized patient care. Because of non- competes, physicians no longer have any recourse. This has led to very unhappy physicians, since the group-individual dynamic is completely one-sided; medical groups do not have to treat their physicians well. Furthermore, this has led to a sharp decrease in the quality of medical care, because physicians cannot advocate thr patients against certain policies set forth by administrations. Furthermore, because of how unhappy physicians have become, given that these non-competes are so prevalent, it will deter people from going into medicine, and endanger the profession. As historical context, many years ago, when there were many small medical groups, a group would need to protect itself from one physician leaving, which would have a major impact on the group. Therefore, in that era, it would be understandable, and more equitable, to have a non-compete clause in contracts. Given the tremendous consolidation that has transpired over the last 20 years, a large group or medical center will not feel any effect if a physician leaves. These non-compete clauses area major detriment to any worker, including physicians, and the clauses also have a measurable effect of diminishing the quality of medical care. There really should not be any differentiation between "high-wage" and "low-wage" workers - this is a contrived and arbitrary distinction. Thank you for reading this and for your consideration."
Victor	"I am a family medicine physician and due to my non compete, I have no way to move to another hospital or clinic system. This impacts my family's options, home, and young children's schooling significantly. Non competes need to be banned for all hospitals and clinics"

Robert	"I have worked as a software engineer in the United States for the last 15 years. Every single position I have ever been offered has immediately required that I sign a non-compete. [...] In every single case, the non-compete was initially written in such a broad way as to make it impossible for me to reasonably find any work as a software engineer in the city in which I live (New York City), for a 1-2 year period after I had ceased working with the firm. To give an example, at one point I worked for a company that was in the business of automated scanning of paper magazines, and then selling aggregated information from those scans. The non-compete from that organization initially stated that for 12 months after termination of employment, I was barred from working on any software for any company that interacted in any way with the internet, as that would constitute that company as a competitive company.. The internet, for a paper magazine scanning company. The technology industry in New York City focuses primarily on Ad Tech and Finance, and every Ad Tech company I have worked with claims that working, in any capacity for any company that deals in advertising is a competitive company, and therefore barred from future employment. These agreements have never offered any form of compensation or guarantee for their restriction. New York is an at-will state, and employment can be terminated at any point by the company, but at no point has any such agreement offered any remuneration for this period in which I would legally be unable to work. The contents of these agreements are frequently considered "trade secrets" by the companies for whom I have worked, which of course, also require non-disclosure agreements when starting the position. This means, in turn, that I am not even allowed to provide examples to you of such agreements while they are in effect. Lastly, these agreements change continuously, and on the whim of the businesses. It has been standard practice for every company I have been employed by to re-write their non-competes to be more broad and more restrictive on a yearly or event-driven basis, and each time require their employees to sign the new contract as a condition of continued employment. I have had discussions with multiple management positions at multiple companies about the value and requirement of these agreements. as I traditionally attempt to negotiate to a point of good faith before signing any such agreement. Generally, I receive platitudes as to it being a stock form of boilerplate that employees are expected to sign and not read, and promises that they will not be enforced. Of course, the opposite is often true. In my career I have been part of managerial discussions where companies consider actively enforcing such agreements in court. More nefariously, I have also seen them enforced outside of the court. In one such occasion, an employer (let's call him Employer A) was upset that one of his employees quit his position, a month before a major deal was set to be delivered. Employer A used social media to discover where the employee had gone for new employment (Employer B). Employer A then found the contact information for Employer B's HR department, called them, and falsely claimed that the employee was in breach of a non-compete and that Employer A was considering law suits against both the employee and Employer B. Even though this claim was to the best of my knowledge false, Employer B did not want to deal with the trouble of a lawsuit, and immediately fired the employee, who was, to my knowledge, never informed of why he was terminated. This story, I hope,

	exemplifies how even in the case that a non-compete is so overly broad and anti-competitively written as to be legally enforceable, it is still an anti-competitive practice, that poses no downside risk for an employer, while potentially crippling an industry's labor pool."
James	"Physicians and other healthcare workers should not be held to non-compete clauses. It limits the mobility and negatively impacts well-being. Physicians in particular have a higher rate of suicide than the general public. This is astounding as we care for those with mental illness and are aware of the symptoms associated with suicidal ideations. A sizable degree of this dissatisfaction can come from the feeling of being trapped. Allowing physicians to change jobs without uprooting their families has the ability to provide a degree of wellness by not forcing a physician to a poor working environment. Thus having the feeling of controlling one's destiny can provide a degree of mental comfort which has been shown to reduce burnout and the subsequent sequela. Moreover the hospital systems argument that patients migrate with their providers is often not true as patients are choosing health systems that show high outcomes."
Joanne	"Noncompete clauses should be banned. My husband has been working for a smaller company for decades and suddenly they just required him to sign a "Commission agreement" that besides vague statements saying that "from time-to-time" they may simply change the rules on how he gets paid commissions based on nothing more than a whim, or if they decide he might make too much on a particular sale, they embedded in "confidentiality" rules that include customer contacts and "potential customers" information cannot be used in any manner that is not in the normal pursuit of sales for that company and that the agreement, although a 1 year term, lists afterwards that "even after the 1 year term the agreement shall survive any expiration or termination of the agreement for 5 years even after the return or destruction of confidential information by the recipient". They told him that if he didn't sign the agreement as is, they inferred he would be fired and also that he would not be paid any of his commissions that have not fully processed yet, so he had no choice but to sign under duress. I understand they don't want employees stealing the entire customer list and going into business for themselves or similar, but the way these noncompete clauses in employment contracts are written, he could not go work for a company that does the same type of business for 5 years, which is impossible because he's been in that industry alone for 30 years, he and others with many years experience cannot simply change their whole professions because the company they work for may lay off or even fire them for no reason, but then try to sue the employee for going to a competitor with their knowledge before the 5 years is up because those employees need to continue in their careers just like other fields like nursing, etc. you can't stop a Dr or a nurse after they change practices from their patients following them. Noncompete clauses are particularly harsh on older workers and on folks living in smaller towns. Please ban them."
Jerome	"It is very important to prohibit all non-compete clauses for physician contracts. 70% of physicians in the US are now employed, and are not employers. To get hired to practice, a Physician must obtain a college degree, get accepted to

Medical School, obtain an MD or DO degree, complete 4-5 years of Specialty Training, often complete another 3-4 years of Subspecialty Training, obtain a State license to practice, and pass one or more Board Certifications. None of this time, commitment, or financial expenditure is done by the employer or even reimbursed by the employer. Enforcement of a non-compete clause negates all of these credentials. Take the example of a large Hospital Corporation with many Hospitals and free- standing Clinics in their System, such as Northwell in NY. A non-compete clause of 15 miles of ANY facility owned by the Corporation means that a huge geographic area is forbidden for work. This disrupts the physician-patient relationship, and forces patients to see a new doctor when the Physician leaves for any reason, even if just laid off because the Hospital wants to replace him/her with a lower-paid less-qualified less-experienced provider. This is bad for competition, and bad for the public. I understand that some are arguing that the proposed FTC rule does not apply to non-profit Corporations, and most hospitals at least in NY are organized as non-profits. The argument goes like this: "the FTC rule would not be applicable to many, if not most, nonprofit, i.e., 501(cX3) hospitals. Here is the problem ---under the Federal Trade Commission Act (FTCA), which is the law under which the proposed rule has been promulgated, the FTC has authority over "persons, partnerships, or corporations," and the FTCA defines "corporation" as an entity that "is organized to carry on business for its own profit or that of its members." This means, though, that under the FCTA, the FTC does not have authority over, and the proposed rule does not apply to, entity that is NOT "organized to carry on business for its own profit or that of its members," because that entity is not a "corporation" as defined under the FTCA. And what is an entity that is not "organized to carry on business for its own profit or that of its members?" It is a nonprofit. So, the proposed rule would not apply to nonprofit hospitals like 501(cX3) hospitals, unless the FTC could mount some kind of challenge to the hospital that it is somehow organized for its own profit or that of its members." My argument is that the FTC does have jurisdiction over those non-profit Corporations that are run as a business. That's because under the plain meaning of the Legislation, these Hospital corporations are indeed organized to make a profit that is retained to benefit the hospital chain, buy out or merge with other hospitals, buy out competing physician practices, control market-sham, and pay millions of dollars annually to their top executives. Non-profit hospitals can also award "Phantom Stock Options". When bonuses and phantom stock options are awarded based upon profitability, then certainly such a non-profit is acting like a for-profit business. Physicians used to be independent owners of their own offices. That is no longer true for most physicians, 70% of whom are employees. Non-profit NY Hospitals have been run like businesses for a long time, and have succeeded in absorbing the local practices and then dramatically increasing the fees and costs to the insurance companies, and ultimately to the consumer. Also, take a close look at how the Corporations are structured to run those clinics. Often, the parent non-profit Corporation has separate subsidiary corporations to run each separate profit center, one for the physicians, another for the nursing homes, another for the hospital itself, another for lab services, etc. So even if the non-profit parent Corporation may not be subject to the proposed FTC regulation, some or all of the subsidiary Corporations could and should be. In summary, I urge the FTC to finalize its proposed rule to prohibit all non-compete clauses in health care, especially for physicians and other highly- trained individuals. As for non-profit Corporations, I urge the FTC' to apply its rule to all non-profits that conduct themselves like businesses."

Julia	"Individuals desire to innovate and bring their best ideas to bear in their jobs. At times, they cannot apply or manifest their best ideas owing to time, context, colleagues, workplace dynamics, and other factors beyond their control. Noncompetes hinder and inhibit progress that can be applied in a new context that may better fit that innovation. Please ensure that businesses—as well as individuals and best ideas and practices—can grow: change the laws and eliminate noncompete clauses. In the area of for-profit education , this is particularly important. There are many for-profit independent schools in the United States now, and that number is growing, and allowing noncompetes limits the education of students. These schools exist for the benefit of children, and telling teachers what ideas belong to the institution is limiting in a detrimental way to teachers and students alike. Please remember that it is not only in the traditional business sector that these exist, but also in creative fields like education. Thank you!"
Miriam Richter	"I ask that "non compete" clauses be deemed illegal, or be punitive to the employer. It is injurious to all walks of life. I am a retired doctor. There were "no compete" clauses in all the jobs I worked, including private practice and in academics. It was grossly unfair and injurious to me, because I could not move due to my husband's job."
Nadine	"As a physician I strongly support removing this non compete clause from any and all contracts. Non competes have prevented me from providing much needed primary care to a population as the non compete clause of previous employer restricts me significantly. This creates a significant obstacle to patients getting access to primary care."
Sarah	"Removing the non-compete agreements is a wonderful step in providing autonomy back to workers. I work in a field that I love, but only has a handful of companies working within that field. At my current company, I signed a non compete agreement (out of force), and am worried that if the company ever becomes a bad fit for me personally, has no opportunities for growth, or if I want to leave tin any reason, I will be unable to do so. My only option would be to work somewhere that is quite different from where my career interests and skills lie. having the freedom to determine my career progression and growth without fear of retaliation is immense. Additionally, while many say that noncompetes are usually non enforceable anyways and a federal rule is not needed, the fear and unknown of having it be enforced provides a fear of leaving a bad environment for employees. Furthermore, even if it is unenforceable, competing employers may not consider these employees because they don't want to handle potential legal issues. Therefore, by creating a federal rule, companies will be less fearful of hiring good skilled employees."
Laura	"I'm a PA in upstate NY and have been prevented from providing care to grossly underserved areas due to non-compete clauses. Non-competes deny care to those who need it most and drive up healthcare costs by forcing us to travel to continue to work. They also decrease the likelihood that a patient's medical provider is a member of their community and less aware of all their resources and options. Please end this despicable practice and allow me to care for my patients where I'm needed most."

Peg	"For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement."
Horatio	"This would be epic. Please do this. I am very competitive, and don't need to be held back. I'm like a tiger in this market, but these non- compete agreements make me feel like a tabby cat. Thank you, FTC."
Lisa	"As a freelance photographer , clients come to me to make images for their brands. They have to see that I've done similar work in order to trust me with their photography, often only considering photographers who specialize in one or two genres. If beverage photography is mostly what I do-and is the bulk of the previously made work that I'm able to show clients—then a non-compete agreement severely limits the clients I can work for, restricting my work for other beverage companies. If I can't work for other beverage companies, then I'm forced to create work in other genres. But if I show work in too many genres, companies will not see me as a specialist who is highly qualified to work for their brand, which will further limit the number of clients who will hire me."
David	"Dear FTC, As a physician who has been and is currently contrained by a non-compete agreement, I strongly support this proceed to ban noncompete agreement. During my last job, our hospital was purchased by a larger hospital system. We found that this new organization no longer cared about quality and cutting edge medicine and one by one physicians left the group. I would have loved to stay in the area and work for the other hospital system, but COVID and a health scare meant I needed permanent employment and health insurance. I had to move my family and an underserved area lost another physician as my noncompete prevented me from staying. I am currently in a 2-year noncompete cause. Given that our area only has 2 hospital systems, they effectively have a monopoly on cardiology care. Our current salaries are 25% below the mean per national benchmarks since we can change system. Please go forward with your proposal and enable physicians to have choice in employment without us having to move cities and put our kids in new schools."
Tania	"I completely support banning non-compete clauses nationwide. I am a physician and non compete clauses hurt all physicians and other workers as well. Corporations have complete fluidity in this country - workers should have job mobility without penalties as well."
Taylor	"Dear FTC: I am a third year internal medicine resident who will soon be searching for a job. The prospect of a non-compete clause has always been very frustrating to me and my colleagues. For many internal medicine jobs, there is legitimately no reason to enforce a non-compete. For example, hospitalists do not have a patient panel with whom they build long term relationships so there is no reason to prevent them from moving to other facilities to stop them from siphoning off patients. They admit the patients that show up in the emergency department and patients have little if any choice in the matter. All this does is force physicians and other healthcare team members to stay within their system because they would have to uproot their families to practice medicine in a different system. This is non-competitive and leads to more burned out physicians. It also prevents physicians from moonlighting at outside facilities to make additional money and help reduce any their staffing shortages so creates a less efficient healthcare market for providers and patients. I know that the AMA and American Hospital Association are lobbying against this bill, but I promise that rank and file physicians who care for patients daily do not want non-compete clauses in our contracts. It is actively harmful to us economically, personally and professionally."

Ron	"Non-competes are ridiculous and hurt the medical profession and patients."
Cathy	"I am an attorney in New York. When I first began my career as a labor attorney in 1991 non competes were generally considered void against public policy. However, because there was no statute which limited non compete agreements it was up to judges to make determinations if they were allowable. Over the years the cases started coming down on the side of employers until non compete agreements became legal for th most part; even if the employer terminated the employee without cause. My own doctor came to me with a non compete agreement. I had to tell her that she was banned from working at a cancer hospital because it violated her non compete. Her life was disrupted. She was prevented from earning better wages. The community suffered because an important cancer research institute could not hire a talented physician. Non compete agreements are anti capitalist and anti free market and anti American."
Kevin	"Its pretty messed up how corporations use this to supress workers and with it artificially lower wages, that is why im in favor of revoking or at least limiting their ability to do this"
Zach	"Allow free trade for all workers to be able to advance their careers without the risk of unfair non competes"
Eric	" Physicians should be included in the proposed regulations invalidating non-competes. The American hospital association is trying to exclude Physicians so they can continue to restrict physician practices and limit them to legacy hospitals. This has an adverse impact to quality of care, patient outcomes and cost. Since about 2010 onward there has been enormous hospital mergers and acquisitions and consolidation which has driven up costs for patients, taxpayers and insurers without any discernable improvement in outcomes. Physicians are patient advocates. In healthcare, Non-competes are used as a tool to suppress Physicians voice in advocating for patient care over or instead of the bottom line. It is used as a tool to fighter doctors such that if doctors speak out against poor patient care conditions they can be fired and left without an ability to see patients

	and maintain their livelihoods in their city. This has a net negative impact to patient care, outcomes, cost. When the pandemic hit doctors were called upon to provide free services when nurses were being paid surpluses and hospitals and PE backed mega practices were demanding extra payments to manage covid patients. Physicians put their lives on the line out of a duty to serve during the pandemic. Now is time to provide physicians with the basic human decency of being allowed to practice their craft and advocate for patients without fear that a non-compete can allow an employer to leverage termination against a physician having to uproot the lives of themselves and their loved ones. The most egregious part of Non-competes against Physicians is that there is nothing proprietary that the hospitals or practices provide that the physicians can take. It is in fact the Physicians that have the trained expertise that benefits the hospitals and practices. Invalidating non-competes for physicians is not about a money grab its about allowing people who have dedicated their lives to helping people freedom to help people and save lives without being forced to do so in a setting that is not conducive to a healthy physician patient relationship. Those who oppose this like the large hospital systems, the AHA and large PE hacked healthcare practices do so because this would erode their unfair ability to grow in size and limit fair competition in healthcare and support their egregiously high priced cost of care that adversely impacts patients and the public."
John	"Companies of all sizes are enforcing non compete even on lower wage earners restricting their earning potential. Its practice should be banned even on those who have existing non competes. To add employees are forced into non compete and threatened with them when they try to work out simulations to join another firm - I see it's practice on entry level employees to keep them or force the fear of legal implications."
John	"As both a longtime freelancer and a small business owner, I strongly support the proposed rule to ban noncomplete agreements. I was laid off from my job just this week and the company is attempting to have me sign a stringent noncompete, which would severely limit my future employment options. This is a hardship and amounts to a monopoly by a former employer, in that they are seeking to control the market for a service - me - and eliminate competition, namely other potential employers. Thank you for putting forward this common sense rule."
L. René	"Non competition agreement perpetuate power while it suffocates the smaller resources of an individual who is trying to establish his/her self in the industry. Noncompete agreements lack balance from the very beginning at the most vulnerable time of an employee, setting a tone of someone's interest above another. If non competes are removed, the employer s will have to involve the employees in more fair and just negotiations and be willing to share more of the business not just a salary or benefits. My case is related to healthcare business and how the current system punishes the new graduate or the relocated doctor due."
Craig	"This type of law is necessary and should include Training Reimbursement Agreement Programs (TRAPs) as well. Both Non-competes and TRAPs are all to often used to prevent people from seeking better employment. There are situations where both types of agreements can be valid, but most are not used that way. Any contract that prevents some one from practicing their profession, or seeking better employment should not be allowed. The sooner this legislation gets passed, the better. My wife is currently being sued by a woman who is using these contracts to keep young woman working for her at minimum wage. All she is doing is victimized young woman who don't know how to stand up for themselves."

Judith	"non-compete is just another way corporations keep us on pins and needles. what kind of democracy is it when everyone is afraid that taking care of themselves will bring down punishment?"
Lucas	"Non-compete clauses lower market effectiveness by limiting a business ability to attract top talent. To increase productivity and achieve revenue growth new workers must be hired but this is difficult in a field filled with talent that is unable to shift between companies due to legal restrictions. It would make no sense if a worker could leave a company and legally prevent the use of their production, such as code, but the reverse it currently true."
John	"Employers claim that non-compete agreements are necessary to protect trade secrets, it should also be recognized that non-compete agreements can be used by employers to dissuade their unhappy employees from seeking alternative employment options."
Amanda	"Please end this unfair practice."
Ellen	"It's about time that we get rid of non-compete clauses as it hurts workers and our economy. Thank you for proposing this rule."
Todd	"I am employed as a Professor of Surgery by a NY State Cancer Center and am a voluntarily faculty member of the NY State University Department of Surgery. I did not have a no-compete clause when I first joined the institution 20 years ago, but it was required when returning after attempting a brief leadership opportunity elsewhere. Upon return I had to agree to a no-compete clause extending exactly one mile past the location of an academic institution over an hour away in a different city (78 miles). I understand how a doctor who built a personal practice in a local community over a lifetime might be protected by such a clause when bringing in a partner, but this institutional use to protect market share seems extreme and limits my options to find the best opportunity to help patients and advance the science of healthcare. This seems to be at odds of the stated mission of such institutions."
Lauraine	"I believe this is the best choice to allow people to negotiate their own career and destiny. A score for individual vs big business. Vote this in!"
Dina	"As a physician non compete clauses affect our career and should be prohibited"

Abigail	"I would absolutely support the removal of non competes in contracts. We live in a small town and the nearest hospital to work for outside the non compete would be well over 40 minutes away where other opportunities would be within 10 minutes. I have a family of five with three little kids so this commute would be impossible. Also current employer pays less knowing they have the non compete in place. Please remove them"
Holly	"Ban non-complete clauses. They do irreparable harm and you have a chance to do some good here."
Teresa	"As a health care worker (nurse practitioner) in a rural part of NYS non-compete clauses make changing jobs extremely difficult. Please consider including non-profits in this, since most health care facilities, especially those around me are non-profit"
Jane	"I would like to sincerely thank the FTC for your consideration of this rule and for your awareness of the plight of workers caught in these agreements. I am not able to speak publicly because of fear of recrimination from my firm, but I am a female finance professional with strong qualifications and experience. I am subject to an extremely long and comprehensive non compete contract which I was induced to sign at a young age. I have been offered many positions at other firms who would be more willing to provide me with leadership opportunities and a path to further advancement, but I am unable to consider them and I am essentially trapped at my firm. These contracts overwhelmingly favor companies over employees. I've been told by an employment lawyer that this contract is egregious and asymmetrical and would likely be struck down or revised by a judge in court, but I am extremely afraid to jeopardize my career and reputation by attempting to challenge my employer in court. The firm has endless legal resources and even if I ultimately won they would make sure I paid dearly for it. If this proposed ban were to pass, I could simply evaluate the many options open to me and make the best choice for me and for my family. The excuses about trade secrets and training costs making these contracts necessary are feeble— hardly any of us subject to them are in possession of any knowledge of unique value. At my firm we make financial products and there are no secret recipes or techniques that need protection. Thank you to all of you who have worked on this proposal for recognizing the plight of those of us subject to these contracts— I will be actively following this and hoping fervently that you are successful."
John	"Noncompetes are just a way of reducing employee mobility and compensation. In 99% of the cases , they are not warranted. California has done just fine and I would argue thrived without noncompetes"
Kathryn	"As a physician , I believe we must eliminate non-compete clauses in physician contracts. As hospital systems and/or private equity physician groups grow and merge to control larger areas of the country, these noncompete clauses become more and more onerous. One must move out of state away from friends and family to find a new job and even then it could be challenging when a hospital system or private equity physician group is present in multiple states. Additionally, as

	healthcare becomes increasingly focused on profits - there is a very real threat to patient care. Sometimes only way for physicians to protect our patients is the ability to move to a new job where we feel our patient centered focus is valued. Hospitals and large groups are becoming bullies who try to strong arm physicians into compromising on our oath to "1st do no harm" when it comes to patient care. They have more lobbying power, more funds, and more time to fight this important issue. The only reason there aren't more comments on this is because physicians are busy taking care of patients. Please let us continue to do our jobs as intended. Please do not let them win this battle and continue to further deteriorate patient care. Not only that, but the interest hospitals and medical practices claim they want to protect with non- compete can easily be protected with non-disclosure agreements which would also have the advantage of allowing physicians to change jobs when working conditions became intolerable (as they have at many large employers especially since the COVID-19 pandemic) without having to move. Requiring people to move simply to change jobs creates profoundly coercive employment conditions. Thank you for recieving the comment."
Deborah	"My prior employer, a New York City nonprofit, tried to force non-compete agreements on all then-current employees at a level of "manager" or above. (It should be noted that "manager" was a compensation rank, not a description of duties - you did not necessarily have to be supervising staff to be a manager.) This included employees managing volunteer programs, IT staff who installed software and set up computers, nutrition educators, policy researchers, helpline supervisors, etc. When several people objected, the then-president announced that we would not be "required" to sign the non- compete, but that if we did not we would not have "access" to the organization's strategic plan. However, employees were heavily pressured with intimidation tactics to sign the non-competes (at one point a VP actually blocked the exit to a conference room as she was handing them out to be signed). I was fortunate to have a friend who is a labor lawyer and who consulted with me for free and told me I should refuse to sign the non-compete, which would have kept me from working in my field (prospect research fundraising) in all five boroughs of NYC for a period of two years, as written. He advised that I approach the VP and offer to try to negotiate a more reasonable agreement. I did so. Five minutes after I emailed this person, I was called into the president's office who proceeded to scream at me for 15 minutes about how I was spreading rumors that the non-competes were required. I subsequently contacted as many employees as I could outside of the office and shared what my attorney had told me. Due to this, most staff refused to sign the non-competes. The organization then tried to impose them on new hires, then had to give up the non-competes completely because they found they could not hire a marketing director - every good candidate turned down the position due to the non-compete. The reason the organization had tried to require the non- compete's in the first place? The president was angry that an employee in a key position had left for our "competitor," another nonprofit which also served low-income people. (The idea of human services nonprofits competing with each other is disturbing to begin with - we're supposed to be helping people in poverty, not competing with each other.) There was, of course, nothing in the "strategic plan" that subsequently came out that was remotely innovative or secretive. This entire incident left me very anxious and depressed and negatively impacted the mental health of a number of my coworkers, some of the hardest working people I've ever met. Non-competes are about one thing: Power. They are yielded as weapons against workers. They are a way for executives to disempower workers and prevent them from exercising their freedom in a market economy. California has already proven that there is no justification for non-competes. I cannot tell you how overjoyed I was to read of the proposed FTC rule. Please, please pass it. Thank you for this opportunity to comment on this proposed rule."

Andrew	"I am in complete support of this rule being enacted as soon as possible. As a physician and the husband of a physician, both of our careers are severely impacted by non-compete clauses. As it stands, my wife and I would almost certainly have to move cities and likely states (because of the specialized nature of our specific work) if we left our current positions because the non-competes as written would effectively bar us from employment at any other local hospital within our specialty. Every physician we know currently working at a major commercial/non-profit hospital is in a similar position. When they leave a position, our colleagues are left to the whims of whichever specific supervisor or administrator decides whether to "enforce" the non-compete clause. I have personally seen this result in people leave cities/states, uprooting their families, and occasionally entering years of costly litigation. This rule as I interpret it would completely rectify the above issues. In addition to improving physician and other employee lives, this would improve patient access to care."
James	"Non-compete clauses in contracts are anti-capitalist and anti-American. It is a modern form of indentured servitude and should already be illegal under current labor laws. Holding people hostage by threatening their home and livelihood is unacceptable no matter what the profession. They can find another way to deal with -trade secrets," that's just an excuse to suppress wages and growth. Not only are non-competes bad for the economy, they are bad for the environment. Forcing someone to commute 90 minutes by car in order to do a job they could do within walking distance is absurd and wasteful."
Jean	"A non-compete prevents an individual's potential career growth, binding the employee to work in unsatisfactory conditions, the reasons they initiated their seeking to move on from their current employer in the first place. Unsatisfactory conditions can range from a toxic and abusive work environment to simply the structure not being a good fit inhibiting an employee's ability to grow within their current firm. This affects an employee's physical and mental health, affecting the choices they make in their everyday lives. Many people that have grown in their careers and have committed to make a living depending on income to support themselves and their families. To prevent employees from farther developing the specialty in which they formed their careers, it inhibits their career growth, financial stability, and their ability to contribute towards the evolution of the economy. In some states employers can fire employees "At-Will" for no reason at all. Employees deserve the right to fire their employers as well and move on with their careers."

Matthew	"I support this. As someone who currently works within the insurance industry my company has done nothing to supply me with leads to convert to sales. Those opportunities have come because of my network of centers of influence, leads I purchased with my own money or from my family and friends. When I change jobs and those clients follow me, my former employer threatens me with lawsuits and I have to spend my own money to defend myself against false charges. In some cases if there is back pay owed the company refuses to compensate us as a way to enforce their non-compete. Again costing the employee money they can't afford, while the corporation is merely having their on staff lawyers waste time and employees cash. It's time to allow employees and 1099's the freedom we need to select better work environments and compensation for our families."
I	"To Whom it May Concern, I am currently an employee at a multi-billion dollar private equity fund. My employer is based in France and I work out of the secondary office in New York City. My base salary would be more than sufficient in most cities, but for NYC standards it is sufficient to pay rent for my growing family (my wife and I look forward to welcoming our first child this summer), groceries, electricity, and other basics. I do not want anyone to feel bad for me, I consciously chose to live in the city I grew up in and remain near my and my wife's families. Additionally, I fully recognize that my salary is significantly above the nation's average. Furthermore, I have the opportunity to receive an annual bonus, which is completely at the discretion of my boss. Even more so, part of my compensation is tied to long term incentives that vest over seven years and can provide additional upside. Clearly I am financially stable and have nothing to complain about regarding economics, I don't deny that. My contract contains a Non-Compete clause that is broad and purposefully limiting. Before I signed the contract, I had multiple lawyers review the document and they all said "this is not enforceable, you would win in court". Nonetheless, I never want to have to test that view. Based on the contract that I knowingly signed, I can't work for any "employer who makes investments" for one year after my termination. This scope is not limited by the healthcare industry I invest in nor the size of investments my employer focuses on. I've focused my entire education and career on healthcare and such a clause would eliminate my ability to pivot to any type of investing, not that this is something I would want to do or something someone would hire me for. I am now trapped. Within the first year of my employment, at the firm's holiday party, I was sexually groped and propositioned for to go get high at a colleague's apartment. I immediately reported this incident to the HR partner and was told "everyone deserves a second chance" and "can you confirm that someone else saw this happen?" Every day [...] I have to work every day with the knowledge that my employer accepts sexual harassment in the work place. I've also heard sexist and antisemitic remarks, which I reported to multiple Partners. I was told "that is part of French culture", a justification I do not accept nor what to be a part of. I write this as I hope the FTC does not think of non-competes as merely an unfair economic stranglehold on employees. They are also handcuffs that can force people to endure harassment and abuse. They give a license to those that believe it is acceptable to grope, perpetuate sexism, antisemitism, and additional inappropriate behaviors. Yes, I have the freedom to walk away from my job any day. I am not chained to my desk, but I constantly need to weigh the likelihood of being out of

	the industry I've focused my career on for at least a year. There are other ways to retain employees, a happy workplace, providing learning and growth opportunities, long term financial incentives, and/or the opportunity to work on something that makes the world a better or healthier place, to name a few. Non-competes should not be the mechanism to keep employees employed at a certain employer. I do not have a legal or economic argument on the invalidity/validity of non-competes, my goal was to put a real life human example to the destructive captive nature of such clauses. Thank you for your time."
Jessica	"Non competes limit an individuals ability to earn a competitive salary in whatever industry they are part of. Capitalism thrives on competition and having workers unable to "better themselves" due to a non compete; severely limits both companies and individuals abilities to grow/evolve."
Jessica	"Non competes are detrimental to an employees ability to remain competitive and move forward in their careers. They limit a persons ability to earn a living and do not promote growth for an employee or industry."
Robin	"Do it. Please give regular folks a chance against big business and Gov't."
Erik	"Im a optometrist who signed a restrictive covenant with my former employer. The restrictions kept me working for any ophthalmologist in a 15 mile radius from any of their five practice locations for a period of one year, effectively a giant 80 mile circle that took up the entire greater capital region of Albany NY. In order to leave my practice I had to find a job either working for an optometrist or start my own practice. I consulted with a lawyer who advised me that despite the outrageous geographic constraints, there could be precedent for enforcement and a lawsuit. Despite the great risk and uncertainty I quit my job and abided by these restrictions by starting my own practice. I have taken an over 50% reduction in my yearly salary this year and I have one employee while my small little practice survives until these restrictions are lifted. I am getting by but it has been extremely difficult. There is no reason why these covenants should be legal in this country."
Gary	"As a retired law clerk who dealt with a number of cases involving non-compete clauses, I firmly believe that this is an area that need restriction or an outright ban. It is an area rife with abuse. In addition, the legal wrangling over these clauses is a huge waste of time and money."
Fern	"Non-compete clauses need to be eliminated We must take steps in the US to stop the curtailment of workers' rights. This curtailment leads to diminishing of the middle class and to furthering the stupendous income and wealth inequalities that have grown exponentially in this country. We must reverse this trend if we want a democracy here, rather than an oligarchy."
Reva	"Plain and simple I truly believe that employers we have retired from have no business monitoring where we go next On our individual career paths"

Ahmed	"To ban the noncompete clauses will be the best thing ever happen. I totally support the removal of the non-compete clause in employment. It is a human right to work where he likes. It will stop the big employer like hospitals from abusing doctors and stop hospitals from preventing doctors to practice medicine freely and serve the public if they decided to leave or not happy with the hospital administration or their chair/boss. I have noticed that many hospitals/universities abuse doctors and after the doctor resign or the hospital do not renew the contract, hospitals will push doctors either to leave the city which put a significant burden on physician families and prevent the public from physician service. I consider the noncompete clause is kind of twenty century slavery. Non-compete clause is a way for employers to avoid the responsibility of making the work place a desirable place to make a living."
Ronald	"Non competes for employees should be outlawed. People have a right to work. Basic human right."
Fanny	"I wholeheartedly support the proposed rule as written. This will be a small step in tilting the balance away from owners towards workers. Business interests always protest new regulations, but the overwhelming public support shows that this nde is long overdue."
Charles	"This is long overdue protection for workers. I strongly support this rule change."
Zach	"I am for the removal of any non-compete clauses or any similar clauses. They remove the power from people and give it to the businesses. Businesses have shown there is no good faith in anything they do and will use these clauses to keep people under paid and to keep their profits high."
Francisco	"Eliminating the non-compete clause on contracts will stimulate competition and provide freedom of choice for many healthcare workers across the US."
Peter	"I am writing in support of Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200. All workers should have the right to work within the industry of their choosing & expertise without being forced by a non-compete agreement. Employers should not be able to force a worker to give up that right. Especially since many of the non-compete clauses are being used against low-income wage workers who have little recourse to move their homes to another location to seek employment to meet the required restrictions. The use of non-compete clauses is just plain wrong."
L	"I firmly support the abolishment of blanket and mandatory non-compete and non-poaching clauses as a condition of employment. Especially in smaller industries the latter is regularly used to reduce employee mobility and directly impacts the economic mobility of US citizens. My former employer enforces their non-compete clause not through their former employees, but instead through fines and operational restrictions hurried in a non-poaching clause in contracts with their customers and business partners. As someone currently working down a 1 year non-compete, I have had to inform several potential employers that they have a 2 year non-poaching agreement with my former employer. Hiring me would mean they would be penalized, even though my prior position was IT support , and did not include access to intellectual property or other reasonably protected information. Despite moving to a state and region where my former employer neither maintains an office nor employs anyone I have had to find work in a completely different industry."

Ugochi	"In a world already depleted of the much needed healthcare manpower, the non-compete clause not only harms healthy competition but creates a more excruciating situation for individuals, patients, communities, entrepreneurs, and organizations. Imagine a nurse hounded by a non-compete being unable to work in health care or a variety of health care settings. The non-compete clause should be banned."
Dan	"Non compete clauses in worker contracts are simply a scam to drive down wages and benefits for workers in order to maximize the profits of employers. These clauses serve no other purpose, and for anyone to claim that they do is simply lying. They should be eliminated immediately for all new labor agreements, and should also be eliminated retroactively on all past labor agreements."
Adam	"I strongly support removing non-competes. I was laid off on Dec. 30 and signed a non-compete to enable my severance and 2022 bonus. I am now in the market with great skills to share in emergency services and unable."
Matthew	"Dear Chair Khan, As a resident physician , I would like to comment on the ALIA disagreement to the proposed noncompete clause ban. Noncompete clauses are common and often non-negotiable parts of physician contracts. While the AHA tries to make it seem that physicians have substantial power and bargaining ability within their contract negotiations that is often far from the truth. This is especially true for early career physicians, who have substantial debt, young families, and limited options for relocation. Noncompete clauses are anti-competitive in nature and exist in order to exert control over a hospital's workforce. In this regard, there is no difference between hospitals and other industries. The AHA also writes that noncompete clauses improve the retention of physicians in rural healthcare settings. However, the use of noncompete agreements is actually far more prevalent in large cities, and amongst large healthcare organizations with substantial power. The AHA tries to make it seem that due to the COVID-19 pandemic a large number of healthcare personnel want to leave the field so, therefore, hospitals should be exempt from this rule. But they don't write that many healthcare personnel particularly want to leave the healthcare field because of the way that their hospitals and administrators treated them during the pandemic. Many would likely be happy to stay with the field if they could find a better job within the same geographic area, so that they do not have to uproot their families. Burnout is a serious problem in the healthcare workforce and the solution is not to further restrict employment opportunities, and the abilities of clinicians to improve their working conditions. The option to leave a job to find a better one, with better treatment and benefits, is a substantial negotiating position in order to help improve the conditions in one's current employment. Additionally, I find it incredibly disingenuous that the ALIA is trying to use COVID-19 as a tactic in their lobbying

	of the government when the pandemic was far more impactful on clinicians than on hospital leadership and executives, and it's pretty obvious which group with benefit most from the proposed rule exemption. (Please note the large nursing union strikes in the last year over the same issues.) Hospital revenues are actually increasing in the last years (and the only dipped temporarily during the height of the pandemic) and should no longer be used as a pity tactic by some of the largest and most profitable hospital systems, who are the ones sponsoring this lobbying attempt. This is an especially large concern for many hospital employees now that private equity is trying to invest in and take over many hospitals and healthcare systems. These business interests try to cut costs and raise revenues all the while decreasing the quality of patient care and workforce satisfaction, with the ultimate goal of selling the practice or hospital to another firm, while shouldering none of the long-term consequences. Lastly, the AHA try to paint all physicians with the same brush. While some physicians are extremely well compensated, others are much less so (primary care, pediatrics, hospitalist medicine, critical care, psychiatry, endocrinology and diabetes — fields that are facing the most severe shortages of physicians). This is especially an issue when many physicians enter the workforce with upwards of $200,000 in debt, and after 3 to 7 years of residency training, where they are often earning less than $20 an hour working 80 hours per week. Even with income-based repayment plans, interest accrues rapidly meaning that many physicians are actually living in debt for a substantial portion of their adult life, even while they are practicing attending physicians. This is even more so the case for physicians who choose to start a family during their training because if they wait until they're done, they will be in their mid 30s. The vast majority of healthcare workers, including physicians, oppose this obvious attempt by large hospital systems to further control, trap, and exploit their workforce. Please disregard the AHA and their attempts to exclude themselves from this important and useful rule. Thank you and best wishes."
Margret	"I support the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hinder the ability of workers to seek better employment opportunities and negotiate for higher wages, which can have a lasting impact on their careers and livelihoods. Additionally, non-compete clauses have been shown to reduce competition, hinder innovation, and limit entrepreneurship. These clauses can discourage workers from leaving their current job to start a business or join a competing company, ultimately limiting the range of products and services available to consumer. The use of non-compete clauses has been shown to be particularly harmful to low-wage workers, who are unable to negotiate the terms of their employment and are more likely to be subject to abusive clauses. This can create a cycle of economic insecurity and limit the opportunities available to these workers. "The proposed ban on non-compete clauses is a critical step toward creating a more equitable and competitive job market. By limiting the use of these clauses, we can empower workers to pursue better opportunities and foster a more dynamic and innovative economy.""
Laura	"I am a physician and writing in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses as you propose. Increasing numbers of physicians nowadays are employed by health systems and non-compete clauses are being used to prevent them from moving to

	a neighboring health system for better pay, benefits, or treatment. There are no issues of access to proprietary information or training expenditures and other legal approaches can be used to minimize loss of patients from one system to another. Despite this, organizations often prohibit physicians from taking another job within a 50 mile radius. That essentially means that an individual needs to relocate to get another position. Furthermore, non-compete clauses are typically added to new contracts without warning so the individual has little recourse. Thus, the current use of non-compete clauses is anti-competitive and is also anti-family since individuals have little choice but to relocate to escape a problematic workplace. I would also note that the data cited in your document about physicians earning more with non-complete clauses in place was based on information from many years ago with a very small subset of physician practice types. Whether it is relevant at all to today's marketplace is questionable but it certainly should not be taken as fact or as generalizable. Again, thank you for proposing this rule, which will be beneficial for a significant number of workers and their families."
David	"I would like to voice my strong support for the FTC's proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses in the United States, and I also urge the FTC to stick with the plan to not include a "grandfather clause" that maintains existing non-competes when the rule is passed. I work for a small company (-50 employees) that rolled out a draconian non-compete clause to all of us in the past few months, and required us to sign (under threat of termination) before the FTC makes a final decision. They hope that the agreements we sign now will still be allowed to be enforced after the new rule is implemented. I'm sure there are many other companies that are trying the same thing -- please don't let them get away with it!"
Richard	"An employer should not have the ability to effectively hold their worker hostage with threats of legal action. This is an unfair practice that doesn't allow workers their right to free association. Anti-competition is anti small business because it prevents a worker from starting his own business"
Zachary	"Noncompetes limit opportunity for my family. My wife was recently looking for a job, and her opportunities were limited by her noncompete."
Beth Jane	"The only thing an employer should be allowed is to not let an employee reveal company secrets to his or her new employer. An employee should be allowed to take any job they can qualify for."
Nuno	"The removal of Non-Compete and also Non-Solicit agreements would definitely improve the market, giving the ability for workers to move. In large companies and conglomerates where the business covered includes multiple industries and segments makes it impossible for workers to move even when in the current position such worker has no involvement with other parts of the business. The Non-Competes and Non-Solicit agreements generally cover the entire company closing off all movement of employees to work with customers, distributors or anyone involved in partnerships with the company. It would be of great value for employees to be able to move and be able to contribute to grow the market."

Lenny	"I believe that the FTC should ban restrictive covenant clauses for physicians because they are anti-competitive and detrimental to public health. Restrictive covenant clauses can reduce the supply of physicians in certain markets, increase health care costs, and decrease access and quality of care for patients. They can also stifle innovation and collaboration among physicians by creating artificial barriers to entry and exit. The FTC has the authority and responsibility to promote competition in labor markets and protect consumers from unfair trade practices. Banning restrictive covenant clauses for physicians would be consistent with these goals."
Larry	"The non compete clauses need to be eliminated I need to leave my current position and will have difficulty doing that as me lonng time home and family live here. Alternatively I would need to increase my ride to work greatly. NO NON COMPETE CLAUSES please"
Cory	"I am a current otolaryngology resident physician in a major academic hospital in the NYC area. As a medical doctor and one who is graduating from residency in the coming months, I fully support the non-compete clause rule. I believe this will have substantial benefits and allow for a more free market for physicians and encourage more fair compensation. I implore the non-compete clause rule to pass and to include physicians"
Shawn	"I support this: FTC Proposes Rule to Ban Noncompete Clauses. Please help the workers!"
Adam	"Non-compete clauses to contacts absolutely need to be prohibited. They simply are unethical and they deprive individuals of the ability to earn a living, especially in an increasingly monopolistic landscape. Being prohibited from working for a competitor may mean you simply cannot work in your field."
Stephen	"I strongly support this rulemaking action to severely curtail the use of non-compete agreements. The purpose of such agreements is to limit labor power, a project that has been remarkably successful and reflected in one of the largest wealth gaps in history here in the USA. Non-public information and client poaching are still restricted via other means, making this a non-controversial step to deliver more balance to the negotiations between employer and employee. The exception for owners and sellers of businesses appears appropriately narrow and well purposes. I applaud the crafting of this rule and look forward to its implementation."
Kendra	"I think noncompete clauses should be banned. I can't believe they would apply to regular lower wage workers who cannot afford to relocate. In our house, my husband is our families sole breadwinner and a higher level worker, though not c level. The issue is his expertise is very niche. The non compete clauses he has had to sign are basically taking away his opportunity for gainful employment nationwide. Of course, theoretically those non competes may be found by a court of law to be thus technically overbroad. However, in the real world it means threats from the employer and fear for the employee. Going to court is prohibitively expensive, for the employee that is. Several of my husbands colleges have moved to California with the primary reason being they aren't tied to noncompetes there and their work is national no matter their state of residence. I think it is ridiculous to be forced to move to another state to protect you right to continue your career if you leave an employer."

Everett	"The restrictive covenant non-compete clauses are one of the nooses around our doctors' necks in corporate healthcare, where they are stuck doing what they are told to do to patients."
Kathie	"I am completely in favor of forbidding non-compete agreements. 100%!"
Ishaan	"I had a non-compete as a software engineer at a high-frequency trading firm, Citadel Securities, and don't believe they should be legal. When joining the firm, I signed a non-compete of 12 months. Four weeks into the job, my employer told me I would need to sign a new, 24-month, non-compete or I would be fired. I signed. Proponents of non-competes say they are necessary for protecting confidential or proprietary information. The argument goes that some firms have critical secrets (trading algorithms, manufacturing methods, recipes for sodas.) Firms obtain these secrets at great R&D expense, hoping they will increase the company's profits. If employees could join competitors too soon after quitting, competitors would learn secrets without having to invest their own money. Perhaps firms would spend less and less on research, opting instead to hire knowledgeable employees from competitors. Progress would stagnate. I personally don't find this argument very convincing. Is it true that without strict non-competes, companies would be unable to protect secrets? Actually, intellectual property is protected by law in all 50 states by copyrights, patents, and trade-secret laws. These mechanisms protect secrets without limiting job mobility. Non-competes are ripe for abuse by the employer because they alone decide what counts as a competitor and what counts as a trade secret. Non-competes are frequently used even when there are no secrets to protect. For example, one employee in my industry sought to accept a job at a company that helps low-income workers with their resumes and interview skills. Her hedge fund employer prevented her from taking this job because they said the resume editing company was a competitor. Because legal fees would be so expensive, she was effectively left with no recourse. I've also seen non-competes applied to engineers who work on open source code, or are recruiters. Neither employee was exposed to trade secrets, but found it impossible to prove that. Another huge problem is the variability in the length of non-compete enforcement. Non-competes lengths are stipulated as "maximums." A typical agreement says, "You will not work for competitors for up to 18 months after leaving." The actual length of the NC might be 0 months, 18 months, or anywhere in between. The way the actual length is determined shows that noncompetes are used by employers to extract value without even pretending to protect trade secrets. Officially, on your last day of work, HR would review the projects I had worked on, and depending on how secret these projects are, I IR would choose a length, up to 18 months, of NC. In reality, things work differently. From what I've observed, the four most significant factors that determine the length of your non-compete are: * How popular you are at your firm. For example: "Wei is a nice guy but burned out. Give him the entire length so he can recharge". This is non-

	compete as compensation for friends. * Where you want to work next. "George is leaving and going to RivalFirm. We want to hire Jack from RivalFirm, who has a long non-compete. Give George the full length. That way, we can work out an agreement with RivalFirm to reduce George's non-compete if RivalFirm reduces Jack's." This is non-compete as negotiating power. * How prestigious your manager wants to seem. "My employee is leaving. Tell I IR to give him the entire length. Otherwise, my boss won't think the team I manage does important work." This is non-compete as empire-building. * Whether you are still needed on the team. "Jessica handed in her resignation, but we need all the help we can get right now. Tell her that if she quits, we will enforce a 24-month non-compete, but if she works for another 12 months, we will only enforce 12 months." This is non-compete as a deterrent to quitting. I have seen examples of each of these at my firm. Protecting secrets, the purported reason non-competes exist, is not on the list."
Brett	"This is one of the best rules the ftc has come up with in a long time don't listen to all of the bs from the chamber of commerce who is supposed to be in favor of free markets that all of the sudden they don't like free markets when it comes to non compete clauses. Us workers appreciate an ftc that actually doesn't tip the scales in favor of business all we ask for is a fair system. Do not grant an extension on comments either if the chamber of commerce wants to go to court to explain why they are not in favor of the free market let them so it. It would be funny to watch. Thank you."
Alan	"Dear FTC, I am writing to provide input on the issue of whether physicians should be exempted from the sweeping ban on non-compete clauses. I understand that the American Hospital Association (ALIA) is arguing to exclude physicians from this ban, but I believe that exempting physicians would be a bad idea and would undermine the FTC's efforts to promote competition and innovation. While I acknowledge that the AHA opposes a sweeping ban of non-compete clauses, it is important to consider the potential negative consequences of allowing such clauses for physicians. Non-compete clauses can restrict a worker's ability to find employment in their field, limiting job opportunities and hindering economic growth. Allowing non-compete clauses for physicians would create an unfair advantage for medical employers and limit the freedom of physicians to pursue their careers. In addition, exempting physicians from the ban on non-compete clauses could negatively impact patient care. Non-compete clauses could limit the ability of physicians to practice in certain geographic areas or to work for competitors of their former employers. This could result in a reduced number of physicians available to provide medical services in a particular area, leading to decreased access to care for patients in need. Patients may have to travel further to see a physician or may have limited options for medical care altogether. Moreover, non-compete clauses may lead to the loss of continuity of care for patients. Patients who have established relationships with their physicians may be forced to seek out new providers if their physician leaves their practice or is unable to work in the same geographic area due to a non-compete clause. This can lead to disruptions in care, such as delayed diagnoses or treatment, and may result in poorer health outcomes for patients. Finally, non-compete clauses may

	limit the ability of physicians to engage in medical research, teaching, or other activities that could benefit patient care. For example, a physician who is prohibited from working for a competitor may be unable to participate in clinical trials or collaborate with colleagues at other institutions, which could limit their ability to learn about new treatments or share knowledge with others. In summary, allowing non-compete clauses for physicians could lead to reduced access to care, disruptions in continuity of care, and limitations on physicians' ability to engage in activities that could benefit patient care. For these reasons, exempting physicians from the FTC's sweeping ban on non-compete clauses is not in the best interests of patients or the public. The FTC's ban on non-compete clauses is a step in the right direction to promote competition and innovation, which can benefit consumers and drive economic growth. Allowing physicians to be exempted from this policy would undermine its effectiveness, harm patients, and provide an unfair advantage to medical employers. Therefore, I urge the FTC to maintain its current policy and not exempt physicians from the ban on non-compete clauses. Thank you for your consideration."
Yoni	"I have been practicing medicine for 30 years. Every job for which I have applied has required a non compete clause. The first one required me to sign a non compete which would have prevented me working for one year within a 10 mile radius of this job location, after quitting or being let go. I questioned this because the job was located near my home, and a 10 mile radius would have meant driving for more than an hour in any direction. I received no answer to my question and the application process ended. From that moment, I discovered that every practice, whether solo or large group required non competes. I have read through the comments and have concluded that the employers who support non competes have no regard for the well being of their employees or are too insecure to believe in the stability of their own businesses. In fact, these employers believe in the opposite of capitalism. They wish to control the competition unfairly. If a patient or many patients leave a practice with their preferred doctor, that is the patients' right to do so. While I can understand that an employer may not want the anyone who leaves the practice to inform the patients that they are leaving and where they are going, or to take a list of the patients, that can be included in a contract without requiring a non compete. An employee should have the right to work where they want whenever they want. I applaud the FTC for getting rid of this terrible idea."
Gabriel	"I strongly support the proposed rule and agree that it would improve the efficiency and competitiveness of labor markets. I was forced to sign a noncompete as a condition of employment for a seasonal tax preparation position. The noncompete period was 3 times as long as my seasonal employment. I found this highly unfair but badly needed the experience. Please stop companies from taking advantage of desperate workers."
Richard	"This is a fantastic proposal that I support 100%. I actually thought this was illegal already because ifs so obviously unfair and anti-competitive."
Aileen	"Non compete clauses should be made illegal and no physician should be forced to sign one. They only stand to force physicians to remain in jobs longer than they

	desire to and to accept being paid less than market value for their skill, training, and expertise. The hospital administrators who support these non compete clauses are not subject to the same. Many physicians have been forced to uproot their families or endure long commutes if they want to change jobs, especially physicians who are highly specialized. These non compete clauses are unethical and need to be removed."
K	"Please pass this bill. People should be free to move jobs when it is best for them. Businesses should work hard to retain workers because they are good places to work- and not be places where people are forced to work because they signed a non-compete."
Kennisha	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Andrew	"I am strongly in support of eliminating non-compete clauses for workers, especially those who don't have access to genuine industry secrets. Blue- and white-collar workers, in many cases even those in low-level positions, are adversely, unnecessarily, and unfairly affected by these non-compete clauses, and they're merely used as a tool to keep leverage over their workers in another way. Please end them to stop these unjust practices and at least allow for free movement in the labor force."
Aqeel	"Non-compete clause in physician contracts is unfair. It threatens our livelihood. It also jeopardizes access to care for our patients. I fully support removing them and make it an even playing field for every individual who is trying to earn their living by fair means and hardwork. Thanks"
Nadine	"I support a ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down by discouraging workers from accepting better jobs in the fields where they have some expertise. When I was in my 20s working as a novice news reporter , my employer required me to sign a one-page contract meant to keep me from working for the competition. I was hired away anyway, after which the first employer sued both my new employer and me. Fortunately, my new employer took over my defense and it was not long before the court rejected a temporary injunction meant to keep me from working for the new employer and then the plaintiff dropped the case. This proposed policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth without being harassed with litigation."
Nadine	"When I was a 20-something, I got my first travel industry job at a weekly travel trade publication. The then-owner and publisher required me to sign what he considered a noncompete agreement, meaning he didn't want me to work for other travel trade publications. This was a one-page "contract" of sorts that covered title, salary and my obligation to protect company secrets. It never seemed like a big deal. About a year and half after I signed that piece of paper, I took a job with a

	competitor, which came with a nice pay hike. On my last day with the old employer, I was served with papers in a lawsuit asserting I had violated that contract and seeking a temporary restraining order to keep me from taking my new job while the case was pending. The owner/publisher sued my new employer, as well. I was lucky because the document was an extremely poor example of a noncompete agreement and my new employer took on my legal defense. There was no TRO and the lawsuit went nowhere. I know my life would have taken quite a different course if I had been forced to stay with the old employer. I was job hunting and would have wound up in a different industry. Not my preference. This is just my personal reason I support the FTC proposal to outlaw noncompetes as they apply to all employees at all levels as well as to independent contractors. Looking at the bigger picture, the rule promises to put more money into the pockets of workers who need it most and to help close gender and racial wage gaps, all while stimulating the creation of new companies and their promise of more jobs and creativity in the marketplace."
Gene	"Non compete clause are unjust as it goes against everything our country stands for. It restricts us from persuing opportunities in our chosen fields wether they're around the corner or 100 miles away."
Andrew	"I worked as a non-exempt employee for a company that made rugged displays and computers for military use. It was less than an hour from my home. I had signed a compulsory non-compete agreement that prevented me from working for a competitor for two years and within a 250 mile radius if I left voluntarily. This company sold products world wide, so a 250 mile radius was meaningless to them competitively and would only have the affect of making me move if I found work with a (very) distant competitor. This 250 mile radius eliminated almost the entirety of New York State, NJ, Connecticut and everything up to Maine and down to Virginia to consider for future employment in my specialized field. After 6 years the company wanted me to leave, but firing me would have voided the non-compete. Instead they reduced my salary, made life there a bit more difficult, told me to leave, and inferred that additional salary reductions were an option if I didn't. Although an old (local) employer in the same business wanted me back, they did not want to risk the expense of litigation and did not make me an offer. My options were very limited, but after six months of searching I found a new job in Wilton Connecticut with a non-competing company. It should be noted that my new job was now a 1.5 hour commute each way and would still have been well within the 250 mile radius stated in the non-compete."
Marcy	"Non-compete clauses harm workers. There is simply no valid reason for any employer to be able to restrict a former employee's future employment. If employers want to retain people, they need to start treating them fairly instead of making them sign non-compete agreements."
Bronwyn	"The non compete is a violation of freedom where healthcare professionals are controlled, monopolized and exploited. The fairness demonstrated across other professions of free professional mobility should be a fundamental right within the healthcare industry. Employment satisfaction and reduction of burnout is essential for the survival of medical professionals, otherwise, we will leave the field. I personally have left the bedside due to dissatisfaction of fair treatment within the industry, and many will follow."

Joshua	" Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency."
Katherine	"I am an American citizen, a voter, and a businesswoman in the staffing and recruiting industry. I am STRONGLY in favor of the Non-Compete Clause Rule. In our business we see every day the negative impacts of non-compete clauses including keeping people in jobs that they don't like and driving down wages. We have had staff members sued by former employers, preventing them from earning a living for their families when they only want to do an honest job. These people were not stealing IP or engaging in behavior that hurt their former employers, other than giving them competition. Isn't that what capitalism is about? Congratulations to the FTC for proposing this rule."
Sarah	"I am a veterinarian and opposed to non- competes. They are common in my field and they inhibit the free market and competition. If a company cannot retain an employee, than another company (including a new one started by the former employee) should be able to benefit from this person's labor and talents without restriction. Dictating where a person can work after they have left a position is fundamentally in opposition to a free labor market."
CHLOE	"I support banning non compete contracts because they are an unfair limitation on workers' rights and their ability to find the best jobs that they can. These contracts are exploitative and unAmerican and allow corporations to limit workers' rights in a time when corporate profits are running high and wages are not what they should be."

Carl	"I'm a physician practicing anesthesiology in the New York City and Westchester, NY area. Most anesthesia provider jobs in my area are covered by contracts with a few large corporations which severely limits finding a new job. Especially with a 30mile as the crow flies restriction. I'm in favor of completely removing the non-compete restrictive covenant from anesthesiologist contracts. We do not bring patients to the hospital to provide services. We are not stealing patients from any place we may be providing services to. We are only providing anesthesia services to patients that are brought to various procedure sites or hospitals by the physician surgeon or physician endoscopist. We have been bullied by this limitation on compete too long for fear of expensive legal defense when seeking a better job near where we live. Please adopt a policy removing all non compete clauses with some limitation on physicians selling the practice to a corporation. Thank you. Carl Greenberg, MD"
Roman	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements."
Wei Jun	"I am writing to you to express my strong belief that non-compete agreements for physicians should be made illegal. Non-compete agreements are contractual agreements between an employer and employee, which prohibit the employee from working for a competitor or starting their own business in the same industry for a certain period of time. In the case of physicians, these agreements can have a detrimental impact on patient care and access to healthcare services. Non-compete agreements for physicians can limit patients' access to medical care, particularly in rural or underserved areas, by preventing doctors from practicing within a certain geographic radius. This can lead to patients traveling long distances to receive medical care, which can be particularly challenging for elderly or low-income individuals. It can also lead to an increase in healthcare costs as physicians who are able to practice in certain areas can charge higher fees due to decreased competition. Moreover, non-compete agreements for physicians can hinder the quality of medical care as it can prevent physicians from pursuing alternative opportunities that may better serve their patients' needs. For example, a physician may wish to leave their current practice to join a hospital that offers more advanced medical equipment or more specialized services. However, if they have signed a non-compete agreement, they may be prevented from doing so, resulting in their patients being unable to access these services. Furthermore, non-compete agreements for physicians can also have negative consequences for the physicians themselves. These agreements can limit their ability to negotiate their salaries or benefits, as they may not have the option to leave their current practice for a better opportunity. Additionally, it can restrict their ability to pursue their chosen field of medicine or to work with patients they have developed strong relationships with. In conclusion, non-compete agreements for physicians can have far-reaching negative consequences for patients, healthcare providers, and the healthcare system as a whole. I strongly urge the government to consider banning non-compete agreements for physicians and to work towards creating a healthcare system that prioritizes patient care and access to medical services. Thank you for your attention to this important matter. Sincerely, Dr. Wei Jun Gu"

Mark	"Non-competes severely limit physician rights to fair negotiations and access to better jobs, if locked in by a non-compete and therefore unable to stay/work in the same region. This is unduly burdensome to workers and gives too much power to corporations. This rule should ban non competes for all physician practices, both for-profit and not-for-profit."
Alex	"Non compete clauses should be abolished. A great number of physicians are affected by it and are unable to provide services elsewhere in the same geographical area."
Kathleen	"As a physician with three children it is daunting to know that in order to change jobs I would have to either leave my children longer during the day for a very long commute, or uproot them altogether and move to a new community. Please please eliminate our non-compete."
Jessica	" Physicians took an oath to put patients first, they also have a fiduciary responsibility to their patients. The corporate practice of medicine is illegal in most states. Noncompete agreements are in direct conflict with the ethical practice of Medicine because they put Physician's at risk of being strong, aimed into practicing unethical medicine, and into putting their employers over their patients. Physician should have a right to work and move freely just like every other person. Physicians are the value creators. There's no intellectual property or business value that is created by health system employers -they bring patients and doctors together, they are compensated, handsomely for that service, and they should have no further influence or jurisdiction over the practice of medicine"
Nikola	"I am strongly in favor of this proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses limit job mobility and can stifle competition and innovation. They're bad for worker autonomy and widen the power differential between employers and employees. Banning non-compete clauses will give sonic small amount of agency and self-determination back to workers. In addition, sonic workers currently under non-compete clauses will have the option to take their relevant skills and pursue freelance work alongside their jobs, which I hope would give people the opportunity to better their economic circumstances."
SHARIQ	"I am a young child and adolescent psychiatrist , considering a position in a larger city. My options are either to be employed or to go into private practice. Going into private practice right away with me and that I potentially have slow growth of my business as a learning the ropes. Working for a established business will help me to gain experience, however I am worried if I do not like the position and tends to leave after a year and may have to move to a different city entirely or to the other end of the city. This would preclude me from having to buy a house or put down roots which would be detrimental to myself and my family. I feel like banning non competes will keep the market more favorable and would keep the power of mobility in the hands of the patient in terms of who they wanted to have as their therapist or psychiatrist. This autonomy is really what makes the healthcare marketplace flexible and feasible. Therefore I am in favor of banning noncompete contracts as it would be beneficial for the employee and the patient."

Patricia	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people, in effect forcing a person to only be employed by one company. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Joshua	"Non compete rules are damaging to fair compensation and harm employees at the benefit of corporations. Please eliminate these clauses and ensure physicians, who are disproportionately impacted by them, are protected."
Jie	"I work at multiple hospitals in upstate New York through a company. Because I am a traveler, they have each have a non-compete for each. If I have to quit the company I have to move from upstate New York. On top of that, some how the hospital 12 miles from home is off limit for me due to non- compete."
Bridgette	"I'm a nurse practitioner currently working in family medicine. I fully support this change. Non-compete clauses are worsening the burnout crisis in healthcare. Furthermore, forcing providers to move to a different location leaves a gap in the available healthcare providers in the former area of practice. I work in primary care, which is experiencing a shortage of providers. Relocation or forcing providers into a different specialty worsens the gaps in primary care which are already critical. The clauses hurt patients as well as providers."
Donna	"I support the ruling to eliminate non compete clauses in the workplace. I am a physician and have been subjected to non competes in the past and it severely limits ability to work outside the health system that is imposing the non competes. I left a trinity system 7 years ago and only applied to 3 local jobs that did not violate the non compete. I did not want to apply outside the radius where non compete was enforced as i did not want to uproot my family. I did take one of the positions but it was a significant pay cut and it is a niche area of practice. If I had sought a position in traditional office based practice close to my home I would have left myself open to lawsuit by the former employer. I was not willing to take that risk. I do not think our society can afford these non competes in health care given the shortage of people willing to subject themselves to the ever increasing stress of our over burdened health care system."
Marie	"I support the ruling to eliminate non compete clauses in the workplace. My mom is a physician and has been subjected to non competes in the past and it severely limits ability to work outside the health system that is imposing the non competes. She left a trinity system 7 years ago and only applied to 3 local jobs that did not violate the non compete. She did not want to apply outside the radius where non compete was enforced as she did not want to uproot our family. She did take one of the positions but it was a significant pay cut and it is a niche area of practice. If she had sought a position in traditional office based practice close to my home she would have left herself open to lawsuit by the former employer. She was not willing to take that risk. I do not think our society can afford these non competes in health care given the shortage of people willing to subject themselves to the ever increasing stress of our over burdened health care system."

Gerard	"I am a 64-year-old Male that has been in the Telecommunications Industry since 1983. I reside in the State of New York. I worked for a single Company from 1989-2021 (32 Years). In July of 2021 I held the position of Sales Executive. I resigned my position effective July 12,2021. When I resigned I was under a Covenant of Non-Compete. My understanding of the Non-Compete was that the term was for one year and restricted me from soliciting any current or future/potential company Clients across the globe and prohibiting the sharing of any Company data with any entity. After my resignation I took a year off complying with my understanding of the non-compete. One year after my resignation I began working for a Company Competitor. Shortly afterward, I and my new Company received a letter from a Law Firm representing my old firm demanding that I cease my employment under threat of legal action. Included with the letter was an executed Compensation plan that was hastily executed by me at the last hour of a week's long sales meeting. Embedded in the agreement was a section that increased the Non- Compete from 1-2 years. Upon receipt of the letter my new Company put me on unpaid leave. I knew that the terms of the Non-Compete were not enforceable in New York. I engaged an attorney and eventually after several months came to an agreement that still left major restrictions on my future employment. This cost me $5,000 in Legal fees. If I was willing to spend approx. $50,000 I could have taken my old Employer to court and probably would have won due to the onerous conditions of the non-compete. Being so close to retirement, I couldn't take the risk of depleting my retirement savings hence I am still under restrictions on who I can solicit through October of 2023. From my experience, non competes are used to severely restrict an individual from making a living in the field that they have developed experience in. Companies utilize non competes to bully their employees with threats of legal action utilizing their unlimited legal resources. From my perspective non competes by nature are a restriction of trade that places the burden on the American Worker and should be eliminated or at a minimum heavily regulated by the Federal Trade Commission."
Paula	"I support banning Noncompete clauses. These punish workers who might need to leave a job due to poor working conditions or low pay. They provide no value to the American worker or to the economy. Noncompete clauses don't belong in a free democracy and harken back to the days of indentured servitude."
Stefan	"I think this rule is amazing."
Melissa	"I am in support of this change non competes are limiting for individuals whom have a specialty and affects his or her livelihood adversely"
Elsa	"This is a great step forward for small-time consultants . I have been alarmed by the space of time--up to 3 years on a 3-month contract--and for an indefinite contract, I had to negotiate to get from 3 years to 2 years. Interpretations of non-compete clauses seem to be wide-ranging in small companies. In one personal experience, I was warned that a contract with an arm of county government I had would be considered competitive if it grew into a contract with the county based on the fact that my new client used to work for the county. This seems very far-reaching. I look forward to this clause being removed."

Lawrence	"Banning non-compete clauses would open up job for 30 million Americans! HELP STIMULATE THE ECONOMY AND EMPLOY MORE PEOPLE!!!!"
Day	"I wholeheartedly agree with the non-compete ban as proposed by FTC. I'm a doctor and can attest to the stifling effect non-competes have on physician placement, mobility and within-system growth. A doctor or other practitioner with a non-compete is forced into a major geographic relocation or impracticable commutes for a modest salary or working condition improvements. The resulting salary stagnation has two negative knock-on effects for patients and healthcare: one, it encourages exploitation by employers; and two, it drives outmigration of doctors from areas where they're most needed-- rural areas-- now dominated by one or two health systems. Wholehearted support for this overdue change!"
Dawn	"Non-Compete clauses which are used by businesses should be struck down. They are harming workers (and their families) by forcing them to drive great distances to find work. Businesses are permitted competition, and workers should absolutely be able to compete for the best jobs near their homes."
Uri	"In my most recent job I signed a non-compete clause both before employment and after my employment ended that restricted, for a year, who I could work for. I am still within that year and have yet to find a job. This was the clause: "During the twelve (12) months following the termination of employment Employee may not, without the Company's written consent, solicit, sell or perform, for his/her own account or for any other entity, services or products which are directly or indirectly competitive with the services or products of the Company to or for any client for which Employee or employees under his/her managerial control have solicited, sold or performed any such services or products on behalf of the Company during any part of the year immediately preceding the termination of his/her employment." And less applicable to my situation: "During the twelve (12) months following the termination of employment, Employee may not directly or indirectly hire any employee of the Company or any former Company employee within six months after the date such person ceases to be a Company employee for his/her own account or on behalf of any individual, corporation or other entity other than the Company, nor attempt to directly or indirectly induce or solicit any such employee to leave the employ of the Company or to apply for or accept employment with any individual, corporation, or other entity." The company I worked for was a very large consulting company and they work with many different companies. This was also my first full time job which meant that the only experience I had as a software engineer was in consulting and I was restricted from working for another consulting firm. I couldn't work in the one field I had experience in and a very large field at that. I was also restricted from working for the client I had been placed at which meant even if the client liked my work and now wanted to hire me after my employer chose to lay me off, they weren't allowed to. The clause is also very

	vague and while my understanding is that it refers only to other consulting companies, they might have a more expansive view of what constitutes a direct or indirect competitor. It's possible since I worked for their financial services sector that they would consider all financial services companies off-limits. In an even clearer scenario, if an employee who had worked directly for one of the banks or insurance companies and had signed one of these clauses they would now be restricted from working for all other banks or insurance companies and maybe even other related institutions, which means they are being prevented from working in their field of expertise. Or worse, for an employee of a company that has products and services across a wide variety of industries, this clause would prevent them from working in all of those industries and would significantly shrink their job possibilities, potentially leaving them unemployed for a very long time. These non-compete clauses are problematic and I agree with the FTC that they unfairly harm workers and should be harmed."
Judy	"Non-competes are anti-American! Please vote to stop them."
Harold T.	"I support the FTC's ban on non-competition clauses. Years ago, my wife, a veterinarian, worked subject to such a clause in her contract with an employer; when she left that job that arrangement made her life annoyingly difficult for a while. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Desmonique	"During the pandemic my husband was unable to work and my family was in a financial struggle . I looked for another opportunity and was unable to take the position due to the non compete. This was a potential 50,000 pay increase. I now have to work 74 hours a week and two jobs because I can't let the one go. My family is now financially and mentally struggling due to my absences"
Jane Date	"Non-competes are a burden not only to the employee but also to society. I am a physician in a highly populated city, where there is a great need for my work no matter where I choose to work. My hospital is currently proposing a non-compete that excludes every other large hospital system in the area, and is far encompassing and holds me the my entire contract. Whether there is a need or better conditions elsewhere, this clause would keep me at this one hospital, OR force me to move away from the area entirely, OR simply step away from my job. This exacerbates physician shortages and access to care, as clearly outlined by my choices above. If the work conditions at my hospital were to deteriorate, I would have no recourse to leave, and then my choices would be to either leave medicine entirely, or move to a completely different region, thus the region losing another health care worker. The allowance of noncompetes allows employers to ignore the needs of employees, in that they feel secure that employees as myself would be forced to either stay in the position, or just leave, and they assume that the latter is not even a choice. Furthermore, the idea that the noncompete is necessary for the protection of the hospital or practice is completely unfounded, particularly in areas of high need. There is no harm, as there is no loss of patients or revenue to the hospital when any one physician leaves. If many were to leave at once, that would indicate that the hospital or practice is in fact in need of change, and should not be allowed to continue in the manner that they are. Most importantly, the current proposal does not apply to non-profit hospitals, but it really should. Most all hospital systems are labeled as "nonprofit," despite operating like any other for profit institution. By excluding "nonprofit" hospitals and hospital systems, this is hurting the large number of health care workers as outlined above, with no recourse. I highly support and urge for the proposal to go forward and to include non-profit entities, particularly hospitals and hospital systems, in the verbiage of the proposal."

Debra	"Thank you for taking up this issue and extending the public comment period. I firmly believe that companies are unfairly using non-compete clauses just to lower their labor costs and not to protect vital company information. My son-in-law was not allowed to take a job offer in another state where his wife was employed because of a 2-year period non-compete law that his employer had in all contracts. Please ban these. Thank you."
Becky	"I wholeheartedly support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements."
David	"I strongly support the ban of non-compete clauses as they only serve to restrict employees and enrich employers, the power imbalance is held over employees heads as leverage for raises and promotions."
Ben	"I am highly in favor of this change. Non-competes put an undue burden on American workers and are routinely abused by businesses to restrict their freedom of economic movement."
Ifeoma	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. As a physician I have directly felt their impact and saw how it impacted the patients I was no longer able to serve since I had to leave the community in order to leave my job."
Roody	"To whom it may concern, I fully support the non-compete clause rule. Thank you. Best, Roody Innocent"
Jethro	"This could be one of the most important changes to the tech industry in years. Please make this happen."
Muhammad	"This rule is going to increase competition and that's capitalism. Let's pass this rule."
Brandon	"Non-compete clauses are an egregious violation of widely-held principles about the value of competition in the American economy. They are also unfair to workers, biasing the labor market against them. These biases in the labor market have led to wage stagnation and increasing inequality since the 1970s. Getting rid of non-competes would be a step toward more competitive, fair, and less fragile economy."

T	"I'm strongly opposed to non-compete agreements. They should be banned unilaterally. I've been personally negatively impacted by non-compete agreements as a management-level professional. It's particularly painful during an economically challenging time, having been laid off, to have further legal restrictions limiting one's options when you're struggling to find another job and keep the lights on. Individuals should not carry this burden - the scales have been tipped in the favor of employers for too long, and this goes for ANY size of business, any industry and all levels of employee skill/seniority. It bears mentioning that anti-disparagement clauses are equally punitive and unjust and should be banned."
Shari	"The non compete clause is an act of bullying by the more powerful employer and the employee, who needs the job must submit. This is giving one party much more power over another in a very unfair tactic. This is completely not respectful of another's rights and interferes with fair labor practices. It needs to be banned."
Luke	"Non-compete agreements should be banned. They hurt workers' wages and the economy."
Doriel	"As a therapist , non-competes are harmful to both myself and, more importantly, my patients. A therapeutic relationship is a deep, meaningful, and often life-saving relationship for many. A non-compete can force a patient to non-consensually forego that relationship due to institutional constraints (largely driven by greed and territorialism). A therapy practice is supposed to serve patients and have their best interests in mind. A non-compete, forcing a patient to prematurely end treatment with a therapist in a traumatizing way due to the ways in which practice directors handle therapists changing jobs), is completely contradictory to what therapy and the helping professions are all about. I am strongly opposed to non-competes in all sectors of the economy, and especially so in the fields of psychotherapy and psychiatry."
Neil	"I am writing as a physician to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting non-compete agreements. Physicians who leave a hospital system currently have two options: stop working temporarily or upend their life to have a job. It's an unethical tool to restrict physician independence, not seen in any other industry. After 7-13 years of postgraduate training to become a highly skilled member of society that fulfills a genuine need in our communities, how is it fair that once again we are not free members of the labor market, but rather placed in a stranglehold by hospital administrators? Exempting physicians from prohibiting a noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations. It could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. This in turn, hurts patient care. I strongly urge the FTC to stand up for physicians, who give so much of our lives to taking care of others, and deserve to be free from non-compete agreements."

Christophe	"Noncompetes are silly and unjustly burden employees and freelancers from doing work."
Jack	"At my first job out of college, I had to sign a non compete which would have prevented me from working with every CPG in the world. I signed and then when the company failed 6 months later, decided to violate the contract and go to a competitor. Non competes suck, get rid of them."
Vinni	"I support banning no compete clause. It is choking medical practitioners and gives unjustified control over employers."
Scott	"I support this new proposed rule! I have been caught up twice in career with non compete agreements that I was forced to sign as part of my employment (or go unemployed) and then which took costly legal work to make go away. I work in a fairly specific field so I can't just go work in another industry for a year. Because of this, I spent the first 12-18 months of now two jobs feeling stress that anything I might do could land me in a costly law suit with my previous employer. Why not say "you can't demonstrably steal client, but you can leave at any time that the job is no longer right for you. It is time!!!"
Scott	"The practice of companies forcing employees to sign non-compete clauses has cost me one job (where the potential employer was unwilling to risk the complications), and cost another employer that WAS willing to deal with the issue considerable legal fees - just to iron out what I would NOT do as I made my employment transition. As I consider future options, I do not anticipate finding another employer who will pay these legal fees, so I will have to shoulder them myself. This is just another example of how the United States "the land of freedom" enslaves employees for the benefit of employers!"
Jordan	"Speaking as an American worker, the concept of non-compete clauses is craven and arguably a barrier to an employee's "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," those unalienable rights laid out in our Declaration of Independence. I am in favor of banning them."
Monil	"Non-compete clauses are extremely damaging to workers. I have been personally negatively affected by my non-compete clause. I worked at amazon as a software engineer , Apple reached out to me for a job working on the same technology I worked on. I had a non-compete and I had to withdraw from the position because I was worried that my then employer would sue me."
Alissa	"Reasons against non-competes: * What's meant to be short term protection of trade secrets/confidential info for employers has turned into long term binding contracts that prevent employees from legitimate work * Highly-skilled former employees unable to use their legitimate skillsets elsewhere * Former employers completely monopolize skill sets and hard work of employees for certain time periods * Increased legal liability and lawsuits that are oftentimes unnecessary *

	The agreement lowers employee satisfaction, prevents upward movement for the employee * Reduced wages * Depressed labor market, lowers mobility"
ROBIN	"Noncompete clauses should be illegal. Employees are not property. Many employers who use these prey on the poorest and most desperate in many cases, and in any case the employer does not OWN that person. When they're no longer employed there they should be FREE of the former employer. Where specific intellectual property or copyrights etc are involved, sure, have a clause. But at hamburger joints? That's nothing but an attempt to OWN people who are underpaid & mistreated."
sam	"I think I am a perfect example of being trapped by non-compete clauses. I work for a recruitment agency and have been in my current role for 10 years. I turn down approaches and offers constantly and I fear starting my own business due to the legal stonn that would follow me. This is the 3rd agency I have worked for, when I moved to the second my previous company made my life a living hell for the first 6 months of my new role. I was 22 years old and it was terrible. This change must happen to promote entrepreneurship and release the legal stranglehold on workers like me who have innovation and new ideas to offer the world."
Bob	"I work in the finance (hedge fund) industry as a portfolio manager and I support this rule. Just like in any industry, non-competes stifle innovation by not allowing highly skilled workers to switch jobs. Even if the non-compete is a paid one, not being able to use one's skills cause these skills to dull over time. One criticism that was raised against removing non-competes was that it would cause high correlation between hedge funds and it would increase systemic risk. I think this is nonsense. First, removing non-competes do not mean removing intellectual property (IP) protection. IP protection is the ultimate control against creating correlated returns among hedge funds. Second, new ideas will always be scrutinized and evaluated objectively at a new team. Doing away with non-competes would mean more tax income for the people (people make more money when they are working), and more productive work force. Imagine this: if an employee who is subject to a 1 yr non-compete in each job chose to switch jobs 5 times throughout their career, that is 5 years of wasted economic output. That also means 5 years of not being able to train junior employees. Yes, it would hurt some businesses, and I personally may get hurt as well if one of my employees left the firm with my knowhow. But in the final analysis, I think this is a good thing for innovation to thrive"
R	"I began working for my employer 10 years ago as a very young and inexperienced single mother. I desperately needed a job that could pay more than minimum wage, and I eagerly accepted my position and non-compete status. I have now been working at almost the same rate of pay (as raises are not readily given to us regardless of recessions or cost of living increases) - for a DECADE. My children are approaching college age, and I will absolutely need a higher income to help hind their educations. The freedom to seek a higher competitive wage to improve economic stability should ALWAYS be a right in this free country. I don't want to claim benefits. All I'm asking for is an equal opportunity for upward mobility in my field of expertise. Thank you."

A	"I fully support the FTC proposal to ban non-compete agreements. As a chiropractor and ex-employee, the non-compete agreement was a non-negotiable part of the contract, and currently places an unfair restriction on my ability to use my training to earn a living and contribute to the economy in a 'free market'."
Heather	"I support this! Non competes should be illegal. They prevent employees from being mobile and force them to stay in an inequitable or abusive workplace. As a physician non competes prevent me from serving other communities and is bad for patient care"
stuart	"As a practicing Physician for over thirty years, and one who trained fellows in pain management, who followed many of their students careers, I was able to see the detriments of unfair Non-Compete clauses in their contracts. Often a physician would take a job, and if it did not work out, the restrictions were so severe, that they would need to move to a new geographic location in order to be employed. This clearly would be unfair if that person and their family had roots in the community where the job was located. For example if the employer did not proceed to make the employee a partner, and only allowed them to continue as an employee, and limit their income, they would never achieve their potential, but be stuck. Their Spouse may have a great career, or the kids if there are any may be entrenched in educational programs they are thriving in, and the family does not want to move. This makes no sense. That Employee would likely have opportunities to stay and thrive right in the community they were in. This would allow for fairer competition for both parties. Other scenarios exist as well. Where large institutions can block scientific discovery of their research physicians from moving to other institutions which may be better able to support their research, potentially blocking the promotion of scientific discovery. All of this clearly effects the salaries of the employees, in this case the physicians in a negative way, as once the employee realizes that their staff has no options in their local area, and is locked in to that area, they have no incentive to improve the offering of the benefits package."
Joshua	"Non Compete's are just wrong. Everyone should have the right to work wherever they went whenever they want. We are a capitalist society and the workers should have the same free market rights."
Linda	"There is absolutely no reason a doctor should be subject to a non- compete. It's just more greed by hospital administration and insurance co."
Daniel	"As an early career physician , I am VERY MUCH in favor of legislation to BAN non-compete clauses. Especially in dense metropolitan areas, these draconian clauses stifle innovation, development, and harm the practice of medicine in general. Non-compete clauses become a major problem especially when considering the balance of family and a demanding career in medicine."

Shohane	"There are 2 examples below. Another example: I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. Eliminating the noncompete clauses will help improve healthcare access for patients as hospitals and corporations can no longer restrict where physicians can work. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A concerned physician."
Erica	"Noncompetes are unfair to physicians , who can be forced to move hours away due to noncompetes. They're also applied broadly even in specialties that don't have their own patient base (such as emergency medicine). Noncompetes give employers too much power over their employees, often forcing them to stay in a toxic or underpaying job in order to avoid uprooting their families."
Stuart	"Non-compete clauses should be banned except in narrow cases for which the current employment provides the employee with unique knowledge and skills that were not present prior to employment, not consistent with general requirements for employee licensure (when applicable), and not generally otherwise available in the community affected by the non-compete agreement. Very few employment positions would be eligible for non-compete clauses under these conditions."
Linda	"The country is in desperate need of Doctors. Doctors start out in hundreds and thousands of dollars in debt and their salaries have been squeezed so that hospital executives and insurance companies can make billions in profits. Lets face it, in the current economy doctors are nothing more than skilled labor and to exclude them from the non-compete rule is outrageous."
Casey	"I am in full support of this new proposed rule. Non competes are used to stifle wages and put too much power in business owners hands. This rule should pass!"
David	"I am an engineer with 30years of experience working for a large medical device company. I am obligated to sign a non compete agreement. As I watch the company stock fall and restructuring occur, I'm concerned. I'm in strongly in favor of banning non-compete agreements. While I would never disclose confidential information to another company, I do not see why I should be blocked from working for another medical device company. Switching to another industry would be a major career reset. There are other more productive and effective ways to retain talent than contractually black listing them from what they are good at. Suppressing competition in the market for the benefit of the corporation has never been good for the economy."

Colin	"We The People do see big business is getting ever more greedy and aggressive and psychopathic in their disregard. Revolutions seem to be the only way to rein them in. Let's try dispensing with non-compete clauses first."
Evan	"This rule is sorely needed. Non-compete clauses stifle competition and innovation."
Anna	"Please include high income earners such as physicians as this impacts so much about decisions to practice or leave practice if they have to uproot their families to change jobs, impacting their communities and forcing people to stay in toxic job situations. Thank you."
Anna	"Please do not exclude physicians from this, as when we have good reasons to leave a job it often means leaving the community, our homes our families to be outside of non competes. Job satisfaction may improve if we can stop non competes, not to mention burnout and leaving the workforce or suicide. Also, entire communities that need specialists may lose them if they are in a dual physician marriage. Lastly, with our high burden of debt we are often obligated to continue working at the same place until those debts are paid or forgiven, and not able to work part time to support young families until the debt is gone, so other flexible work arrangements open to lower paying fields are not always an option to early career physicians."
ASADUR	"Non-compete clause destroys families, makes worker life's difficult, increases burnout at work, destroys competition in workplace, annihilates innovative and growth in workplace and industry. Please eliminate it"
Omair	"Excellent for the future of America! This will be something our economy and our infrastructure desperately needs to kick start a new stage of development and progression."
Daniel	"Place a federal ban on non-competes. It will give some power back from the workers. Power that is still vastly in the hands of mega-corporations. Your children and grandkids children will thank you."
Ryan	"Please help doctors enjoy the same protections as other workers"
Jonathan	"I am strongly in favor of the proposed NPRM. Non-compete clauses are an infringement on workers' rights and freedoms to seek the best employment conditions they can. Preventing enforcement of non-compete clauses will be a great improvement in the quality of life and work in this country and I urge the proposed rule to be adopted."

Maria	"End it!"
Andrew	"Non-compete clauses are nothing short of class war. The employers who already hold power over their employees strengthen that hold by making it difficult, if not impossible, for them to leave and find other work in their field. The name of these clauses is apt, but not in the way it was originally intended. That is, such limitations allow the employers not to compete with one another. If anything, they create a race for the bottom: Once non-competes became prevalent, the companies whose non-competes are the worst for employees became the most able to shackle their employees forever- -or until their workers' health and ability to produce is used up. Even someone laid off through no fault of their own may find themselves legally barred from seeking new work in the only field they know. These clauses are fundamentally at odds with the supposed benefits of an at-will labor market, because they make it nothing of the sort. They merely seek to recreate serfdom in the guise of freedom of contract. We should never have tolerated non-compete clauses in the first place, and we must do all we can do abolish them even now."
Alex	"Non-compete clauses prevent individuals from utilizing skills developed at a job for other companies, entirely preventing competition in job offers for many fields. The protection of trade secrets, which is a common justification for blocking employees from working for competitors, is sufficiently legally protected by NDA agreements. If an employee discloses trade secrets to new employers, they are still legally liable if an NDA agreement covers that information. Non-compete clauses exist primarily to prevent workers from accepting other job offers in similar companies, and therefore allow companies to provide overall worse compensation since they do not need to directly compete for their workers. The prohibition of Non-compete clauses will greatly improve the working conditions in the United States without preventing companies from protecting their trade secrets."
Trevor	"Non-compete clauses have crept into the contracts of all sorts of professions, where it makes no sense and only where they only serve the interests of the employer, preventing employees from being able to work anywhere else and removing employees' ability to negotiate or leave. It clearly results in lower wages. Please ban non-competes."
Lilly	"Non-complete clauses are an unfair hindrance on workers seeking a better job. These clauses favor corporations over workers and force them to stay on a job even though they could go elsewhere and earn more. One can say these clauses are a form of slavery on workers. They must stop."
Lilly	"I urge the FTC to ban Non-Compete Clauses. These clauses hamper persons seeking employment in the field of their choice. They do not serve persons, only corporations."
Noam	"Get rid of the non-compete rule in the business world."
Katherine	"As both a W2 and 1099 employee, I fully support this proposed rule. Non-compete contracts are in direct opposition of a free market economy not to mention a type of worker serfdom. Please do the right thing for millions of American workers by passing it."

mark	"I am completely in favor of a regulation banning noncompetes. They are almost always to screw over workers, including even minimum-wage fast food workers. Let's show some commitment to workers, instead of millionaire shareholders and CEO's. No non-competes. Thank you."
Laura	"This rule should not exclude physicians . No one should be held hostage to a job because of a non-compete. Additionally, this rule needs to apply to non-profit health systems as well. As the non-profit hospital systems currently have so much of a competitive advantage over independent practices that are struggling to stay afloat, keeping non-competes for non-profits but not for other employers would provide an unfair advantage against private practices and for profit health systems. Given that the operating model of not for profit health systems may not be significantly different than for profit health systems, this rule seems arbitrary and much to the advantage of several of our country's largest and most profitable hospital systems that happen to have not for profit status in name."
Nick	"Non compete clauses are Unamerican in that they hamper the freedom of workers to choose their own destiny and career path, and provide an unfair advantage to the employer that stifles competition and artificially holds down wages. The FTC should ban the use of Non-compete clauses in employment contracts"
Peter	"Thank you for pursuing this important issue. Non-competes stifle growth and innovation. Companies should not be allowed to prevent someone from earning a living. Their reasoning for wanting to enforce these does not look out for the worker only the company. Please get rid of them. Thank you."
Nigel	"As a burgeoning software developer the breadth of scope that non-competes that are actively used in the industry most definitely have a chilling effect on my confidence to apply and interview for opportunities even if they are not directly associated with the main business that my employers partake in"
Val	"100% support eliminating non-compete clauses and it is allows employers to abuse employees as they most of the time depend on the current income and unable to take prolonged gap or move out from restricted area"
Melissa	"These take away options from specialized workers. You get driven out of a community by these which only hurts the town when you can't move between hospitals."
Daniel	"Please extend this rule to non-profit entities (including nonprofit hospitals). People who choose to work for a nonprofit entity should enjoy the same labor protections as those who work for private entities. Nonprofits hospitals are notorious for weaponizing noncompete clauses against physicians , forcing physicians to relocate their whole families at times."

Daniel	"You must make sure to INCLUDE physicians in any ruling the eliminates non-compete clauses. Physicians are forced into contracts and then stay in undesirable and sometimes unsafe employment situations under fear of having to uproot their families if they leave because they won't be able to stay until their region due to current non-compete clauses. Physicians deserve the same labor protections as all other workers here in the United States."
Sergei	"I certainly welcome this proposal. Without having non-compete clauses, employees can easily move to another company with better pay and benefits. The company also can invest in employee education and development. The employees won't have to think about how to fight non-competes which looks like slavery contracts and if they can afford to hire a lawyer to fight it. I am as a low-level employee dealing with non-compete which is prohibiting me to do any IT work anywhere in the United States for the whole year without any payment from the company, where the base of the non-compete is continued employment."
Angelish	"As a physician , I believe non-compete clauses in contracts should be banned. They are often used to bully physicians into accepting new and unfavorable work terms, and prevent physicians from maintaining continuity of care with their patients. Non-competes also restrict access to care in specialties where there are not many doctors, such as female urology. Non-competes allow hospitals and other large group employers to take advantage of employees."
Vedika	"Please resist lobbying by hospitals and do NOT exclude physicians from this new legislation. Many physicians are burdened by non competes which depleted their power by saddling them with poor working conditions. It also makes it difficult for us to advocate for patient safety or better conditions when we are bound to explorative jobs by noncompetes."
Zach	"Getting rid of non-competes would make the job market for middle-class+ workers much more efficient and enable us to convert expertise within the same industry. It would definitely raise wages too!"
Fred	"This rule is necessary to give individual physicians negotiating power against large hospital corporations."
Karen	"I'm a family physician providing primary care in an underserved area of Upstate New York. I'm currently in private practice- physician/ owner of my own practice - because it's unbearable working for the large medical corporations in my area. At one point I was forced to commute a minimum of 30 miles for two years due to a non- compete clause. At this time several physicians also employed by the local hospital would like to work in private practice in order to have some semblance of control over their lives, but non-compete clauses hold them hostage. These dedicated physicians have spent 11 or more years after high school becoming experts in medicine. They should have liberty to work in reasonable, supportive environments doing what they love- caring for patients. Please make non-compete clauses unlawful. Thank you."

Myriam	" Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. As a dentist , I have been subject to such non-compete agreements in almost every contract I've been offered. As a result, it is very difficult to leave positions that are no longer a good fit for me or my family, as the agreement shuts me out from other potential employers within almost a ten mile radius in an area where most potential employers are concentrated. In order to leave my current job, I would likely have to leave the state. For young dentists just starting out, this makes it very difficult to leave a position with a bad work environment, or where they do not feel comfortable, especially since they do not have a lot of leverage in these negotiations. As you know, noncompete agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
S	"Noncompetes must be fully and completely outlawed. Employers use them to force people to stay in unfair and abusive situations. That's true even for people in higher wage brackets. There are ways to protect confidential information outside of noncompete clauses, and the idea that trade secrets law, etc. isn't good enough is a lie because employers want to be able to unilaterally impose noncompetes. There is NO justification for a noncompete, it's purely a way to force employees to stay in bad situations that they could not possibly have known about before joining the company and signing the noncompete. People need to be free to move between employers, the fact that they can't creates friction in the economy and reduces wages for employees and hampers economic growth. Noncompetes benefit the employer at the expense of everyone else -- just like monopoly power -- and must be outlawed. Likewise, related techniques such as TRAPs and similar "you can't quit" rules must also be prohibited, so employers can't do a run-around about the non-compete prohibition. Employers have more than enough market power, and workers do not have any realistic ability to avoid being forced into these situations. These techniques must be flatly prohibited."
Suzanne	"Overall, I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth. I think the real issue is taking information to a competitor. That would require a Non- Disclosure Law, which is different."
Ray	"Non-compete clauses give too much power to the business over the employee. There must be a better way to protect the interests of each."
Scott	"I support eliminating the noncompete contracts employers use to exploit employees. After traveling from the US to Europe for 3.5 years to build out a new market for my company, they fired me. In a 25 month period of intense travel, I

	flew to Europe (coach) 27 times. I was in a different city every 1-2 days meeting with clients. I built a division that became the only growth engine in the company. Once it ended and we had a European staff, I became overhead. The owners began to berate my performance and my sales skills. When they fired me, they thought I went to a competitor although I did not. There was a cease and desist letter within 72 hours. My heartburn is... if I was such a dirtbag, why would they care if I went to a competitor? The salt in the wound is the company hired salespeople from competition and took secrets from them! I saved one article all these years to prove it. They had the money so I had to keep my mouth shut and leave the industry."
Joel	"Thank you for the chance to add my opinion to the many that you are reading. This issue involves a basic right workers have to sell their labor to whom they choose. Anything less is an abridgement of an unalienable right. Non-Compete clauses serve a master. The "free marketplace" is fine when economic masters benefit, but when workers demand the same advantage and leverage it is frowned upon. Please consider this when you reach your decision about workers bootstrapping themselves in their career and wage level."
grace	"non compete clauses are anti capitalist. americans want to work and we want to work freely with purpose, imagination and dreams. Non competes are modern indentured servitude."
Matthew	"I started working in California and didn't realize other states allowed these non-compete clauses to exist and restrict the movement of workers. I am in favor of disallowing them and using other tools like ndas to protect high value information. Thank you!"
Doug	"I am fully in favor of completely banning non-compete agreements. Please DO NOT come back and offer different terms or narrow the specifications at all. Please do everything in your power to ban non-compete agreements for all industries and all employees. Non competes hurt all employees, and do not allow for free and fair trade. I recently started a healthcare staffing agency and I am being dragged through a lawsuit by my former employer in New York State over a non compete. I am simply trying to help healthcare facilities in my community in throughout the country meet their staffing needs in a cost effective way. To tell me that I am not allowed to do that simply because my former employer doesn't want to face any competition and wants to have all the opportunities for themselves is not only unfair and unamerican but it is also severely hurting the hospitals and healthcare facilities who should be getting competitive bids and offers to assist with their staffing levels. If there is anything that I or the public can do to help get legislation against non-competes in place please let me know."
Alex	"I am an oral surgeon in upstate New York and my restrictive covenant radius is so ridiculously large that I would need to move my whole family in order to get a new job anywhere else. I signed my current contract because I had no other choice in the area we decided to live and the practice owner refused to negotiate the terms of the covenant after I pointed out how unfair it was. I still had to accept

	the job since it was the only oral surgery office hiring in the area where my wife actually works. Now I would like to leave the practice and we are thinking moving out of state just so I can practice. That is 14 years of university training just to be held up by a contract that unilaterally favours the employers."
Leesa	"I support the abolishment of non-compete clauses."
Lili	"Please do not excluded physicians from the FTC proposal to eliminate noncompetes. Additionally and most critically, nearly all the hospitals in NYC, long island, or even tri- state area are "non-profit" 503c so excluding nonprofit organizations from the ruling would be detrimental for physicians. Indeed, if the hospitals were truly nonprofit, why would it matter if employees can find something better suited for their life situation. In the last 10 years, my husband and I (both physicians) have not received a single cost of living increase and our work volume has increased incrementally. With noncompetes, large hospital corporations essentially have all the power and we are left with no recourse even to find a job where we can maintain our daily living. With two toddlers to support, I have considered leaving my job or going part- time and we both have considered having to move out of state because even with our current non- competes we have very limited options. My hospital is now planning to add specific hospitals and increase the length of time for the noncompete which would make it either impossible for either of us to leave our job and find another job within the tristate area. Please include physicians in the FTC proposal to eliminate noncompetes and please do not exclude nonprofit hospitals from this rule."
N	"Non-compete clauses are the modem-day version of labor slavery or indentured servitude. Please change this."
Victor	"I am a data scientist working at a startup. Banning non-compete agreements can be a powerful tool to promote innovation and competition. For example, in the technology industry (where I work), innovation is often the key driver of economic growth. Companies rely on highly skilled workers to develop new products and services that can change the world. However, non-compete agreements can prevent these workers from using their skills and knowledge to start their own businesses or work for competing companies. This can limit competition and slow down the pace of innovation in the industry. Furthermore, non-compete agreements can limit the flow of knowledge and talent between companies, which can also stifle innovation. Workers who are bound by non-compete agreements are often unable to share their knowledge and experience with new companies. This can create "innovation silos" where different companies are unable to learn from each other, hindering the development of new ideas and technologies. By allowing workers to move more freely between companies, employers will have to work harder to retain their best talent and offer more competitive wages and benefits. This can lead to greater innovation as companies compete to develop new products and services, and can benefit workers by increasing their bargaining power and improving their economic prospects. Opponents of a ban on non-compete agreements often argue that they are necessary to protect their business interests and intellectual property. However, there is growing concern about the

	use of non-compete agreements for low-wage workers, particularly in industries such as fast food and retail, where employees may not have access to significant proprietary information or trade secrets that would justify such agreements. Instead, these agreements can be used to restrict workers' job mobility and limit their bargaining power, leading to lower wages and reduced benefits. One high-profile example of this is the case of Jimmy John's, a fast-food chain that was criticized for requiring low-wage sandwich makers and delivery drivers to sign non-compete agreements. These agreements prohibited workers from working for a competitor within a certain radius of any Jimmy John's location, effectively limiting their employment options and bargaining power. The non-compete agreements were not used to protect any meaningful intellectual property or trade secrets, but rather to keep wages artificially low by restricting workers mobility. This type of practice has been criticized by labor advocates, who argue that non-compete agreements for low-wage workers are unfair and do not serve a legitimate business interest. The agreements can limit workers' ability to improve their economic circumstances, such as by taking a higher-paying job with a competitor, and can also restrict their ability to negotiate for better wages and benefits with their current employer. Workers who are bound by non-compete agreements may be hesitant to seek other job opportunities, even if they could earn higher wages or better benefits elsewhere. This can contribute to a "race to the bottom" in terms of wages, where employers are able to pay workers less than they might earn in a more competitive labor market. Furthermore, the use of non-compete agreements for low-wage workers can have a disproportionate impact on workers who may be less able to negotiate for better pay or working conditions. Workers in low-wage industries, such as fast food or retail, may have limited education or work experience, and may be less able to negotiate with their employers. The use of non-compete agreements can further limit these workers' bargaining power, leading to lower wages and less job security. In response to this concern, some states have taken action to limit the use of non-compete agreements for low-wage workers. For example, in 2022, Illinois passed a law that prohibited non-compete agreements for workers earning a salary less than $75,000. Other states, such as New York and New Jersey, have also taken steps to limit the use of non-compete agreements for low-wage workers. Additionally, opponents of a ban on non-compete agreements may be relying on these agreements to maintain their market dominance, rather than competing on a level playing field. This is particularly true in industries where there are high barriers to entry, such as tech or pharmaceuticals. In these industries, established players may use non-compete agreements to prevent their employees from leaving and joining startups or other companies that could potentially disrupt their market position. By banning non-compete agreements, policymakers can level the playing field for workers and promote competition and innovation. This can lead to more opportunities for startups and new entrants to challenge established players, and can result in better products, services, and prices for consumers."
Staci	"I fully support the Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) proposed ban on noncompete clauses in employment agreements. Noncompete clauses have long been used by employers as a tool to restrict the career mobility of their employees, which is both unfair and harmful to workers. These clauses unfairly restrict workers' ability to find better jobs, as they often prevent employees from seeking employment with competing companies or starting their own businesses. This means that employees are effectively trapped in their current job, with little room for career advancement or negotiation for better pay and benefits. Moreover, noncompete clauses allow employers to keep salaries low and working conditions poor, as employees are left with little bargaining power. In industries where these clauses are common, employers are able to maintain a stranglehold on their workforce, effectively turning careers into indentured servitude. It is time to put an end to these unfair and outdated practices, and the FTC's proposed ban on noncompete clauses in employment agreements is an important step in that direction. By doing away with these clauses, workers will be free to pursue the careers they want, with the freedom to negotiate for better pay, benefits, and working conditions."

B. R.	"This is ridiculous, allowing companies, corporations etc to dictate when, where and potentially how long a person can be employed. This is covert employment oppression. Stop this archaic practice immediately."
Dr	"Please, please, please pass this and include physicians . We are now employees of often for profit healthcare entities and mergers are leading to fewer employment options forcing does to accept increasingly abusive and exploitative conditions. Now, more than ever: pass this and don't leave the does behind."
Beth	" Physicians that are not generationally wealthy come out of school, saddled in huge debt. This makes them unable financially to negotiate with large organizations that impose restrictive covenants. When they are unable to treat patients the best way they are trained to do they are forced to leave communities. This is bad for patients (the American public). I fully support the ban on restrictive covenants. Please do not place income limits on this ban."
Beth	"Please do not exclude physicians from non compete clauses. We work so hard to become physicians and then get stuck at the mercy of hospital administration. No non compete means better access to specialists in areas of medicine for the public. My non compete forces me out of my town, Rochester, New York where I am certainly needed."
Sara	"My non compete clause is ridiculous. I was laid off and given 3 months severance but a 12 months non compete. I've been in this industry for almost 20 years and the non compete blocks me from getting a job in my expertise. I have 3 kids to support"
Christina	"I wholeheartedly support getting rid of non-compete clauses in employee agreements. Oftentimes, these clauses unfairly affect the employee who specializes in a certain field or industry and prevents them from gainful employment. These clauses favor big business rather than individual citizens."
Jeremy	"I am a physician trained in brain catheterization which included the emergency treatment of patients having a stroke. I was employed by a single-owner practice that expanded (in part due to my work) to cover many hospitals in the ny/nj area."

	In the middle of my contract, my employer asked me to take a 60% paycut. I refused and was terminated without cause. Now i am under a 2 year non-compete restriction that applies to 5 miles of any hospital with which the practice was affiliated. This essentially bans me from a good portion of the area, despite multiple hospitals within the area that interested in hiring me. Understandably, they do not want to risk getting involved in litigation with my previous employer. This is egregious and entirely unfair. I feverently support the FTC proposal."
Seul	"I am in favor of ending non compete clauses as it will give more flexibility for workers."
Kevin	"I'm a healthcare worker and my agency has a clause to prohibit me from working at this facility for 1 year unless they sign off on me joining another agency. It's not even a non-compete as there's nothing to compete for except my labor."
Helen O.	"I strongly support the FTC's rule banning employees' exploitative noncomplete agreements by corporations!"
Nicole	" Physicians should not be subject to noncompete clauses, and the AHA supporting implementing noncompetes for physicians is in NO WAY representative of how the majority of physicians feel. Noncompetes severely limit access to quality healthcare particularly in undeserved areas. This is particularly true where I live and the impact on my community is noticeable as it becomes more and more impossible to get any physician to sign on at our institution, let alone high quality physicians. Our noncompete should be criminal - 30 miles from the city border thr 5 years after leaving the intuition. We are held hostage at our institution where wages don't come close to comparing to national averages, we never see a raise despite years to decades of dedication to our work/ community, and are forced to work longer hours to see more patients due to our inability to hire more help almost solely because of the noncompete. This is not safe for patient care, and it is resulting in physicians leaving to find work outside of our community, or leaving the bedside completely. We are dangerously close to seeing a physician shortage in this country so tremendous that we will not be able to bounce back from for decades, if ever. Nonprofit institutions also should not be exempt from the noncompete rule - they, including my hospital, are the biggest offenders of poor working conditions and low raises. We are on the verge of a serious healthcare crisis and upholding noncompetes for physicians will be the final tipping point - our government will be solely responsible for this."
BARRY	"The ban on non compete clauses should extend to nonprofit hospitals as well. These large hospitals are unfairly subjugating doctors with non competes"
Michael	"Eliminating non-competes is a great idea! This would spark American entrepreneurship. I fully support it!"
Megan	"I agree with this proposed rule!"

Jesus	"In response to the American Hospital Association (AHA) statement that physicians should and want to be exempt from the Non-Complete Clause Rule, I as a physician completely disagree with their statement. By requesting our exclusion they purposely seek to reduce our rights to explore the labor market, seek fair market value compensation, at a time when we have come out of a pandemic. As a career that requires significant educational, time, and financial investments, including near indentured labor as trainees, to regress to a state of corporate rule based on their self-enforced Non-completes goes against this. I urge the FTC to include physicians in the non-complete clause rule such that they CANNOT be enforced on physicians by hospitals."
Ruby	"I am a radiologist in NYC as is my husband. Non-compete clauses do no make sense in the setting of radiology and tele-radiology, especially not in a place like NYC where hospitals are in close proximity to one another. They place an undue stress on physicians often requiring them uproot their family and move outside the state. My husband is not able to take a job within 20 miles of his previous employer due to the non-compete clause that they enforced on his colleague. He now has to commute much further. He has also decided not to do mammography /breast imaging since that is patient facing and he was afraid his previous employer would use that as a way to enforce the non-compete."
A	"Ban non-compete contracts. You should be able to move from job to job as freely as you like."
Alison	"I was bound by a non-compete agreement when I first graduated college, working for a school photo company (2007-2010). It stated that I couldn't work for any other school photo companies or companies that photograph children within two years of being employed by this company. By chance, about a year into my employment with them, I became friendly with the owner of a much smaller competing company (he was a friend of a friend). Because this type of work is seasonal, the larger company that I worked for didn't have work for me at certain times of the year (school breaks, holidays, late spring, late summer, etc). The school photo company has been in business since the 60s, but they had recently adopted the employment model of paying photographers per diem, rather than full-time. I was paid only for the days I worked. The smaller competitor offered me work during Holidays doing family photos, and during other slow times of the year that I was forced to turn down, as I didn't want to lose my position (and have to pay a penalty, which was written into the contract...I don't know how enforceable that would have been but I was young and needed the money.). Rather than work for a local company that I knew I would do a fantastic job for, I was forced to turn down work and instead had to collect unemployment during those slow times. I really loved that type of work too, and I'm still salty to this day that I had to turn down numerous opportunities for work because of the noncompete."
Ameet	"I was very excited to learn about this proposal. My most recent employer made me sign a non-compete as a condition for accepting a job offer. I was barred for one year from working for a competitor (which they did not define). I work in Marketing and hold no trade secrets. Upon my separation with the company in August (due to loss of work), I was surprised they claimed the non-compete was still in three. I am not sure if it will be enforced, but it definitely impacts my job prospects, with prospective employers even asking me if I have signed a non-compete. I am ready and willing to get back to work, but this is only making it harder and limiting my options. Even if I contest, it is still a liability for prospective employers. Please end this non- competitive practice! Thank you."

Michael	"I am writing in immense support of the FTC's proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. Non-compete agreements are predatory and severely limiting towards worker's rights to work where they want without repercussions. It is time to end non-competes."
Matt	"I highly support banning non-competes. The lack of non-competes is a major reason Silicon Valley had so much innovation compared to Boston in the early days of computing, which advanced our economy and progress. Non-competes hurt workers."
Chuck	"A NO BRAINER!!! It's about time the government works in favor of regular citizens and restrain the worst tendencies of free market capitalism."
Dr Norma	"What a perfectly awful idea!: making workers sign documents agreeing not to work for anyone else in the field! Doesn't this go against America's competing spirit, if not its values? Away with this rule!!"
James	"Non-compete clauses are unfair to workers and should be illegal. Companies should pay workers more if they do not want them to get 2nd jobs."
James	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal. I had to sign one to work for an agency providing in-home ABA services to children with Autism. I was paid by the hour; mileage and commuting time was not included. This agency took advantage of me by making me drive 60 miles to see my clients. The agency then removed all my caseload except for three clients. Total authorized hours I could work with these three clients was about ten hours per week. I cannot afford to live working only ten hours per week. My nondisclosure clause was meant to prevent me from working in the field for one of their competitors, but finally, I took a chance and obtained a job with a different company. The nondisclosure clause made me hesitant to look for a better job and caused me to waste a lot of time and money."
David	"I began employment at Patterson Dental in Totowa, NJ almost three and a half years ago. At that time a noncompete agreement was required for employment. My position is as a service technician (one of 800). At the time of employment, I agreed to accept a low salary for one year to prove my value to the company, wherein my salary would be adjusted at my one-year anniversary. After the year management claimed not to know of that agreement and refused to address the issue. I am likely the most experienced tech at the company. Many less experienced techs are receiving almost twice my salary. I am locked into this low-paying position, with an agreement not to compete with my current employer for a period of two years after leaving the company. The management has said I am doing an excellent job and has given me small increases which have amounted to about 25% of the inflation rate since my employment began. I have no bargaining position since my only recourse is to stop working for two years before I may switch jobs to a similar company. Employers have people like me over a barrel. I support the FTC's work to do away with non-compete clauses, allowing employees to seek employment at a company that values their worth. Thank you"

Morgan	"I LOVE that this rule is being proposed. Non-competes have been a standard part of my full-time working agreements at startups and large corporations for as long as I can remember, and I actively fight to get them removed every time due to the unfair restraint it puts on me to not be able to make any more money as a freelancer outside of my day job with my unique craft and skill set. I REALLY hope this passes. It will improve the quality of my life and financial well-being and that of millions of others as well."
Jonathan	"I have been a software engineer for seventeen years and I'm pretty sure that early on in my career I was presented with a non-compete clause or two. At the time I remember finding it intimidating and absurd but going along with it because it was my first job, I was young, and needed it. Ultimately it has had no effect on my life but I consider myself one of the lucky ones. I've been at my current job for ten years and have no non-compete but I'm thrilled by the proposition that new graduates pursuing their first major resume credit in the world will no longer have to be intimidated by these arcane measures. Thanks for all you do."
Nathan	"I was laid off from a large computer manufacturer in 1993. I was given a separation package on condition I sign a non-compete package as well as an agreement not to sue for damages. It was a take it or leave it. I had to take it because I feared it would take me a long time to find employment again without some financial assistance. I was also forced to find employment outside my skill set because of the non-compete clause. I suffered nineteen months of unemployment. The non-compete forced me to eliminate prospective opportunities and to apply for jobs at substantially lower salaries. Non-compete must be banned."
Sandra	"Non-compete clauses are grossly unfair and should be done away with. Companies become unaccountable for bad behavior because they feel you cannot leave."
Daniel	"The non-compete clauses that hospitals put in place are wrong and should be outlawed."
Nicholas	"I am writing to express my strong support for this rule, as I personally know people who have had their careers impacted by non-competes in unfair ways. I think that continuing to allow non-solicitation clauses seems like a reasonable compromise, but letting employers arbitrarily restrict competition by limiting workers options even after the termination of their employment seems ridiculous to me. Of course if businesses have the option, then they will continue to use non-compete agreements, since no business wants to be left behind all the other businesses doing the same thing, but if we ban non-compete agreements nationwide then that seems like a fair way to keep everyone on a level playing field."

Max	"I support a ban on employee non-competes"
Andrew	"As a highly trained specialist in Dentistry (Oral and Maxillofacial Surgery), I feel that the use of non compete clauses have been a destructive force in my profession. New graduates that spent years in training face geographic upheaval if their choice of employment is not what they expected or wanted. The idea that a new practitioner will "steal" from a long established practice is ridiculous. Arbitrary distances and time limitations are sources of aggravation, anxiety and are unprofessional. Several states already limit non compete clauses and their employers aren't suffering. It's time to remove this relic."
Eugene	"Competition is allegedly the excuse for our catastrophically unfair and unjust and undemocratic set of arrangements we call -the economy." How is it that the labor force can be made to consent to this patently unfair and unAmerican "non-compete clause?"
Erlin	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the use of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Thus, I am glad the FTC is doing something about it. As a resident of New York State and the Buffalo/Niagara region, I believe that these clauses have a negative impact on workers and the economy, and I urge you to take action as soon as possible to limit or eliminate their use. Non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to find new employment, stifle innovation by preventing employees from sharing their knowledge and expertise with new employers, and limit competition and consumer choice by preventing new businesses from entering a market. I am an Endocrinologist and, despite the huge shortage in the country and specially in our region of doctors with my specialty, this past year alone at least 3 Endocrinologist moved out of our region due to this type of restriction. I am considering myself leaving for similar reasons. My current employer is unable to provide the service and yet will not let me work in the whole region. Hundreds of patients will be unable to get the care they need and deserve. I urge you to pass regulation as soon as possible. Thank you for your time and attention to this important issue. I look forward to your response."
Mara	"To become a physician I dedicated 7 years and hundreds of thousands of dollars to post graduate training I would like the opportunity to be a free agent and practice medicine as I wish and for whom I wish. I often dream of becoming an entrepreneur but fear the ramifications of the law as it's currently written. I took a job in my home town for a "non-profit" state run hospital, but this doesn't mean I should have to uproot my family, sell my house, and move to progress in my career. It's un-American to stifle someone's entrepreneurial spirit this way."
Alexandra	"To whom it may concern: It is high time that these onerous, ridiculous and ANTICOMPETITIVE non-compete clauses be done away with. They only serve the interests of monopolies, while harming workers, consumers and communities. Please stand firm in implementing these necessary new rules. Thank you."

Geraldine	"I fully support abolishing the practice of non-compete clauses. There is a nationwide shortage of anesthesiologists right now and I am limited as to where I can work because of a non compete clause with my former employer. The hospital I would like to work at is in an underserved community, so care is being limited to those who need it most. This policy only benefits the large employers....not the employees or the patients that they serve."
J.R.	"What's troubling here, in regard to non competes, is that we're not talking about a uniform ascertainable statute imposed by a legislature but instead a constructed legal regulatory regime basically concocted by judges in alliance with employers and other special interests. It has undeniably diminished the mobility and freedom (including the actual freedom to contract) of labor. Under this existing regime, there are fewer voluntary contracts. Even if you think voluntary contracts are the beginning and end of freedom as purists, the fact that there are fewer fair contracts under this existing regime means that there is actually less freedom for workers. Simply put, non-competes and this version of the freedom of contract have actually restricted the freedoms of one party, the less powerful party. It can be seen with medical practice groups restricting doctors when leaving a practice prohibiting them from working in a certain radius of their former hospital to a former lawn care employee not allowed to cut grass in a certain part of town after he goes out on his own."
Hugh	"Please put and end to this unconscionable proliferation of non-compete clauses in service workers and ordinary American's work lives. Bravo for proposing it in the first place, and shame on the lobby that's opposing it."
JoAnne	"I fully support the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. I am an emergency physician , and our specialty has been harmed by these clauses. They stifle competition, and discourage people from going into medicine. As the trend towards continued merger and larger health system continues, non-competes can turn physicians (and others) into indentured servants. Right now I work for a large health system that spans several hours driving. With a noncompete that prohibits me from working near any campus in the health system, I would be forced to move to change jobs. This is anti-free market, as I have no leverage in discussions with employers."
Peter	"I support FTC regarding the Non-Complete Clause Rule. People and the economy suffers under the status quo."
Gillian	"Strongly support the measure to ban the non-compete, clause and leave workers able to seek work where they want to. This has long been a thorn."
Greer	"Noncompete clauses (NCCs) for high level executives, or founders, where the employee is privy to trade secrets or information damaging to the company could be justified, except for the fact that these individuals are heavily compensated for

	their knowledge and work, and have the option to sign nondisclosure agreements. NCCs added to employment contracts as a matter of course for rank and file employees, white collar and blue collar workers, consultants, frontline employees etc, who are employed at will and would be prevented from working because they <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Sought higher wages; 2. were laid off; 3. Sought a less hostile work environment; 4. left their position briefly for any personal reason should not have their life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness encroached upon by an arbitrary phrase in a contract. Especially if the employee carries no trade secrets, and can only affect the employer by making them engage in a fair and competitive wage market. The government works for the PEOPLE, and people are entitled to a living wage."
Physician	"I strongly oppose the physician exclusion from the noncompete ban! Why should we be the victims of noncompetes. We have families of our own- lives of our own that this affects!"
David	"Very important!"
Patricia	"I respectfully submit this comment in the hopes that all non compete clauses will be banned nationwide. My experience is: my mother suffered a massive stroke which left her mentally and physically disabled. The healthcare agency I use offers no medical benefits, 401k etc to their employees. The aide that takes care of my mom is so kind and knows my mom would be uncomfortable with anyone else so she stays with this agency because she does not want to leave my mom. Because of the non compete agreement that we BOTH (employee and patient) had to sign we would not be able to work with her for 3 months without paying a large penalty and they would file charges in court . Neither of us can afford a penalty so she is forced to stay at this agency when there are better jobs available."
Rodrigo	"Non-competes reduce competition and are bad for the American consumer. As both an engineer and a fonner business owner , I wholly endorse this!"
Patrick	"Please ban non-compete contracts, for obvious ethical reasons"
Jen	"The proposed rule to eliminate rampant non-compete clauses in employee contracts has become a necessity. Non-competes have become standard in companies of all sizes and all job functions, despite the absence of practical reasons for them. There are a wide variety of other tools available, such as patents, intellectual property (IP) rights, and non-disclosure agreements, that employers freely use to protect their customer lists, proprietary processes, and technologies. The only reason for the existence of non-competes is to create an artificial barrier to the free movement of labor. They present a strong, unfair disincentive for employees to seek opportunities to develop their talents, careers, and contribute to innovation and growth within their industries. As a marketer , I am shocked by the frequency with which headhunters have asked me whether I have a non-compete, as well as the insistence of employers to include non-competes in contracts. The tools and tactics my profession uses are broadly applied across industries and well-documented in countless marketing books, industry publications, blogs, etc. As a generalist with 20 years of experience in all facets of

	marketing, none of my work is a trade secret that would not be otherwise covered by the range of more appropriate tools employers use to enforce their IP rights. The only purpose of a non-compete would be to lock me out of the industry I have the most valuable, recent, and substantial experience in. Non-competes are nefarious and stifle fair competition in multiple ways. They prevent industry growth by blocking the free movement of labor. People with experience in a particular industry are unable to share their expertise within the industry because they cannot afford the loss of income mandated by non-competes. They are also less willing to leave a job without a non-compete for a potentially more desirable one requiring a non-compete, out of concern they may get locked out of the industry altogether should the move prove to be a poor fit. Prospective employers need to fill positions immediately and cannot afford to wait for months or years for the ideal candidate to become available due to a non-compete from another employer. Non-competes present a direct disadvantage for job candidates, as they are required to disclose them regardless of whether they are applicable, forcing HR and legal at the prospective new employer to review and confirm the absence of conflict. The potential legal jeopardy of hiring a new employee with an existing non-compete puts smaller companies at a disadvantage, as they rarely have the HR and legal resources to carefully evaluate these documents. They may be compelled to downplay or disqualify more proficient candidates to avoid the extra risk and due diligence. Non-competes hurt productivity, morale, and company culture by forcing dissatisfied employees to stay in a job they no longer desire, because they are prevented from pursuing more attractive career opportunities within their industry. Most employees cannot afford to lose income for the duration of their non-compete, and many cannot afford to change industries and lose the advantage of their relevant industry experience. Additionally, every new job posting requires or values candidates with relevant industry experience. These issues are becoming more serious as industries continue to consolidate. Once, I had to advocate for a coworker who had a non-compete and was moving to a much larger organization, simply because the larger company had a separate division (not the one my coworker was joining) that was considered a competitor. I also had to refuse signing a non-compete based on legal advice because it was worded so broadly that I would have been virtually unable to find any gainful employment for a full year. The worst is that non-competes are now standard, regardless of whether an employee leaves the company on their own accord or is laid off. Very few working people can afford a long gap in income and a hole on their resume. Please do what's right. Ban completely this nonsensical, abusive practice that unfairly stifles competition among employees and within industries. Preventing competition is what it does - it's in the name! Thank you."
William	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, A noncompete kept my mother out of a job for over a year (+costs), in a career she's won national awards for year after year since. She was just starting off in this industry at the time, maybe 3 years in, and this was amidst the financial crisis where her 4 kids (myself included) were in college (we're all a year apart), and everyone was working to pay the bills."
Haris	"I have suffered the consequences of a non compete. As there is a physician shortage in USA it adversely affects the patients. I would encourage that these non competitive practices be banned and freedom of movement and choice in job be extended to everyone."

Anthony	"Non-compete's stifle innovation. They decrease an individual's earning ability. Doctors must be included in the repeal of non-compete. No exceptions."
Mohfujul	"Non-compete clauses impose an undue hardship that unfairly and adversely affects workers. They limit healthy competition in the labor market and decrease job mobility, preventing workers from finding new, better opportunities at the risk of being sued by their former employers for breach of contract. Moreover, they effectively monopolize the available talent in the workforce, harming other competing businesses as well. Doing away with them would do a world of good for everyone."
Bryan	"My wife has suffered from a non-compete contract she signed November 2021. She was hired on by a chiropractor business to work as a chiropractor /co-partner November 2021. She signed a noncompete for 2 years/25 mile radius in a small town, Watertown, New York. She didn't think it was that big of a deal at the time because she believed she would be there for many years. July 2022 approaches and her boss turns into a narcissist over several months because his patients started requesting appointments to see my wife instead of him. During her employment, he harassed her, talked down to her, told patients that she wasn't experienced enough to practice. She would come home crying to me. She stuck it out because she needed the money due to a pile of student loans and the non-compete hanging over her head. Tensions rose at the workplace and her boss could tell she was no longer happy being there because of the dilemma of his patients requesting to see her and the harassment. Unbeknownst to us, New York state is a "fire at will state", without any explanation of termination. He calls her to the office on a Sunday which was her day off He gave her no explanation of why she had to come into the office. She decided to go anyways pause it was her boss. She was thinking it could be anything like possibly a new work schedule for the week because he has went on vacation for a week at a time and made her cover for everything. Later that night, she called me stating that he fired her on the spot and she can't not to return to work the following day. He gave her a bogus reason that their "views do not align". He never gave a termination letter or formal reason. The reason why he called her in on Sunday was because she would not qualify for a $5800 work bonus based on how the contract was wrote up. He fired her one day before her work bonus. The work bonus was designed by the amount of success she had made for the business for the previous month of which she clearly exceeded. Her former boss told all her patients that she up and left and disappeared and he had no idea where she left to. Her patients reached out through social media hoping she was okay and wishing for her future. When she was fired, she asked her former boss if the non-compete still stands. Her boss said of course it still stands. She was medically trained at a private university just the same as he was. She received her Doctor of Chiropractic. There is no proprietary information being taken. It is medically evaluating, adjusting, and treating patients. She was working at this business for less than 9 months, harassed by him, then to be fired at will, and then harassed by the Department of Labor for filing for

	unemployment. Her former boss stated to the Department of Labor that she was fired for doing something extremely negligible at the business. This also wasn't true and yet she still had no proof of termination because of the fire at will. Her former boss was still trying to find a way so for her to be ineligible to receive unemployment. She has suffered traumatic stress through all this only to be told she can't practice what she went to school for because of a non-compete. I am in complete utter disbelief that this can happen in the state of New York. A female dedicated in competing in a male dominant profession, spending more than 8 years in schooling, to be fired at will, to be told this non-compete agreement still stands or you will be penalized up to $15000 dollars and paid lawyer fees which was wrote in the contract, to be told by our own lawyers that it is not a good idea to open your own business because of the non- compete, to be told to find another job and just wait it out. Noncompetes are strictly to bully employees vs valuing them. Has everyone forgotten the healthcare industry was forced to sign noncompetes? Covid happens and the healthcare shortage appears. Then all of a sudden you can't have medical professionals working anywhere because of the non compete. We as a society let people die because big time companies were afraid of competition while jobless medical professionals were afraid of being sued. It's disgraceful. I low in this country of freedom does a business still own you after you have left the company or even being fired from the company? And that company gets to decide where you work or how long you aren't able to work in that profession? You know how many people are not aware of that consequence and were just desperate for a job. There are trade secret laws and NDAs for a reason. Noncompetes bully America. I completely support the proposed ruling."
M.E.	"If you're required to sign a piece of paper, a non-compete clause, you're really signing on to servitude. Not being able to go from job to job just because you want or need a change, or there is an offer of more money that you need or for any other reason should be allowed. Non-compete clauses are equal to servitude, a condition in which an individual lacks liberty especially to determine his or her course of action or way of life."
David	"How are non-compete clauses any different than indentured servitude? If the US is a free market economy than how conic labor cannot move freely and demand the highest wage? Constraining labor and devastating people's lives by restricting where they can work is anti- free market and anti-American."
Ben	"I am writing to express my intense support for the proposed rule limiting non-compete clauses. Non-competes place a grave restriction on the rights of workers, depress wages, stifle competition and interfere in the proper functioning of the market to the exclusive benefit of large corporations. While there may be narrow circumstances in which non-compete clauses are reasonable, their proliferation into virtually all sectors of the economy is a travesty of corporate over-reach. Putting an end to this draconian practice, at the federal level, would be an enormous milestone Mr the FTC and indeed for the federal government as a whole. Workers would gain substantial freedom which would in turn increase competition, improve wages and working conditions and invigorate the overall economy. California - home to most substantial restrictions on non-competes - has its warts, but its economy is nothing if not dynamic, creative and powerful. This is not a coincidence. The FTC will be subjected to a barrage of corporate lobbying against this common sense rule. It must demonstrate the courage and leadership to implement this long overdue rule and support the rights and opportunities of working Americans in the face of the intractable greed and anti-competitive instincts of large sections of corporate America."

Gail	"Ban exploitive non compete agreements so that workers can leave their jobs for a better offer or can find similar work after being let go."
Sean	"Hello, I am currently being offered a job but the non-compete is ridiculously restrictive. I really want the job and I'm afraid of creating tension. I just want you (FTC) to know that I wholeheartedly support this new rule. Non-competes are not fair. I really admire and respect the founders and everything they've built. They're just following legal advice. Please just pass this rule so that none of this needs to be dealt with on a case-by-case basis. If you must compromise, I think the employer should be obligated to pay the employee's full salary for the entire term a company wishes to restrict an employee's freedom. I had a friend who worked in Options Trading, she had one year of leave required but they paid her full salary for that year. One whole year is very restrictive but with compensation I think it's fairer. Thank you for looking out for the average working Joe, I think this is very necessary and a key piece of labor rights. Sincerely, Sean"
Ali	"Non-compete clauses fundamentally do not conform to American values and what this country stands for. If we are to look at it from a capitalist perspective it only hinders innovation and goes against the fundamental "at will" concept of employment in many states. It is not only anti consumer but anti freedom in itself. These clauses only exist to protect the rights of commercial entities vs the people. I fully support the abolishment of non-compete clauses and making them unenforceable."
Michael	"To whom it may concern: Several years ago I had an employer demand that everyone in the office, regardless of position, sign a non-compete agreement with a term of one year. This was a multi-discipline firm with Attorneys, Statisticians and Illustrators/Designers. Immediately the Attorneys struck a bargain with the boss, also an Attorney. The Statisticians and Illustrators/Designers were on their own. At the time I was the Art Director and I hired an Attorney of my own to help me navigate. I passed on his advice to the other Artists on my team so they could negotiate. I mean, it was either sign or be fired. That was the choice that was given. When you're in that situation you never feel so alone. Ultimately I resigned my position along with several others. The way we saw it, the demand was inappropriate for our position level. It was unenforceable other than the fact that you have to have money in order to access the justice system. There were many individual meetings I heard about with this employer where people were reduced to tears. The people at this firm were all highly paid professionals and it tore us all apart inside. I cannot fathom how much worse an experience this would be for a person earning an hourly wage. No one below the executive level, with specific insider industry knowledge, should be required to sign a non-compete agreement."

	Even then, to do so after years of employment must come with commensurate compensation. My employer demanded a year of my time post- employment, he should have to pay me for that time if he expects me to sign. Best wishes, Michael"
Owen	"Heather, thank you for holding this open comment period. As a physician , I have never seen it noncompete clauses used for appropriate purposes that would be in keeping with the interests of either patients or physicians. They are used by powerful institutions to harass and bully physicians into staying in hostile work environment with low ability either understand employment law or move to problematic environments. I see no public interest in reducing the ability of physicians to work with patients as they see fit, and absent I compelling argument tin the care of patience for the well-being of physicians, non- competes in medicine function only to allow bullies with expensive legal department to selectively harass physicians who try to step out of line. Doctors have a lot to lose, and its not worth rocking the boat. This leads to less appropriate enforcement actions, less mobility from more hospital environments two more appropriate environments, and the fact that I'm not naming names here should be a pretty good example of how good that system of intimidation on the part of hospital legal can be."
Evan	"I support the proposed non-compete clause rule. Non-compete clauses have become predatory tools used to improperly control employees while distorting the labor market and limiting free and fair competition."
Patrick	"I support eliminating non compete clauses in all employer contracts. It would be fantastic if our government actually acted on behalf of working people for once."
Nevin	"I am strongly in favor of the new rules. No compete clauses are by their nature anti-competition. They depress wages and stifle the formation of new businesses. They serve no useful purpose to the greater society. There other better ways to keep trade secrets and the like."
CI	"I am a specialist physician --out of training for about 6 years with two employers over that span. Both required a non-compete. The first was a regional hospital chain; I would effectively have been unable to practice within a 20 mile radius (in a city that has an 8 month waiting list for my specialty)--given we live in a large city surrounded by very rural areas, leaving this job entailed either a move, a buyout, paying an attorney to fight this claim or in my case transitioning my career to telemedicine. Now the telemedicine job has a non-compete banning me from either practicing telemedicine (of note, I received less than a day's orientation--I have no "secret sauce" or trade secrets to reveal to competitors, just putting my (largely taxpayer funded) pre-existing training to work doing my job over the video vs in-person) ANYWHERE in the US for two years, as well as non-competes with any hospital that is currently a client. I'm savvy enough to recognize these for what they are--largely unenforceable intimidation tactics--but intimidation tactics still work, particularly when I do the calculation of paying an attorney fee as my family's sole breadwinner and going up against much deeper pockets. So, in short, even when these provisions are made in bad faith, even when both sides recognize them for what they are, they still do their "job"--to restrain trade, to put a thumb on the scale in favor of those with deeper pockets, and to transform salaries into corporate profits."

Bush	"Please end these clauses. Hospital administration are abusing their power for their benefit but against physicians and public health needs."
Sandra	"Non-compete clauses are nothing more than a tool to control workers. It's just another form of abuse."
Greg	"I support the FTC's rule to ban all non-compete clauses, and support in addition banning broad in scope NDA's that can essentially function as noncompetes in all but name. Noncompetes are unethical to a free market society, as they only function to hinder the worker's right to argue and gain the highest wages for their field of employment, hinders a competitive work field, and disincentivizes companies from making their workplace and the jobs they provide more appealing to keep their workers."
Tina	"Non compete clauses prevent working people from maximizing their potential An employer. Can always keep an employee at their institution if they make work conditions snd salary competitive Non competes allow an employer to operate at below cost per employee compared to local market conditions once an employee has signed a non compete The present format with sweeping non compete clauses should be banned. Non compete agreements should be replaced with non disclosure of trade secrets agreement Non compete should be made illegal as unfair to employees snd restrictive of free market"
Raj	"Dear Sir/Madam: The Non-Compete Clause Rule is very well researched and written. I strongly support the elimination of such clauses since they create a very uneven power imbalance between the employer and the employee. This is especially true when the employer is a large health system/university. They insist on having you agree to a non-compete with the rationale that they are investing in helping you set up a practice. However, even after many years, long after you have more that adequately paid back your 'debt' by working tirelessly for them and building a practice and a program, they will insist that you cannot work for anyone else unless you move out of the region. Individual physicians usually do not have the financial resources or the time to fight such restrictions, and they cannot stop working for a year to get past the restrictive period. Most other employers will hesitate to hire you since they do not want to get into litigation. I would therefore strongly urge you to proceed with eliminating such clauses from employment contracts. Respectfully submitted."
Noreen	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements. Especially in the Apparel I clothing industry . they do not make allow good practices all around."
Charles	"I'm writing in support of the proposed non-compete clause rule. For too long employers have used these clauses to constrain workers' ability to participate in the job market and leverage employment opportunities, negatively impacting their wages, bargaining power, and freedom of movement. This is especially egregious with regards to low-wage workers , who often lack adequate worker protections and are more likely to experience discrimination and wage theft at the hands of their employers. This measure is an important step in leveling the playing field."

F	"Please get rid of non compete clause!!!"
Sara	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 Non compete clauses pose undue stress on physicians of hospital systems - essentially barring a change of jobs to all other systems/hospitals. Mt Sinai hospital restricts employment at nearly all the other hospital systems for one year AFTER employment ends regardless of reason. This impacts all aspects of life negatively: family, income, and professional development."
Athena	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. I urge the FTC to reject the MIA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A concerned physician."
Anthony	"I am completely against non compete clauses in all contracts and especially when it comes to physicians . I have seen it prevent doctors from continually caring with the patients that they have been seeing for years and decades prior because that physician chose to go to another job that forced them out of the area that those patients would be comfortable traveling to see that physician. It truly destroys doctor patient relationships. I wish to see non compete clauses rules illegal for all professions as it stifles wage growth and prevents real necessary competition and from a physician standpoint negatively impacts patients when doctors are force to leave them."
Conrad	"For years working Americans have been victimized by corporations and their practices while being aided and abetted by the federal agencies that are supposed to protect the citizenry. Our elected officials and the institutional staff are in place to serve the public interest. On so many fronts government has failed to act in the interest of the public it serves. Regulatory powers already available to agencies are not exercised, and the People have suffered as a consequence. Non-compete clauses end now and should have been ended many years ago. I fully support this rule change. I applaud the agency for proposing this rule and I challenge the FTC to vigorously change rules within their authority for the good of the People, since legislators aren't legislating Thank you."

Kristin	"I strongly support this rule change. As a freelance composer-performer I have been adversely affected by non-compete agreements that limit the repetition of concert programs and compositions (operas, music theater) in particular geographic areas over a length of time, which can be up to 5 years! This has made it very difficult to earn a living and to keep those works and programs alive and viable. Changing this rule will help immensely!"
Julian	"I support this."
Troy	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Shlomo	"I am strongly in favor of banning non compete clauses."
Aimee	"I fully support the ban on non-competes!"
Dr	"The need to protect company secrets and intellectual property is valid and necessary. However, the ability for a worker to secure employment is greatly inhibited by restrictive covenants (as they are known in my trades, Dentistry/healthcare) and non-compete clauses. These restrictive covenants/non-competes have no place in healthcare as the trade is solely the secret of the provider administering said services-- ie, patients are attached to their doctor/nurse/PA/dentist/hygienist not their hospital due to their doctors personal ability and skill, none of which is exclusive or tethered to the practice/hospital/office in which they work. It is only fair to allow doctors to provide their services to their patients in the setting (hospital, office, etc) in which they see fit. Doctor's devote years of their life, spend grueling hours working in residency, delay their own lives and family planning in order to pursue this knowledge and ability which is the actual trade secret/intellectual property. I myself, after devoting a decade of my life to advanced education and accruing more than half a million dollars in student loan debt, was more than happy to accept any job offer that gave me the opportunity to earn a living and begin paying down this debt. What I was not prepared for however, was how employers would use the legal system to keep me tied to their company and, should I leave, severely restrict my ability to practice in a specific geographic area. For reference, I live in New York City. A large metropolitan area where doctors and various healthcare professions can practice in a any number of private practices, for profit, non-profit, public, or corporate practices. Although the amount of employers and various positions are available, we are not able to freely move from one practice to another due to these restrictive covenants/non-competes. As an example, I will upload two separate clauses in two real life contracts for employers whom I worked for. The restrictive covenants outlined in these contracts are egregious, one spanned 30 blocks south and 30 blocks north of the practice and extended from the east river through the entirety of central park for a term of two years -- and in addition to this ludicrous restricted

	area, there was another clause that added that should the employer open a new office during my time of employment I would be restricted from working anywhere within a 1 mile radius of this new practice (despite it not existing at the time of my initial employment agreement). To further add insult to injury, these contracts have assignability clauses so that, if said employer with whom I agreed to work with decides to sell or dies, these restrictive covenants are assignable to their new owner without my need to consent. Often times I hear the argument from large lobbying groups and corporations that the onus is on the individual employee to read through these contracts and then decline any employer in which they feel these terms are too stringent. A claim which I find laughable, after years of missed income in exchange for training, accruing hundreds of thousands of dollars in debt to attain said education which is the intellectual property that attracts "customers" (patients), I know also have to shell out thousands of dollars to hire an attorney to parse through a contract and try to amend these non-competes-- I myself paid $3000 in attorney fees to have one contract reviewed and edited and in the end acquiesced to a restrictive covenant that spanned 15 blocks north and south (which covers three separate neighborhoods and 2 hospitals). How, in any capacity, can this be deemed just? Large corporations who invest in research and create products should and have every right to protect their intellectual property. On the most basic level, healthcare professionals and the knowledge that they accrued on their own time and on their own dime are the intellectual property and therefore should not be subject to non-competes. At it's most just and highest level of argument, non-competes should not be permitted in contracts for healthcare professionals so that patients can be best served-- patients should be the right to follow their doctor with whom they trust and have established a relationship with regardless of whether it is down the street or to a new zip code. Andrew	"Non-Compete rules are a form of anti competition which hurts individuals. Please ban Non-compete clauses against workers."
Brian	"The only purpose of non-compete clauses is monopolization and greed. There is zero societal benefit except for the 1% and they cause massive destruction of the middle class. Make them illegal. They are the opposite of free market. They are oppression."
Jared	"Non-compete is absurd. If a company can freely fire an employee without reason, then the employee should be able to work anywhere they want. This non-compete also caps the salary of the worker since they cannot bring the experience they gained to a different company."
Renaye	"The non compete clause is an unfair burden on employees. We personally have to move cities/states to change jobs. This is not a reasonable burden."

Wally	"I am an MD that has been directly affected by noncompetes. I have no ability to practice within 60 miles of where I live, as my noncompete is not bound by mileage, but by competing health systems, which have monopolized medical care in Long Island and New York. I have no authority to leave my employer unless I move my entire family out of state."
Breda	"I support the proposed rule to abolish Non-Compete clauses from employment contracts."
Lisa	"I want to voice my complete support for this rule. Non-compete clauses interfere with people's ability to make a living in the field of their choice by forcing them to either stay put in a job that doesn't suit them, or to find other work when leaving that job. It is forcing labor."
Michael	"I believe non-compete clauses are a parasite to the worker and only serve to limit their freedom."
Jonathan	"forbidding noncompete agreements would be a great step in the right direction!"
Patrick	"Noncompetes exacerbate clinician shortages and access to care, as physicians are forced to decide between cutting back clinically or leaving the workforce vs. staying at jobs that are not a good fit. Noncompetes help employers evade market forces that would necessitate change and take leverage away from clinicians. They make it difficult to speak out about patient care issues, unfair or unsafe working conditions, etc, without worrying about having to relocate if fired. A single physician leaving a hospital to practice elsewhere in the same city does not significantly hurt a system financially. If many physicians leave the same institution simultaneously, this indicates a bigger issue with the employer that needs to be addressed. The current FTC proposal wording doesn't apply to nonprofit hospitals & needs to be modified to include all hospital systems. Given most US hospital systems are 'nonprofit' (despite the same business model as for profits), this will hurt independent physicians and for-profit hospitals. It will also fail to eliminate noncompetes for most physicians who currently have them."
Mauro	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. I've personally had to deal with noncompetes in the software industry and fully understand it's negative impact. I've only been so lucky that companies rarely enforce noncompetes but holding this choke hold over workers is unethical. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
J	"Non-Compete clauses are being used to essentially hold employees hostage. In order for my husband to change jobs (anesthesia), we would have to relocate our entire family and I would have to give up my own job. There is no issue of trade secrets and no issue of taking patients with him. The non- complete simply allows the hospital to be exempt from the normal supply and demand economics that prevent exploitation."

Sarah	"This is such important legislation for Physicians ."
Eric	"Non-compete agreements restrict employees from working for competitors of their current employer for a certain period of time after leaving their job. While they are intended to protect employers' trade secrets and competitive advantages, they can also stifle employees' ability to find work and innovate in their field. The FCC's proposal to ban non-compete clauses for employees promotes fair competition, innovation, and employee mobility. Non-compete agreements limit employees' ability to move freely between jobs, reducing their bargaining power and economic opportunities. They can also prevent employees from sharing knowledge and expertise, inhibiting innovation. Additionally, non-compete agreements can be unfair to employees, particularly those in lower-paying jobs who may not have the resources to fight back against their employers. By prohibiting non-compete agreements, the FCC can help ensure that workers are not unfairly restricted in their career paths, encouraging entrepreneurship and innovation, and creating a more competitive and fair marketplace. As such, I strongly support the proposed rule change and urge the FCC to implement it as soon as possible."
Katie	"Please do not exclude physicians Please do away with the salary cap"
Himanshu	"I support it."
Akhil	"This is a welcome step. All non compete causes should be illegal. Especially in medicine where they promote monopolies and exploitation of patients and doctors by big healthcare corporations"
Purvi	"Non- compete fornn B physician should be illegal. Often times the sole breadwinner for their family. If they lose their position at one facility often times that includes leaving their home, uprooting their family and having to move to a new city to get employment. This causes a significant amount of stress for family harmony. If there is a spouse involved, they often times will also have to look for new employment and then you city just because a certain job or position does not work out at one hospital does not mean that the physician cannot practice in that city at a different hospital. Making physicians that are respected in the community who have a large patient population move for political issues at work, or for compensation, less than what is being offered somewhere else should not be allowed."
Jisoo	"Banning non-compete would be a huge win for workers and consumers."
Susan	"Noncompetes should be prohibited except in rare cases of actionable trade secrets. Any noncompete legally permitted should require full salary and benefits for as long as the noncompete is in force."

Conor	"I support the proposition to ban non-competes. I am a physician and see how non-competes have come to dictate the contracts and employment options of my colleagues in New York State."
Gary	"Non-compete rule should involve physician . Currently they are most explored labor force in USA. It's resulting in unsafe patient care practices, predatory profit off physicians work, bum out of physicians, resulting in unequal healthcare access. This specifically affecting international physician who have to stuck at a place for visa reasons and exploited to the core by profit as well as non profit hospital systems. Non compete should be uniform and equal for every individual."
F	"I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban nonconnpete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetcs suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. I myself have been impacted due to at will employment which allows my employer to fire me at anytime and I still wouldn't be able to work in the industry immediately due to my non compete. That means I would have to find a job in another industry that I have no experience in or wait a year fully unemployed. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

Parth	"Absolutely ridiculous that it is only applying to physicians , why the discrimination? Why doesn't it have to apply to any other providers? If you can't see that giving independent practice rights to other providers (Physician Assistants and NPs) and then making laws that specifically target phycisians is discrimination, 'hats a huge problem."
Rajesh C	"About time this horrible issue is tackled. With powerful hospital lobbies, it's impossible for an individual physician to survive in the community with this useless non-compete rules / laws. It does no body any good. Makes life miserable for the doctor and the patients alike."
Macario	"This will be beneficial to the working class. Businesses should no longer be able to benefit from binding their employees to a non-compete clause. It's wrong, and exploitative. People over profit. The benefits far outweigh the concerns."
Manoj	"Dear Sir, I sold my employee benefits consulting firm (insurance agency - Paul Global Benefits, Inc.) in Sept, 2020 to a private equity owned company World Insurance Associates, LLC. The sale was initiated by a consultant who teamed up with a lawyer to help sell my company. The consultant insisted that I use his partner law firm, with a logic that they have extensive experience in M&A activity."

	That, this law firm will help negotiate better terms for me. They teamed up to aggressively push me to sign the purchase agreement and non-compete, not realizing that they wrote me out of the business if I ever quit. First, I have a five year non-compete, plus, two-years non-solicitation after my non-compete. If I leave after five years, I will have one additional year of non-compete, plus two years of non- solicitation. This effectively has written me out of the business if I want to quit, and start all over."
Matt	"I fully support banning of non-compete agreements. As a lifelong worker in the technology industry, a non-compete is disastrous as it can prevent me from supporting my family if my only employment options are considered "competitive" with previous employers."
Isabella	"Noncompetes, "trade secret" s, default company ownership of IP developed by an employee (even during their off hours), and other anti-competitive measures are a blight upon society. I wholeheartedly endorse abolishing noncompetes completely, even though they're typically already solidly unentbrceable. I would also fully support the abolition of the other aforementioned conditions."
Arlene	"I wholeheartedly agree with this rule. It would make me feel more comfortable and more confident and changing jobs. As a medical professional, I've been I wholeheartedly agree with this rule. It would make me feel more comfortable and more confident and changing jobs. As a medical professional, I've been scared of restrictive covenants. even change the contract on me. But thank you for thinking of us."
Richard	""No" to non-competes"
Daniel	"Dear FTC, I am writing to express my support for the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses are anticompetitive and harm both workers and the economy. Non- compete agreements unfairly restrict a worker's ability to find new employment opportunities and earn a living in their chosen field. These clauses also limit innovation and competition by preventing workers from sharing their skills and knowledge with other companies. This can ultimately hurt consumers by limiting their choices and driving up prices. Moreover, there's an asymmetry in the power dynamics between worker and employee that can lead to a lack of bargaining power for workers, particularly in industries where there are few job opportunities or a limited number of employers. Non-compete clauses further exacerbate this power imbalance by restricting workers' mobility and ability to negotiate better terms of employment. This can result in lower wages and fewer benefits for workers, as well as reduced innovation and competition in the marketplace. By banning non-compete agreements, the FTC can help level the playing field for workers and encourage a more competitive and fair job market. By banning non-compete agreements, we can promote competition, innovation, and economic growth while protecting the rights and opportunities of workers. I urge the FTC to move forward with this important proposal. Thank you for your consideration."

Joseph	"I strongly SUPPORT the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Chau	"Non-compete clauses are immoral and unethical."
Matthew	"I support prohibiting non compete agreements. I had to sign one in order to work for an apple retail store . This agreement preventing me from joining a start up team and learning how to develop iPhone applications. Looking back I'm sure the agreement was probably not that strong. But the threat of litigation from one of the biggest tech companies in the world was too much for the entrepreneurs that wanted to hire me."
Matthew	"This is a much-needed rule to enhance state-level efforts. Confidentiality can be maintained without the need for restrictive non-competes"
Brian	"I am strongly against Non-compete agreements. As a physician , I currently work under a very restrictive RC that essentially would require that I uproot my family to find a new job. It dos no thing but incentivize larger corporations or hospitals to treat their physician employees unfairly with no recourse on behalf of the employees. At worst, it potentially restrict the quality of healthcare available to people by forcing someone to leave a community to escape a predatory work environment. There is no way in reality that a single person can negatively impact the bottom line of a larger entity enough to justify such draconian laws. They should be made illegal immediately."
William	"I have been an attorney for more than fifty years and have regularly dealt with non-compete clauses. In my experience the inclusion of non-compete clauses, even when they are obviously unenforceable prevents employers from hiring talented and qualified people because they do not want their competitors challenging their unenforceable non-compete clauses. So, in my experience the primary purpose of non-compete clauses and the observance of those clauses is to prevent a challenge to their own non-competes. Also, no company I have ever dealt with has been prepared to reimburse the hire if his/her challenge to a non-compete is successful and very few employees have the financial wherewithal to bring an action challenging a non-compete. Even if the hire wanted to challenge the non-compete, by the time the case would be heard, the non-compete period is likely to have expired. Finally, companies often confuse non-competes and confidentiality clauses. they are different and should be treated differently."
Naomi	"As a physician, I would say that it is high time that the issue of non-compete clauses was addressed. I support the proposed FTC Non-Compete Clause Rule."

Christopher	"I urge the members of the FTC to eliminate no-compete clauses from employment contracts. Non-compete clauses clearly and unfairly limit people's ability to seek the best employment opportunities for them. In the land of the free, freedom should include the right to work for whom they please. Why should private companies have the power to limit this freedom, especially when many employees do not have trade secrets?"
Judi	"As a woman who has worked in information technology for 40 years, I can confirm that, as you rightly observe, non-compete clauses are a very effective means of depressing wages and restricting labor mobility. These effects are felt across the entire labor force, not just by employees but by consultants and contractors also. Please note also that the lack of labor mobility resulting from non-compete clauses makes it materially more difficult the employees to escape harassment or bullying on the job. I have experienced all of these impacts at almost every one of the half-dozen employers I have worked for. I would suggest one adjustment to the language in the proposed rule: allowing an employer to prevent workers from seeking employment prior to the conclusion of the worker's employment with that employer, is almost as chilling as the current situation. In my experience, non-compete clauses are exploitative and coercive at all times, so I would suggest that the language be adjusted to allow workers to seek new work even while employed. Thank you for seeking to make this change."
Alexander	"There are 2 examples below. Another example: I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AMA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. Eliminating the noncompete clauses will help improve healthcare access for patients as hospitals and corporations can no longer restrict where physicians can work. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely. A concerned physician."
Joseph	"Banning a No Trade Clause is the best thing we can do. It will only drive competition for the work force and create a better environment for the employees. Companies will finally have to treat their workers the way they treat their C Suite employees."

Elizabeth	"I didn't realize the extent of the problem with non-compete clauses until a relative asked me to review his non-compete after his job was eliminated due to a downsizing. The small real estate company that he worked for in North Carolina, made him sign a non compete after he had already begun his job at the company. They gave him no additional compensation and no choice but to sign the agreement. Furthermore, when he was let go after only one year at the company they would not release his severance pay unless he signed a contract re-affirming that the non compete was in full force for one year after the termination of employment. His job wasn't specialized or in a field where there was any type of technical or proprietary information that he would take to another company. I believe this sort of clause is very detrimental to employees who need to find a new job. My relative, who is a well educated, mature employee still was considering contacting an attorney in the face of his non compete clauses and was very concerned about litigating such a clause for a small amount of money. He asked his employer to eliminate the non compete clause and the employer would not. Having to involve attorneys in the negotiation process for non compete clauses that are often in a contract even though they are unenforceable under state law is a burden on the ordinary employee. Therefore, I agree with the FTC's proposed rule."
Jacob	"Love it, absolutely love it! Companies should not have the legal right to forbid former employees from taking other jobs in their industry. How are they supposed to make more money for themselves and their families?! All their experience is based on their chosen industry. I applaud you Lina Khan and the rest of you at the FTC for spearheading this. Noncompetes are simply tools to protect corporations without any regard for the little guy or gal. You have my full support!"
D	"Dear Members of the Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. As a physician, I know firsthand the negative impact that non-competes have on the healthcare industry, and I believe this rule is a necessary step towards creating a fairer, more competitive healthcare system. Non-compete clauses are a major impediment to healthy competition in the healthcare industry. By preventing physicians from working for multiple employers in the same geographic area, non-competes create a monopoly-like environment that limits competition and puts physicians at a disadvantage when negotiating their contracts. This inevitably leads to lower wages and fewer benefits, which in turn harms both physicians and their patients. Non-compete clauses also give employers unfair leverage during contract negotiations. In many cases, employers use the threat of non-competes to coerce physicians into signing unfavorable contracts. This is especially true for younger physicians, who may not be aware of their rights or lack the bargaining power to negotiate a better deal. Non-competes also result in the mandatory relocation of physician families. Because physicians are not allowed to work in the same geographic area, they are often forced to move to a different city or state in order to find employment. This can be a traumatic experience for families, and it also disrupts continuity of care for patients, who may have to find a new physician if their current one moves away. Finally, non-competes limit patient access to specialty care. By preventing physicians from working for multiple employers, non-competes reduce the number of providers available in a given area. This can make it difficult for patients to find a specialist or receive the care they need in a timely manner. For all of these reasons, I believe the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses is a necessary and important step towards creating a fairer, more competitive healthcare system. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to pass this rule as soon as possible."

Jennifer	"I strongly support eliminating non-competes. I am a physician and this limits job opportunities and can be incredibly restrictive."
John	"Could not agree more. I am in sales and went from working as an employee to being a 1099 rep for another competitor. I am not allowed into any of my old employers customers, even if I wasn't their rep when I was with them. It has hurt my new business terribly, to the point where I am not sure I can survive. I have time invested and money invested in those old relationships, just the same as my old employer does. I should be able to use that to my advantage, especially since I am the little guy and they are a multi-billion dollar company."
Nader	"Non-compete agreements can be extremely restrictive and unfair, limiting an individual's ability to work in their chosen field and earn a living for an extended period. These agreements can be particularly egregious when they are used to prevent low-wage workers or employees in non-managerial positions from finding employment elsewhere. It's time for employers to reassess the necessity and fairness of these agreements, and for lawmakers to enact legislation that protects workers' rights to pursue their chosen careers without unreasonable restrictions."
SHEILA	"I as a primary care physician rurally trained am in support of this measure to ban non compete clauses as my prior contract prevents me from working in critical access rural community for a minimum of 2 years. Removing non competes allows physicians the option to continue to work in areas where physicians have an established name and can serve the community directly faster."
Luis	"This is very discriminatory and should end ASAP! Employers are unfairly preventing individuals to go out on the market and get fair compensation to provide better living conditions to their families while they continue to do better at the expense of the hard working individuals!"
Mary Ann	"I am a CRNA, Certified Registered Nurse Anesthetist , practicing in New York State. I work under a contract with my corporate employer, the Anesthesia Group of Albany, that has a one year noncompete clause after I leave their employment. I cannot work in any of the facilities that they have had contracts in during the last year. My employer recently contracted in size leaving 2 hospitals in the last year. So if I was to give my 6 months notice to leave say 6/1/23, I could not work in those 2 hospitals until after 6/1/24. This is very unfair as there are significant CRN needs in hospitals and would mean I would have to travel outside my living area, perhaps over an hour versus 20 minutes from my home. I welcome the proposed change to eliminate noncompete clauses to make work more available. In my profession, I'm delivering anesthesia, it's not like I'm working for a profit oriented business."

Stacy	"I strongly support the FTC's proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. They hurt people from growing- in economic strength and ideas (entrepreneurs). No company- even fast food places, should have a right to hold people back. Make the rules strong and enforceable- please."
Zachary	"End all noncompete clauses immediately"
Najeeb	"In markets there is no need for non-compete clause especially those who have no trade secrets. E.g. physicians. Let the employer keep their employees happy with work-life balance and not burn them out."
Najeeb	"I am a physician practicing in Upstate NY. Non-compete clause is oppressive which obstructs the rights of physicians as employee. On other hand, a hospital can construct their extension whenever they want. In smaller communities, physician can't exercise their right to dissociate from a hospital and move to another organization. There can be a lot of reasons for physicians to move away from a hospital; one of them being non-conducive environment to provide compassionate clinical care or indolent discrimination. I strongly support the motion to end non-compete clause. Employers should work hard to keep their health-care providers happy and save them from bum-out and cut down admin bonuses."
Steven	"I am a practicing physician and sincerely hope that the FTC supports the REPEAL/ELIMINATION of non- compete clauses in ALL contracts. The intention of a business to require a non-compete in any contracts is to solely restrain/restrict trade. It has ZERO benefit to the consumer of any product, or service when one looks at the non-competes intention. It RESTRICTS an individuals ability to provide services to the public, not because that individual cannot, or will not deliver said service, but it restricted from providing that service ONLY because it would be to the detriment of the corportation/business. A restrictive covenant/non-compete rule in and of itself does not provide a benefit to the consumer, but inherently becomes a control mechanism in that the company now can inherently control a market, not directly, but indirectly through the restriction of its present as well as future employees. That is restriction of services and therefore the consumers "free choice" to chose said service."
Kelsey	"Please make sure medical and hospital jobs are included in the non compete clause rule! Thank you so much!"
Keith	"Non compete clauses are unfair for medical providers . There is little individual art to their work and they could be replaced if they chose to leave. The clauses should be banned as they only serve to prevent employees from being able to negotiate contract extensions effectively after the initial contract is signed."
Sandy	"Regarding Part ILA, these clauses should never apply to hourly wage / non professional staff workers such as sandwich makers, warehouse workers, security guards etc.whose qualifications already constrain their choices of employment and unfairly prevent them from finding comparable or better employment in the same

	field. As a member of the professional staff / administrative team for my last employer, I had other professional options and would have been utterly unable to move to another company had a non-compete clause been in place. My job did not involve developing proprietary material for my employer that could potentially be compromised if I worked for a competitor, and it would be completely unrealistic to expect me to change careers and acquire new skill sets for a period of years so that my employer could dissuade me from leaving Training costs-- along with the costs of advertising, hiring, benefits administration, etc. -- are the standard "cost of doing business" and should serve as an incentive for the employer to 1. hire carefully and not rely on a TRA or non-complete cause to hold the staff person hostage, and, 2. to treat the person they ultimately hire as an asset and in a way that ensures they are satisfied and want to stay on. Non-compete clauses -- while potentially relevant in areas of proprietary research -- allow the employer to unfairly retain staff whose departure won't have a comparable impact on the company, and provide an unfair advantage in the marketplace by not permitting other businesses with the same staffing needs to access the true pool of talent that exists to meet their needs. Please pay particular attention in this regulation to its impact on hair stylists. While stylists at a salon may offer the same schedule of services, the artistry of the individual stylist in providing those services is what creates their base of loyal clients. When a stylist leaves a salon, it is impossible to find out from the salon owner where the stylist has gone; perhaps word-of-mouth on social media is a way around this now, but stylists are not interchangeable and the prior employer should not prevent customers from locating the service provider who best meets their needs, plus those stylists should not be held hostage in a work environment by the fear of losing contact with their means of support, their client list."
Elise	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, Physicians, and medical providers generally, should not be excluded from the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. Such an exclusion would interfere with continuity of care among patients choosing to stay with their physician or create undue hardships for them to access their care, especially in rural and underserved areas. This is further aggravated by the recent practice of large medical centers and hospitals acquiring practices and clinic over large geographical regions, so that even in urban areas, a physician would be forced to relocate an unreasonably far distance to avoid "competing" with his former employer."
Kurt	"There is no justifiable reason for non-compete restrictions on employees below the most senior, product design and research, marketing strategy or policy-formulating levels of businesses. Hourly and skilled employees who can be considered as technicians or service providers must retain the right to seek alternative employment when they leave their prior employer, for whatever the reason for their separation. It is anti-competitive and discriminatory for past employers to seek to control the futures and success of employees. I support the finalization of the proposed rule and its application to as many employees and categories of employment as possible."

Tom	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I strongly support the FTC moving forward on this, with expediency. Non-compete clauses are monopolistic, based on greed and fear and rob the American worker of prosperity. They run counter to the American entrepreneurial spirit and work against a free market economy. They can allow one company /firm, whether effective or ineffective, to dominate a market, especially in remote areas where workers have fewer employment options. Non- compete clauses also can severely limit consumer choice in rural areas, especially in the health care field. Another health practitioner may be more skilled, able to provide a better service or more cost effective services, but be blocked from serving their community due to another business trying to unfairly control the market. This is predatory in nature and nothing but a microcosm of the Standard Oil monopoly days. For the worker and their families, being forced to relocate for employment due to a non-compete cause places an undue financial, emotional and social burden on them while concurrently supporting the economic prosperity a fonner employer. Workers may be forced to stay in an unsatisfactory work environment for fear of unemployment/ underemployment/ loss of income/ expense of re- training for a different field of work in order to stay in their home community. Children may be uprooted from their friends and school districts, families may have to take a loss on the sale of their home or move away from family- perhaps family they are caring for (elder care). All of this for what? For the greed of a company. An argument could be made that forcing someone to sign a non-compete clause as a condition of employment is a form of discrimination. Removing this unfair, predatory, and un-American practice will enable people to continue to seek out their best prosperity and support the ideal of a free market economy. Thankyou for your time and consideration and for spearheading this effort to protect the American worker from these unfair practices Kind regards, An American worker"
Jose	"As an anesthesia provider in a small community the non-compete clause prevents me from giving access to invaluable diagnostic and surgical services for patients who live just down the road from me. It also makes me feel as if my employer owns my labor. I ought to be able to work for and with whomever I choose to."
Josiah	"Under the "at-will" employment doctrine, an employer has no right to make employment conditional on non-competition. Outlawing all non-compete agreements will better reflect free market, small government principles."
Ewan	"As an employee and resident of Upstate New York, I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."

John	"I think this proposal is a good way to increase the quality of life of the average working American. People work so hard to bring success to their employers so its only fair that employers not be allowed to restrict workers from seeking other job opportunities."
Carlos	"I'm a physician in NYC and non compete rules here are killing our business Have been hurting my practice And I cannot practice in the areas I would like to work"
Wesley	"Ending non-compete agreements is one of the most important things that the government can do to allow individuals to work in a free and safe work environment. Additionally, it is essential that the protections for workers include those in the medical industry, including doctors, nurses, and other providers. Many hospital systems have developed into massive conglomerates through mergers and acquisitions, and when they enforce non-compete agreements with workers, they force physicians and others to move entire states away to take new jobs. American hospital systems should not be allowed to carve out a special exemption to allow themselves to mistreat those in medical professions while other Americans are protected."
BettyJean	"As the parent of a small business owner, I can attest to the impact the non compete rule has had on my daughter's career. She worked for two years for a doggie day care facility, owned by a Veterinarian Group and unfortunately, signed a NPRM. The terms included no competition for TWO years, including day care and dog training. Leaving a very difficult employer and wanting to resume her own small business became impossible. It's absurd that a large veterinary practice, which is very profitable, has been able to prevent her from making a living. Her business would not harm theirs by any stretch of the imagination. There are no trade secrets involved and there are more than enough clients to be had by both. The non-compete clause does not encourage women and small business owners to succeed. It only restricts and discouraged them from trying. I speak in favor of the new rule eliminating the non- compete clause."
Nicholas	"While I have not been subject to a strict non-compete clause in my work, I am aware of friends and family who have been. These types of clauses have caused them tremendous hardship. They have had to move to different states just to have the opportunity of changing jobs. One of them was a doctor who have spent decades paying for training personally and did not want to leave the medical profession just because he didn't like the practice he was in. Thus, we was require by his non-compete clause to leave the state just to change jobs. It seems unlikely he was privy to any special knowledge or skills of his practice that would make it unfair for him to move practices in the same state. It seems more likely that the practice did this to prevent him form finding a better paying job and to keep their wages down. This is a huge burden on people to freely leave bad or underpaying employers and take their skills somewhere else. I support the non-complete clause rule the FTC is proposing."
Emily	"As a young physician who hopes to work for a non profit hospital, I am depending on congress to protect my ability to charge jobs. Physicians have high suicide rates, often due to toxic work environments. We should be able to leave our job and go somewhere better without having to uproot our entire lives if our job is miserable. We put our lives on the line to protect the country during COVID. Please protect us from being stuck in a miserable work situation."

Randi	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements."
Alexandra	"As a physician , non compete clauses only help administrators make money at the expense of patients and patient care. Non compete clauses should be banned completely!"
Rhianna	"Yes non-competes should be banned! When an employer can hire/fire you at will but you cannot leave for better circumstances that amounts to indentured servitude. It is a blatant way to suppress employees because having to uproot your family to find another job is not feasible in many instances so it leaves employees with no choice but to continue to be held hostage to provide for themselves and their families"
Joseph	"Hi, non-compete clauses should be banned, including for healthcare workers. In many cases this will force an employee to move if they want to change jobs, which means that they will have very little leverage when negotiating with their employer."
Thomas	"I am opposed to the use of non-compete agreements, particularly in the healthcare field where the welfare and free choice of patients is of paramount concern. The same principle applies across the economy."
A	"I support the ban on noncompete clauses. Specifically for physicians . A non compete clause for a physician, where the large conglomerate healthcare systems, would make it impossible in many cases to find employment without moving. Physicians can not change specialty and many healthcare systems have multiple locations through the state. This limits employment for physicians seeking a job as they would fear a non compete clause from a healthcare system and also hinders the physician who already works for the healthcare system as they may not find employment opportunities near their home if they leave the healthcare system."
Cathy	"Hard-working American citizens who earn modest wages should not be subject to non-compete clauses. It doesn't even make sense and I could enumerate reasons why, but I think the FTC understands them well already. I'll mention a side issue: when people have to drive hours out of their way to work, burning gas, it's not just a personal inconvenience, it's an environmental issue too. Please fix this. It's tyranny,"
j	"are you kidding me, i didnt know this even existed, just another way to keep people down"
J	"To speak informally I strongly support this and it would be incredibly beneficial to workers across the board. With that stated I think that it should be sure to not exclude any particular professions or groups. In particular, physicians should be included as well as the vast majority of them are simple employees working under larger hospital and medical systems. This proposal would help support the growth of small businesses and give common workers greater stakes in their productivity. Please try to push for this to be passed to the best of your ability."

L	"As a freelance voice over actor this would be wonderful. Jobs can be very low paying and companies can try to sneak in a non-compete for recording for another similar brand or company. It's ridiculous."
M	"As a physician , I have to comment on unfair noncompete clauses that tie us into contracts and make it difficult to leave jobs that are geared towards making money for the hospital system and not helping people like we want. I have heard of colleagues stuck in noncompete contracts that deny them the ability to seek mother job in the entire STATE. These noncompete clauses are arbitrary, inhumane, and manipulative. I urge you to remove noncompete clauses and allow physicians to function as people who can actually help patients, and not be attached to a certain hospital system with a ball and chain."
R.	"I am in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses. They do not allow fair competition between employers to offer the best work environments for the most suitable employees. They hand-cuff employees into jobs they may not like (and therefore put in the minimum hours and effort). I thought business-owners and capitalists believe in a "free market". Non-compete clauses are antithetical to free market theories."
Milena	"I wholeheartedly support ending non-compete clauses. Employees should have free choice over when to leave their employer and where to go afterwards. It is an unfair restriction of employee rights to limit the location or industry they are able to work in. Stifling competition is not good for any of us."
Ashraf	"This should be removed causing major problem to doctors as hospitals blackmail then on this clause."
Jatan	"It is absolutely essential to include physicians and non profit hospitals in their final draft!"
Adam	"Please ban non-compete clauses for ALL WORKERS. I have decades of experience in the fast-paced technology industry , where non-competes stop veteran AND lower-paid emerging talent from being reallocated to the winning products, services and companies that drive America's economy, competitiveness and tax base. America wins from faster innovation and when it attracts the best talent from around the world. thank you, Adam Sah former senior engineer, Google author of 25 patents in internetworking, databases, digital imaging and healthcare"
Keith	"Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. And yet, because of the time the employee

	has been involved in that industry, that's undoubtedly the kind of work/ industry/ practices the employee knows best. While I acknowledge that for employees at the TOP of the food chain (Presidents, Vice Presidents, Executive Vice Presidents, Managing Directors, and Directors) if the employee was covered by a CONTRACT, such non-compete stipulations included in the contract should be acceptable. The person taking the position has the opportunity to accept or reject the position because of that element in the contract. But if anyone else who is hired / employed on an "at will" basis, there is no place in our economy or in the American philosophy that says a former employer has any claims to what you are doing, or where you are working once you have left their employ. I strongly approve the FTC's proposed rule to ban non-complete clauses."
peter	"Hello - Thank you so much for hopefully making non-competes illegal to enforce. I am in sales and had to sign a non compete as a requirement for the company I've worked for, the past 14 years. They were a great company to work for, until they weren't. I'm 64 and trapped, as I'd need to take 12 months off or work outside my industry for that time period, which would be a financially hurtful to me and my family. I'm one of at least 5 sales people in my company in the same predicament. Eliminating non competes is the right thing to do. You'd be freeing up millions of people to better their lives. We're rooting for you!"
Amy	"Non-competes are hurting local communities that need more, not less, doctors for health care."
Ahmed	"As a physician planning to relocate to Florida my contract has a noncompete clause with geographical restrictions (30 miles for 2 years). That essentially means that if things do not work out I would have to leave the city. Given this predicament I am wary of purchasing a home. Furthermore this affects patient care who may rely on certain local physicians expertise who cannot practice locally after leaving the institution due to noncompete clauses essentially running them out of town."
Idoko	"I am a resident of Long Island, New York working remotely for a global Contract Research Organization (CRO) as a Medical Director. My sentiments are strongly in favor of the proposed rule by the FTC to ban non-compete clauses. What I have with my current employer is not even a contract but an offer letter that shouldn't be legally binding. Yet, I was essentially compelled to sign a non-compete agreement as a condition for getting the job. My objections to the non-compete clause that CROs, such as the one I work for, put into these offer letters is the extreme restrictions it places on employees in this industry. Given the global nature of the operations of these CROs, the implication of the non-compete clause is that you can't work to make a living in any part of the US or the world for 6 months to 1 year. This is absolutely absurd and impinging on one's fundamental human rights to exist! It creates extreme hardship, makes it almost impossible to find another job in the industry and could potentially create discord within a family unit. This is the scenario I face in that I am the breadwinner/sole income earner in my family. So, you have companies creating geographical restrictions that are unnecessary since their sole aim is to make sure you don't leave the company for any other that could pay you a better salary. Most of us that are made to sign

	these restrictions on our offer letters (they all do not even offer contracts of employments with better terms), do not even have any access to the so called trade secrets that they claim to be protecting. The experiences we bring to bear on our jobs are experiences we already possessed before joining the company and which are adaptable to any job of that kind in the industry. In other words, they gain more from us than we do from them. The softwares we use for work basically work on the same principles. So, what exactly are CROs protecting that pushes them to want to restrict one's ability to make a living and feed his/her family? To conclude, the benefits to workers in the CRO, biopharmaceutical and biotechnology sector in ending the non-compete clause will be quite immense as it will allow for fluidity of skills, prevent untold hardship upon families (re: income, children's schooling, logistics of commuting to work, etc), and allow for more meaningful and sustained contributions to the communities where an employee is currently domiciled. Transferring skills thousands of miles across borders (which is even impossible under a particular non-compete with a company that is global and without specification on the geographical areas that you cannot work in), is quite disruptive, unnecessary and lacking any merit. A non-compete clause is a violation of an individual rights to be domiciled where he/she chooses and ability to work for whom he/she chooses. There are enough laws protecting confidentiality of information and trade secrets without violating individual fundamental human rights and compelling people to sign non competes just to be able to get a job to earn a living. Thank you for taking the time to read through this and I hope the FTC's efforts to do away with the non-compete clause in offer letters and employment contract sails through."
Roopal	"As a physician, I have had to make the difficult choice of declining job offers in remote areas due to egregious non-compete clauses-- meaning, if I ever decided or needed to leave the potential employer, I would have to sell my house and uproot my family in order to find alternate employment. This prevented me from accepting positions in underserved areas. My current employer, located in an urban/suburban region, is utilizing a non-compete clause to decrease my compensation, knowing that it will be nearly impossible to stay employed in my field of practice if I do not accept. Competing companies have stated that they are ready to hire me if I can "work on my noncompete." Thus, my employer has effectively prevented its competition from acquiring an experienced, skilled physician employee."
C	"I am a physician and healthcare administrator in analytics and digital health. Non competes have had a chilling effect on both ends of my career. I do understand that there could be 'proprietary information in other industries but in healthcare we're all working from the same knowledge base and working out of the same EHRs and analytics software tools. We already sign NDAs and intellectual property agreements in case we discover or invent anything. But barring where I work for two years makes me decide between progressing in my career and my salary as would be commensurate with my experience OR uprooting my family OR spending many hours commuting to a farther job. Either way even if I get paid more I still lose. This is un American and unconstitutional. You should keep in mind that in an industry so heavily consolidated many medical groups are now owned

	by bigger hospitals or payers or publicly traded companies or investor groups. So essentially everyone around you is a competitor of your current employer or is also part of your current employer. You either don't want to or cannot work for them when you decide it's time to leave. For someone like me who has a variety of clinical management skills I can always be told that someone is a competitor whether it's a clinical job, a startup, a payer. Different companies are doing aspects of work I've done. At the same time when I've negotiated contracts I must admit I'm in a better negotiation position than most workers. And still the best I can do is either negotiate down the number of miles radius OR receive a vague non legally binding reassurance that it's not really me they're after with these non competes. That I shouldn't worry. If that's the case then the small number of worrisome cases where trade secrets are stolen or shared should be taken to court. There are already protections for that. Those don't keep wages down or add costs to most workers. Thank for for this proposal."
Jon	"Please make sure ALL physicians are included in this policy. Many physicians are hospital-based and don't carry a patient panels. We take care of patients admitted to the hospital and in the hospital only. There is literally zero risk to the hospital if we choose to move to a different job because our previous patients are already home, and any current patients are already being taken care of by a team in the hospital. It is inhumane to allow noncompetes in our contracts, as it essentially amounts to signing our lives over for this job unless we are willing to relocate our entire lives and family a very significant distance (often to a completely different state) for literally no reason."
Ayman	"I support this proposal as I find that the non-compete clause can often result in undue distress on workers unjustly. The non-compete clause prevents workers from leaving malicious work environments without suffering consequences of life changing sacrifices such as relocating themselves and their family out of the non-compete zone to be able to earn an income. Similar, the non-compete clause can force workers to relocate from a non-compete zone even though the employer is not able to continue to support the position for the worker. I urge you to support this proposal and end the negative impact of the non-compete clause."
Kabir	"I am strongly in support of the FTC's proposed rule banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts. This restriction on employees moving freely between jobs and firms has the effect of stifling innovation and traps employees in job situations where they are unable to reach their full potential. Non-compete clauses give disproportionate power to employers, who can adversely impact a person's ability to earn a livelihood in their industry and with the job skills they have developed over the course of their career."
Michael	"I am an ophthalmologist in practice for 25 years. I agree with elimination of non-competes as long as it is for all health care group including non-profits. Don't let the nonprofit lobby groups pressure you. If we want a fair playing field for all doctors then eliminate the no-competes for all! If you only do a partial then you are giving unfair advantages to non-for-profits"

Wendy	"Workers deserve the right to seek out new employment when they are unhappy or dissatisfied with their current situation. Non-compete clauses make that almost impossible. This country has gone too far in stripping of workers rights."
Lorraine	"It seems to me that a fast-food worker or hairdresser or others in non-management positions, the employer should only control your activities while he or she is paying you. It seems unfair to prevent you from leaving a job and finding another."
Natalie	"Hello. I previously worked for a staffing agency that made me sign a noncompete agreement as a prerequisite of employment. Per the terms of the noncompete agreement, upon termination of employment at the company, I would not be able to work for another staffing agency of comparable business sectors (administrative, technical, accounting/finance, and creative) within FIFTY miles of the company headquarters. This is an absurd business practice that was forced upon me as a condition of employment as a full-time, salaried employee at this company. I have the privilege and resources to be able to work in another field or move to another area. However, many people, especially those who work in underpaid, hourly jobs, do not have this same type of access. Noncompete "agreements" are an exploitative business practice that not only discourages competition but artificially lowers worker wages and maintains the trend of the US economy toward monopolization. I support the FTC proposal to ban noncompete agreements across the labor market. Citizens are the driving force of government, NOT companies. Thank you for your time."
Jordan	"The elimination of non-competes would have an enormous positive impact on my career and the lives of countless other workers. In the field of medicine, non-compete agreements allow monopolistic hospital chains and health systems to effectively eliminate any meaningful competition and shackle doctors into onerous contracts through non compete agreements. It is common for physician employment contracts to include non-compete clauses that prevent the doctor from working within 50 or 100 miles of their employer for months or even a year after quitting. With many health systems spanning entire states, this essentially prevents physicians from exiting their contracts for fear of having to move their families to a different state to find work. These contracts also prevent physicians from informing their patients, who they may have treated and developed relationships with over years, that they are leaving and where they are going. This allows healthcare oligopolies to maintain a strangle hold in patients and threatens the trust and care that defines the physician-patient relationship. These effects harm not only physicians, but patients, who are deprived of a competitive healthcare environment that could reduce prices and make available the kind of humanistic care that everyone deserves. Other professions are similarly affected by these contracts that dictate how a former employee may behave long after they have left their former employer. Non competes may make some kind of sense in the context of industries with trade secrets, but this doesn't apply to medicine or most other industries that non-compete agreements are deployed in. In medicine, there are no trade secrets. On the contrary, medical practice is predicated on transparent, universal guidelines that are developed through the scientific method."

	If a surgeon developed a new technique that improved outcomes, it would be unethical not to share it with their colleagues so that everyone could benefit. In this context, trade secrets and non-compete agreements are nonsensical, and are in fact harmful to patients. Please, make this great step forward for workers everywhere Eliminate these onerous agreements"
Randy	"This is great news! I worked for year selling sale, leadership, and customer service training, and gaining much experience. When my former company changed ownership, they imposed very restrictive commission structures. I list hundreds of Thousands of dollars in commissions. I was offered an incredible salary with a competitive firm back in 2002. I took the job knowing full well that the new owner of my former company would sue. tie did yet we won. I was still very loyal to my former owner/CEO and fully abided by the non disclosure agreement. This is a major move forward and I applaud the work of the FTC!"
Brahm	"I strongly support regulations to limit non-competes. Non-competes have become the default in many industries and reduce economic productivity and choice among workers. Companies should try to retain their employees by being a more attractive employer as opposed to threatening to sue their employees who are being recruited elsewhere."
Greg	"I am an engineer. Over my 35+ year career I have been negatively impacted by non-compete clauses in employment agreements and continue to be negatively impacted to this day. The non-compete clauses have been used to discourage me from seeking new employment when I wanted to do so. This has been in the form of intimidation and a "friendly reminder" that I am under a non-compete clause. Specifically, I have been told that I cannot take another job if that job will result in using anything that I learned while employed regardless of how or when that knowledge was gained - on or off the job 24/7 since the date I started that job. This, of course, is ridiculous but it is the kinds of things that employers have used to prevent me from leaving and to prevent me from voicing complaints about my work conditions or salary. I believe that nearly all employers within my industry understand that the non- compete is unenforceable and actually have no intention of enforcing it, rather they force employees to sign them (I've had employers that require it to be signed every year just before performance appraisals) and use it as a threat only. I feel strongly (for the future generation of engineers mostly) that employers should be prevented from using this threat in any way against employees."
Phyllis	"Non-compete rules effectively create a monopoly-type employment market. We're long overdue to start reigning in the power that corporations have over our lives, and this is a good first step."
Bryan	"I am a freelance Mechanical Engineer. Changing this rule would allow me to immediately expand my business and potentially begin hiring and training others to take on more work."

Dili	"The physicians should not have the non-compete clause rule in their contracts. This severely restricts a physician's ability to switch jobs in case the employer is not a great match for the physician. The non-compete also allows the hospital to potentially abuse and hold the physician hostage. This should not be allowed in a free society such as United States."
Tyler	"I support this decision."
Sarah	"Noncompetes must be banned for physicians . I am in a situation where I was hired fresh out of training with the promise that I would be considered for partnership and there would be "good faith negotiations" that would start after working 2.5 years. Well that never happened and instead I was being threatened to be fired with the noncompete being held against me as a means of keeping me at the practice or else I would have to leave the geographic area to practice. The practice owner fired the other associate as well who had to move to practice. It is not fair that other professionals such as lawyers are no subject to noncompete agreements. I have been verbally harassed by the owner of the practice and wish I would be treated fairly. There are other jobs at local hospitals which are no competition to this one owner practice but because of the clause I cannot practice anywhere."
Nancy	"RE: FTC proposed Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No.P201200. In general, I support eliminating non-compete clauses from employment contracts, as they make it more difficult for employees to change jobs, or to seek a better job. I speak as a former employee of companies that had non- compete agreements for all salaried employees. I do support limitations on former employees "stealing" employees or clients from a previous employer. I also support confidentiality agreements for proprietary information owned by a company."
Mannu	"As a physician . I am appalled that anytime I wish to pursue other options for mine or my families best interest, it is the interest of hospital systems which is prioritized above our own. Non-competes turn us into indentured slaves, we cannot leave employment without leaving the area and in turn my family suffers or I suffer, but the hospital systems which abuse us do not. Non-competes are anti-American, they are anti-capitalism. They exist only for the sole benefit for hospital systems which despite "non-profit" status are in fact entirely for profit."
Shara	"This is so important. Physicians locked into a contract with a non compete, especially in rural areas with greater mileage non competes would have to move to a different area if they needed to leave their job. Or they might be forced to commute over an hour. This isn't a fair ask for doctors. It means that employers doesn't have to try to keep us with fair wages or benefits like health insurance or retirement savings. It's doesn't allow fair compensation."
joyce	"Dear Sir/Madam: Hello, my name is Joyce Shiffin, and I am sending you this e-message to tell you that I support a ban on non-compete clauses for ALWAYS!!! Why is this particular issue pertinent to me? Because to me, EVERY worker deserves to be given fair wages and more importantly, a safe, productive work environment for as long as stlie is working for ALL TIMES!!! Thank you, Joyce Shiffrin"

Robert	"Well paid workers drive a strong economy!! I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and hann working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Alyson	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth and to be free of corporate control"
Jennifer	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses."
Ian	"This proposed rule is absolutely the right thing to do for the American economy. I have signed a non-compete statement/restrictive covenant in my current role as all of my coworkers have. Finding a job is hard enough and being legally obliged to look outside of a certain geographic area is lunacy. I am not really sure what else to comment, but I cannot express how strongly I support this rule. Even if I did not sign a restrictive covenant, I would still be in support of this rule because an employees have not been "owned" by employers since 1865. A company shouldn't be able to carve out an arbitrary piece of land and stake it as their bounds for their employees; at least not without paying property tax and then even still it's a had idea."
Michael	"I am strongly in favor of this rule. Non-complete clause distort the economy, disempower workers, ultimately resulting in worsened growth and social outcomes. Thank you for your diligent work on this."
Shlomo	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, doctors, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a fmal rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Alexandra	"I am an internal medicine physician in a small rural city. I own a home here and work for the only hospital in the county, which is a non-profit private organization. Unfortunately, after signing my contract (which included a non-compete) and working here for a few years, I've learned just how terribly the hospital is run and how poorly the physicians and APPs are treated. I'd like to leave my job and continue to serve my community, which is in desperate need of internal medicine physicians. However, I cannot, as I have a non-compete. As this job is not sustainable and many are quitting, I've looked for other jobs, however, this means I have to commute an hour away to another city. This other city does not have a healthcare worker shortage the way my home city does, but it's my only option since I cannot work locally due to the non-compete. I also do not want to sell my home, uproot my life, and move away from my family and friends. The non-compete in my contract is preventing me from continuing to serve my community, where I live, which is in dire need of internal medicine physicians. Physician burnout rates are so high, and so many physicians are leaving the profession. The non-compete in my contract allows the only hospital in town to essentially "get away with" the horrible working conditions they provide, and it prevents locals from working in their own community when they want to make the decision to work in a place that doesn't lead to high rates of depression and burn out."

Dennis	"Non compete agreements are a unfair stipulation companies put on employees. It takes power away from the employee and give it solely to the employer. These agreements benefit no one but the large entity. Employees are forced to sign these, it is never voluntary. It puts people in a position of putting up with unfair conditions. If they don't like their situation it is either commute long distances or move their family. Some states have outlawed non compete agreements. I hope the federal government will do the right thing and ban them to. Please restore the power to the people you serve. Give us back our negotiating power."
Erin	"We live rurally and my husband has been under a non compete ever since leaving college. The size of the non compete makes it so we would have to move entirely if he ever was unhappy with his employer. It is never ending indentured servitude. His employer blindsighted everyone and sold to a big corporate company who then also withheld pay owed to him until he signed the non compete. The whole thing is ludicrous and needs to change!"
Hiroshi	"We should ban the non-compete clause. 1. Non-compete agreements harm workers: Non-compete agreements prevent workers from pursuing their chosen career paths and limit their opportunities for advancement. They also make it harder for workers to negotiate for better wages and benefits. 2. Non-compete agreements harm innovation: Non-compete agreements prevent workers from starting their own businesses or joining new startups, which stifles innovation and competition in the marketplace. 3. Non-compete agreements are unfair: Non-compete agreements often force workers to choose between their livelihoods and their personal freedoms. They also disproportionately affect low-wage workers who are less likely to have the resources to fight them. 4. Non-compete agreements are unnecessary: Many industries, such as technology and healthcare, already have protections in place to prevent employees from taking trade secrets or other confidential information to a competitor. Non-compete agreements are therefore redundant and only serve to limit workers' opportunities. 5. Non-compete agreements hurt the economy: By limiting workers' opportunities, non-compete agreements make it harder for businesses to attract and retain top talent. This can lead to a brain drain in certain industries and hurt the overall economy."
Gail	"I am in strong support of the proposed rule to severely curtail the excessive and often capricious use of non-compete clauses by private employers under the guise of protecting corporate interests. The practice of overly broad non-competes -

	which all employees are afraid of, whether they are a blue or white collar employee - results in a form of indentured servitude. As a professional consultant, my current non-compete literally forces me to stay in my current employer or essentially leave the industry. As a highly specialized person, my non-compete states that I cannot work within 200 miles of my office or with any client of the firm's (not my own) for two years upon my departure. Both the term and the geographic limitations serve to handcuff me to the organization. I would love to start my own business where I could easily earn more and work less, a clear example of how these non-competes stifle competition and suppresses salaries. Moving to restrict employers' use of these agreements is critical for people like me - professionals who are ready for a new challenge - to get the opportunity to truly do something incredible in the waning years of their career. What ever happened to rewarding American ingenuity? Without this basic restriction, we are stifling everyone to achieving their best. And by the way, to the question of why I would have signed a non-compete in the first place? My job offer was literally contingent on it and I needed the job. If I had had the ability to negotiate it away, I would have. Now, although I'm employed, I'm stuck."
Abigail	"I urge the FTC to ban noncompete clauses, which hinder labor Inability and hurt workers. The deck is already stacked against regular employees, and it is unjust to allow employers to dictate what people do after they leave their jobs."
Paul	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I work in digital advertising sales, and have been under noncompete agreements for most of my career. My experience hasn't been a great one. Often, when it would be most beneficial to you, you're unable to change jobs because of them. That's not to mention how vague they can be (it's not rare to have them worded so broadly you could conceivably never work in advertising again if you were to try and change jobs). I easily has missed out on higher paying or more desirable jobs because of my contract. I am one of many people I know who could say the same in my industry. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Paul Stack"
Eric	"I am a family practice physician who has struggled with noncompete agreements for most of my career. There are many reasons why noncompetes are not good for medicine but the biggest of all is that they hurt patients! The patients frequently have to go find a new doctor. Or a community may lose a certain specialist who is desperately needed. I completely support banning these agreements but please include doctors and other medical professionals, for the sake of the public."
Skye	"As a violin teacher I have non-compete clause in my contract at a community music school. The school has never provided me with any curriculum, and provided no training before I began my position in 2003. I've never been offered more than 10-15 hours per week of work with this organization. Although they have never interfered with my ability to work concurrently with other organizations to make ends meet, it has prevented me from pursuing opportunities that would cut into my time working with them. The fact that this clause is there and enforceable should one of my supervisors choose to target me hangs over my head. It is unjust, and unjustifiable. Please enact the proposed ban on unjustified non-compete clauses."

Danny	"My wife and I oppose the Non-Compete clause. This prohibits workers from moving up to better positions and wages. They suffer with threats of legal action and must travel cruel distance to survive. Please eliminate the NPRM"
Mindy	"I was subject to a non-compete clause. They are unfair esp as corporations get larger."
Joseph	"This is great. I am a doctor and my non compete limits me from going to any hospital in the area. To remove this restrictive clause would help me so much"
David	"I'm in favor of banning non-compete clauses because they are detrimental to workers. I hope the FTC passes this rule soon."
Sandra	"Anything that would increase competition in our monopolized market is a good thing."
Jeffrey	"In the case of a business sale, I would recommend the percentage be raised to at least 33% perhaps even 50%. Having it at the currently proposed 25% greatly restricts innovation that could be happening in our economy, by casting way too big a net for founders selling their companies. Additionally, I believe, again in the case of a business sale, at minimum, the FTC should restrict how long a non-compete can stay in force. I am seeing many in the market coming in at 5 years. Again, this stifles innovation. I would propose something more on the order of 1 to 2 years."
William	"As the FTC has correctly stated, Noncompetes depress wages and kill innovation. That gives corporations more power over workers, and less freedom for millions of Americans. It would be a clear win for workers if the FTC banned noncompetes, but corporations won't just let it happen."
Rose	"the Federal Trade Commission proposed a rule this year that would ban the use of noncompete clauses in future employment contracts and void such clauses in existing contracts. This would help my family enonnously. I am a physician assistant with a noncompete clause. I do not have access to, nor am I party to, any trade secrets by my employer that would be of any use to any other hospital system. Therefore, the point of the noncompete clause is to drive down competition and to keep my wages stagnant. Please void the noncompete clause in my contract so that I am free to move from hospital system. I have a middle class family and a child and this has a real impact on my ability to earn a living."
Dan	"I've been in medical sales for 20 years. Every year I have to work longer and harder while my company lowers commissions and create hostile work environment. To the point where many of my colleagues do unethical things to try and make quotas and earn what they used to learn. We can't go elsewhere because of noncompetes and are stuck in our jobs or have to change fields losing all our contacts"

Patrick	"I was recently let go by my employer who is the second largest electronic security [firm] in the country. The company I used to work for was acquired by this new company two years ago and in order to stay employees I was forced to sign a non compete agreement. These agreements can force a 24 year veteran in the business into another industry due to the restrictions in the agreement. I am not the type of person to steal their business and or trade secrets. If a Cleo t wants to do business with the new company I am working for due to their discontent for my previous employer it should not be considered a breech of contract. I fear that these agreements Don not only affect the employees but also the customers in the business. In my line of work there are only a handful of companies in the US that specialize in the technology I have worked with for over 20 years. It is my belief that in order for fair trade that non compete agreements should be banned and deemed illegal. This will ensure fair trade and labor options for all parties."
Vonetta	"As a physician who has had noncompete clauses in employment contracts, I am writing in support of the abolition of noncompetes. They serve no purpose in improving patient care. They adversely affect patient care by limiting where physicians can work and thereby affecting availability to many different communities. An employee should have the ability to leave an employment position when the working conditions are not suitable and not be bound to an employer, just because leaving would be so onerous. They are simply a means for the employer to bind the employee to stay with that employer, regardless of working conditions. Because of noncompetes, employers have a little incentive to improve contracts and conditions. Employers, especially large hospital chains, use restrictive covenants indiscriminately by adding clauses to positions that do not justify having restrictive covenants, for example, jobs were physicians are performing duties that are solely inpatient, either delivering care as emergency, physicians, anesthesiologists, hospitalists or intensivists, and have no patient following that would necessitate a restrictive covenant. Even worse are large systems that have wide geographical areas and use their restrictive covenants to basically force the employee physician to choose between staying at their current position or moving completely out of state. The historical justification was that these positions are highly specialized, and requiring highly technical skills that are hard to come by in the employment sector, and therefore certain clauses should be added to ensure employee retention. The reality is that restrictive covenants, affect, competition, adversely, by forcing the employee to effectively be chained to their current employment, and not be able to have the ability to move to other nearby employers. If a specialist has to move completely out of the region to honor restrictive covenant, this will have a negative impact on the community, especially if this specialist was the one treating rare conditions, or in a specialty that is experiencing overall physician shortages or limited access. Given the known shortages of physicians nationwide, having these kind of limitations on employment, have a significant negative impact on the healthcare system as a whole. Outside of the medical community, it is known that employers have become egregious abusers of restrictive covenants, and have not use them as they claim, to retain highly skilled employees who may have trade secrets, but for non-skilled employees as a way to 'chain' them to their job. For this reason, restrictive covenants should be eliminated in all industries."

J	"The American hospital association does not represent physicians. The American medical association does not represent physicians. They do not have the interest of physicians and trying to exclude physicians from this ruling. This is to increase the profits of hospitals and their CEOs on the back of physicians. Physicians are limited in where they can practice and forced to leave their homes if things do not work out. Hospitals are creating monopolies every where as health systems. They have deep pockets and are trying to influence the FTC. Physicians, mostly, are all against non competes. Listen to physicians when inquiring about how physicians feel and not the CEOs of hospitals who make millions. They forced physicians to work during Covid and they made big profits and bonuses - yes even the not for profit hospitals."
Rita	"Noncompete clauses are finally getting the attention that it deserves and I'm glad it's negative attention. These contracts prevent employees from getting work/fair pay. I am a healthcare worker and in my opinion as well as others who work in this field agree that this blocks access to care. Which has been a major problem when all systems fail because we aren't prepared (example: Covid pandemic). These contracts allow for employers to keep their employees hostage resulting in unfair pay/lack of raise in wages. If this is a country that values freedom- no compete clauses should not exist. They were implemented for something specific (keeping company secrets) but has been used in horrible ways to prevent people from getting work. I support this bill 100%!"
S	"As a recent residency graduate who has moved to New York City due to a change in her long-term partner's job, having a non-compete clause of any distance in my contract severely limits my ability to continue to practice in multiple other boroughs. Therefore, we would have to significantly relocate to a totally different type of environment (suburban or rural), if I were to leave my current position with a desire to work at another institution, which not only affects my ability to work, but also my partner (while uprooting our children). Already in California and other states, legislators have recognized that these agreements restrict a patient's right to choose their physicians and wrongly limits competition between healthcare systems. It is likely that non-solicitation agreements are sufficient to prevent physicians from poaching patients when they leave the practice, although I still believe that patients should have a right to choose their physicians. Additionally, a physician should have the right to fair compensation and working conditions regardless of the proximity to their previous employers, especially as so many physicians are forced out of the workforce either due to extreme burnout or dying by suicide. Lastly, this ban on non-compete agreements should certainly apply to both for profit and non-profit organizations, as many health systems have a non-profit organization status and will undoubtedly utilize this loophole to continue enforcing non-compete agreements."

Lewis	"People are free. They should be able to work anywhere they can find work. Noncompetes only help exploiters, not workers. Which side are you on?"
Carolina	"It's about time the federal government steps in to stop these abuses by companies, especially in financial business where agent working as independent contractor are barred by big companies like New York Life to go to competitor, meantime, getting all the contacts and business of that agent whose commissions/renewals are cut off. Even when financial professionals do not sign any non-compete agreements, the company will harass former agents and financial professionals from continuing business with their clients, including their own family members whom they had a previous dealing NYS frowns upon such practices as shown by several cases by NY Atty General, but a federal law is still necessary to curtail these illegal practices of these big institutions. New York Life Co, for example, will insist that non-compete is incorporated with their agency agreement written somewhere, except that it is not even signed by agents. Also, thousands of FINRA cases for those with securities licenses are filed against professionals moving to another company only to harass them, it gets dropped by FINRA by the thousands but not after expensive arbitration process and besmirching the reputation of the professionals for at least 2 years and depriving them of livelihood. Yet, this big company (NYL) sweeps under the rug their own compliance mishap leading to elder abuse case and fraudulent withdrawal of elder client annuity accounts. They don't investigate their ranks despite timely report by us but they are quick to jump at financial professionals leaving the company to join competitors. FINRA is not very helpful either, because it allows publication of ALL reports and allegations by financial institutions, leaving the individuals to fend for themselves. hire lawyers while having no job, the rules require arbitration fees and hearings which takes many months if not years, while the records of the individual are not automatically deleted even after an investigation by FINRA shows the report is not true! FINRA forces the financial professionals to arbitrate in order to remove the false report. The FTC must step in. I have evidence to all these."
Richard	"I am writing in support of the proposed non-compete clause rule to restrict and/or eliminate non-competes from the workplace. As a former employee of a company who compelled me to sign a non-compete, I can say with experience that non-compete clauses chain an employee to an employer for the long term if for no other reason that the employer is the one with the bigger financial pockets and can easily crush an employee into submission to the noncompete - whether or not the non-compete document has merit - with the threat of a lawsuit whether in current employ or post employment. In my case, I was let go from my employment of 11-1/2 years mid-year in 2009 during the financial crisis. My employer (a lighting/audio/video production company in the New York City special events industry) was deeply in financial distress and seeking to cut expenses wherever possible. I was let go and my employer cautioned me that the non-compete was still in effect and that I should not seek employment with a firm that competed with the company. At the time, I had spent virtually my entire professional life in the New York City theatrical and special events business. I owned an apartment with a wife and young child. The idea that I was to simply walk away from my profession and all of my professional contacts and colleagues was simply preposterous. I

	consulted with an attorney and was advised that I should go ahead and seek new employment - which I did and was successful. (I remain with this same company today 12+ years later). In the late fall of 2009, my former employer served notice of a lawsuit and I spent the next year fighting back. I did not have the financial means readily available to do this but had no choice as I was in no place to move from New York City, the country was in deep recession, and the idea that I would have to change professions not only practically impossible but deeply unfair and unjust. I borrowed money from my father to pay the lawyer. In December of 2010, the matter was finally brought before a judge who ordered my former employer to provide financial proof that I had caused irreparable harm. My former employer chose to drop the lawsuit rather than pursue the case. I spent $35,000 in legal fees fighting him off for a year. This was a tremendous amount of money for me. Non-competes in my opinion are on their face un-American, deeply unfair to the employee, and an unjust and unjustified restriction on a worker's rights to freely work with and for whomever offers the best possible employment. The employee has no financial ammunition - unless most likely assuming debt - in the face of a committed former employer who wishes to chase the employee from the profession. Regardless of an employer's arguments that they have an inherent right to restrict their employee's right from seeking the best possible employment situation that is in their interests, I cannot agree in any manner whatsoever. Nothing can justify the assault on an employee to work where the offer is best. I am adamant in that opinion. Thank you for your time. I urge support to all parties involved in implementing this rule that will restrict or eliminate non-competes from the American workplace wherever it may occur and regardless of profession or employee income."
Scott	"Noncompete agreements are anti-American and definitely anti-capitalism. Companies should not be able to tell employees who have spent their lives training for specific jobs that they can not take their talents elsewhere if they want to. I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Robert	"This is an amazing idea. Non-compete is a fundamentally anti-worker idea that sends a message that people are not allowed to advance themselves and their careers."
Yosef	"The non-compete clause is stopping good talent from reaching their potential. Please get rid of this clause. Thank you"
A	"I think this is a great move for the FTC!! It's the first time in a long while the country has seen a commissioner do something positive for the working class! Thank you, keep up the good work!"

Alec	"Anxiety, depression, and thoughts of suicide are increasing exponentially. It's been determined that a major cause is toxic work environments. Too many places of employment are run by narcissistic and sociopaths who view kindness, praise, and empathy as weaknesses while demanding that their words and methods be treated as gospel. As easy as it is to tell them to "just move on," too many employers make that significantly more difficult by making employees sign Non-Compete Agreements, giving them the right to file lawsuits against employees to prevent them from moving on. By banning Non-Compete Agreements, you would open up job opportunities for over 30 million Americans, raise wages by over $300 billion per year, and decrease America's depression rates. This is a matter of humanity, not numbers."
Ann	"I am writing in support of the proposed rule banning noncompete clauses. As a physician working for a large system, I am currently bound by a noncompete clause that bars me from working anywhere in a reasonable commuting distance from my home. Without the freedom to change employers, not only do I have no real bargaining power in terms of my own compensation, but I and other physicians lack power to effectively negotiate for system changes to positively impact patient care, including advocating for adequate staffing, resources for communicating with patients, and processes of care for patients."
Jennifer	"Noncompete clauses won't apply to nonprofit hospitals. Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations (which I have personally suffered under) as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities. Sincerely, Jennifer Tomczak MD"
Ray	"Non-competes are a burden not only to the employee but also to society. I am a physician in a highly populated city, where there is a great need for my work no matter where I choose to work. My hospital is currently proposing a non-compete that excludes every other large hospital system in the area, and is far encompassing and holds me the my entire contract. Whether there is a need or

	better conditions elsewhere, this clause would keep me at this one hospital, OR force me to move away from the area entirely, OR simply step away from my job. This exacerbates physician shortages and access to care, as clearly outlined by my choices above. If the work conditions at my hospital were to deteriorate, I would have no recourse to leave, and then my choices would be to either leave medicine entirely, or move to a completely different region, thus the region losing another health care worker. The allowance of noncompetes allows employers to ignore the needs of employees, in that they feel secure that employees as myself would be forced to either stay in the position, or just leave, and they assume that the latter is not even a choice. Furthermore, the idea that the noncompete is necessary for the protection of the hospital or practice is completely unfounded, particularly in areas of high need. There is no harm, as there is no loss of patients or revenue to the hospital when any one physician leaves. If many were to leave at once, that would indicate that the hospital or practice is in fact in need of change, and should not be allowed to continue in the manner that they are. Most importantly, the current proposal does not apply to non-profit hospitals, but it really should. Most all hospital systems are labeled as "nonprofit," despite operating like any other for profit institution. By excluding "nonprofit" hospitals and hospital systems, this is hurting the large number of health care workers as outlined above, with no recourse. I highly support and urge for the proposal to go forward and to include non-profit entities, particularly hospitals and hospital systems, in the verbiage of the proposal."
Philip	"You don't apply it to Attorneys how dare you try to make it applicable to Physicians. Ever heard of Equal Protection Clause" we have and you couldn't even pass a rational basis scrutiny for a socio-economic provision. That is how absurd the suggestion."
Bradley	"Dear FTC, I support banning employers from enforcing non-compete agreements. Employee non-compete agreements stifle innovation. The USA should follow California's lead on this issue. If an employer wants to ban an employee from working for a competitor, they can restrict them from doing so by paying for the non-compete activity. A non-compete agreement has value, so employers should not get to take it for free from employees. Regards, Brad Note: These opinions are my own, and not related to my employment or employer. My current employer does not have non-compete agreements or clauses as a requirement of employment."
Christopher	"between non-competes and all the hospital system mergers (that should have fallen under more scrutiny) physicians essentially need to uproot their families and move in order to change jobs. These market distortions artificially lower wages by taking away any negotiating leverage and trap people in practice settings where they are unhappy and unproductive. health systems might argue that they use this downward pressure on wages to pass along savings to patients and their families, but where is the evidence of that? https://ldi.upenn.edu/our-work/research-updates/hospital-consolidation-continues-to-boost-costs-narrow-access-and-impact-care-quality/ to cite many studies showing the opposite is true."

William	"I am writing in support of this rule and that it should apply to non-profit organizations and physicians along with other healthcare professionals. Many healthcare non-competes are very restrictive and prevent professionals including physicians from fairly seeking other opportunities, especially as many require physicians to move in order to obtain a job in the same specialty due to incredibly restrictive covenants including radius and duration. In many cases, physicians who wish to seek other opportunities do so in order to advance their careers, pursue leadership positions, obtain research opportunities, etc. In other cases, it may be working conditions such as unsafe patient conditions, poor hospital quality, or burdensome work unrelated to direct patient care. By allowing physicians and other professionals switch jobs freely, it would also improve patient care, hospital quality, and incentivise hospitals to invest in their employees. In our current healthcare environment post-pandemic, our hospital systems are on the verge of collapse and healthcare professionals are leaving the field in droves. This is unsustainable and by allowing professionals to seek other opportunities, perhaps we can retain this talented and highly skilled workforce."
Ben	"I strongly support a ban on noncompete clauses. I have been bound by one at every job since college, and they have forced me to change industries with every job, reduced the rate I've been able to increase my wages, and have left me afraid of taking opportunities that my current employer might see as competitive and suing me to stay put. America will be fairer, more prosperous, and more free when noncompetes are a thing of the past."
Emily	"All non competes should be made illegal. They are incredibly harmful to workers. They result in undue hardship, pressure to stay at low paying and other wise undesirable jobs, depress wage growth and cause a number of other issues. Business need to compete for workers by providing better pay and benefits, not by cheating their way to keeping unhappy employees!"
San	"I strongly support this clause. I signed into a 5 year non-compete with a small business owner who supplied me with the resources but I pretty much learned everything from my friend on the job and on my own. There are no trade secret but i still had to sign a non-compete. I want to someday start a business but cannot so my only two choices are to stay or to learn a new skill. Im a 32 year old man, it took me years to gain the skills i have and i have to leave it behind if i would like to pursue the american dream, i cannot get sued before i get innovate, so now i must start over and learn another skill."
Olivia	"Please put this rule into effect! I work in publishing , where my main leverage to increase my salary was switching companies. I was once told explicitly by my direct supervisor that an offer from another company was my best option to get a raise. This is a small enough industry that if I'd had a non compete, I would not have had that option and might still be fighting for the same raise."
Kym	"I am a Certified Registered Nurse Anesthetist , who works on Long Island. I had to sign a noncompete clause to keep my job. It basically keeps me from working for any other hospital system on Long Island. Therefore, if I wanted a new job I would have to move or travel over 90 min to work for a diffent company. I do not think this is fair. I totally support banning non compete clauses."

Jill	"Please ban non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Please also look at non-competes and other rights waivers for severance contracts. These are also stifling worker mobility and allow companies to fire people that are outliers or challenge the status quo without threat of lawsuits."
Sarah	"Please please please ban non-compete clauses. These vile clauses prohibit excellent workers from taking their skill sets to where they're most needed. Because these clauses can be insanely broad, wonderful workers can be locked out of their industry for years and years, wasting their developed skill sets just because one place of employment didn't pan out. Banning non-compete clauses will help raise the employment rates and strengthen our economy with experienced workers."
Cyril	"I am a physician in support of removal of non-competes. The non-competes are used by the large health systems to monopolize their networks and intimidate and threaten their physician staff. Having non-competes is a detriment to public health, as physicians are forced to take non clinical roles or practice outside a geographic area for 2 years. By removing non-competes, public health will be improved by more access to providers. Additionally, physician and provider burnout will be decreased"
Vikram	"Please pass this bill!"
Richard	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people Banning this policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! As a business owner , I do not feel the Non-Compete Clause Rule is fair of justified. A company should not be able to keep employees from being paid a fair wage for their services compared to other similar size companies. Pay from employers should be based on many factors, but companies should not be able to hold employees hostage by the Non-Compete Clause Rule. If another company is willing to pay more for someones services, businesses have the choice to match or negotiate with the employee, if desired, or accept the losses and not hold them back financially with this Rule."
Gregg	"This is an excellent rule and should be adopted. Employers have no legitimate interest to prevent an employee who has honored his/her contract from earning a living in the same city. Employers can be protected by rights of first refusal. Non-competes are overreaching and utterly unfair to employees. In the broadcast television field , many states have already enacted laws that ban non-competes, and the FTC should do so as well."
John	"I have heard that the American Hospital Association is trying to EXCLUDE Physicians/Surgeons from the non-compete rule. Physicians/Surgeons are some of the most negatively impacted professionals by non-compete clauses. We often spend years developing a practice based of our personal reputation and expertise

	however many hospital systems and practices have non-competes in place that prevent us from changing jobs. We settle our families near where the job is, children are in schools, and spouses work nearby and the fear of a non-compete is essentially like a pair of handcuffs keeping us tied to the job. We often have no recourse when it comes to job dissatisfaction and the only options are to completely uproot our families and give up our practices and start over from scratch somewhere outside the non-compete. We are one of the only fields where trying to comply with a noncompete can often mean completely restarting your career whereas other professions have the benefit of being able to take jobs that are equivalent to their experience/seniority albeit in locations that do not violate the noncompete. Physicians/Surgeons and all other healthcare practitioners at all levels should NOT be excluded from the non-compete rule. Do not cave to hospital lobby."
Dawn	"Please rule in favor of abolishing non compete contracts. I should be allowed to take a job at another company without being forced to move or commute long disyances. I want to be allowed to have a competitive work three as well as fair working conditions which I believe will occur if you abolish non complete clauses in contracts."
Justin	"I support banning non-competes. In medicine, it serves to disadvantage doctors from options. Their choices are less and they feel trapped."
Corey	"I fully support the FTC in banning non-compete clauses in contracts. Non-competes are in themselves anti-competitive- they function only to benefit corporations by chaining employees to their employer. To be unable to work/practice one's craft freely in the place one has formed a life, simply due to a clause within a contract, is absurd. In one quite pervasive example, physicians are subject to non-compete clauses and many times cannot practice within several miles of their former office (and many times within any office owned by their former employer). In areas that have large health systems a non compete clause essentially prevents a physician from leaving, harming patient care and destroying any ability for that physician to continue caring for their patients- ultimately a harm to the people under that physicians care."
Alexandra	"I am a physician in a small town in New York State. My employer lived 500 miles away however he kept me to my two year noncompete clause and therefore I had to drive 1.5 hours to work, but more importantly, he substituted a poor physician in my place who had no knowledge of the people of the community and was much less qualified. I do not hold trade secrets, I am a physician trying to do my job. My reason for leaving initially was that my employer was a slave driver and would not provide assistance. I worked with him for 13 years but couldn't continue."
Kyle	"please ban them in all capacity and in all scenarios. people have the right to chose where they want to work. if companies are worried about trade secrets getting out then dials what NDAs are for, in all other scenarios its a workers choice where they want to work and emoloyers shouldnt be able to forcibly keep employees by tying a rope around them. i had to sign one at my first job and it severely limited where i could go after i left the job. invalidating my degree, experience, and work history."

Michael	"My name is Dr. Michael White and I am a 37 year old neurologist with specialized training in neuro-oncology. I trained at some of the best institutions in the world and became one of a handful of physicians in the United States who is an expert on cancers that metastasize to the brain. I moved from Boston, Massachusetts to Rochester, New York because I wanted to live near family and knew there was a great need for access to brain tumor treatments and there was no physician in the entire upstate-NY region with metastatic cancer expertise. I took a faculty position in the Department of Neurology, division of neuro-oncology, at the University of Rochester and was forced to sign a non-compete agreement that specified I could not practice medicine within a 30 mile radius for 2 years if I decided to change jobs. At the University of Rochester I created the first program for brain metastasis specific treatment and opened a first-of- its-kind early phase clinical trial for targeted experimental therapies in Rochester, New York. During my 1.5 years at the University of Rochester, my program grew rapidly and I saw my first patient respond dramatically to treatment on my clinical trial. However, my work environment was toxic and I wanted to change jobs. My wife is one of a handful of transplant-specific cardiologists (also at the University of Rochester), and our family is in the region. Because of my desire to keep my house, friends, local family, and wife's position but also switch jobs, I was legally forced by the University of Rochester to work in a small town as a general neurologist far from my home. My brain metastasis clinic was closed, my clinical trial closed, and all of my patients left with no doctor as there is no one else who has my particular expertise. All of the promising work I did in the region evaporated when I left. There is no other large cancer center in the region that would have been an alternative for me to work at outside of the non-compete zone. I currently drive over 80 miles per workday and no longer provide neuro-oncology services. For having trained at Harvard Medical School/Dana-Farber Cancer Institute/Massachusetts General Hospital, I could not believe the University of Rochester could do this to the community who is already underserved in all areas of medicine simply to maintain their profits. In my opinion, the non-compete clause imposed on me by the University of Rochester prevented me from providing a critical service in an underserved region and was damaging to both the community and my professional career. I implore the FTC to ban these harmful non-compete agreements that are used to exploit workers such as myself and deprive underserved communities of critical services."
Beth	"Noncompetes area kind of financial prison. When you have a physical reason to remain in a geographic area (ailing elderly parent, custody issues etc) and you are physically bound to a geographic area, noncompetes imprison you to your job and prevent you from making a living outside it. Please please overturn the rule"
Mark	"I belly that it's clear at this point that non competes are overwhelmingly in favor of the companies that require employees to sign them and are simply, and I never use this term, un American. flow can anyone or any entity prevent people from making a living? This is is corporate America scaring employee from leaving. Just

	one step away from indentured servitude. Non competes should be eliminated entirely."
Jerry	"This would be an incredible step in stopping nonsense in my industry. I'm in the mortgage space , and ever lender I've worked for has a non-compete. Most recent, I moved companies and one of my friends wanted to come with me. I have a non-compete for 1 year, but I cannot tell someone that they cannot work for whomever they want, so after he started with me at the new place, my old company promptly sued me for 1,000,000. Yes, 1 mil for only 1 person, stating they would be working there for "years to come". So petty... I hope this goes through and quickly!"
Cheryl	"I am in favor of the ban on non compete agreements. As a fitness professional it is very limiting to have employers ask you to not work elsewhere in an industry that is already extremely difficult to make enough money to live on. Banning these agreements would be hugely helpful!"
Gabriel	"As an emergency physician for almost 23 years, and an administrator for hospital in New York City and an emergency medicine staffing group in Texas, I have seen that non compete clauses unnecessarily restrict the ability of hospitals to properly staff. Most physicians do not want to change jobs or locations, but when they do, they should be free to work at any hospital in the community. Often if they leave one hospital, there is only one other hospital in the region at which to work. A non compete clause means they have to move their family and practice. I am against non-compete clauses."
Katherine	"Throughout my career I've been subject to a non-compete clause at almost every job I've departed--whether I was laid off, fired, or quit. For those of us working in states like New York, where I'm located and where noncompetes have been effectively unenforceable for a long time, they rarely achieve their intended purpose at all, but do create incredible animosity between company and employee and huge amounts of stress particularly for young employees struggling to navigate a job change for the first time. The last time I left a job I simply refused to sign the noncompete paperwork, recognizing it for the empty threat it was, and moved on with my life, but those with less experience navigating the system find them chilling and confusing, and they suppress the ability of young workers to effectively build their skills and grow their careers out of fear that they'll wind up in expensive prosecution they cannot afford. It's time to recognize that professional skills are the property of the employee, not the employer. Perhaps these clauses made sense at a time when employees invested years into building companies and businesses, but in a world without any guarantee of job security at all for coming generations it is unfair to slap them with restrictions that date from the era of pensions and gold watches. The burden should be on employers to effectively manage their internal security and processes to restrict access to sensitive information, not on employees to restrict their economic prospects on the off-chance they may have encountered something proprietary."

James	"Restricting noncompetes would be a major step forward for workers rights. Non-compete clauses are used maliciously to lock employees into staying at their current employer, by mandating that they can't work at another employer for a period of time just because they happen to be in a similar field or industry. In the technology field especially, these clauses can be incredibly broad and restrictive in a way which greatly reduces individual flexibility and freedom. Please support this and all measures which give protections back to American workers."
Xiaodi	"As a physician scientist , I was astounded to hear that the American Hospital Association (AHA) purports to speak on behalf of 270,000 of my peers in opposing the proposed rule. I am not aware of any communication, let alone decision-making process, about that stance from the AHA to the hundreds of thousands that they allege back up their stance. Quite to the contrary, for my own part, I would urge the FTC to use a high bar for exempting any profession from its proposed rule. Physicians, surgeons, and other healthcare workers who are employees—including those of non-profit hospitals—need and deserve the fullest tools and protections under law to advocate for their working conditions, which are essential not only for their own well-being but for that of their patients."
Meegan	"Non competes make it impossible for employees to be compensated fairly and look for other jobs. Its monopolizes certain industry's and can make it impossible for workers to find new jobs. Employers should not be allowed to have that much control over workers and prevent them from moving on to better opportunities. Banning non competes is the right thing to do for workers as it puts them at a disadvantage in the work force and can force them to change careers all together if they need to leave an employer"
Wenbin	"NPRM is unfair for physicians, undermining career advancement of many physicians, creating many issues for families."
Adina	"Yes, please ban non-compete clauses! They are anti-competitive and decrease the power of employees compared to their bosses. Thank you."
Anna	"I am an oral surgeon practicing in Plattsburgh, New York. I chose to relocate to this area from New York City last year after having my first child and hoping to find a place in New York where I could establish a family while being located closer to relatives in the upstate area. I was lucky to find a local dental office hiring, and I chose to accept the job as a way to begin to familiarize myself with this new area. Unfortunately my employer imposed an extremely restrictive non-compete in my contract that bans me from practicing in two contiguous counties (Essex and Franklin county in New York - this is an area that spans hundreds of miles). I did make an effort to try and negotiate this part of my contract to something more reasonable, but my employer refused. Unfortunately, because I was completely unfamiliar with the area, I was afraid to open my own practice from scratch and

	instead chose to sign this contract in order to at least begin working Now that I am ready to move on, I realize that this non-compete part of my contract has not only prevented me from becoming a part of a community that has extreme barriers in accessing excellent dental care, but I am also being prevented from creating a livelihood and establishing my family. It is not reasonable for me to simply not work for 2 years while I wait out the non-compete in my contract. Likewise, I am looking to simply move elsewhere and perhaps to Vermont. Likewise, I strongly support the FTC proposal to ban non-competes."
Atif	"Physicians need not be tied up by corporations. Physicians advocate for their patients when they are not tied down by insurance firms and health systems"
Rodolfo	"I am a private practice veterinarian in the Northeast USA and non-competes hurt my profession which has been dealing with a nationwide shortage of doctors to care for the growing pet population in the country. Non-competes hurt the ability of professionals to negotiate fair wages because they cannot easily leave a position for a better fit unless they uproot their lives and move miles away. This hurts rural communities most severely and will result in loss of care for millions."
Gregory	"Dear representative, I am a reproductive endocrinology & infertility specialist practicing in Syosset, NY (Long Island). I am in support of eliminating or banning the practice of non-compete clauses. I believe non-compete clauses are undemocratic and stifle healthy competition. Thank you!"
Madeleine	"I am a general dentist and own my own business in NY. I don't believe in restricted covenants, never had one for my employee dentists or Hygienists. It has not hurt my business. There is no logical reason to hamper growth (I can not easily hire a new dentist away from a competitor- don't they deserve to get market rate /competitive salaries? Isn't this what America is all about?) I am happy to pay more for a great employee - my husband is a physician and has not taken jobs due to the restrictive covenants offered as I can not leave the area due to my business. Small businesses are being hurt. Please help the small business owners. How can we compete with big business. Ultimately Americans lose out on competition which drives efficiency's, change and our economy. Help us doctors out please."
David	" Noncompete clauses are what firms use to sequester your human capital from competitors. When a new employee signs a noncompete with, say, Johnson & Johnson, they agree that when their employment ends, they won't work at another pharmaceutical company for a designated period — usually one to two years. If you're familiar with noncompetes, you likely associate them with technology jobs, where employers want to protect valuable intellectual property. And that's the defense most often offered for the restrictions. BTW, the argument is bullshit ... a confidentiality agreement does the trick. The irony of noncompetes is they only serve to dampen growth. One of the few places where they're banned is also home to the world's most innovative tech economy: California. Job-hopping and seeding new acorns have been part of Silicon Valley since the beginning. In 1994 a Berkeley economist theorized that California's ban on noncompetes was one of the main reasons Silicon Valley existed at all, and in 2005, economists at the Federal Reserve put forward statistical evidence supporting the theory. Apple, Disney, Google, Intel, Meta, Netflix, Oracle, and Tesla were able to succeed without limiting the options of their employees."

Sara	"No compete clause is stripping a worker's right to freedom. Non compete clause should be made illegal."
Ross	"Dear Sir/Madam, I am a physician in New York who is an owner of a specialty dermatology group, Hudson Dermatology. Caremount Medical, the largest multispecialty group in our area, with over 600 physicians, has been recently acquired by United Healthcare to form Optum Medical. Unfortunately, the acquisition has brought a multitude of deleterious consequences for patient care that have been extensively documented in the press. https://www.theexaminemews.com/lexaminer-probe-uncovers-restrictive-employment-contract-at-optum-veteran-caremount-doc-tors-feel-trapped/ The good doctors at the former Caremount now feel trapped by their draconian non-competes, yet unable to provide excellent care for the local community, hampered by mismanagement by United/Optum. We would love to hire some of our colleagues and allow them to continue seeing their patients, but they are at risk of harsh legal retribution. The situation is beyond shameful. I fully support your efforts to end the unreasonable practice of non-competes that harms patients."
Shan	"In my case, I don't have a problem with the employer protecting their interests and understand it's the ordinary course of business. However, these non- competes often extend into businesses they are not participating in. In my case, I have an anesthesia device company and an anesthesia staffing company. The employer wants me to sign a contract preventing me from doing these things and claim all of my inventions as theirs. That was not the spirit of the non- compete clause, so I am in a very long contract negotiation. I think the proposed summary here would be more fair for the employee to increase competition for the domain rather than essentially prevent employees from competing with former employers"
Andrea	"Agree with banning mandatory noncompetes for employees, very important for career opportunities and adequate wages."
Rachel	"I support this rule 100%. Non-compete clauses force physicians in hospitals to accept poor working conditions and administrative decisions that negatively affect patient care."
nicole	"non competes should not be allowed against physicians. This allows hospitals to force physicians to stay and limits options for care for patients."
Martha	"The non-compete contract should be outlawed except in rare instances for executives and technical workers who have bona fide trade secrets from a particular company. Even in those kind of circumstances they seem suspect to me. If employees are managed well there should not be an issue. As a verified AICP planner certain non compete circumstances were governed by the AICP's ethical

	rule of professional conduct. That seems like an appropriate approach. But individual employers enforcing draconian non compete rules is stifling individual's careers and stifling our overall economy that depends on labor's ability to move to better opportunities. The FTC should stop non compete contracts, and the Chamber and other business organizations should recognize that the economy will be better without them."
Michael	"The company I recently worked throughout my whole career sold to a larger entity this past year. They pressured each person to sign an NDA that states they can't work for any competing company within the US. As a 30 year veteran in the Electrical Industry, you can imagine the challenge I'm faced with trying to leave and find work to support my family. I'm in support of the FTC to ban all Non Competes from corporations of 50 employees or more."
Amit	"Non-compete Clauses are often used by employers to keep employees hostage. The employees are afraid of being forced to move to a different region in order to get a new job, which would affect their personal life as well as the life and education/career of their family members. As a result, the employees are afraid to speak up even when they see/experience discrimination, inadequate working conditions, unsafe or unlawful practices, and such. The non- compete clause should be removed from most employment opportunities."
Scott	"Non-compete clauses are completely acceptable for a sliver of highly specialized employees with knowledge of trade secrets or senior leaders of very large organizations. Otherwise, they should be banned. American employees, but for a few exceptions, are at will employees. They can be fired for any non-discriminatory reason at anytime with no notice. Employers have all the power. To extend that power to limit employee's next job is wrong. It also ties into the face of capitalism, whose basic premise is markets(jobs are a market) should be left unregulated. Businesses want it all.... employment at will when it is convenient to fire someone and non-compete clauses when they want to retain employees. They shouldn't be able to have their cake and eat it too. Please end non-compete clauses!"
Rebecca	"I appreciate the intent and the content of this rule. I have read it and find the evidence cited (especially the impact on competition and wage suppression) to be compelling. These non-compete agreements are not appropriate for employees. Business partners are a different matter, but employees shouldn't be subject to these."
Nicholas	"As someone who has been subject to a number of non-compete clauses over the years, I welcome the initiative to regulate these clauses in defense of worker's rights. However, I think it's worth calling out the different types of non-competes. I've worked at firms who dictated I should not work at any other firm in the industry for a year in a very broad manner, and with no compensation. This is unacceptable. However, in the financial industry, it is customary to pair the non-compete clause with a guarantee that you be paid your salary during the year the non-compete is in effect. This is a great way for employees to essentially take a sabbatical, and protects both the firms interests while ensuring financial security for employees. I hope an exception would be in place for these types of clauses."

Gregory	"I am in favor of banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts in most situations. I understand there may be highly specialized industries that might need some level of assurance that an employee won't take proprietary knowledge to a competitor, but I believe that could be accomplished without hamstringing employees and preventing them from finding work."
Errol	"I am in strongly in favor of the proposed rule. Non-compete clauses should be used in a very limited fashion, not widely in a manner that is detrimental to everyday Americans. This rule as proposed will correct that wrong."
Alex	"Non-compete clauses have their place, yes. If someone's knowledge/brand is integral to a business, then they should be prevented from competing in related businesses close by as that would provide a definite conflict of interest. This does not apply to someone who flips burgers, and it definitely does not apply to security guards. These jobs are fungible, and (within reason) any two workers are able to work the job equally well. In these (and the vast majority of scenarios), non-compete clauses only serve to limit people's ability to get jobs. They should only be allowed in special circumstances, like the one I started this comment with."
Kari	"Hello, the non-compete clause should be banned for any employee who is a wage earner meaning they do not own a share of the company nor do they receive a share of profits. They are ONLY appropriate for employees that receive significant stock options or a significant percentage of profits -- e.g. are co-thunder or co-owners. If an employee simply participates in an employee stock program (which most tech companies offer) the non-compete is not appropriate. For hourly and salaried employees the non-compete must be banned. Employers should not be able to prevent a worker from seeking better working conditions or higher pay through non-compete clauses. If they want to keep workers from switching to a competitor, then offer them a great working environment and fair pay. All US citizens should have free will to work where they wish. Restricting that freedom is a form of human chattel."
Jack	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

North Carolina | Statewide Impact

North Carolina Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual NC Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual NC Worker Earnings

	"Physician here, I've had to uproot my family and move 3 times due to non-compete clauses. Disrupting kids, friendships and life. Why? I'm an employed /salaried anesthesiologist. It would be impossible for me to steal patients or some mythical operating room management secrets." -Raymond S.
	".... I was a caregiver for a time for my disabled parents. To help make ends meet I took a part-time job that was seasonal and nature for a tax preparation company. Now, I am able to return the full-time work. I would like to take a job as a bookkeeper with another company but because of the noncompete clause I cannot work for that company....it's ridiculous that I am trapped in a seasonal part-time job and have to take public assistance when if it were not for that [non-compete] clause I could go to work full-time for another company that wants to hire me as a bookkeeper...Depresses me to staying in poverty level in a public assistance." -Eddie K.
	"I work for a Learning Center in North Carolina making only $15 tutoring students. Many of the students are special education students. I can't leave to find other work because of the non-compete clause...The clause names explicitly all of the tutoring companies in Charlotte where I can find work. I can barely afford to live on this wage in Charlotte. If I did not have to worry about the non-compete clause, not only would I be able to find a fairly paying job. It would also create more competition for qualified tutors, and wages would increase." -Tamara C.
	"I work for a company in the equipment rental business.... I am in sales and have a non-compete agreement that I was forced to sign after taking the job. I cannot go to any other company that rents or sales the same equipment we do. Non-compete agreements stop me for making a better wage, better benefits and the mental healing of working for a company that values their employees and not having to deal with the stress of hying to make it day to day and provide for my family. Because of my skills and knowledge, I have been offered management positions but cannot take them because of a piece of paper. I support the rule to make [the non-compete] vanish so I can be valued and be happy." -Bret H.

	"As a veterinary specialist, non-compete clauses have been a part of every contract.... the clauses are so restrictive from a distance and time frame that it forces those who which to leave their employer to move to a different area of the country. This means uprooting a family in the name of changing jobs. For example, my current employment is an area where there are 5 other specialty hospitals within a reasonable driving distance. However, the non-compete encompasses all of those hospitals, making it nearly impossible to leave my current position unless changing careers altogether." -Marc H.
	"I am a small business owner, and I am asking for the repeal of non-compete clauses to apply to franchise agreements. I own a [franchise] Car Care Center in North Carolina and have been in business for 11 years. This is my first business and when needed financing to open this business I was not able to obtain an SBA loan without the backing of a franchise. My current agreement will expire in 4 years. At that time, I will have the opportunity to sign another agreement...for another 10 years. If I choose not to renew, I will be unable to operate an automotive related business or work for another automotive related company for one year. Since I lease the building where my business is located, I will be left with two choices- renew or sell my business....When this agreement ends, I believe the two parties should be able to negotiate a new contract in good faith without the threat of closure or sale of my business as coercion for me to re-sign, Removing the non-compete clause may give me the opportunity to negotiate for better terms and lower fees too." -Gregg C.
	"I work for a very diversified manufacturing company in the automotive industry. All employees are forced to sign a non-compete agreement to join the company and at any promotion. As a result of our diversification, it is difficult for any employee to leave the company and stay within the automotive field without violating the terms of their non-compete. This makes it very hard for those looking to move on from the company and stay within the industry. I am all in favor of eliminating these non-compete agreements." -Clint G.
	"As an IT worker, I can be coerced with a noncompete to not work in the same industry for a certain number of years for any or no reason at all. This limits my ability to find gainful employment with the full set of skills and experience that I gain working for a current employer. I was interested in starting a company after leaving my last job but would be unable to do so without leaving because of a non-compete...I cannot afford a legal battle so I have to avoid breaking any current or possible future noncompete and will do my best to avoid having to sign one going forward. This could mean that I avoid an otherwise great job opportunity. This is not useful and hurts the IT field in general." -John M.

Manish	"I urge you to include physicians in a ban on noncompetes. Noncompetes prevent physicians from leaving unethical practices that do not offer patients adequate care or time with each patient. Noncompetes also force the physician to leave the state after she's left the practice, causing patients to lose their doctor."
Edward	"Please end this archaic practice. It is unfair, especially to contractors. I was unable to line up new jobs and had to wait 90 days after my contract to reapply for jobs that had already been filled because of NCAs. They also caused me to collect unemployment."
James	"This is long past due. As a physician , the non-compete clause limits our ability to force organizations to improve their efforts to better patient care through a competitive market. In addition, many medical professions (mine included as an anesthesiologist) have no impact on the competitive nature of a hospital. Patients do not choose to come to a hospital because of the anesthesiologists that work there, but typically because of the surgical care that they will receive. In addition to this, having non-competes for trainees is both unethical and unwarranted (which occurs for non-ACGME accredited trainees). Removing non-compete clauses can only improve the competitive nature of business that should exist in a capitalist society that is driven by competition to constantly and consistently improve. It places the power back into the hands of the common employee to force organizations to improve, which in my world as a physician means better outcomes for patients."
Rediet	"In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc.). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all-time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency."
J	"Don't hinder the American worker- help us! Keep the ban on non/ compete clauses"
Jonathan	"My institution titles a similar concept of a noncompete as a... "Cost Share" clause, and I am very excited about the FTC's efforts to eliminate this practice. I have a concern that my institution, among others, will be creative and otherwise rename, redescribe, or find a loophole/workaround to penalize the employee in a way that circumvents the intent of the FTC's effort to eliminate this predatory practice that is indeed antiquated."

Michelle	"Physicians are once again being held to higher standards than any other practitioner while being asked to early those less trained and knowledgeable again and again. Those of us who have longest commitments need to be protected too."
Nicole	"I fully support the FTC's proposal to eliminate non-compete clauses. I have been forced to work under a non-compete clause for 15 years. While I love the city in which I work, I am significantly underpaid and work in a dysfunctional hospital system . Echoing many voices here, my options are to either drive 1.5 hours daily to a position outside the non-compete radius, or to uproot my family and move. However, I have a child with special educational needs. Leaving her current school would be devastating to her and almost certainly provide a worse educational experience for her. Why should my employer force me to choose between staying in an unpleasant working environment or hurting my family by choosing excessively long commutes or moving. I don't have industry secrets. I don't have patients who follow me. My employer didn't put hundreds of thousands of dollars into training me. Their only motivation in having a non-compete clause for my position is to allow them to keep salaries low and to not have to address workplace issues.... The current use of non-compete clauses is applied indiscriminately, but trying to argue against it in court is cost prohibitive for employees. It's hardly a fair fight when going up against a multimillion-dollar corporation who has its own legal team."
Scott	"I am generally in favor of disallowing non-compete clauses for healthcare professionals, irrespective of whether the employer is for-profit or not for-profit, or at least strictly limiting their scope. The hodgepodge of various state rules makes navigating the employment market maddeningly difficult. When combined with no-cause termination clauses, a non-compete may result in disruption of physician practices and patient access to care, not to mention family life, children's education, healthcare of the individual and their family, and limitation of market-based compensation. It is possible to discourage "employer shopping" and to recover employer "investment" in new physician talent via economic forces (for example, cost share agreements or claw back of startup packages for departure within a narrow range of dates after hire."
James	"As a technology senior manager , I fully support ending non-competes for almost all employees. Individuals work hard to develop expertise in a given field and should have the freedom to use those skills in the manner they choose. A previous employer should have no control over my future decisions."
Jennifer	"I believe non-compete clauses in employment contracts should not be legal for anyone. It limits competition. As a physician most employment contracts have a restrictive non-compete clause (not just non-solicitation) that basically requires us to move our families if we seek employment elsewhere. It leads to uprooting

	our spouses from their jobs, and our kids from their schools. It is not fair. Big hospital corporations tend to have cookie cutter contracts and will not remove these clauses. It limits our employment opportunities and keeps us in jobs we otherwise might leave just because we don't want to move our families. I served in the military and moved my family enough as part of my service to my country and moved around my entire childhood due to my father's service to his country as well; my job as a civilian shouldn't require me to move my family just to take another job if one is available in the nearby area."
Erin	"It is EXTREMELY important that all healthcare workers including physicians are free from noncompete clauses. Noncompete clauses for physicians are written in such a manner that a physician would have to leave the city they reside in, if not the county- move completely- in order to leave a job. This is done entirely to limit market competition. As healthcare systems have merged this has further limited competition and put more control over the workforce into a handful of administrators.... This directly harms patients who lose healthcare providers when there is already a desperate shortage. Providers in rural settings who are forced away from serving an underserved area hurts multitudes- and it is done because the fact that the area is underserved has direct profit benefit for the owners of the main healthcare system in the region who can prey upon them. Disruption which occurs when a physician is forced to leave a geographic area can also directly harm Patients who then just scramble to find persons who can continue their care. Allowing physicians and other healthcare workers to seek workplaces which honor their humanity and treat them as respected workers rather than forcing them to remain in jobs which at best area poor fit for them and at worst actively abuse them is harmful to them, healthcare consumers, and the market.... PLEASE do not allow the powerful hospital lobbies to buy an exception to exemptions for physicians...."
Erin	"Nonprofit healthcare systems should not be excluded for this ruling. As has been exclusively researched upon, predatory practices that enrich nonprofit hospitals while sacrificing their care mission are extremely common. Forcing physicians who may have chosen to work at a nonprofit at some point in their career to now have to move to an entirely new geographic area- move their family and lives- should they wish to take another job is absurd. Healthcare consolidation has already limited market competition and allowed abuses of healthcare workers across the spectrum. There is really no reason to exclude nonprofits in general- if they are living up to their mission then the idealistic persons who work for them will be glad to continue doing so even if it pays less. They knew it paid less when they took the job in the first place.... It serves no one but hospital boards and will only further contribute to the mass healthcare worker exodus as healthcare workers continue to burn out and can find no reprieve. If you are going to exclude nonprofits then set radius limits or something for goodness' sake! How is forcing persons to move far away so that health system employers can keep a functional monopoly and artificial scarcity alive in ANY WAY consistent with our supposedly capitalist system...Healthcare if anything is the area that needs competition the MOST at this point in time. If you exclude nonprofits, you are taking out of play the biggest healthcare systems in the country!"

Jimmy	"These archaic and restrictive clauses have made companies treat their employees more like indentured servants than employees. I worked for a company that had so restrictive non-compete clause that I would have had to find a job that was over a two-hour drive from my home. I could not relocate due to family commitments in the area and housing issues. So, in essence I was "bound" to stay there and continue to work in a toxic environment. I can understand that companies need to protect their self-interests but, me leaving and taking a similar position across town would not hurt their bottom line or that I would "steal" clients away from them. We are in a healthcare industry and patients are bound by where their insurance company will "allow" them to receive care not by where their favorite provider practices."
Sherri	"Do not believe hospitals writing letters "on behalf of physicians and employees stating that noncompete should stand as is. These letters do NOT really represent the wishes of the employees. Hospital systems use noncompete clauses to trap employees and avoid paying fair salaries! Noncompete should be illegal!"
Jacob	"This is extremely healthy and welcomed throughout many private sector jobs. In particular, as a physician it helps keep the market reasonable for both academic and private practice positions as non-competes are ubiquitous and nonsensical."
Erin	"I am writing to urge you to consider banning all non-compete clauses, including physicians Non-compete agreements are designed to prevent employees from leaving their current employer and working for a competing company or starting a competing business. While non-compete agreements can be appropriate in certain circumstances, they can also be overly restrictive and limit job opportunities for workers. In the case of physicians, non-compete agreements can prevent them from practicing medicine in a certain geographical area or with certain patients for a period of time after leaving their current employer. This can be especially problematic for patients who rely on their physicians for ongoing care, as well as for physicians who may be forced to relocate or give up their medical practice altogether. I believe that including physicians in the non-compete rule would help to promote competition in the healthcare industry and provide greater job opportunities for physicians. By prohibiting overly restrictive non-compete agreements, physicians would be free to pursue new job opportunities and provide healthcare services to patients without fear of legal consequences. I appreciate your consideration of this issue and urge you to take action to ensure that physicians are included in the non-compete rule."
Suman	"Non-compete clause significantly limits employee's opportunity for growth, better pay and should be banned. It is very painful to move to different locations for job change, especially with the people with families/children and almost a form of enforced slavery (work here or move away to different city or state). It is against right to freedom."
Triad	"I am a physician in North Carolina. I have innovated huge for our health system.... The AHA has not been talking on "behalf of doctors".... take down this non-compete immediately. Let health systems learn to survive through insurance pricing, culture and fair employee management."

Mike	"I would hope to see the non-compete be forced to go away. A non-compete cost me my home and livelihood for 20 months..."
Jacob	"Non-competes are antiquated and should be illegal"
Kyle	"I support this rule disallowing non-compete agreements. Many industries are very specialized, and years of experience should not lock an individual into working for a single employer."
HJ	"Simply put, there is no valid reason to have a non-compete clause that limits the workers ability to earn what they're worth. I am a retired Building Engineer with more than 35 years with the same agency. I dealt with hundreds of companies with assets and payrolls from the thousands to the millions."
Eddie	"Especially hurts people like me who have a part-time seasonal job in tax preparation. If not for the noncompete clause, I could get a full-time job is a bookkeeper at someplace else, but since they also do tax preparation, I'm banned from doing it. So, it's actually keeping me from making a living keeping me in poverty."
Grace	"I am in support of eliminating noncompete clauses. For my practice in anesthesia , healthcare delivery is limited when noncompete contracts restrict provider practice for the financial benefit of the contracting company. Removing the noncompete barrier enhances free trade in healthcare and all other industries."
Justin	"100% support this"
Tamara	"It is not a good policy to have so many non-compete clauses in the workplace. I know they were originally intended to protect company trade "secrets", but they have gotten totally out of hand and overused. You can't tell me that a fast-food worker should be limited as to where they can get a job because of where they worked before. This is yet another way that employers are keeping the upper hand over workers. A friend of mine has run into this in the health field (what secrets do hospitals have that workers would "take"??) Please help the folks trying so hard to make ends meet in this increasingly fraught time where the U.S. is regulating more and more of our lives- -this time without any greater good...only corporate good."
Vinay	"Please ban this practice that limits a physician's ability to fmd better jobs without having to uproot their lives and move far away disrupting their family and social lives."
Greg	"I currently work for a company that promoted me 2 years ago and they told me that I had to sign a non-compete. I have been recruited by other companies and they have offered me more salary and better benefits, but my current employer won't let me out of the contract. I am just a regional manager for a small company, and I am upset that I cannot better myself"

Triad	"As a physician in North Carolina speaking for myself and many of my colleagues we 10000% welcome a ban on non-competes. This is the worst abusive monopolistic behavior generated by corporations esp. health systems to get away with mediocrity of HR practices that involve employment HR abuse and poor listening skills by management. It stifles physician creativity and makes the health system treat us like cogs in a wheel. This ban is long, long overdue"
Ava	"This is essential to allow for patient -physician relationship to prevail over the needs of corporations and large groups. It will allow physicians to continue to serve their communities when it is no longer possible to remain in a group or to remain employed by a corporation for any number of reasons. Why deny a community access to a physician's services just so a hospital corporation or physicians' group can try to force physicians remain in their employ when it isn't in the best interest of the physician or the patients."
A	"I am a physician and strongly support the bill to remove non-compete clauses. They are particularly discriminatory to women and mothers who often are geographically limited due to their family and childcare obligations. Patients suffer as well, as often times there are only a small number of specialists that can treat certain diseases. If one of those specialists are barred from working in an underserved area, it has harmful effects for patients."
Rachel	"I am or was in flooring . My previous employer is seeking irreparable damages from me stating they provide specific performance which is not true. This company...offers cabinets, countertops, flooring, window treatments, Fixtures, lighting fixtures and more...I have been in the flooring industry my entire life this is pushing me out of my career. And even though I adhered to placing my LLC outside of the noncompete mileage and it clearly states this business is Real estate related, they are still seeking damages."
Michelle	"As a long time, massage therapist who has worked in a variety of settings, I can attest that non-compete agreements do more harm than good to our profession and my colleagues. Customers who want to work with an individual are restricted in their free market access to preferred service providers. Practitioners who ethically move into private practice are strong-armed by corporate entities motivated by greed, instead of working together for the benefit of the consumer. Since they...cause financial and mental/emotional hardship on people pursuing the American Dream of starting one's own business, please DO ban non-competes."
Cameron	"Regardless of the length of time no compete clauses have been in use the unfortunate impact of such provisions in employment agreements is coming to light and it is negative in effect. Typically, a no compete clause bars the contracting employee for a one- or two-year period from competitive employment

	and does not provide for regular compensation and benefits during the period of such an agreement. Most employees who are asked to sign such agreements do not have the resources to endure a one- or two-year period of time without compensation. This places an undue burden on creativity on our economy and prevents upward mobility for ordinary skilled people. Work conditioned on such covenants without regard to job content is an overreach based on unequal bargaining power and is clearly an anticompetitive practice. If an exception were to be desirable, other than the sale of a business, then continued compensation and benefits of an employee during the period of such a no compete covenant would protect the employer and enable the employee to be available at the end of that time for other employment. As a former practitioner dealing with these covenants from time to time, it was frequently apparent that no compete agreements provided cover for abusive treatment of employees because some employers would anticipate an employee could not economically withstand the lack of employment for one or two years and would impose undue risk taking without commensurate compensation. Additionally, it is believed that many of the employees subjected to these covenants are not fairly identified to the employee or the company's other employees or even in the annual disclosure documents of the company as essential to the company to the point of needing a no compete. As we are concerned with all of our citizens, the use of a no compete clause especially prevents upward mobility as well as wealth building for minorities both male and female. No compete provisions seem to be particularly unfair when one examines the relative imbalance between an employee and a company or employer as upper management has compensation for the risk of unemployment or the life of a no compete clause. I don't think this is true for other employees. As difficult as it sounds, in my opinion the use of these agreements consigns a large number of our countrymen and women to perpetual serfdom. For these and other reasons I submit that the Federal Trade Commission should adopt a rule banning such agreements as anticompetitive and unfair competition. Sincerely, Cameron Cooke"
Chad	"...I'm all for them being done away with. If an employer wants an employee to not spill trade secrets or something, they should work harder to keep their employees. In a capitalist society, one which insists that capitalism does in fact work, it is amazing to me that we have a practice baked into our society that is literally non-competitive even in name. If the little guy has to compete for his bread, so should the big guys."
Jenny	"This practice seems directly opposed to any concept of 'free trade' I can understand. It unfairly benefits employers and makes innovation and starting up new veterinary practices difficult. If an employee has bought property in a certain area (usually while working for the employer who has written in the 'non- compete' clause), this person is essentially forced to either change professions, or to sell up and relocate. It is unfair to prevent a professional from practicing their profession in the area of their choosing."
Arnold	"Ban non-competes for MDs"

Christina	"As a physician I fully support the eradicating non-complete cause in contracting. Non-competes are used to unfairly restrict physicians from competing in the workforce and restrain fair trade for labor."
Joshua	"I am fully supportive of this Rule. It is sorely needed to protect workers' rights to provide for their families."
Jessica	"I am a Board-Certified Family Medicine physician noncompete clauses can be very detrimental to a physician's career, lead to increased stress and burnout due to being forced to stay in a position, and contribute to the PCP shortage due to early retirement. My personal experience with a noncompete clause is the following: I had been working in a small community for 7 years when the practice was bought by the local hospital system. I was unable to negotiate out of the noncompete clause in my contract. The work environment turned out to be quite toxic and I was very unhappy. I resigned from my position. Since this is a small rural community, with few medical practices, the closest practice to join, due to the noncompete clause, was over 45min away. I ended up starting my own practice, to great expense."
Christopher	"I have worked under an NCA for only one (former) employer, and that NCA was clearly intended to dissuade workers from leaving the company for other employment...in practice, NCAs are most often used to more tightly bind current workers to the employer through the threat of future punishment. legally pitting the Goliath (employer) against the David (worker) in a legal battle that nearly all former workers would be financially incapable of waging. This is by design. As such. I am in favor of a ban as proposed...If a company's business is truly threatened by low-level workers leaving to work for competitors, then the business model of the company is unsustainable. Workers who are so valuable to a company that their employment with a competitor poses a threat to the company will certainly be compensated appropriately, so a fair earnings test would look something like earning >400% of the average (mean) employee/owner/partner compensation. This would limit applicability to the higher earners in a company regardless of geography or industry."
John	"I heartily support the rescinding of the non-compete clause."
Skand	"Support move to stop non-compete clauses"
HoJun	"This would make lives better, too many companies and corporations put restrictions on workers that makes even simple moving or changing jobs too hard. I am a dentist in NC and while I do not have any immediate plans to change jobs non-compete restrictions are always on the back of my mind."
Justin	"As a fully employed physician in a large academic health system, I support the FTCs goal of eliminating the noncompete clause. As an employed physician, we are often forced to sign geographic noncompete causes, which makes it extremely difficult to find new employment if for some reason you separate from your employer. This new rule would help physicians find optimal employment, help physicians find fair compensation, and improve the well-being of physicians."

Vijayarajan	"Please don't exclude, as I feel I am feeling being taken advantage."
Micheal	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. They harm workers, making it extremely difficult to leave an unfair employer. The proposed policy will make it easier for workers to seek better employment without leaving their field of expertise and construct better lives for their families."
Jennifer	"This is an excellent rule that should be enacted nationally as written, as it protects workers and enforces the social contract engendered in "at will" employment. For at will employment to work, employees need a more equal playing field and movement in the job sector. That is, they should be able to freely move jobs at will in the open market using their skills and experience without restrictions, just as employers can hire and fire "at will." Current practice of non-compete squelches this on the side of employees through contract. Removing the burdens of non-compete on employees will enhance the US economy and help employees in equal bargaining. The control employers have had on common skills through non-competes has not only squelched worker's ability to seek a livelihood but has squelched innovation in many sectors because it removes the movement of people (and their innovative brains) in their jobs. Non-competes are not necessary for employers either, who theoretically want to hire the best people (potentially more experienced) for their positions. Non-competes by their yew nature discourage people seeking experience in related jobs, keep wages low, restricting the ability of employees to move and gain skills in an area, and thwarts competition - all of which negatively affects all employees, all companies, and the economy. These non-competes are especially damaging in retail, food industry, social work, education, eldercare, healthcare, and manual and skilled labor jobs where there absolutely no reason for them. It is high time these oppressive rules are done away with. To be clear - doing away with these rules does not do away with the protections of confidentiality that many employees must retain upon leaving a job. There are many employers who conflate these concepts in support of non-competes, but these are not mutually exclusive. Once can easily protect confidential information and misappropriation of secret company information while still doing away with onerous non-competes. This comment is willfully submitted by me as an individual, not on behalf of any employer, and does not reflect the opinion of any present or past employer."
Andrea	" Physicians with non-competes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families any time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenge of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. As a real-world example, I practice at a hospital that has several other hospitals in the area. Because of non-compete clauses, it is nearly impossible to change jobs or move to another health system. This has also allowed ALL the health systems to pay far less than the national average and we as die employee have no leverage at all and are held hostage in whichever health system we started at. These clauses give all the power to die health systems to continue to underpay and overwork their staff"

Matthew	"I am writing in support of eliminating non-compete clauses and restrictive covenants. In a remote work world, companies are using non-compete clauses to limit employees' rights over a large geographical area, including the entire United States. In my case, I am a physician with a specialty in digital health product management. My skill set, by necessity, means that any employer who would want to hire me would be considered in the same field as my current employer, and thus a violation of a non-compete. This leave me trapped in my current job, even if my job description, work projects, reporting structure, and expected compensation are all completely changed by current employer, which is exactly what has happened. A world in which a worker does not have the right to work for the employer who most values his talents is antithetical to the free-market system that this country supports. Thank you."
Greg	"Please ban non-compete clauses. This is a restraint that is unfair to workers and destroys the integrity of the free market. How can a market be free when an employer holds power?"
Amy	"I'm a nurse anesthetist and non-compete clauses with hospitals and anesthesia staffing companies have become predatory. Typical clause: Two years legally barred from working within a 30-mile radius from your current facility, which is enforced even when the staffing company you work for loses the contract to provide services at the hospital you were staffing. These non-compete practices are anti-competitive and hurt medical providers and their patients."
Bradley	"This is a much-needed regulation. I work as a middle manager with no trade secrets, yet the non-compete I had to sign to secure the job prevents me from looking at other companies. There is nothing about me that is unique, and I have no super- secret knowledge that would benefit a competitor. Really feel like this clause is preventing me from gaining a job more aligned with my needs and expectations."
Bryan	"I am commenting as a physician ...Physicians should absolutely be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it greatly limits their ability to negotiate their contracts and instead offers large hospital systems an unprecedented advantage over physicians in the marketplace. There is a large increase in physician burnout, in large part due to the ways these large health care organizations take advantage of them and exempting them from the FTC non-compete rule would simply continue to exacerbate an already burnt out and at-risk group in favor of the profiteering of large health care organizations. Additionally, the last time an exemption of this nature was granted by the lobbying from the American Hospital Association (Jung v AAMC 2004) resulted in decades of delay for improving resident physicians' ability for fair wages and benefits; this is still an active struggle today. Please do not make the same mistake again for physicians of today and the future."

Cibele	"I am against non competes."
Kieran	"This...would dramatically improve healthcare worker flexibility. Unfortunately, in the world of consolidated healthcare nearly all employed physician groups/organizations/hospitals require non-compete agreements. This has functionally led to no ability to negotiate with organizations to remove non-competes. This has the effect of artificially suppressing income, choice, benefits, and more practically the patient care environment. Organizations can tell physicians and other healthcare workers they need to increase how much work they do with less and the only alternative physicians have is to complete uproot their families and move a great distance away. This in the setting of most physician specialties there is no practical reason for non-compete agreements as it does not change referral patterns and many hospital specialties are not chosen by patients who arrive in emergencies. Thank you, Kieran Leong"
Tracey	"I'm writing to express my strong opposition to the use of non-compete clauses in contracts for healthcare providers . I urge the Federal Trade Commission to take action to prohibit the use of non-compete clauses in contracts for physicians. Such a prohibition would help to ensure that patients have access to the care they need and would promote competition in the healthcare industry. These clauses or restrictive covenants unduly restrict employed or contracted providers from practicing medicine within a certain geographic area and/or for a specified period of time after leaving a practice or other employment situation. This can lead to loss in income and instability for healthcare providers and their families The use of non-compete clauses in physician contracts is harmful to the physicians and the patients they serve. Physician non-competes limit the mobility and job opportunities of physicians and can prevent them from providing consistent care to patients in need. This leads to shortages of physicians in certain areas and can make it difficult for patients to find the care they need. Furthermore, non-compete clauses in physician contracts can limit competition, which can lead to higher healthcare costs for patients. By limiting the number of physicians in a given area, non-competes can also limit the number of choices that patients have when selecting a healthcare provider."
Abbie	"These non-competes hold workers hostage, stopping them from switching jobs to get better wages. The ability of a worker to leave a job to pursue better opportunities is a fundamental part of how a marketplace works. These non-competes are giving too much power to business, at the expense of workers and their lives. It's time to get rid of the non-competes and allow workers the freedom to choose where to work, and to make businesses compete for the best labor."
Richard	"I am retired for the past three years. Formerly I enjoyed a four-decade career as a software developer for IBM, Lenovo, Itron and Blade. Almost all of these years

	I was required to sign a non-compete clause. I was never in a position financially where I could refuse to sign. I agree with the FTC rule because these non-compete clauses are entirely weighted in the favor of the employer. The employee is never rewarded for honoring the non-compete clause. Now I am seeing the next generation of employees, my own daughters and sons in-law being subject to the same type of clause by their employers. In their cases I see this as an even more egregious imbalance between the employer and employee in favor of the employer. The reason that I state this is the very high level of education that these employees bring to the job on day one with their employer. This education is in part paid for by me. It includes undergraduate, PhD and professional schools and internships. Now when this new employee starts on day one with their new employer their future employment options are severely limited by these non-compete clauses. If they are unhappy or have professional disagreements with their employer, they are restricted from pursuing employment in the same geographic area using the training that they invested in and that I invested in prior to their signing the employment agreement."
Ashley	"The non-compete restriction that employers have in place limit a person to continue their career in a given industry. When the non-compete prevents someone from changing companies with all of their industry knowledge, it puts the person at a disadvantage to better themselves, increase their income and support their family. Companies seek people who are already in the same industry to join their teams. This allows the new employee to be a productive part of the team quickly, benefitting both the company and the employee. When an employee works for a company with a non-compete, they are limited in their financial growth and their overall career growth. With average raises only 2-3% a year, people can get increases in pay by changing companies every few years. With a non-compete, the employee is essentially locked in to working for that employer, unless they have transferrable skills for another industry. The employer thinks they are keeping their 'trade knowledge', but all they are really doing is forcing someone to continue to work for them who feels stuck and eventually will give less to the company based on the feeling of being captured. The worker bees that are doing the tactical work should not be bound by this type of agreement. In our country, people should have the right to change their employment for more professional opportunity and increased compensation. When employers implement non-compete agreements that prevent them from working for competitors, vendors or clients of that company, employees lose those rights. Who wants to have thick career opportunities and income limited? Nobody. I support the effort to reduce or eliminate the use of non-compete clauses broadly across a company. Alternatives could be to only require executives to sign non-competes and/or limit the scope of non-compete agreements to only include direct competitors and not clients, vendors, etc.."
John	"Please get rid of this archaic and abused tactic that companies use to essentially enact a form of indentured servanthship. I could see an extremely small carve out for people that have produced proprietary information and products at the expense of a company from being able to take that investment immediately to a competitor. Or even a principal in a company with a guaranteed golden parachute, being able to leave and immediately work for a competitor. But to be able to force lower-level workers into a noncompete clause as a condition of employment is a restriction that defies the competitive nature of capitalism. To borrow a phrase from Ronald Reagan, please throw this destructive tactic onto the trash heap of history. (For context, I am a retired person who would never have the need to sign a noncompete agreement, nor have I ever.)"

Freedom	"Non-compete agreements prevent me from moving up in my industry; I would have to be unemployed two years from current job to get a career advancement at a new company. It totally screws individual employees while protecting companies profit margins. Getting rid of them would be government for the people not the corporations."
Smeet	"This is a much-needed regulatory action. As a physician , I see countless colleagues stuck in jobs with increasing burnout as they feel they have no other options due to their restrictive covenants that sometimes span 100 miles. There is no trade secret we are taking with us just what we have learned clinically through our training. Physicians all across the US would and do support this regulation."
Dawn	"Workers need to be able to leave a job they are not happy with and be able to find a new job using their skills."
Balwinder	"I as a physician strongly support the ban on non-compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the corporate hospital groups to dominate the market and control the physicians."
Vamshi	"As a physician and patient, I would request to remove non-compete clause"
Jeff	"I fully support the banning of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Non-compete clauses restrict employees from working for a competitor or starting a competing business after leaving their current job. Such clauses limit an individual's freedom to work and pursue their career, and they also harm the overall economy by reducing competition and innovation. Research has shown that non-compete clauses have a negative impact on the economy, particularly in terms of entrepreneurship and innovation...non-compete clauses may impede the diffusion of knowledge and innovation, as they limit the ability of workers to move between firms and share ideas and expertise. In many cases, non-compete clauses can be overly restrictive and unreasonable. They can prevent employees from using their skills and expertise in the same industry, even if they are not directly competing with their former employer. This can result in talented individuals being forced to leave their chosen field entirely, reducing the pool of available talent and stifling innovation. This is overly evident in the STEM field where we already struggle to maintain a healthy pool of skilled workers and extremely small pools for niche fields like power and nuclear engineering. Banning non-compete clauses would allow employees to pursue their careers freely and contribute to the economy without unnecessary restrictions. This would ultimately benefit both workers and businesses by promoting a more competitive and innovative job market. Therefore, I strongly support the ban of non-compete clauses in employment contracts.... Banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts would be yet another step towards ensuring that America remains at the forefront of innovation and economic prosperity. By promoting competition and entrepreneurship, the US can continue to attract the best and brightest minds from around the world and create an environment where creativity and innovation can thrive.... Banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts would be a testament to America's commitment to entrepreneurship, innovation, and individual freedom. It would ensure that the US remains a beacon of hope and opportunity for generations to come."

John	"This is something that absolutely needs to happen. Noncompetes force workers into making the tough choice between staying in a job with poor working conditions and uprooting themselves/their family. Nonprofits should not be exempt from this - and in fact should abide by their own service mission to pay their employees fairly to retain them vs coercion via noncompete."
Robin	"Need to get rid of noncompetes as they are bad for patients, bad for capitalism, create unfair working situations that employees cannot get out of. Nonprofit hospitals should not be excluded from this as the majority of hospitals are listed a nonprofit but their ceo makes millions. Hospitals are not hurt from an employee leaving to a competitor any more than an employee leaving to move to a different state. In order to prevent people from leaving, employers need to work on better strategies for retaining their staff"
Raymond	" Physician here, I've had to uproot my family and move 3 times due to non-compete clauses. Disrupting kids, friendships and life. Why? I'm an employed /salaried anesthesiologist . It would be impossible for me to steal patients or some mythical operating room management secrets"
Daniel	"The non-compete needs to be removed completely. When a person spends any amount of time in a field and they're forced into a non-compete, that's the only field they have skill and experience in, meaning they can't go do the job they know for a livable wage elsewhere."
Priyavadan	"Agree with proposals"
Michelle	" Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."

Jennifer	"Non-compete agreements keep employees with the passion for their field from finding a better job especially when your working environment is toxic, and you are unhappy with that company and are underpaid."
J	"I am 100% supportive of banning all non-compete agreements. This practice currently prohibits many medical providers, including myself, from being able to seek other employment opportunities without having to completely relocate."
William	"I arrived with my employer through a series of acquisitions over the last 7 years. My current employer required that I sign a non-compete as a condition of keeping my job. The non-compete prevents me from working for virtually any other employer in my field of work. I've spent 25 years in this industry. Where can I take my hard-won skills for employment and be of use to another employer with an employment contract hanging over my head? I signed the document because I cannot pay the bills without a job. There is nothing my employer has taught me that is proprietary information. I acquired those skills and knowledge elsewhere. The only reason for this contract is to prevent me from going anywhere without imposing hardship on my family. This does not benefit me and it does not benefit out economy,"
Avia	"Non-compete clauses patient's ability care and prevents companies from being competitive and raises unemployment for well-qualified individuals."
Max	"End non-compete clauses, they harm the workers in a way in which the workers can not harm the employer. employers get to keep and continue to use any work performed by an employee when the employee terminated their employment, or is terminated, but to say the employee then can't get a new job is ridiculous!"
John	"I fully support the FTC's proposed rule both as a working member of our country's dynamic tech community, but more importantly as a person subject to technology in the public and private sector. These types of agreements should be reserved for issues of national security, not fur banal consumer tech."
Christopher	"This is wonderful. In the research triangle park area, the 3 dominant medical systems were colluding through use of noncompetes and handshake agreements not to hire each other's physicians. This led the Durham Hospital Referral Region on one Medscape physician salary survey to have the lowest physician salaries in the nation. When physicians were poorly treated, they had often to leave the state to find work, disrupting their families and children. Thank you for pushing for workers. I hope lobbying doesn't neuter this advocacy."

Gabriel	"I am a young physician about to finish my training of 6 years. There is so much fear and anxiety about joining a practice in a location I actually want to live long tenn because of the fear of getting stuck in a noncompete I would be unhappy with. Noncompete impede physicians from getting the most competitive salaries as when it is time to renegotiate contracts, the employers have the upper hand of knowing you are unlikely to uproot your entire life to leave to an area outside of your noncompete clause. It is becoming very common for physician practices to be sold to private equity and other investment firms and physicians are losing their ability to practice die way they want, and sometimes corporate interests supercede good patient care in these settings and noncompetes only amplify this problem as it creates difficulty for physicians to leave. I hope that you create a new role to get rid of noncompete clauses for everyone."
Caitlin	"I am dealing with an unusually restrictive non-compete right now that has caused me significant emotional distress and financial strain. Brief backstory - I am an RN and worked for a plastic surgery office for over 5 years. I contributed to the company significantly throughout this time and was well-liked by my patients and coworkers. There was, however, a long history of administration actively bullying staff' members, threatening their professional futures, and using manipulative tactics. In my case, I was retaliated against because I confided in and expressed personal concerns with my manager in private...It was pretty obvious they were trying to force me out. Why did I not quit? Because of my non-compete agreement - I had nowhere to go. I was fired about a week later - over the phone, with no opportunity for an exit interview.... I paid my attorney thousands more to write my ex-employer a letter in an attempt to negotiate my NCA and collect my unpaid wages. They refused to negotiate and claimed they owed me nothing. Instead, they threatened to sue me if they ever found the in violation of my NCA terms.... All I want to is to perform the services for which I was trained and love to do. I am not trying to "compete", "steal clients" or "divulge trade-secrets"...the NCA prohibits me from performing ANY of the services I performed with my ex-employer within a 50 mile radius and for a period of 18 months, regardless of how my employment ended....This not only hurts me as an individual, but it has hurt my clients who I built rapport with and treated for the last 5 years who I can no longer treat due to my 2-year non-solicitation clause. This has hurt my family and startup business as I have had to invest a lot of time and money into this situation which could have been invested ill them. This hurts society as a whole as it limits the ability to earn a living and pay taxes. Please consider my story and know I am NOT the only one in this unjust situation. Thank you."
Nirav	"I would be in full support of banning non-compete's and restrictive covenants."
Anonymous	"Non-compete clauses need to be eliminated Non-compete clauses are detrimental to everyday people trying to survive in today's economy. They only favor big companies with infinite resources. Please stand firm in implementing these necessary new rules. Thank you"

Jocelyn	"I support this Non-compete Clause Rule. Clinic's/owner's do not own associates or clients. In our society, businesses should keep employees and clients because they treat them well, create a good working environment and provide a good service. Non- compete clauses help to foster toxic work environments in so many ways. Feeling trapped and forced to work in a toxic situation is affecting the mental health of veterinarians in our profession. Please pass this rule."
Connie	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
George	"As a physician , it locks our hands when we are not happy with current work environment and cannot leave. It is a disservice to our patients when we would like to stay in the area and take care of them but cannot because we have to move out of the state because of the economic burden the physician would incur from a non-compete. Please remove noncompete and/or restrictive covenants."
Anonymous	"I am completely in favor of forbidding non-compete agreements. In this time of inflation and a potential recession, the American people need to be able to obtain employment from any place that is offering employment nationwide."
Carolyn	"I am a physician of 25 years. Non competes have created a dangerous situation where hospitals control the choice of patients to see their physician of choice. The majority of physicians are now employed by large hospital systems. An employment disagreement such as a contract dispute can escalate quickly into the employment relationship being dissolved. Patients are caught in the middle- most physicians have to leave their community after their employment with a particular system ends. Patients are unable to follow the doctor they trust when the physicians are forced to move. Hospitals know their employed physicians are largely captive to whatever they decide unless they are willing to uproot their families and move."
Kevin	"Almost every job I have worked as an employee or contractor in the last 5 years has tried to have me sign a noncompete clause. Some have been open to negotiation while others have insisted it was required for the work. At this point in my career my skill base is so specialized that a non-compete clause would essentially render me jobless and ensure that my particular skills and certifications would be all but useless to the workforce. This trend in these clauses becoming almost the assumed norm has completely removed valuable job skills from the workforce. The idea that a company can still attempt to enforce these even when they lay someone off or break their end of the contract is almost comical in how blatantly unfair and illogical this is."

Franklin	"Non-competes are harmful to the average American worker and ultimately to die United States economy as a whole. They're most frequently used as a tool to prevent employee mobility between companies. This limits Americans' options in harmful way, especially when wages aren't keeping up with inflation. It's well known that wages for jobs at the middle management level and below do not come close to keeping up with inflation. Frequently the only way to get a significant raise to keep up with inflation is to change jobs. It appears that the Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) would be a positive force for the average American in the land of the Free and the home of the Brave. Thanks"
Leon	"I strongly support banning non-competes. Hi. I'm an emergency physician . When the formerly physician-owned, well-run practice I had been working for was bought by a private equity company, the initial proposal was for a 75 mile non-compete for physicians. The younger physicians (no equity in prior company) negotiated that number down to 12 miles. However, negotiating over the non-compete enabled the company to decrease our pay and benefits. That was likely the plan all along. Non-competes in medicine harm physicians and patients. Physicians get trapped in practices they don't want to be in. That leads to burnout and poorer patient care. Additionally, the risk of not having a non-compete is what? The non-solicitation and non-disclosure agreements are separate. Rather than trapping physicians in a contract, regulations should prevent the exiting physician from soliciting that practice's patients & contracts for a fair amount of time and prevent the physician from disclosing the company's secrets. I strongly support banning non-competes."
Deborah	"Please take steps to reduce the use of non-compete clauses. Currently, workers who make sandwiches or prepare fast food are required to sign non-compete clauses in order to be hired at some companies. This restricts their upward mobility and ability to pursue the American dream. Please restrict the use of these clauses to rare situations."
Sandeep	"I strongly support the proposed change. As a physician, given the growing costs of medical care in this country, I am amazed that health care companies are able to prevent physicians from easily leaving and providing more choice for patients by using a no compete clause."
Michele	"Yes please help - I am a nurse anesthetist contractor...If work is done for them then I would understand but the hospitals make us use them and they don't even know what we do. They will keep you on the back burner as someone with experience and take a cheaper person they have nailed down be that means they get a bigger portion of the pay per hour...and then you have no job"
Emily	"As someone who has taught yoga for five years and is currently under a non-compete and non-solicit contract, I have a direct understanding of how these laws being lifted could change the industry. As a yoga teacher you get paid maybe

	$60/class max, which ends up being less than $30/hour when you take into account prep time, arriving early/staying after, and more. Meanwhile the owners of the studio make all the money, yet students think that by supporting the studio they're putting money in your pocket. One way to make ends meet as a teacher is to teach at multiple studios. A non-compete prohibits that. A second way is to branch out on your own and offer your own classes or open your own studio. A non-compete/non solicit makes this incredibly hard because of the waiting period between leaving the studio and being free of your contract. As someone with plans to open their own studio one day, have these contracts nullified would directly impact my life. More so it would benefit the local economy to allow people to make a living wage doing what they love and offering more classes in a city with high demand. Non competes are a money grab and attempt to own someone while paying them well below their worth. I'm hopeful the FTC sees that and will nullify these contracts to create a fair labor market."
Jacob	"I urge the FTC to ban non-compete agreements to simplify the law and prevent future employer abuse tactics. In many US states, non-compete agreements already are very limited. However, some corporations choose to use legal loopholes and pay "Registered Agent" companies to set up a P.O. box in Delaware or other employer-first states, even though neither the employer or employee ever step foot in those states. For a mere $50, you can set-up your company in the most employee unfriendly state and manipulate your employees. Personally, I was a victim of manipulation and emotional abuse by a former employer during college through the use of a non-compete agreement for academic research. What I thought was a good opportunity at the time turned into a complex situation, where I was essentially hostage to my employer, as they threatened me to be unable to find employment elsewhere if I left their company on unfavorable terms due to the non-compete agreement. I was manipulated to work many hours unpaid under the pressure of keeping my job. The employer also pressured me to shut myself off from other undergraduate research opportunities, spending time with friends, and to not seek out any other internships. While this happened in 2020, the situation still impacts my life, as I lost my opportunities for graduate school. Of course, I later found out such a non-compete agreement was unenforceable in Illinois (where I worked at the time), because they did not recognize legal loopholes. But it is not illegal to write a unenforceable non-compete contract, and the laws surrounding non-competes vary, so that combined with their manipulation tactics kept me at this company through fear. I urge the FTC to make non-compete agreements universally banned to simplify the law, and close the opportunity for inter-state loopholes and employer abuse."
Heinz	"As a 25 year veteran of a niche industry business and I am under a 18 month non-compete. The other mid-level managers I work with are also under the same non-competes. All of us have spent our working careers in this industry and if we were to leave, we would have to sit out of our industry and find work in a different line of business. In many respects it keeps us anchored to the current employer since we cannot afford to wait out the non-compete with no option to entertain offers from competitors. In some respects you feel like the employer owns your

	skill set and services in this type of situation. No one wants more competitors in their industry, but it is healthy for the business community which brings down prices for the consumer. Getting rid of non-competes would be a positive step for the employee and the economy."
Kevin	"Non compete's are nothing but harmful It prevents healthy competition in an industry, which hurts not only the employees bound by them, but the customers of the companies imposing them, and the companies themselves. Pm currently under one waiting to expire. I've had to give up 15 years of experience, and take a lesser paying job, which has caused me to struggle. Not to mention the only reason I am under one is because I had to sign a non compete when the original company I worked for was bought out, and the new owner made us sign one. So my option was keep working for us by signing this, or get fired. I was left with no choice but to sign it, and kept in a toxic work environment because I couldn't go out and work for someone else in the industry. So the only way out was to leave the industry completely, and let my non compete expire. I'm constantly being reached out to by my previous customers, as the service I provided to them is no longer available, but I am unable to help thanks to my non compete. So a few of them have actually had to hire people to replace the services I was providing, costing them more money. So, there is no benefit to non competes, even to those who impose them. My previous company even loses out because they are losing customers regardless, as the customers find other solutions. So what is the point? Who are these non competes protecting? Hopefully this proposition passes to allow healthy competition again"
Jennifer	"Physicians should be included in the non-compete ban. Burnout is high in healthcare and the ability to avoid being trapped in a poor working environment may help."
Greg	"I am an independent contractor. One of my clients has the following in their contractor agreement. The name of the company has been starred out. The CAPITALIZATION is mine for emphasis. 'Contractor agrees that during the term of this Agreement and for a one (1) year period after completion or termination of this Agreement, Contractor shall not in any manner whatsoever, directly or indirectly: (i) within the geographic areas where * conducts business and its clients and customers are located, solicit or accept any Competing Business from, or engage in any Competing Business with, any clients or customers OR PROSPECTIVE CLIENTS OR CUSTOMERS of 55 with whom Contractor had any written or oral contacts or dealings in conjunction with the Services during the term of this Agreement; or (ii) on behalf of Contractor or on behalf of any person, firm, corporation, association or other entity, solicit, influence or cause any employee or contractor of * * * * to leave his or her employment with * * * * or cease or reduce his or her contractual relationship with *. For purposes of this Agreement, "Competing Business" is business of a nature or type that is the same as, similar to, OR OTHERWISE COMPETITIVE WITH THE BUSINESS being conducted by *. Contractor agrees that, in the event of a breach of the covenants set forth in this paragraph, *'s remedy at law would be inadequate, and * may seek injunctive relief, as well as damages. Contractor acknowledges and agrees that the requirements of this paragraph are reasonable in time, territory and scope, and do not unduly burden Contractor's ability to earn a living, and that the aforementioned one (1) year period shall not be reduced or shortened by any period of time during which Contractor is in breach of this covenant.' This is in North Carolina, but the company does business worldwide and its clients have entities worldwide, thus the world is off limits. Anyone the business has ever talked to could be considered a PROSPECTIVE client. Even potential clients that have refused to do business with the company. I FIRMLY believe this non-compete clause is in RESTRAINT OF TRADE and I am IN FAVOR of the Proposed RULE."

Amal	"Physicians should also be included in NPRM"
Victor	"I'm in Tech where these idiotic clauses stifle competition. Which prevents the best workers from going to better, smarter companies. Which results in inferior products and services for consumers."
Kathleen	"California prohibits non-compete clauses yet it has the largest and strongest economy in the nation."
Rebecca	"I strongly agree that the no compete should be dropped and not considered a legal contract"
Josh	"It's entirely unfair that employers get to dictate the terms of my employment for years to come. I turned down my first employment opportunity during the pandemic for just such a reason. The government should ensure that workers have a right to work anywhere, not limited by who previously employed them. If there are trade secrets, limit those under already existing law. Otherwise, let Americans work freely."
David	"I strongly support the proposed rule on non-compete clauses. I have worked in the automotive industry where I had to sign a non-compete that was so broad, I would not have been able to work for 2 years for any other employer that COULD theoretically compete with my employer, regardless of whether the other employer actually competed against them. This hurt my income and career trajectory, as when the plant shut down for a year to retool, they didn't lay off the office staff - instead, they "relocated" our jobs to another plant 1.5 hours away from where I worked, then said the non-competes prevented us from getting other jobs in the local area. This abuse must stop. It hurts the local economy and other employers, who could have hired employees like me. Instead, I had to change fields entirely just to avoid the non-compete, which reduced my income and reset my progress on climbing the promotion ladder. I had to throw away skills that I had gained in the automotive industry."
Joshua	"I see no benefit to workers for non-compete clauses. I was asked to sign one out of grad school which would have prevented me from working within several miles of my home in anything remotely related to the job. Non-compete clauses are frequently abused to the maximum degree and should be outright banned."

Gregory	"Please pass regulations on non-compete clauses. It is not fair to hold employees hostage, or limit their ability to grow themselves and the economy, by restricting their employment options. I have first hand experience with this practice. A former employer had me sign a Non-Compete when I started employment as a internship in college. It was a part time position of 20 hours of work as an Electrical Engineer, while I finished university. After university, I worked for this employer another 4 years full time, but then found a better job in another state. It was not a competitor, but a customer of my former employer. My former employer waited till the day after my 4-week notice to tell me that I had signed a non-compete agreement and that it bared me from working for any competitor, customer or any potential customer up to 5 years after leaving the company with no geographic limitations. This was effectively the entire semi-conductor industry and put my entire career at risk. I had to pay a lawyer $1500 out of pocket to help, and they were only able to water down the language in the agreement to allow me to take my new job. However, I had to agree to new binding agreements and a "confidentiality" clause so I could not warn my former workmates or post about my experiences."
Daniel	"I wholly support the FTC eliminating the socialist baggage otherwise known as, "Non-Compete Agreements" (NCA), from the American professional experience. Some organizations have claimed management of NCA should be left to the states, but this betrays our system. Interstate matters are the purview of the Federal government, not of lower-tier state governments. NCA are not limited in scope to a single state and are therefore the purview of the Federal government. My own NCA is based in the state where my company is headquartered, a state where I have never performed a day of work in my life. NCA unfairly stifle the American worker, wages, and innovation, they give employers unfair and dishonest leverage to keep employees at their company who would otherwise leave for better employment. It is time to end NCA and restore capitalism to the American workplace. Competition is healthy and good, an employer who only maintains an employment relationship by NCA is not a good employer and should not be protected from the consequences of failing to be a good employer by such means."
Kevin	"Employers have most of the leverage over their employees. That leverage should end when the employment ends! Employers are more than capable of protecting themselves without crippling intimidating a FORMER employee's opportunity to eam a living!"
Patrick	"Hello. I am a husband of a spouse that is also medical like me. The anesthesia company that controls entire large city we live in mandates that she sign a non compete. They do not allow their employees to choose where they want to work. If you want to work within 40 minutes from home, you are forced to sign this. The benefits are terrible and the pay is under the average. However, they know they have a monopoly in the area and that is how they keep people. They don't keep people because they offer a fair wage, good benefits, or even respect. People should not be forced into this. Especially highly trained individuals that have invested their lives to helping people in the medical field that no one wants to work at. Please cancel non competes. It only serves the greed in companies. Not die employees. Let people choose where they want to work. For her to leave this company, we both have to uproot and move an hour away or she has to commute an hour away, which would take a toll on our family."

Ralph	"My comments on the proposed FTC ban on noncompete agreements are as follows: 1. For most levels of employees, and most situations, I agree that non-compete agreements should be banned. The countering argument, that noncompete agreements are necessary to safeguard company proprietary information, may have some validity. But on the other hand, for other than employees in certain positions or circumstances, banning noncompete agreements could have a benefit to society in that companies will be discouraged from underpaying or abusing its better employees so that they will not be motivated to leave in the first place. They will want to stay. 2. if noncompete agreements are NOT banned, then I suggest limiting their allowed application as follows: They could be applied to any employee, who was fired for disciplinary reasons. That's because fired employees could be more likely expected to take retribution against their former employer by doing things such as sharing its proprietary information with the new employer, who could be a direct competitor to the former one. It seems reasonable and fair to prevent this specific and more likely circumstance from occurring. 3. If not banned, then noncompete agreements should NOT be applied to laid off (as in Reduction in Force programs) employees who work in a position where proprietary information is unlikely to be known, such as working on the factory floor. In order to maintain this desirable circumstance, it would of course be necessary for the employer to disperse proprietary information strictly on a need-to-know basis, such restriction which the employer should already be doing ANYWAY. There would admittedly be "gray areas" where decisions would need to be made about what is proprietary, such as a more efficient way to distribute materials on the factory floor. Is that really proprietary or not? But again, one way to defend against the "gray areas" is to treat the employees well, so that they are motivated to stay, not to leave. 4. The best application for noncompete agreements, if not banned, is for the riskiest scenario, which is where a high-ranking officer of the company, who would be likely to know critical company proprietary information, is fired for disciplinary or performance reasons. Obviously, this particular employee would probably be at most risk for divulging critical proprietary information to a new employer in same industry as former one."
Jennifer	"Non-compete clauses expose people to undue restriction on employment and are in direct conflict with an individuals right to prosperity. In many circumstances employers that compete, are in the same regional location, meaning people working under a non-complete clauses have few prospects for alternative work."
Elizabeth	"I am a veterinarian who has lived my entire 33 years in practice following and respecting all my non competes. Now I simply want to start a side business as a way to move into retirement while keeping my small animal job. I advised my employer up front about all of this when I signed on with them over two years ago. They informed me then it would not be a problem but now it is a problem."

	Veterinarians already have high burnout, long hours for low pay compared to our human counterparts and non competes are not helping. Please help free our profession from this onerous problem. I simply want to have a side business which in no way competes with my employer who does not even offer these specialty services. Please do the right thing and end non competes for American workers (veterinarians) and give us a chance to be all we can be. Thank you!"
Kathleen	"My wife is subject to a non compete as a veterinary professional and it is literally robbing us of income we could be making if she could search for a better job. Please help us. We are trapped on a hamster wheel and we are ready to start a business ourselves which in no way even competes with her employer."
Fatima	"Physicians have long suffered with non competes as we get bound to one hospital or practice over another. And then unable to work anywhere nearby even after leaving for up to two years. Working hard in this field doesn't mean we are entitled to one hospital or clinic. Our quality of life have declined a lot ever since huge corporations have taken over healthcare. We need some silver lining. Please remove non competes for Physicians as well as a fair rule for all laborers."
Andrew	"The prohibition of non-compete agreements needs to be finalized and implemented now. These agreements, except in the narrowest of circumstances, are unfair, anti-competitive, monopolistic and quite frankly, completely unamerican. They depress wages and worker freedoms and are a net drain on the economy as a whole. Thank you and please do the right thing."
Andrew	"Non-compete clauses have transformed from their original intent of protecting sensitive company information from being easily accessed by competitors to what they are now; which is simply a means to reduce the mobility and opportunity of current employees to negotiate and compete for higher wages at their current employer or at competing enterprises. Noncompetes are now almost exclusively directed toward lowering the wages of lower tier workers by suppressing their freedom to compete in the employment marketplace. This is flat out Unamerican!"
Lisa	"I write to support a BAN on exploitative noncompete agreements. Workers around the country are sharing their own stories about how noncompete agreements have hurt their careers. One in five Americans has been forced to sign noncompete agreements at the time they were hired, leaving these workers with lower wages and worse benefits. Everyone should be free to leave their job for a better opportunity. Noncompete agreements are bad for workers."
T	"I believe this to be a profound change for good. As the press page from ftc.gov states, it will unleash change. Employees shouldn't be held to an employer through coercion but through instituting a work environment and compensation package that doesn't encourage them to leave. The allowing of non- disclosure is still vital and enforceable so that an employee's worth is determined by their general ability to contribute and not a short term market change by disclosing strategic information. While some might view the change to be government overstep, I counter that there has been a fundamental shift in the worker/management relationship since the 1970s, this puts power back to the workers to sell their labor to the bidder that best aligns with their price. This doesn't stifle capitalism, rather it unleashes it by removing barriers. Additionally, workers are subjected to layoffs with little to no notice and often with limited to no severance packages. While management knows of these changes and those being let go have an opportunity to plan a departure. Barring more radical changes to the disclosure requirements for layoffs, this will give workers some ability to continue to provide for themselves quickly and reduce government assistance. Personally, I would like to see more European style labor protections, i.e. layoffs can't be restaffed without offering the position back to the holder and months of notice with generous severance packages."

Noah	"I strongly support banning non-compete clauses. As an advanced practice nurse, and I have only seen non-compete clauses used to limit healthy competition rather than for their ostensible purpose of protecting proprietary information. Medical care is generally not proprietary, but instead relies on a large-scale collaborative effort of countless researchers and medical professionals using publicly available in with the single goal of helping those in need. Allowing companies to limit medical professionals ability to easily switch to large multi state hospital groups to abuse non-competes as leverage to keep practitioners locked into non-competitive contracts rather than allowing the free market to force these companies to provide market rate compensation. Non-compete contracts stifle competition, innovation, and the ability of workers to move freely between jobs which harms the public health system. The only thing non-competes do in my field are useful for is to allow companies to provide below market value compensation to health care professionals."
Thomas	"I am for the elimination of the practice of using non-compete clauses in the labor market."
Christine	"This is great news. I work in the therapy field. Non-compete clauses hurt both practicing clinicians and most of all, clients. Clinicians have the right to provide their (much needed and in a shortage) services to clients in whatever environment that is best suits them. I've seen many group therapy practices intimidate and scare clinicians into continuing to work for them by pointing at their non-compete clause. It's completely and totally unethical and all clinicians in the field know that about non-competes. It's time to be rid of them."
Nazema	"Please continue the proposed changes! Non-compete clauses are widespread in medicine. As health care systems have expanded through mergers and acquisitions of smaller hospitals, a non-compete that states one cannot work within 50 miles (for example) of the health care system may now apply to a wide geographic region or an entire state. This impedes competition, and limits the ability for providers to move practices to more rural areas where health care is desperately needed."
Marilyn	"As a physician, I should be free to practice wherever I am licensed. Noncompete clauses exist to unfairly restrict physicians from changing the places and conditions of their employment, negotiating for fair incomes, and drives physicians away from practicing medicine, at a time when we don't have enough to fulfill our needs. No employer of physicians (for profit or not for profit) should be able to use a non-compete clause."

Nancy	"I am in support of eliminating non-compete clauses."
Virginia	"I am a veterinarian. Non-compete clauses in our contracts hurt veterinarians themselves, limiting our ability to leave a job that isn't a good fit. I personally bought a house 30 min away from my job so that if I ever left I wouldn't be locked into an even longer commute by living close to my job with its 7 mile, 2 year non-compete radius. They also hurt consumer choice. Since veterinarians find it difficult to leave their jobs because they might have to move, have unreasonable commute times (can be hours long to get outside the radius), etc., they are stifled from setting up their own business, bringing their ideas to a different business, and forcing veterinary practices as a whole to be better to keep their staff."
Zari	"I support banning non-compete agreements. Workers should be able to transfer their skills to any job they want without penalty."
Himanshu	"I, as a privately employed physician , whole heartedly AGREE with the ban of non-competes on a national scale. It is a way for corporate entities to keep wages LOW for workers and have undue power in renegotiations in contracts....I can assure you ALL of those doctors and nurses would WHOLEHEARTEDLY support the banning of non competes. Additionally, if you look at their leadership page for AFIA, there is not a single medical doctor on there. And finally, their letter has an undertone of a potential legal action, which an organization would only suggest if it impacts the corporate profits. Please, I implore you to proceed with a national ban on non-competes WITH NO EXEMPTIONS for ANY SKILLED WORKERS. It is tiring watching our representatives be swayed by corporations."
Michelle	"As an employee that was forced to sign a noncompete clause by my employer, I urge you to pass this rule. Many workers are forced to stay in low-paying jobs or toxic work environments because they do not wish to relocate in order to change jobs. Abolishing noncomplete clauses is just the right thing to do."
Jennifer	"I am in support of ending non-compete clauses. This MUST INCLUDE PHYSICIANS. Physicians are increasingly held hostage in untenable work environments but are unable to change jobs without completely uprooting their entire family and leaving their support systems and even specialized programs that they themselves built for their employers. Physicians are unable to unionize to improve their working conditions and ensure they are being treated fairly. Contracts are changed, reimbursement for services provided are changed mid contract and physicians are forced to sign these unfavorable changes because they cannot leave their current employer and still live in their same city. Of course hospital systems are against this... they want to maintain their unfair power. Physicians should not be treated any differently than any other employee."

anon	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements, I had recently been offered a new tech position, which I was very interested in, but due to their broad non compete clause lasting 18 months, which would be effectively worldwide, I have had to turn down that position which would have been a dream job. The fact that in some states they are illegal and not all is unjust, I shouldn't have to live in CA just for the same position not to have a non complete cause."
Sam	"...I am an outside sales rep for medical devices and am under a strict non-compete agreement. I love my company but have argued for years this practice holds down wage growth within my company. I currently make the same base salary that I made when I started 11 years ago. My commission rate is also the same it was 11 years ago. The only way I get a "raise" is if I sell more than the "quota" that is assigned to me by the company. There is no negotiation, no discussion, no objections. Ending the non-compete clause would force my company to increase wages and more fairly allow for individual growth. In the mean time, I am trapped in the forced compensation package they determine."
Jenny	"I support ban on noncompete clauses for physicians."
Laura	"Non-compete clauses keep physicians bound to undesirable work environments, restrict them from earning a living with the skills they have devoted their lives to developing in communities where they have established their families and livelihoods, and potentially limit patients access to good care with their trusted physician."
Henry	"I am all for it. Non competes unfairly advantage employers. It may even be immediately relevant to my own ability to find extra work as a professional photographer working with studios."
Gina	"I feel that a non-compete limits your ability to grow. It almost feels like your trapped may it be a good or bad job. We have a hard time securing great potential employees as they do not want to sign a non-compete"
Elec	"I am writing in support of this proposed rule. Non compete clauses and contracts are unfair practices that hurt the economy. Furthermore I would encourage the commission to include the healthcare industry in this rule. Healthcare workers should not be limited by an employer in terms of where or for how long they can practice."
Anusha	"Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician

	leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however, one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave the block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients."
Laura	"This is very important and should be done and accepted"
Alden	"Non-compete clauses in medicine prevent competent physicians from making personal career decisions. They are bad for patient care especially in areas of medial need. They should be eliminated completely but especially in the medical field. Physicians are leaving the profession in record numbers. Do we want to continue to prevent physicians from remaining in a geographic area solely to protect the "rights" of a business or corporation. The need for physician is increasing exponentially. Stop the draconian practice of non-compete clauses and allow physicians to make career decisions that do not force them to move and uproot their family."
Frederic	"I am a 30 year physician in NC. Noncompetes for medical practitioners does little to 'protect' the financial interests of the employer. In medicine, there is uniformity of training. Forcing relocation of a family should a group and doe separate does not protect the employer. But it does upend many lives."
Rachel	"I am submitting my support for the proposed rule to terminate non-compete clauses, particularly for physicians, as this would allow them to provide care to patients, especially those in underserved areas. The current state of healthcare in this country is a challenge, and it is essential to explore every possible solution. This is one solution. Non-compete clauses limit the ability of physicians to practice medicine (including where it is most needed), as they restrict their employment options and prevent them from serving patients in certain areas. By eliminating these clauses, we can promote a more equitable and accessible healthcare system by our communities. This step will undoubtedly contribute to the betterment of healthcare in the country and ensure that patients receive the care they deserve. I am being affected by not being allowed to practice as an Obstetrician/Gynecologist....This will provide appropriate and fair wage compensation for healthcare. It's a step in the right direction!"
Jacqueline	"The non compete clause is an infraction on personal rights of an individual to work in an area of their choosing."
Shelileah	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to you as an oncology physician, who is bound by a noncompete clause. I am writing in strong support of your proposed change to eliminate noncompete clauses andlor make them illegal in contracts. I think that it fundamentally restricts our freedom as physicians, employees and citizens, to be bound by a noncompete clause that essentially force us to move cities, if we no longer wish to work for our current employer. If employers mistreat us, undervalue us or otherwise create a suboptimal work environment we should have the right to leave and work elsewhere, without having to uproot our lives to another city. It is not as though we are taking trade secrets or intellectual property with us as physicians. Furthermore, let it be known that the American Hospital Association does not speak for physicians when it states that it is against the elimination of noncompete clauses. I cannot think of a single physician that I know that is in favor of noncompete clauses. I respectfully ask that the FTC pass the proposed rule to eliminate noncompete clauses from contracts."

Becca	"I am commenting in support of the proposed rule. I have been a practicing physician for over 10 years. Most physicians are now employed, typically by large healthcare systems, and frequently required to sign non-compete clauses with employment contracts. These non-compete clauses allow the employer to modify the job expectations, support structure, and compensation, knowing that their employees are less likely to leave since they are unable to obtain a new job within a reasonable commuting distance without moving or facing a significant legal battle. In this area, non-compete clauses are clearly detrimental to competition and limit the employees' ability to seek better employment or improved working conditions."
Lauren	"As a veterinarian I strongly support the FTC's proposed changes to non-compete rules. Both large corporate practices and small single-owner hospitals/clinics use non-competes to depress wages and suppress career growth by keeping us from starting our own businesses or taking to a better job in the same area. I have worked for three veterinary hospitals in my 16 years in practice and each one of them had a non-compete clause in my hiring contract which they said was non-negotiable. As a result, when I did leave for another job I was forced to uproot my family to avoid costly litigation. This rule would be a boon for the thousands of veterinarians who are trapped by non-compete clauses and a boon for consumers as well. The elimination of non-complete clauses would increase competition between practices and would make starting a new hospital or clinic much easier, leading to more choice and more affordable care options for the consumer."
Kim	"Non compete clauses in employment contracts should be illegal. They are not compatible with a free market economy. They give far too much power to an employer and force people to stay in work environments where they are unhappy. They are hugely detrimental to workers and I urge you to consider making them illegal in the U.S."
David	"I am in full support of the proposed rule. Non-competes are basically just a way for companies with a lot of money and resources to bully employees who can't fight back. The only way to fight back is to not work for them but in our current economy we need to work to survive. I recently left a job where I was being held back in terms of upward movement in the company. I made the decision to leave to pursue other opportunities. This decision though forced me to work farther from my home than I already did because of the size of the non-compete radius. This

	makes my commute longer and takes me away from my family for longer periods during the day. Unfortunately, the company I went to also made me sign a non-compete. I work in healthcare and there are no groups in the private practice sector who operate without non-competes. It is unfair and I hope that you all will find it illegal."
Jane Doe	"I am a veterinarian, as is my spouse. Non-compete clauses are abusive to employees. My husband is subject to a non-compete clause that makes it so that he'd have to commute an hour to be able to work elsewhere. How is this ever fair? His employer lured him in to working for him by promising him partial practice ownership. The owner has worked part-time since my husband started, taking many long weekends and entire weeks off to vacation and spend time with his family. My husband, as a reliable long term associate, works long hours and gets little time off. Instead becoming a part owner, my husband worked for this man for several years, substantially adding to his client base and heavily lining the owner's pocketbook. The employer then sold the practice to a corporation for a massive profit, or which my husband sees none of. Many times, he has asked to negotiate the non compete clause, but this was flat out denied. He would like to start his own business, since his took away any opportunity to run the practice he helped build, but he cannot do anything related to vet medicine unless we move our family. The practice owner plans to retire in his early 50s, owns a luxurious beach home, multiple new luxury vehicles, and has more money than he knows what to do with. Meanwhile, my husband and I continue to have endless student loan debt. It's appalling that these practices continue regularly in the land of the free. My husband could build a wonderful practice to serve our community and our family could stay in the area we know and love without non competes. Instead, we are saddled with the choice between him working locally for a corporation and owner that will not repay his loyalty, or we move and uproot our lives to start somewhere new. Also, it's time we stop giving corporations such a leg up over individuals. They already have more buying power to negotiate better prices, more capital to use as they wish, etc. They do not need the additional prop of controlling their employee's ability to choose to work elsewhere. Non competes can and do trap employees who don't have the means to move their lives elsewhere. The transition of medical, dental, and vet practices from small businesses to corporate-controlled machines is taking the humanity out of these services. Practice ownership is one way that these people, who have dedicated their lives to constantly learning and serving in order to help others, can earn enough to pay off the immense student loan debt that comes with a public school medical/dental/vet degree. Even small businesses should not be permitted to use non competes with their employees. They should be challenged to be considerate or their employee's needs and of the fair and competitive benefits that other businesses offer in their area. My husband's boss used deceptive promises to get my husband to join in with a non compete, and now the employer reaps all the benefit and keeps my husband from being able to negotiate at all."
Mahesh	"Non-compete clauses deprive patients of continuity of care. If a physician leaves an organization with has non-compete clause that provider is arm-twisted to sign initially, he has to leave town. This is unfair to patients and causes harm. Hence there is no place for non-compete clauses. Also, it forces physicians to leave town. This in my opinion, is against the freedom enshrined in our constitution."

Richard	"I am absolutely for removing Non Compete clauses in the workplace!"
Joshua	"This law needs to go into effect, I specifically am an individual that would benefit greatly. I am bound by an 18 month NC and it has stifled my ability to grow and have any chance of higher wages no Matter how successful I am at my position."
Mataia	"I don't believe non-competes should exist, mainly because in the world where an employer can terminate you for no reason at all, they don't have to actually have a specific reason to let you go. I think that this disproportionately the working class I also believe that this can affect minorities at a heavier rate, because of the things that they could potentially face during employment, and then this can also affect their ability to provide for their families and cause yet another economic disadvantage for people that are in their communities."
Stephen	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. What they have been doing is wrong and should be banned."
Holly	"I work as a programmer in small companies. I have had extreme distress and economic hardship due to these noncompete. I cannot change jobs easily due to thing banning anything to do with credit card transactions, or air conditioners. Every time I have to get a new job I have to change industries and start from the bottom again. I make 1/2 what most programmers make and I largely attribute it to these non compete. I have had to turn down several jobs due to this."
Patrick	"I am an individual covered by a non compete that essentially limits me from working in any capacity by any organization that touches HVAC equipment for 5 years, covering about a 500 mile radius from my house. Leaving my current employer would result in me needing to make a complete career change. This essentially means I must choose to continue working for this person or risk the ability to provide for my family. I understand in certain circumstances a non-compete is needed to protect investment and training, but making something so broad like in my case essentially limits my ability to seek additional compensation or benefits due to the sweepingly broad language used. My non compete was offered with no additional compensation, years after I was fully employed by this individual. I was told to sign it or my employment would end."
Shazia	"As a physician serving the local community am against non compete clauses limiting the scope of practice of a physician. The admin monopolies and blackmails the physicians with such restrictions."
Randie	"Non competes seem prohibitive to clinicians to successfully change jobs if unsatisfied with their work environment and remain local. This seems absolutely unfair, is an extreme hardship to the clinicians and their families The clinician has to cease working for a period of time (unaffordable for most) drive very far to avoid violations (unhealthy/unsustainable for the good of the clinicians, their patients or their families) or relocate which also an egregious expectation because you want to change jobs. If I was a cashier at target and I quit, I can easily work at Walmart. In fact my experience is helpful not feared due to liability of non compete violations. If I am a pilot, I can switch airlines right? A pharmacist-pharmacies? I just don't see how large hospital systems can monopolize where doctors can and can't work. It is wrong!"

S	"This is no brainer non compete should have been eliminated decades ago if FTC was in favor of more access and fair competition. Impossible to believe that individual physicians can compete against behemoth hospitals"
Shoba	"I am a Physician who is affected by the non compete clause of 30 miles for one year. I don't want this clause."
Vishal	"I support this proposed ban on non-compete clauses."
Elsa	"It is time that these archaic deals that only protect employers end. Equine vets are often forced by them to have to sell their homes and move out of the area if they disagree or don't like how they are being treated by a practice owner."
Roy	"Non-compete clauses are unfair to employees, restricting their ability to work (and innovate) within a specialized skill set. Employers demand months or years of guarantee for no consideration paid during the restriction period."
Charles	"The actions to remove non-compete clauses are long overdue. Employers use non-compete clauses as a means to restrain die employee's flexibility to seek and secure jobs with higher wages or better working environments. I am an optometrist and have been forced to pass on better jobs for 12-18 months because of broad non-compete clauses. Thank you for taking actions to end this unnecessary practice."
Evan	"Trying to enforce noncompetes on physician while disallowing them on every other profession is absolutely ridiculous. What happened to your healthcare hero's?"
Michael	"Please pass this rule on banning non-competes in the workplace! They are anti-capitalism and unAinerican and hurt employees by limiting their wages in preventing them from working for competing companies in the same locations. This rule is totally pro-company and anti-employee and I can't understand how it was ever passed."
Uchit	"Should healthcare field be included in this, then definitely one of the best things to have happened to healthcare over last several years. This would improve patient's access to different specialists in an otherwise access limited (or delayed) scenario."
Kevin	"I regards to. Non compete the ruling should apply to all hospital systems non profit vs for profit is a meaningless distinction for the physician and in realty for the health system since they are all for profit. Everything else is just how they file their taxes"

Hiren	"Absolutely doctors must be free from non compete clause."
Anil	"This ban will be very helpful and fair for physicians"
Randall	"I cannot truly express how much banning non competes would truly help the American worker. Since graduating college over 10 years ago, I have been forced to sign a noncompete at every single job I have had. This has severely limited my career options in several instances and forced me to stay with a company that was holding me back and negatively impacting my mental and subsequently physical health."
David	"I previously worked as a physician for a large hospital system in North Carolina that had a severe non-compete clause. If I left my job, I would not be able to practice medicine, period (not just in my specialty), in my county for at least a year. Given the size of the system, this would de facto mean that I had to move or face 2+ hour daily commutes if I wanted to get another job. The system would not have lost clients/patients if I'd left: I was a hospitalist and did not have personal or lasting relationships with patients. There was no proprietary information that I knew or developed that competitors could have exploited. They explicitly used this non-compete to compel physicians to continue working under ever-worsening conditions: unsafe patient loads, shifts several hours longer than their stated duration, and increased frequency of call duties. It allowed them to cap and suppress salaries, despite increased health risks (daily exposure to original COVID) and rising inflation. I was able to get out of my non-compete clause thanks to a personal connection with an upper-level executive, but other doctors could not. My former teammates have children in school and families they couldn't easily uproot. They wouldn't be uprooting immediate families, but also close relatives who either helped with childcare, or suffered ailing health themselves."
Ornob	"I am strongly against non compete clauses. This stymies innovation, competition, and is antithetical to the economic philosophy of capitalism. It also promotes formation of monopolistic business models."
Sam	"I support an end to non-compete clauses for physician hiring."
Dan	"I am not in favor of non compete clauses. This prevents competitive salaries and benefits. Please stop the non compete."
Eleanor	"I strongly support restrictions or a ban on non-competes. I am a veterinarian and my first job after graduating required a non-compete. After 8 years at that job, I needed to move on, but because of the 25 mile non-compete, I would have had to drive over an hour each way to work. Since veterinary jobs tend to be long hours anyway, this was not possible for me at the time with kids in school and sports. After almost $10k in lawyer fees, I was able to work closer to home, and I have refused to sign a noncompete since that first job. Thankfully the market allows for me to make that requirement right now, but when the market changes, I won't always have that ability. For me and for new vets that follow me, I hope you pass this rule. While I understand an employers concern of 'stealing' client, they had a non-solicit clause in the contract that prevented me from soliciting previous clients."

Kenan	"Pm writing in full support of outlawing non-compete clauses. As a worker, these are extremely harmful and limit our ability to find new jobs when necessary. Confidentiality of trade secrets can be protected with NDAs, so there exists no reason to additionally limit where else a person can work. If another company can provide a better working situation, or if a worker wants to start their own company in the same industry, nothing should stop them. Preventing that is anti-competitive and anti-worker. Also consider that non-compete clauses can frequently prevent a worker from working anywhere at all and force workers to stay in poor working conditions. In some professions, a non-compete could essentially cover any other job a worker would be trained / qualified to do. So a worker would be faced with the choice of never leaving their current company or leaving and waiting for the non-compete to expire (oftentimes over a year), which isn't feasible without pay."
Joan V	"Agree the non-compete clause in an unfair portion of many physician contracts that can limit life decisions"
James	"Thank you for proposing this rule change. Companies' broad use of these noncompete clauses- -even for entry-level, low-paid jobs- -is out of control."
Amanda	"Non-competes make no sense for physicians, like myself, who only take care of ICU inpatients. Patients don't "choose" where they go for ICU admission. There's no way I could "steal" patients from another ICU. Stop the madness. All these non-competes do is force physicians to uproot their entire lives just to find a new job because it means they have to move to a new city."
Tamara	"I work for a Learning Center in North Carolina making only $15 tutoring students . Many of the students are special education students. I can't leave to find other work because of the non-compete clause...The clause names explicitly all of the tutoring companies in Charlotte, NC where I can find work. I can barely afford to live on this wage in Charlotte. If I did not have to worry about the non-compete clause, not only would I be able to find a fairly paying job. It would also create more competition for qualified tutors, and wages would increase."
Ariel	"I am a sales representative and non competes have hindered me significantly in the rental industry! I moved out of state to avoid violating a contract. After my contract was up I moved back to my home state. I was fired 1 month after being in the new territory they want to hold me to another non compete in both states. I had to switch industries as I did not have the time or resources to fight the case. They then threatened my severance and sent me a letter of intent to protect themselves via lawsuit that could cause issues for me, or future employers making me essentially unable to be hired for a entire year within the construction rental equipment industry unless I got a release of that contract which they

	refused. I was only in my new territory for a month. They essentially eliminated competition by enforcing a non compete in my home territory after being there for such a short period of time with their company. They allowed me to enter contacts and previous relationships I had in the area to salesforce and then fired me for being "too bubbly and giggly"
Christine	"I have already commented but since that time, my non compete has come into play. I was being starved out of my media sales position with Gray TV in Charlotte, NC by new management, so I was unable to remain employed due to financial responsibilities that must be met. I have had 2 compensation plans violated, which HR is telling me is fine and normal. I've been doing this for 10 years for several different companies and have never seen annual income reduced by 75%, due to managers moving accounts around as they please just because they want to do so. I left my job last Friday, after having only been there 6 months, due to management changes and account shifting, which I was assured would not happen. The manager that assured me of that was let go a month ago. I can't do any damage after only 6 months, but after having multiple tense conversations with the new General Sales Manager, I believe she is not letting me out of the agreement due to spite, just to make my life harder....My 81 yr old mother loves with me. We relocated for this job and I bought a home, which I am now going to lose, since the 3 stations I've spoken to cannot hire me due to being sued for interference by Gray TV. This should be illegal. No company should have that much control over a previous employee."
Brian	"I am currently 3 months removed from my position as a client support rep....I started at $38,000 as the lowest ranking employee. Didn't even realize when signing (being I was getting paid so little) that I signed a non compete. I quit in late October because my roles and tasks increased dramatically. My hours and days worked also increased then... [and] asked for a raise that got denied....I was happy with the workload and to work in sports but wanted to be compensated accordingly. They weren't willing, so I'm the end, I left. After I quit, I took a local job...paid me more money than Vald did. During this time I was seeking employment with sports tech companies in the industry as I wanted to be happy doing something I loved and got hired to do client support. I have since received a letter from Vald trying to take me to court for breaking my non compute. I have a grandmother in the hospital whose bills I help pay. A wedding a year from now that I need to pay for. A fiancé in PA school and two dogs that I care for. This is causing me undue hardship as they are trying to make me quit and be without a job. I found a job I love and people who treat me right and pay me accordingly....I just want to work. A non compete is against all human rights. I have the right to work wherever I want and this absurd....This has given me an unbelievable amount of anxiety and they're causing me to feel a way I've never felt."
Chris	"Please, this limits the ability to utilize learned transferable industry knowledge that will benefit the employee. Without necessary skills and knowledge, growth as an employee within their industry is nearly impossible. Banning non-competes will promote progression and competition. Will some abuse? Absolutely, but the absolute majority will not. Companies can protect themselves in other ways."

Kermit	"I am totally against non-compete agreements as they clearly stifle individuals from starting their own business. My current company gave me a non-compete agreement while I was on vacation and said I didn't have a job if I did not have it back to them in 48 hours. That was 6 years ago and I have been trying to leave, but this agreement is being held over my head. The United States has been prosperous because of entrepreneurship and this is crushed with these agreements. Please pass this law and do not allow the large corporations to keep it stuck in court for years."
Shannon	"I have been a veterinary specialist for —25 years and have been asked/ required to sign a non-compete agreement at 70% of the positions that I have held. My experience with non-compete clauses as they relate to service driven professions such as mine, is that they are used to prevent competition and limit opportunities for growth of the profession locally and regionally. I was once asked to sign a non-compete clause that spanned 1/2 of the state of SC, part of southern NC and part of northern GA. This is a ridiculous restriction but not necessarily that unique in my profession. When working in a service industry such as veterinary medicine, the non-compete clause really functions as a means of trapping employees in a situation that they may want to leave. If this is a free market society, then no one should be threatened by a competitor opening a business down the street. Competition is good for the community and leads to innovation in the profession. Also, the individual practitioner is being denied credit for their contribution to their workplace/ employer. Although a client may enter a practice because the practice has a good reputation, it is incumbent upon me as the practitioner to foster the doctor/client/patient relationship such that the client wants to return to the practice again and again. In that scenario, the practice benefits from my hard work and productivity. However, if I choose to leave a practice after having signed a non-compete clause or get released from the company without cause, all of my sweat equity is lost. Meanwhile, the practice retains all the goodwill I have created with the clientele. Even if I "sit out" my non-compete period, typically 12 months in my profession, I have nothing to show for all my hard work; meanwhile, the practice can continue to grow and build on my reputation and sweat equity. This is an unfair competitive advantage for the practice. The other loser in this equation is the client/ patients. When a practitioner is forced to leave a region due to a non-compete clause, the clients/patients are left scrambling to find a replacement. Often the choice of replacement is made by the practice; whereas the client/patient do not have/get a choice. The replacement chosen by the practice may not have the same skill set or clinical experience of the practitioner being replaced. To mention nothing of the need for the client/ patient to build trust with a new caregiver. This takes time and while that new relationship is developing, patient care may suffer. Again, where is the fair market? I strongly urge the FTC to move forward with abolishing non-compete clauses. I believe that doing so, professions such as mine will become stronger, more innovative, and far more productive. Every community, region and ultimately the country will be better for it."
Kari	"I am an OBGYN physician. I recently moved and now my commute home is an hour. Because of noncompetes, I am unable to join the group (close by my home) for a year. The "solution" to satisfy my noncompete is to work only hospital based in a hospital outside the noncompete for a year and then return to the office. Fine - I'm doing it - but my goodness. These are my skills that I've worked over a decade for. I was with my previous office for 10 years. Let me go where I want to go! Enough with the noncompetes."

Daniel	"I support the ban of non compete clauses. My wife has one as a doctor in NC where she wouldn't be able to work anywhere within 100 miles of either of her work locations, which means we'd have to move to another city. This breaks apart family bonds, friendships, and the spouses job."
A.	"I strongly favor the proposed rule by the FTC to disallow noncompetes. As a physician, these noncompetes greatly hinder our ability to find the best job fit for us and for our patients. Noncompetes need to stop now."
Jasmine	"Please vote to get rid of non-compete clauses. I have been forced to sign many in my career in marketing, and they are clearly a tool to scare employees and keep them from looking for better opportunities."
Angelica	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
HARLEY	"I am fully in favor of the FTC eliminating non-compete clauses. I am a physician, an anesthesiologist specifically, and I was required to sign a non-compete clause with my employer. I have always thought that a non-compete clause for anesthesiologists was ridiculous. If I moved from Hospital A to Hospital B within the same city, I would never draw a patient away from the other hospital. Patients simply do not make a decision about their care based on where an anesthesiologist practices. So why do these large medical corporations require us to sign a non-compete clause? It is simply a business tool to monopolize a market and reap the largest profits at the expense of the employees and the local hospitals. When the hospital that I worked at decided to cancel the contract with my employer, our entire group of over 90 highly specialized anesthesiologists suddenly found ourselves unemployed and unable to work in our city for two and a half years. The personal consequences for each of us; selling homes, leaving family and friends, finding new jobs, pulling our kids out of school was bad enough. For the hospital system and the patient community it was devastating. Ask yourself, how do you replace over 90 highly trained physicians that have served the community and the hospital surgeons for over 35 years overnight? The simple answer is that you cannot yet that was what was done. As a result, there was a chaotic and dangerous transition where unfortunately, patients suffered and worse. As the FTC's position is discussed, the question in the medical community is what comes first, patients lives or corporate profits? The answer is obvious. With Thanks, Harley Geller, MD"

Anna	"Please do not omit physicians from the noncompete!"
Rex	"Non-competes traps me in my technical job position. I can't go anywhere else for two years or I will be sued by my current employer. They didn't decrease my pay but changed my job position and limited my merit increases to below the norm. I'd have left years ago if it wasn't for this employment clause"
Helen	"I firmly support a new regulation that forbids non compete clause. Reason: unjust, anticompetitive, hurts the lower level managers, workers who want to strike on their own, can be seriously discriminatory and simply unAmerican. However do believe employers should be fairly with clear fair definitions of forbidding solicitation of current clients/customers from your current employer for your future planned business. That would be immoral and should be illegal. However again the language should be clearly defined by the FTC. The FTC approved language should be die only language put in any employer contract to be signed by a future employee. In fact that language should be in quotes and directly attributed to the FTC. An official FTC Imprimatur so to speak!!!"
Yizhen	"Please ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians in all levels of training, including residency. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter."
Tama	"Non compete clauses hurt employees. It stifles free and fair competition and puts people in a position that they might not find a job in their given field in the town that they live in."
Samuel	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Allen	"I am a physician recently employed by non-profit health system. I was treated very poorly and made to see 2,000 patients in a clinic with no nurse no manager and no other doctors for over two years. To join a better group that provided adequate support, I was forced to move 15 miles for one year. Many of my patients delayed care until I returned to the region; others had to drive on tollways and had significant burden to reach me to continue care. Please include non-profit hospital systems in rules reducing non-compete agreements as this is an unfair regulation hurting patients, when doctors must choose between leaving or being able to support patients adequately."

Christine	"I work for Gray TV, WBTV in Charlotte NC. I previously worked for the same company, different station (WECT) in Wilmington NC for 5 yrs. The only position in the entire company that must sign a non compete to be hired, is that of Account Executives. The only damage that can be done is sharing rates, which managers know as well or better than AEs do, but can also be shared by any client that either advertises with a station or has been pitched by a station. Advertising agencies have rates and products as well Engineers and IT employees can shut down systems but don't have to sign one, and talent is free to go wherever they like once their contract is up. Our agreements read that up to one year after separation from the company, we can't work for a competitor, even if we are fired. I have seen Gray TV intimidate a company that was going to hire a previous co worker of mine, keeping him from being able to eat a living unless he moved out of town for one year. I am currently being squeezed out by new management, after relocating for my current position, buying a new home, and uprooting my 81 yr old mother to a new town. New management sees no value in me, even though 3 previous managers that hired me did, offered me enough to make a move across NC both desirable and profitable. Now just because new managers can do whatever they want to, I can't survive on what they've reduced my current income to, which was not in the offer I accepted, but they are also making it impossible to earn a living without relocating again. I spent $10,000 to move here and buy a home and am going to go bankrupt if I can't find other employment within 30-60 days. How can that be fair and/or legal?? I have 2 other companies that would hire me if this agreement was not in place. SHOULD BE ILLEGAL"
Adrienne	"I fully support eliminating non-competes."
Kelly	"There is nothing proprietary about a physician's knowledge. Every specialty has societies, organizations, and regulatory bodies to ensure they are meeting practice standards. Corporate hospital systems, both for-profit and non-profit, do not have trade secrets when it comes to practicing medicine. They are using non-compete agreements to force physicians to comply with often poor working conditions or be faced with being abruptly stripped of patient relationships, be forced to uproot their families, or be forced to leave home for extended periods of time to make a living. It also limits patient access to physicians when physicians are forced out of an area. There is absolutely no reason non-compete agreements should be upheld for physicians. Be get these banned asap."
Kaustubh	"Non-compete clauses are used against physicians to increase responsibilities while compromising patient safety. E.g., 1. physicians are asked to cover calls at multiple busy hospitals simultaneously. 2. Physicians are asked to supervise multiple PAs & NPs simultaneously since the healthcare system can generate additional revenue. Both these examples create significant patient safety issues. The healthcare administrators understand the safety risk. However, they also know physicians must leave town if they oppose the excessive responsibilities. So, a lot of physicians have become a part of this unsafe patient care culture."

Laura	"Please include ALL physicians in the elimination of noncompete clauses. Do not give exemptions to non-profit hospitals, many of which are non-profit in name only."
Kate	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements."
Michael	"I strongly support this rule. Non-compete clauses tilt the balance of power away from employees and toward large corporations. They unfairly inhibit business and trade. They force many employees to choose between family and work, with employees having little option but to stay at their current employment due to non-compete rules."
Sunil	"Current non compete clauses are nothing but ensuring indentured servitude. The current proposed agreement and explicitly categorizing non compete as anti trust and monopoly is what any free citizen should demand.. Also its nice that the proposed rule would clarify that the term `Worker" which includes an employee, individual classified as an independent contractor, extern, intern, volunteer, apprentice, or sole proprietor who provides a service to a client or customer. (12) as this definition will not give much wiggle room for corporations and their lawyers to get around any non compete clause rule ban"
Mary Ann	"The non-compete law should be abolished. It's skewed to benefit the employers and punish the employees. It keeps the employees hostage in their jobs even when they're unhappy or being treated unfairly."
Elizabeth	"Noncompete clauses are what firms use to sequester your human capital from competitors. I fully support the removal of non-compete clause to support individual workers. Noncompete agreements contribute to wage stagnation because one of the most effective ways to secure higher pay is switching companies. These clauses have become so commonplace that they have swept up even low-wage workers."
Ranadeep	"It's a very important and most needed rule to help average employees. Employers have long exploited non-compete rules to under pay and keep employees in jobs that are not very satisfying and fulfilling"
Brett	"...I am an accountant . I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. Corporations don't want to pay workers what they could earn on an open market, so they make claims about "fostering innovation." It's a load of crap. Workers describe themselves as "hostages" and "indentured servants" to their bosses. But impacted industries will run their own campaigns in an attempt to keep the rule from being implemented, sometimes even using tricky astroturf tactics that can be hard for the FTC to detect. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. The ban on non-compete clauses will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! It would open job opportunities for about 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion a year. Non-compete clauses also make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats people by allowing their former employer to sue them if they go to work for another company in the same industry. Please do the right thing and ban non-compete clauses."

Judith	"Non compete clauses forces employees to choose between keeping a terrible job or feeding their family. This is absolutely an unfair labor practice."
Tedra	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Shan	"We need a non-compete rule. I support it for the sake of healthcare!"
Katrina	"I am a Paralegal currently working on the review and research for a Non-Compete Agreement in order to facilitate the ridiculous restrictions that only benefit the company. And what I found funny is within the one I am working on (which has been previously executed by the way) mentions the word "indefinitely", however the term is two (2) years extinguishment after the employee leaves the company. A lot of them are quite ambiguous and enoneous. I am ecstatic that the FTC even discussed and researched this as being a very serious issues not only for the working class and the public as a whole, but also for many businesses. I not only support die Non-Compete Clause Rule, but very much look forward to the final outcome!"
Paul	"Noncompete clauses are limiting physicians ability to make a living without having to disrupt their family. I strongly urge the FTC to go forward and eliminate this practice."
Paul	"Noncompete clauses are limiting physicians ability to make a living without having to disrupt their family. I strongly urge the FTC to go forward and eliminate this practice."
Sarah	"Non- Compete's are for die benefit of the employer and the employer alone. Yoga is already a profession with very limited income and benefit opportunities. NC's restrict our financial opportunities even more. In addition to this, Yoga is meant to be shared to all and NC's prevent teachers from having that ability to help their community."
Scott	"As a physician , I oppose noncompetes universally. It has no place in medicine."

Gwyn	"Non-compete clauses are bad for the American public and American workers. Please ban them."
Thomas	"As an anesthesiologist for over 25 years, our group of over 35 physicians has endlessly hated our non-compete relationship with our private equity owners. This "non-enforceable" rule has kept most of us in check through the threat of litigation and has ultimately limited anesthesia care in our community. Our physicians are entrenched in the community and most of us are unwilling to make the wholesale move to another location. We can't just pick up and leave without serious family and financial disruption. The concept of an anesthesiologist having trade secrets or competing for local business is laughable. No one chooses their anesthesiologist for surgical care although some might like it when they see a familiar face, but ultimately we are not involved in the decision tree of locating surgical care. Limiting our ability to leave our current position to work ultimately leads to higher medical costs and a disgruntled workforce. I would surmise that most physicians would support the removal of our non-compete clauses in the contracts that we must sign to work and that a mobile physician force would be good medicine for our communities. I have attached a section of our 2014 contract's non-compete clause for your review. Attachments Anesthesiologist non-compete example"
Charlotte	"We need to get rid of non compete in healthcare worker contracts. Patients need options, not monopoly from big hospitals."
Melissa	"The non compete title should absolutely be abolished. No one should be prohibited from furthering their career or just changing employers for better quality of life. It allows companies to keep employees at lower wages because it stops competition. Companies do not have a trade mark on a position, therefore they should have no control over an employee taking a new position with another company. It truly is one of the most absurd rules of employment."
Anonymous	"I support amending non-compete agreements laws. They are unfair and unrealistic to the funeral director."
Dan	"The biggest establishments that you're trying to excuse from this bill is between the franchisor and the franchisee. Franchisee's are forced to sign non-competes that keep them locked into a franchise for life or give up everything they built. Franchisors own the data (Customers) that the franchisee paid for through sweat, tears and marketing and that with a non compete in their territory leads to be completely controlled by the franchisor. I am ok with Personal, Confidential agreements about how the franchisee performs but not the non-compete or ownership of customers clauses."
Matthew	"Non-competes are controversial because they can have negative consequences for both employees and the economy as a whole. Here are a few reasons why non-competes can be seen as bad: They restrict employee mobility: Non-competes limit employees' ability to seek new employment opportunities in their field, potentially limiting their earning potential and career growth. They may also

	prevent employees from leaving a job that they are unhappy with or moving to a new city or state. They can stifle innovation: Non-competes can discourage employees from leaving to start their own businesses, which could potentially be innovative and beneficial to the economy. This could limit competition and result in a lack of new ideas and products. They may be unfair: Non-competes are often included in employment contracts without much negotiation, meaning employees may not fully understand the implications of signing one. Additionally, non-competes can be overly broad and prevent employees from working in any company in their field, regardless of whether that company is actually a competitor. They can be difficult to enforce: Non-competes can be difficult to enforce, leading to costly legal battles for both employees and employers. This can be particularly challenging for low-wage workers who may not have the resources to fight a legal battle. Overall, the negative effects of non-competes on employee mobility and innovation often outweigh their benefits for employers. While there may be certain circumstances in which non-competes are appropriate, they should be used judiciously and only when absolutely necessary."
Ryan	"I own a freight brokerage company with no non-competes. I pay wages that are top of the industry, have great health benefits and many perks for the employees. We have roughly 800 workers with very little turnover. During Covid, many of my competitors laid off employees and then enforced their non-competes. This seems ludicrous to me, an individual is out of a job during a pandemic and can't look for work in his profession. I strongly support ending non-competes."
Michael	"As a surgeon in North Carolina I am bound by an 18 month non-compete clause and would support eliminating all non-compete clauses"
Kim	"Hi I totally support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements. I worked for a company that I brought 12 clients with me to and to get the job I had to sign a non-compete clause. I had never heard of one before- after 3 years of emotional abuse and bullying by these 2 owners I decided to move to another agency - they picked the clients from my caseload they wanted to keep and let me have the others- some they picked were some that had come with me three years prior. One person was on my caseload did not want another therapist and came with me anyway. It's a client's right to choose where they want to get services. As soon as the old company found out I received an ethical complaint from my licensure board with the complaint. I had to hire a lawyer to respond to this complaint. The ethics board were exceptional letting me know they had to go through the protocol to address this and once the letter was as written it was dropped. I was never considered to be practicing unethically. This board's response to me gave me the understanding that the ethics board had dealt with these people before and I did find out that they did this to every employee that left their company. The consequences of their complaint caused by liability insurance to drop me because they had to pay the lawyer to write the letter. (Which was what I was paying the liability insurance for. The other consequence it caused me was to be completely traumatized, as I was in the middle of divorcing a narcissistic husband and becoming a single parent, losing my job because of the stress of the

	situation - almost losing my house and having to file bankruptcy. As a single parent of a then 4.5 year old I felt helpless and I had no family support. Then I found out all the stress that put me under it took the Drs 6 months to find out that my thyroid had stopped working, then trying new meds to level out my blood work and fix the numbers. This triggered me to go into full blown menopause . The entire process took about a year to get my hormones straight. I did get new liability insurance and eventually got the help I needed to keep my house- I ended up opening my own private practice. So I have to say that I'm very grateful for the second chance. But the plethora of stress and sleeplessness. I look back at that time - 2013-2015- and wonder how I made it through out that situation."
Leslie	"This has been due for many years. Thank you so much for addressing this issue."
Ashraf	"This ban must be approved because it is inline with the spirit of this country. I am a previous employee of a company that had me sign a non-compete when I started and was told that all employees signed the same non-compete. That wasn't true and was just one of many other untruths during my employment. When I was leaving the company, they had their lawyers enforce the non-compete so they wanted to make sure I don't provide the same ideas to others. Although these ideas were all from my creation and not the company's. Non-competes are being used by few greedy and unfair organizations to steal people's hard work and gives the company an undeserved advantage over other companies that may deserve this advantage more and who actually want to do good. I strongly support the ban which is inline with the spirit of this country."
Jennie	"I believe non compete clauses need to be done away with immediately. Those clauses are financial and career suicide for individuals looking to work and provide for themselves and their family if they leave their employer. It causes individuals to be tied to companies even if they are being treated unfairly, passed up for promotions, or working conditions aren't ideal. Non compete clauses allow companies to be bought out by larger corporate companies because the individual can't typically take on the corporation or pay the egregious amount to get out of their contract. The individual may have an excellent working relationship with their current company. When they are bought out by a larger company there are many risks. The new company that comes in could make changes to production or have unrealistic expectations that can't be met to get a raise, and yet you are tied to that company if you signed a noncompete with a he prior company. Your rights are stripped away and you no longer are free to make a living. Often times these contracts are signed prior to an individual ever working for the company and most people are unaware of working conditions prior to signing their life away. I have personally witnessed individuals have to find a new line of work or move hours or even states away to be able to work and provide for themselves and their family. This means having families that are settled in a community where they live, work, go to church, intend to raise their family, in a blink of an eye are gone if they no longer are with the company they signed the non compete clause for. They now have to uproot their family and move so they can get another job in their field of work so they can provide for their family. Non compete clauses are unethical and

	take away our right to work and we live and work in a right to work state. An individual shouldn't be punished because they made the choice to leave their employer. If people or businesses decide to follow the person that is the choice of the individual or the business. When we interfere w/ decisions preventing individuals or businesses from making their own choice on who they want to do business with we become a dictatorship. We live in the United States of America. The home of the free.....until you sign a noncompete. Corporations large and small will still be successful without non compete clauses because they will be relying on the employees they hire to do their jobs. It is unconstitutional to prevent an individual the ability to work and that is what non compete clauses do. They take away a right that Americans have fought for."
Michael	"As a franchise owner, I had to sign a non-compete agreement initially 9 years ago to acquire my franchise. My contract is up in 2024 and I fully intend on semi-retiring, only working when my health allows it to supplement my income from SS. I would have to move over 40 miles from my territory to avoid prosecution on my non compete agreement, which requires me to build a Client network again. In semi-retirement, I would not be able to atibrd the minimum franchise fees if I decided to continue to work part time. I would have to give up my loyal Clients, forcing them to find my services elsewhere. I believe that this type of agreement serves only the large corporations and franchisors and stifles my continuing contribution to the workforce and to my craft. I support outlawing of non-compete clauses in contracts because of the way it would idle me and individuals like me and keep me from working and paying taxes while providing a service."
Jon	"I think it would be terrible for healthcare to leave physicians out of regulation. CMG s are using non completes to worsens patient care and abuse physicians and other medical staff."
Chad	"I am an optometrist. I have worked at four different practices during my career and have had to sign a noncompete clause at three of them. Their reasoning for the noncompete clause was they didn't want all their patients following the doctor if he or she left. Each time I left I had to move to another town because the noncompete clause prevented me from working in that area, except for the one company that didn't make me sign one. These companies, that were corporate or private, did not want to increase my pay despite having worked there for several years. Even though their fees to patients and insurance went up every year, my salary did not increase. In order to find fair and competitive compensation I was forced to move to another town. The companies with whom I had a noncompete clause were not willing to negotiate my salary because I had no leverage. They knew most people were willing to deal with the lower salary just so they didn't have to move. The one practice that I left that did not require a noncompete clause did just fine after I left despite only moving down the road by 5 miles to another location. Most companies offer doctors a low "base salary" and then offer large bonuses based off work completed or revenue generated. Then these companies will find reasons not to pay the bonuses stating the doctor didn't meet certain requirements but never being willing to show the actual numbers generated and the doctor is left with a low base salary. They know that most doctors don't want to uproot their families and they're willing to take the chance that those doctors will stay and just deal with a lower salary Taking away the leverage of a noncompete clause will force these companies to negotiate with their employees so that the employees can earn a better wage."

Anne	"Ban non competes. They are forcing us to stay in jobs"
Kristie	"I was layed off and prevented for working in my state for 2 years for any customer facing accounting activity. A whole 2 years of being held back from my chosen profession. An employer should not own employees in this way. We have a right to work."
Regina	"Studies show that ending non-competes would boost wages for countless American workers, one out of five of whom are currently bound by a non-compete. But business interests led by die Chamber of Commerce the main business lobby group in the U.S. are now carrying out a full court press against the ban proposed by FTC Chair Lina Khan. Pass the ban on non-competes."
Sarah	"These non compete clauses, made swoping engineering jobs difficult, locking in more experienced engi eers. These rules are rarely enforced, except if you succeed in competition with the patriarchy or established system. Change brings risk to incumbents, who are incentivized to suppress it. Thus, a key role of government is to ensure efforts to suppress competition are blocked"
Ho	"Forcing non-compete contracts creates problems for consumers seeking good competent care being readily available."
Harry	"As a machinist in the late 70s skills acquired from low paying jobs always had the potential to lead to a higher paying job. One place I worked treated it's top workers so well I once witnessed them bail a gentleman out of the drunk tank to do a job. That's job security. Is it wrong to seek a better life? Or more precisely, life is not fair and employers should evaluate each employee and if valuable pay that employee accordingly and treat them well. Or competition in the workforce makes for better workers?"
Allison	"I've always worked for a small company with small town values. My employers just recently merged with a large corporation. It was a necessity to sip a noncompete agreement so we all still had jobs after the merger. The merger has been a nightmare and had an attorney look over my noncompete I had to sign. It says that if I have a separation of employment with the company, I can not provide the same services I provide now for anyone else or anywhere else for 2 years. I have a family to take care of. I am a CPA and have worked in the industry for 17 years now. It is not right. That basically tells me that if I want to continue to have a job, I HAVE to work for them. That should be against the law! I am completely on board with the FTC cancelling out these agreements. As employees we should have rights."

Buddy	"Non-Compete Agreements should be outlawed. They are unfair and should made illegal. Any active Non-Competes should should be rescinded immediately. Not only do they hurt the worker, but they can also be devastational to their families as well. Especially for those that did not voluntarily choose to leave their employment. Non-Competes prevent growth in many ways. They are bad for the individual, the consumer, and for the economy. They prevent the opportunity for higher wages, new worker opportunities, and new business growth. All of this has an affect on our economy. Both direct and indirect. The potential for increased tax revenues are automatically lost. This loss effects local, state, and federal coffers. Not good."
Barbara	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! Why should workers have to change careers when they want to change a job?"
Dirk	"Please eliminate the non-compete. It is so punitive to workers, and generally is non-negotiable"
Caleb	"I support this! Non compete agreements are an unfair tool used by companies to keep you from personal progress and hinder competition in the markets."
Andrew	"I am a physician in a rural area. There are limited options to practice where I live. The non compete I was forced to sign allows me no other options for gainful employment."
Gregory	"My wife and I are both primary care physicians and have been hurt by. Incomplete clauses that are used by large hospital based systems to not only limit competition, but punish employees when the corporations work requirements change. My wife was hire to work part time as a primary care physician by a large hospital system in Charlotte, NC. After building a successful practice working 3 1/2 Days/week as she was hire to do the company decided that their new requirement was that all providers had to work a full time schedule. With two small kids at home that was not possible. Even though this was different then the job she was hired to do her company held her to her no complete clause and she was out of work for 12 months. They punished us via a noncompete to try to force her to work only for them. At a time of a severe health care provider shortage this is simply manipulative. My current employer is planning on implementing a severe noncompete clause in an effort to keep under paid providers from moving to any potential competition. Primary care providers are in high demand and they bring value and patients to hospital based systems. The hospital systems add little to the physicians skill set or knowledge base. Noncompete clauses typically attempt to make an argument that the employer has made huge investments in the provider, that the provider has made no personal investment in the new job, and in primary care this is simply not true. I requested that my employer reconsider their proposed noncompete clause. The lawyer for the hospital said that if a competitor moved to town they might lose their providers. At the same time a decision was made to NOT implement a pay raise to bring certain providers up to nearly die median pay scale for their specialty. Clearly the noncompete is being used to restrict competitive employment opportunities. As nearly all hospital systems (in states that allow noncompete clauses) both have extreme noncompete clauses in all of their provider contracts and entbrce these, their is an appearance of collusion."

Paul	"I have read and support die proposed rule clmnges. Non-compete clauses are generally detrimental to workers, small start-up businesses, and the economy. This proposal fairly addresses the legitimate concerns of large established organizations that may use non-compete agreements to mitigate their risk, but would prevent the use of such agreements to unfairly extract value from workers and the employment market. Please enact these rules to protect the rights of workers, new businesses, and the economy."
Sanford	"My comments are in support of eliminating "non-compete" agreements....Forcing one of my employees to sign a 3 year agreement was threatening and required an additional non-compete year than the majority of the Hanes Companies management who had 2 year agreements....A company can destroy someone's moral, self-esteem, and confidence after they have signed these types of agreements. In conclusion, non-compete agreements are not needed in a country that has the ability to patent products, designs, and ideas like the United States. There is no doubt these agreements are detrimental to new products, new companies, job growth, tax growth and most importantly the consumer."
David	"I am a Physician Assistant for the last 25 years- I (and more importantly my patients) have been subject to non compete clauses- This has harmed both myself but mostly patients who must drive the (in my case 20 miles) to continue their health care with the provider whom they have chosen and entrusted with theoir lives. The non compete in the medical arena serves to bolster hospitaFhospital organizations control (read money here) over health care providers and patients alike. This is un american, harmful to patients and of course medical personnel's mental health. Ever wonder why the now > 60 % of health care workers want to leave medicine? THis is a primary reason- we cannot strike out on our own or move to a different hospitaloffice without uprooting our families and the families of patients we serve. Non competition clauses further inhibit competition, and serves a corporate interest (again read money here) but is inherently un-american, and isn't how our society works. Please consider ending this practice for the betterment of the american patient, economy, and allow us to "pursue happiness" as the constitution intended."
Nancy	"This rule is a good start -- but only a start. Please also outlaw TRAP requirements as well as NDAs. These are just as restrictive in a supposedly free country. Also, universal healthcare would free up many employees who now feel they must remain due to familial or personal health problems."
JOANN	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them. I have personally witnessed excellent doctors having to move their practice to another town 30+ miles away. Their patients have to decide to choose another doctor or choose to DRIVE longer distance to the physician of their choice."

AARON	"Please, please, please pass this. As a primary care physician in a small community we have seen first hand the challenges and unfair advantages non-competes have on our ability to get and keep medical specialist and primary care physicians we need. Abolishing non competes would help shift the balance to fair market employment and compensation."
Kate	"Non competes have given monopoly healthcare systems power over physicians that are now employed but not allowed to unionize. Consequently they are treating the experts in medicine with the most dedication to training and education The worst. I live in a small town and physicians have to move out of town while disrupting their entire families with 100's of thousands in debt when a hospital system treats them so poorly because they are not allowed to work within driving area. It is cruel and should be absolutely illegal to treat people like this. My own physician had to leave. It isn't good for patients, the community or physicians. Everyone talks about rural healthcare but continues to allow non compete clauses."
Kim	"Non-compete clauses do nothing to promote patient care, and in fact detract from it. I was employed by a practice that insisted on a 50 mile non- compete, which I was able to negotiate somewhat lower, only to find after I started working that the practice was rife with fraud. By that time, I had a healthy and happy panel of patients that I had to leave behind completely. Without the non-compete, I would have been able to carry on making positive impacts for the patients."
Matthew	"Non-competes stifle innovation, violate free enterprise and create pseudo career monopolies for skilled workers. In the spirit of capitalism, they should be abolished."
Mark	"They should be banned. They stifle workers rights in favor of businesses. I am and independent contractor and even I have one. This makes no sense at all. PLEASE do away with non compete agreements!!! I'm trapped and mine even says my employer can sue me. How can this be possible if my skills as an independent contractor would not allow me to put on the table for my family? I'm at a loss."
Sherri	"FINALLY! Highly restrictive No compete contracts are not fair. I work in rural America. I can be abused in my job and have no choice but to stay ... or move my entire family! I understand restrictions regarding specific propriety information, but years/miles? I definitely support the change!!!"

Stephen	"As a young sales rep at a tv station in 1995, my income was limited by established, senior reps at the station. I was offered a job at a competing station in the same market and doubled my income that year after the switch. I did not have a non compete and most reps at the time did not. When I become a sales mgr at that station several years later, all the reps in the market were forced to agree to non competes. I couldn't hire the talent I needed at my station. Reps couldn't increase their incomes since they were locked into their jobs. I retired in 2020, and I can say conclusively that tv stations are desperate for talented reps in all markets. Non competes have damaged reps incomes and hurt the very station groups that enforce these terrible agreements. They are the single biggest reason talented sales reps overlook media sales. NCs should have been eliminated years ago!"
Susan	"I urge you to eliminate non-compete agreements! My daughter works as an esthetician at a spa where she was asked to sign a non-compete agreement on her first day of work. Her contract stated that if she left the spa within one year, she would have to pay the owner $20,000 for the "training" she received. She receives no paid time off and is "riot-allowed" to take a sick day. She must request her unpaid days off 2 months in advance. Working conditions are tough and she'd like to leave but she would not be allowed to work at another spa anywhere in her current county for 1 year and cannot open her own business for 5 years. This seems so unfair. It allows employers to keep employees from earning a living should they choose to leave a workplace where they are being taken advantage of. All employees should have the freedom to change jobs in order to get ahead or to just maintain their physical and mental health. These employers have their employees handcuffed."
John	"Ban non-compete clauses."
Madison	"As a new business owner, it would be devastating to my company to hire an individual who takes the information and knowledge we share with this employee and they then turn around and use it against our company. Non-competes assure that companies can invest in their employees and provide insider knowledge without fear that this employee will later have the opportunity to take business away from them. It can allow a certain amount of trust between employer and employee. I would be hesitant to hire any worker to invest time, money, and energy teaching them the trade if there isn't any basic protection that would assure my investment isn't going to be taken advantage of or used later against my company."
Kyle	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. It doesn't make sense for fast food workers to have non-compete clauses."

David	"In a country ostensibly centered on a ethic of free association and self-determination, non-compete clauses are anathema to those values and should be put aside."
Alaina	"I am fully on board with this proposal. This would be very helpful to my current situation and provide more opportunities to live a quality life as a yoga teacher."
Gayle	"It is about time that we did something to even the playing field between businesses and workers. Workers give their time and bodies to benefit businesses. And they get stopped from progressing at every stage. This is one small step that the FTC can take to be fairer to those who labor and remain the working poor. We need to do better. This rule needs to pass not."
J	"I fully support a ban on non-compete clauses. My employer has moved most of their manufacturing to Mexico and will most likely close this US plant. A competitor has announced they are opening a facility within the year in our town. Some employees have already been offered higher wages and have gone to work for the new company setting up their factory. My employer is intensely pressuring us to sign a non-compete that would stop us from working for 12 months after we are laid off or give notice. The intention is to retaliate against their competitor. The result is preventing people from being able to work in their trained profession at a competitive wage. The majority of the almost 100 workers impacted make less than $50K a year. This creates a hardship for many. I hired an attorney at my expense to help me understand the document. I am not signing it and am worried about losing my job and health insurance."
Phillip	"I support the elimination of any/all non-compete clauses from employers. Please pass this legislation ASAP!"
Carmen	"I strongly agree with this sentence from your document: 'In the Commission's view, the existing legal frameworks governing non-compete clauses formed decades ago, without the benefit of this evidence allow serious anticompetitive harm to labor, product, and service markets to go unchecked.' My husband worked for John Deere works for 17 years as a welder , and we have great health insurance too, and that represents an example of an American man who contributed to the health of our country and Democracy and both parties benefited. The company was happy to have him, and he was happy and grateful to work there, and felt valued. This needs to be the way things are in our country, in our opinion. Of course he was a UAW union member, which is a different topic, but anything, including non-compete negative affects, which strengthens the fabric of our country needs to change for the better. For some people less fortunate than my husband was, it's more like modern slavery out here than good solid common sense ways of operating, and even though it is improving, when I was talking to people recently who work at our local Walmart, they feel taken advantage of for specific practices such as only being allowed to work 30 hours a week or less so the corporation does not have to provide health insurance for them. So what happens instead? A drain on the U.S. economy because healthcare and privately purchased health insurance are so expensive. Please do

	everything you can, including this, to make our country strong, which includes any support you can give the working citizens. The only thing I would change regarding this specific non-compete clause issue is a document that is less than 216 pages for the public to read and comment on which possibly can achieve the same result as reading 216 pages? thank you so much"
Josh	"The proposed ban on non-compete agreements by the FTC is a step in the right direction towards promoting fair competition and innovation in the job market. Non-compete agreements are often included in employment contracts and restrict employees from working for competitors or starting their own businesses for a certain period of time after leaving their current employer. Such agreements limit employees' career options and hinder their ability to contribute to the economy by starting new businesses or creating new products and services. The proposed ban would promote job mobility, allowing employees to seek better opportunities and employers to attract the best talent. It would also encourage competition among businesses, leading to greater innovation and better services for consumers. Moreover, the proposed ban on non-compete agreements would help to address the power imbalances between employers and employees. Non-compete agreements are often included in employment contracts as a condition for employment, leaving workers with little bargaining power to negotiate the terms of the agreement. The ban would protect employees from being trapped in jobs that are not a good fit, and would also prevent employers from using non-compete agreements to control their workforce. In summary, the proposed ban on non-compete agreements by the FTC would create a fairer job market, promote innovation, and empower employees to pursue better opportunities."
Casey	"I love this! When I was 22 I worked for a company that got sold. I was sold as an employee with the company. DAY 1 the boss came in and told me I sign this complicated contract OR I lose my job. I had no idea what any of it even meant at the time. I just knew that I had bills to pay. My mom's house was in foreclosure 2012 still fall out of 2008 effects... I had no choice. I ended up only being hired to train my replacement and then they let me go just a few weeks later with a warning not to do anything related to the industry for a few years within 100 miles. I had nowhere to go. I ended up moving from NC to Washington DC/Baltimore to start my 1st company. Away from family, friends and support. I could have stayed close and my life would have been much happier. I know I could have been a competitor and done a great job for the community I loved. They knew I was great at what I did but out of fear they denied that so they did not have to work as hard. They actually tried to sue me even still! I had never been so stressed. I was just trying to make a living at 23. I luckily got passed the threats but I know as a now experienced business owner that these contracts are very unfair and used for bad more than good. Competition drive innovation. If you are scared of your employees then you are doing something wrong. I grew my company to be the largest in the nation for the niche market I am in. I sold it in 2021. I know this will have litigation against it. The FTC absolutely has authority here. We need this to pass. I would stand before the entire country and tell my story and explain why this rule is needed. I feel this will only bring positive economic growth. Drive innovation and speed up market changes. Non-competes are predatory and used to extinguish new flames of fresh thinking in an industry. You want to see job creation or higher wages? This is it. Yes YES and YESSSS! - CC"

Carmen	"I am a veterinarian and have worked close to 40 years. I have been an associate and a practice owner. I see no justification for non-competes and in fact feel it hanns the entire profession. Non-competes are pervasive and notoriously difficult to tight. For many years now I have worked for corporations and have watched colleagues both attempt to negotiate non-competes and bear the brunt of legal battles if they attempt to challenge the non-compete. Should you really have to move your entire family to acquire a job? How do I harm a company by working for their competitor?"
Mary Ellen	"I support this proposed rule! Thank you!"
James	"I work in an industry that across my 16 years of work have always required a non compete agreement and they always hung that over my head. I recently had to move 700 miles away to avoid the non compete agreement. Please make non compete agreements illegal and allow employees right to provide for this families. Thank you"
Jeremy	"Please enact this as soon as possible! We are held hostage by non-compete clauses, forcing us to work for companies that don't take care of their people. No one can work a lifetime in one industry and wait a year to switch employers!"
Sean	"I am a physician in a rural underserved area of Appalachia. As has become the trend over the past 2 decades, die hospital system in our area has been acquired by a national for profit hospital system that now has a functional monopoly in our area. Prior to my arrival here, die hospital system had purchased all the physician groups in my specialty giving me no other options for employment. After significant protest, I was forced to sign a non-compete agreement that would bar me from working in a 25 mile radius, which covers all the major hospital systems in our region. If I were to leave my employer, not only would I have to leave my local community, but would have uproot my family from the Western North Carolina region completely. These "non-compete" clauses have become ubiquitous in die healthcare industry. With Hospital systems merging, providers with aggressive non compete clauses must abandon the community that they serve if they chose to leave their employer. This can have devastating effects access to care for patients in a healthcare system that is already severely understaffed. This disproportionately effects rural areas, where there is often only one healthcare employer for a large geographic radius. Healthcare providers feel trapped in their current employment situation, leading to significant burn out that can shorten their carer longevity. Many are forced to retire early or take a prolonged pause in their career when they have no other recourse to combat their employer. I am very much in favor of the proposed "non compete clause rule" and feel that it should be enacted in its current proposed fonn as soon as possible. Applying Non compete clauses to physicians is inappropriate for many reasons. First, these clauses are supposed to encourage corporations to invest in developing their worktbrce. However in healthcare the training and expertise

	required for the job is not provided by employers, rather through the rigorous schooling and post graduate training that providers pursue individually. In the US, physicians are asked to take on massive amounts of debt that can take their entire career to pay back. Second, patient do not seek consultation by a physician because of the corporation that employee diem; they come to a physician due to their individual expertise, bedside manor and reputation in the community. Thirdly, Excluding Physicians from this rule would allow corporations to further control the market, limiting access to care and increasing the cost of healthcare in our country by squelching competition. Patients in rural and underserved areas are already struggling to have access to high quality, affordable healthcare, and non-compete clauses are a large part of the problem. I would ask that non - compete clauses be completely banned from the contracts of all healthcare providers to help stave off the oligopoly within healthcare that I fear is already at our doorstep."
Kathleen	"Many LOW PAYING jobs in the areas of retail and education (tutoring and teaching) that have made me sign non-compete disclosures and shared information regularly with 'competitors' to ensure their workers were trapped where they were. These exploitative companies are also the types of employers who are constantly policing any talk among employees about their rights or right to organize."
John	"Noncompetes limit our ability as physicians to adequately practice how and where we want to. A noncompete is simply a contract that you will work for a hospital system until you retire/die or you will have to up and move your family to another city/state and leave the community and patients that you have been caring for. Hospital systems know this and use this to suppress wages, understaff clinics, and overwork employees. I have seen this first hand in practice and like many others have know way out unless I move 90 miles away. This is not practical and if feasible only increases the cost of healthcare unnecessarily. Noncompetes will lead to more physician burnout and early retirement which we can't afford in our current healthcare climate Banning noncompetes would incentivize hospitals to abide by fair pay practices, encourage healthy competition, incentivize adequate staffing of hospitals/clinics and ultimately lead to better patient care."
Brian	"Non compete clauses are used by hospitals to limit competition and bully physicians into sticking with existing contracts. Please unwind these burdensome, anti completevative practices"
Erik	"Lawyers have banned non-competes across their profession stating that this is necessary to protect individual attorney autonomy and protect the attorney- client relationship. Obviously lawyers are aware of the damage these agreements can cause to society. How are these not banned in similar professions such as Physicians? The doctor-patient relationship is surely equally if not more important to preserve than a relationship with a client. I support this ban across all professions and employment sutuations."

Andrew	"I am writing in support of eliminating non compete clauses from employment contracts. As a practicing physician, I have dealt with this issue first hand, having had to navigate an excessive non compete in order to continue providing care for my local patient base and maintain their continuity of care. The practices argue that this protects their "business" or "intellectual property," but in the medical field, we are dealing with actual patients, who have actual problems. Luckily I have patients who trust me and were willing to follow me to my new location, and most did. Nothing from the old practice translated into the care I had with an individual patient. I did not learn techniques from my practice that influenced how I performed surgery, or cared for patients. Their surgical experience was based on my skill, and die experience at the hospital. In the medical field, these contracts are written just to limit employee options, which does have a direct negative reflection on the patients we are trying to care for. Often, physicians have to choose to completely move from an area because they don't have the financial resources to fight a major healthcare system in a non compete argument. The reality is that in some states (CA), these non compete causes have been illegal for years. it's ridiculous that this would be a state to state difference that only benefits physicians in CA. Obviously the health systems in that state have been able to survive/thrive for many years, even without the protection of a non compete. Obviously in the cases of a coffee barista, having a non compete in effect is ridiculous. I would argue that these tenns also affect higher income earners (physicians), which also has a more significant effect on patient care, which is more vital to the population than being able to get the appropriate venti latte. My thimer practice was basically stealing money from me, but thought they were in a position to continue doing so just because of an onerous non compete clause that I would not want to fight. They were never willing to renegotiate any of my contract because they felt they were in a position of ultimate power, and that I would be forced to move if I wanted to get out. I got to the point where I was willing to fight, and again, basically every patient desired me to continue their care. Interestingly, the old practice even started telling patients to come see me when they couldn't provide the "same care" for them that they advertised they would do after my leaving."
John	"To Whom it May Concern: Thank you for proposing this critical rule change. I am a physician, and non-compete restraints within health care have led to monopsony at my health system, leading to decreased wages across various categories of workers, decreased mobility, and decreased access to care for patients. I am strongly in favor of the proposed legislation, and firmly believe that it will benefit my personal career, the career of my physician and non-physician colleagues, and the community that we serve."
Erica	"I support elimination of non compete clauses to help promote competition and hopefully increase compensation of workers in the US workforce. Iain and employed physician."
Mike	"I support elimination of non-compete clauses to help foster competition and help worker pay in the US labor force. I am an employed physician."

ROBERT	"I fully support the banning of non-compete agreements."
James	"Dear Sir/Madam: I am writing to express my support for banning non-compete clauses nationwide. In this day and age, these clauses tend to bind and bog down the American worker. 'The freedom to change jobs is core to economic liberty and to a competitive, thriving economy,'" said Chair Lina M. Khan. I feel that the workers should be free to change jobs in the same field without the threat of litigation from a former employer for simply continuing employment in said field. By stopping this practice, the FTC estimates that the new proposed rule could increase wages by nearly 1300 billion per year and expand career opportunities for about 30 million Americans. As a worker with another 30+ years ahead of him in the workforce, I hope to see the use of non-compete clauses eliminated in the upcoming vote. Thanks,"
Chris	"I work as a general dentist in a private practice owned by one other dentist, in the heart of a very desirable town to live and work. Due to the appeal of living in this town, the associateship opportunities were so thin that this was the only open position within 30 minutes of town when I began applying for an associateship position. However, along with my contract came a non-compete clause which bars me from practicing within 8 miles of my current practice within 2 years of discontinuing my associateship. The clause specifically points out that it doesn't matter who ends the associateship or for what reasons; regardless, I'm unable to practice dentistry within 8 miles of this town for 2 years after departure from the practice. Once you travel —3-4 miles outside of the heart of this town, the population density becomes drastically thinner until you quickly reach very rural areas that would be difficult to start a new, successful dental practice. The owner of the practice I work for has no desire to bring me on as a financial partner/part-owner, as he and his wife handle every aspect of the operations behind the clinical scene. So as long as I continue working for this practice, I will continue to be an associate and will never have the opportunity to become a partner, which would substantially increase my income and allow for personal growth in my career. I am a proponent of banning non-compete clauses for situations similar to my own. While it may be true that a small handful of patients may decide to follow me to a new practice if I ever leave my current practice, the effect this would have on the owner of my current practice would be substantially smaller than the effect the non-compete clause has on my career growth and income potential. Dental patients almost always stay with the practice they're comfortable with, especially when the doctors staying on board have a much longer history of treating the patients at that practice. The tangible effects on my current practice, even if I moved directly across the street and started a brand new practice, would be very minor, and inconsequential in the short-to-medium term. The harsh subclauses prevent any escape from this non-compete clause, regardless of cause for departure. Please continue forward with banning these clauses."
Amanda	"I signed a non-compete clause with my former employer that is now limiting my ability to get a new job. The employer, Ross Stores, proposed the non-compete in a year that I would not be receiving my regular bonus pay, something that I relied on for income. It was at the peak of COVID when many retail employees

	were terrified of losing their jobs. Let's just say it was management's full-time role to ensure their employees signed it. Every discussion was about whether or not we had signed it yet, and they wanted us to do it ASAP. I was afraid that if layoffs happened I would be the first to go if I didn't sign the agreement. Now I am no longer with the company and have started my own small business, and the fear of this non-compete hangs over my head. I don't really understand what I am legally obliged to and no one has taken the time to let me know. I worked hard for that company for seven years and now I feel unemployable in my new location because of this clause. Giant corporations shouldn't restrict their employees' ability to advance their own careers. Please ban non-compete clauses."
Nicholas	"As a physician I have seen how noncompete contracts have negatively effected patient care. If a doctor wants to leave a hospital or a practice they often have to leave the area all together. This has happened in my area where a hospital was bought out and doctors had to make a commitment to a new employer with the risk that if it was not a good fit they would have to leave our area to find another job. The new owners of the hospital where operating with unsafe practices. Doctors would typically leave to not risk their license and to not promote unsafe care, but they risked up rooting their kids from their schools, spouses from their job, leaving their family, friends, and church. Doctors should be able to practice where their is need not based on what is going to protect corporate healthcare profit. People over profits"
Dinah	"I really like banning the non- compete clause for workers, this protects their choice to work where they want. If it is a good employer you wouldn't leave. Poor work environments cause this. Non-combat ban protect employees Dina Duckworth"
Daniel	" As a hospital physician I have no personal patients. I admit and see whoever shows up. Rest assured in the 20 years I've been doing this and after seeing many thousands of patients not one has said they come the that specific hospital just to see me. Yet the hospital makes us sign a non-compete clause. I have no proprietary information to bring to another competing hospital. Medicine is medicine. Yet hospitals continue to force non competes. Why? Ownership. They want to own doctors. They want to force them to follow their rules or risk having to find work in a different field or else upend their family and move or drive for hours all in the name of control. This isn't legal and must end now! My last non compete was for two years. I had no proprietary information on how the hospital was run, logistics, billing, coding, etc. after I left I asked a year into the non compete to be let out. They refused and threatened a law suit against me. This is about control of the market. Control of compensation. Keeping doctors in jobs they aren't happy with lest they upend their family. I'm happy to talk further about it and my experience as a doctor that has worked in three states and in over 25 hospitals."
Lynne	"Protection of industry secrets is sensible, total noncompetes is nonsensical. People must be able to change jobs without excessive restrictions."

Vaibhavkumar	"I am in strong support of banning non compete. It only benefits big corporations, since they can buy out skilled or trained employees from small business if they want even though small business may have non compete. But cannot be true the other way around, since small business doesn't have that type of extra money. And once this is allowed, the employees have no choice but to accept that in their contract as there is no other option... During pandemic in June 2020 a corporation " cone health" decided to end their contract with other corporate " sound physicians" for hospitalist services at their hospital in Burlington, North Carolina. 18 doctors, 2 nurse practitioner and 3 office staff worked for sound physicians at this hospital. This was a " very good time" for hospital to make this move due to "very less" work secondary to pandemic....And in that "slow business season" hospital can wait to hire and replace the whole team in few months. Usually it is very difficult task, since this work never stops and even difficult to hire 20%of your staffs at a time if left vacant. Now the corporate greed comes to surface. As not going to be employed by sound physician group, physicians reach to hospital management for job, since they are in need of doctors... Sound physicians company wouldn't release them of non compete clause so they can't work within 20 miles of that place for 2 years or with that employer at other place. Most of the team had to relocate at other places. Sound physician company was having only one other place contracting in the whole state at Rocky Mount,NC and didn't have any openings. They offered to continue to employ them if they move out of state to their other places: but wouldn't release Noncompete without money... Please ban non compete."
Bryan	"I think this is long overdue. Employers have been using Non-Competes as leverage against employees for too long. Now all employees that are being held back from bettering themselves have nothing to fear if this is approved"
WESLEY	"As someone who has seen first hand the weaponization of noncompete clauses by employers against employees, I support a blanket ban on their enforcement. Non-compete clauses were born out of sensitive trade secrets, and have now evolved into simply a tool to allow modern day servants. As someone with a blue collar background, I have seen people with 0 trade secrets drug through court and sued by employers. These people were not making enough money to survive, and were doing what they had to for their family. Their ex-employer rewarded their sacrifice by driving them into bankruptcy with summary judgements and legal fees. Before anyone says "noncompetes are managed by the states and often aren't enforceable" they should understand just how these corporations use the judicial system. Sure, if you fought a non-compete suit as an employee you would probably win, in many situations. However, you would spend tens of thousands of dollars on legal fees to do it. I ask you, what common citizen has that much money to fight an employer? All non- competes should be ruled invalid"
Ashley	"As a physician working under a noncompete, I beg you to eliminate noncompetes. If I decide to pursue other employment, I will be required to uproot my family (including four children). I would hate to leave my community based on this archaic rule. Please consider that non-competes eliminate good, healthy competition in areas of our country, and greatly affect healthcare."

Oscar	"These agreements are overused by corporations and limit individual citizens right to work and support themselves. The existing trade secret and Intellectual property protections existing already protect companies information. These agreements are used solely to limit employees ability to seek alternative employment."
Jessica	"I strongly believe in the FTC taking action on the non-compete regulations that are in place. In the past, these regulations at my previous employers prevented me from growing my career and earning more income for myself and my family. As a single mom, this is a critical issue for me and my family. Please make changes to this horrendous rule. Thank you for supporting the public in this matter."
Laura	"Good day, I am an Emergency Physician who travels for work. I live in the Asheville, NC area. I have been greatly affected by non-compete clauses in several of my prior positions. Employers and employees are hampered by such clauses. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Beth	"The whole idea of Non-Compete contracts is ridiculous. Corporations and franchises base their whole existence on free-market competition. How is it that the American Worker should be hamstrung by this limitation?"
Beth	"What do Non-Compete agreements do? Only give the employer an unfair advantage over the employee and take away the primary tool the employee has to better his lot. This allows the employer to trap workers in stagnant wages and positions, while reaping the benefits of their work, kind of like slavery."
Ryan	"To whom it may concern, I am a young physician just starting in my career. I have a non-compete as is "standard in the industry". I also have a young family and hundreds of thousands of dollars of medical school debt. I fully support the prospects of making non-compete agreements obsolete as this would boost competition and allow workers increased opportunity. This would also improve the economy and the worker's rights environment as a whole. Additionally, before medical school I had a small business that had a non-compete clause for its employees. Even with that background and knowing that non-compete agreements help businesses (big and small) maintain their employees, I feel a shift towards pushing those employers to focus on compensation and benefits to keep their employees provides a greater good. Thank you for your time."
John	"I completely support the effort to ban non-compete clauses. I've been in a new job less than 2 months and feel trapped. What about an escape option from bad work conditions? My non-compete is effective for a year after termination."

Richard	"I believe this clause will further our industry, economy, and markets in a positive and meaningful way. This clause would reinstate the competitive nature of our workforce, and incentivize companies to innovate, explore, and capture the right talent to join their ranks. This clause would allow millions to freely move to better, more advantageous companies that offer higher pay, and allow many young aspiring workers entering into the workforce to adapt to a more competitive environment in order to secure their future from the start. The American Dream can only become possible if the non-compete diminishes!"
Meg	"I have worked for a company for 7 years. The company has recently been bought out and I've been "forced" into signing a non compete. I have spent 7 years learning this industry and now will be stuck here or will need to find a completely new industry to work in. Non competes are not for those of us trying to support our families, it is only for big business. It is unacceptable. Please get rid of non competes."
John	"Non competes are outdated and need to be banned. There's nothing worse than being stuck in a position because you are only allowed to use your talents for 1 specific employer."
Justin	"I strongly support the proposed ride to ban non-compete clauses. Non-competes depress labor market competition by making it challenging to switch employers. This depresses wages and inhibits employers that treat workers well from accessing the best talent. As a student in a high-tech field, I am particularly excited about this proposal's potential to unlock latent innovative capacity, giving disruptive employers a chance to recruit top talent and forcing large companies to offer stability and interesting work. I believe this will contribute to the development of some of the technologies we will need as a species to weather the disruptions caused to humanity by climate change and environmental degradation."
T	"I am faced with the same as an Emergency Physician . I do not agree with this. It limits where I work and it hinders others from hiring me when they are in need."
Matt	"This is a GREAT piece of legislation. My wife is a Physicians Assistant and works for a private company that has a non compete for one year after leaving. The enforcement area is huge and they simply use it as a tool to keep people in place. They won't negotiate salaries with any real intention and when people try to leave they call upon the non compete and try to scare people into staying. It's just a scam to keep pay low and not be too worried about keeping excellent working conditions. Thank you for proposing this and I hope it happens!"
Janet	"I agree that non compete clauses need to go away. The American worker has been feeling used and abused during and since the pandemic. "The great resignation" and subsequent rise of employees embracing unions should show all corporations that we are tired of the boots on our necks and  pay while shareholders and CEO's make profits hand over fist. Eliminating the non compete clauses would go a long way to give the average hard working American a feeling of security and trust in their company and perhaps even cut down on union building efforts if employees are allowed to change jobs that aren't working for them. Nobody wants to feel trapped."

Sam	"I am a large proponent of this bill. Please do all you can to make this a reality. Would be a big game changer for employees and help encourage economic growth. Good for you guys taking the initiative on this. :) Very pleased"
John	"As an employee bound to a non-compete agreement I can testify that the non compete agreement has prevented me from increasing my annual income of an additional $501c a year. What is makes these unfair is like in my situation the non-compete agreement was not a condition of employment nor a condition of a promotion. The company I work for terminated a manager, that manager accepted employment from a competitor. When this occurred my employer mandated we sign a no compete in order to keep our employment. I consulted an attorney and was advised if I needed to maintain my current job I had no choice but to sign the no compete."
Kristin	"In favor of this. As both a manager trying to hire staff and also a worker myself, the freedom and flexibility to have talent and skill sets be used where best fit is a wonderful change to see coming."
Drew	"I work in sales management with 6 direct reports covering die entire US Eastern seaboard. As a distributor, wee represent 30+ manufacturers and sell to more than 700 customers in my region alone (well over 3000 across the entire US). My non-compete prohibits me for a period of 24 months 'post separation' from my current company from working for any of our suppliers, or from working for any direct competitor (we have at least a few dozen that would fall in this cateogy), and from even speaking professionally to any of the customers I or anybody on my team has dealt with during my entire tenure with the company. It's restrictive to say the least. Recently I have been looking for new opportunities, both to expand my skillset within my industry, and to seek higher wages to support my family. There have been at least two companies that were interested until they saw my non-compete, and then declined to interview me based on that document alone. Fortunatley I still have a job, but the non-compete agreement has made seeking new employment challenging."
Amelia	"It is vital to our healthcare system that noncompete clauses do not limit physicians. Physicians hold no trade secrets and practice independently. Non competes exist only to limit physician to patient relationships outside of a branded healthcare entity. It exists to stop negotiating and stifle benefits and competition."
K	"As a physician , I strongly support the proposed measure to ban non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses for physicians only protect the profits of large health care systems. It is otherwise unethical for the employed physicians and their patients. These causes force physicians to uproot their families and leave their beloved patients if they ever need to leave a toxic work environment. Many patients can be left without a physician since their physician had to move outside of a certain radius so as not to violate the non-compete clause. These non-compete clauses also stifle negotiations and bargaining, and continue to perpetuate the abuse that health care systems can impose on their employees."

Jackie	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. I face enough hardships and employee/owner power imbalance in employment as it is, I don't need this limitation as well, and I consider banning non- competes and even going further to ensure liberty from coercion by further limiting the power of employment contracts in general. This is a good and concrete first step, and I support that. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements, Don't stop there either. Sincerely, Jackie Fox Ocean Isle Beach, NC 28469"
Carl	"I am in favor of banning non-compete clauses and I don't believe pre-existing contracts with non-competes should be grandfathered in. These clauses inhibit competition in die labor market, suppress wages, and prevent basic freedom of movement in our country."
A	"I am a registered nurse that due to back injury during a patient transfer would have to switch specialties. Since I'm working for an agency, I had to sign a contract that said that for a year after tennination I would have to not work 50 miles away from the hospital where I was injured. There's a hospital 2 miles away from said hospital but the closest one besides that is 80 miles away. That would mean that not only I lost my job but I also have to move my entire family to a different state in order to continue working as a nurse. Please change this law for die sake of the average working people"
S. Madisom	"As a new pediatric ophthalmologist, I have been recently interviewing for my first "real" job at the age of 30. I have spent die last 5 years living separately from my husband due to the life of a resident / fellow and the match system (he is currently a fellow as well). Now, as a I am offered contracts most contracts include non-competes ensuring that if I leave my first job ever, I either must leave the city (most cut out the whole metropolitan area and beyond) or pay between 300 and 400 thousand dollars. As we will be starting our family in the next several years— my first job choice seems to determine if we will get to stay in the city that we would like to live in— or if once again we will need to move across the country to find work. My education of non- competes is admittedly lacking for all occupations, but surely few other occupations have such large and restrictive non-competed as physicians."
M	"I commend this proposal as it will improve access to care while broadening opportunities for practicing clinicians. Dr. M. Lucas"
Kathryn	"Yes, please ban non-compete clauses"
Michael	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. My wife and I's career growth and even mental health

	have been directly impacted by onerous non-competes. Several years ago my wife left her employer, Red Ventures, and when Red Ventures found out she had interviewed (not worked, interviewed) with a firm being run by someone with a personal dislike for the Red Ventures CEO the non-compete clause was used as a guise for harassment...All because they knew they had far deeper pockets and legal expertise than my wife and were quite willing to use that in order to intimate her, damaging both her career and the would-be new employer. Over the years I've heard countless similar stories, always told 'off the record' due to employees fear of an employer taking legal action. In my experience non-competes PRIMARY purpose is employee intimidation which creates a highly distorted labor market and is antithetical to the virtues of our capitalist system. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Vanitha	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. The present institution that I work for will not allow me to moonlight with other institutions as a physician even if I purchase my own malpractice coverage. Therefore, I am enslaved by the below market value my institution pays. They make the claim that my freedoms are intact and that all we have to do is get approval from leadership to moonlight elsewhere. Leadership always rejects these requests and we are left constrained by the motives of the healthcare institution imprisoning us. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Janet	"I agree that non compete clauses need to go away. The American worker has been feeling used and abused during and since the pandemic. "The great resignation" and subsequent rise of employees embracing unions should show all corporations that we are tired of the boots on our necks and shiny pay while shareholders and CEO's make profits hand over fist. Eliminating the non compete clauses would go a long way to give the average hard working American a feeling of security and trust in their company and perhaps even cut down on union building efforts if employees are allowed to change jobs that aren't working for them. Nobody wants to feel trapped."
Sean	"I would very much be in FAVOR of a ban on Non-Compete clauses in contracts. They are held over workers in my industry, with a threat of lawsuits the employee would be difficult to defend, mainly due to cost. As a doctor, we are sometimes forced to move from an area, with our families and children in school, due to the limiting of options and restrictions from these Non-competes. It gives companies the authority to treat us as poorly as they wish, unless we wish to resign and leave an area. Even if we decide not to sign a new contract, we have been banned from earning a living in the area we often live and our children go to school. I look forward to this passing and the end of Non-compete clauses in all contracts."

Donald	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Non-compete agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with higher non-compete agreements suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements I am encouraged by your work to ban non-compete agreements. Please issue a final rule that bans non-compete agreements."
Gil	"I am strongly against non-competes. They should not be allowed in healthcare. As a physician if I would like to change jobs I would have to uproot my family and move to another city in order to remain employed and provide care. Patients inevitably suffer as well as they lose access to their doctor. Local communities also suffer due to loss of a potential healthcare practitioner. The only entity that benefits from non competes are the employer. It's a one-sided and profoundly unfair power balance. It leads to abuse of employees as they know that they have no option other than to stay in a bad job or move to another city. Extremely unethical. Please ban them from healthcare."
Jamiellah	"Non-Competes are used to scare and stifle employees from moving on. Most of the time the employees are not executive-level and are not running off with trade secrets or a client list. Companies use non-competes to bully and this they should be illegal and unenforceable at the federal level."
D	"I am strongly in favor of the proposed rule. I am in an industry that frequently has up to 3 year noncompetes globally. It is ridiculous and unfair, and anti-competitive. 3 year noncompetes for all workers are insane. Even relatively "good" firms will give you 1 year."
William	"Employed physicians, particularly in academics and nonprofit hospitals are an important class of workers that need to be rid of non compete clauses. The current environment discourages hospitals from investing in patient care."
Shekinah	"I am writing because I hope that physicians, and therefore our patients, will benefit from inclusion in the NPRM. While hospital systems are classified as not for profit, it is unfortunate that a profit motive is seen clearly in their decision making. Physicians want to stay in their jobs. Yet, there is little that we can do to ensure fair working conditions to make this possible. Our working conditions are the healing conditions for patients and when they are harmful, it's patients that are harmed. Non-compete agreements mean that physicians are often trapped in unfair and unhealthy working conditions, or forced to leave communities and patients entirely by leaving medicine for roles that are not only more lucrative but allow them to stay with their families Physicians deserve to be included in the NPRM rule regardless of where we are employed. The leverage it provides will ensure that hospitals are improved, more physicians are retained, and patients benefit."

D	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements. As a physician psychiatrist, I have witnessed first hand how healthcare organizations bully physicians with non-competes that lead to a huge restriction in access to care for entire communities. Non-competes are a way for big corporations to take advantage of those with less resources, creating situations that cause negative impact to individuals and entire communities."
Suz	"Non-compete agreements should not be allowed in the health care field. It limits the freedom of patients to see the provider of their choice. This is also true for mental health professionals in addition to other health care workers. Voting against non-compete clauses protects the therapeutic relationship that is vital to the patient's mental health care and can take months to solidify. Non-compete agreements are an outdated practice and in our times today are unethical and unAmerican."
Peter	"I am a pediatrician in Charlotte, NC. Two health systems (Atrium and Novant) employ almost every pediatrician and both systems have non compete clauses in their employment contracts. These two systems have all the leverage in insurance contracts so it is not financially feasible to practice primary pediatrics without working for one of the two systems. If I were to try and leave my health system I am prohibited from working for 12 months within 15 miles of my practice. The effect of this practice is that doctors have to stay with one of the health systems and have little leverage in any negotiations regarding working conditions or else they will be faced with loss of employment x 12 months. You can try to move to the other system but would be forced to practice in a different area x 12 months which effectively disrupts established patient-doctor relationships and access to care for patients. The systems claim that they have invested in our professional development with unique and proprietary health delivery models necessitating non compete clauses but in reality our professional training and development occurred during medical school and residency, not with these large health systems. As systems nationwide merge and become larger they create monopolies that control doctors and the end result has become less patient access, disruption of doctor patient relationships and less personal healthcare. Eliminating non compete clauses would force the systems to respond to physician concerns, re- instill competition, and empower doctors to seek employment that best serves the doctor and patient, which after all should be the center of healthcare, not the interests of corporations! The public good is best served by physicians having the freedom to practice without being controlled by corporations incentivized solely by profits. Next, the government should eliminate "non-profit" tax status for these mega health systems that pay their CEO's multimillion dollar salaries and invest the tax revenue in making Medicare and Medicaid more financially stable. DO not increase payroll taxes on hard working Americans to shore up government funded health care, just tax corporations that have been enriching their administrators by evading taxes under a non profit disguise!"
Marguerite	"Veterinary Non Compete agreements are unfairly restrictive to veterinarians and their families, their communities, and to animal owners. Animal owners have the right to seek treatment from the veterinarian of their choice. Veterinary practices

	should rely on goodwill generated in the community among animal owners rather than non-compete agreements. Veterinarians should be able to treat animals that need help, wherever they are. They should not be subjected to the undue hardship of having to find employment outside of their community with expensive, long commutes to another area, or of having to move from an area in which they have roots in the community, where spouses and family may be employed and children may be in school. I have known several veterinarians whose work and lives were impacted severely and unfairly by non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements stifle the industry by limiting innovation, competition, and freedom of movement. They also result in substantial anxiety and fear of litigation in many veterinarians who have entered such agreements as a requirement of their employment. Corporate practices are increasingly pushing the limits of geographical area and length of term on non-compete agreements in order to wield control over employees who may find better practice environment elsewhere. AVMA's Principle VII states that veterinarians must be able to choose the environment in which they practice veterinary medicine. This principle suggests that veterinarians should be free to leave a practice in which they do not believe they can provide care that is consistent with their ethical beliefs. Where a non-compete agreement is in place, the veterinarian before leaving such a practice environment must consider: What would I do if the job does not work out? Will I be able to commute to a different job? Will I be forced to move? Is my family in a situation to move if that happens? Veterinary non-compete agreements are not ethical and should be banned."
Taylor	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. I myself have dreamed for years to start my own data analysis firm but cannot due to my idea being too closely related to the work that I do in my current job where I have a non-compete. Despite my years of experience and research, and working for a firm that does not care about any of my ideas, I cannot begin this business venture until 2 years after leaving that firm. Proposing this ban on non-competes would allow me the opportunity to start my business as soon as possible which will ultimately contribute to the local economy"
Ashley	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the use of non-compete clauses in contracts for healthcare providers. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to take action to prohibit the use of non-compete clauses in contracts for physicians. Such a prohibition would help to ensure that patients have access to the care they need, and would promote competition in the healthcare industry. These clauses or restrictive covenants unduly restrict employed or contracted providers from practicing medicine within a certain geographic area and/or for a specified period of time after leaving a practice or other employment situation. This can lead to loss in income and instability for healthcare providers and their families. The use of non-compete clauses in physician contracts is harmful to the physicians and the patients they serve. Physician non-competes limit the mobility and job opportunities of physicians, and can prevent them from providing consistent care to patients in need. This leads to shortages of physicians in certain areas, and can make it difficult for patients to find the care they need. Furthermore, non-compete clauses in physician contracts can limit competition, which can lead to higher healthcare costs for patients. By limiting the number of physicians in a given area, non-competes can also limit the number of choices that patients have when selecting a healthcare provider."

Ryan	"I agree, please discontinue Non Compete agreements. It has the potential to restrict myself from starting a new business our community needs!"
Peter	"I support the elimination of the non-compete. There already trade-secrets, NDA, and IP assignments to protect my employer, their stuff, and the fact that I know how to build their stuff. The non-compete just limits me though, burning my bridges for me before I ever reach them."
Meenal	"Strongly oppose non-compete clause. In urban and rural areas physicians and physician extenders should be able take care of patients where ever the need is. Healthcare is dwindling in the number of providers when compared to the population growth (20% of population over 65 by 2030). We need to understand how care will improve with non-competes. For reference, some academic institutions don't have non-competes. They don't offer more than fair market value salaries, but yet are able to retain physicians based on the work conditions and other leverage. Often they are amazing places to work. Non-competes are unfair to highly trained professional, such as physicians, limiting their ability and will to provide care where needed."
Doctor	"As an MD in anesthesia group owned by private equity firm I can state that noncompete is the only thing keeping me working for them. It's a 30 mile radius noncompete clause precluding me working in any nearby medical facility. PE is banking on us not being willing to relocate and truly I can't until my daughter is done with school. What an evil!!! PE firms taking generous amount of our money without contributing zero value. Patients indirectly paying for all of that, if you think about it. Patient care suffers greatly since the only thing PE do well is cutting care and staffing ratios to improve their reimbursement. Noncompetes must be banned! It's a free market and hospitals actually will benefit from it too."
Royce	"I am an emergency medicine physician and have been negatively impacted by non-compete clauses. I worked in an area under a non-compete contract that would have required me and my family to move if I switched employers. This essentially meant I had no options at all and had to work under whatever conditions and wages my employer decided. Eliminating this rule would have allowed for a rural market competition and less unfair employment conditions."
Mag	"Doctors have worked long and hard to care for patients. And the reward? Non-compete clauses that force us to stay in jobs that abuse our time and energy. We deserve to work freely with the right to change jobs without fear of non-compete. We are not indentured servants. We deserve freedom of choice."

Chris	"Non competes should be dropped for healthcare workers including physicians regardless of salary earned or employer (non profit vs for profit). Having physicians forced to leave an area can disrupt therapeutic relationships and create significant costs to the healthcare system as patients struggle to re-establish care with a new doctor....Non compete clauses create artificial and unnecessary disruptions in the physician/patient relationship. In addition, non compete clauses can exacerbate physician shortages. I live and practice in such an area and have seen doctors leaving unnecessarily because of non compete clauses making it hard to meet patient demands for care."
Zeni	"I strongly support the ban of non-compete clause. Non-compete prevents competitions to allow patients to get the best care available. Shortage of physicians already make appointment time months in advance, limiting medical access. Noncompete also allows big health system to monopolize the health market while suppressing the establishment of independent physicians to serve the communities they are already in"
Hakim	"Agree with banning non compete clause. It goes against a market economy"
Brian	"As a physician, I wholeheartedly support the abolishment of non- compete clauses for physicians nationwide."
Chai	"Ban non compete clause"
E	"There is already a legal tool available to business owners to deter the disclosure of corporate secrets, it is called the Non-Disclosure Agreement (NDA). Business owners do not ALSO need to shackle workers to a non-compete agreement. Competition benefits the consumer; forced non-compete agreements only benefit the business owner, and they also work contrary to the establishment of a fair and free marketplace. Please vote to ban the use of non-compete agreements as a requirement to employment."
Cindy	"As someone affected by a noncompete agreement, I have experience the ay/fill difficulty of finding a new job. Employers want individuals with industry experience, and the non-compete bars, those of us with experience from earning a livelihood. I can't tell you how difficult it has been trying to find a job. I finally Obtain one at a 32% decrease in pay. Not to mention worst benefits. I cannot vocalize how difficult this has been on me and my family, the sleepless nights, the anxiety and the stress. This is caused all because of the noncompete. I know for a fact, as competitors did offer me positions if I could get out of the noncompete. I have no issues with signing a nondisclosure agreement to keep trade secrets. But die noncompete prohibits those of us that want to earn a living to find income and employment in the industry we know and love. I hope Congress will act and illuminate the restrictions, placed on individuals who want to work, but are prohibited because of non-complete clauses"

Valerie	"Non-competes prevent freedom to work and should be prohibited. I support this proposed regulation to prohibit non-compete clauses. Thank you."
Robert	"I have been a physician employed for 16 years at a hospital-based practice. Our noncompete prevents us from practicing within 30 miles of any of 16 locations for two years. Even though this may not be enforceable in court the corporation has voiced the opinion that they would bankrupt any physician trying to fight this in court, with legal fees. This policy would in effect, force us to move away from our patients who we have treated for many years and deny them continuity of care for corporate profit. Hospitals claim they need the noncompete to protect them from losing training costs and recruitment cost. Past majority of physicians take out loans to cover their medical school and residency costs prior to obtaining any position that requires noncompete. The only training usually provided would be on that specific hospital standard operating procedures. This is not something that the physician could use to get another job as that hospital would have to train them on their policies. As far as recruitment costs go, all businesses that do not use non-competes are required to treat and compensate their employees so that they do not want to leave. Requiring employees to stay by contractual agreement is evidence that this is a unfair practice, otherwise why would it be required. Preventing physicians from working at other hospitals/clinics inflates the cost of care to patients and the government. Private practice physicians charge much less for the same procedures performed in office versus hospital outpatient departments for the same procedure, The hospital outpatient procedure is usually a office in the hospital office building, providing an identical environment at 2-3 times the cost. Physicians have no proprietary information regarding the hospital's financial information. For the most part the hospital has not paid for any of the training or education of the physician. The noncompete in the healthcare scenario, is simply to limit trade and prevent workers from obtaining fair market value for their services."
Thomas	"Non-competes are not perfect. In fact, most of them are used putatively, without merit. But plenty of others are necessary to protect proprietary information. It is definitely a matter that needs attention, and even regulation, but not a binary solution."
David	"As a small town attorney in a county where working for a lawyer is a somewhat coveted position because of its access to people in power and its 'bankers' hours," I would like to comment on what a ban on non-compete agreements would mean to small/solo law firms in smaller communities. I instituted non-compete agreements, as a solo attorney, because of the predatory behavior of older, more well-established attorneys who would steal good employees. As a solo attorney who was looking for a person of good character with a good work ethic that could be trained, I was less concerned with prior experience, education, or contacts than I was the aforementioned traits. Consequently, I trained my first assistant when I was still attempting to establish myself. She has been my best employee I have ever had because of the time dedicated to her training. She helped me establish many of the client handling systems that I still use twenty years later, she networked well with our local judicial staff, other law offices,

	clerks, and our clients and their families. She learned a lot and offered a lot to me and my young firm. All of this was while continuing to increase her salary and giving her a new marketable trade. Numerous attorneys tried to hire her out from under me with offers of better pay, more time off, etc. But for her loyalty, my time and effort training her, introducing her to innumerable contacts, and helping her to establish a good name would have been in vain and my business would have suffered tremendously. It was after that experience that I instituted non-compete agreements. Smaller businesses cannot compete with larger, well- established businesses all the time and a non-compete agreement that is not unconscionable is not an insurmountable hindrance. The non-compete that I have had employees sign is a stand-alone document that is for a duration of three years and a radius of fifteen miles. Additionally, when I have hired well- established legal assistants with their own reputation locally, I have not had those persons execute non-compete agreements because the firm was not offering them anything exceptional to add to their resume. In support of some common sense, however, I do believe that employees should be made well aware of the fact that, by accepting employment with ABC company, employee is restricting employee's options for employment thereafter. I have always ensured that is done by a clearly labelled stand-alone document. No employer should be permitted to deceive potential employees. Adding to the common sense theme, as well, I believe that minimally skilled labor positions where employers are offering little to no training or experience should not be permitted to bind those in the most need of opportunities who are applying for these positions out of necessity. All in all, I believe that this interferes with my ability as a small businessperson to negotiate contracts with individuals meaningfully while still protecting my small business' ability to remain competitive, a violation of my First Amendment rights. While I may not be able to offer all the salary and perks of my larger competitors, I will give someone a chance that a larger employer will not. This regulation allows the larger employers the opportunity to then interfere with my business by hiring the person in whom I invested so much time and training I think this regulation defeats the very purpose for which it is intended."
Jack	"Non-competition clauses are an important tool that businesses use to protect their business and their intellectual property. It appears that the intent of the FTC for the current rule is to prevent companies from unfairly restricting economic activity (i.e. unfairly restricting workers from being able to make a living). Non-competition clauses are generally disfavored as they are viewed as a restriction of an individual's ability to freely participate in commerce. Courts typically weigh the business necessity of the non-competition clause with the right of an individual to make a living. Many times there are less restrictive means to protect a business's intellectual property and customer lists (non-disclosure agreements and non-solicitation agreements are two such less restrictive means). However, there are times that a non-competition agreement is not only appropriate but promotes commerce. Specifically, non-competition agreements should be specifically allowed (via a safe-harbor provision in the final Rule) in the event they cover business owners who are selling all (or substantially all) of their business to another party. In this example, if a buyer of a business is unable to ensure that the seller will agree to not compete, it is highly likely that buyers will determine business purchases are much riskier than they are now (and they are already

	risky), and this would suppress mergers and acquisitions (and thus economic activity). Therefore, the FTC should include a specific exception in the rule and allow non-competition agreements to be effective for owners who sell their business to another. Non-competition agreements are also important and necessary to protect a business in the event its highly paid executive level employees leave the business. In this example, some executive level employees are highly paid and as part of their incentive package, they are offered a golden parachute. These workers have a greater level of bargaining power than non-executive level employees, and also have more information and a greater overview of the business. If these executives are able to leave the business and immediately start competing with their former employer, the business would most likely be damaged. Therefore, the FTC should provide a safe-harbor in the final rule allowing businesses to enter into non-competition agreements with highly compensated executives for the duration of any agreed upon severance agreement/golden parachute. The non-competition agreement would terminate at the same time that the severance agreement/golden parachute terminates. Finally, regarding franchises, the FTC should allow non-competition agreements for a certain period of time (i.e. 6 months) in the event a franchise agreement is terminated due to no fault of the franchisor. If the franchisor terminates the franchise agreement/fails to extend the franchise agreement, then the non-competition agreement should not take effect (unless the termination was "for cause"). However, if the franchisee terminates the franchise agreement or if the franchise agreement is terminated for cause, then a non-competition agreement with a limited geographic scope and a six month duration should be allowed. Without allowing such an agreement, the FTC may discourage companies that offer franchises from participating in this commercial activity (i.e. it could have a "chilling effect"). Further, the FTC should consider that any individual that negotiates with a franchisor to be a sophisticated investor. In conclusion, the FTC should pass a rule banning non-competition agreement for ordinary workers as non-competition agreements do restrict commerce and ordinary workers lack the bargaining power to push back against non-competition agreements. However, the Rule should have specific exceptions and safe-harbors for non-competition agreements affecting owners who sell their own businesses, franchisees, and highly paid executives with a golden parachute. The FTC should consider additional exceptions in the event the two parties have equal bargaining power. The reason for these exceptions is that individuals who have more bargaining power than ordinary workers should be allowed to freely contract and make bargains with potential employers. By enacting the non-compete clause rule with such exceptions, the FTC will be promoting commerce. Yours truly, Jack T. Brock II, Esq."
Bob	"I would suggest a legal time limit like 12 or 24 months. Some jobs require you learn trade secrets that possibly made that company successful and is proprietary to the company. (the recipe for Coca cola, or Pancake syrup for example) Without a non compete clause they could possibly share that knowledge through a new job at a competitors company."

Kenneth	"Non-competes are a mis-use of contract law used to bind employees to employers. Occasionally, you hear a specious argument by employers that they are necessary to allow employers to "invest" and get a return on their investment. If true...why are they necessary for some positions and not others? Why are they used by some employers and not others? And why would they not have sunset requirements for when the investment return has been achieved? Because, they're simply a corruption of the law. My daughter turned down a job she wanted, on my counsel, because they were a nationwide firm and had a 100 mile clause. It would have shut her out from most any city in the US. This was for a job as a "Nail Technician" paying low teens per hour. I commend the FTC for addressing this long-overdue problem. I don't care at all about executives. They can afford lawyers. But for any job making less than about $150,000, they should be prohibited. Thanks for listening."
Patricia	"Non-compete clauses should be banned for all but the top echelon of companies. Too often, they are being used to force hourly employees to remain in poorly compensated jobs or substandard working conditions. When I worked at a newspaper, the company that bought us tried to force us to sign non- compete clauses until the newsroom at one of our sister publications raised hell. They s till required newbies to sign one. There is no fair reason a fast-food or retail worker should be forced to sign a clause effectively preventing them from seeking other employment. This clause amounts to indentured servitude for too many people. If someone is in a position to have trade secrets, then a non-compete clause is appropriate. If it is just there to prevent your poorly paid employees from seeking a better deal with a competitor, then it's indentured servitude."
A	"I believe non-compete clauses should only be enforced IF the employer : a. Is willing to compensate the employee in FULL (including benefits) for the duration of the non-compete agreement if the employee resigns without a competing offer. b. agrees to waive it in cases of an involuntary termination, not for cause c. In case the employee is getting a higher offer at a competitor, is willing to compensate the employee at that higher wage for the duration of the non compete This is my long way of saying - away with non-competes."

North Dakota | Statewide Impact

	"Perhaps no professional class in the world is as restricted from practices their craft as physicians. We are legally barred from owning hospitals, Medicare is constantly reducing the allowed value of our work product, and hospital companies grow larger and larger. The Company I work for, Common spirit, operates in 35 states. I have an enormous non-compete clause in my employment contract which leaves unclear whether I wouldn't be barred from practicing in any of those 35 states if I were to leave their employment. It sounds absurd that a noncompete could be written that way, I don't know if it could be legally binding. But the expense of any legal action to find out would break me. For patients, these clauses give hospitals the leverage to take away their ability to see their doctor. Physicians already don't earn overtime, don't receive compensation for taking extra call for hospitals, are in many instances barred from unionizing . . . Please outlaw physician noncompete clauses" - Nicholas B.
	"A non-compete clause in any profession, especially one involving the physical health and mental well being of the employee and the patients being cared for, is unethical. These clauses have led many health care professionals to experience financial strain, personal isolation, and professional limitations that are long lasting. I ask the government to recognize the malicious intent of these contractual agreements, and make them illegal and non-enforceable on a national level. Thank you." -Evan R.
	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! I've been in the workforce since I was 16 years old and non competes never made sense to me. This is meant to be a competitive environment where the company willing to pay the best prices for their employees succeed. If I have to join a new Industry every time I get a new job then how will I ever get paid as a true professional if half my knowledge base is wiped out from job to job. 	"As a physician I recommend noncompete clause be dissolved and no longer standard contract language. I think it deprives physicians the appropriate ability to choose where and when to work and limits access to care by placing burdens between patients and physicians." -Michael W.
	"My son is stuck because of this right now. He worked for a company and had to sign a non compete, then his job ended they had [finished] the job and laid off. He couldn't move on with any other company doing the same type of work and basically had to start over with a new career because of this non compete. I am all for competition it is what makes the world thrive, it's not fair for anyone to horde the field." -Liana S.

Theresa	"Non-compete clauses only stick individuals in terrible situations. With the healthcare shortage, it limits the workforce to the benefit of big hospital systems forcing people to work fine worse conditions - then we quit and can't work for a while further fueling the use of locums rather than stable, long term individuals. It is part of the problem. Non-competes should be removed for all healthcare workers! We should be able to chose where we work based on the real working conditions. When we get promised the world and then they change and switch - but we are locked in? Employers can change the contract at any time, but we have to be enslaved to them even after we work there. We should have the freedom to look at other options without being punished with moving over 100 miles away so a hospital can hang that over our head and treat us just a little worse knowing we have way more to lose. It's a form of indenturing servitude and a significant cost to the worker."
Jessie	"Please consider the health of physicians in this country when deciding on this. Non-compete clauses are detrimental to physicians mental health and this country needs to focus more on this, with physician suicide rates on the rise."
Joseph	"As a physician, I support the FTC decision to end noncompete clauses for physicians. Noncompete clauses area significant source of physician burn out and are harmful to patients. They only benefit large hospitals and health systems that have used them to exploit and manipulate physicians."

David	"This rule is overdue and should pass. How on earth companies can tie the hands of former employees is beyond me."
Andy	"Non-Compete clauses are anti-competitive and used to exploit the working class in favor of business owners. Many of these clauses are poorly written and non-enforceable as they are in violation of state law, however the mere fact of their presence is enough have a chilling effect on employees who may not know their rights. In some places, employees with specialized skills may need to completely uproot and relocate their families to get employment after choosing to leave an employer - or be involuntarily terminated. This is an unacceptable hardship on American workers. There are sufficient protections in the way of NDA's and No Poaching clauses that protect the employer's intellectual property and existing customers. Removing this onerous burden on employees would achieve the Commission's goal of raising wages by forcing employers to offer competitive wages in their geographic area. Exceptions could be made for business owner's selling their business and in cases of other highly compensated, high influence individuals (this should be defined, and really restricted to those who are compensated at the C- Suite executive level) who will not be materially harmed by remaining unemployed during the non-compete term. A software engineer, product manager, or equipment technician from middle America making <$100,000 a year should not be included in this definition. One alternative would be a severance package equal in value to the expected salary for the term of the non-compete term. Likewise, there should NOT be a regulatory carve-out for specialized technical employees as proposed by the Society for Human Resource Management. With the wage pressure in the industry caused by globalization, these employees are no longer as highly compensated as in years past, with the constant risk of having their jobs eliminated as we have seen in the latest round of Silicon Valley layoffs. America traditionally has valued competition, and this nation was built on the principle of moving to the best opportunity. American history is full of stories of employees leaving their employer to found their own successful businesses. In summary, there are better ways to protect employers - particularly large corporations to whom employees are almost a commodity - and their property and customers without restrictions on where employees may work. I respectfully request the Commission consider how workers have been harmed by these anti-competitive conditions of employment, and how the market conditions today are materially different from those of years past and how the scope creep of those non-competes have trapped an entire generation of mid to low level workers in a sort of legal bondage to their employers. Thank you."
Sidhant	"I support non competes for all health care practices including not for profit hospitals."
Amit	"Non-compete clauses are anti-competitive and in general are bad for employees."
