"Non-compete clauses for employed physicians are becoming increasingly common, particularly in the United States. These clauses are agreements that prohibit physicians from working for competitors or starting their own practice within a certain geographic area for a specific period after leaving their current employer. However, non-compete clauses have a negative impact on both patients and competition amongst hospitals. First and foremost, non-compete clauses harm patients. These clauses limit the patients' ability to choose the doctor they prefer and access the care they need. If a patient's physician is bound by a non-compete clause, they may have to travel further or pay higher costs to see another doctor. This can lead to delays in receiving care, which can be particularly harmful in cases where prompt treatment is crucial. Non-compete clauses also limit the continuity of care that patients receive, which can be especially problematic for those with chronic or complex conditions. Secondly, non-compete clauses prevent competition amongst hospitals. Hospitals can use these clauses to limit the number of physicians available to competitors, which can reduce the quality of care and increase costs. Non-compete clauses can also prevent new hospitals from entering the market or expanding their services, which can limit patients' access to care and result in higher costs. This lack of competition can lead to a lack of innovation and progress in the medical field. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can have a negative impact on physicians. These clauses can limit physicians' ability to advance their careers and earn a fair wage. Physicians who are bound by non-compete clauses may be unable to negotiate higher salaries or better working conditions because they have limited options for employment. Additionally, non-compete clauses can discourage physicians from pursuing new research or treatment methods because they fear they will be unable to practice their new skills if they leave their current employer. Fourthly, non-compete clauses can have detrimental effects on physician burnout, suicide, and mental health. These clauses can contribute to a toxic work environment where physicians feel trapped and undervalued. Studies have shown that physician burnout is on the rise, with one of the main contributing factors being a lack of autonomy and control over their work environment. Non-compete clauses can exacerbate this issue by limiting physicians' ability to make career choices and control their own destinies. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can contribute to a sense of isolation and hopelessness among physicians, which can increase the risk of suicide. A study published in the Journal of the American Medical Association found that physicians who reported a lack of career autonomy had a higher risk of suicidal ideation than those who reported greater autonomy. Non-compete clauses can also contribute to anxiety, depression, and other mental health issues among physicians, who may feel trapped in their current employment situation. Therefore, it is crucial to consider the potential impact of non-compete clauses on physician burnout, suicide, and mental health. Employers and policymakers should prioritize the well-being of physicians and work towards creating a supportive and flexible work environment that encourages autonomy and allows physicians to pursue their careers without unnecessary limitations. This would not only benefit the physicians themselves but also lead to better patient care and outcomes. In conclusion, non-compete clauses for employed physicians have significant negative consequences for patients, hospitals, and physicians. These clauses limit patients' access to care, prevent competition amongst hospitals, and can harm physicians' careers and mental health. As such, policymakers and employers should reconsider the use of non-compete clauses in the medical field and work towards developing alternative solutions that prioritize patient care, competition amongst hospitals, and the well-being of physicians. This can include offering fair compensation, providing support and resources for physician burnout and mental health, and promoting a culture of collaboration and innovation."

Shirley	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal - of course! A worker has every right to quit and take another job. An employer should have no say in the life of someone who no longer works for him. I can hardly believe this is legal in the first place, and the sooner it is banned the better."
Wylee	"Yes, please!!!"

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Ohio | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Ohio:

Ohio Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual OH Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual OH Worker Earnings

	"I am a home inspector in Ohio. I signed a no compete with my boss in January of 2017. Business was slow at the beginning of 2023 and I was not working so I resigned to start my own business. My former employer advised me not to inspect in a 50 square mile radius of his office or I would owe him $10k. He said that I would have to wait 2 years and then I could open my own business. I worked for him for 6 years and he could not give me ample work even though I was willing and able yet he denies me the right to provide for my family using the skills and education I acquired in my field. These non competes need to be done away with, so people such as myself can flourish." -Richard
	"I am in favor of repealing non compete clauses in employment contracts. As a small town physician closely located next to another state, I would be unable to leave my current employer and remain near my patients. This would be a burden to many of my patients as I am the only board certified addiction specialist in the area. IF I left many would lose access to life saving Medication for Opioid Use Disorder. Removing non compete clauses from employment contracts would allow me to return to private practice if needed and continue providing life saving treatment to those suffering from Opioid Use Disorder" -Michael
	"I have worked for a company for 33 years that makes a profit of $500,000 per year of the work my 2 colleagues and I do. They do nothing to enhance our lives or lighten the workload. Recently 1 colleague retired leaving just 2 of us. Instead of replacing him they left us with an increased workload and call. Meanwhile they pocketed his salary as well as the profit they were already making. Because of the non compete clause we were unable to form our own company and bid on the account ourselves in order to staff appropriately and get paid a fair market wage. Because of my profession I basically have to move to change jobs and this company is everywhere anyway. I should be retired but because I've been underpaid for so long I don't see that happening soon." -P
	"As a large Midwestern system owned primary care group we pride ourselves in having no non competes in our contracts as we believe they create obstructions to patients having a long term stable relationship with their doctor. We have very few physicians leave our system for our competitors who do use non compete clauses - we as a system and as medical group feel we want physicians as members of our team not because they are held hostage but because they value their experience with us. If you are bound to your employer by these draconian clauses

	the employer has the power to bully and intimidate the physician staffing. These clauses are of a negative impact to good high quality patient care." -Joseph.
	"As a former professional recruiter and current law cleric of an employment firm, I can say with experience that noncompetes hurt employees AND employers alike. I remember trying to hire people who were perfect fits for certain companies and even though the noncompete was likely too restrictive, the employer had to pass on the employee rather than go through the cost of litigation. It also hurts small businesses because folks looking to create their own companies are prevented from doing so they have to choose between moving their entire family or working outside of their field for years Banning noncompetes also helps the courts by significantly decreasing litigation. I am 100000% in favor of a prohibition on noncompete clauses." -Sarris
	"I support the ban of non competes and also non solicitation agreements! I am a hairstylist. For the first time in my 25 year career I worked in a salon last year as an employee. After 90 days they informed me that they require all employees to sign a noncompete. I had just uprooted my family from Michigan to Ohio. After 11 months of working for the salon I chose to leave to go back to being an independent contractor. The noncompete was for 15 mile radius and 1 year. I found a salon 14 miles away yet closer to my home. I am a single mother and have to take a break to meet the school bus for my daughter every day. 4 months after leaving the salon they emailed me via their attorney a cease and desist letter stating I am in violation for that 1 mile. My clients have reached out to me. So they're claiming that I have caused them a financial loss. I have had to leave the current salon. I cannot find another salon near my home. It has caused a huge financial hardship for me. And now I have displaced clients...Please ban these like yesterday!! They hinder the middle class from getting further!" -Cindy
	"I support the FTC to ban non compete clauses that are unduly strict. We are a small private practice radiology group and it is almost impossible to get anyone to work for us on site due to the noncompete clauses for the large private equity firms that are scooping up the radiologists in this town. In addition to the move towards teleradiology. The non compete ban would help redistribute the workforce and keep our small business alive. We are outside of the city almost 30 mi away yet the non competes include distance from any minor branch of theirs or a place they provide services for so that includes almost all of central Ohio for us. I was told many times that there area lot of radiologists wanting to work for us but they cannot get out of their noncompetes. Thank you!" -Angel

"I am writing to express my support for the proposed rule. I had to sign a non-compete agreement as a retail worker. There was no special training, no significant investment, or any reason my near minimum wage job should have warranted such a thing except they could Banning them at least for everyone below the highly compensated employee threshold is absolutely justified."

A	"Please repeal the non-compete! This is my personal experience. I am a pediatric Hospitalist and have seen the negative impact on patient care due to this restriction. I work in the hospital care setting with infants and children, and would not "take" patients if I worked at another nearby facility. For example, I work near several community hospitals that are desperate for help, but I am restricted for over a year to work there. My non- compete says I cannot work in any county that touches the county I worked it. Instead they have to hire expensive traveling coverage- raising health care costs. It is a hardship to restrict someone's livelihood when my area of practice is limited to a hospital setting. I cannot just go anywhere and start my own Hospital to work at. If a place of employment is fair to its employees, they should not have to worry about retention of employees. How is non- compete helpful to patient care in "non-profits" who are supposed to be there to help? Thank you,"
H	"Noncompete is against fair business and restricts looking for better opportunities. Noncompete should be banned."
H	"No place in healthcare for the non compete. May be no solicitation is appropriate so do not steal the patients. Doctors and nurses are abused. If you have a small practice May be it is better to be creative and add real partners with good plan for the future to keep them rather than to chain them with a non compete until you make your investment ack out from the new hire. Everyone is expecting more from physicians, see more patients, stay late, while managers and CEOs already home hours earlier. Doctors and nurses are abused and the least what the government can do for the sake of the patients, healthcare and doctors, the non compete clause has to be banned in healthcare. End of discussion!"
Hadeel	"Stop noncompetes for physicians and health care workers. Should be illegal to trap a healthcare worker in a job and force them to move or lose income because of hospital greed. Physicians should be allowed to participate in free market likes any other employee"

Saad	"Non compete clause cause exploitation and mental and emotional exploitation of the employees-I am in favor of removing non compete laws"
Michael	"I believe non compete clauses are harmful for workers and that this rule should move forward. Non compete clauses have prevented workers from seeking other employment in the same field with different employers for better compensation for fear of the consequences of their current employer. These clauses suppress competition and fair compensation, so this rule should be adopted."
Mark	"As a corporate technology engineer of 20 years, I fully support the elimination of non-competes. These large corporations take advantage of unknowing professionals with little or no corporate experience. No training is offered about the implications of what you're signing, no legal representation is offered, and in many cases you don't even realize that you should seek legal advice. If you don't sign their paperwork, you don't get the job, it's as simple as that. And the paperwork is very one-sided towards the employer. I have first hand experience with being threatened by my former company for leaving to go to another company that wasn't even a competitor. They told me that there was "a chance" that my new company could become a competitor in the future. So even though I went to a non-competitor, they threatened to enforce a non-compete against me. Then my former company even contacted my new company and threatened to take legal action against me and my new company. My new company nearly terminated me over this. This was extremely unjust treatment that applied undue risk to my career and added high anxiety to me and my family. Corporate America has too much power in this regard. It is causing actual detriment to people's lives. Elimination of non-competes would be a great step forward fur this country and our hardest working citizens."
Hisbam	"I agree with the statement as is."
Rebecca	"Please ban noncompetes! As a physician, I can honestly say it is the bane of my existence!"
Anonymous	"I am a 23 year old, fully licensed and educated insurance agent. I only make $15 an hour. I live in a rural area where finance jobs are scarce and my current job has me under a 2 year noncompete that spans 6 counties. I work 40 hours a week and sell easily $20-25,000 in premium per month yet my take home pay is rarely $1000. I wish I could gain employment with another agency but I'm scared to leave due to my noncompete. So I am stuck with $30 or less left over after each paycheck, plus no benefits, because of the non compete. If the proposed rule passes, I could have a chance at building a savings account, getting health insurance, and buying groceries. It would change my life to achieve gainful employment somewhere with a better wage."
Anonymous	"I'm a physician and my area is dominated by two major healthcare corporations. My current employer has a noncompete clause that I cannot work within x miles of ANY of my employer's facilities -- even ones that are 50 MILES AWAY from the hospital I do work at and they expand to new geographic locations all the time. This effectively plans two major metro areas across the entire state. If I want to leave my job, I basically have to say goodbye to friends and family and practically move to another state. It's an unfair labor practice."

H	"There should be NO noncompete clause. It is just another way to keep health care providers as slave to their system - it should be illegal."
Wanda	"I'm in favor of banning the non-compete clause, it impedes competition."
Patrick	"I strongly support any measure that prevents non-compete clauses in employment contracts. My wife's current contract is set up in such a way that if she needed to leave her employer we would be forced to move our family to a new city to find a job for her, leaving behind numerous family and friends in our home town."
Carrie	"Please include physicians in the elimination of the non-compete so that we can seek employment in the same community at other employers without having to move or commute to change jobs."
Lakisha	"As a C- suite executive in a professional organization , I strongly support this proposed rule of terminating this policy. A non- compete hinders individuals from making lateral and/or progressive moves within their industry. It is imperative for a solid workforce to allow employees and contractors to accept job offers that would enable them to grow professionally. With a non-compete in place, an individual may have to completely change their industry, remove themselves from the workforce for a period of time or create hesitation on leaving an employer. To complicate the situation even further, many employees feel pressured to accept a non-compete to accept their position. Neither of these options are conducive to growing a strong economy."
Tom	"Members of the FTC Thank you for the opportunity to comment on the proposed revision of the legality of non-compete clauses. To some extent die continued legalization of non compete clauses is an equivalent to modern day indentured servitude. While a corporation has the right to protect its intellectual property the current use of non-compete clauses forces unfair hardships upon the working class and creating a monopolization of the work force."
Dot	"As a health care provider this has always been standard practice but has never felt like it was for the best interest of the employee only the employer. When you live in a small geographical area and there are only 2 health systems to work for , it feel like being trapped in your job. The Americans dream and rights are about freedom and advancement and non-competes hinder these by employers having a stronghold on their employees. Sure you can work somewhere outside of the milage specified in your noncomplete, but then you and your family's quality of life may suffer and you may incur more costs for higher residential costs, utility costs, child care costs, etc. if you have to move to work. The non-compete is archaic and should be illegal as it infringes on our rights as Americans."
Colton	"I think this is an excellent change. As a young white-collar professional, I feel as though non-compete agreements force me and others like me into having to

	choose which matters the least between staying in the same city, staying in the same career sector, and making more money. I recently lost-out on a career advancement opportunity at the biggest employer in my sector because the recruiter in touch with me got spooked by my non-compete agreement with my employer, who is a labor supplier for the company I was pursuing an opportunity with. My employer pays lower wages for similar work compared to the larger company. Therefore, if I want to make a better wage, I need to either leave the city to work with this company elsewhere or switch career sectors. If I want to stay in the same sector, I either need to leave the city or accept my lower wage compared to other opportunities. And if I want to stay in the city, I either need to switch career sectors or accept the mediocre wage my employer pays. These agreements not only limit income potential, but also force employees to make the difficult choice between being poorer but keeping their friends, family, and support network close, or leaving behind their friends and family to get paid the wage they deserve and build a life of their own. I don't know how many individuals my age (mid-20s) know about this proposed ban on non-competes, but I know we are the demographic most affected by it. And I know every major corporation in America knows about this proposed change. I'm sure every corporation will lobby against this with their fancy legalese arguments, and there will be no shortage of comments from them. But don't forget the comments of individuals like me, who are most hurt by these agreements. Non-compete agreements are anti-competitive, anti-social mobility anti-freedom, and frankly, anti-American. The sooner this rule comes into place, the better off this great nation will be for it."
Thomas	"I fully support this rule, and encourage you to make it applicable to NON-PROFITS as well! I am a Neonatal ICU physician at a non-profit Children's Hospital. There are multiple other NICUs at hospitals in my city, and there are two private physician groups that care for the patients in those NICUs. My non-compete clause states that I cannot work within 100 miles for 3 years, whether I leave voluntarily or not! This means, even though there would be plenty of opportunities for me to work elsewhere in my city if my current employer lets me go, I have NO CHOICE but to move far away from my extended family for years. I have had colleagues who had to live in apartments in other cities, away from their spouse and children, during the week every week, because the spouse couldn't move his/her job, or they didn't want to pull the children from a school. Why should my hospital be able to DESTROY a family's life like this, even if they are a non-profit? Why should a Children's Hospital be able to say that once you've worked for them, you have to move over 100 miles away if things don't work out, even though there are jobs available nearby? I understand having a non-compete if one has trade secrets, or would steal business (for example, an accountant opens a new office and pilfers all their clients from the old job). But this is NOT the case in my situation. Families do not pick their neonatologist. If I moved to another local hospital, business would not follow me there. And I hold no secrets that would undermine my current employer. The only reasons for the non-complete are to suppress wages, to suppress dissent (because, if I criticize the hospital administration, they can let me go without cause, and I'll have to sell my house and move far away), and to suppress competition (for example, a group of pediatric specialists could not open an office and compete with the Children's Hospital for new patients). The lack of competition raises prices, and likely reduces the quality of care, as patients are left with no option but to use the monopoly that the Children's Hospital has. I work in fear every day, knowing that one misstep in the eyes of my employer means I'll need to sell a house, find a new job far away, move, and leave my elderly parents. Please implement this rule, and do NOT allow an exception for non-profit institutions, which employ 50% of physicians"

Imad	"I strongly oppose the present non compete clause in contracts. As a physician who was adversely impacted by such clause in medical employment contract , I feel the unfairness of such clause which adversely impacts the livelihood of physicians if decided to leave their employers for some reason,. they are prevented from seeking different employer if they are not happy with the current one. They are forced to uproot their lives and families because of such unfair clause. this non compete rule is un American and contradicts basics of freedom of work and seeking better options and opportunities and without being penalized for such effort I strongly feel it is time to remove such unfair clause and respect the freedom of workers to choose what best for them and not to be under the mercy of their employer even if they are not happy ."
Amanda	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. Corporations are too greedy and expect that if they can't retain an employee by paying them well and having healthy work environments then they can threaten them with their non compete clauses. It's bad business and inevitably harms the working class on all fronts. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth and force company's to improve work culture which is desperately needed in all sectors."
Beth	"I absolutely disagree with non compete clause/contracts. 1. Why am I being punished for being good or great at something I have chosen to do while employed? 2. When a company fires you for whatever reason they determine, why should someone not be able to work at their choice employer after being discarded? 3. Great job opportunities are much harder to find in small industries. If you happen to be the best and want a better opportunity, they should not be able to stop you from choosing a new employer."
Tyler	"Non-compete clauses have held my wife and I back from jobs that we would have been better trained for. Employers are taking away our liberties and the should be barred from writing up or requiring non-competes."
Gerald	"I support proposals to ban (or at least greatly restrict) non-compete agreements; that will give workers greater freedom and flexibility to change jobs and advance their careers."
Thomas	"Non-compete clause with former employer has left me with few commensurate employment options all with significantly less compensation even with fifteen plus years experience of which one third was in employ of most recent employer. I now have very severely limited earnings potential for the 12 month and 100 mile restrictive covenant with no hopes of overcoming this deficit for I predict the next five to ten years. My former employer has zero chance of being

	harmd in any way by releasing me from this. My career and my family's economic prospects are now in dire straits."
Stewart	"As an employee I appreciate this type of action to ban non-competes. My previous owner sold the company to our competitor who made me resign a new N.C. I feel stuck and not able to explore other companies within the music industry. Company culture is one of many reason why I support this ban. If a employee doesn't like the culture of the new company taking over then a non-compete limits the employee to look at other companies within the same industry. I love what I do but non- compete limits my ability to look at other companies that offer a better fit with wages, benefits, career advancements, company culture/beliefs."
Patricia	"If I had been able to find new work as a physician without upsetting my children's lives, it would have changed our lives. Please end noncompete clauses."
Jon	"I fully support getting rid of non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are anti-worker and anti-competitive. Any time a company wants to use a non-compete clause they should be using an NDA. NDAs would cover any trade secrets that a company may want to protect. All Non-compete clauses do is prevent workers from using the one thing they have at their disposal to bargain for better jobs, their ability to work. If a business can only retain talent through the use of a non-compete clauses they shouldn't be in business. As a worker, I fully support getting rid of non-compete clauses."
Seref	"Non-compete clauses for physicians are being used by employers for putting profits before patient care. The corporate practice of medicine, despite being prohibited by multiple jurisdictions, continues because physicians who want to put patients' interest first are left with die choice of "bowing head down" versus "leaving town." Eliminating non-compete clauses from physician contracts will reduce profit-based interference with how physicians practice medicine. A physician who does not have to leave town, sell their house at a loss, and disrupt their family's life will be better positioned in saying no to profit-based "instructions" of their employer. The benefits of eliminating physician non-compete clauses for patient care and also the cost of healthcare are self-explanatory. Thank you."
Lindsey	"I am whole heartedly against non-compete clauses and would love for them to be discontinued. Non-compete clauses by the major health systems in Northwest Ohio have restricted doctors and our ability to practice. Once a contract is signed with a noncompete, if the doctor is unhappy, die few options are to set up private practice, to uproot family, or commute hours away. The noncompete can be just for where a doctor personally practices or for any facility operated by the company which could be 50-100 miles in any direction. This puts all of the power with the employer. Thank you for addressing this topic."
Caleb	"I support this rule being implemented as an Ohioan."

colin	"Non-compete clauses are exploitative, anti-democratic and protect the wealthy from accountability for their misdeeds, while denying justice to the less powerful. They are unAmerican and must be outlawed, completely, totally and thoroughly, as quickly as is feasible."
colin	"Ban non-compete clauses. They are anti-worker, protect predatory businessmen (like career criminal Donald Trump) and punish employees for seeking to improve their situation."
Brenda	"I do not agree with noncompete clauses. I work as a physician, and these have been used by companies against physicians for a long time to prevent them leaving and working for another company or setting up their own practice in the same area. I and most physicians are not in administration roles, so the work we do is not proprietary, we practice by the same standards of our specialty nationwide. I could see nondisclosure agreements as those would protect company secrets. It has been traditional that you cannot solicit patients from a former employer to follow you to a new practice, but if the patient seek you out, that is fine. Noncompete clauses are an unfair restrictions on workers abilities to change jobs without having to upend their whole lives eg moving, taking children away from school, friends and family. I am in a short supplied specialty which results in less accessibility to patients when noncompete clauses cause doctors to move away. Please do away with noncompete clauses."
Doctor	"Non-compete clauses should be the exception rather than the rule. They mostly act to unduly burden workers and restrict the free movement of labor."
Kayla	"People should be allowed to work wherever in any radius! Let people free!!! !!!!"
PLouise	"As a contract health care professional I support the ban on non-compete clauses in the health care industry. I work with marginalized communities and provide services to youth and elderly relative to education and wellness."
Adam	"I am under a one year non-compete clause for any location within 10 miles of die former employer. Just so happens that said employer has locations in just about every are as their competitors for 1-2 hour drive. Remove the hindrance of the employee from seeking to improve their work environment and make it easier for competition. In the end we all want a happy, healthy and productive workplace."
Richard Eric	"I accepted a new position at the start of the year. I asked my management for permission to accept die new company and be released to work there. They accepted and I worked for 3 weeks with public knowledge I had accepted new position that didn't compete against my soon to be old employer. 3 weeks after starting my new employer and I both got copies of my 13 yr old non compete via certified mail. 3 weeks after that I was terminated when my old company would not relent on giving a written release. Now I don't have a job."

Matthew	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. As a general surgeon and medical professional. I know firsthand the negative implications that non-compete clauses have on both patients and physicians. Non-compete clauses restrict healthy competition and give employers unfair leverage during contract negotiations. They prevent physicians from being able to negotiate higher salaries, better benefits, and improved working conditions. This lack of competition is detrimental to the physician's well-being as well as to the quality of care that patients receive. In addition, non-compete clauses often require physicians to relocate their families, disrupting continuity of care and limiting patient access to specialty care. When physicians are forced to relocate, they often have to spend a significant amount of time and money getting re-certified in their new state, which can put a strain on their finances and delay their ability to start providing patient care. Finally, non-compete clauses can also limit patient access to specialty care. When physicians are prohibited from practicing in certain areas, patients may not have access to the care they need. This can be especially problematic for rural areas, where access to specialty care is already limited. In conclusion, non-compete clauses have a negative impact on both physicians and patients. For these reasons, I urge you to pass the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses and ensure that physicians and patients have access to the care they need. Sincerely, A General Surgeon"
Mathew	"As a healthcare worker bound by a non compete I welcome this new rule which would allow areas underserved to utilize my services that would be restricted by my current non compete . Please move forward with banning this clauses ."
Darrian	"I support making non-compete agreements illegal. I believe that they unfairly suppress competition and worker's wages."
Kyra	"The passing of this law would greatly improve my life. I'm currently stuck in a non compete contract in the state of Ohio that I believe is extremely unfair. My employer states that I'm not permitted to work ANYWHERE in the entire city of Columbus, Ohio. This is the city where I was born, have lived in for 21 years, the city I got my cosmetic license in, which I went $20k into debt for, and I believe telling me I can't carry out any work here is absolutely against my constitutional rights. I'm aware this law has been introduced on several occasions and has failed to pass. I'm confident when I say the passing of this bill will help so many other women in the beauty industry besides me."
Erol	"Ins Flexo printing machine operator in Ohio State , my current employer no have PTO or benefits that other flexo printing companies have to offer i have give them 2 weeks notice resignation and the same last day of my 2 weeks notice a letter was send to me and my new employer that i have non-compete agreement that i signed 12 years ago if i start work with the new company both will be sued is a shame for a company the i spend 1/2 of my life working hard and they no let me go for better opportunities Attachments letter The attachment is restricted to restrict all."

Elizabeth	"I am a Nurse Practitioner working for a laser hair removal company and my no compete is so broad that I cannot pursue employment at any med spa who preforms laser hair removal anywhere for 2 years. Considering that I specialize in aesthetics this no compete limits me from most job prospects which would support me in practicing to the full extent of my license. My no compete contract depreciates my quality of life and happiness in my career. Additionally this contract limits the people who I can support and care for."
Mario	"I fully support this move. I fought a non compete in court in Ohio up to the Appeals Court of Ohio. In medicine there are no trade secrets only hard work. Contact me if you wish to discuss."
Stephen	"While a lot of states prevent these from being enforceable, I would like to see these companies banned from trying this shady practice."
David	"Noncompete clauses have caused harm to the healthcare system on both an individual personal level and on larger patient focused systems level. On a personal level as a practicing radiologist,) have witnessed firsthand the limitation they put on physicians and their families. Radiology has for all practical purposes become a commodity in the medical field. Just as a patient really does not care which lab performs the requested test, just as long as basic quality metrics are met, that is all that matters when it comes to lab results. The same goes for radiology these days, patients want their imaging studies read quickly and accurately, yet they really don't care who reads their study, as long it is a licensed and credentialed physician that has met state and specialty board requirements, of which there are many. Radiology groups hide behind their noncompete clauses and prohibit the radiologists from leaving a particular group and working for other groups in the city, county, or sometimes even the state. As radiology groups across the country consolidate, this has led to larger and larger noncompete territories, prohibiting physicians from seeking employment at other groups in the city, county or state that may offer better working conditions focused more on patient care rather than profit. The business minded radiology groups attempt to run leaner and leaner to improve their profit margin, often to the detriment of both patient care and the working conditions of the radiologists, constantly pushing the radiologists to read more studies faster and faster. And the radiologist has little choice but to comply with no option of leaving the company if they are tied down to a particular city due to family circumstances, kids in school or a spouse's job. And no doubt these noncompete clauses also cause patient care to suffer. Chronic understaffing at radiology groups to increase the bottom line leads to fewer radiologists working more and more hours while cramming in more and more studies. The nonstop focus on productivity causes all the softer and more artistic aspects of medicine to fall by the wayside. It would be nice to pick up that phone and answer a question from a referring physician, but that meter on your computer desktop is telling you that you are running behind and you don't have time for that, better start cranking out another case report! Gee, I would like to help out and perform your requested procedure this evening, but I am reading studies from over 30 hospitals and we are several hours behind on our turn around time so I will push it off as long as possible. Many private practice radiology groups,

	especially larger private equity backed groups, hide behind the motto of being "physician led" when actually they have nothing more than one or more token physician puppets who are highly compensated to tow the party line in the interest of the bottom line rather than the larger group of humanitarian minded physician worker bees. The knowledge that the radiologists use to carry out their life's work is acquired over years in medical school, residency training, fellowship and endless self study, not corporate secrets that individuals will take with them between jobs to the detriment of a company. Noncompctes have no place in medicine and simply exists to restrict the free flow of labor and allow the heavy hand of corporations to exert undue influence on the practice of medicine and individual liberty. If private practice groups actually had to create a work environment to compete for radiologists (or any physician) to stay, rather than trap them in place, the incentives would flow to improvement of both working conditions and patient care rather than profit."
Elizabeth	"Non-compete clauses for physicians are not only terrible for physicians but also their patients. Patient should be allowed the choice to continue care with their physician, even if the physician decides to leave a specific hospital or clinic. Physicians aren't taking trade secrets when they go to a new position. Physicians should not have to move to another city in order to be able to continue working if they find themselves in a bad situation or have a poor fit with their employer. There are physicians who end up having to take jobs with a commute of 1-2 hours driving away for 1-2 years due to non-competes. Non-competes are really a way for hospitals and healthcare system to prevent physicians from leaving so they can treat physicians poorly. Physician burnout has increased with the COVID pandemic and has ranged from 40-60% even before the pandemic. Approx 10% of physicians left the practice of medicine last year. We already have a physician shortage, we don't need to loose more doctors. Non-competes contribute to the loss of physicians from practicing because some end up leaving and due to the non-compete, can not find another position so they end up leaving the practice of medicine. This is not good for patients given the physician shortage. Many health care system now cover such large areas that the non-compete covers the entire metropolitan area, with clauses that state the physician can not work with 10 miles of any satellite clinic of the healthcare system. Physicians already have a difficult time competing with healthcare systems who have a lot more power to negotiate better reimbursement from insurance companies. There is no need for a non-compete to be another set of handcuffs keeping a physician at a job that they don't want to be at."
Matthew	"As an independent business owner who has spent most of his non compete time teaching myself my knowledge it has severely dampened my ability to offer multiple services to my clients. I have die the of working in jobs i liked so i could improve my own knowledge and pass it on. I am a citizen who has voted in all my elections and work die polls. I care deeply about America. I strongly support removing this antiquated rule and replace it with the liberties of pursuing our dreams of upward mobility without some company who doesn't pay our bills at home telling us what to do. Thank you for your bold move FTC."

Chris	"I feel that all non-compete contracts should be banned and voided. I have been in sales for over 20 years and have recently taken a sales position at a company I have worked for a while. I originally was shown a salary expectation and in order to get this new and better position I had to sign a non-compete contract. Since I have signed the contract and taken the job I have not seen the return that was led to believe I would be seeing even taking into account for slower sales. In short, I feel I was shown a highlights reel so to speak in order to get me to sign the contract. Now I would like to part ways and take a job elsewhere in the same field with a guaranteed better return but I can't because of the non-compete contract. I can't keep working in this current position due to the lack of pay and is starting to negatively effect my finances. I have friends working at other companies and have tried to get me to apply there but I would get into legal trouble if I got hired there. Most of my sales experience is in a certain area of sales so what else am I supposed to do for work if I quit? I feel that the non-compete contract is holding me back from yet again Trying to better my life. If my current company wouldn't have exaggerated the job to me I wouldn't have signed the contract in the first place. Now I feel they don't have to do anything to keep me working for them, I feel they have gotten a if you want to leave but don't go work for the competition or we will sue you kind of attitude. If my contract was banned then I could go somewhere else that might want to make it more worth my while to work there. I have multiple opportunities that guarantee me a higher wage but I can't go work there because of the non-compete contract or at least until it is banned. In essence I am losing money that is effecting my family's well being and I don't know how to fix that until non-compete contracts are banned."
Jeffrey	"I fully support a complete ban on non-compete clauses. My wife and I met in Columbus, OH while she was completing her residency at Ohio state. She had signed a non-compete clause with The Ohio State University. In order for her to find a job she had to accept a job in Dayton, OH. The drive from Columbus to Dayton is not acceptable daily commute. I quit my job and found a new job in Dayton. I sold my house which I had bought at age 21 and had put in years of renovations into and had a strong sentimental feeling to. We had to move away from nearby friends and family, which we see occasionally on weekends when we drive back to Columbus. We can no longer do weeknight dinners with our friends and family in Columbus. This has been an incredibly stressful move and continues to be a strain on our daily lives all of which could have been avoided had the non-compete not existed."
Victor	"I've been in the transportation industry for 10 years and a non-compete with the wrong company is forcing me out of the industry to avoid being sued. Northeast Trailer Services or NETS Companies based out of NJ, is probably the worst company I've worked for. Although a corporation, they lack any processes or procedures and every decision from equipment purchasing to ordering pens for the office trickles to the owners desk for approval. He's a narcissistic, sexist crude individual that has zero respect for anyone. Currently the company is running thin and what's left of employees can't/won't leave because of the NDA. Constant threats of being sued if leaving for a competitor is told to us often. From top office execs, to middle level management (where I

	am) and mechanics are threatened with legal action from this NDA. Recently a competitor (who doesn't require NDA's, pursued me for employment) decided not to hire me due to my non competent and the owners reputation for litigation. Poor working conditions, harassment, secretive behavior, closed door culture, non transparent commission payscales, lower pay, no structure and pure insanity is why we want to leave this company but we feel stuck. I have an opportunity to double my pay! All I want is better work environment and to better myself financially and I'm stuck. Please ban the NDA's. If not, have to quit and change career paths (lower pay) to avoid being sued."
Samantha	"It is time for non- compete clauses to be outlawed. They affect real people and allow businesses to take advantage of their workers. No one should be prevented from taking another position or being forced to move or commute to enter lto a better work agreement. As a physician all of my contracts have included a non compete clause that would prevent me from providing continuous care to my patients if I left my current position. Non compete clauses hurt workers and their families and force people to give up opportunities that they would otherwise strive for."
christin	"Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts arc forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable-unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working condition-, for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. I have had to uproot my life twice because of non compete clauses. If the system focused on physician retention patient retention would go hand in hand. When they lose good physicians the patients WANT to follow their doctor and they actively prohibit continuity if patient care by non compete clauses and by not allowing physicians to tell patients where they are going. I was effectively clausued out of Philadelphia for a year because of this clause which forced me to uproot my life becuase the proximity of medical systems to one another and they make it from any of their satellite locations the radius of non compete."
william	"I worked, as a chemist, for the rubber industry for over 40 years. During the first 20 years, there were no compete clauses for non managerial employees. Employees who changed companies were professional in what they knew from the previous companies and their new employers generally employed in areas where there were no conflicts of interest. 1. Non competes were started by Michelin and the other major rubber companies followed suit in which an employee had to remain unemployed fur 18 to 24 months, with pay, if he/she was able to provide proof that the other company wanted to hire him/her. The issue was obtaining the proof from the other corporation and having that job still open after the unemployed time. That did happen to an acquiesce of mine where die economy softened while he waited, the new company rescinded the offer, the previous company would not re employ him, and he was forced to

	change careers to a non rubber industry. 2. I tracked my salary, vs the CPI, before and after the non-competes were implemented. Per Cent raises vs the CPI decreased after the non-competes were implemented. 3. Non-competes were also used to punish employees who left on their own accord or were fired. They were not only black balled from working for another rubber company but also from working with suppliers to the rubber companies. Suppliers had to ask permission to hire someone from a rubber company which sometimes were refused. 4. Employees did have the financial resources to fight the non-competes in court. 5. It appeared to me that marketing and sales executives did not have issues switching companies so there was a double standard on non-competes. Non-compete clauses and training charges should be eliminated for hourly workers and non-managerial professionals. a. If companies expect training should be reimbursed, they should have verifiable data upfront for employees taking the training as to the cost per individual and the time frame for it to be reimbursed. Employees should be allowed to refuse the training, without repercussions, if they feel that it is overpriced for what they will learn. b. Most companies have the forensic knowledge to determining if a professional employee has passed on company secrets. c. Employees should not have to spend their own money in fighting corporations' non-compete clauses. d. That said, the government should strengthen its resources in foreign government spying and have foreign nationals or even 1st generation citizens sign documentation to acknowledge the punishments for spying for foreign nations."
Andrea	"Please end noncompete. It hurts peoples ability to get jobs and switch jobs. Most importantly non-competes are terrible for people who are fired or laid off. I had coworkers who were laid off in Feb 2020 but due to non competes & the economy due to covid were out of work for almost a year. They had companies willing to hire them but the company that fired them wouldn't release them from the noncomplete so they were drawing unemployment which they didn't have to draw except for this piece of paper. I have been a director or higher for the last half dozen years for corporations. I honestly don't know any trade secrets that I could take somewhere. I think there are very few jobs that people know real trade secrets. I have many friends across multiple industries in high level positions & non of them really know anything that someone couldn't figure out on their own. Plus even if they do doesn't competition lead to better innovation & lower prices to customers?"
Eric	"As a worker I believe getting rid of a no compete clause will help keep wages fair and big corporations more honest!"
Micheal	"I am 1000% against non compete agreements. I am currently unable to continue sales in my industry until April 15th of 2024. I was top 3 in overall sales for my industry for 12 of the last 16 years and have controlled the same territory for 20 years. To not allow me to compete is not only completely unjust and biased. But, it's depriving the economy, the hospitality industry a half million dollars a year. Also, the extra personal taxes I would be paying. Because, I've taken a 150 to 200k a year income cut changing industries. Please at least reduce it to 1 year, if you don't completely wipe it off the earth. Thank you for your serious consideration!!!"

Zachary	"Completely agree with abolishing non compete clauses. This makes it difficult for me as a physician to work in one city and change practice employers. Please make non competes illegal."
Stephen	"End noncompete clauses! It's past time to end this disparity in power of employers over American workers!"
Logan	"I encourage the FTC to not allow exemptions for any one class of employee (physicians) or corporation (non profit) included. Physicians or medical professionals are employees, and non competes significantly affect employee mobility, competitive compensation, and allow healthcare workers to be further taken advantage of."
Jamie	"As a physician in a small subspecialty employed by a large health system, I wholeheartedly support the elimination of the noncompete clause from employee contracts. My health system is the largest employer in the region. My limiting my options to practice if I choose to leave my current position, they are furthering strengthening their current monopoly on health care in the area."
Avi	"I favor on passing this law wholeheartedly. This also should not exclude anyone in healthcare including any providers. Non compete laws are in bad faith and only helps employers consolidate leverage. Employees and general public are at a disadvantage in all aspect due to this anti capitalist law."
Elizabeth	"The current non-compete rules don't allow for full worker mobility for leaving abusive environments and also stifles creativity."
Tara	"Noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021; this is roughly 10% of US physicians. Currently, profits are prioritized over patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying as physicians leave the field secondary to widespread frustration and burnout; it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or that they will line unable to provide for themselves and their families. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a physician noncompete clause often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. The downstream effects of noncompetes include coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating market forces that can lead to better systems for clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced to uproot themselves and their families if they want to switch practice environments where they must reestablish their reputation and practice in a new location. Employers leverage this when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. Physicians are held hostage at unfavorable working conditions while employers evade market forces that necessitate change. A single physician leaving a large hospital system hardly threatens the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. This is exactly where market forces should come to play to lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. When physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic location. (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field grows while clinician burnout is at an all time high."

Thomas	"A non-compete is one sided and doesn't look out for an employee at all. It makes an employee feel trapped and unable to better themselves. It also stops an employee from being able to financially better themselves."
Gregory	"Board certified dermatologist who is stuck in a situation where he is unable to earn a living after 12 years of education and 200k debt due to an unconstitutional, parasitic non compete clause"
Rachel	"I am 100% for banning noncompete clauses. I am a physician and will be leaving by current employer to work elsewhere for many reasons. My noncompete is a 20 mile radius for 1 year and it is significantly hindering my ability to care for my patients who I have established long- tenn relationships with, and to make a living myself."
David	"Am fully against excluding physicians from the change to the non-compete rule. This is at the very least, very anti-capitalist, giving far more power to corporations compared to individuals"
Nadine	"It is my feeling that these clauses should be removed from contracts, especially for physicians. As a physician recruiter I have seen it affect physicians, their patients and their communities. It is difficult to find doctors for some communities and banning practitioners from finding employment in the community when they are unhappy with their current employer or wish to open their own care center does nothing but leave patients without care. In a free country you should be free to market your skills and knowledge to other employers and have an option to find a career that you are happy with in the community where you live!!"
Rick	"Please make this not possible for companies to restrict the free market of where I want to work. Our software industry is very non-specific and leaves me very few options to make a change in companies. You could consider many similar companies competitors although they really aren't but depends on use cases. I have many years in this industry so hard tbr me to make a big change to another totally different market."
Patrick	"I am writing to express my STRONG opposition to die American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. It is inappropriate for the ANA to even suggest this after the worst pandemic in 100 years. We with nurses, RTs, PTs and the rest of the hospital staff tireless work to better people but the hospitals would like to prevent us from changing jobs without changing cities. Why are doctors not worthy of the same treatment as everyone else in this country?"

david	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete contracts. I work in a very limited industry and due to that I must relocate to another state but my current employer will not release me from my agreement until the 12 month term has expired Banning these types of agreements will definitely allow workers to regain their lost income and allow them to start their new career paths. Non-compete agreements are impactable in most industries because there aren't many trade secrets that can be taken to other companies, industries are ran very similar and if one employee can damage a company then I would wonder why die employer didn't keep die associate? Please pass this ridiculous non-compete restriction."
John	"About 8 years ago, after losing a few employees to a competitor, my company introduced a non-compete agreement and forced all employees to sign it or else risk losing their job. For some of us, there was an additional threat that if we didn't sign the agreement the company would refuse to pay us bonuses that we had already earned. Since then, I have seen those few employees that left before the agreement and many that have taken the risk to leave afterwards thrive with their new companies, both financially and psychologically. Since the agreement was put in place, those of us who dare challenging the document have seen our salaries stagnate, falling as much as 50% below similar positions at competitive companies. This non-compete was put in place for one reason only - to keep salaries down - and it has been effective. I don't blame companies for wanting to protect IP by preventing employees from taking it with them, but in this case the sole purpose of the agreement was for the company to avoid compensating their employees per market value. Please put this ban in place immediately, thank you."
Fabrice	"Non-compete clauses should be banned."
Elayna	"To the FTC, I am writing in support of the proposed ban on non-compete clauses in the American workplace. It is an important step in helping workers regain the power over their own careers that has been eroded in the past. Thank you. Elayna Duitman"
Ashley	"Most Non-compete covenants are only there to strangle the choices of employees. I am a fiscal conservative and would strongly vote to ban them."
Anne	"I am just graduating with my PhD and pursuing a job in clinical research and realized that I would have to sign a non-compete agreement with the company I have received an offer from. This non-compete is very restrictive and would not allow me to work in clinical trials in the U.S. for a full year. I thought this job would be a great starting opportunity, but I would eventually like to move closer to family to raise my kids. To do this, I would need to leave the company and work in an entirely different field for a year, or not work at all. Non-compete clauses are incredibly unfair and difficult to avoid in my field. Please eliminate them."

Ben	"Non-compete is anti-worker, and creates an atmosphere that promotes toxic work environments. An employer is emboldened to tell employees "do what I want, because otherwise you can't work in the field for an extended period of time." If non-compete clauses are not enforceable, employers would be forced to work with employees instead of forcing them to do things that may be undesirable at best, but potentially dangerous or encourage doing something illegal at worst. Holding this power over past employees is wrong."
Lauren	"This is a valuable rule to protect workers and their ability to seek better employment. Employers are abusing non-compete clauses to retain workers without addressing pay, benefits, or working conditions. No one should feel trapped in a job due to a non-compete clause, regardless of the industry in question. If employers are concerned about insider information, they can simply rely on non-disclosure agreements."
Bill	"I fully believe that the non compete agreements that employers force employees to stay in their roles. Over time, they use the non-compete to force workers to stay at below market pay also. I am in highly specifies sales management role in a niche industry. The non compete I signed has prevented me from advancing financially. When I was hired, I did not know the company does not give yearly market raises or raises in general. Over 9 years, my salary has only been increased by a total of 8% and the noncompete forces me to search for a new job in industries I do not have experience. I could realistically be making double what I make now and be hired immediately by a vendor or supplier of my current company. I am literally being held hostage in my role. This is compounded by the company not raising base pay in line with most acceptable practices: Including but not limited to cost of living increases, performance based raises, and achievement of goals. I feel that non competes should be eliminates and companies should be responsible for retaining their talent, versus an agreement that is mandatory to sign, allowing companies to exploit employees."
Matthew	"Get rid of noncompetes!"
Victoria	"I am writing in regards to the proposed ban on non-competes. I am a physician and have heard that hospital lobbying organizations are petitioning to exclude the medical field from the ban on non-competes. I am writing in opposition to this exclusion. Non-competes inherently benefit only the employer and hurt/harm both physicians and patients. In an ideal world, when circumstances necessitate a physician seeking a new employer/practice location, patients should have the option of going with their physician to continue their care under that physician at their new location. Instead, what happens is that large hospital administrations enact a non-compete that can force physicians to practice a specified distance from either their current practice site or any location in a medical system. I have had colleagues that were under such extreme non-competes that they had to leave the state to be able to practice. Physicians are forced to move locations that are often inconvenient for patients to follow - this allows the hospital system to retain the patient base/profits from those patients and forces physicians out. This is not a therapeutic practice because it takes a patient that has often worked with a specific physician for years and makes them seek a new physician. I would therefore request that the hospital systems/medical field not be exempted from the proposed ban on non-competes - they should also be banned in the medical field for the aforementioned reasons."

Katherine	"I am a practicing physician and I support the ban on non-compete clause."
Cortney	"I feel non-compete clause has been a tool used by employers to `trap" professionals. If a company is confident in their ability to retain employees then there is no such need for the clause. Also, employees deserve to work where they have professional "peace" regardless of the zipcode"
Janelle	"In medicine, the role of a non compete is completely absurd. The physician or surgeon is not using any skill developed by or proprietary to the prior employer. They have honed their own skills separately and over many years of training. The hospitals assumption that they 'own' our expertise is ridiculous. For many, we don't have options that wouldn't cause us to uproot and move clear out of our own state in order to comply with a non compete. Highly trained professionals deserve better."
Antonio	"The non-compete clause, as it states, hurts competition which is beneficial in any industry. An important consequence of this clause is that there is a little incentive by Hospitals and managers to improve the quality of employees' work environment (in my case physician). In the current physician burnt-out epidemic, it perpetuates job dissatisfaction which is associated with poorer patient outcomes. Nobody would leave a job where one is treated well, and work conditions are safe. The support of a non-compete clause is a confession by the employer of its unwillingness to listen to or to invest in the well-being of its employees. By eliminating the non-compete clause, there will be an incentive to the employer to improve the work conditions of its employees. This will likely lead to more productivity and better outcomes, at least for patients. The American Hospital Association, with no physician representing us, is strongly opposing to these measures, as if the healthcare providers who bring value this industry were responsible for die irresponsible perspective of insurance companies, drug distribution system (that inflates the price of drugs), and staffing companies who are killing the profits of hospitals. If hospitals want their employees to be loyal, improve the work conditions!"
Ibrahim	"This clause should be removed all together. Companies and hospitals who still carry such a clause should be punished as it hurtles patients' access and timely care. It's difficult to find good jobs or efficient providers anyway, adding another limitation is totally unacceptable, selfish, unfortunate and self centered. It's absolutely worse in the healthcare system as it literally deprives patients and force many providers to move away from their loved communities!!"
Luke	"I am against the use anon-compete clauses since they screw over doctors"

Gretchen	"I am a PHYSICIAN affected by such a non-compete clause and am 1 week resigned from my employer. I am trying to find work IN MY FIELD that will allow me to remain in the city in which I grew up and have lived as a doctor for 26 years taking care of patients. I do not wish to move and have to disrupt my family, especially our high-schooler. Had I not the financial and emotional support of my husband, I would have had to stick it out in a job which wasn't what it was touted to be. PLEASE take out non-compete clauses and allow talent to go where they are valued OR allow for employers to be responsive to employees needs so they do not jump ship."
Elizabeth	" Laborers must be protected, not held hostage by employers when the need to make decisions for the sake of themselves or their family. Thanks for taking this action!:"
John	"These company-required non-compete agreements only exacerbate the power difference between a corporation and an individual worker. Most American workers already are employees at will, which, as a famous judicial opinion stated, allows them to be fired 'for a good reason, a bad reason, or no reason at all.' Allowing their former employers to restrict their future employment not only destroys the worker's supposed equivalent right to quit, but it allows the company additional power to harm a worker it has forced out of his job. Such clauses should be illegal when applied to all workers or at least those who are not top executives."
Nathan	"I agree that non-compete agreements should be banned by the FTC. I agree that non-compete agreements hamper worker choice within the job market, suppress workers wages, and discourage competition and innovation. Evidence supports that non-compete harm competition in US labor markets"
Whitney	"Definitely should be eliminated? Encourages business owners to take someone on, get great work out of the employee, change terms of agreement or not hold up their portion of the agreement and then the employee is trapped."
James	"I fully support the non-compete rule. I I I I fully support the non-compete rule. I believe it's important to give people as much opportunity as possible to find work."
Sandy	"I am an American working woman . I strongly support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. These clauses are anti-competitive, and they undermine the freedom of working people. They benefit only corporations who seek to control working people by denying us fundamental rights. We all know how coercive corporations can be in forcing workers to comply with rules that benefit only corporate interests at the expense of working people. Too many working people have their job prospects and means of support undermined because their employers coerced or tricked them into signing clauses that prevent them from moving on in their careers. The freedom to seek employment where and when one chooses is fundamental to our democratic republic. These non-compete clauses do grave harm to the American people, and they should be blocked. If corporations are so worried about their precious secrets, they can negotiate agreements not to share secrets with future employers. Non-compete clauses are bad for the nation. Please do the right thing and approve this necessary rule. Thank you."

R	"I've been approached by many of the clients of the company I work for, especially since covid, and have been offered better jobs. These weren't just a little better, they were much better. Increases in pay by 25-50%, 100% covered health insurance, tenure, etc. The company I currently work for has a one year non-compete, which is crazy. Please do away with non-competes !"
Senta	"Agree the non compete clause should be banned. It will allow for others to flourish and the industry not be so restricted."
Donald	"I support the banning of non-compete clauses. In the medical field we have a shortage of workers. This is exacerbated when available workers are unable to work due to contractual restrictions"
Emily	"I am a practicing PA in Ohio. I would be in full support of banning non compete clause in employment contracts as it would expand opportunity and ensure fair pay."
Zachariah	"This is long overdue, let's discuss Non competes on skilled labor, for specificity, mechanics. Several large companies use non competes, often times hidden in the onboarding process and not discussed during hiring/interview process. For example, several of my good friends worked for one of these companies. They are mechanics by trade, they invest thousands of dollars in tooling and years perfecting their craft. The non compete that was just another "click box" and stated you cannot work as a mechanic for 9 months within 75 miles! This effectively forces a mechanic to stay working for this company or move cities. This is extremely restrictive on the mechanic, and allows the employer to hold all the power. They can change your pay, vacation, hours and treat you like trash with zero repercussions. This is almost like forcing someone to stay in an abusive relationship. If they leave, they can't work in a field that they spent years, and thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of dollars on tools perfecting their craft. Often times, this leaves mechanics to work in random positions where they cannot earn the appropriate amount of money while they wait for the non compete to run out. This financially impacts the mechanic and decreases the taxable income that government entities can collect. Or worse, they go work in their field, and get sued by a major corporation with bottomless pockets for pointless lawsuits. Often times leading to financial ruin for the mechanic. When we look at white collar fields, I.E. Lawyers and Doctors, their non competes are often times thrown out. Its time to provide blue collar workers with the same legal protection as white collar workers. Eliminating non competes will force employers EARN the loyalty of their employees, and allow employees to leave abusive relationships without facing huge financial repercussions. Let the free market compete. +1 for competition, +1 for freedom"

Benjamin	"NDAs should be banned. They are not helpful for employees or workers. If we are going to continue to allow non-competes companies should be force to compensate former workers for loss of income due to non-competes."
Mike	"I am all for this to go through as I was approached by a competing company and they are offering me far more than I am making A company vehicle plus full paid medical benefits. I am currently working in Ohio but the competitor is in Michigan. Only issue is I'm a field service engineer in a specific field and only few company's in this field so I believe this should pass. It makes for a better paid employee and less for the guy up top who wants to fatten his wallet instead of pay his employees a fair wage."
Krista	"I am in support of banning noncompete clauses. Noncomplete clauses negatively impact my family's income, morale, and wellbeing."
Sam	"am in support of banning noncompete clauses. Noncomplete clauses negatively impact my income, morale, and well being."
Scott	"I totally support the ban of these non-compete rules. The ban will serve as a great correction of what amounts to self serving injustice perpetrated on employees across the market by those who yield power and influence in society and government. Let the bosses eat cake and pay up for talent like the rest of the free market."
Alexandra	"This comment is in support of the work that is being done to eliminate non-compete clauses in employee contracts. I have worked for a large academic medical center for 7+ years now. The non-compete clause in my original contract has prevented me from being able to pursue opportunities at other area hospitals that have offered better pay, benefits, maternal support, and work/life balance. The non-compete that I signed includes a 10-mile radius, and last 18 months. In a small- to-medium sized city, all hospitals fall within this range. It has felt that my only option for pursuing better opportunities is to uproot my young family, take my husband away from his job, and relocate to another city away from our larger families. It feels that we are being taken advantage of, and have no leverage to argue for better treatment."
Laeth	"Hello. I am an Oncologist . Non-compete agreements are used to place healthcare workers into restrictive covenants, reduce competition, and keep employees in poor work environments. Furthermore, they are often written in a way that, should the employee leave, they cannot reasonably take a new job in the same city, necessitating either leaving the workforce for an extended period of time or moving entirely. Furthermore, the rule should be written to include non-profit hospitals, as most hospitals are "non-profit", even those that generate billions in revenue. They should not be exempt from the rule, and employees should be allowed to switch jobs without being punitively restricted and limited."
Laeth	"I am strongly in support of banning non-compete agreements across the board. They are used to trap employees into toxic work environment with highly restrictive covenants. This is rampant in medicine. If you are a physician, and wish to change jobs, you are nearly always facing the threat of a non-compete and legal action to do so. Banning non-competes would support workers across all industries and strengthen employee rights and wellbeing."

ChrisTian	"The noncompetes law is unfair and should be removed from all contracts for physicians working for any hospital whether non profit or for profit. As the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as not for profit in name, this rule may not have the consequences a lot of physicians are hoping for. In an environment where large non-profit hospital systems currently have so much of a competitive advantage over independent practices that are struggling to stay afloat, keeping non-competes for non-profits but not for other employers would provide an unfair advantage against private practices and for profit health systems. Given that the operating model of not for profit health systems may not be significantly different than for profit health systems, this rule seems arbitrary and much to the advantage of several of our country's largest and most profitable hospital systems that happen to have not for profit status in mine."
Christian	"Non compete clause should be banned on all levels. It distrust family lives and decrease opportunities and keep wages at low level. For physicians, the patients are now limited by their insurance so the argument that the hospitals make that the patients will leave the practice to follow them is not strong. Even if a patient wants to follow a physician, it should not limit a physician to find a new job in the city so they don't have to disrupt their entire life by moving out of state."
Sudip	"I very strongly support this proposed rule by the FTC to eliminate non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Studies have shown that the elimination of non-compete clauses can be a significant contributing factor in driving competition and faster product development. An example is the state of California where the elimination of non-compete has helped the state become competitive in creating new knowledge and products. I think this proposal will position US very well to be competitive in the future."
Brian	"I support the FTC's proposal to federally ban exploitative noncompete agreements. These are non-competes that have no bearing on the nature of a person's employment due to the fact that their work is easily replaceable, and they do not possess knowledge or expertise that will compromise the business of their former employer. This can include most wage labor in the US."
Kathleen	"I am writing to support the FTC's non-compete rule. Non-competes have been widely used in situations where they don't make any sense. Originally non-competes were used for top level executives to prevent them from going to work for the competition and using information they had gained in their previous work for a competitor. These were high-ranking employees or contractors who could survive a year of non-competition by doing other work. I knew someone who managed to do this after he left a high level position. But I was talking to a worker in a chain sandwich shop one evening a few years ago and we asked her about the non-competes and found out the workers in their shop were subject to them. That is outrageous. It keeps low wage workers from moving to other jobs that pay better or have better benefits. Even for the higher wage workers like my friend, a non-disclosure of information can be equally effective to a non-compete. I support this proposed rule."

Mini	"As a Physician for 23 years I have firsthand witnessed the destructive effects of non-compete clauses on patient care and physician careers. They create monopolies, especially by major hospital systems. They need to become illegal to preserve the integrity of medicine, which is to always put patient care first!"
Aaron	"I started working for a healthcare IT company right out of college and have stayed with them for the past 11 years. Initially my non-compete time frame was 1 year but in the past 11 years that has slowly crept up first to 1.5 years and now to 2. These new dates apply to me as I've signed up to be a part of certain incentive programs offered. As my family was preparing for a move two years ago, I was looking into other employment opportunities but felt severely restricted in options due to the non-compete. The list of blocked companies include customers and competitors and is 44 pages long with three columns per page. Since my current company is continuing to diversify into new areas of healthcare IT, essentially the entire field is inaccessible to me since almost any company might interfere in an area currently sold by my company or actively under development. This was my first job out of college and though it wasn't my area of study but I have loved it and excelled at it. However, I would be extremely hard pressed to find a job for 2 years while I wait out my non-compete time if I wanted to continue in an area where I've worked for over a decade. This would really negatively impact my ability to support my two children with my partner. It should not be this difficult to get a new job in an area where I have extensive experience and passion."
Thomas	"The use of "non-competes" is an abomination and should be banned, and/or made to be unenforceable. They restrict employment choices in an asymmetrical power structure between employer and employee. Only the most highly paid employees can afford to sit out a year before moving to another firm in the same industry. Real trade secrets are quite rare in most businesses, and these "agreements" are designed to trap employees and reduce compensation expenses. Find a way to make these, along with "confidentiality" agreements non enforceable."
Nav	"This is a landmark decision and I hope it goes through. Hospitals and physician employers use the financial clout to tie down doctors to unfair contracts and then threaten the physician livelihoods by imposing those non-compete clauses. Hospital Administrators use non-compete clauses in contract as a cudgel to beat down physicians and force them to literally indentured labor. This has to stop. Thank you."
Andrew	"This ruling would be a huge benefit to workers who are often laid off in droves but then told they can't work elsewhere. In the very least you should be allowed to work anywhere in the case if being let go."
Rachel	"I write in favor of a federal ban on non-compete clauses. As an employee at a large company with locations all across the United States, my contract requires

	a non-compete period of one (1) year that I cannot work for my employer's competitors in the city in which I live. As a new homeowner, if I wanted to leave at the end of my contract, I would have to either leave the industry I've worked so hard and accumulated so much student loan debt to be in, or sell my home and move to another city. It also removes any leverage I have when negotiating raises. Seven years with the same company means my wages have stagnated, compared to my peers who have moved every two years as their contracts expire and other companies make better offers to them. If I left the industry, I would have to start over on a new career path, in which I would likely not receive commiserate compensation due to the lack of experience. It's a no-win situation. From what I've witnessed when other employees have left the company and the industry in order to stay in the city where they have put down roots and are building their lives, my company and its market competitors have had decades of experience flee the industry all together. This means we can no longer serve the public and our stakeholders to the degree that they deserve."
Nancy	"I am an Ohio attorney and a Certified Specialist in Employment Law. I have advised many employees about their non-compete agreements, and litigated several. Noncompete "agreements" keep people from doing the work that they are most qualified to do. They force people to stay at work in a bad environment. Or, they add an extra kick in the butt on the way out the door, especially when enforced against an employee who was discharged without good cause. National and international companies write agreements to prevent any employee from working in the employee's field anywhere the company is located. Even an NCA which is so broad that it would be unenforceable under state law requires employees to incur legal fees to challenge the overbroad agreement in court, in states such as Ohio where the legal rule is to "balance interests" based on the specific facts. An unemployed employee is unlikely to be able to support the cost such litigation. NCA agreements supposedly legitimate business interests, but the thumb is on the scale against the public interest."
mohit	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to bring to your attention an issue that affects the employment of physicians in the United States. Specifically, I would like to discuss the non-compete clauses that are often included in physicians' employment contracts and how they can be exploitative and harmful to these healthcare professionals. As you may be aware, non-compete clauses are contractual agreements that restrict an employee from working for a competing business or in a similar profession for a certain period of time after leaving their current employer. While these clauses are common in many industries, they can have particularly damaging effects on physicians. Firstly, non-compete clauses can limit a physician's ability to practice medicine in their desired location. These clauses often restrict a physician's ability to practice within a certain geographic radius of their current employer, which can make it difficult for physicians to find work in their chosen specialty in a location that is convenient for them and their patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can limit a physician's ability to negotiate better employment terms. When a physician is faced with a non-compete clause, they may feel pressured to accept whatever terms their employer offers, as the consequences of not doing

	so could be severe. This can leave physicians in a vulnerable position where they are unable to negotiate for better pay, benefits, or working conditions. Finally, non-compete clauses can limit patient choice and access to care. If a physician is restricted from practicing in a certain area or working for a certain period of time, patients in that area may not have access to the care they need. This can lead to longer wait times, higher costs, and lower quality care. In summary, non-compete clauses in physicians' employment contracts can be exploitative and harmful to these healthcare professionals, as well as the patients they serve. I urge you to take action to ensure that physicians are not subject to such clauses, or at the very least, that these clauses are subject to rigorous scrutiny to ensure that they are not unfairly limiting physicians' employment opportunities. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, Mohit Gupta MD"
Smriti	"To whom it may concern, Noncompete clauses stifle the ability of any physician to provide well meaning and continuous care to their patients at the whim a current employer. Physicians should not have to move towns or even states in order to be in the next employable location. Rural America can't afford for a doctor to be driven out because they're not allowed to work at the clinic down street. Noncompete clauses should be illegal; two parties signing a contract now should not limit the employment capabilities of either of them in the future."
Lila	"Noncompete clauses should absolutely be abolished. This is terrible for our economy, and it's terrible for negotiations, and puts too much power in a central authority."
Noah	"Free the chains of corporate slavery"
PD	"I am writing to express that physicians and healthcare systems (profit and nonprofit systems) should NOT be excluded from the non complete clause rule. It is imperative to ban non compete clauses for all professions including physicians, NPs, dentists and PAs. As it has been clearly outlined that non compete clauses restrict the employer's ability to work fora certain period of time after leaving a job. There could be multiple reasons for physicians and non physicians to leave their job from a certain health care system (burnout, bad hours, negative workplace culture etc) and not being able to find a job in the vicinity of home can be incredibly detrimental to any profession (including physicians who have worked very hard in their career to get to this point). It can also be a disservice to the population and patient's they serve as these patient's need to reestablish care with different providers they might not trust. This is more so the case in rural areas as well where there is a provider shortage to begin with. It is important that we think of patients and their care in this matter and allow all providers in any healthcare system to be able transition to different more meaningful jobs with better job satisfaction as they please. Multiple studies have shown that job satisfaction is the single most predictor to providing meaningful and valuable care to patients. Therefore, I urge to ban non compete clauses for all providers in any profit or non profit healthcare systems."

Gee	"Please do not allow "nonprofit" hospitals to have exemption from noncompetes. It is leading to erosion of healthcare and the healthcare exodus and will exacerbate the shortage of workers. Only when they have to pay a fair wage will healthcare improve!"
Scott	"Non-competes are ethically unsound, most often punitive, and have done plenty of harm to innovation and competition in American life. I understand the desire to protect IP, but a non-disclosure agreement can do exactly the same thing without also removing someone and their work from the market entirely. Please support this rule!"
S	"The prohibition of non-compete clauses should also apply to the Franchise industry. Franchisors create Franchise Agreements favorable to themselves by detailing Franchisees' responsibilities but leaving theirs vague, allowing them to manufacture any number of reasons to label a Franchisee noncompliant and seize their business. Because the Franchisor/Franchisee relationship is not one of business partners nor employer/employee, the laws/rules/rights governing them do not apply. The only recourse available to harmed/wronged Franchisees is a self-financed legal battle, which is cost prohibitive to the Franchisee (if said Franchisee can even find a knowledgeable lawyer to take their case), and regardless of the outcome, will not make the Franchisee whole. Non-compete clauses not only deny individuals the ability to utilize their expertise to make a living (Imagine investing in and operating a restaurant for 10 years then being told you can no longer own/manage a restaurant <- some franchises have saturated viable territories) and deprives communities of goods/services. No one should have to uproot their families to protect the noncompetitive whims of a corporation."
Gary	"These non competes are very hannhamrful to workers and are often written in a way that makes them illegal anyways... but only those with resources to fight in court can do anything about it. if we're going to be in a willing employee willing employer at will arrangement, then both parties need to be able to move on if it doesn't work out. The best non compete is to keep people in your team and let someone else have them if you don't want them."
Tom	"Non-compete contracts serve to monopolize the lives of individuals by corporations. Regulate them out of existence."
Linda	"Right now, noncompete agreements are being unethically used across the country to prevent workers from quitting their jobs for a better offer. Competition drives markets — and when noncompetes eliminate competition in the labor market, employers don't have an incentive to give their workers better pay, working conditions, or benefits. One in five American workers have signed noncompete agreements — and it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly bound to their jobs by noncompetes. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompetes to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompetes would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people — but the FTC hasn't approved the policy yet. Please rule against non-compete clauses and help keep both America and its workers strong!"

Stacey	"It is time to Ban Noncompete Agreements. I worked for the same organization for eighteen years, the company sold to a large corporate organization. I was let go and held to a non compete for the corporate company that resulted in unemployment compensation with the need for legal representation. I have been working in the same career field for most of my life and found it to be a true challenge to change careers. It is selfish for any company to control a person's right to work. In my opinion, we should all have the right to work!"
Dennis	"I say, yes, it's about time these noncompete clauses are eliminated! In California, where they have eliminated noncompete clauses, it has been a big boon to the economy, especially the tech sector. People are not intellectual property."
Tim	"I think that banning non-compete agreements is a good thing for the economy and for employees. I have been thinking about starting up my own IT business for over 3 years now, but I am unable to since my non-compete agreement with my employer mandates that I am not able to do so for a period of two years after the termination of my employment from my current company. This is the exact reason why I have not yet begun to run my own company. I would be able to make substantially more money from running my own business than what I am currently making. The non-compete that I am currently bound by prevents that and I think that it would definitely be better if they were banned."
Anna Maria	" Physicians , including those in not for profit hospitals, should not be forced to sign non-compete rules. Non-competes negatively impact families and communities when people are forced to move to seek a positive employment situation, and physicians are not exempt from this."
Martha	"I support getting rid of non competes"
Emily	"It's completely ridiculous and crippling that these clauses still exist. It keeps people stuck in jobs that are toxic and miserable for the fear that they won't be able to get another job and support their families."
Marc	"I am a salesman with 30+ years experience, and there is nothing more harmful to careers and growth in this country than monopolistic non compete clauses. I was separated from service by my previous employer, and my non compete essentially states: that I am not allowed to solicit or conduct business similar to my previous employer's ANYWHERE in the country for the next two years (even in states where they have little to no business), I violate the agreement my former employer will seek $250 a day in liquidated damages (an average client was $1,000 annual revenue), I am also not allowed to make contact with anyone that was a customer in the last 5 years or any prospect that was contacted within the 12 months leading up to my departure; frankly, when the paychecks stop, so should the obligations to my former employer."

	The nature of the company was a non financial brokerage representing 30 +/- vendors/suppliers - my employer did not market or brand any internal products, we only sold and marketed the products furnished by vendors/suppliers. The only function that was proprietary in nature was the customer resource manager (CRM): that information could not be obtained by ordinary means and it was reasonable for the employer to protect it. So long as you (former employee) didn't have the CRM list, and didn't coerce customers to break their agreements, the employer should have no grievance. The state I reside in tends to favor a former employee's ability to make a living BUT the fact that the non compete agreement exists (even if unenforceable) is a major problem."
Preston	"Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."
Hannah	"I fully support doing away with non compete contracts! In my industry of cosmetology, I have seen peoples' careers ruined when they choose to leave a salon to enter a new one. Clients should not ever be told who they can see for their hair, and this is what a non compete in my industry does."
Nathan	"I agree with this 100%."
Julia	"I support the ban for non-compete clauses. I, along with millions of other people, have been affected and feel trapped by this clause. I will have a better chance of being successful if the non-compete clause is banned. There will also be many more businesses and a lot more happy people doing what they love without any consequences like being sued and losing their hard earned money. Another reason why this ban should go through is because the government supports small businesses. They rely more and more on small businesses to pay taxes and help boost the economy in a better way. Overall, there are many benefits to not only the people, but to the government and economy of this country if the non-compete clause is banned."

Thomas	"Please act swiftly to prohibit the misuse of non-compete agreements that currently leave many workers in a state of indentured servitude. In my career working as a manager for a national nonprofit community development organization, I'm increasingly seeing non-compete agreements used to keep contract workers from moving into full-time positions with benefits. I haven't had a staff member leave my team in over ten years because I work hard to see that they're fairly compensated, have competitive benefits, and feel like they're valued as team members. Non-compete agreements are an unacceptable and un-American alternative to keeping employees at your business because they want to continue to work for you."
Janos	"No more non-compete clauses!"
Andrew	"Non-competes, especially in a recession, severely limit the ability of Americans to seek gainful employment and stay afloat. Even if companies choose to not enforce them, many candidates encounter issues with prospective employers choosing to not move forward with employment due to the risk associated with non-compete agreements. However, while non-competes often have no legal standing, companies with money to burn in the courts can (and will) choose to tie up hardworking Americans in court to prove a point. Any policy or practice that seeks to keep Americans from achieving gainful employment should be struck down with extreme intensity. Non-compete agreements are one of the single most oppressive forms of reducing honest citizens from achieving the American Dream."
Abdul	"Noncompete is a form of modern slavery as it take the freedom from a person to make a living in an area of his preference or must put up by unjust work conditions or abusive leadership. If you work in a place for 20 years and you have all your family affairs organized in a certain way, then a boss decided you are no good anymore, he can uproot you from your home to a far place or force you to change a job or quit your job completely. I m surprised it is legal in the first place."
Brett	"This is a great a idea, and has been too long in coming."
Shane	"Having a company being able to dictate where you cannot work afterward is a direct attack on freedom and the founding principles of this country. I work in manufacturing where many manufacturers are within the same field. If, for any reason, I decide to leave for a better opportunity, or I am terminated, my job opportunities for the field quite literally have the most experience in, is next to nothing. My ability to take care of myself, and my bills, will diminish. As an American I am sickened by companies having the ability to control their employees lives as such. Ban this immediately."
Nikki	"Please end the ability for large employers to use non-compete clause rules. I am a US physician who opposes the ability of employers to restrict my ability to work and practice using non-compete clause rules in contracts. As health systems buy small independent medical practices, they reduce the ability of independent medical practices to compete for services. If physicians decide to leave their employer and start their own practice, the limited radius around the large health system does not allow for a practice to start. That, combined with a state's Certificate of Need laws, may restrict the physician from practicing at all near their established home and family. Further, with more than 75% of physicians employed, individual physician practices are fewer, and there is little chance for a new or existing smaller business to grow and compete with these large health systems. This essentially gives large health systems a monopoly on health care over more affordable and personable small practices."

Aj	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the use of non-compete clauses in physician employment contracts, particularly within not-for-profit, major hospitals, and academic institutions. As a physician who has experienced the detrimental effects of such clauses firsthand, I am compelled to advocate for the abolishment of these restrictions in the interest of our patients, medical professionals, and the overall healthcare system. Throughout my career, I have witnessed so-called not-for-profit major hospitals and institutions behave in an alarmingly capitalistic manner, taking over entire markets and squeezing out independent practitioners and small practices. The utilization of non-compete clauses only exacerbates this one-sided power dynamic. By restricting physicians' ability to compete with these organizations, non-competes enable large corporations to dominate the healthcare landscape, ultimately driving out the independent practices that provide vital services to our communities. healthcare landscape. Thank you for your time and consideration. I urge you to take action on this critical issue that impacts the lives of countless patients, healthcare professionals, and the overall well-being of our nation."
Gregory	"I would like to add my voice to the range of comments in support of eliminating noncompete clauses and opposing the attempt to exclude physicians from this rule. As a primary care provider in the medical industry, I can assure you that the shortage of primary care is dire enough without the further restrictions imposed by noncompete clauses, which restrict physician autonomy, three relocations, and deter actively working in the field for up to months to avoid these restrictions. It is further the point that the demand for primary care in particular is always greater than the supply of providers, and that there is very little credible argument to be made on behalf of hospital systems to need to retain their patients at so high a cost to their employees, when new patients at the primary care level are so easily found if you have providers to care for them. Beyond this, the pressure behind recent movements towards physician striking and unionization may be alleviated if by enabling more dynamic physician relocation, the market can better address physician needs and improve treatment and match between hospitals and their providers, rather than leave work stoppages and collective bargaining as the only means of recourse. For these reasons I believe it serves physicians and the public at large better to do away with these restrictions that serve only to benefit only the hospital systems themselves at our collective expense."
A	"I am a medical oncologist. I had to leave town- and state- when my employer (a hospital system- changed my compensation terms. I had to do it again when we had a new leader that created a toxic environment at work. I had to uproot

	my family every time and compromise continuity of care for my patients. This is not fair. This clause should be outlawed."
J	"Very important to eliminate non-compete clauses so individuals are able to pursue the best option for themselves and their families. Non-compete clauses put undue burden on the individual often forcing them to leave a city or state to pursue a different opportunity."
Mohamed	"The physician should be included in this noncompete. The physician should not be excluded or rules out The physician should be able to work with no concerns about noncompete"
Jagdish	"It's about time we get rid of all kinds of restrictive covenants. Hospital association statement is not representative of my position."
Jonathan	"I support this proposal. I believe noncompetes are too restrictive and a form of indentured servitude. I also would like to see legislation that prevents companies from inserting language into severance agreements that state the employee agrees not to sue their employer. I believe that these employers are preying on distressed workers who may sign off on that without realizing the implications. I personally know someone who was discriminated against due to a disability and cannot take action because she signed such an agreement."
Tara	"I am physician myself and mother to 2 toddler. I recently resigned from my position at a non profit hospital due to mis treatment. Due to non compete I cannot work for 1 year in the city. My husband's has a good established job and we own the house and have family in the city. So moving city is not in the favor of our family. I will be losing a year worth of wages due to non compete. This should be abolished which will lead to better treatment of physician and in turn will lead to better care of our patients."
Thomas	"I have worked at several banks in a lower level professional position. I have been subject to several non compete agreements. Most of the companies I have worked for primarily used this as a threat to not leave the company while only offering paltry raises. Because of this I didn't work nearly as hard as I could have because I felt that I wasn't being fairly compensated for my work but it was difficult to leave because the threat of litigation. Most recently my prior employer had sent an email to my new employers legal team threatening lawsuits. Their non-compete was overly broad and the former employer said I couldn't work anywhere in the US because they had a national footprint. Luckily my new employer saw through the BS and let me retain my job, but the fear of having to take off an entire year with a family just because of a petty company really did cause a ton of stress. Non-compete agreements are a sham. With the Internet these days, nothing (outside some engineering information) is really proprietary. When it comes to finance, everyone knows everyone else's rates/programs/terms so the non-competes are just used to enforce giving out 1.5-2% raises and to save large companies money to further their record profits."

Dennis	"I strongly support the efforts to make it easier for workers to exercise their rights."
Alina	"I am a veterinarian who moved from CA where non-competes were illegal to OH where I was forced to sign one. There is a shortage of vets and this is a contributing factor. This shortage is a threat to public health. These clauses need to be replaced with non solicitation agreements. It would be a great boon to the veterinary profession and animal owners if non competes were banned."
Masuma	"I wholeheartedly support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements."
Owais	"We as physicians are most affected by it forcing us to make major life changing decisions. This cruelty should end once for all."
Scott	"I support the proposed rule to ban the use of non-compete contracts. I have personally been restricted by such which kept me from accepting employ that would have significantly increased my income. It is widely understood that companies use these contracts to protect "trade secrets" or "customer base" but in doing so they can restrict employees, almost penalizing them, with little to no compensation increases, Often workers are almost trapped into signing these contracts. Often they will have already left a previous job, and not know of these contracts, until the first day filling out a stack of paperwork with their new employer. What can they do at that point? The amount of wages lost by the worker is thousands (in my case ten's of thousands) per year due to not being able to accept other offers, and offered little, often no, pay increases because the company knows you cannot leave. I am 64 years old so the damage is done in my case but please, for the sake of all who come behind, please eliminate these contracts."
Erin R.	"I fully support this proposed rule limiting the use of non-compete clauses. My nephew has been struggling to find a new job for nearly a year now after being forced to leave his employer's hostile and abusive workplace. While he has been able to find multiple open positions in his field they have all been barred from hiring him solely due to his prior employer's non-negotiable inclusion of a non-compete clause in his employment contract."
Richard	"Non competes are extremely unfair to workers. I am unemployed and have been for about 5 months. I was working for a company that began to have a hostile work environment, and was planning on quitting in a few months. The owner found out, asked if that was true, I replied honestly, then she made me sign a non-compete. I could have quit on the spot to not sign it, but at that time I was not prepared to quit. I signed it and quit about 4 months later. Now I can't get a job in my field anywhere because of it, I thought it was going to be less limiting but I was severely wrong. I would have gotten hired on at 2 places for a respectable salary, but both times my non-compete blocked it. None of the knowledge or skills I learned at my previous job are in any way secret and I could in no way affect my old workplace's success by working for a competitor. I work in education, my previous job was as an IT bootcamp instructor. Please for god's sake end non-competes; after having felt the very real effects of one, I realize that they are madness and should not be legal."

Suat	"I am a physician that is looking for independent practice jobs for the first time. Many hospital systems and practices have non-complete clauses as part of their contracts. We as physicians can be highly specialized and sometimes only able to work in certain geographic regions or urban centers. If we have a geographic location that ties us down to a certain region, we sometimes only have one or two job offers to choose from. Since hospitals know this, they are able to get us to agree to non-compete clauses. This then makes it even more difficult to switch jobs in that same geographic location. The hospitals can use this to their advantage and treat us poorly. This can lead to physicians feeling like they are stuck at their job, further worsening the physician burnout problem that is so widespread. This rule should apply for nonprofit hospitals as well as for-profit hospitals. There are many non-profit hospitals that have non-complete clauses."
Brandon	"Hello, Non-compete agreements are anti-competitive and encourage hospital monopolies, which hurt patients, employees, and communities. Physicians do not possess any "trade secrets" that they can carry from hospital to hospital. Rather, physicians work to share and advance knowledge globally, adhering to a standard of care determined by national guidelines. Hospitals should retain their physicians by creating the best working conditions for patients and employees, rather than using the threat of lawsuits to prevent physicians from working at the best-run places within many miles. As such, the most powerful for profit and non-profit hospitals systems are not necessarily the ones that work to employ the best doctors but the ones that hire the best lawyers. This muzzles the capacity for physicians to act as patient advocates, knowing that they can be fired and not be able to find work in their communities where their children go to school, they go to places of worship, and their families have built friendships with neighbors. Rather, each decision to speak up must be weighed against potentially having to uproot their entire lives. Nobody can say that the shift to move medical decision making and leverage away from doctors and to administrators, lawyers, and MBAs have resulted in more compassionate, efficient, or patient-focused care in the past twenty years. Removing non-competes for physicians as well would balance these forces and make hospitals work harder to support the patient-physician relationship. Thank you. Sincerely, Brandon Kim"
Angela	"I fully support making non-compete clauses illegal. I am a veterinarian and have worked for two veterinary practices that had non-compete clauses in their contracts. After I left my first job, I moved states to get away from the non-compete restrictions. I just left my second job this summer. I had worked at this practice for almost 8 years and now have a child. We have deep roots in the community. The non-compete covers 30 miles around the main clinic and 10 miles around the two satellite clinics. However, the practice also sees cattle and it covers all dairy cattle clients seen within the last year. This takes out most of western Ohio for me. I really would have to move far away again to escape this. It lasts for two years. We don't want to uproot our family so I had to get creative on how to make an income for two years until I can start my own practice where I live or work for a neighboring practice. You shouldn't have to move when you leave a job. I understand employers don't want a good vet leaving and their clients following them. But, I don't think I should be punished for making a mistake to work for a practice that didn't value me appropriately."

Megan	"Please include physicians in the proposed rule for removing non-compete clauses. The AHA does not speak for all physicians and there is no need for us to have that clause in our contracts."
Timothy	"My name is Timothy King. I'm a Certified Registered Nurse Anesthetist and provide anesthesia services in rural and underserved areas of Southern/Southeastern Ohio. I decided to leave xx as a W2 employee and become an Independent Contractor. I was contacted by two different critical access hospitals to provide anesthesia services for them. Unfortunately at xx, they have a nine county non compete. Because of this, those individuals in the rural area are now not able to receive my anesthesia services. I full agree with outlawing the non-compete cause. Thank you for your time."
Mark	"As a hospital employed physician practicing in my hometown, I am worried about my ability to continue to provide service to my patients. Our hospital ownership has changed multiple times. My contract has a non-compete clause and it rolls over to the new ownership group with each change. If ownership changes to another group that wants me to practice in ways opposing my personal and professional beliefs, I will be forced to move from my hometown and force my patients to have to find another provider. Some groups value volume of patients seen over quality of care, and I am not going to put my patients at risk in order to crank out more volume of patient revenue."
Homer	"My wife has a cleaning business . She is a subcontractor with a large cleaning company. We live in a rural town in Ohio and when the company she is subcontracted through lost the contract that made her lose her job. The big company had her sign a non compete clause that has a 2 year maturity date. She can not bid on the job because of the clause. So in turn her income took a hit and so did her employee. If this rule were to pass it would mean more money for our family and her employee. We have been struggling ever since. This only wouldn't affect my family but other families who can't get work because of the non compete clause. I stand behind this rule!!!"
Stefan	"I am fully in support of this proposed rule. Non-competes are ridiculous. Companies should have to compete for workers just like they have to compete for customers, and workers should have the right to both leave employment and seek employment at-will."
Venugopal	"I agree with the proposition that non compete should be banned"
Ken	"Physician non-competes hurt patients and limit care options in communities. I support the proposal to eliminate non-competes for physicians. We have cases in my practice where competent physicians are forced to either drive over an hour to practice until the non-compete expires. This forces additional stress of physicians and families and ultimately robs patients of health care. Non-compete clauses are unethical and anti-American. Non-compete clauses for physicians are dangerous for patients and a critical spear in the heart of physician well-being. Please eliminate non-compete clauses for physicians."

Bonnie	"I support the banning of noncompete clauses. I was sued by a former employer for breaking a noncompete when they decided to move to a foreign country and told me they could not guarantee me full-time hours, and that I would have to take on sales duties when I was a network engineer consultant. I had an eight month old baby and had just put an addition on my house, I gave my notice and was hired by a client that was 20 miles from my employers business. They lost the suit but it cost my employer $30,000 to defend me. It is unfair for employers to hold employees hostage. There was no way I would have been able to get , a comparable paying job by going into die open market place and I just didn't have time to pursue that. Currently I would like to hire a former consultant, but I am not able to because lie is held under a noncompete for the next nine months. It would help my organization which is a nonprofit if we could hire him full- time. He wants to work with us. I believe that this is hindering his right to the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness. Thank you."
Michael	"Hello, I am currently subject to a non-compete for an engineering industry which I have working in since graduating college 22 years ago. I left my previous employer after the company was acquired by another company with indications to move many of my responsibilities out of the USA. I have recently left the specific industry but I'm finding it difficult to find comparable positions in other industries because all of my specific knowledge and experience are really gear to toward the particular industry for which I was previously involved with. I have ended up taking a lower paying and less senior position to consume time for my non-compete to expire and allow me to go work for a local competitor in the previous industry where my background is applicable. My non-compete also is claiming global coverage, which could possibly be fought in court, but I do not have the funds to go against my previous employer, and I do not particularly want to move out of the state of Ohio or the USA to find another position. I support the proposed federal ban on non-competes and sincerely hope you are able to remove non-competes for my families future well being."
Amogh	"Non-competes have been traditionally unfair and benefit the employer asymmetrically, while also restricting an employee's rights and their ability to provide for their loved ones."
Michael	"I agree with the removal of noncompete agreements from the labor market. I am currently under a noncompete and it has greatly thwarted my ability to freely and easily switch companies while still utilizing my own hard earned knowledge in the market I am employed in. If my employer is allowed to fire me at will without any reason, I too should be able to quit and move on wherever I choose. Although the reason for noncompetes may seem like a good deterrent for trade secrets and IP, if I am truly a nefarious actor it would not stop anything A company should not have the authority to dictate an individuals future in such a way. My understanding is that California has done away with this practice and had not seen a negative impact with plenty of innovation and large companies prospering in the state. Give the power back to the individual and remove noncompete agreements from the labor market."

Dave	"I think that this is a fantastic idea. Too often employees unknowingly or unwittingly sign these agreements and are then threatened and bullied when they try to earn a living. The agreements stifle competition."
Balint	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to express my support of your recent ruling to ban non-compete clauses in the United States. As a soon-to-be practicing physician, I have seen firsthand how these clauses can be used to limit competition and stifle innovation in the medical field. These clauses have been used to limit the pay and benefits of physicians, as well as reducing their options for employment. This, in turn, has made it more difficult for new physicians to get started in their careers. By banning non-compete clauses, you have opened up more opportunities for physicians to find meaningful and fulfilling work. Not only does this ruling benefit physicians, but it also benefits the patients that we serve. By increasing competition, physicians are able to offer more competitive prices for services, which will ultimately lead to better care for patients. I am thankful for your ruling and the positive impact it will have on the medical industry. Your ruling will help to ensure that new physicians and patients alike are able to benefit from a competitive and innovative industry."
Umashankar	"The current existing rules are in favor of the corporate / hospitals. It has to be patient-centered and people need to have a choice. The simple fact that the corporate needs to employ attorneys to reinforce the compete clause, tells us the reality. Hence, I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule."
Brian	"I am in favor of a ban on non-competes in the US. I have worked in this industry for 25 years and am nearly unable to change jobs at this point. I know that I am paid —50% less than market value, but I can not change jobs due to this. This affects many people in my industry and numerous people have had to change entire industries even when laid off. In my opinion, a NSA and NDA should help protect employers"
Robert	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements One only need to look at California and Silicon Valley to see the value of not enforcing noncompete clauses. All of the innovation that has occurred there, may not have happened had noncompete clauses been enforced. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Robert Larson Plain City, OH 43064"

Stephen	"As a knowledge worker, I have been forced to sign non-compete clauses throughout my career even though I rarely have access to trade secrets or proprietary information and my employers' intellectual property has always been protected by patents, copyrights and non disclosure agreements. Most of the non-compete clauses I have been subject to have been aggressively broad and expansive to the point where the employer would try to claim that anything I created in the following years after I left the company would still be considered to be the property of that employer. Consequently, my opportunities for career advancement have been limited by the excessive restrictions that these agreements have imposed. At different times of my career, I have been effectively shut out of working for any company in various industries until these agreements expired even though some of those companies never competed directly. This limited which jobs I could apply to and prevented me from seeking better paying or more challenging roles at other firms. Employees like me rarely have the ability to negotiate the terms of these clauses let alone to refuse to sign them. Typically, we don't even see the terms of these clauses until we sign our employment contracts after accepting the position. Most HR departments consider non-compete clauses to be legal requirements that cannot be revised or adjusted. As a result, businesses have no incentive to write non-compete clauses fairly and in ways that balance their needs with those of the employee. Rather, these clauses are usually written with the most stringent restrictions permitted by law to include as many potential competitors as possible. Considering that intellectual property is protected in many ways and employers have other legal recourses to prevent IP theft by competitors, I strongly support the ban of non-compete clauses for all employees regardless of their title, salary or field of expertise."
Agnes	"I support the banning of non compete clauses in employment contracts. They are akin to holding hostage after you sign your own kidnapping because you had no choice."
David	"I think eliminating non compete clauses will be a great thing for the majority of workers. I am currently under a non compete as a home inspector. Where I should not be allowed to work as an inspector in the area for 3 years after leaving the company unless I pay $10,000 to the company. Not having the NCA would allow me to pursue starting my own business."
Robert	"Non-Compete agreements put employees in a similar state to an Indentured Servant in our colonial days. I am 72 but I intend to continue working I have only worked in the graphic arts industry in my lifetime, and I am now under a non-compete which virtually prevents me from working in that industry while the agreement is in effect. So, I must remain with my current employer or not work at all if I leave while the agreement is in effect. This unfairly restricts my ability to take a better position with another employer."
spencer	"Non-Competes are awful!! Please do not allow this!!"
Kristina	"I am a physician in Ohio. I was fortunate to have been hired just before non-competes were added to the contract. A non-compete only benefits the organization and requires them to do less to keep their employees. Employers

Mike	"Non-compete clauses, as they pertain to physicians, are a major reason for many issues in health care today as well as quality of life for physicians. They remove the ability of a physician to work, freely, often requiring them to work far from home or move. This causes multiple problems in that die location where the physician did live loses income tax revenue and a high earner, and the population loses an important medical resource. Many physicians are leaving medicine due to the overhearing control that non-competes give to employers. Physicians already cannot strike, and non-competes removed yet another freedom. As such, physicians are easily at the mercy of their employers whom often extract more work, for lower reimbursement, in poorer working conditions, a poorer work-life balance, without any worry of repercussions to the employer. When a physicians only options are to uproot their family, leave their community, only to find that die next employer also utilized non-competes, it makes the only viable option to get out of medicine as soon as possible. This is happening per the available current data. Non-competes keep doctors from moving to the hospital down the street which is competition. What should be keeping physicians from moving to the competition is competitive work environments and compensation. Free market, and freedom as our Forefathers envisioned and enshrined in our Constitution. I am an MD, MPH, and I have personally had my freedoms removed and life made harder due to non-competes."
Levi	"A non compete violates my rights by restricting my freedom of movement."
Isaac	"As a medical resident looking forward to and speaking with older colleagues, die negative effect of non-competes conies up time and again. A formerly well-established employed primary care physician who now needs to commute four hours daily to get to work was the first sign to me that this is a serious wrong. From speaking with other colleagues, I have heard similar stories. Proponents of non-competes speak of the investment in their employees they are at risk of losing should this proposal become law. This seems wrong. If the employer is not paying or treating the employee well enough that they need to tie them to their oar, shouldn't that employee have the right to leave? What sort of country would this be if we allow this semi-serfdom any longer. Please, in the strongest of terms, ban or significantly reduce non-competes. Competition is what makes our country strong!"

David	"In 2019, I accepted a Sales position with an asphalt company in Columbus, Ohio. This company required me to sign a non-compete agreement as terms of employment. Over the next 4 years, I had great success in sales and helped this company make millions in profit. Unfortunately, I also came to realize that the culture at this company (hostile work environment, dishonesty, nepotism and slow pay on commissions) was not for me and resigned my position last month (March 2023). The ownership was not happy that I left and even though two other employees had recently resigned without the company enforcing their non-compete agreements, the company has vigorously enforced my non-compete with threatening text messages and emails from their attorney reminding me of my non-compete agreement. They are also considering filing a lawsuit against me. My intent is not to steal any of their customers or do their business any harm but simply do what I do (sell asphalt jobs) with another paving company in town. The non-compete agreement is totally one-sided and they have not been willing to negotiate any type of concession that would allow me to work for another paving company without harming them. As a result, I will have to take a lessor paying job in a different industry until the time period (12 months) expires. FTC please ban all Non-Compete Agreements for individual employees. These agreements cause employees to be trapped in a bad work environment or face the prospect of less money at a job outside their field of expertise."
Jack	"Non competes have allowed no room for progression in my career. I was recently rejected for a promotion which has left me static in my role without any opportunity for growth in the foreseeable future. My current non compete is for two years and nationwide, the non compete is so broad that I have no opportunity to even explore other opportunities in different roles with other employers in the industry. Leaving the industry would be extremely tough and only lead to entry level positions which I cannot afford to do at this point in my life. I believe non competes at my level and with the current restrictions are extremely damaging for individuals like myself. They remove all avenues for career growth and are simply just a way for my current employer to keep me there."
Eamon	"I am writing to express support of the FTC's proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. I believe this rule will encourage employers to retain employees by negotiating in good faith rather than by limiting an employees employment options upon separation from an employer. Further as a healthcare worker I believe non-compete clauses act as a hindrance to an effective response to emergencies such as the covid- 19 as clinicians may be prohibited from obtaining employment where they are most needed. I fully support the FTC's proposal in it's current form."
Kevin	"Restrictive covenants (non-competes) are entirely one sided to favor the corporation. Some companies I've worked for claim the information they teach you on the job COULD be harmful to the company if you go to another business and share their proprietary information. If that were the case, couldn't they have you sign an NDA if your specific position uses aforementioned information, instead of prohibiting you from obtaining work without uprooting your family? I am NOT in favor of non-competes, I believe it should be unlawful to keep someone from working where they please."

Myka	"I am totally in favor of eliminating non-compete employment clauses and contracts. Not only are non-compete clauses anti worker, as they limit the ability of workers to capitalize off of their skills, they are bad for society at large by removing experts in fields who could be contributing potentially life changing advancements if allowed to seek employment in their respective field"
Alicia	"Healthcare is in crisis. Large non-compete hospitals, for profit insurance companies, and pharmaceutical middle men are driving costs and making it so difficult for providers. Removal of non-compete clauses FOR ALL SYSTEMS is so important in bringing back competition. When I care for a patient, it is my patient, not my system's patient. Why does the system (any hospital practice) get to own my relationship? I know the patient, not the system. Take a step in the right direction, remove the antiquated non-compete to protect the patient-provider relationship. Allow for some competition in theses systems!"
Valeria	"I am affected by a noncompete. It has limited me from seeking new employment even though I was paid less and worked substantially more at my prior job. I support this rule to remove noncompete clauses because it is unfair to the employee."
Mark	"As a physician I feel that noncompetet clause hurt everyone And need to be limited or done away with"
Katherine	"Non-compete clauses limit patients ability to access care and impede physician career opportunities."
C	"I am a physician , if I quit my job I will have to leave the entire region and uproot my family, because of non-compete. Employer knows this well, resulting in abusive work environment without real accountability"
Thomas	"Please support the free market. Do not continue to allow the indentured servitude of noncompete clauses"
Arun	"In regards to physician NPRM, these non-competes rules sometime extends the radius of non-compete to hundreds of miles, even listing cities and counties. This is providing organizations, which are forming bigger conglomerates each year, with unlimited power to put physicians under poor working conditions. Even if physicians love their community and patient population they are serving, instead of moving to a better working condition physicians are forced to completely move to a different city. This put enormous amount of stress on families including kids to move to a different city and start their lives afresh. This not only if physicians have to move from this poor conditions they are forced to move their families to a different city and sometimes states. This puts a lot of stress on patients who have developed trust with these physicians. Physicians also struggle to leave these patients behind and sometimes continue to work in these poor working conditions. So please include physicians as part of removing non-compete clause."

Aaron	"I have, in the past, been constrained by noncompete agreements. This could have made it difficult or impossible to find a job in my field, software programming I believe noncompete clauses are anticompetitive, stifle innovation, prevent employment, and should be made illegal."
Warren	"I support the banning of non-compete clauses. I am a control systems engineer . Non-competes have affected my career in numerous ways that are exploitative. I had to turn down my first job out of school due to an overly aggressive non-compete agreement. Due to the pervasiveness of non-competes, I have since reluctantly signed one. This has severely restricted my freedoms as a professional."
Andrew	"I support this rule because too many businesses are writing non-compete agreements that go too far. If I leave my job for a competitor, my current employer will sue me for breach of contract. It is up to me to prove to the court that the contract was unfair and prevented me from making a living. I really wish that the rules include fines for companies that violate this rule or fail to notify employees of their rights."
Matt	"I 100% support the banning of non-compete clauses from employment agreements. They serve only to hinder the upward mobility of workers and make it more difficult to advance in one's career."
Jennifer	"Currently dealing with a non-compete in Ohio! My husband was terminated for not doing some audit for his previous company, or the audit score was not high enough for "their" liking, meanwhile it was in the 90% range. Long story short they let him go, he has lost almost 30k in wages in 6 months, and now accepts a job and within 2 days of starting a new job he receives threatening emails, and mail from his previous company. So basically he can't make a living for his family, pay bills. How is this acceptable. They let him go!"
Mike	"In my IT career, starting in the early 1990s, I have seen these agreements h both grow in popularity with employers and be used to suppress employee mobility. Nothing we do was a true trade secret but a non-compete document can be used to deter employees from leaving for better paying jobs."
Anthony	"Non compete clauses are predatory unless the employee is paid so well that they can afford not to work for the period of non-compete enforcement. Most people suffering under these rules are not so lucky. They are anti-competitive and have no place in employment contracts. Companies afraid of workers going to a competitor or setting up their own business have a simple solution, offer the best working conditions and wages. This is the way."
Wisam	"I wholeheartedly support this rule as a physician who changed multiple jobs in my careers. I had experienced the brunt of no compete clauses in my contracts over and over, which resulted in my departure from communities I had worked at for many years and practices in which I established long term relationships with patients who needed me and my services."

Tim	"I support the proposed rule change in most cases for all classes of workers. An employee should not be contractually prohibited from supporting his/her family because of being tethered to a NCC. Someone who has 30+ years in an industry or a specific position, who is also over the age of 40 is currently prohibited from changing employers. Instead, the worker is expected to learn a new trade and earn the same or higher income immediately. This stifles competition for talent and puts an undue burden on the employee's ability to pursue better opportunities. Same with Senior executives. Franchises should not be held to a NCC, especially if the franchisor is not delivering the promises set forth in the franchise agreement."
Nina	"PLEASE pass this. As a writer , I have been forced to sign numerous noncompetes that have made it very hard for me to find new clients as nobody wants to work with someone who is under even a broad/vague noncompete. A previous colleague of mine was SUED by my former employer because she left to go to another PR firm, and lost and had to pay a ton of money to the toxic company she left. As more and more workers are working 2 jobs, working side hustles, and in the gig economy, noncompetes are unfair and limit our ability to make money."
Emily	"I am writing in favor of the Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM). As a veterinarian , I have been held to non-compete clauses for my entire career. These clauses make it challenging to move between jobs without relocating my family. Non-compete clauses allow employers to treat employees poorly with little recourse on the part of the employee. In addition, many non-compete clauses continue even in the face of an employer choosing not to renew a contract. Being left with no contract and no ability to work locally is unfair and unreasonable. I applaud the FTC on taking this action to ban non-compete clauses."
Bob	"I have been subject to 3 non competes. Two were for 1 yr each & my current one is for 2yrs. This is very restrictive & not involving any proprietary information. Most of the customers are the same as are products. Pricing is easily know. Companies just want to discourage taking folks from each other."
Arunab	"I support elimination of non-compete clauses. It suppresses wages and leads to individuals having to uproot their family for no reason."
Carmen	"Please stop non compete clauses for physicians. Rules for our profession should be no different than those for other health care professionals."
Vincent	"I am in agreement to continue this piece of law"
Bryan	"Strongly support the abolishment of noncompetes. In the medical setting, they compromise patient access and care to doctors they have been seeing for years by forcing doctors to move far away. And hospitals intentionally leverage this to lock physicians into undesirable contracts, taking advantage of their altruism and dedication to patient care knowing that they won't abandon their patients. The noncompetes force them to stay with the same group and accept the poor contract offer along with any other negative that come with that position they would like to leave."

Jennifer	"I am writing in favor of banning physician non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Upon completion of training, My husband, also a physician, and I both had to sign a noncompete clause at the start of our employment. Like most people, we were optimistic that this was where we could spend our career. Unfortunately, over half of physicians leave their first job within 5 years of employment (1). My husband soon realized that he would have to leave his current employment in order to be content in the practice of medicine. Although there were jobs available in his specialty in our city that would hire him, he was not able to start employment there because of the noncompete clause. Our family felt trapped. Ultimately, the noncompete clause caused us to have to leave our family, friends, and patients so that he could continue to work at another location 100 miles away. The negative effects of noncompete provisions in physician employment contracts are not limited to us. In recent years, more physicians have left independent practice in favor of employed positions, leading to an increase in non-compete clauses employment contracts. Hospitals argue that hiring a physician is a significant expense and that these contracts protect their business interests. However, physicians differ from the executives that historically had these clauses in their contracts in that there are typically quite a few in our city with our skill set. For example, my city has almost 70 other specialists with similar training and skill set to mine. In my region, these employment contracts have become increasingly unfair to the physician. For example, some pediatric specialists in central Ohio are expected to sign two year, one hundred mile noncompete agreements (2). This essentially forces any physician leaving this practice to also leave the state. In the case of less common specialties, it may make it so that a patient in Ohio may be unable to see a physician in that specialty at all. Some of the strongest healthcare systems in the country are flourishing in states where non-compete clauses are unenforceable, which argues strongly against them being needed for the financial health of a hospital system. The average medical school debt in the United States is in excess of $200,000 for a new physician-. this is excluding educational debt incurred prior to medical school (3). For this reason, young physicians simply cannot take a year or two off to wait out a noncompete provision. Allowing a hospital to ban a physician from working in the state if they leave a given hospital harms the physician and the state's populace, negatively impacts both physicians and patients wellbeing and may contribute to physicians' ultimately pursuing a career outside of healthcare. Recently, a long standing and well- loved physician left my practice group for a promotion in a different state and I have been largely taking over his patient panel. It is eye-opening to see how much his patients admire, trust, and depend on him. Many have told me during our first visit that they would gladly drive 8 hours each way to see him if their insurance would allow. No wonder hospital systems want to ensure that a physician must practice outside of their catchment area if they leave their employment. However, we all went into health care to serve patients. Shouldn't their needs come first?"

Nanda	"It is unbelievable that an employer can have a non-compete clause on a doctor in this day and age. Non-compete clauses should be BANNED for ever. There are so many patients that suffer because of this clauses. Administrators of hospitals have a blind eye to the doctors who deliver care to the patients because the administrators know that the doctors cannot leave and work for another hospitals because they are tied to the area due to non-compete clauses."
Jonathan	"Please pass this rule and ban non-compete clauses. These have spread too far and do too much to limit Americans' freedom. When a worker complains, the answer is always the same: "If you don't like it, go work somewhere else." Non-compete clauses should be banned so that's possible."
Jessica	"Please get rid of non complete clause. Inhibiting many factors of professional career. Health care workers are limited in so many other ways , in addition to this."
Eric	"I fully support this rule by the FTC. Non-Compete clauses hurt American workers, including myself. Please push this forward."
Adam	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. This is a positive step that will not only help workers, but a lot of business as well."
Rob	"I absolutely love this idea. Non compete agreements are used to strongarm individuals into compliance with an overbearing employer. This rule has my full support!"
Drew	"I love it! Iain an engineering student , so Iain very glad that I will not have to worry about these predatory business practices when looking for a job in die future. I also love the provision that requires businesses to notify employees of this change. Very glad that that was not overlooked."
Nicole	"Getting rid Non-Compete Agreements is a win for workers and consumers alike. I was an SAT/ACT tutor for five years, and when I joined die team, I didn't really think about what a NCA was going to do to my future. I was hired as an independent contractor, but I also signed an NCA that stated I would not contract for a competing tutoring agency tr two years after completing my time with them. When I had to stop tutoring with that particular company, I faced a choice about whether or not I could continue to tutor without violating my NCA. Because I couldn't get another tutoring job in the area, I lost out on wages and frankly, students in my area missed out on hiring me, a seasoned tutor. And even for the businesses who rely on them, they are very hard to enforce. There needs to be another way to protect trade secrets that doesn't tie the hands of workers just trying to feed their families."
robert	"The use of non-compete agreements are a scourge on workers, who become stuck and unable to earn a living with a reasonable distance from there homes without forgoing work for a year or more"

Katherine	"I support this change. I am a licensed cosmetologist in Ohio. I signed a noncompete at the age of 19 in 2002. 20 years later I am stagnant at my company and do not have the option to further advance or even become a business owner due to my noncompete. I have no negotiating power for pay increase. My contract states that I can not work within an 18 mile radius of any company owned property for 18 months. I also can not provide service to my current clients for 18 months even if outside the radius. My company owns at least 10 properties in my city and outlying suburbs. I would have to move far away in order to work somewhere else. I am literally stuck. My company also does not have to keep up with industry/employee demands and pay in order to retain employees as we are trapped. I don't plan to leave my company in the future. However I'd have less anxiety knowing I have the ability to if I choice to. I also would like to have the power to negotiate pay. As you can imagine the same commission rate from 20 years ago is not sufficient with todays cost of living. My company has also drastically changed since I signed my contract in 2002. There are times I do not feel they are holding up their end of the contract yet I can not do anything about it. I also do not have the ability to freelance on the side. Thank you for taking the time to read my comment."
Kim	"No compete laws need to outlawed for physicians and other professionals. In our area, the no competes are getting out of control with $100,000 and 100 miles contracts the norm. It is truly putting the hospitals in total control, which is a detriment to the patient. Physicians have no choice when they are unhappy to have to move out of state to be able to get out of the contract, leaving friends and family. Please keep fighting for this."
Ryan	"My family and I have been affected greatly by my non compete agreement. I have been forced to completely change careers after having dedicated 15 years of my life to my trade. I have lost over one third of my income. The company that let me go was able to keep my customers and essentially banish me from the small trade community that had been my closest friends. I was not trained by the company that holds my non compete, and have not gained any expertise from the company that holds my non compete. There are various times in anyones life where the desperation of needing work, might lead to signing a document that seems like the only choice. Only to have that choice used to cage you from your full potential."
David	"I am one of many workers with a non compete. While, non competes do protect business and "secrets", those aspects are often generated from the employees themselves and are more often than not unrewarded financially. That being said employees are not often being hired or recruited because of die secrets they hold, but more often to fill a void. We have become a service orientated world, that competes to hire top talent to serve the customer. Non competes actually prevent competition, in which allows companies to remain stagnant on die internal customer. If varying forms of capitalists believe that competition is die key to success with the external customer, it should like wise be the same in recruiting top talent. Do people stay because a business is a great place to work or out of fear of legal action`' Eliminating non competes only increases competition and turns the goals of business to provide even more positive work environments to keep top talent."

T	"First of all, I highly support the proposal from FTC...I am a...immigrant, left my home country about eight years ago with empty my hands and minimal English. I have to work really hard go to school and get a degree. I'm currently working at a small engineering firm at Aurora OH. The company have a big problem on retention for years, because of amount of travel and heavy work and with the low compensation/benefit. Basically all my co-worker that I knew two years ago all had left the company and Yesterday (3/29/23) I turned my two week notice courtesy despite that the president was not approved for my resignation because of three-years non-compete. As an automation engineer my field are very wide that would significantly impact on my chance to find a job and I also using my income to funding for continue study at Ohio State, that will also interrupt on my education. I feel work environment in the company very hostile at the moment."
Pamella	"I would love it if we banned non-compete clauses. Full support."
Robert	"The FTC has found that non competes "depress labor market mobility and reduce wages and wage growth (regardless of whether employers can or do enforce them in court) and contribute to racial and gender wage gaps". Would you want that for your children? Can we try to do the right thing on this one? Non competes are particularly egregious in healthcare. They limit patient access when doctors are barred from working in their regions for years if they ever decide to leave their current employer."
Jason	"I support this rule to eliminate non-compete clauses. I have been part of a medical group that required signage of a non-competition agreement that included restrictions on working within a 30 miles radius. This severely limited my options to work closer to my home particularly when the president of our company failed to renegotiate our primary contract leaving us with less than full-time work. The company refused to waive the non-competition clause which would be in effect for 2 years. This experience was highly detrimental to my career. There are very successful healthcare systems that hire physicians without non-competition clauses and in many ways I believe that companies are forced to improve faster in an environment where employees can relocate to competitors. Certainly non-disclosure agreements can satisfy the concern of sharing proprietary information without limiting the ability to gain employment."
Corey	"Hello. I am a nurse practitioner in Ohio. I specialize in wounds. I only want to work in wound care and that's the area I have worked in for the past 25 years. My employer has us sign a noncompete so we cannot do wound care in Ohio. They claim they are not stopping the NPs from doing other types of nursing. However, Wound care is our specialty and I dont have the experience or training to jump into another area of medicine. I am a professional in wound care and that is all I want to do. I cannot look for another job, even when my employer has me working 50-60 hours a week (I am salary) , Those under a noncompete are slaves to the company. You cannot disagree with the company, you cannot complain you have too much for a work--lift balance. You are forever stuck in the same company. If its a good company, then the company will have no worries, as everyone will want to work there. The non-compete protects the employer and enslaves the employee. I pray noncompetes will be prohibited. Noncompetes are terrible . If you violate them you owe the company all the money you make at the new employer and they can sue you. The employees are vulnerable ."

Dr. Leonard	"Hello, I am a primary care physician in southern Ohio. Non compete clauses being utilized by small rural hospitals for control over physicians is a detriment to my community and the great people who live here Amazing physicians are forced to leave my community and their patients behind with nobody left to fill die void once they are gone. Please place a ban on non compete clauses in healthcare settings to help save rural health care."
Rakhi	"In this crisis moment in healthcare, where physicians mental health issues are at pick (not to mention suicidal rate too) what we need is strong support from family and leaders. Moving around with family is devastating to mental health. Not only physicians are victimized for opioid overdoses due to increased smuggling and corruption but they are loosing license to practice because of victimization. Only thing we can do to make our life simple is take Noncompete off."
Adam	"This is a serious issue in all industries, even physicians are significantly affected. I strongly encourage the FTC to protect workers by passing this rule without exceptions."
Meghan	"Non-compete clauses are predatory and limit access to care for patients in need. They should be banned."
Charles	"Non-compete clauses get into die realm of indentured servitude. Unless the employer paid for a degree or something, it feels like employees are signing over a bunch of rights in exchange for the right to work. The balance of power is already shifted too far towards companies. I support the proposed NPRM."
Jason	"I am in agreement with the proposed rule. Noncompete clauses hinder free market economics and unfairly harm employees."
Dave	"If it effects the health and wellness of individuals and the economy then this is a no brained. Non-Compete laws only benefit the employers who should compete for labor by offering competitive wages and benefits not punitive contracts. Outlawing non compete contracts will only improve working conditions, wages and benifits for the labor market. Please make these contracts illegal."
Josh	"Put an end to the unfairness of non compete clauses."
Paul	"I do not support non compete clauses."
Tony	"I do not support non compete"

Jisna	"Non compete clauses for professionals really limit our ability to be fairly compensated, negotiate, and quite honestly live our lives! An employer should have to provide a great working environment, salary, and benefits that make you want to stay NOT a clause in a long contract that says you cannot find another job within a certain radius or during a length of time. This certainly adds to my stress and reduces the opportunities to serve the patients better."
Kristi	"I feel restrictive clauses are depressing wages as well as locking professionals such as myself (a physician) into areas with little recourse of we are in a bad job situation."
Eneysis	"Because of a non compete I had to move my daughter away from her school, friends, grandparents. The level of anxiety this move caused to my family is indescribable. At the end my family broke apart. I ended up having to spend thousands of dollars to pay out a contract. To then move back and place my daughter with her friends and her school. While a took a job 100 miles away. Not worthy"
Ben	"I agree with banning non-compete clauses. I personally am affected and currently unemployed due to a non-compete agreement. Continuous threats of enforcement are scaring off new opportunities. I work in healthcare and am needed in my capacity but my previous employer has threatened to enforce the non-compete agreement for up to 1 year after my termination date. I shouldn't have agreed to this or signed this agreement, but at the time, I didn't expect things to end like this. I am in full agreement to ban non-compete clauses."
Alexander	"Non-competes are extremely exploitative towards employees. Employees can be fired at any time, but employers are free to lock their employees out of the job market? Why should a private entity be capable of dictating what a free citizen does with their life after leaving said company? The only way I could see non-competes continuing without exploitation would be some sort of equitable "garden leave" policy wherein the former employer is obligated to pay the former employee for the duration of the non-compete. As it stands, non-competes wholly benefit corporations at the expense of labor."
Edward	"This is much overdo. Companies are able to keep employees hostage with these agreements that were in most cases signed under extreme duress. Once a company has this agreement they can affect your compensation, work structure, and career path. These non compete contracts impede an employees career growth and dramatically affect the ability to pursue employment in the same field which can be financially devastating. I am hopeful these non compete contracts are eliminated or at least drastically modified. Kudos to the FTC"
Maria	"I am a physician and I am routinely attempting to negotiate out of non-compete clauses in contracts oftentimes unsuccessfully - as an example, even though I am still in training and the hospital had no intention of enforcing a non-compete in my particular contract, they were unwilling to remove language referring to a possible non-compete from my contract as a fellow (trainee) which just reflects the absurdity with which hospitals and large employers wield

	these clauses without thought without reason and without justification. As I look to sign contracts and intend to stay in practice in a region that my family and my husband's family is from. I am Leery about signing contracts with non-competes because I am not interested in uprooting my family If a job is no longer the right fit. This aggressively penalizes both the worker and the community by discouraging individuals from continuing to provide needed skills in a particular region. especially health care where burnout the pandemic and overall fatigue has led to many professionals leaving the field. I would wholeheartedly support a rule that banned or eliminated non-competes and basic overall fairness for workers and our communities mandates the same."
David	"Eliminating non-competes would be a positive step for the competitiveness of the employment markets, with potential cascading benefits to consumers. Non-competes, like mandatory arbitration and other trending legal conventions in employment, operate with a false premise that the two parties have equal power to modify and agree on the terms before executing the agreement. Generally the manager or HR person presenting the agreement to the prospective employee is not a signatory or otherwise authorized to negotiate the terms of the agreement, and the prospective employee has only the option to turn down the employment offer wholly instead of modifying the terms to arrive at a mutual agreement. And as these trends take hold, there are fewer and fewer employers without them, leaving workers with the option to work under a non-compete or not work at all. It is not a mutually agreed contract between decision-makers as it is assumed to be. There are other more specific employment constructs that protect the employer's intellectual property, and to some degree their client and prospect relationships, so the non-compete clauses are simply a blanket approach to reducing competition, both for labor and for whatever the employer's commercial pursuits may be. Non-competes are a legal crutch for employers to avoid competition, and generally not entered into as a good faith agreement negotiated between two parties with equal power."
Wendy	"I am a clinician in healthcare that has worked in acute care for the last 16 years. We have lost so many physicians, nurses, and other qualified staff due to hospital administration not listening or taking action. Please continue to listen and allow for the non compete clause to be a thing of the past. We are losing amazing staff every single day due to mistreatment by HA."
Ralph	"As a professional employed in the technology industry for nearly 40 years, I have been negatively effected by overly aggressive and broadly worded non-compete clauses several times Intimidating threats of legal action, and in fact filed lawsuits against me have happened that have hampered my ability to effectively market my talents to better my personal situation, even in instances where I have moved on to new employers that do not compete against the previous ones who have threatened or in fact followed through in taking legal action against these moves through the use of unfair and broad non compete clauses. In all of these instances I have faithfully honored non disclosure of anything proprietary in nature, which is fair in my view. Non disclosure bounds however, have been unfairly connected to broad and ever more restrictive non

	compete clauses, which only harm individual employees like myself (and millions of others) and are used as a tool to falsely attempt to protect a business entity, which can unfairly leverage too much intimidation with the power they can wield over an individual simply trying to better their situation and grow their career. I strongly urge and support the FTC in rectifying this long overdue situation by enacting these laws as quickly as possible, returning competitive rights to the individual and expanding economic opportunities to create an even playing field in all industries."
Randy	"I would support the ban of Non-Competes. I do Dairy Nutrition and Management consulting. My non-compete greatly affects me because I can't control the margins that get added to my service fee's. I have no control of company over head that is created. I am considered and independent contractor but yet am locked into a non-compete. I cover all my own expenses (insurances ,travel continued education). My contract is questionable but I can't afford the time, emotional and financial burden of proving that I can legally leave."
Jeffrey	"There should be no exemption for hospital systems, including not-for-profit systems. Despite AHA's lobbying, there is no public interest in creating this exemption. It will result in areas that are medically underserved having an even greater effective shortage of physicians. Physicians and other healthcare providers, while highly trained, have a very transferable skill and do not use trade secrets. There is no legitimate reason to allow non-compete clauses for these groups. It only hinders mobility of the workforce and promotes healthcare systems to be less efficient and less competitive."
Steven	"I've worked as a physician educator for 36 years and have seen noncompete clauses damage our health system in several ways: 1. Tether young primary care physicians to terrible jobs without recourse. Nobody wants to feel sorry for physicians who are in the top percentile of earners. We are fortunate with our job security and earnings. But primary care attracts does from lower income backgrounds, pays them least of all specialties, and burdens them now with over $250,000 in educational debt when they are ready to begin earning and starting a family around age 29. Non competes in this setting amount to indentured servitude. 2. Quality of care suffers because noncompete clauses add to the disincentives which discourage young physicians from entering primary care. Many folks complain about the difficulty finding a primary care physician. Others don't complain until they confront a chronic illness and fragmented care. 3. Noncompete clauses remove incentives for employers of young does to improve systems of care when issues are pointed out by young physicians and their colleagues. I was fortunate not to have to grapple with noncompete clauses early in my career. Our self funded primary care group made it a point to eliminate these from our contracts. It pains me greatly to see young physicians grapple with this unfair contractual obligation as they begin taking care of patients."
Kimberly	"Please, non-compete clauses area huge problem to the majority of the working class. These legal "threats" work well for corporate America, restricting people

	from freedom to work and be successful. They are over used, and becoming a nuisance by stifling competition along with freedoms. This policy is coming to a head as we see many people sitting out of work because rules like this only lead to workers killing themselves for lower wages, and CEO's becoming ultra wealthy. So unfair to the little guy, who can't take on the corporations. It's time to fix our society so more Americans can give their work 100%, and possibly even branch out and build their own "American dream". We are falling behind the rest of the first world in so many ways. We need to support and help groom our next generation as they have the ability to keep our country at the top...but right now we are sinking fast...please stop corporate greed and start by supporting this bill...which in turn helps workers apply themselves better and promotes ingenuity. Thank you."
Harrison	"Non compete agreements reduce patients freedom of choice for healthcare providers, and increase physician burnout Eliminating non compete agreements will temporarily cause some shuffling but eventually it will lead to true stability and greater physician autonomy. Patient satisfaction and outcome will improve."
Mary	"I am an independent piano and group music teacher who is currently living under threat of litigation for leaving a local non-profit arts school where I built a family music program and piano studio over the past 2 decades. We (myself and five other faculty who have left due to consistently poor management, unacceptable work conditions, and low earnings) found a facility to rent that accommodated all of us and we all resigned. The board of this arts school had been given adequate communications over a six month period that our departure would take place if they didn't correct the administrative difficulties. While all of us are skilled teachers, none of us possess trade secrets or training that was provided by the arts school. No one had signed an employee handbook for at least 2.5 years. We were told by prior management that the handbook had to be signed annually, therefore we were not concerned about the non-compete clause embedded in the handbook. Despite this understanding, we have been threatened by the president of the arts school board with possible legal action if we did not "buy" our students from them. Obviously, we could never afford to "buy students" at any price given that everyone earns a gross income less than 40,000 per year. Moreover, the non-compete clause in the handbook has never been enforced against prior or current employees who left and continued teaching students who followed them to different locations in violation of the clause. Yet, we have this threat against us. It has now been almost 4 months since we departed and we hired a labor lawyer and have spent $700 in advice given the threat of a lawsuit. This is a lot of money at our income level. This stress of a possible lawsuit should not exist and threatens our new arts school. Per our labor lawyer, we have been advised to lay low and be very careful with posters or other visible signs of our new enterprise. This threat seriously affects our potential to earn a living, put up a robust website, and advertise freely to attract new students. SUMMARY: I support this non-compete clause rule that does not allow employers to put non-compete clauses in contracts or employee handbooks. EXCEPTIONS might be allowed for sensitive trade secret jobs, where earnings are very high to begin with.

	However, even these non-competes need reasonable limitations on them and should not hinder a person from leaving their job to go earn better money or better work conditions in their field of experience or expertise."
Cole	"Banning non-compete agreements allows an employee to have the freedom of choosing their work environment. Something that is currently limited by these agreements. Please vote in favor of banning non-compete agreements."
Dave	"Please pass this. This would be a very good direction."
Jennifer	"I strongly support the Non-Complete Clause Rule. My husband is a specialized scientist who has a two year non-compete that is written to be applied across the entire country. It has prevented him from moving to a better company for over five years and being able to utilize his skills toward scientific advancements."
Shuja	" Physicians should absolutely be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it greatly limits their ability to negotiate their contracts and instead offers large hospital systems an unprecedented advantage over physicians in the marketplace. There is a large increase in physician burnout and allowing the market place to be more free would allow physicians more freedom and flexibility. Additionally, the last time an exemption of this nature was granted by the lobbying from the American Hospital Association (Jung v AAMC 2004) resulted in decades of delay for improving resident physicians' ability for fair wages and benefits; this is still an active struggle today. Please do not make the same mistake again for physicians of today and the future."
Dale	"I am a veterinarian that strongly approves of a ban on non competes. There are industry standard in the veterinary field and have grown increasingly lengthy and geographically broad. Because they have become industry standard new graduates are essentially forced to comply because there aren't job offers available without non competes. Then in the future if they would like to leave they often can't afford to litigate a most likely over reaching non compete when opposing a practice with more financial resources than themselves. The fact that they can't afford to litigate these non competes has allowed owners to make them increasingly broad and lengthy because they aren't hardly ever legally challenged. Please consider banning non competes and freeing up the veterinary industry for more innovation and fair competition. Thanks"
john	"I have known several people who have been harmed by noncompetes. Most have talked about direct economic harried in the sense of being denied the opportunity to gain more or greater income. However, I know one woman who was harmed not directly economically but more in terms of her personal life—she wanted to switch from a job she was not fond of a to a job that look more appealing (albeit at the same pay). All non-competes need to be totally & fully banned so as to promote American freedom as well as American well-being."

Craig	"As a retired military physician, I devoted 24 years to serving my fellow service-members but upon retirement, I needed to strongly consider where I could practice as a civilian based on non-complete clauses. These were in essentially every contract that hospitals and multi-specialty medical practices offered me. Because I was stationed away from my eventual destination it meant that I needed to determine which practice I would be locked into without being physically near them (other than brief recruitment visits, most of this was by phone or virtual). This model hurts physicians and actually hurts patients as well by restricting market forces. In the worst examples, physicians can be locked into practices that don't value patient care over profits because they are economically constrained to a certain location."
Eric	"These only hurt people by limiting their employment options. It's also short sighted of business as they retain bitter employees and are unable to acquire potentially here employees from other companies who may bound by such agreements. But ultimately, an employer should have no say in an employee's life outside of their actual job."
Larry	"I'm in support of banning the non-compete clause. Companies utilize these to harm their employees and former employees. In a specialized field the company is able to treat employees poorly because they know they can't go any other place. It's harming employees and their families all in the name of corporate greed."
Jared	"The proposed rule is violative of the heart and soul of the Antitrust laws of the United States. The proposed rule here would limit companies from abusing power at the expense of employees. This rule will give power to the individuals who work and are bound by non-compete clauses. So long as these non-competes are not being used to protect intellectual Property, they should be disallowed. There are two examples I want to bring up. The first is low-wage workers. If we consider minimum wage sandwich shops who have these non-compete clauses in their agreements. They want to prevent these workers from taking the knowledge they gain as they work and exploiting that at a nearby sandwich shop. In other words, these sandwich shops have agreed together to keep their sandwich workers at their respective sandwich shop, so they can keep wages down for these workers. If we eliminate these non-compete clauses, we allow the sandwich workers to get raises. Employers may know that their employees who excel will likely get a better offer from their competitors. They will either increase the payment of their workers or let those sandwich workers find a better employment opportunity. The second example is doctors who are working at heart-saving clinical research centers. The argument is that these clinics need to have the ability to prevent these doctors from taking their skills to their competitors. Without non-compete clauses the doctors/researchers who would receive higher wages, but it would also increase the amount of research that is being done. Within the restraints that already exist within Intellectual Property, these doctors could take their expertise and skills to employers who want that expertise more, and the fluidity of trade will increase the amount of research that is being performed. These rules are anti-competitive. They limit die ability of employees, and allow price fixing in the market of wages. We need to stop these violations of Antitrust laws which have been allowed simply because they have traditionally been allowed. Tradition is no excuse for illegality."

Kevin	"Not a good idea at all. Limits workers opportunities and will make it harder to find better paying jobs"
Robert	"I have been subject to Non-Compete and (No Solicitation) clauses twice in my life. First I was in building materials . (non-compete) In my opinion it's an unfair practice. If the owner of a business needs a "non-compete" to hold over an employees head in an effort to retain the employee. What are they afraid of? Are they not offering competitive products/prices/wages/benefits for the talent they possess? Often employers change programs and territories to aid them in the market place. Those moves may be to the detriment of the employee. Can the employee leave if the work place is toxic? The employer would always have the right to sue over dissemination of trade secrets. The second time was as a Financial Advisor. I firmly believe that every business is a relationship business. It takes quite an effort to acquire clients as a financial professional. While every broker/dealer(b/d) believes that they are the catalyst in obtaining new clients, if name brand alone was the ultimate decision, we would have very few broker/dealers. The financial industry believes that the investor holds all the power to determine what's best for themselves. I completely agree. Preventing interaction between the broker and the client, for any period of time, who they determined who they wanted to do business with is, an all out effort to circumvent the clients right to do business with whom they preferred. It seems that b/d's in the independent space have adjusted to broker changes over the years. I firmly believe that the larger brand names have driven many brokers to the independent channel forever."
Suzanne	"The FTC should vote to end non-compete clauses. They restrict die rights of citizens to work, to fulfill their potential, and to earn a living and care for themselves and their families. These clauses only benefit employers, and most often, unfairly so. They are unnecessary and harmful."
Taylor	"I feel the noncompete limits employees on their growth within in a workplace as well as controls their income and under some circumstances can prevent them from having an income. If an employee chooses to leave a company for personal reasons but may not have the option or want to move they are unable to provide for themselves or even their family. If that person is unsafe in their workplace they cannot simply quit. If a person has outgrown their workplace and wants to further their career they cannot simply leave. If someone wants to increase their pay they cannot simply leave. If someone just wants to quit they cannot simply leave. Employees should be able to provide the life they want for themselves without having to worry about a lawsuit, a former boss. Changing jobs can be stressful enough. No one should be held captive to a job."
L	"As an professional who's been working under a non-compete, I fully support die FTC's proposal. While I left my previous employment to join the largest employer in my industry - I was given no choice but to agreed to the non-compete clause, effectively limiting my potential for growth beyond this company. As a mother and the family bread-winner, it is now not a question of forwarding my career - but instead - protecting my income and ensuring I have employment. Non-competes are damaging to all industries and hamper growth and development across the board. I fully support this proposed rule."

Brittney	"I've been in a non-compete for 7 years at my job, there is no way for me to leave without starting a completely different career or moving away. I'd have so much relief banning the non-compete. I was 18 when I signed it and was ignorant to what I was doing."
Dave	"Great idea. Please implement it."
Riaan	"I work in the analytics field at a consulting agency . Non-competes are some of the worst forms of anti-competitive behavior I have ever seen a company use to stifle workers wage growth, keep them in dead-end jobs and kill economic competition. There is nothing more anti-capitalistic than legally binding a worker to a non-contracted job (most of us live in "right to work" states) for the company's own sole benefit. It is almost akin to forced labor if you cannot transition to another job elsewhere that might give you a better economic outcome. NCAs also prevent companies from addressing employee grievance, keep pay low and remove benefits; this solely benefits the company to the detriment of the individual and the broader economy."
Lori	"Noncompete clauses should be banned for all. Hospitals and private equity should not be able to hold it's professionals hostage."
Alan	"I agree with this proposed change, having been under a couple of these agreements over my career, I've never understood how a company can tell me I cannot practice the trade that I trained for, paid for college for and is my sole income generating profession. Now, can we work on eliminating non-disparaging agreements too? Too many business owners are crappy to their employees and these agreements are silencing those of us willing to speak out about it."
Saket	"Non compete clause only worsen die burnout and gives employers unnecessary advantage over the employees."
Domenic	"I'm currently at a company being bought out and the new company is making a one year offer to stay with one year non compete agreement. In my mind what's to keep them from telling me after a year that there cutting my salary. Now I'm stuck because of the non compete agreement with no chance to move. Not very fair after 25 years in the industry that I can't better my self and my family."
Micah	"Having non competes is anti-consumer, anti-worker, and anti-American. In an era where it's already very difficult to get appropriate medical care, having doctors subject to non- competes limits patient access and discourages competition. When a huge part of our problem with Healthcare is out of control costs, it seems wise to foster competition. I have also seen comments that this will not apply/be enforced on non-for-profit hospital systems, but as someone with extensive experience in this market, non-for-profit is merely a tax status these systems use and has little to do with how they actually operate. I would encourage the abolition of non-competes, and I would encourage the inclusion of non-for-profit systems in the abolition of these non-competes. For the sake of the doctors themselves, as well as their patients."

Philip	"The intention behind non-compete clauses was intended to protect "trade secrets". I would classify these as a special formula, recipe, technical code, or something that makes your company, service, or product differentiated in the marketplace. Non-compete language has been abused to keep employees trapped at an employer and to eliminate the ability of that employee to compete against such employer. Companies have argued that these people may have trade secrets. I've personally seen companies sue former employees for taking their phone address book, or "client list" with them. These have NO fundamental bearing on a company's specific "trade secrets". I was asked to sign an 11-page non-compete - which I declined. It was a global organization who would NOT take red-line changes from my lawyer. They were unwilling to discuss or change the language. They were known for going after employees who signed these. If I was terminated or left on my own accord, I would not have been able to work within 50 miles of any of their locations in all of North America - in the same field. Non-compete clauses should be outlawed. The abuse has been rampant. Time for Congress to step up and be for the people."
Kristofer	"Private practice physician in interventional radiology here - noncompetes disenfranchise individuals in order to protect profits of hospitals. I am currently being forced to move cities due to a noncompete for my entire city and a 15 mile radius. This is financially crippling us as I still owe 6 figures of medical school debt and am the sole provider for infant twins."
Jessica	"Non-compete agreements are outdated and hurt the income of people who are actively trying to work for a living. Please do away with these contracts."
Mohammad	"No compete is a way for large healthcare organizations to control providers and where they practice. It is extremely unprofessional and affect patient care negatively if a provider who has been providing care for patients is forced to leave them merely because he is leaving the healthcare organization he has been working at. Long term patient physician relationship and trust is extremely valuable to patients and should not be broken because of such clause"
Doug	"Important to balance worker and business relationships. Please make a National rule"
David	"Non-competes create prohibitive practices on physicians and limit their ability to change practices if their employer/practice fails to meet contractual obligations irrespective of the reason. Furthermore they infringe on the doctor patient relationship and lead to overall decreases in doctor salaries at a time of unprecedented burnout and physician shortages. They also empower hospital systems to remain complacent with regard to improving practice environments which is directly correlated with patient outcomes"

Denise	"I live in Ohio. The company I work for has employees sign non compete agreements. I am 65 and at the end of my career. Most employees make between $15.00 to $20.00 an hour. I am a trucking dispatcher. My boss uses paid for load boards...nothing confidential here at all. I feel bad for younger workers because if you leave he threatens the new company with a lawsuit and the employees at the new company gets fired. There is no reason tbr this to happen. I do not support non competes for low level workers. I hope you can ban them."
gene	"As a member of the Dayton Ohio Chamber of commerce and a business owner , limiting these agreements would not have a devastating effect on business operations. These agreements for the most part benefit the owners of the business and don't consider the tens of thousands of people working under these unfair agreements. While I strongly agree that proprietary information must be kept confidential and a company has a right to protect itself from training employees and the time and money that goes into this. These agreements have a beginning, but no end. I have worked at Eatonfomi since 1983 and while I have a small ownership stake, these agreements greatly restrict die ability for the employee to move around the industry, and take their knowledge and expertise with them if they decide to pursue other opportunities in their industry. The employer hold these people hostage and in most cases there is not any proprietary information involved. There needs to be a set time frame that these agreements cover, long enough for the employer to recoup any investments they have made in that employee. The employee should have the opportunity to market diem selves in the same industry they have been in for years and maximize their financial value."
Alicia	"I agree that non compete agreements should be banned by the FTC. I agree that noncompete agreements hamper worker choice within the job market, suppress workers wages, and discourages competition and innovation. Evidence supports that non competes harm competition in US labor markets. Please do not continue to hinder our healthcare field by allowing these bogus clauses to continue to make it into our contracts. We need more workplace choice especially when it comes to our ER's and primary care."
Jennifer	"I hope and pray this passes! It would greatly effect my growth in my field of work, as well as many of my friends and co-workers."
Yadwinder	"I as a physician strongly support the ban on non compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the corporate hospital groups to dominate the market and control the physicians."
Brendan	"The ability for an individual to search for and accept employment outside of their current employment is an absolute first amendment right. There should be legal constraints on employment and job seeking, especially if a company can terminate employment at any time without reason."

Jaime	"I request the FTC include franchises in the ban on noncompete. The noncompete in my franchise agreement limits my ability to make a living at the expiration of my term. It forces me to choose between signing a renewal agreement with much worse terms than my current agreement, which I don't want to do, or not be able to work in my field of expertise."
Mike	"My wife works currently as a nurse practitioner with a noncompetition clause in her contract. We live in a small town and if she wanted to switch jobs she would have to go two counties over based on the terms of this agreement. She is also paid significantly lower than the national average. She feels trapped in her current job because we have limited childcare options that make having a significant commute impossible. There are several other medical practices in town but she is barred from seeking alternative employment due to the agreement. A family practice physician left this same group two years ago due to disagreements with leadership. He wanted to join another practice in town but was unable to. He worked in another city for 2 years until the agreement expired and then came back to work for another practice. His patients had to see a different doctor for 2 years because of this agreement. We are fairly rural and many patients have limited transportation. Whatever is available in the town is all they can travel to. These agreements stifle competitive pay and benefits and are directly harmful to both employees and patients by forcing providers to move if they want a different job and reducing the availability of medical care in the community."
Will	"I would like to see laws regarding non-compete laws restricting employees from seeking better positions and pay to be struck down. I believe non-compete is wrong."
Jennifer	"I support eliminating non compete clauses from contracts. My current employer has a 20 mile radius noncompete from 3 different offices. This spans the entire metropolitan city where I live, Columbus, OH. In order to change employers, I would have to uproot my family for a year or go unemployed for a year. Neither of which are options at this time. My employer rests on this knowledge that many workers are trapped rather than improving the work environment and compensation."
Jeffrey	"I am starting a new career path in IT cybersecurity I working for a for profit company that contract workers on the autism spectrum contracts me out much larger company for which I have been there one year. I very much would love to work for them but the agreement bars me from applying there for one year after. I don't want to start up a business to compete against them. I want a chance to be able be paid at rate that matches my work experience and education. Which the company has been Opaque to compassion outside of the $15 dollars an hour no overtime or paid vacation. My family has had to essentially subsidize my cost of living."

Yasemin	"Please do not exclude physicians from this. As hospital systems become larger and larger they impose their will on physicians we should not be the only sector of "employees" that are confined to our employer because of non-competes. We need to have autonomy to provide the best care for patients and sometimes that means bucking whatever system we are in to go elsewhere."
Nick	"Non compete clauses takes away from the individual whilst giving the corporation all the power."
Gary	"My best friend was abruptly fired for an incredibly minor mistake and before she even made it home, the company she formerly worked for emailed her a reminder of their non compete clause. She really enjoyed her profession but was scared of going against a bunch of legalese and a huge uncaring company. How could a company that hung a banner advertising its survey results of "being one of the best companies to work for" hold someone back from continuing her profession with a more caring company? What are they afraid of?"
Ryan	"Please pass this. I despise noncompetes."
Eric	"As a software engineer , I support the restriction or elimination of non-compete clauses. By artificially reducing competition in the labor market, non-competes artificially drag down worker salaries and make it harder to hire quality people when we need them. They represent an onerous burden for workers while only offering mixed results to companies, because while they improve retention they also hurt hiring. We should not be impeding the free market by allowing non-compete clauses to be enforced."
Michael	"Noncompete clause should be banned in the healthcare setting. This gives private organizations power over physicians and other healthcare professionals from choosing location to practice and escaping unfair, business practices. If an employer is treating a physician fairly, the physician should be able to leave without threatening, uprooting their family, losing earned salary or being unfairly subjected to unethical business practice. It should be a right to leave your job without fear of your well-being being threatened by an employer who is treating you with disrespect. The freedom to work is a beautiful thing about this country, the freedom to leave work should be equally valued. Leaving employment is a personal choice and a non-compete clause gives employers and unfair power over current and future employees. Please make non-compete clauses illegal and make non-compete clauses illegal in the healthcare industry. It is employers responsibilities to attract employees with fair wages and benefits. It is not ethical for an employer to use fear to keep you an employee by threatening your livelihood. Thank you for your time"
Andrew	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. Eliminating the noncompete clauses will help improve healthcare access for patients as hospitals and corporations can no longer restrict where physicians can work. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A VERY concerned MD"

Ben	"Non-competes are anti-competitive and anti-worker. I am 100% in favor of banning non-compete agreements!"
Kevin	"I agree with a ban of this unfair practice in business. I've been through this and it can be damaging to an individual and an entire family."
Ryan	"I support banning non-compete agreements. I worked for a company for over 24 years, in multiple positions, and I believe the original non-compete I signed as an entry level person should not have applied. Never the less when I put in my resignation they asked me where I was going. Fortunately, it had no relevance as I was going from private owned to government. I'm certain there are other employees remaining because of this hinderance. Leadership uses it as a deterrent anytime someone wishes to leave for better opportunity. That company hasn't shown loyalty to the employees for years, why should an employee's hands be tied."
Elizabeth	"I am very much IN FAVOR of banning non compete clauses. They cause undue stress to workers and are unfair. They may cause you to remain in a job that is a horrible fit due to fear or inability to leave. I worked in a place that stated that I could not work within 25 nu of any offices that I had worked in, but I had worked in eight offices ranging around a hundred miles, which essentially just prevented me from getting another job in my area within my field. They are in the best interest of the employer but never the employee. If an employer wants to keep an employee they should provide incentives and fair compensation not bully them into staying! Additionally non-compete clauses are already illegal in multiple states they should just be illegal in all states. We spend far too much time protecting employers and not enough time protecting employees."
Jason	"As a victim of non-compete clause enforcement, I am strongly in favor of die proposed rule to eliminate such contract clauses. I ani an anesthesiologist working in a city with several large healthcare systems. I did my residency training at one of these institutions and stayed as an employee for several years after training. Upon deciding to leave that institution for a private-practice position, I was informed that my non-compete clause would be enforced. Ultimately, I was forced to work out of town approximately 1 hour away for most

	of a year. This was a hardship on my family as I had to stay at a hotel near the outside hospital for a week at a time while my wife and first grade children were at home. Meanwhile, there was no substantive change in the operation of either hospital that was involved. My departure from one for the other did not impact operations in a meaningful way. As an anesthesiologist, I did not take any patients or "trade secrets" with me when I left. I was told, in fact, that the enforcement of my contract had more to do with the higher-level competition between the two healthcare systems and nothing to do with me as an individual. As such, I was simply used as a pawn in the game of political and business bririksmanship. In addition to the inconvenience my family and I endured, I incurred some legal bills in my effort to assert my rights. I was told that my case was quite strong for having my non-compete nullified. However, the personal cost of pursuing legal action would have been great, and the institution I would be seeking action against could afford a lengthy legal battle while could not. Stories like mine are all too common in healthcare where non-compete clauses are ubiquitous. I strongly urge the FTC to adopt the proposed rule and eliminate this unfair practice."
KASANDARA	"This is incredibly important in today's socioeconomic situation. Our government should protect people from harm at the hands of other people or corporations. Being unable to end one's own employment in a reasonable time frame is akin to indentured servitude, which was made rightfully illegal with slavery. This is a step in the right direction towards protection of the rights of individuals."
Anita	"I am in support of the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. Our Country is known for innovation and as an example of democracy around the world this cannot be done with these clauses. They hold workers' wages down and harm working people. Stifling what we set as an example. This policy will provide a more constrictive example globally and make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth."
Lisa	"I am bound by a non-compete agreement. My employer was acquired by a competitor. They are requiring the relocation of a large % of employees. Many employees have 10+ years in the industry and are now forced to uproot their established families or face decreased earning potential because their experience is in a single industry. They are unable to pursue other options. Their bargaining power with the current employer is also compromised because they cannot search for additional positions - some of which might allow them to continue to live in their current location."
Rashmi	"I support banning non compete clause which harm workers and drive up cost of care."
Rashmi	"Non compete clauses are an unfair practice that limit opportunities for physicians and drive up cost of care, they also prevent continuity of care for patients."
Michael	"I'm referring specifically to medicine here: non-compete clauses have a chilling effect on die independent practice of medicine. When you are employed by a large mega hospital, your ability to independently practice is threatened by non-competes as you are unable to leave if need be. In this way, it is a way of enforcing institutional practice of medicine over the true, traditional individual practice of medicine. For this alone, I believe non-competes should be abolished. More specifically, there is nothing about the practice of medicine that has any sort of trade secret."

Lisa	"Yes, please get rid of these non compete clauses. They are detrimental to hard working employees."
Tim	"I support this"
Alix Junior	"In our beautiful capitalist society where innovation and competition are fundamentals to our freedom, prosperity, and even our economic survival. Therefore, non-compete clause should be abolish and all industries in a free enterprises society such as ours and this applies especially in healthcare where as a physician I have to abandon my patients and my home in order to continue to serve if I don't agree with the work environment or the quality of care my employer offers."
Lynn	"I support the rule to ban non-competes. I have worked in my industry (niche insurance) for over 20 years and my company was recently acquired. The new company has imposed a non-compete on me, in addition to reducing my total compensation. I was given only a few weeks, over the holidays, to either accept the non-compete or be out of a job effective Jan 1. So it was under duress that I had to accept the new terms. Now, all of the expertise I have built over my 20 year career is begin essentially locked up at this company. And I am being forced to accept lower wages, or risk being sued. This is the most unfair, egregious thing I've even been through. If the FTC outlaws non-competes, than my new company will need to improve pay and benefits for not only me but others in my organization. Or, face losing us to the competition. Please pass this law!"
Troy	"To whom it may concern, I am writing this correspondence based on my own experiences and these are not the views of my employer. These views are purely what I have seen as an individual in corporate America today. Areas of noncompete agreements have been around for a while now and believe that they were strongly created for not taking the business of current customers to a member's new place of employment should they leave the existing company. However, what I have seen in these times is a usage or threat from a current employer against employees leaving to go work for a customer or company of competition regardless of taking current business away from their current employer. This has stifled members in the US economy from being treated fairly in circumstances of working other job opportunities for better wages, growing their knowledge base and even ethics. In the cases where employees leave a company for a customer or competition the threat of legal action has often been verbally given to them. In cases where the employee comes back to the company due to the fear of that legal action, their work becomes unproductive, and they are at time set as an example to others to avoid other employees from taking that same driven path. Over the years, my employer has taken

	advantage of hiring members for its team from other companies that do or do not carry noncompete clauses from our competitor's customer business lines... The usage of noncompete agreements has turned companies into an unethical means for keeping your employees at bay so that the company can have a stronger ability for growth without worries of their knowledge leading to their competition. It saddens me in that being a Veteran of the United States Military where I have been active in war so that the many other members of the United States would not have to serve and can preserve their freedom. In those fights for the passions of freedom to our US citizens and other countries around the world that it comes down to those freedoms are not in the businesses we work. To be held hostage to a company is not something that I wish anyone to be held to. I have ALWAYS and will remain to work truthfully for my country, family and business and put my best foot forward. All I ask is that they do the same for me. I support the Federal Trades Commission's Rule to Ban aspects of a noncompete for companies in the United States"
Sheila	"I am writing in support of any medical provider who might be affected by a Non-compete clause. Non-compete clauses will definitely have a negative affect on my community (senior citizens). You are the Fair Trade Commission. Making Non-compete clauses null and void is fair trade."

Oklahoma | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade.

	"I'm a physician and it is critically important to get rid of non-compete clauses for doctors. I live in Oklahoma and one of my colleagues has been in a lengthy court battle over this, meanwhile patients NEED us and we cannot take care of them. Rural Oklahoma and even parts of urban areas are lacking in providers and the corporate bosses keep us unable to do what we trained to do help people. Please don't listen to the corporate leaders who want to keep us trapped and powerless to help. This feeling of being trapped into not helping people and into serving impersonal for-profit businesses is a HUGE part of physician burnout." - Marianne
	"After a forty plus year career in a creative profession I would like to urge the FTC to end the practice of non-compete clauses. Most industries draw their innovation from higher education and industry technical development, not geniuses that invent new processes in isolation. Limiting the movement of design team members only clods the evolution of progress in our society." - Paul
	"Ban non-competes immediately, when there's a person who excels at their job and a company, who they have a no compete with, treats them poorly then said person should be allowed to compete especially if said industry is all they know. You can't expect a family person to not provide or maintain a lifestyle for their family all because of a no compete. Also, with so many major corporations running the private sector, we need more competition in the private sector to keep these big corporations in check and harsh competition prevents them from becoming too powerful and prevents them from hurting small business Banning no-competes will also allow small business to employ some really good people in their industry, like good people who come from the larger companies. But many good employees are unable to work in their industries with small business all because of a no compete from a big company. So yes. as a Republican, ban no-competes. Trust me, I work in concrete construction and no-competes are common and have only hurt the workers and the industry." - Benjamin
	"I believe this clause should highly be reconsidered. This clause will indefinitely have prospective students thinking twice about pursuing medicine as a physician and possibly medicine as a whole. Once a worker and employer has split ways amicably, I see no reason why said employer should have any bearing on the employee's future employment. I can understand wanted to keep employees that committed work place violence at arms length but model employees as well?" - Alex

Garrett	"Non-compete clauses are blatantly anti-capitalist and harmful to people who make the economy work."
Abeera	"Non competes are terrible. I am glad FTC is doing something about it"
Anonymous	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of the effort to ban unfair non-compete agreements forced on employees by employers under threat of layoff or unemployment. I am a consultant and I work for an organization that was acquired by another company. As part of this merger I was coerced by the acquiring company to sign a non-compete clause that bans me from working within my entire industry because it is a global company with worldwide reach in the tech industry. There are few opportunities that exist which enable me to continue to work in my industry without violating this non-compete clause. While I enjoy my job at the moment, this hinders my ability to seek opportunities that could provide upward mobility as a woman in an industry that is overwhelmingly dominated by men. Your plan will directly help millions of workers, as well as boost the economy and enable future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt hard working-class people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements I submitted this support anonymously because the acquiring company I am now employed by does work as a contractor for the federal government I fear repercussion if discovered and I require this position to provide for my family at this time. Thank you for your understanding. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Anonymous Anonymous Broken Arrow, OK"
Satish	"Non-compete clause is a modern day slavery. The fact of "owning the exclusive right to a person" and prohibiting the person from being employed anywhere else is nothing but slavery. This is the most anti-competitive, anti-market behavior there is. I am surprised the United States government has let it go this far. Slave owners always slavery was "just" and they always said the slaves were better off being slaves and had a better quality of life being slaves than free person. Same scenario, the corporate is going to flood the comments with support for the non-compete clause rule. Wrong is still wrong, even if the majority are still doing it. Just because my pre-K teacher taught me reading skill, she does not own me nor has she asked me a portion of money, everytime I read."
Zackary	"I feel this is a great idea, I have personally been threatened for a non compete that was put into an employee handbook that had to be acknowledged before I could be paid, it was a pdf and I had no idea about the non compete clause along with all other employees of the company which included the HR personnel and the companies financial advisor"

Ray	"The non compete clause exempting Doctors is continuing to promote indentured servitude and stagnation of physician salaries. This exemption only benefits those who stand to make the shareholders and board members and does not promote health in any sense of the word. Non-compete clauses don't keep physicians rooted in physician-hungry cities. They prevent them from going to them by keeping physicians in the area of their first job, which is likely the area they trained, and, as such, is most likely a large city. I whole heartedly do not support physicians being kept exempt from the non-compete clause rule."
Amanda	"In the climate of nationwide physician shortages with many leaving medicine due to burnout, we as a nation need to look at policies that are contributing to this and fix the problem. A physician spending the best years of their life in school, going into half a million dollars of debt, only to become a slave to a hospital administration who would rather see this physician self destruct rather than leave for greener pastures is unethical, immoral, and completely not sustainable. Physicians deserve to leave a job they are unhappy with and go somewhere else. They have earned that right. When discussing health care costs, let's not forget that we physicians make up the smallest piece of that pie. Hospital and insurance administration appear to generate large costs, and as they aren't actually providing the medical care in any way, should not get the preferential treatment here. Laws and policies should always benefit the physician to ensure a happy and effective doctor who enjoys their work and wants to stick around. If this doesn't change, areas with non-competes will see unprecedented physician shortages, and everyone in those areas will suffer. Non compete policies have no place in a free market and no place in healthcare."
Ethan	"This is something I would 100% support."
Joshua	"I am completely for banning non-compete clauses, but the rule needs to be air tight to keep businesses from fording loopholes. This will help give more power to the employees and give them a better bargaining position for wages and benefits."
Jimmy	"I think non-compete clauses should be banned across the board especially in medicine. Big hospital systems use this to effectively stifle competition and innovation. I retired from Orthopaedic Surgery in December 2021 primarily because of the hospital administrators began to place profits over patients."
Gautam	"I am a radiologist practicing in Oklahoma and I strongly support the ban on the non compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban would allow physicians to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the corporate hospital groups to dominate the market and control physicians."

Marc	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal. They are clearly a form of indentured servitude and diet slavery. It isn't just bad business but a human and civil rights violation."
Elizabeth	"I request the FTC include franchises in the ban on non-competes. The non-compete in my franchise agreement limits my ability to make a living at the expiration of my term. It forces me to choose between signing a renewal agreement with much worse terms than my current agreement, which I don't want to do, or not be able to work in my field of expertise. One way to reach a happy medium if the FTC is adverse to including franchises would be to allow franchise non-competes to cover ownership of a company but not employment in the same industry. Please ban non-competes. They are harmful. Thx"
Audrey	"Hello, I am a worker covered under a non-compete and it was a condition of me becoming employed. Given my need for work, my options were very limited and I felt I had to sign it or not be able to provide for my family. However, the non-compete is very restrictive and my employer is attempting to use it to keep me from doing an unrelated second job. Non-competes tend to be overly broad and overreaching and almost always favor the employer. Employers are free to fire or lay off employees at-will, whereas employees subject to non-competes do not have reciprocal rights. I cannot leave my job and move on without ensuring I meet all requirements of my non-compete. This broadly limits growth potential for employees. It is my hope that the FTC will take swift action to require that existing non-competes be rescinded and new ones made illegal. Thank you for your time, Audrey Dye"
Joseph	"Non-compete clauses have extremely negative effects on individual physicians. If another medical group in the same town is willing to pay you more money, this non-compete clause allows business people and massive companies to prevent you from taking that job. The only way to escape is to uproot your entire family. Non-compete clauses hurt hardworking doctors while benefitting companies making billions of dollars."
Chad	"Hello, I support the efforts of the FTC to ban or significantly restrict the use of non-compete agreements by employers. Furthermore, I would point all who oppose this potential rule, presumably desiring non-compete agreements to remain a contractual option, to an alternative. I believe the concept of the pension originated with the Roman Legion so that retirees from that service would choose to rest comfortably instead of taking work as a mercenary with a rival army. That method of behavioral influence ought to be evaluated for modern times - in other words - pay your employees well enough that they have no desire to compete!"
Jennifer	"I have been an employed physician since my residency training Each of my contracts with three different employers has a "noncompete" clause of varying degrees of distance and difficulty in overcoming it. This discourages competition between employers who are local to each other because the non-compete makes it much more difficult for physicians to leave and work elsewhere in their current city, or to start a private practice. It is unconstitutional at its core limiting our right to basic freedom of employment. It also is bad for not only employees but also for patients. When a physician can choose their terms of employment, this also means we have more control over how well patients are treated by a system. For example a hospital system can (and they do) put pressures on physicians to discharge patients earlier than they should be, or to order fewer tests even if the physician thinks they are needed. This can become very difficult for the physician who is taught to always advocate for patients. If the physician is trapped in a job, due to a non-compete, they will be less able to advocate against those practices harmful to patients"

Jesicah	"As a physician, I believe we must eliminate non-compete clauses in physician contracts. As hospital systems and/or private equity physician groups grow and merge to control larger areas of the country, these noncompete clauses become more and more onerous. One must move out of state away from friends and family to find a new job and even then it is challenging when a hospital system or private equity physician group is present in multiple states. Additionally, as healthcare becomes increasingly focused on profits, there is a very real threat to patient care. Sometimes, the only way for physicians to protect our patients is the ability to move to a new job where we feel our patient-centered focus is valued. Hospitals and large groups are becoming bullies who try to strong arm physicians into compromising our oath to "1st do no harm" when it comes to patient care. They have more lobbying power, more funds, and more time to fight this important issue. Please let us continue to do our jobs as intended. Please do not let them win this battle and continue to further deteriorate patient care."
Kelsey	"I fully support banning non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are only good for big businesses and bad for consumers and employees. Please continue this good work of ending non-compete clauses!"
Shyvonne	"I support the rule. As a physician, I have seen these clauses result in losing good doctors from the workforce entirely because their current position has become untenable but they are unable to use their MD anywhere in the area they have settled their family due to these unconscionable non-compete clauses. People should be free to work and feed their families. A good employer has nothing to fear because people will always want to work with them. Bad employers should not be supported with anti-competitive legal handcuffs."
Dale	"Please push this through. Non-compete clauses are hurting the medical field, especially in the area of primary care, which desperately needs expansion and support."
Timothy	"I am an employee ENT physician practicing in rural Oklahoma. We have difficulty recruiting people to rural Oklahoma. There are 2 hospitals in my town. My employer is a national corporation for-profit hospital system. I am the only ENT physician within a 1.5 hour drive. The non-compete is for 1.5 years and 50 miles. In the current situation, I would have to move out of the area, leaving the entire region and all of the patients without ENT care. This destroys the physician and the community. Only the for-profit hospital benefits. I recommend ending non-competes.T"

Kinya	"Non competes should done away with. They limited physicians and hence limit the care that a community receives. The only people that benefit are the greedy hospitals."
Brent	"I applaud the FTC's efforts to end non-competed for physicians. Non-competed harm countless physicians, their families and the communities in which they live. These types of agreements are forced upon physicians who do not have the time or resources to fight them. They limit patients' healthcare options, especially in rural areas which are already underserved. I expect strong pushback from the hospital lobby, but hope that the FTC will stay the course and do what is best for U.S citizens."
Lynsey	"As a worker and citizen of the United States, I support the adoption of the Rule banning non-compete clauses. They are a violation of freedoms and harmful to the economy."
Mercedes	"Since when do we allow ex-employers to dictate our lives after we leave the job? These non-compete clauses have gotten insane--they are even on contracts for fast food workers! You can literally be FIRED from a job and then prevented completely from being able to make a living in the field you are trained in! Flow is this even remotely fair to people?"
Mercedes	"Non-compete clauses are exactly the opposite of a free market and a democracy. And increasingly they are being applied to ordinary people in ordinary jobs. Like fast food! They lock workers into horrible jobs to be abused and exploited, because these workers cannot take their skills elsewhere to a better paying, more satisfying job. And they encourage worker abuse. After all, what can an abused worker do? They can't leave!"
Lisa	"Individuals have no ability to negotiate on an even playing field with business when setting the terms of a job. Non compete clauses put all the power in the hands of business. Individuals who need a job, will sign away their rights because they have few to no choice in the matter. Non-compete clauses are just a way for business to unfairly protect their own interests. These policies enable business to set and maintain terms of employment that can be exploitive. Individuals are subject to the whims of business and have no comparable ability to protect their interests of securing reasonable employment."
Derek	"I completely agree with eliminating non-competes. They have a chilling effect on workers who are scared to leave the company they work for, believing that they cannot find another job in their field without risking being sued from their previous employer."
Lisa	"As a physician, I believe we must eliminate non-compete clauses in physician contracts. As hospital systems and/or private equity physician groups grow and

Please let us continue to do our jobs as intended. Please do not let them win this battle and continue to further deteriorate patient care."
Jiss	"I am writing to express my strong support for the Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) efforts to ban non-compete clauses in employment contracts for doctors. Non-compete clauses are provisions that prohibit doctors from working for a competing practice or hospital for a certain period of time after leaving their current employer. As you may be aware, non-compete clauses can be particularly harmful for doctors, and I believe that they should be banned altogether for the following reasons: Non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient care. By restricting a doctor's ability to practice medicine in a specific geographic area, non-compete clauses can limit access to medical care for patients who may need it most. In many cases, patients may be forced to travel further to receive medical care or may have to see a less qualified or experienced doctor. Non-compete clauses can limit doctors' career opportunities. Non-compete clauses can restrict doctors from pursuing their professional goals, including advancing their careers, gaining new experiences, and seeking better compensation. This can be especially detrimental to doctors who are seeking to specialize in certain areas of medicine. Non- compete clauses can harm competition and innovation in the healthcare industry. By restricting the ability of doctors to work for competing practices, non-compete clauses can limit competition and innovation in the healthcare industry. This can lead to higher costs for patients and a reduction in the quality of care. In light of these concerns, I strongly support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete clauses for doctors. I believe that this ban will help to ensure that patients have access to high-quality medical care, doctors have the ability to pursue their professional goals, and the healthcare industry remains competitive and innovative. Thank you for considering my views on this important issue. Sincerely, J.M., MD Oklahoma City, OK."
Isaac	"In a free market, a non-compete clause should have never existed in the first place."
Brian	"I've worked under both NCAs and NDAs. The NDAs we're usually related to a company trying to protect IP of software. Non competes had a different feel. They were more like making me feel like I was working on a high tech plantation. I equate it to pro football players being a free agent vs. something more akin to an indentured servant. I'm glad to see you're doing this new rule. The other latest example I've seen is the NCAA athlete portal which gives a student athlete back their freedoms. Not sure why both my examples are athletes when I was in the software industry but there you have it."

Clint	"As a physician I am all for getting rid of non-competes. It's an antiquated idea that needs to be gone!"
Ryan	"I have been told by local attorneys they usually aren't enforceable but do cause undue financial burden when having to combat against them. Please ban"
Ryan	"I'm a physician. I worked for the largest hospital system in the state that has a team of attorneys. When I wanted to start my own obesity clinic they told me it competed with them. Mind you I worked as a hospitalist and they didn't have a single physician that marketed themselves as being operating a pure obesity medicine practice. It took several letters and emails to the President of the hospital system to convince them and now I'm a huge resource for the entire system and more than 15% of our patients are employees in the hospital system. The fact that they tried to argue the merits of what constitutes competition and what does not is inherently unfair when they have endless resources and we do not."
Michael	"I am strongly in support of the dismantling of non-compete clauses. They provide benefit only to the employer, who is permitted to put a legal harness on their employees and interfere with said employees' ability to ply their trade as they so choose. This artificially suppresses wages, it stagnates the markets it affects, and it is against any notion of economic freedom or individual choice. I have more than ten years of experience in the Information Technology sector and have witnessed how, through the use of these non-compete clauses, large corporate entities (which already held substantial advantages over their employees, in most instances) were able to keep employees from seeking better employment, changing their life situation (i.e. moving to a different part of the country in which the given corporate entity does not operate), or furthering their career. They are, in essence, trapped. As are many of the country's workers by these clauses, at a time when the need for economic power is greater than ever. This is a move in the right direction. I wish to re-state that I strongly, strongly support this proposed rule."
Thuy	"As a physician, I vote NO to noncompete!!!"
Sherri	"I am for banning non-competes!!! I have been against them for years and believe they prevent people from their livelihoods."
siddhartha	"I support non compete clause rule proposed by FTC"
Barra Chantel	"Non-compete clauses can effectively (Otte someone out of their field, particularly if that field is quite specialized. They trap employees in difficult positions, and even in situations where an employee was let go as part of a reduction in force, some employers have continued to enforce them (or try to)."

Dearri	"i amok with changes"
Carri	"I am so glad to see this is being proposed and pray that it goes through. I work as a manager for a medical device company and it is very difficult to find experienced technical employees. One of the challenges is that some of our competitors have very talented and knowledgeable employees but they have non-compete agreements with them. These non-compete were put into place 10+ years ago and as such, their wages have barely increased year to year and now they are being payed way below the market average (by 60-80% less)! It breaks my heart for those employees and it's not fair that they aren't allowed to be paid for the amazing expertise that they have and can't better themselves, and their livelihood, by looking for employment elsewhere. These are not stake holders or part owners in the company. They make less than 50K a year. Please get this in place for all of the workers that are trapped by non-competes because they don't have the financial resources to leave the industry and start a new career."
Magesh	"This is a great news. This should be adopted as a new rule as soon as possible. Physician services and their expertise should not be limited and ruined because of the non compete clauses. This will definitely impact some of the staffing agencies who make money on physician services and let physician serve the community without any clauses..."
James	"Non-compete agreements can be detrimental to both employees and the economy as a whole. They limit the mobility of workers, preventing them from seeking better job opportunities and earning higher wages. This can stifle innovation and competition, as employees are discouraged from leaving their current employer to start their own businesses or work for a competitor. Banning companies from requiring employees to sign non-competes would allow for greater flexibility in the job market and promote a more dynamic economy. Furthermore, non-compete agreements disproportionately affect lower-wage workers and those in industries with less job mobility. These workers may feel pressured to sign non-competes, even if they don't fully understand the implications, in order to keep their jobs Banning non-competes would protect these workers from being trapped in a job they are not satisfied with or from being unable to find new employment in their field. Additionally, non-competes can also restrict the growth of small businesses, as they may be unable to attract top talent due to the non-compete agreements that potential employees have signed with larger companies Banning non-competes would level the playing field for small businesses and allow them to compete more effectively with larger companies. In conclusion, this proposal would be beneficial for both employees and the economy as a whole. It would promote job mobility, stimulate innovation and competition, protect lower-wage workers, and help small businesses to grow."

Mashala	"I support the ban on non-compete clauses! Thankfully, I was educated to avoid this from early in my career, but I've read the comments of many who are not as fortunate. This clause is purely a benefit to the employer to keep them from having to provide market salary or competitive work conditions."
Adrian	"This clause allows for people to be taken advantage of and treated poorly based' !III Say NO to Non competes!!!"
Andrea	"Simply put it's just another way to keep the masses from getting ahead! It would be no different if we were to demand no new patents would be allowed beyond 1 per five years! Yet they are free to curtail the average worker to be put out of the job market! It's wrong to dictate another's ability to make a living or hold them in a low paying job! Slavery is against the law!"
Subha	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter."
Rachel	"Please consider omitting the following agreements from the non-compete ban: NDA, Non-solicitation, No-business, No-recruit, TRA, and liquidated damages provisions. While I understand the limitation to unusually broad scope, these corollary agreements would limit a recruitment too utilized by my company and make the market more challenging for small businesses."
Debbie	"I fully support the elimination of non-compete clauses in an employee/employer situation. The use of these clauses has kept my family member (a veterinarian in a large metropolitan area) from picking up extra shifts as a relief vet on their days off, or in an emergency setting such as a short-staffed hospital, thus restricting their earning abilities. This non-compete clause was used to control the employee, not protect the business. If necessary, a non- solicitation clause might satisfy the legitimate business needs of the employer."

Preston	"Attached you will find the document that was (docsignated prior to employment). As well as the email I received threatening my family the afternoon after leaving Melton Logistics. Attachments PRESTON YOST CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION AND SOLICITATION DOCUMENT Preston Caution Letter Redacted"
Brian	"Physicians are often subjected to non-compete clauses. These would be better named anti-competition clauses. While there is certainly expense in hiring and establishing a physician practice, there are other contractual tools that can be levied against the physician employee in lieu of such broad anti- competitive clauses that potentially force a physician to move or commute to a new location outside the specified prohibited radius. This places all power and control in the hands of the employer and leaves the employee powerless. It undermines the physician employee while also creating no incentive for the employer to be a better employer, as the pressure rests entirely on the physician employee. At the very least, restrictive time limits should be placed on non-competes and other reasonable avenues to regaining geographic employment freedom should be required. Ideally, they should be banned. Non-competes that exist in perpetuity are akin to indentured servitude and contribute to the powerlessness and burn out of the physician workforce. The exodus of physicians from practice is already evidence of the severity of these issues. Given the time and extreme financial duress of completing college, medical school and residency, these arrangements are unconscionable. Our physician workforce deserves to be treated with more dignity and autonomy than these arrangements allow. Furthermore, with the shift toward large health systems absorbing smaller local and regional facilities, the pool of potential employers is shrinking rapidly, and non-competes eliminate options for lateral or upward mobility. I have been an employed physician, as well as an employer of healthcare professionals. Thankfully, I have never been forced to be party to a non- compete, and I am morally averse to such employer tactics in operating my own company. All physicians should have the opportunity for professional freedom I've been afforded, and that I afford to my own staff I kindly urge the committee to weigh the needs of having a competent, mentally healthy physician workforce against the protestations from large healthcare employers. If these employers were operated competently and compassionately, the need for non-competes should not exist. The fact they do is exhibit A of the profiteering, inefficiency, incompetence and administrative greed that creates a climate where non-competes are required to maintain a captive physician workforce. Thank you for your time."
Margaret	"I am writing to lend my support for the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. As patients we want the best medical care available and these restrictions often hinder that process. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety

	concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. Please, I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Oregon | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Oregon:

	"As a subspecialist physician, I am one of about 15 physicians in Oregon who provide this unique medical care. My noncompete pushes me into an area where my patients, some of who already drive 4 hours to see me, are significantly less able to receive the care they need. Yes, my initial earnings will suffer, but it's really the patient that suffers in the end. Thank you for bringing light to this unfair and antiquated practice." - Chidimma
	"Semiconductor manufactures uses non-competes to make it more difficult for folks to move within the industry. They more harm individuals under the guise of protecting bogus "company secrets". This law should be approved." - Chris
	"Veterinarians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch jobs. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when veterinarians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold veterinarians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change." - Andrew
	"I am a 44-yr old tech worker (software engineer) in Portland, OR. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!" - Franco
	"As a working optometrist in the Portland area, it is not uncommon for non compete clauses to be within a 5 mile radius. Due to the pandemic, I've had to move jobs multiple times and, by this point, I would need to literally leave the city in order to find a job that doesn't violate the non-compete. It shouldn't be legal to dictate where people live in order to work. Thank you for working on this issue" - Jeanine

Constituent First Name	Comment Highlights
Timothy	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are harmful to patients and physicians alike. Especially practicing medicine in a smaller city, all they do is cause harm to the community and providers. Nothing good on a community level can come from having rampant non-compete clauses for medical providers. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Darshan	"If we are to consider ourselves capitalist and as such supports of the free market, this must apply to both employees and employers, and severely restricting non-compete clauses is a primary step towards this goal of creating a true free and fair market. In practice, there is little in the way of intellectual property at stake in the vast majority of cases in which non-competes are applied. In the case of physicians and other healthcare workers, the primary goal is only to suppress salaries and restrict movement. As a physician, the presence of a noncomplete does not help my employer preserve any IP or other similar legitimate market goal; the information we base our practice on is freely available in the medical literature, and the geographic restrictions make it so that any change in job requires a move, a stipulation that is anticompetitive and does not do anything to bolster the medical market."
Betty	"I am a medical doctor and put simply: a non-compete clause can ruin my career. It does not make sense that when a job situation changes, every aspect of my life is forced to change due to the geographical limitations of a non-compete clause."
Wayne	"I have seen this agreement heavily used in simply business of commerce like agricultural supply. It is used and ask for from sales people, warehouse staff, purchasing team, and both licensed and un-licensed sales staff It seems like a heavy hand to sway people from leaving to a competitor or start their own independent business in their established profession."
Armin	"As a pediatric dentist I moved for nother state to Oregon to work in an underserved community, after my agreement was terminated, I had to work an hour away from home for 18 months specially because owners insisted they do not appreciate if I work any close to their practice. The termination was solely personal not practice related. This was very toring and disappointing. Many times thought about moving the state because of that. This will help the healthcare practice and the people."

Anthony	"It is not fair that person cannot change jobs to improve their working situation."
Nancy	"It is unacceptable to use non-competes to prevent workers from leaving a job and getting another job. It is part of a large pattern of worker exploitation that includes tying health care to employment, ongoing and systematic destruction of the social safety net, and limiting the ability of employees to organize. People do not need to be coerced to stay in a job, if they are well treated and well compensated."
Dr	"See attached file(s) Attachments FTC non-compete support"
Caitlin	"I am writing to voice my emphatic support of the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. I am living proof that they absolutely stifle new entrepreneurial ventures and limit workers' ability to move out of deteriorating work situations. I worked for my former firm for 8 years and was given paycut- after- paycut, the most recent being in December 2022, enacting a 33% cut to our commissions and overall income for the same work. Not wanting to be a victim of my circumstances, there was discussion of starting a business in the same industry with two colleagues, however, after reviewing our employment agreements and consulting an attorney, it was concluded that the risk of being sued was too high and could lead to financial ruin. We decided to wait the 12 months dictated in our non-compete to start a business and then hope and pray that we are not dragged into a needless law suit to defend ourselves against baseless claims. I am currently unable to make a living utilizing the skills and contacts I have developed over the last decade. My family is suffering financial setbacks due to fear of retribution and inability to forge a new business in my industry of expertise. I sincerely hope that this ban on non- competition clauses is enacted - it would make a tremendous difference in my professional career, my family's future, and fostering a climate of healthy competition in our country."
Megan	"I completely agree with a ban on non-compete clauses. These non-competes are used to suppress employee/worker wages and stifle competition. It does not fit within the frame of a true free market and is a form of worker suppression."
Sophia	"I worked at a Tilly's clothing store for minimum wage part time during college breaks. They didn't allow their workers to get other part time jobs at other clothing stores because "it's a conflict of interest". If they found out you had another job at a different clothing store, they would fire you. These stores don't want to give their workers full time hours because then they'd have to provide benefits, but they also don't let them make their full earning potential with extra hours at a different store with the skills they already have. Needless to say, I am in favor of banning non-competes."
Kaitlin	"I am in favor of getting rid of Non-Competes; as a working woman who is currently under a non-compete contract, I have been prevented from providing several contributions to the betterment of my industry due to my non-compete contract. Non-competes directly prevent new ideas from being put into play and also prevents both people and goods from reaching their full potential. Due to my non-compete I am unable to pursue not only any full-time jobs in my industry but freelance as well, which has made it difficult to earn extra money when I already feel like I am unfairly paid due to gender wage gaps and limited roles within my company. I encourage anyone who is in favor of a non-compete contract to consider the possibilities for advancing our markets and society as a whole and how dropping these harmful contracts can improve competition and the quality of the workplace. Thank you."

Kyle	"After reading through some articles (on here and other places) I definitely want to say I 100% agree with this and I hope this makes it through. This would be substantial for so many Americans. Thank you for pushing this bill. Attachments great-job- thumb-up-drawn-hand- emblem"
Ellen	"Please outlaw non compete clauses in employment contracts."
S	"I have been forced to sign these "non-compete" clauses for years. While I understand the corporate desire to control the creativity of others, the non-compete clause stifles creativity at a time when we need it more than ever! Our planet and all life indigenous to it, (including humans), are currently facing extreme danger due to corporate greed and their decades-long willingness to take NO responsibility for the rape, pillage, and constant destruction of balanced ecosystems around the world. If there was ever a moment in time when humanity needs creative solutions, it is now. Please end the non-compete clause immediately. All life thanks you."
Al	"Non competes are a form of muzzling job change and are almost a derivation of a form of slavery. In a so called Capitalist society we are propoorted to be, non competes are against competition."
Richard	"I'm strongly in favor of this change to enable workers the freedom to work as they see fit. Specific information (e.g. chemical formulas) should be allowed to be held in secret by the employer however this should not extend to prohibiting people who have had such access from working elsewhere as long as they do not divulge the specific proprietary information described in an agreement wherein such information is uniquely identified."
Veronika	"I am a physician assistant. My prior employer, an emergency room doctor group, had a non-competetition clause. I was unable to seek employment within a 50 mile radius for two years. This restricted me from leaving when 1, and other female PA's, began to experience sexual harassment and bullying by the physicians: Doctor's Emergency Room Corporation in Springfield OR and their sister Urgent Care branch (consisting of the same individuals), Cascade Medical Associates. They did not offer appropriate benefits, such a 401K or affordable health insurance. Most egregiously however, they denied me leave to take care of my father when he was ill with cancer and needing round the clock care. I did not realize it was within my rights to file FMLA. When he passed I said No, I cannot and will not work right now. I was given several weeks of leave. When I returned they fired me on the spot and attempted to slander me. I was told if I did

	not sign a legal document stating I would not sue them, they would "find something" to pin on me in regards to patient care in order to make my termination appear legitimate. However, they were unable to, and I did not sign. I reached out to an attorney. The situation ended in a settlement for me, which also included compensation for wage theft, as they did not pay lawful overtime. Although the result was net financially positive for me, I was bullied and denied the right to take time off all throughout my father's illness. I took care of other people's loved ones while being denied the right to take care of my own. This experience was horrific, and the guilt of not being there for his last few months of life, as I was working full time, will haunt me always. If I did not have the non-compete, I could have obtained employment with a different healthcare organization in Eugene or Springfield. Leaving the practice however would have meant leaving my father, who needed me. This was not an option. This is the reality of these clauses. They promote the financial exploitation and abuse of those with the least power. They also make harassment inescapable. As a result, they are morally wrong. They are also detrimental to business interests and overall health of the organizations which maintain them, by discouraging appropriate competition. Today, I implore decision makers to choose the morally correct and economically advantageous path going forward: non-compete clauses must be abolished."
Tobias	"These clauses clearly favor employers' interests over workers', if an employer truly wishes to avoid an employee leaving for a competitor they should simply pay the employee in question, instead of preventing her or him from seeking work through contractual trickery."
Derek	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, Thank you proposing this rule. While I am sure it is wildly unpopular with institutions that profit off of forcing employees to sign such agreements this rule will help pretty much everyone else. The workers will have the opportunity to explore new opportunities and find better paying jobs and jobs that better suit their lives. I was just in my doctor's office today and we were discussing healthcare. He commented that morale among healthcare workers is the lowest he's ever seen it. Even lower than at the height of COVID. This rule will help address the flagging morale of our essential health care workers. Meanwhile patients will benefit by having happier and more motivated healthcare workers. The rule will also likely increase the interest people have in pursuing a career in medicine. Meaning patients will have more care providers to meet their needs. This is a no nonsense rule in my eyes. If we are going to have a market based healthcare system then it needs to be market for all actors involved. Healthcare institutions should not be allowed to prevent workers from entering the marketplace in search of a better job. Thank you for proposing this rule and for taking the time to review this comment. I strongly urge you to adopt this rule."
Joy	"As it relates to blue collar, middle class, non-executive, and employees whose positions are void of "trade secrets,"" I encourage the Commissioners to stop the practice of some businesses from requiring an NCA as a condition of employment. 	effect be judged null and void, making them unenforceable for those workers currently covered by such agreements."
Carl	"I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. Without regulation, non-compete clauses will continue to proliferate to more and more classes of employee, imposing a drag on the economy. Non-compete clauses are anti-competitive and have a negative effect on the availability of services. They are bad for workers and consumers."
Christopher	"There are several arguments against non-compete clauses for physicians: Restriction of patient access: Non-compete clauses can limit patient access to care by limiting the number of available physicians in a particular area. Patients may be forced to travel further to receive medical treatment or may not be able to see the physician of their choice. This can have negative effects on patient health outcomes and can result in decreased patient satisfaction. Inhibits physician mobility: Non-compete clauses can limit physician mobility and their ability to practice medicine in the location of their choice. This can prevent physicians from pursuing career opportunities that could benefit their patients, their career growth, and their own personal and professional development. Limits competition and innovation: Non-compete clauses can limit competition and innovation within the healthcare industry. By restricting physicians from working for competitors or starting their own practices, non-compete clauses can stifle innovation and limit the development of new medical technologies and treatments. Ethical concerns: Some argue that non-compete clauses can raise ethical concerns by limiting a physician's ability to provide care to patients who need it most. If a physician is unable to practice in a particular area due to a non-compete clause, patients in that area may not have access to essential medical care. Negative impact on the healthcare system: Non-compete clauses can have a negative impact on the healthcare system as a whole. By limiting physician mobility and restricting competition, healthcare costs may increase, and patients may receive lower quality care. This can have negative effects on the health and wellbeing of entire communities. In conclusion, non-compete clauses for physicians can have negative effects on patient access to care, physician mobility and career growth, competition and innovation within the healthcare industry, ethical concerns, and the healthcare system as a whole. Therefore, it is important to carefully consider the implications of such clauses before implementing them. - https://chat.openai.com/chat "
Steve	"The proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule will directly help employees of a small business that I am familiar with, which are currently subject to an 18 month non-compete agreement. Under the terms of their agreement, to change jobs they would effectively need to change industries, since they would need to wait 18 months before working for a company in the same industry, which is a severe burden. I look forward to this rule being enacted so these and other workers feel freer to pursue the job that is right for them. Thank you."
Leif	"I really hope they get rid of non-compete agreements. Working in the Managed Service Provider space, everyone is supporting roughly the same clientele in a given geographic location, and when employers can force me to not work where I'm skilled, it me over and I have to work boring internal IT or slow down my skill progression. Removing Non Compete agreements let's me take my skills gained at one MSP, and provide the same quality support for another MSP that values my time and skills more appropriately than my old place."

Ryan	"Competition is the heart and soul of a healthy free market. Government intervention, as even Adam Smith knew, is vital to maintaining a free market, because market participants will naturally want to remove their competition from the marketplace. Non-competes do exactly that. They are harmful to a healthy, functioning free market. Any country with a market economy ought not allow such things."
Nolan	"Non-compete clauses are a despicable drag on American freedom and our economy. Please ban them."
Jev	"Why should your employer have any say or action on where and when you want to take your skills and self. It only serves to hinder progress and stops tom, owth."
Celia	"Dear Sir/Madam, I am writing to express my full support for the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM). This regulation is of great importance, particularly for workers who are subjected to non-compete clauses, which can have an extremely detrimental effect on their employment prospects and earning potential. By prohibiting employers from entering into or attempting to enter into a non-compete clause with a worker, the proposed rule would ensure that employees are not unfairly restricted from seeking new job opportunities or starting their own businesses. Furthermore, the proposed rule would also prevent employers from maintaining non-compete clauses with workers, which can often be used as a means of controlling their workforce and limiting their potential. In certain circumstances, employers may even misrepresent to workers that they are subject to a non-compete clause, which can cause confusion and undue stress for employees. The Non-Compete Clause Rule would also promote fair competition in the labor market and prevent anti-competitive practices. It would allow workers to have the freedom to change jobs and utilize their skills and experience to the fullest extent possible, which would ultimately benefit the economy as a whole. In conclusion, I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, which would protect the rights and interests of workers and promote a fair and competitive labor market. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to finalize this regulation and ensure that it is implemented as soon as possible."
Tim	"I strongly support adoption of the rule banning the use of non-compete clauses by employers. Competition is key to the American economy functioning properly and providing efficient markets that lead to a high standard of living for the largest majority of Americans. Unfortunately, large businesses and their wealthy owners often have significantly more resources than the the typical worker and frequently use these resources to gain an outsized advantage in policy, regulation, transactions and employment. Non-compete clauses are a clear example of how this outsized power is used by employers to the detriment of the American economy and millions of individual workers. For these reasons, I urge the commission to adopt the rule banning the use of non-compete clauses for employees and independent contractors."

Jessi	"Non compete clauses continue to support our broken, for-profit, capitalistic, medical industry limiting physicians from providing healthcare to members our society. I say this as an Emergency Physician and an owner our our company."
Catherine	"Physicians shouldn't have noncompetes just like no other worker should have a noncompete"
Catherine	"As a physician, I believe we must eliminate non-compete clauses in physician contracts. As hospital systems and/or private equity physician groups grow and merge to control larger areas of the country, these noncompete clauses become more and more onerous. One must move out of state away from friends and family to find a new job and even then it could be challenging when a hospital system or private equity physician group is present in multiple states. Additionally, as healthcare becomes increasingly focused on profits - there is a very real threat to patient care. Sometimes only way for physicians to protect our patients is the ability to move to a new job where we feel our patient centered focus is valued. Hospitals and large groups are becoming bullies who try to strong arm physicians into compromising on our oath to "1st do no harm" when it comes to patient care. They have more lobbying power , more funds, and more time to fight this important issue. The only reason there aren't more comments on this is because physicians are busy taking care of patients. Please let us continue to do our jobs as intended. Please do not let them win this battle and continue to further deteriorate patient care."
Louis	"Repealing/severely limiting Non-Competes is the single most important step the government can take to assist American workers. As a white-collar professional, my benefit from invalidating non-competes may be marginal, but I am thinking of thousands of other workers in lower-paid fields who unnecessarily suffer from this outdated rule. I thought "competition" was one of the strengths of our economy, so I don't see how we can justify continuing to allow this practice which penalizes workers, stifles innovation, and results in effective regulatory capture."
Lin	"Workers deserve the right to look for better pay, a better work environment etc. Allowing them to be sued by former employers resembles slavery. That was abolished a long time ago. Be fair!"
Cat	"I'm a licensed massage therapist in private practice, and the first office I ever had was in a gym where the owner made me sign a contract stating that I couldn't fmd an office in another gym for two years. And that's my sole proprietorship story! Employees must have it worse than me. Stand up for them."

Brian	"I believe non-competes should never force someone to relocate. Depending on the population and geographic area, you live, this may or may not be the case. In Bend Oregon virtually all non-competes with a 20 mile radius force relocation. In large metropolitan areas like Portland this is rarely the case. Thus noncompetes in less populated areas carry a much heavier penalty and this often leads to more exploitation of those who have signed them. I feel they should be outlawed as competition and career opportunities are significantly limited by them. Noncompetes do not align with the ideas of a free country and free economy."
Sue	"Dear Friends: While I never had to sign a non-compete clause, I would have been absolutely against signing such. This clause gives business interests far too much control, which they have in so many other ways. Non-compete should be banned nation-wide."
Victoria	"I really appreciate the approach that the FTC is taking. I've been subject to various non-competes during my career (primarily in NY) and they definitely hampered my ability to negotiate with potential employers. I have also seen many examples of non-competes using very broad language and attempting to prevent someone from seeking employment in the same industry, which is really detrimental to individual job seekers. While a court might hold those types of non-competes up as too broad to enforce, it still creates issues for the individual making a decision to seek employment and creates risk and uncertainty with potential employers."
Margaret	"As a veterinarian, I support the banning of non- competes."
Julia	"I'm a critical care attending working in the pacific northwest and I am writing to urge the FTC to eliminate non-compete clauses for physicians employed in hospital systems - both for for-profit and for non-profit hospitals. Physicians have been fighting for this for years and I am so glad that the FTC is proposing removing the non-compete clause. These clauses inhibit doctors from being able to walk away from jobs that are toxic and they prevent needed changes from happening with those toxic environments because there is no market force for those changes. It contributes to our current health care physician shortage because physicians walk away when they are given no choice. We dedicate so much of our lives to education and to honing our expertise. Limitations placed on where we can work if an job goes badly are detriments to physician wellness, but also to the care provided our patients. I also urge the FTC to revise the ruling stating that non-profits are exempt. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would exclude the majority of practicing physicians. If a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable, as it would be those practices who could be most directly impacted."
Andrea	"Non-competes damage communities and doctors who serve them. Much of the non-competes are driven by PE; I have worked at an independent practice that

	offered to let me open a practice next door, if I wanted. We do not need to have moral injury. We need to have choices."
Rod	"Removal of non-competes from all levels of society and work conditions is needed. As a physician I have experienced non-compete clauses in 1 contract. The argument is that the "entity" made investment in my practice etc. This is not true at all. A reasonable contract for payment was agreed and I initiated care in a position. I had constant update of my billing and collections and being from Private practice model previously I easily covered my salary and all expenses in the 1st year of my joining. No investment needed nor did the entity have to worry about recovering their investment. The argument is that they need to cover their investment, overhead, moving allowances, signing bonuses etc. All of that is covered in the contract and has to be re-paid to the entity if someone leaves early from the practice, regardless they move 2 miles or 200 miles. Otherwise I had to pay a non-compete buyout fee of $200,000!!! If I wished to practice within 3 miles of any of this entities clinics. This essentially eliminated any employment by me either privately or with another facility in the small town I was living in at the time. This forced me to move entirely to another region of the state and worsening the available number of physicians in that community. Entities want to "restrict" the movement of personnel regardless of their employment, whether minimum wage all the way to Physician level payment programs to impose a form of "economic slavery" on all employees. I have seen this same non-compete enforced on medical assistants in my office whom are making minimum wage up to 1-2$ dollars over minimum wage and have been working for several years. Offers for new position and a local facility with a 3-4$ jump in pay was "restricted" to them unless a 5-10,000$ "buyout" was performed. This makes it impossible for the employee and most certainly the offering institution to hire this new employee. Regardless of the level of education or capabilities non-competes are bad for employment and restrict advancement of all people regardless of race, sex or education level."
Rod	"Removal of non-competes from all levels of society and work conditions is needed. My daughter had an inter-state non-compete enforced as a minimum wage medical scribe. Originally she was working with a medical scribe company in Indiana prior to Covid. Due to COVID and graduating from college she then moved to our home in Oregon. She applied for a medical scribe job in Oregon with a company that did not provide any scribe services in Indiana. But her original scribe company had 1 "office" they were providing scribe services to in Salem, Oregon. My daughter had applied with the local scribe company to provide services but when examined further found that her original scribe company from Indiana was going to enforce a $5000 non-compete buy-out fee on her to provide the services in Salem, Oregon that were within the sphere of restriction for her "new" local scribe opportunity. If we wished to fight the non-compete clause in court it was not locally in Oregon where the event was to take place, but had to be filled in court in Florida and required in-person adjudication. No minimum wage job employee can pay these kind's of fees and should not be required or enforced especially when crossing state lines. The completely restrict and enforce a form of economic slavery on all levels of education, race and sex of employees in the United States."

Alexandra	"I support this ruling and feel it should be applicable to the non-profit sector as well. Non-competes negatively impact smaller, rural, and underserved communities that struggle to attract top talent, especially in the medical realm. For example, if a non-compete for a physician stipulates a mile distance from their place of business, this forces a physician from working in that particular town, community, or potentially county, which only benefits the business's bottom line and negatively impacts the community. This also infringes upon an individual's constitutional right to "...endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness"."
Bridget	"I support the individuals right to transfer their job at their discretion. It is better for families and a fairer economy!!"
Pam	"Non compete clauses feel a lot like slavery to me. Owning or in this case having control over others ability to perform the skills they've gone into debt to achieve is not that different. Physicians caught in this nightmare are not allowed to continue treating their patients even in areas with critical levels of doctor shortages. This hurts the community as much or more than the doctor. My daughter is one of those affected by this awful "right" of her ex employer uses to keep her from practicing. He is motivated purely by greed but the patients are waiting to see their beloved doctor and therefore he did not benefit at all by this action. If you're an employer then you should be responsible to provide a workplace that people don't want to leave, not forcing them to stay or move away from your home town. Please keep our doctors free to serve patients in the setting of their choice!"
Christina	"The non compete clause rule makes it easy for hospitals to extort physicians and trap them into untenable situations. Please abolish it."
Ami	"I support the elimination of all non-compete clauses ...! These non-competes create a terrible stranglehold on employees who have very little leverage to ask for workplace changes or little freedom to leave a bad work environment - most people cannot afford to leave a job but then not work for a year or more because the non-compete dictates that. My husband is a doctor in a medical group with sub par administration that hampers the doctors ability to do their best work - he has considered starting his own practice so he can serve patients better and he cannot do this because of the non-compete clause in his contract. Our community is paying the price and getting worse medical care because doctors don't have the freedom to practice as they see fit but rather have to meet unreasonable production guidelines set by private-equity owned medical groups - without consulting doctors on these policies... This prioritizes profit for a few over the personal and professional needs of both patients and doctors in our community and it should be changed as soon as possible. Please eliminate non-competes! They do not serve workers or consumers!!"

Richard	"Non-compete clauses, especially those imposed by Private Equity Firms, hospitals and group medical practices, are killing medical care for the patients and are destroying physician freedom, free enterprise. It takes superbly trained physicians and converts them into money making machines instead of caring, humanistic care providers."
Amy	"Every employee should have the right to pursue their best work environment and bring their skills to the most outstanding employer. Our workplaces should be incentivized to become better to retain great employees and improve rather than force employees to stay to allow stagnation. I'm a doctor, I'll venture to say a good one, who is lucky to live in a state that does not allow non-compete clauses. Some of my friends do not. Why should my friends be forced to sign an agreement (which has become standard fare) that then forces them to keep their skills from hospitals that need them? Whether you are a doctor or a hair dresser, you should be able to bring your skills to where it is needed, and where you actually want to work. Our employers should be working to improve themselves to recruit the best to come and incentivize us to stay, not looking for ways to keep from improving because their employees have no choice but to stay."
Kim	"I support a ban on non-competes. They are unfair to workers and we deserve to have the ability to get any job we want."
David	"The proposed ban on non-compete agreements does not go far enough. This ban should absolutely extend to not-for-profit hospitals and hospital systems, as these healthcare entities often exhibit near-monopolistic control over large regions of the United States, discouraging competition in the healthcare sector. These not-for-profit entities also have disproportionate control over physician and healthcare provider compensation, as many healthcare providers now are employed by these systems. Please consider extending the proposed rule to not-for-profit entities, especially in healthcare, and especially for larger not-for-profit entities."
Monica	"Please ban noncompete clauses. In this day of big healthcare, (large companies, owning most of the healthcare opportunities in a specific region) noncompete clauses have greatly diminished the local wages, as compared to areas only 100 miles away over a mountain pass. When a physician or provider signs a contract locally, they have to sign a noncompete, and now they are no longer able to negotiate their wages. If they want higher wages, they have to uproot their entire family and move 100 miles away over a mountain pass, which takes three Hours Dr. This is ridiculous. It puts all the bargaining power in the hands of a giant corporation owned by another giant corporation. It hurts the little guy, and it completely affects a persons ability to earn a fair wage."
Sean	"I am all in favor of ending non-compete practices. It is extremely harmful to freelancers like me."

linda	"I have never liked noncompetes. It stifles competition and has been abused way too much. I want to see it outlawed."
Jared	"I 100% support this proposed change, for too long have companies been hording talent. An NDA should be all a company needs to protect itself from IP leaks."
Staci	"I fully support the ban of noncompete clauses. I am a veterinarian specialized in Internal Medicine. I have had noncompete clauses in every employment contract I've had since finishing residency in 2013, other than when I worked in California for 2 years where they are illegal. I have had to relocate to other cities when I wanted to leave a job because of how restrictive noncompete clauses were. With the mental health crisis in veterinary medicine, noncompetes are a large factor in this since it causes medical professionals to feel "trapped" in employment situations that are not in alignment with their personal or ethical values, with little recourse to leave them without fear their employer may take lengthy and expensive legal action against them. Please ban noncompete clauses to help ensure better treatment for employees and improve the freedom of employees to leave toxic workplace environments without fear of repercussions."
Ruby	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. Although I have not been negatively affected by a non-compete clause, I know that others have, so I support this ban. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Alex	"This is the right thing to do."
Claire	"Hi fam --- I'm asking for your help. On January 5th, the FTC proposed a rule change which would abolish noncompete clauses. If you're willing, please follow this link and submit a comment supporting this action. This will only take you 5 minutes but could make a lifetime difference for me. Once the webpage is open, click on "submit a comment" right above the word Overview. Next, click the blue comment button. The very top allows you to type in a comment. To make it easier for you, I've drafted this short blurb: I support this action to abolish noncompete clauses. A close friend of mine is a healthcare small business owner and struggles in growing his practice due to a noncompete clause. It hinders work stream and personnel expansion. Please move thrward with this action and restore the uninhibited entrepreneur spirit and wage equity. Thank you Once complete, be sure to fill out the remaining fields until you get to the confirmation page which provides you a confirmation number of your comment. Please copy an share as you see fit. Thank you for considering!"
LONI	"No matter the training or skill offered by a business to an employee or partner, the way it is deployed by an individual in the business community will always be through the unique lens of that individual. It will never truly be a duplicate or replica. And entrepreneurs know that the more they differentiate their service

	from another, the stronger their offering will be. Therefore, contractually limiting the ability to carry knowledge and skill forward after employment or engagement with another firm is an artificial protection that is truly meant to only limit competition. Eliminating the non-compete clause is healthy for American business, especially the small entrepreneur."
James	"Hello there, I'm a hiring manager at an optometry practice in Portland and I've seen firsthand how noncompete clauses can be a real pain for folks in the medical field. I mean, it's crazy that people are getting forced out of their city or even state just because of these things. It doesn't make any sense, especially in cities like ours where the competition is already tough. And it's not just bad for the employees, it's bad for the patients too. Noncompetes are like a sword hanging over your head that your boss can use to threaten you. And it's just holding back growth in the industry. I know getting rid of noncompetes won't solve all our problems, but it would be a huge step in the right direction for making things more competitive."
Douglas	"Re: Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am a physician who in the course of my 40 year medical career has worked in academic medicine, moved to a health maintenance organization and then back to an academic position. Each of those moves was made necessary by family considerations. There was absolutely nothing in my work as a medical professor or primary care physician that was proprietary. Yet the options I had in each of those career transitions were profoundly restricted by non- compete clauses tucked away in the contracts that I needed to sign at each stage. I would offer from my personal experience that these clauses deeply impact career options and family needs, as well as harming much needed academic movement. I also believe that any rule changes should not put a salary restriction on their implementation. These non-complete clauses needlessly hams high-earners as much as lower wage workers."
Coral	"PLEASE ban non-competes, they make changing jobs in my industry very hard, they create hardship on families, they artificially suppress wages, and they are anti-free businesses. - OREGON"
Josh	"Non-compete clauses are like breaking up and your ex telling you who you can and can't date. This is toxic behavior and it's toxic for employers to have any input into an employee's life, they do not exercise in the employee, or former employees best interest. If an employee doesn't want a former employee to compete they should pay them not to."
Laura	"I support the proposed rule to ban exploitative noncompete agreements. Right now, noncompete agreements are being unethically used across the country to prevent workers from quitting their jobs for a better offer. Competition drives markets — and when noncompetes eliminate competition in the labor market, employers don't have an incentive to give their workers better pay, working conditions, or benefits. One in five American workers have signed noncompete agreements --- and it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly bound to their jobs by noncompetes. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompetes to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompetes would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people. I urge you to pass this proposal."

Chris	"Non compete is not fair to employees leaving a company without the ability to move into similar jobs. I just left a company after 16 years. They made me sign a non compete and non disclosure. Now I have to start a entirely different career. Ridiculous! I have put my whole life education into this trade and now I am prohibited from using the knowledge. This just doesn't make sense."
Kristi	"I am 100% in favor of this rule. We merged with a company that had us sign a non-solicitation agreement and after working for them for two years realized they don't care about the customer, but just making money. I was so unhappy and had to look for a job with a salary until my non-solicitation is over. I would have left and started my own agency. I do like the new company I work for, but owning my own business would have been nice. I have prior clients calling me everyday about the terrible service and want to move to me, but I am unable to help! My new company even tried to negotiate a price to buy my book, but my previous employer decided to sell it to a company that is not local, so now my prior clients are not only no longer able to move to me, but they are dealing with someone who is not local and not business is done in-person. Bottom line this is not fair to my prior clients not being able to move to who they want to."
Justin	"I work as a financial advisor to physicians and I help them understand the contracts they sign. Many of my clients specifically are anesthesiologists, and almost all of them have onerous noncompete clauses included in their contracts. In my observation, these noncompetes serve no constructive protective purpose for the employers. Anesthesiologists work with patients who are unconscious, and patients very seldom (if ever) select the physician who will be their anesthesiologist. There is no patient relationship to protect, and seldom any intellectual property or business reason that an anesthesiologist should not be given free rein in terms of their employment opportunities. Whenever these doctors are stuck in punitive noncompetes, they get burned out quickly, and institutions are disincentivized to earn these doctors' trust and loyalty. This creates an environment of burned out, disillusioned doctors who are ill equipped to provide proper patient care. Many doctors are just quitting medicine out of despair. Noncompetes are heightening our country's already dire healthcare issues and the most vulnerable parts of the healthcare ecosystem would be protected by a suspension of noncompetes for physicians."
Ryan	"I support this proposal to rule that non-compete clauses are unfair to employees. Workers are at a disadvantaged position and are at the mercy of their employers for their livelihoods. Non-compete clauses trap employees into their position by making it functionally impossible for most people to find another job. Employees need to be able to hold their employers accountable for wrongdoing, and the minimum power they must be equipped with is the freedom to quit their job when they find it is not meeting their needs."

Melissa	"People should not be trapped in their jobs because of a non-compete clause. It's unfair and - d'uh - anti-competitive. Just another way corporations have advantaged themselves over their employees, and given themselves too much power over people's lives."
kimberley	"Non-compete clauses are stifling creativity, entrepreneurship and social mobility. Please ban them."
Carla	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. It is contrary to the concepts of freedom on which this country was founded to punish people for leaving a job by making it difficult-to- impossible for them to find alternative employment in their chosen field! Non-compete clauses do exactly that--they become indentured servants. Why was this ever considered a good idea? It boggles the mind. Every person should be free to pursue their optimal employment opportunities, wherever they may lie."
Diana	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, This is important for our citizens who have been held back by employers who have used this tactic as means of wage control stopping their workers from earning fair market value. It's time for the US Government to start protecting its working citizens from the greed of business profits. I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Colter	"Non-competes provide minimal benefit to a company at the cost of both society and the employee. We could have better working conditions, more innovative startups, and reduce the sense of employees being preyed on by their employer. Please ban non compete clauses."
Ryan	"It's time to protect freedom and promote the free movement of labor! Employers should not be allowed to control their former employees with non- complete clauses. Thank you for leading on this issue and taking a serious look at the harms caused by non-compete clauses."
A.L.	"I support the non-compete clause ban for ALL workers, no exceptions. This will give workers and families much needed ability to move if needed, either between employers or geographically. Current non-competes hamstring workers' ability to provide well for themselves and their families."

Sarah	"This is long overdue. No one should have to move from their home simply because they want a different job if one is available nearby. It allows employers to take advantage of workers. As physicians and other medical workers leave the field, this is something that could be done to help us be able to find a job that values and respects us while not having to leave the field or move and encourage big for profit corporations to treat front line workers better. Please abolish non compete clauses. Thank you."
Wesley	"I agree with the idea that Americans should be able to get whatever job they wish especially if it is a better opportunity. Therefore, removing the noncompete clause makes sense. This will force companies to continue to treat their employees fairly to keep them with their company instead of leaving to a competitor for greater salary. This will lead to a greater retention rate within companies and will improve the overall environment in the workplace. This is a comment in support for removing the noncompete clause. This will also allow those who are not being compensated fairly to get their fair wage and share thus increasing competition and people will get paid more if they are so qualified."
Andrew	"I am writing in support of the proposed ruling which would prohibit non-competes. I am a physician, and I have firsthand seen the deleterious effects it has on patient care and physician burnout. Non-competes as they are currently used can completely erase negotiating power of individual employees, with little clear benefit. I have heard from numerous other physicians who have been forced to stay at jobs they absolutely despise, but have no other option as their non-competes would force them to move away from their family and home. This lets employers take advantage of their employee's with minimal regard for their well being. States that have made non-competes non-enforceable, such as California and Colorado, do not seem to have sustained any significant harm to their economy despite the loss of non-competes. This past year I had to move hundreds of miles away from my prior job due in part to the non-compete. Many of my former colleagues were unhappy with their work situation, but were unable to leave because their families are located in the area, and the non-compete prevents any mobility. One should not have to choose to settle for miserable work conditions just to live near their family. A happier, more productive, and independent work force should be what America strives for. Non-competes fight against these principals and I urge you to make them a problem of the past."
Brandt	"I agree let's get rid of the non compete clause. Proud intro to business class representative."
James	"The non-compete clause is outrageously unfair to working people and must be abolished!"
Ahsan	"I support a ban on non compete clause rule."

Alina	"As a 17 year old high school student from Wilsonville, Oregon, a member of the workplace, and an aspiring career woman, you should ban non-compete agreements. I would like to have the opportunity to move my career forward, and these agreements prohibit me from freely taking on new opportunities to better myself. I shouldn't have to feel guilty for networking and aspiring to create a better life for not only myself but my family."
Erica	"Please stop non-compete bans. This is a severe limitation not only to financial independence, but denies the concept of a free market system. Employees must be able to leverage their own employment in order to have any voice in their own livelihood."
Jacqueline	"Let's free our workers instead of keeping them enslaved. Do better for American corksers"
Eli	"I am absolutely in favor of this. Not only are big companies just pl am becoming monopolies, where they can't, they're becoming cartels. Get 'em to knock that crap off."
Betty	"I am a physician in private practice and support this important change. Many physicians get stuck in large organizations which maximize profit over patient care. This will allow them to leave and potentially start and join smaller practices that focus on their original calling- the care of patients."
Elsa	"Non-compete clauses are deeply unfair to workers, even more so for lower wage workers. Nobody should be trapped in a job by these unreasonable contracts."
Marta	"Thank you for considering ending non-competes. I am a physician and currently taking a hiatus from practice as my non compete limits my ability to practice medicine within our community. Outside of taking time off, the only other option was to move my entire family to another city (closest is over an hour away). Healthcare options are already limited in our community, so my inability to practice here is directly impacting patient care."
Rachael	"I strongly support the effort to ban non-compete clauses nationwide. As an author, educator, and citizen, I know that noncompete clauses reduce competition and create an unfair power imbalance between a worker and employer. Please ban non-compete clauses and do away with this backwards practice that stifles competition for no good reason."
Ann	"Eliminate it ! Why do companies have full control over employees even after layoffs?"
Michael	"I fully support this rule. This creates a more fair economy and shifts the balance of power towards a more sustainable, citizen- focused society, where workers have every ability to earn a livable wage in a competitive employment environment."

Geraldine	"Non-Compete clauses are anti family. A change of employment forces the whole family to relocate. This is an unfair infringement on the right to happiness."
Edward	"Contracts with non-compete agreements are undoubtedly an important tool designed for entrepreneurs and innovators to protect invaluable intellectual property they possess; this gives their businesses a chance to succeed in highly competitive environments. In healthcare, employers such as hospitals, large multispecialty groups, and even small single specialty practices have adopted this tool to suppress competition, reduce compensation, and take advantage of naive new doctors out of residency or fellowship. In medicine, there is no "intellectual property" that the hospital system owns, it is the expertise learned over 7 to 11 years of training that the employee (physician) possesses that the healthcare employer seeks to control and monetize with a non-compete. The arguments made by employers to force non-compete agreements, and make no mistake they are forced, all come down to controlling the market and reducing competition. When physicians finish their training and fatally start to look for jobs, they have no idea how much they are worth in terms of revenue generation; all the power is in the employer's hands since they have the data that shows how much each physician makes with their insurance contracts, payer mix, etc. The goal is to bring in the physician for as little as possible with a signed non-compete to maximize return. What then plays out over the next 2-3 years is the physician learns their revenue potential (or what their colleague is making), and then has no recourse or negotiation power to get a more equitable deal unless they want to leave the county or even state in some instances. So now the physician must choose between staying in an inferior deal or picking up their family and moving to a whole different community; the thought that your employer has the power to control where you live is unconscionable, but it also leads to poorer patient continuity and worsened access to care when the physician is forced to leave. A perfect example is playing out right now in my current practice - a large healthcare organization bought a smaller orthopedic practice on the promise of stability and better insurance contracts. There wasn't a massive payout, just a good contract and the ability to keep practicing for the physicians. The healthcare organization then came back 5 years later and is forcing the physicians to either sign a contract addendum reducing compensation, leave the community, or fight the non-compete in the courts at an exorbitant cost. The non-compete states the physician cannot practice within 75 miles of the county for one year. Some of the older physicians with the means are going to take a year off, but the new physicians in the group do not have the ability to sit idle for a year, so will be forced to sign the agreement or leave the community. Think about what this does to the community who now may lose 7-8 physicians; each of which are caring for thousands of patients in any given year. This will undoubtedly harm the patients and the local economy. Employers will also cite the considerable cost associated with bringing in new physician employees, and not having a non-compete opens them up to considerable risk if the physician gets an offer from a competing practice in town. While this is true that it takes time to establish a practice and

	turn a profit. this is no excuse for locking these employees in to inferior contracts and taking away all their negotiating power. Market forces will establish the demand and pay for physician employees just like it does for employees in other fields; if the employer is the superior choice in town, then they will attract and retain these employees. With increasing healthcare consolidation driven by private equity and insurance companies, getting rid of the non-compete clause would be an important step towards maintaining competition in the healthcare market."
Thomas	"I currently work for a large medical practice that employs over 100 physicians, nurse practitioners and physician assistants. Most of us have a non- compete clause that limits us to practice outside a 25 mile radius. Unfortunately, the organization was recently bought out by a Fortune 5 company (United Health Group via Optum Health). Numerous of the clinicians have expressed disinterest in the change of power and have considered leaving. The problem is this is the 2nd largest employer in the county and if most of these disinterest clinicians people were to leave, it would leave a large gap in medical care in the County as 25 miles puts move of these clinicians in the next county over."
Daniel	"For 99% of employees and contractors currently subject to non competes, I agree with the proposed rule. However, there are 3 important carveouts where the employee motility drawbacks of non competes are outweighed by the stifling of innovation from corporate secrets escaping to a competitor. In our legal system, trying to achieve this protection from NDAs (non disclosure agreements) costs millions more to pursue and win than most small and midsize companies can afford. Noncompetes providing prima facie evidence of civil damages and injunctive relief is the only way to protect small and midsize companies from these losses. All 3 carveouts inherently protect the employee because they are highly skilled, and thus highly paid positions. I propose an additional protection for them at the end. Carve-out 1: The employee is primarily employed (>80% of their hours) to perform R&D on pre-patentable research, where a reasonable observer would expect a patent to be pursued and obtained. The research must be directed as "intent to pursue a marketable discovery" to qualify. The need is to protect corporate secrets in a stage of development where the execution of our judicial process does not provide protection due to the high cost of pursuit and low probability of success despite real injury. Principal PhD researchers, and even lab technicians in certain industries would fall under this exemption. The lower paid levels such as the lab techs should be given the additional compensation relief noted at the end. Carve-out 2: The employee is employed primarily for the creation of, or for directing the execution of, corporate strategy. This would apply to CxOs, board members, Strategy Office employees. It can apply to director-level managers that operate a large percentage (>25%) of the corporation's business by revenue, where 'corporation' is not the legal entity, but the top-level entity at which corporate strategy is defined. (The corporate parent, or a subsidiary level if strategy is primarily defined by the subsidiary.) A 'highly compensated employee' threshold should be applied to protect against a local franchise owner taking advantage of local store managers, but still giving that owner a way of protecting him/herself from another local bad actor with a viable

	threat to his business if he has a truly novel strategy. The 3rd carve-out is already covered by the rule. Seller of a business. For the first two carveouts, the objective of the proposed rule can be met with further protection to the employee. Include a rule where, "Except for highly compensated board members and CxOs who have legal representation for their employment contracts", such agreements must be bundled with a clause that grants a minimum of 6 months severance for both involuntary separation (vesting immediately) and voluntary separation (proportional to time worked and fully vesting at 2 years) as the penalty for subjecting an employee to anon compete. This will financially cover those few employees who are forced into a career change, and provide a substantial disincentive to employers to ask for these clauses."
Dahv	"I support the proposed rule change barring non-compete clauses. The arguments against non-compete clauses are well stated in the Overview of the Proposed Rule. In addition to the direct damages caused by non-compete clauses, they create additional burdens because employees covered by such clauses (and their employers) experience uncertainty as to whether they could be accused of violations. Businesses are very successful in states that already bar non-compete clauses, including CA, demonstrating that non-compete clauses are not required and perhaps are a net negative in terms of business success."
James	"Non-competes clauses are very abusive and prohibit competition, hospitals abuse physicians by enforcing non-competes clauses preventing them supporting themselves without uprooting their family and starting over in a new city. Physicians provide no competition against hospitals, non-compete clauses should be abolished immediately."
James	"Non-compete clauses prevents some patients from seeing a patient, they prohibit market forces with negotiation, one physician leaving does not affect a hospital. The current law needs to be modified to INCLUDE NON-PROFIT hospitals. They are the worst offenders in taking advantage of the physicians!"
Emily	"Just a note to say that I'm in favor of voiding non compete clauses that constrain the ability of low wage workers to obtain new employment."
Wendy	"Please support banning non-competes. As a veterinarian, non-competes prevent me from working in my chosen field if I have to leave a company for any reason. These overly restrictive rules are unfair."
Casey	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses are deliberately intended to hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and hams working Americans. Implementing this policy will make it easier for workers to eam what they're worth and help the American economy grow!"
David	"I am strongly in favor of banning non-compete agreements. The ability of people to freely move between companies has been one of the biggest reasons for the tech industry's success, because talented people aren't tied to one company to keep working in the area they are best at. This is something that should be extended to all people, not just people who happen to work in a field that is common in California."

Louie	"Hey FTC! This is why you should ban non-compete clauses. This is because it will allow workers to go to better jobs, or have leverage to ask for higher pay at their current job. With an increase in wages, consumer spending will increase and this will boost our economy naturally, without the need for billions of dollars in government stimulus that's puts us more in debt and causes inflation. This could be a great solution to our rising debt problem while helping the working class make more money and not be afraid to leave for a better job."
Emily	"This law would be an excellent way to bolster worker's rights in strata of the population normally unaffected by unions or other collective bargaining agreements: white collar workers. As a white collar worker myself, there have been several times when noncompete agreements have prevented me from changing companies and receiving a better offer. Making such agreements illegal would render my power in the employer-employee relationship much greater and allow a slimmer margin between my wages and the amount of value my work produces. Overall, myself and several colleagues are excited to see if this passes as it will directly affect us in a positive way."
Ben	"A great rule! Non-compete agreements are blatantly anti-competitive, and hams both workers and consumers. Even though in many cases they're already unenforceable, ifs important to stop employers from threatening employees with enforcement."
Nancy	"The New York Times published a video this morning explaining the effects of non-compete clauses on citizens who work in jobs that should not be bound by this clause. It is your responsibility to fix this. So, fix it."
Lola	"A non-compete clause is a very easy way to abuse physicians (at our current companies), and limit our ability to be accessible to patients with whom we have long term relationships with. Physician well being is an issue that is permeating the country, and is leading to physician burnout even earlier than before (due to multiple factors)."
tim	"To Whom It May Concern: I am a medical professional, PA-C, now 25 years in the industry. Non-compete clauses, in previous contracts, have forced me to either move away from the town in which I have a home, in which we have a son in school, and has kept me from caring for many, many, many patients with whom I have forged a professional relationship over years of service. Non-compete clauses are not in the public interest and are an unfair element of contracts that many medical practices hold over the heads, like a dagger, of employees who would like, or who NEED, to seek employment with other employers in the same vicinity. Many states do ban non-compete clauses, but the ban should be federal and complete. Please do the right thing and end non-compete clauses once and for all. Sincerely, A medical professional Oregon"

Chris	"I am strongly in favor of this rule! Noncompetes stifle competition, and the harm they do to labor markets far outweighs their benefits."
Karen	"Non-Compete is in place to protect the companies profits and ability to set prices for goods and services. This process curtails innovation and competition and makes it almost impossible for new business start ups that would be energizing the economy and creating jobs. This hurts supply and demand economy where the consumer pays and the company profits."
Ross	"This is an important rule that will protect worker's rights and promote competition in the labor market."
Ross	"The American Hospital Association recently asserted that a ban on noncompetes would "exacerbate problems of health care labor scarcity, especially for medically underserved areas like rural communities.", and that "physicians and senior executives, do not present the same considerations with respect to noncompete agreements as other types of employees." As a physician anesthesiologist I strongly disagree with these statements. The American Hospital Association is a lobbying organization supported by large private equity corporations that also happen to own hospitals. These organizations have developed a business model of siphoning profits from a hospital system out of the region, while reducing services and staffing to unsafe levels that promote burnout. Healthcare workers are victims of the same corporate malfeasance as the rest of the American workforce and deserve the same labor protections. Burnout and suicide among medical professionals is far more prevalent than the general population, and a major contributor to labor scarcity. Non- compete agreements essentially trap hospital employed physicians in contracts, allow hospital corporations to erode the quality of care because physicians have no seat at the table and are unable to leave. A ban on non-competes in this sector might result in local physician migration to higher functioning systems, and pressure hospitals that physicians view as bad stewards to improve. Most physician non-competes have a geographical boundary, and would therefore not significantly exacerbate local/regional staffing. I am aware from personal experience that non-competes in the Seattle area, for example, have significantly reduced average compensation and benefits compared to the Portland area, where non-competes are not enforceable and cost of living is lower. Hospital employed physicians, like other healthcare workers, deserve to participate in a free employment marketplace, to seek job opportunities where they can use their medical license as leverage to provide high quality care."
Michael	"I have been a physician assistant for almost 20 years, and every place I have worked at has had a non-compete clause for both physician assistants and physicians. This has always been an incredibly unfair and limiting practice by hospitals and clinics. As one example, in the town in which I currently live, my clinic has a non-compete clause stating that I cannot take another primary care job in the immediate area for 2 years after I leave the clinic. The problem is that the next nearest town where I could potentially find a job is an hour away. These kinds of clauses either create a condition of indentured servitude, or result in people having to move from an area which they otherwise might love. I strongly urge the FTC to pass this change in regulation and prohibit the use of non-compete clauses in all areas. These clauses are anti-worker."

Richard	"Please do not allow the hospital lobby to hamstringing this very important change in regulations! Non-competes result in poorer working conditions and poorer patient care. They are one of many problems in our healthcare industry, and you have the ability to fix this problem. Please make sure that medical professionals are not excluded in any way from the removal of non-competes!"
Sherri	"Non-compete clauses were initially used to keep executives from stealing trade secrets. It is an injustice to allow companies to use them to prevent middle class and minimum wage earners from seeking employment to put food on their table and a roof over their heads. I support complete abolishment of non- complete clauses in this country."
John	"I'm writing in support of the FTC's ban of non-compete clauses. These unfairly keep wages down by not allowing new organizations to bid on projects. I am retired but feel that big businesses have far too much sway in the world of commerce and competition encourages the benefits of regulated capitalism."
Arna	"I support the prohibition of enforcing non-compete clauses in employment contracts and agreements. As an independent contractor in healthcare, my industry knowledge is valuable and should not be considered trade secrets. Interoperability of healthcare networks is crucial to public health and not being allowed to work for other companies for a set period of time is stifling progress."
Ted	"I enthusiastically support the Non-Compete Clause Rule, thereby insuring geater flexibility for American workers in the job market and enhancing job growth."
Helen	"It is very important that those working in the medical professions, including physicians and surgeons not be excluded from this important non-compete ban. These non-compete clauses have impacted doctors' ability to advocate for excellence and safety. Being in a "highly skilled" category of employment should not preclude them from being included in this ruling. Those skills should remain available to still practice in their local home community and not held hostage to one clinic."
Emily	"I strongly support this ban. Banning competition prohibits progress, stifles economic growth, and creates division and resentment. It prevents experts from being experts and contributing to society. Businesses should focus on being a great place to work and contribute instead of focusing on how to best punish those who dare to leave toxic and unsupportive work environments. As someone who was under a non-compete myself, I fully understand how devastating these are to people... and not just their work, but their emotions and souls. It's deeply personal and insulting."

Kyle	"I hope this finds those who review my thoughts well. I do not have a non-compete clause at work, though my wife does, and the enforcement of these contracts is stifling to our small community's health care systems. We live in Bend, OR, which is a population of —110k and the health care system in our town serves —250k on the east side of the Cascade mountains. If patients need a colonoscopy or to see a kidney doctor (Nephrologist) in our community there are just a few providers who can see them. If a Provider decides their workplace clinic system isn't a good place for them, because of the number of non-competes in our community, the providers are driven out and have to leave and our community loses a healthcare provider. The use of non-competes, from my limited understanding, does nothing to protect workers but reduces the flexibility said workers have in seeking new employment. In our community these workers - highly trained physicians, nurse practitioners and physician assistants - not only lose their autonomy but also lose ability to practice medicine in a way that's good for their patients. And while some may have little empathy for highly compensated health care providers, I have seen patients suffer in their inability to get in for a colonoscopy or to find a kidney doctor or oncologist. By ending non-competes the true tenets of capitalism can be honored where new businesses can grow, thrive and create opportunities for both their employees and, in this case, the patients that rely on their services. Thanks for considering ending non-compete clauses. Best regards, Kyle"
Richard	"Please remove the non compete clauses! They are predatory towards individual providers who have little leverage to get them removed and have devastating consequences if triggered. Thank you."
Nicholas	"Some companies, like Epic Systems, enforce their non-compete indirectly but preventing access to 3rd party consultants who hire former Epic employees or even fining their own customers for hiring an employee who is still under their non-compete. If the FTC seeks to end non-competes, you should make sure to prevent this sort of behavior as well, otherwise this will become the standard workaround for enforcing a non-compete"
Diya	"As a physician I strongly support banning non compete clauses They are used to force doctors to relocate from their homes and lose their relationship with their patient in case they no longer stayed employed with their group Medical groups usually demand ridiculous sums of money to buy out from non complete as high as 300k This is not good for patient care or the health care system and need to stop"
Bea	"Non compete clauses restrict movement between companies only for the good of the original company - it does not allow for free employment movement, which is a must!"
Christian	"As a medical provider (PA) I fully agree with the FTC's proposed ruling to void Non-Compete Clauses. I strongly agree that it limits any employed person's greatest ability to increase their compensation."

Lara	"By getting rid of Non-competes for employees this allows those employees to better support their families. If there is an opportunity to better support my family why not take it. A non compete limits the ability to earn a living wage for some. Please ban non-compete clauses for employees!"
David	"While I like the idea of removing non-competes from employment contracts a non-solicit which most companies have moved to will still force workers to stay in their current job. Unless I am reading this wrong. The rule should prevent non competes and non-solicits from being put in place forcing employees to stay where they are or be unemployed for 2 years."
Jessica	"I would like to support your proposition of banning non-competes. Our private practice was recently brought out by a multi state corporation and have imposed restrictions and how I practice medicine. I would love to be able to quit my job and move to a private practice again or I can take better care of my patients, but I have a two-year multicounty noncompete. Please consider making non-competes illegal to provide better patient care tbr our patients."
Darlene	"I applaud and strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. When we go looking for a job, the last thing we need is our old boss preventing us from finding one where we earn more and are treated better. This prior restraint controls and exploits employees even after they terminate their relationship with an employer. Surely, we each have the right to seek better employment without our ex-employer's consent. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone. The right thing to do is follow through to ban non-compete agreements. I thank you for the steps already taken to protect workers rights by stopping a cruel practice that disadvantages them."
Alexandra	"Give people freedom to pursue other opportunities instead of being tied to their employer. Non complete clauses infringe on the American right of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.""
Lish	"Of course we need to ban the non competes! Keep the "free market" free from these attacks on workers."
Adam	"As an associate dentist in my own neighborhood, my company has been recently acquired by a private equity firm that has expanded my non-compete to leave with me no choice but to work for them or leave the city and my beloved neighborhood. This is damaging to careers, people's livelihoods, and ability to find stability in their lives without uprooting it to meet an agreement they had no choice but to sign. I ask this to be lifted as it is VERY exploitative."

Thea	"I write in support of this rule. If you look up "slavery" in Britannia .com, you will find that loss or restriction of freedom to move about is one of the constellation of conditions that define slavery. A "free society" should take great care when granting the powerful a right to restrict a citizen's movement. Of the 1st 3 unalienable rights mentioned in our Declaration of Independence, non-compete clauses strip citizens of 2: liberty & the pursuit of happiness. I understand that companies should have the ability to protect proprietary knowledge. But we now see that companies are not restricting non-competes to this justifiable purpose. These rules address some of the current abuses by companies. Thank you."
Neesa	"Non competes are terrible for the individual. They are akin to a monopoly for the employer. I would like to see them outlawed"
ANDREW	"I am resident in Oregon and never knew Non-compete contracts existed until I moved back to my hometown for a new position at a Civil Engineering firm. I was hired as a salaried employee making about 65,000 a year. With my offer letter I received a non-compete contract specifically for Engineering services. I was afraid to sign it at the time and discussed my concerns with the I IR manager. He told me "we only have those so that you can't steal our clients and go to one of our competitors." I told him I wanted to eventually start my own business and this wouldn't work for that. He said that if I started my own business "they probably wouldn't have a problem with that". Fast forward to 2021, I became a partner in the firm with a 6% ownership. Unfortunately they amended the bylaws of the company so that I couldn't be a managing member with less than 10% right before I joined. (Previously it had been 3%). I had no control over employees in my department and even though I increased the revenue of the survey department from 180,000 to nearly 300,000 with less employee hours I still had very little control over my employees or the direction of the company since I was a "non-managing member". No ability to hire, fire, adjust compensation, or purchase new equipment. Over the one year I was a partner my ownership lost about 15% of its value, so I couldn't wait to leave. I was also only getting paid about 80,000/year plus my ownership dividends which didn't do anything but pay off my 6% ownership. When we looked to buy out our biggest partner (51%) and I was only offered 10% of the new company it was time for me to go. In Oregon non-competition contracts between an employer and employee are voidable but not those relating to a sale of a company. As an employee the statutory maximum is 18 months. I reviewed my non-competition with an employment attorney, and she recommended that I take action to void the latest non- competition agreement I had to sign in order to sell my ownership back to the company. Her opinion was that as a non-managing member I was an employee compensated with ownership. I had three non-competition agreements, the first when I came on as a salaried employee, the second as part of our partnership agreement when I bought 6%, and the third as a condition of the sale of my ownership. I didn't know that the first one didn't meet state law when I signed the second, I signed the third thinking it was voidable... I left the firm in March of 2022 and delivered a message to them that I was taking action to void the non-competition and starting my own business, with a focus on Surveying since the non-competition agreements only listed Engineering. As an olive branch I offered to

	limit my services to Surveying for two years in the spirit of the non-competition agreement. The company responded that as an owner of the firm the state law regarding non-competition agreements didn't apply and that I could not provide engineering services or market those services within 100 air miles of my hometown for two years, ending March of 2024. They threatened to take me to court and to collect damages, attorney's fees and their own hours related to the agreement. They also claimed that almost all of the surveying services I was attempting to do were actually "engineering services" in order to make things as difficult as possible for me to make a living. Even though it's a separate license required for surveying vs. engineering. (I am licensed as an engineer and a surveyor). As a one man surveying Finn I am not a threat to their organization. I am/will be competing against other small firms in the area. The company charges more for an intern than I do with 10 years of experience. They specialize in grant funded infrastructure projects which I might never have the ability to deliver something like that. AS a one man company I can only do small projects. It seems to me that they took this personally and are using the threat of legal action as punishment for me leaving the firm. In conclusion I would love to get out of this early. I regularly have to turn away local work and have to drive out of town and be away from my family to fund work. I only have about another year to go but I can't wait to get there... Please when implementing the final ntle don't leave a loophole for employers that non competes can apply for partial owners of the company like what happened to me. I see that you are looking at 25% ownership for the threshold. If you do leave the ownership loophole then companies can make employees owner of a tiny part of the company in order to keep them under a non compete."
Brian	"Any negative effects from banning non-compete requirements will be vastly outweighed by the positive business and tax advantages."
Evelyn	"I strongly support a ban on non compete agreements."
Tamara	"Non compete clauses in physicians contracts are for the benefit of the large corporation, and not the benefit of the patients, who are the ones for whom we should be advocating. Please do not carve out exclusions for non compete clauses for employers of any medical professional but especially physicians. Rot physician is forced to leave a community that has effects patients as well as the support staff that might have been employed by that physician (loss of well paying jobs for the community)."
Mitchell	"I'm currently working as a speech-language pathologist, and previously have worked for a software company. In my experience, non-compete clauses across industries serve primarily to bully employees into staying at jobs that underpay and overwork them. Ostensibly, the purpose of a non-compete is to protect companies' intellectual property. My employer didn't teach me how to conduct speech therapy, my master's program (funded by myself and tax payers) that cost me tens of thousands of dollars and years of my life did that! Employees who spend time and money developing their skills deserve to sell their time and labor as they see fit without interference from employers."

Bryce	"Mon-compete clauses force many employees, including many physicians to choose between staying at jobs with poor working conditions, compensation or are outright exploitative, and uprooting their whole life, and potentially the lives of their families to seek work elsewhere. They are anti-competitive and applied inappropriately in such a way as to only serve to manipulate employees. Please ban them. Respectfully, Physician, MD"
Rebekah	"As a physician, I strongly support advancing this non compete law with a few caveats. It should include physicians and both for profit and non-profit hospitals/employers should have to comply to the law. Non-profit hospitals should NOT be exempt!"
Matthew	"Please include physicians as protected employees from non-compete clauses. The non-compete clauses that are currently prolific allow unprecedented power to employers and remove power from employees. In essence, employers have little fear of reprisal in terms of employees leaving when they contractually prevent employees from working within a defined geographic region. It should be a protected right to practice one's trade, and this right should not be encumbered by employers."
Seth	"Noncompetes are inherently anti-competitive and negative impact the freedom of the market"
Bryan	"A person gains experience for their profession through going to college or sonic type of apprenticeship with the assumption that if they are competent at their chosen profession they will be competitive for positions and have a career. No company should have the right to limit a person's ability to get employment in their chosen profession nor burden them with a lawsuit if they disregard a non compete clause."
Jeanine	"Noncompete clauses are the modern form of indentured servitude. If a hospital or clinic does not want doctors to leave, they need to focus on making employment there worthwhile, not on how they can force doctors to either stay with them or move their whole family to a new area to find work. "Oh, but they build up a big base of patients with us, and then they start their own practice and take all our customers with them!" So treat those doctors as valued employees, and they won't walk off the job with "your" customers in tow. Or, suffer the natural consequence of treating your staff badly—losing them to a better employer."
Gregory	"As a physician who has seen noncompete clauses in action the proposal has my full and aggressive support. These contracts are used in medicine as cudgels to keep individuals from practicing in the area they call home where they can continue seeing patients they've developed relationships with and have been treating for years. They serve no other function than to protect entrenched and moneyed interests and only contribute to decreasing patient choice and access to care. I ran afoul of a noncompete clause when leaving an organization I had worked at for about three years. Theirs stated that I could not see patients within 25 miles of any of their locations for 18 months or I'd owe half of the (gross!)"

	amount they had paid me in the prior 12 months. This is madness and effectively banned me from practicing medicine anywhere near where my family lived, as well as preventing me from seeing any previous patient for a year and a half. They had multiple locations in every direction, making this harder than just seeing patients down the road, and this is commonplace in corporate medicine. This isn't trade secrets or stealing a book of business - it's simply doing my job where I live. I spoke with a few lawyers who felt that we could probably challenge it, and possibly even win, but the legal costs would have been onerous with no guarantee of a good outcome. The previous employer had big pockets and was willing to fight, so I spent over a year of my career doing part time work in other faraway parts of the state, living out of hotels and rented rooms until the clause expired. Upon being able to return home for work, numerous former patients sought me out for care and expressed their disgust and frustration at this absurd situation. It served no god purpose for anyone. It didn't even keep me from competing against my previous employer and provided them no benefit either. It was only a hamstrung career, 18 terrible months, and an interruption in care for patients. At least the former employer is now going bankrupt, so I can dance to that. Please eliminate these ridiculous clauses. Don't listen to the hospital organizations who want to keep physician labor cheap - they don't speak for us. Nor do employers who claim they've "trained" us or some such nonsense. If they can't handle me hanging a shingle next door, that's their problem, it shouldn't be mine. This ruling would be a sea change in medicine. I will be putting in my notice if it goes through. I know a number of other providers who will as well. They all want to remain close to home and see their patients how they see fit. This could change our entire field for the better."
Jeffrey	"I strongly support the proposed Non-Complete Clause Rules. These changes are long overdue and will bring a strong dose of common sense equity to our workforce and economy. Thank you."
Grant	"Non-compete clauses should not be allowed. They constrict the free market at the expense of workers."
Susan	"I support the FTC effort to give workers more mobility and opportunities for increased income by outlawing non-compete clauses. There are already so many ways in which companies can take advantage of their employees and this would allow a natural process of forcing employers to treat workers better. It would result in more self-examination and remediation. A company that invests and works to keep its employees is much stronger anyway. With more mobility among trained workers, it could be advantageous for the companies themselves to be able to attract good people who are ambitious and want a challenge. Anything that gives workers a little more leverage is, it seems to me, very much needed at this time in our history."
John	""Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" Dear FTC, I am a medical provider in dermatology (PA-C) and my employer included a very stringent non-compete clause in my employment contract. It is because of this that I almost did not take this job and after signing the contract I feel trapped. I

	have considered leaving my current employer but I would be forced to sell my house and uproot my family to move to another city if I decide to leave my current employer. This constant threat and pressure has forced me to endure my current employment despite feeling it might not be the best fit for me. I am so excited and thankful to hear about this proposal to do away with non-compete clause! I would like to advocate for myself and all other healthcare providers out there who are my position. Removing the non-compete clause would be life-changing and freeing for so many providers in the health care industry. Thank you for this proposal and accepting comments. It is very much appreciated!"
Karl	"As an employed primary care physician, I agree with the proposed rule change to eliminate non-compete clauses as they have outlived their usefulness in my industry. When I began private practice in 1997, it took 2 years to build-up a sufficient patient base to be profitable during which time I had to be subsidized. The majority of doctors then were self-employed or in small group practices. Today however, the vast majority of physicians are employed by large corporations. There is an unremitting shortage of doctors and no shortage of patients. Non-competes only serve the corporations who rely on them to force physicians to accept lower wages and/or unsatisfactory working conditions or else leave the communities they love. Thank you for addressing this issue and hearing my concerns. Karl Saxman, MD"
Vivian	"As a sub specialist physician surgeon (oculofacial plastic surgery) in a vastly underserved area (California -Oregon border), I had to wait out a 2 year non compete contract to start my solo practice after I left a group of ophthalmologists. There was no financial impact on the practice I was leaving as they hired someone to replace me the day I left. And this area needs 2 or 3 oculofacial plastic surgeons to serve the needs of the community. It is currently just me serving patients from Eugene, OR to Sacramento, CA. The practice that was enforcing the non compete is in Oregon. They have lost the 2 doctors they hired after me. They currently do not have one. So it was a huge financial burden to me to not work for 2 years in this area and I had to travel to Salem during that time (4 hours away) to find work. After the large financial debt from undergraduate education and medical school, it is very financially onerous to have a non compete clause. Please make physician non compete clauses illegal. It is not fair to spend 10-14 years in training to not be able to work. Thank you."
Ryerson	"I strongly urge the severe limitation of Non-Compete Clauses. My experience in the High Tech industry suggests that the wages offered in these contracts are market wages. But, the non-compete clauses are in effect a hidden taking against those offered wages. They reduce and distort the offer present without due compensation for that taking. If non-competes are to be required for a position. They should be negotiated and compensated differently and on top of existing wage compensation including separate compensation for their signing. Including them in the base wage compensation disguises their nature and damages the labor market by denying workers the ability to market their skills."

Laurel	"As a physician, noncompete clauses benefit my employer as I am stuck with them unless willing to move. It stifles our ability to choose what and where we work. It also locks cost of medicine as we are blocked from moving that means patients don't have choices."
Bri	"180 days is too long after we find them non enforceable. Employees should be able to have mass exodus from companies that have held them hostage to move freely and make more money. Non competes are used as golden handcuffs and is slavey. Most companies have you sign it with your hire packet. Once ruled it needs to be effective immediately for employees to leave and retro active. My husbands is for 2 years! His salary is 127k and he has been offered 300k by other business same line of work and has been stuck due to this non compete... his current employer hasn't offered him a raise in 4 years and it's just insane they would make him sit out in the same line of work or sue him if he leaves. This needs to do and be effective immediately"
Brianna	"This is very much needed. My husband has been offered twice as much money but cannot leave because of his non compete. He would be able to make twice as much and his employer has never offered a raise in salary knowing he can't leave and his employer has sued others for practicing in the same line of work and it's a horrible situation. Please ban the use of non competes so there is competition and competitive wages without employers owning people and not giving them raises."
Jamie	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses from big tech mental health companies are wrecking therapists."
Bob	"To whom it may concern: It is high time that these onerous, ridiculous and ANTICOMPETITIVE non-compete clauses be done away with. They only serve the interests of monopolies, while harming workers, consumers and communities. Please stand firm in implementing these necessary new rules. Thank you."
Michael	"Good evening/morning, I, Michael, write today to applaud The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) on recognizing this issue. Should the The Federal Trade Commission make the Just decision to let freedom rein and prohibit the Employer from placing unnecessary, invisible chains on bright employees, just imagine what that better world lcx)ks like. I would also like to mention that it literally took years for a co-worker of mine's brother to finally reunite. This was all because of a non-compete clause which can be found in the video/sound editing industry. I rise up today, in part, because I know Justice is coming. So, please let my voice be heard in SUPPORT of the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses! Take care."
Howard	"I strongly support the elimination of non-compete clauses. Trade secrets protection is enough for companies to protect their intellectual property."
Charles	"Non-compete "agreements" are used by unscrupulous employers to trap employees (especially low paid workers in low paid jobs). They should not ever be allowed to occur for lower paying jobs and only allowed otherwise in limited

	circumstances. They should be otherwise be federally banned. In addition to keeping wages low and discouraging, the competition that spurs discovery, development of new ideas and helps society advance, they are regularly abused by employers.."
Danielle	"Do it, for once do something good for the people."
John	"Banning the non-compete cause is an amazing idea! It's use in Healthcare has suppressed wages for too long."
M	"Here's what I submitted... Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and higher healthcare costs for patients. Note that this is not limited to highly specialized areas of medicine. I've had patience to deal with a negative ramifications of not being able to find an endocrinologist in their area, when their medical conditions exceeded what their primary care physician could provide. The next closest endocrinologist was three hours away. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations (which I have personally suffered under) as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities. Addendum: it is my understanding that organizations such as American hospital association, who includes no physicians on the executive board, has made baseless claims that a nonprofit status should exclude an organization from this proposed rule. The non-profit status is irrelevant, as these organizations are as profitable as for-profit organizations (many have both for-profit and non-profit holdings), they just don't pay dividends to shareholders. The for profit or nonprofit entity designation is irrelevant with respect to the restraint of trade created by non-compete clauses."
teresa	"GET RID of the non-compete clause. It is anti-democratic. It is very, very bad for workers and just an appalling overreach by businesses. My employer does NOT OWN ME. How can an employer force me to work for only them, or no one?! What if you lost your job with the FTC, then were forbidden to take another job in your field for 2 years, within commuting distance of your home? You'd have to leave your home and move at least X miles away, or be unemployed for a

	number of years. And, fast food workers? Are they serious? Capitalism does a lot of harm to a lot of people. The "profit at all costs" dynamic is central to capitalism. THAT is why our DEMOCRACY is necessary - to protect American workers from non-democratic actions by employers. Please do the right thing here - for ALL americans, not just the most privileged among us. Employers: if you don't want employees to leave your employ, then you have to give them a workplace and a wage that will keep them. THAT is democracy, and don't worry - you won't lose your capitalist economic system by competing for employees. If employers don't have to compete for workers, then the horrific economic injustice in this country will only get worse. This helps NO ONE."
Kevin	"A Tnily "Free Market" Would Allow Employees To Be Free To Submit Their Resumes To Any and All Employers . . . "Do Not Compete" Clauses Impede Workers From Pursuing Other Employment Opportunities When The Contractual Terms Of Current Employment No Longer Satisfy Their Personal and/or Economic Necessities . . Hardly Seems To Be An Archetypal Model of a Free Market To Me ! ! !"
David	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Seriously, the fact that an employer could restrain my ability to work elsewhere is absolute nonsense- let's end this travesty now."
Marc	"Dear Sir/Madam: I fully support the proposed rule to ban employment non-competes and I commend your effort to bring this important issue up. In my experience, non- completes hurt the employee and prevent her from earning a honest wage in a location where she wants to live. My wife, for example, is a physician in a small city in the state of Oregon. For the past 5 years, she has been subject to the whims of her employer and has not been able to leave because her employment contract mandates an 18 month non-compete in a 60 mile radius. She cannot work for any other employer, including the VA health system (where there is no protectable interest), and has been threatened by litigation numerous times. She effectively has been forced to stay at her current practice (and get underpaid for seeing over 60 patients a day) so she can live in the community where we raised our children, or move to another county and uproot our family. This is anti-American in my humble opinion. One should be able to work where she wants and where she wants. Employers should not have leverage over employees in this regard. Please pass this rule."
Ozan	"I agree that non compete agreements are unfair. In my situation, I am stuck with my current company because I have a non compete agreement with them. I have worked in this industry all my life and it's a very niche industry (electron

	microscopy). There are only 3-4 companies in this field that my expertise fits in but I can't change my company due to non compete. On top of that my company threatens me really bad knowing that I can't just quit and go somewhere else. I have received a merit increase of 2.3% increase this year, way below the inflation and also the company average. They would not fire me cause they need me but knowing that I can't leave easily they feel like they can pay me as little as they can."
Matthew	"This is a fabulous idea! Please, please enact this rule."
Benjamin	"Hi, thank you for taking comment on an issue that has many life altering scenarios. My wife and I lived in Murray, UT just 4 months ago. She worked for Texas Instruments at their Utah fab facility. She recently made a career advancement move to work for ASML (a semiconductor equipment company) at the same Texas Instruments Utah-based fab and on the day she was going to get her new contractor badge with Texas Instruments she discovered there was a non-compete that required her to be away from all Texas Instruments facilities for 1 year. This caused us some very anxious moments. Was ASML going to fire her? What would happen if this were the case? This Texas Instruments fab is the only semiconductor facility in Utah, she had no other options in the area. Luckily ASML transferred her to work in fab in Oregon, but it required us to sell our home and re-establish a life in a new place. The oddest part to this whole situation is that ASML is NOT even a competitor of TI. There was no merit to their non-compete except that she left the company. We call for the FTC to end the ability of companies to hold employees hostage in their jobs, or cause people to make drastic life alterations to maintain employment in the same professional field. Thank you."
Peter	"As a young practicing surgeon, I have seen the trajectory of hospitals and private equity slowly take control over doctors in the United States over the last decade or so. There are various reasons why doctors have been passive with this shift in power. 1) Doctors are primarily scientists, trained to deal with data collection and interpreting complex physical exam and laboratory results while listening to and counseling individual patients. They are not taught the skills necessary for public policy advocacy or business administration. 2) Doctors as a whole are overwhelmingly people that want to "help others," and have a strong sense of moral and ethical responsibility to do what is right for the patient. Because of this, as a field, they focus on protecting the patient. This comes at the expense of protecting themselves. Doctors think that they can work just a bit harder for their patients in spite of hospitals and administrators slowly chipping away at their autonomy, because doctors' duty is to their patients. So they tolerate it, instead of fiercely fighting it. 3) Due to both of the above, administrators have ballooned and exploited the health care dollar to create a massive increase in the GDP over the last several decades. This is due to insurance companies creating intentional barriers to providing care, doctors having to have a whole set of staff to simply to collect insurance payments that they are lawfully due, and administrators who have never taken care of a patient stepping into healthcare leadership roles to tell doctors how to do their jobs. 4)

	Doctors can be entrepreneurial, similar to dentists and other allied health care professionals, but no compete clauses are a strong barrier to doing this. Allowing hospitals to legally bar physicians from leaving a poor employment situation by creating a massive area where the physician cannot practice means that physicians have no means of fighting back against poor working conditions to allow for the "market to take care of itself," because they are forced to completely relocate to other cities when leaving a practice. This is difficult for multiple reasons, as many physicians have families that are also impacted by this, and moving locations means starting over entirely, as referral patterns must be created from scratch. I strongly believe that the FTC has the power to level the playing field by giving physicians the same treatment as any other profession and including them in the non compete."
Marie	"For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement."
Jemie	"I am writing in support of abolishing non-compete clauses. I unfortunately have such a clause in my contract, and as a family medicine physician working for underserved populations, this severely limits my opportunities to continue caring for these populations should I need to leave my current job. It also would prevent me from being able to bike commute from my home in a neighborhood I love. These clauses are anti- labor and purely benefit big business in a way that is unfair to the public. I hope these clauses will be abolished."
Alexander	"I strongly support this rule change. Especially in regards to current WWE practices."
Clint	"I am a veterinarian and like most of us I work in a practice I don't own. I have been the victim of non compete contracts and have known a number of other vets that have been seriously impacted by them. Non competes serve nobody and instead cause serious harm. An associate I worked with who left a privately owned rural practice ended up being sued under a non compete contract and was forced to sell her home, disrupt her children's education by pulling them from school and eventually had to leave the state. She wasn't even in a new practice that competed with her former but it was within the radius established in the contract and the practice owner used that to maliciously driver her family from the area. These contracts are already banned in two states (maybe more?). They only serve to stifle free movement within our borders, and are uncaptalistic as it gives a single person or group the legal authority to force their competitors out of the area. They are cruel, only serve to drive the high rates of mental health disorders and suicide among veterinarians. End non-compete contracts NOW Thank you."
Eric	"Please outlaw all non-compete clauses"
Tamara	"Please do away with this unfair and unnecessarily restrictive practice in businesses that are not protecting trade secrets. Regular working class

	Americans deserve to have mobility in their careers and the ability to support themselves in their own communities. Most people cannot afford, nor should they be required, to relocate to a new town just to perform basic forms of employment, especially service jobs like hair stylists, massage therapists, administrative work, accounting, auto parts sales, etc etc etc. If innovative companies with tech secrets and things in the patent pipeline want to restrict employees from seeking work with competitors, ALL non-competes should require the employer to pay ongoing wages during the non-compete period. This one additional requirement would assure that employers ONLY use non-compete agreements when something truly important to their business is at stake, and they would have to compensate the employee for the privilege of keeping that employee out of the competitive marketplace for whatever the duration of the contract. If it's not that important, the employer won't do it. But this business where a salon or a retailer or a regular old office & sales job broadly requires employees to sign non-competes is a definition of usury, and should be illegal. Regular working class people are often desperate enough to get a job that they feel compelled to sign one, only to be subsequently underpaid, and worse, abused by these unscrupulous employers. Please protect the working person from this, do away with non-competes except in the most specific situations, and then require those who use them to pay the former employee during the non-compete period. That is what's fair, ethical, moral and just. Not the current misuse of this process. Thank you."
Jennifer	"Re: Non-compete clause rulemaking Matter No. P201200 I wholeheartedly agree with doing away with non-compete clauses. I have seen these clauses affect way too many rural clinicians who were trapped in malignant work environments and had no recourse but to leave the community. This affects the entire community of smaller populations where recruiting health care workers is extremely difficult. I vote in support of this NPRM"
Steven	"I fully support the FTC proposal to revise the non-compete clause rule. While there may be a limited number of cases where a non-compete clause may be needed, such as important corporate executives or key personnel with deep knowledge of trade secrets and/or corporate processes that are proprietary, the vast majority of employees should be exempt from non-compete clauses. This will allow workers to continue earning a living in the industry that employs them with the skills that sustain them in the workforce."
Mark	"I have worked in healthcare as a Physician Assistant (or associate as we are called now) and have been plagued with NCC's the entire time. It has severely limited my ability to change jobs in my community without moving my family, kids, and to move away from my aging parents. Please move forward with this NPRM."
Meredith	"I am a physician who has been in practice since 2008. I have been the subject of an egregious non compete clause in my employment contract for the last 10 years. It is 18 months and a 5 county exclusion area. Should I choose to leave my current position, this effectively -forces me to move out of state in order to find employment. This is an unreasonable burden to myself, my family, and my career. With only very rare exceptions involving protected intellectual property, no one should be subject to such restrictions on earning a living or choosing to stay or leave a job. I would ask that the FTC stand up for employees everywhere and eliminate non-compete clauses from contracts. This will allow for fair treatment of employees and stimulate companies to make a competitive work environment to attract the best talent."

Cameron	"This is an excellent rule change and is both good for workers and consistent with improving competition and reducing exploitation of workers."
Micaela	"An NDA should be able to cover any stealing of content or IP, so the purpose of a non-compete seems to be to force employees into staying with a company even if it's not in the best interest of the employee. Non-compete clauses only hamper innovation and trap employees into staying in workplaces past when they are ready to leave, building resentment and disrupting productivity. You can own materials, you can even own ideas, but you cannot own people. Employees should be free to leave a company and work for another company in the same sector whenever they wish."
Thomas	"Noncompete clauses in employment contracts do more harm than good, and the good they do seek to achieve is better served with precise non disclosure language. Yes trade secrets and proprietary processes deserve protection, but noncompete language is just a overly broad threat to intimidate employees. I speak from my 30 years as a health care executive and CEO who signed many employment contracts with this language."
Zoe	"I implore the FTC to outlaw non compete clauses/contracts ASAP. I am a small animal veterinarian working in a specialized area of practice. I signed a non compete contract before realizing the consequences, and it has caused immense income and career path damage for me. Veterinarians are essential healthcare providers who dedicate their lives to the well-being of animals. They often work in small practices or as independent contractors, where non-compete clauses can severely limit their ability to find new employment opportunities or start thek own practices. This has been my all too real experience. Furthermore, non-compete clauses limit competition in the veterinary industry, leading to higher prices and reduced access to care for pet owners. Removing these clauses will encourage innovation, competition, and improve access to veterinary care. Thank you for considering my comment on this important issue."
rod	"I filly support eliminating non-compete rules in employment."
Balamurali	"This rule is a arbitrary and sweeping interference in existing contracts. To retroactively make existing noncompetes invalid without compensation or the opportunity to renegotiate other elements of existing employment agreements is violative of the value of existing employment agreements. I would respectfully ask the FTC to narrowly tailor its rule to future employment agreements and provide reasonable guidelines (pay, level of position, termination of noncompete if the employer terminates the employee, etc.) where they are allowed and not allowed."

Edward	"It is tiring, relocating, and training professionals in healthcare is expensive, especially for small and medium sized private medical practices. There is a shortage of healthcare providers at the physician, physician assistant and nurse practitioner level in the United States and thus this process is important to help maintain affordable high value community access to healthcare services. This may also apply for other professionals such as veterinarians, dentists and attorneys. It is time consuming and expensive for practices to recruit, potentially relocate and train new providers to practices. Often the process can require substantial direct costs to pay for a professional recruiting team (who have very high fees), travel expenses for the recruiting process, legal fees to negotiate employment contracts, potentially relocation fees and time and financial resources to fully establish insurance credentials and train new providers in a practice. In addition a new provider can bill for professional services upon first starting to see patients, but they do not receive revenue to support their salary and costs for many months, especially if they are building a new practice. Thus the practice must cover those start up costs for that provider. Helping a new provider establish and grow a new practice is great for patient access and competition in general in a community, but it is simply very expensive to do. In addition, when a provider leaves, there is the unique issue of the medical malpractice tail insurance which can be very expensive in the United States. (This is generally 1.5 or 2.0 x the yearly costs of their medical malpractice insurance) Thus, it would be helpful if the regulators would consider including exceptions to allow medical practices to recoup these costs if a provider joins, then leaves to practice in the same community as the practice that covered these costs to establish them in the community. Further, if an employed provider joins a practice as a partner there is generally an agreement to share the costs and obligations of the practice by the partners. When a partner leaves, the partnership should be able to recover the costs of guaranteed lease agreements, bank loans and other contractual agreements the partner is responsible for along side the other partners in that group. These burdens are generally more difficult for small and medium sized medical practices (which are by definitions small and medium sized businesses. Most of this is known at the time of the negotiation and contractual process when a new provider joins a team and thus can be included in the contractual agreement between parties. One might consider writing the regulations in such a way as this is not to prevent competition, but to allow the employer or partnership to cover the direct start up costs of recruitment, training and establishment of new providers so that when this happens, the clinic has the resources to recruit and replace them and patient access to care is maintained. Currently there are numerous regulations by federal and state authorities as well as insurance regulations and increased costs that are challenging the financial viability of small and medium sized medical practices compared to large, integrated healthcare organizations. Small and medium sized medical practices provide high value healthcare at a generally lower cost than large integrated medical practices at hospital systems or large private equity owned practices. Thus adding regulations that further strain the financial viability of small and medium sized medical practices in the United States will reduce access to high value care and ultimately cost all of us more in the long run. Thus I urge the regulators to consider the impact on smaller private practices and consider exceptions that take these factors into consideration."

Ethan	"Throughout my 20 year hi-tech sales career, I have had to limit my job search process at least twice due to non-compete clauses I was forced to sign to secure employment. The non-compete was used to intimidate and restrict employee movement. It also allows employers to under perform in their responsibility to retain employees through positive workplace incentives. Removing the non-compete would be beneficial for employees. I do think there is a place for non-compete agreements but they should be restricted to unique situations."
Tamara	"Good morning, I am writing to ask that the FTC enact policies that ban the use of non-compete clauses in employment contracts for any hourly wage employees and for any employees making less than half the median salary in an organization. NCC's prevent employees from exercising the basic right to offer their labor to others and receive a higher salary. The rules of capitalism should apply to all, not just the corporations."
Karen	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Pennsylvania | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Pennsylvania:

	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I work in the themed entertainment industry, and noncompete agreements are incredibly common. It's also a fairly small industry with niche skill sets, often less than competitive pay, and noncompete agreements make it next to impossible to get a different job in the industry without your current employer's approval. Leaving your current job on less than good terms could mean that you don't have a job for at least a year either because your previous employer has threatened legal action or because you're afraid that they will. Noncompete agreements hurt workers and their opportunities, not only in the themed entertainment industry, but all industries. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements." - Michael M.
	"I am a family medicine physician in rural Pennsylvania, and I previously worked for a healthcare system that had me sign a 24-month, 50-mile non-compete contract. Options for healthcare in my area are sparse to say the least, and this non-compete makes it impossible for me to treat patients in my hometown. Not to mention, this town is in dire need of physicians that are willing to practice here. There's not much to pull doctors into this area, but I want to be here. As previously said, this is my hometown. My family, my friends, and my neighbors all have the right to high-quality healthcare, and I believe this non-compete hurts their access to it. It also hurts my ability to provide it. Please consider the removal of non-competes, and help me provide medical care to an area that truly needs it!" - Lucas W.
	"I totally agree that non competes should be outlawed. A friend of mine who is an HVAC salesman has a non compete in place that says he cannot work in HVAC or plumbing for two years anywhere in the United States if he leaves. They basically have him handcuffed to his job. He would like to leave for a better opportunity but cannot because it's the only job he knows. It sound's completely unfair to impose this law on a free society. If you have a business that treats there employees well, is competitive with pay and does whatever it can to be a great place to work then those companies shouldn't need to have a non compete...people should want to stay at their job." - Michael D.
	"When I started my own business as a hairstylist I was sued by an old employer for breach of 'non-compete' contract. I was forced into bankruptcy after no longer being able to afford to litigate in a lawsuit that is lasting over 3 years. Non-competes limit stylists/employees from advancing their careers and generating more money for themselves and the economy. Abolishing non competes will open many doors for new businesses and advancement in careers" - Sandra R.

	"The proliferation of non-compete agreements is absurd at best and fiendish at worst. I work a blue-collar, physical job restoring natural stone. This is skilled labor, like any you'd find in the construction sector, but the methods of repairing stone aren't some trade secret locked-up next to the formula for Coke. Yet the company I work for, Marblelife, forces every employee to sign a non-compete that prevents a former employee from working for any company that has anything to do with the installation, repair, cleaning, care, etc of natural stone for TWO YEARS. As you might imagine, this severely limits us from being able to take our skills and abilities to a better company, for higher pay or better benefits (Marblelife doesn't even offer health insurance); trapping us where we are, keeping us out of the work force for TWO YEARS or start our career from scratch." - Cagney B.
	"Non Competes should be banned for all workers. I am a veterinarian, and I am stuck working in horrible toxic work environment with forced overtime and more. I can't leave because I'd have to drive over 1 hour to be outside of my noncompete. I can not afford to take time off for 2 years (when my noncompete ends) so my options are to continue working and hating my job, or I leave the veterinary industry all together. With how understaffed most hospitals are, losing yet another veterinarian would be detrimental to this field." - Julia B.
	"I am a journalist who has been forced to move across the country three times, and leave my field entirely for one year, in order to comply with stringent non-compete agreements but continue pursuing my career. In one case, the Non-Compete Clause required me not to work for one year for any company doing any kind of communications work inside the broadcast signal range of my station. It crossed state lines! It covered hundreds of miles! I had to move to a city 800 miles away in order to find a job and not risk breaking the non-compete clause. In another situation, I was stuck working for abusive management who fostered a toxic and abusive workplace, and I had to work there for more than a year until I could find a job in another city entirely because they had threatened to sue me under the non-compete if I left and worked for another local station. These moves were expensive and required me to rebuild my financial security from SO every time they happened." - Victoria M.
	"Good evening, I am being directly affected by a noncompete clause at my job. I am a nurse practitioner who is unable to leave her job at this time even though I work in a toxic work environment. I currently have a contract that states I am unable to work within a 10 miles radius of this hospital system and all it's provider offices. Unfortunately, there is a medical facility belonging to this hospital system surrounding where I live as far wide as at least a 70 mile radius. I either have to stay working for this company, leave my career all together, or work far away from my home. As you know gas prices are sky high and this puts a large commute to my already long work day. Please consider making this no compete clause obsolete and ban companies from making this mandatory!" - Jodi K.

	"My wife is a Radiologist, a highly trained and well paid professional. However, she has been repeatedly subjected to non-compete clauses as a standard matter of her employment. When she lost one job at the end of the great recession, our family was forced to move out of state so that she could find work that did not violate the agreement. The result was a substantial loss of home equity due to the housing crisis. The next Job she had also required a non-compete. The job was fine until new management came on board and altered the nature of her job, requiring her to commute long distances to various outpatient facilities. At one point, she was logging 18 hours a week of unpaid travel time in addition to the long hours and weekend call already required. There has been talk of exempting doctors and other highly paid professionals from a ban on non-compete clauses. This is wrong. The non-compete clauses are even more severe for professionals like my wife because their skills are more valuable to employers. The use of non-competes causes employees, even highly paid ones, to choose between remaining in a difficult or abusive job or being forced to relocate, which uproots an entire family and disrupts friendships and school continuity." - Jon S.
	"I work in the biotech and pharmaceutical industry, and have been placed under multiple non-compete agreements. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to end this restrictive and anti-competitive practice and support a healthier ecosystem in many sectors of innovation by allowing employees to capitalize on the experience and subject matter expertise they have cultivated over their careers. Employers can still exercise protections around intellectual property, and confidential information, but should not be allowed to wholesale restrict opportunities for employees in their respective areas of practice. [...] End this practice and allow companies to protect their IP and employees to protect their marketability as an expert in the general field of innovation and stakeholders for that innovation. Thank you!" - Jacose B.

Allison	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. Margaret	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them. We have got to take the power away from hospital administrators, bureaucrats, insurance companies and politicians and give it back to the physicians and patients. We cannot allow them to continue to make decisions about bodily autonomy, those are decisions that should be left to the patient and their physician. It is long past time to end this non compete clause."
Anne	"Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. The PATIENT has the right to choose their own doctors, NOT the medical facility CEOs who are always interested in money before quality and humanity. Non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Jack	"Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. As as example, I am currently not able to practice hospice or palliative care in a 2 county area after leaving my previous hospice employment in October, 2022. Other local hospices have physician openings, but I am restricted from practicing there, potentially depriving end-of-life patients from adequate physician care. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Kathy	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals (and other facilities Americans depend on for care), abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The doctors and their families suffer because if they choose or are forced to be employed elsewhere, they must move a prescribed distance away (usually at least 30-50 miles) for a prescribed period of time (often 2 years or more) in order to seek new employment. Many doctors are uprooting their families every 2 years as a result of these oppressive contracts. This is not good for the stability of a community, nor the family unit. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."

Greg	"As a physician I have been impacted by non-compete clauses in my contract which limits fair competition among health systems. Often, these parts of the contract are inserted in a predatory fashion for does just completing training and starting their first "real" job as an attending physician. Sadly, we are not well versed in these business practices which leaves us open to further exploitation. In my case, I found a job close to family and a letter of intent was drafted by the hiring department outlining the general role, salary, call, etc that was involved in the job. After review, I signed this letter and then proceeded to look at purchasing a house and preparing to move. It was not until after I had completed the process of submitting for a new state license, entering into contract to purchase a house, and making arrangements to move my family across the country that documents were overnighted to me for urgent signature. This packet included documents to sign for hospital privileges but also included a non-compete clause which I felt forced into agreeing to at that point in time. Obviously I could have better served myself by asking more specific questions at the LOI stage but again I was a physician focused on training and taking care of patients for the past 11 years rather than understanding contracts. Fast forward 3 years and my bonuses that were promised were rescinded, my call became q3 instead of the agreed q4 and yet I was unable to transfer jobs due to potential employers not wanting to get involved in a legal battle involving my non-compete. This put me in a very difficult position of choosing between moving my family again, agreeing to the significantly worse work conditions than were promised, or filing a lawsuit to attempt to break the non-compete which, if did not work, would put me in jeopardy at my current job in addition to preventing me from seeking employment where I put down roots for my family. Obviously, I am in full support of a ban on non-competes especially in the medical field where health systems have largely not only taken over part of physician autonomy but also prey on the business inexperience of individuals like myself."
Kevin	"I applaud your effort to eliminate non-compete clauses. They are detrimental to workers and rarely provide any actual benefit to the company trying to enforce them. They are there as a threat to try and retain employees, nothing more. I fully support the elimination of the non-compete clause from this country."
Joseph	"Very much in favor of the elimination of Non-compete clauses. This will foster fair pay in all industries."
Andrew	"I fully support the FTC's proposal to ban non compete clauses. This outdated modality allows large health care institutions to restrain workers and prevent an otherwise competitive market from emerging."
Andrew	"I've worked hard to continue to grow and develop in my career as a technology professional. I have and continue to face barriers to do so from noncompete clauses. I believe them is something fundamentally unfair about being locked into a job because you lack bargaining power. I'd posit that evidence of the power imbalance almost universally going to the employer is reflected in how rarely the inverse of a non-compete occurs. It is almost unheard of in professional jobs for line-level employees to be able to impose employment contracts for a guaranteed period. Myself and the dozen or so peers I surveyed have never been informed about these clauses prior to employment offer and, during offer negotiations, found employers completely unwilling to even approach language in these clauses. This is something that creates fundamental unfairness across states making it harder to navigate potential employment offers and move as personal and family needs demand."

Danish	"I think the ability for workers to not be locked in a non compete clause is very important. I live in Philadelphia and if I want to get a different job in my field I have to leave the city. Additionally, I do not believe that not for profit organizations should be exempt from this law. Employees working for not for profits should have the ability to leave these jobs and get a new one as well without having to leave the area they live in."
Donald	"I have little experience with non-compete agreements with employers. One place I interviewed with required me to agree to a non-compete agreement as part of the interview but as I was not offered the position, it no longer applied (I think). It was one of the reasons why I breathed a sigh of relief when they told me they world not be making an offer."
Sandra	"As a healthcare worker for 48 years, I urge you to eliminate noncompete clauses from contracts. There is a real shortage of some healthcare specialists and medical personal could fill these positions if they would be allowed to leave their currents positions but they cannot because on noncompete clauses. This is effecting healthcare in the United States."
Asim	"In the case of health care workers , No compete clauses are horrible for doctors, patients and communities. To limit a patients care options or who they can see for their healthcare for the sake of hospital profits is unethical and should be illegal. To limit a physicians ability to make a living and not have to uproot their family when they can easily provide care and services in their own community is like bonded slavery for the provider and bad for the community. No one wants to lose their doctor and forcing physicians to leave a community if their employer is abusive and they want to change jobs is unethical by every standard. Non compete clauses are unethical, draconian and against worker and community interests. They should be illegal."
Mohammad	"I totally support this, it will keep the medical doctors serving the same small community if has issues with their employers, instead of leaving the community struggling to get new Does."
Beth	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Jordan	"As someone who has had non-compete clauses in employment contracts, this is an excellent idea! I'm also disabled and receive home care, many home care agencies use non-competes which stops caregivers from switching agencies or staying with clients who switch, and makes it harder for agencies to fill vacancies. Let the market dictate competitive employment contracts, not established industry players who stagnate wages and services while holding everyone hostage."

Natasha	"I am a physician , wife, and mother proudly serving my rural community. I am bound by a non-compete which prevents me from seeking alternate job opportunities in my area. As such, changing jobs would require me to leave my community. Rural communities like mine already struggle with the recruitment and retention of physicians. Rural communities have fewer physicians per capita, and rural residents experience poorer health outcomes. In the future I will likely leave my rural community to seek an employment opportunity which is a better match for my goals and interests, and outside the bounds of my non-compete. As much as I would love to continue to serve my rural community, my non-compete requires me to choose between my personal/professional needs and my community."
Jovito	" Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. To be clear, there are nuances to this discussion and a blanket endorsement of the FTC proposal. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC' proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay

	their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Rashid	"Non compete clause is very burdensome for a physician and his or her family, as one is bound to work with the health system one is employed regardless of the working conditions. It is unethical in an open society like USA. As a physician practicing in PA, I strongly support the motion to end non compete clause"
Caren	"As a physician in a pediatric subspecialty, I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses which prevent doctors from changing jobs without uprooting themselves to another state (in my case). Thank you for this protection from employers who wish to exploit this."
Jason	"As a family care physician, I approve of the abolition of the non compete clause. It creates undue burden on employees who are unable to leave a position if it is non-equitable as they will have to sell their property and uproot their family. Most hospital networks are gigantic and have unreasonable non- complete clauses requiring significant movement, some times even out of the state."
Sarah	"I agree with the FTC's proposal to end non-compete agreements. I am referring to FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION 16 CFR Part 910 RIN 3084- AB74 as I write this. I agree with positions presented in the paper and are exemplified in this quoted text on page 3 of the paper: "This research has shown the use of non-compete clauses by employers has negatively affected competition in labor markets, resulting in reduced wages for workers across the labor force—including workers not bound by non-compete clauses. 2F 3 This research has also shown that, by suppressing labor mobility, non-compete clauses have negatively affected competition in product and service markets in several ways." I think think the noncompete clause rule is outdated and restrictive. I would like to ask that you include nonprofit organizations and contract work as part of this. Physicians, nonprofit workers, contract workers, etc. can follow rules of nondisclosure but they have expertise that should not be limited by Non-Complete agreements. For example, I live in a city with two major medical systems that are classified as nonprofits. They are in essence two monopolistic medical systems. It does not benefit the community at large to restrict physicians who work within these systems. We benefit when they as human capital can contribute to our community by being allowed to change organizations and not be restricted by noncompete clauses. Thank you for your consideration of my comment."

Micah	"Eliminating "non-compete" clauses would be a godsend to all laborers and employees. 1 100% support this strengthening of labor power. The FTC should absolutely curb abuse by corporations and employers by eliminating the "non-compete" clause."
Melanie	"Non competes are not good for doctors, patients or healthcare. It is a way for healthcare systems to punish doctors for leaving toxic environments"
Susan	"It is time to ban non-competes. They are bad for the autonomy of workers, and by interfering with opportunities to find better job circumstances they provide a disincentive for current employers to improve conditions of employment."
Jillian	"This would greatly change my career path. I am currently stuck in a company, who has not given us a raise in over 2 years and greatly disrespects their employees and clients. Soon I will have 2 young children and moving to find a job avoiding my noncompete is just not an option right now. I have worked at this company for 4 years and have not been trained in over 2 - so no new information has been shared. Once I leave I am stuck in a 2 year noncompete contract, that I didn't realize the extent of when I signed. This would be such an impactful change."
DILIP	"Agree, non-competes should not be allowed. People are poor and need to be able to earn salary to pay bills."
Seema	"I am a primary care physician , of which there is a shortage. Noncompete clauses are harmful for patient care, medical care, access, and physician well-being. Please consider banning such clauses, so that patients can have free access to their positions in the community."
Kevin	"I am a physician in Western Pennsylvania. I grew up in the town that I worked for the first 9 years of my career. I was employed by a large health system. As a resident physician, I was offered a contract to work at the same hospital while I still had 1 year left of residency. I was a young adult without any negotiating experience. I was told there was no ability to negotiate out of a noncompete clause at that time and I was financially incentivized to sign the contract right away. 9 years later, I became increasingly frustrated working for corporate health care. I decided that I wanted to start a private practice and continue to work in my underserved home town. Fortunately for me, I was able to negotiate my way out of my non-compete clause with my former employer without getting legal involvement. This was mainly because of the relationships I had built along the way. Unfortunately, several of my former coworkers have not been as lucky as me in this regard. As a physician, I strongly oppose non compete clauses in health care. I think the only people that lose in these situations are patients and physicians."

Ali	"Non competes need to be banned immediately. Just another form of controlling physicians and limiting opportunities forcing people into difficult situations"
Noy	"I am a radiologist, specifically an interventional radiologist. I am writing in support of the proposed rule. I was given a 'non negotiable' restrictive covenant (noncompete) as part of my employment package. As a fresh trainee I had zero room to negotiate, since I needed a job. Since my healthcare network continues to grow, there have been proposals to modify the noncompete to prevent working within a radius of any site we provide service. This would mean avoiding an area of coverage provided by 14 hospitals in 11 counties in two states. This has been met with resistance from the medical staff for the reasons discussed in the proposed rule. Currently, with a time (measured in years) and geography (miles) specification in this agreement, I would have to move out of the region to find a new job. This means uprooting a spouse, children from school, etc. Taking years without an income is not an option. There is only one other competing network within a commutable distance, it is blocked by the noncompete agreement. Although I am a highly trained specialist and part owner (shareholder, partner) of my medical group practice, in real world terms I am still an employee subject to a contract and rules made by administrators. In the field of medicine the purported nature of these agreements is to prevent us from taking our patients and setting up a practice across the street, but this is a fallacy in a field like mine where we have very few of our own patients and most of our time is providing a service to the hospital (greater than 90% in my practice). Other times I hear the fallacy that my employer has 'taught me' specific skills, which would be injurious to them if practiced at a competitor. Nothing could be further from the truth - we are all similarly trained and practice according to the standards of the field of interventional radiology. My employer and I currently have a good relationship, but with these agreements we are (breed to accept unwelcome changes, and are unable to speak up or negotiate freely. If the relationship sours I will not be able to exercise the reasonable option of looking tar a new job without uprooting my family. I can be forced to accept more work requirements, worse conditions and scheduling, with the employer knowing there is a higher harrier for me to consider other jobs. The field of medicine is particularly sensitive to noncompetes for a few reasons: Among healthcare workers there is already an epidemic of depression, burnout, and a high suicide rate. All of these are worsened by noncompetes that limit the ability of a worker to leave a bad situation. Also, I was trained to practice medicine with government tax money (medical school scholarships, residency is subsidized by CMS via Congress) and these agreements restrict my ability to pay back the debt to society with my training. Finally, in my experience, the noncompete lies somewhere in the spectrum of a perceived threat with questionable legal enforceability. I have heard senior leaders in my own institution

	claim they 'can break any noncompete', and I have personally seen noncompetes negotiated out of the way when money or politics makes it expedient to do so. Perhaps if I provide socially needed but less profitable services no one will try to rescue me from a noncompete, and my family will suffer. As my attorney has advised me, the mere presence of a noncompete in my employment record makes me more toxic and less attractive as a potential hire to other groups, as they would face the threat of litigation. In an era where there are not enough healthcare workers, and specifically not enough specialist physicians like myself, it seems clear to me that these agreements only hinder free patient care and help employers by restricting my trade. I fully support the proposed FTC rule to ban noncompete agreements in the interests of patients, healthcare workers, employees, and fair trade."
Arwen	"As a physician, I am in favor of getting rid of the non-compete clauses that are routinely forced upon doctors. The AHA obviously opposes this, as they prefer to keep control of physicians. Lots of hospitals are "non-profit" such as UPMC, but are actually huge corporations that will take advantage of any exceptions given them, and continue to use non-competes as leverage against physician autonomy. Please eliminate non-competes for all including non-profits. Thank you!"
Harry	"It time to stop Non-Compete Clause Rules there is nothing new under the Sun, and people should be free to seek higher wages when they want."
Seth	"The healthcare employment landscape has been harmed by contemporary noncompete clauses. The consolidation of healthcare has led to the proliferation of monopolistic healthcare systems that rely on these noncompete clauses to suppress competition and prevent workers from seeking alternative options. There is no better example of this than in physician contract language. These noncompete clauses are frequently unreasonable in terms of restriction and often result in the physician worker settling for a less than desirable employment situation or relocating to an area far from where they may have "built a practice " or call home. The large, powerful healthcare entities assert their dominance by threatening harsh legal consequences if physicians violate the noncompete clause. This essentially boils down to employee intimidation, because the healthcare systems realize that no single physician can compete when threatened with a legal challenge. Please do not believe the hospital lobby groups that assert these clauses are essential to protect patient access to care. Hospital lobby groups care nothing about patient care or access, but rather everything about stifling competition and ratcheting down wages in an attempt to bolster corporate profits and expand their footprint. The physician workforce is optimistic that the FTC can eliminate this longstanding "thorn in the side." Promoting competition will result in higher quality and more accessible healthcare while facilitating healthcare employee satisfaction."
Shannon	"I'm completely in support of banning non compete clauses! These clauses are overused and seek to intimidate employees long after they've left their current position."

Anya	"Dear Congress, non-compete clauses endanger America's proven track record of innovation and ingenuity by making employees, particularly highly skilled ones, fearful of switching employers within the same field. This leads to lost wages, career instability, and a slew of other negative outcomes. To maintain American excellence in STEM and other fields, please pass this bill to void non-compete clauses in American courts of law. Sincerely, a scientist in a field run amok with non-compete contracts."
Chris	"I support the efforts of the Federal Trade Commission in cracking down on predatory non-compete clauses for most employees. A former employer of mine had a non-compete clause that supposedly prevented me from changing jobs to work at a competitor who was doing better than our company at selling software to customers, and due to my non-compete, I had to instead leave the industry and work in an adjacent industry. This is unnecessary for employers to force on their employees as they are already protected from harm by their non-disclosure agreements (NDA) that are often included in employee contracts, in addition to patent protection, copyright protection, and trade secrecy laws. If employers would like to prevent employees from working for competing firms after they have been voluntarily let go, they need to pay the employee for the duration of the non-compete. If the employee wishes to leave their employment on their own, then the only criteria they should be protected by is Intellectual Protection (e.g. no sharing trade secrets) as specified in an NDA. I'd also encourage the Commission to heavily fine any companies that continue mandating employees continue to sign unenforceable contracts (i.e. non-compete clause) or that threaten legal action against employees for leaving to work for a competing firm. This is a form of legal extortion that hinders people from exercising their legal rights under threat of financial ruin from lawsuits and needing to hire lawyers to defend themselves."
Alexander	"Competition is the hallmark of capitalism. When companies have the ability to enforce noncompete clauses, the entire enterprise suffers. In addition to limited job mobility for employees, the industry suffers due to a lack of innovation. The free movement of employees enables new ideas to reach fruition. As seen with the pandemic, a lack of competition and disrupted supply chains had massive negative consequences throughout the US economy. By allowing all companies to compete for the best talent, the dominant firm cannot charge unnecessarily high prices, cannot get away with poor product quality, and cannot stifle up and coming competitors. Just as how international competition in the semiconductor industry is of paramount importance, so too is enabling domestic competition by allowing for the free movement of employees to competitors."
Rick	"Commissioners: I urge you to disqualify existing and prevent all future non compete clauses for the vast majority of American workers. Such clauses should only be permitted for those earning more than $1 million annually from their employer and/or are in the "C" suite. The misapplication of the existing non compete clauses to everyday laborers by business is a restriction of trade and unnecessarily repressed the economic and labor rights of the workforce."

	Overturning these rules will be good for the economy, good for the labor force, good for businesses, and good public policy."
Jason	"I have been unfairly restricted by my former employer from pursuing opportunities. Multiple customers have called me, asking me to do work for them, but I cannot do it since I am covered under a three-year noncompete clause. I am in the construction industry and I think this is unfair."
Jared	"I am in favor of having the non-compete ban. For my entire career, first as a low-level entry healthcare employee to now as a physician I have always had a non-compete tied to my employment. Currently, If I were to leave my job, I would be barred from not only working in my own county, but also the county north of me. Effectively this would mean I would have to commute a minimum 50 minutes one way in order to work. To make matters worse my current non-compete would prohibit me from returning to my community for work for 18 months. A violation of this non-compete would mean I could be liable for hundreds of thousands of dollars. I understand when non-competes were first instituted they were aimed at high-level executives with access to sensitive corporate information. However, employers seem to use non-competes as a way of controlling their employees and suppressing wages/benefits. When the employer knows their workers are unable to leave, they have less incentive to offer competitive pay/benefits -dampening wages for everyone in that field."
Karen	"Studies show that ending non-competes would boost wages for countless US workers, one out of five of whom are currently bound by a non-compete. Don't listen to the Chamber. The FTC must render a non-compete-clause rule."
Mark	"I am an interventional cardiologist and have worked in NE PA for 30 years. I was in private practice until 2013, and then joined a large local health care system as an employed physician. I see no justification for non-competes and in fact feel is harmful to the entire medical profession. If a physician is not satisfied with current employment, the Non-compete forces them to leave the area, uprooting family and forcing their patients to find another provider in a current milieu of limited access. This is onerous and punitive. Please approve this legislation."
Eva	"I am strongly in favor of the proposed rule by the FTC to ban non-compete clauses in new and existing employment contracts. I believe that this provides a more just and fair climate for employees."
Burton	"As someone who has been working under a non-compete for a decade, I am excited and thoroughly in support of this proposed rule. Ten years ago, I decided to make a career change and enter the world of executive search as a recruiter where non-competes an industry standard. I believe they are standard because they are intended to restrict competition and limit the options of a producing employee in case they reach a point where they desire to leave their firm. Being on the restrictive end of an non-compete, the harder I work and the more success I achieve the more difficult it is to leave. When I joined my current firm, I had previous industry experience and was confident in my ability to succeed, but I was

	not in a position to start my own firm. I was faced with the choice of joining my firm of choice and signing a non-compete or choosing another career path, which was not a viable option. Therefore I signed the non-compete out of necessity and joined my current firm. As far as search firms go, my firm is one of the better firms and I enjoy it working here. However, I built a new territory from scratch with little to no assistance from the firm owners, other than the miniscule start up salary that is less than the equivalent of minimum wage. Over the last ten years, I built a super successful book of business with deep client partnerships where my clients know and appreciate me alone, not my firm. They know no one else at the firm including the owners or other team members...only me. If I left today under the non-compete I could not work with them for 12 months and they would be heartbroken, upset and their businesses would suffer. They certainly would not work with anyone from my firm because they have no relationship with them. Therefore, they would be forced to work with one of my competitors and while that is always an option, they do not trust them as they trust me and this would in turn negatively impact their businesses and corporate culture. In the end, my non-compete does not guarantee the book of business I created will be passed onto the owners of my firm. It does however, guarantee that I will lose a large portion of my book if I left the firm, so it is combative in nature and restricts trade. While I respect and appreciate the owners of my firm and believe I am valued, they intentionally limit my growth for their benefit because they know I cannot leave on my own terms because of my non-compete. If the non-compete was eliminated under your proposed new rule, the owners will either have to support my ideas for continued growth, which will ultimately benefit them and our clients or risk losing me. For the record, I would prefer to stay with them, but I am prepared to leave and start my own firm if I cannot reach my full potential at my firm. In closing, I pray you render existing non-competes unenforceable and prohibit their use in the future. I strongly believe this will improve competition within any industry and drive up wages for under compensated employees. Moreover, in my case, I am convinced my firm will 'see the light' and support me in my growth endeavors out of fear of losing me, which will benefit them in the long run. Thank you for your time and consideration."
Kyle	"As a physician I am strongly in favor of this rule. It would be a boon for American society as a whole and would unlock economic growth for individuals and society as a whole."
Mark	"I am commenting on the following paragraph on page 80 of the document. "The Commission believes non-compete clauses for senior executives may harm competition in product markets in unique ways, to the extent that senior executives may be likely to start competing businesses, be hired by potential entrants or competitors, or lead the development of innovative products and services. Non-compete clauses for senior executives may also block potential entrants, or raise their costs, to a high degree, because such workers are likely to be in high demand by potential entrants. As a result, prohibiting non-compete clauses for senior executives may have relatively greater benefits for consumers than prohibiting non-compete clauses for other workers. The Commission seeks comment on this analysis as well as whether this reasoning may apply to highly

	paid and highly skilled workers who are not senior executives." I was a Vice President of a small employee owned business, and I was poised for election to the Board of Directors. From what I can surmise, things became political and I was for all intents and purposes "demoted" and relegated to my former sales position and my remuneration was cut in half. In reality, I was given two options, take the sales job or quit. They would not fire me, my guess to avoid paying me severance against my non-compete. Under duress, I agreed to go back into sales, primarily to bide my time until I found another job, which proved difficult since I had a 26 year career doing the same things in the same industry and I had to find something unrelated. It took me a year and a half to find a new job at comparatively lower pay than my Vice-President job. In the meantime, I have had several of my former employers competitors come to me with interest, but we are unable to talk due to the non-compete. The non-compete expires after one year which will be on 10-3-2023."
Jim	"I am absolutely in favor of forbidding all types of employers, including those in the healthcare sector, from using non competes. These draconian practices have continued to stifle and suppress wages for all types of employees."
Lisa	"I don't think non-compete clauses are generally ethical. With 74% of the American populace employees at-will, which is also unethical in most cases, non-compete clauses can essentially put someone out of their enjoyed line of work at the drop of a hat for sometimes even years, which has consequences for long term employment. It also discourages people from leaving poorly managed workplaces; if they work in an environment where they're facing harassment from coworkers or management, they're being under paid in accordance with the work they do, they have no options for growth within the company, etc., and because of a non-compete, they won't get any of what they want in their desired industry anyway. This allows employers to get away with mistreatment, because they know the employee often doesn't have other options."
Monica	"The non compete clauses in many employment contracts fail to do what they claim: prevent loss of intellectual property. Instead, they harm individuals looking for better, more competitive jobs in regions where they live. These clauses prevent wage increases that naturally stem from a free market. How does a hairstylist or a mechanic take intellectual property from one site of employment to another? They do not. I have seen them in use in my industry: healthcare. Physicians without intellectual property or patients tied to their practice such as radiologists, anesthesiologists, pathologists and others are prevented from local movement within regions by non-competes. This depresses wages in our region and in the long run, only makes us less competitive nationally when trying to recruit additional physicians to our practice. What businesses fear is the wage competition and use non competes to hold individuals back. It is time for these clauses to be deemed illegal and banned from usage."
Marcy	"When physicians, dentists and other health care professionals are forced into non-competes patients suffer. Health care progress is stalled. This country needs more providers not constructed providers who are limited to serve patients. This is bad policy for patients and for healthcare policy in general!"

Mark	"This would help so many dentists who are stuck in noncompetes, that do nothing but affect patient care and accessibility, delay or halt practice ownership altogether for young dentists. This would help so much and needs to be passed immediately. I am a young dentist looking to start a practice but my previous non compete locks me out of an area near my home and is so detrimental to my income and career goals."
Wanda	"Thank you for proposing this change. It will be a blessing to all the workers who are being held down by non-compete clauses."
Christopher	"Hello. Non-compete clauses are a violation of worker's rights and also an attempt by corporations to strangle the free market in their own interests. Ban non-competes, please."
Eric	"Restrictive covenants are essential to the illegal corporate practice of medicine. This is particularly true in medicine where physicians have the daunting choice of having to pick up and move rather than opting out of a poorly managed or even maliciously managed local healthcare system that holds a local monopoly. The worst abuses are in emergency medicine where private equity owning contract management groups have undue leverage over emergency physicians forcing them to perform illegal and unethical acts while fee splitting and often taking 50% of their clinical revenue while kicking some back to the local ceo through sham joint ventures. This prevents physicians from advocating for patients as undue leverage is used against them."
Eric	"The balance between practitioners and hospital administrators needs to be restored Eliminating restrictive covenants in medicine reduces undue administrative leverage over physicians (trade secrets are illegal in medicine so preservation of these by restrictive covenants - something that may be a valid concern in other areas of is invalid and unethical in medicine) and disrupts the doctor patient relationship - placing administrative leverage over patient best interests."
Nav	"I support that non compete should be removed. Hospitals and non profit organizations shouldn't be exempt. Non compete should be removed for physicians as well."
Laura	" Physicians are just normal people - we live in communities, often near where we work; our kids go to school, participate in sports, and have friends in the neighborhood; and our partners often have local jobs as well. Sometimes we have extended family in the area as well. Just like everyone else. And yet, physicians are routinely held to noncompete clauses that make them choose between staying in a job they don't love or that is not a good fit for them, or moving away and being uprooted from their communities to pursue a better job, even when a preferred job is right across town. This is not right and should not be legal. Let hospitals compete with each other to retain the physicians they hire, and let physicians work where they want without disruption to their families' lives."

Jeff	"I am writing in support of the proposed FTC Non- Compete Clause Rule. The use of such a clause in an employment contract benefits the employer entirely, the workers not at all. It removes incentives for workers to develop specialized skills, knowing they are precluded from offering enhanced skills to the broader labor market, and placing them in a position of serfdom."
Jenna	"Non competes for physicians are harmful to patients in rural and underserved communities"
Jenna	"If the point of this is that these types of regulations are unconstitutional and/or inappropriate, why would exempting "non-profits" even be in the discussion? They should not be allowed to harm employees. Non-profit is just tax lingo, and in the medical world they are some of the most abusive to their employees."
Tara	"I am in favor of banning non-compete agreements. I am a former employee still under the constraints of a non-compete of a former employer which is now hindering my ability to find work in a field in which I am proficient and enjoy. The situation that I am currently in is not an issue of using proprietary or unique information from said employer, but that I came into the job with prior knowledge that is now difficult to defend the use of I am attempting to start my own business which would in no way compete with the business of the employer, but am running into difficulty due to my prior knowledge and licensing overlapping with what was provided in my training My desire is to stay in the same field, but change my specialty, which has proven difficult due to the employers use of scare tactics and threats, not only directly to those who have signed their non-compete agreements but to other businesses in the field. Compared to other companies offering the same services, our pay and benefits were low and our workload was high. The non-compete was required to be signed before any raises or vacation would be paid out. We are now held hostage as we are unable to seek competitive employment with any company in a remotely similar sector as our non-compete applies. As previously mentioned, my situation is unique in the fact that I had entered into a non-compete with an employer but had previously obtained licensing and training in the field for which I am now forced to defend the use of."
Alyssa	"I believe in most cases Noncompetes for physicians should be banned. At the least, you should not unilaterally exclude physicians from relief from these "noncompetes". Ultimately, the noncompetes potentially harm patients because they force doctors, often in the prime of their careers, to move out of the area they previously practiced in. They give too much power to large hospital systems and medical groups that employ physicians, and discourage healthy competition and potentially discourage "mom and pop" type small private practices from being founded. I also think the noncompetes potentially hurt female physicians disproportionately since we very commonly have spouses who work outside the home and it can be much harder for us to move/relocate if our husbands have a job in the area, our kids are in school, etc. If we get caught in the jaws of a

	noncompete (even if it's only questionable legally enforceable) nobody is going to risk hiring us -they'll just get a fresh new residency graduate or someone moving in from out of state. You should really reconsider if you are thinking of excluding most or all physicians from this new rule."
Lance	"Thank you for the opportunity to submit a comment regarding non-compete clauses. I am an Orthopaedic surgeon in western Pennsylvania, an area of the country for which independent practices are nearly extinct. The presence of two large competing health systems, each with their own health insurance product, creates a near monopoly for which small health systems and independent practices are at the mercy of the two giants. As a result of this local healthcare climate, many forward-thinking, entrepreneurial-spirited physicians/surgeons are stifled and suffocated from attempting independent ventures, and many of us therefore must choose undesirable employed contracts from a health system in order to practice in this area (which is "home" for many of us). Once we are employed, we are hostage to burdensome non-compete clauses that shift almost all of the leverage to the health system. Now that health systems are bleeding at historic levels (the result of the pandemic, subsequent labor shortages, and ongoing decreases in reimbursement levels), our compensation is being decreased to help improve the bottom line. This is happening despite being asked to produce at higher and higher levels each year with fewer stable resources and failing infrastructure. We are up against huge bureaucracies that strip us of virtually all autonomy to run our practices efficiently and effectively. While raising capital remains an enormous hurdle, eliminating non-compete clauses would at least give some of us a chance to extricate ourselves from the burnout of employment and attempt to create competitive models of healthcare delivery for the local communities that we have continued to serve, without disrupting patient care and keeping our families secure in the communities we have dug roots in. Healthcare systems have no business "owning" patients and their records of prior care. Keep the physician-patient relationship sacred! Give us the chance to serve them with the best value, maintaining continuity of care and high-quality outcomes at lower costs with consistently high patient satisfaction! Thank you again for the opportunity."
David	"I am a physician. I absolutely agree with the concept of abolishing the non-compete clause. It is completely and unreasonably restrictive of a doctor's ability to do what he or she is trained for after leaving one practice environment in an attempt to enter into a different practice environment. This kind of restriction also better enables the employer to take advantage of the physician employee regarding pay, benefits, working conditions, etc., because the employer knows that the physician employee does not have an easy exit from that practice position, unless the physician is willing to relocate to a different region."
Alexandra	"Non-Compete Clauses MUST BE ELIMINATED! It is hindering us doctors trying to seek employment close to home."
Alberto	"This is amazing! Thank you so much for creating this rule! I pray that you finalize it! Please! I'm a tattoo artist stuck in a non compete and I've had to drive out of

	my county to work. This non compete I'm in lasts for 3 years and I have 2.5 years left. I've wanted to work in my brothers tattoo studio who lives in the banned county and I can't help him build the business. I live in Pennsylvania and non competes are enforceable here. This rule being finalized would free me and let me work where I'd like. Thank you again! You're helping so many! Don't give this up!"
Marla	"My husband's company was bought out a number of years ago, but this past year he was asked to sign a non-compete. Just a few days ago, a new commission structure came out and it will dramatically cut his commission. He has spent twenty years building a relationship with his customers, working very long hours and through extremely hard times. They didn't ask him to sign the non-compete to protect their products, it was used as a scare tactic to make it more difficult to transition to a new company. It's not a trade secret to care about, listen to and respect your customers, work hard for diem and your employer, it's a gift of a person with pride, compassion and an amazing work ethic. I applaud the FTC for understanding that competing or striving to do better is what makes this world a better place. Those that get up every day and give it 110% of their effort should be applauded and rewarded, not degraded and taken advantage of Without competition and hard work, we couldn't possibly grow and continue to be this amazing country."
Benita	"Studies show that ending non-competes would boost wages for countless US workers, one out of five of whom are currently bound by a non-compete. Don't listen to the Chamber of Commerce."
Sara	"Writing to say I am strongly in favor of a new rule banning non-compete clauses. With the stroke of a pen you have the power to improve quality of life for millions of Americans."
Bryan Paulo	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. Eliminating the noncompete clauses will help improve healthcare access for patients as hospitals and corporations can no longer restrict where physicians can work. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A concerned physician seeing physicians being taken advantage of by healthcare organizations with non-competes"

Amy	"Thank you for the opportunity to comment. The current situation with non-compete clauses causes significant disruption to patient care. The current non-competes result in patients not being told their physician is leaving, the physician having to lie to the patient saying they will see them in follow up knowing they are leaving, and missed opportunity to hand off work ups including cancer evaluations. It is dangerous for patients, it does not give them a choice in what physicians they see and it leads to dishonesty in a place where trust is imperative. The burden on physicians is also becoming exorbitant while giving the medical industry administrators more authority to control how physicians work. I know this is not the only industry affected. It seems that employers should bear some responsibility in providing a work environment where employees want to stay instead of being able to prevent employees from changing jobs without moving out of the area. "
Eileen	"Non Compete clauses stifle American workers' ability to demand better wages and working conditions. All non compete clauses should be unenforceable. If an employee is in possession of trade secrets, those may be easily protected via a non disclosure agreement."
LisaLisa	"Please do ban no compete clauses! They are harmful on so many levels."
Renee	"Non-compete clauses need to be eliminated. They unfairly privilege the interests of large employers like healthcare systems over individuals with little or no recourse, such as primary care physicians. I am a primary care physician , and I consider patient care and my relationship with patients to be far more important than the potential tiny amount of enhanced compensation that an employer could theoretically offer if they don't have to worry about competition. In cases where former employees might take trade secrets, you should allow non-disclosure agreements but not non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses force people to move and prevent people from starting businesses or switching jobs, and all such dampers on employment hurt both individual workers and the economy as a whole. Patients are suffering every time their physician signs a non-compete clause. Ban them!"
George	"Non-compete clauses in the healthcare industry, particularly for those in technical positions and for clinical practitioners , functionally impede patient access to high-quality healthcare. By restricting practice in large areas, the only option oftentimes for highly- trained providers is to move away entirely, leaving patients without their established physician or the technical expertise for specialized care. This particularly impacts rural areas, where non-compete clauses are not uncommonly over 30 miles, sometimes up to 75 miles in radius (an area of over 17,000 square miles) for 2 to 3 years. For reference that is an area larger than Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut combined. Rarely do non-competes for clinical providers protect "trade secrets" or intellectual property, as practitioners apply evidence-based medicine and training available from the public domain. In the modern healthcare environment of rising rates of hospital employment, large corporate healthcare systems utilize non-competes to reduce the cost of highly skilled labor and prevent loss of patient capital. While the loss of patients would be a major concern for smaller, private practice groups, the argument is not founded for multi-billion-dollar healthcare entities; particularly those who also control patient flow by their role as health insurance providers. Even for smaller private practice groups, non-competes squash competition by limiting the ability of new practices from forming because of the restrictive covenants. There are very rare situations where a non-compete is in the public's interest, for example if a clinical practitioner is intimately involved with hospital administration and has fiduciary knowledge of competing health systems. The vast majority of these clauses, in my view, only harms patients, stifles competition and allows employers an unprecedented amount of control over a provider's free choice to practice medicine where they please. -Cardiologist from Pittsburgh, PA"

Gina	"Hello. I would like to tell you about how a noncompete ruined my life. I left a large hair salon & spa in august 2020 after going back to work to a place that did not abide by Covid 19 protocols. I had a newborn at home and I was very scared about my health and his. I started my own studio suite to control who I saw and when. My former employer bullied me, threatened me with a case and desist and ultimately led me to bankruptcy because of all the lawyer and court fees that had accumulated. All I wanted to do was cut hair in a small space and she called me a direct threat to her business. Her business was a full service salon, offering skincare, massage, nail and hair services. She had 10 hair stations, 4 shampoo bowls and a separate area for nails as well as a second floor for spa services. My studio was 2 hair chairs and a shampoo bowl. That's it. it was also 7.5 miles from her building with a total of 30 salons in a 7.5 mile radius. I don't see how I can be a direct threat with all that competition and significantly less space. Please pass this law so no other mother has to go through what I went through. It has truly been a nightmare. Thank you for your time."
Rina	"I agree with getting rid of the non compete clause in physicians contract like any other job a physician shouldn't have to uproot their family if they are unhappy in their current work situation they should have the freedom to use their expertise at another health system"
Wells	"I'm an employed physician who has had two jobs, both of which had non-compete clauses. As physician groups and hospital employers enlarge to gain efficiencies in accountable care organizations there are fewer and fewer self-employed options for physicians. Being tied to a single employer because of a non-compete clause is very stressful as leaving the job would require me to move away from the area, pulling my kids from school and away from their friends. Also, I have noticed that wealthier physicians in higher paying specialties are able to buy-out their non-compete clauses. This worsens the economic disparity between primary care physicians and over compensated specialists."
Mohan	"I am a physician in private practice. Large health systems have swallowed the small physician practices. If there is a non compete clause in their contracts those physicians have no voice. They will have to leave not only their city but probably state to practice elsewhere. I strongly urge FTC to remove non compete clause not only from for profit but also from non profit medical institutions. It will create competition and improve quality of care for patients. In addition it will force larger institutions to treat physicians fairly."

Derek	"I support this rule banning non-competes. Non-competes are unfair to the employees who are leaving the company. Employees should always be free to pursue employment without restrictions in a fair free market."
Emily	"Non competes in medicine hurt physicians and patients- doctors must leave their area to avoid their golden handcuffs even in the case of malignant employers, hostile work environments and poorly run practices and hospitals. Patients lose physician access as doctors leave the workforce or their geographic areas to get out of non competes. It also depresses wages in certain high cost geographic areas."
meg	"Remove noncompete clauses that are crippling our economy and preventing job seekers from finding higher paying jobs!"
Dena	"I have worked for staffing companies for the last 35 years and have always had to sign one of these agreements. They are so unfair. I do not have a degree which makes it almost impossible for me to find a Human Resource Manager position with a company. That is why I stay in staffing and I know I could be making more and/or have better benefits if I could leave my current company and go work for a competitor. Staffing is all I know and my only source of income. I am single and putting a daughter through college."
Penny	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Benjamin	"Non-Compete agreements are particularly harmful for workers that have had their jobs terminated, but are still unable to work for a competitor for up to 2 years. I am in this situation where the "value" I received for signing the non-compete was wiped out several months before being let go, however, my former employer is holding me to the 2 year non-compete. This is stifling innovation and competition. This also limits mobility of employees from moving around the same industry. This keeps salaries lower and slows innovation."
Franco	"These deals remove flexibility and stop me from working with firms for whom I've consulted and like more than my own firm. They stifle wages and limit innovation."

Franco	"I support abolishing this anti-worker philosophy that drives down wages and earning potential. I recall Steve Jobs and Eric Sclunitt calling each other to stop poaching, leading to this harmful practice"
Sydni	"Noncompetes are terrible. As a physician , I'm forced to sign a noncompete that bans me from working in my field in the city I live in. That means if I don't like my job, I have to MOVE! That's just crazy."
Anthony	"Agree to BAN use if nonconapete"
Spencer	"I whole heartedly support the proposed rule. Non-compete agreements bully employees into not finding other positions and can be left in unhealthy work environments. Currently I have a non-compete clause that prevents me from joining any other healthcare organization within 500 miles of a city the company I work for operates out of. This is egregious and no organization in the United States should have the ability to restrict the employment of that citizen. These non-compete clauses are increasingly popular and do nothing but put a stranglehold on talent and innovation. I hope to see this clause go forward since I think it will help all workers immensely."
Christin	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. I, personally, am bound by a non-compete in the field of private music instruction. I work for a large music studio that prohibits me from working for any other music studio within a certain mile radius. Additionally, if I were to leave this particular studio, I would be unable to continue teaching my current students independently for a period of at least 2 years. Music teaching is all about relationships - this kind of restriction inhibits the flourishing of student- teacher relationships and ultimately harms the students the most. Financially speaking, if I worked for myself, I would charge a higher rate than I am currently paid as well. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Jeremy	"Non-compete Agreements are bad for business. They also create issues for employees who just want to get a job. To put food on the table and to take care of families Please ban non-compete agreements."
Parker	"Hi! Non-compete agreements should be illegal, as it is artificially lowering wages."
nicole	"Non competes affect me directly. I was working for the same network system as an NP for over 16 years- in that time the network grew significantly- upon leaving I had 10 miles non compete but the network had grown so much I had to leave the county to work. All non competes should be banned especially with the shortage of primary care providers."

Stephanie	"I am a veterinarian who is currently working under a 2 year, 17 mile non-compete agreement. Due to the shortage of veterinarians and the new competitiveness of offered salaries, I strongly feel that my current contract is taking advantage of me. There are numerous other hospitals in the area that I could make a higher wage but my contract binds me to the current hospital at which I work. I, along with my other associates, have not received raises in wages commensurate with adjusting wages in the area. I am in full favor of the resolution of non-competes for the reasons set forth by the FTC."
Garrett	"Despite never having my career trajectory interrupted by a non-compete clause, I have always found the practice disheartening. A worker should be able to transfer their skills to a new employer without hesitation - they need to be able to look out for themselves. Whether this is a decision based on financial compensation, travel convenience, moral consciousness, or any number of criteria the decision to leave one company for another should never be prevented by your current employer as that seems to defeat the entire purpose of the free market. Often times a young professional may not know what other companies are in their field until they have time to become part of that field; then they may learn that they could be better compensated elsewhere, or they learn that they may take a pay cut but find themselves happier in a different company culture. Young workers may be more fickle than their elder counterparts, but simultaneously I applaud them for being willing to stand up against things such as this very practice of non-compete clauses which were designed to limit their prospects. As a skilled worker, I should be able to shop my skills out and to find the best possible work environment for me."
Joe	"Non-Compete rules are completely unfair and hurt the country by preventing competition. Ban Non-Compete rules."
Nicholas	"Non-compete clauses, also called "restrictive covenants" diminish competitiveness in the healthcare field. Doctors, Physician Assistants, and Nurse Practitioners are often saddled with these in their contracts. If the healthcare system mistreats its employees or patients, leaving can be nearly impossible as one may have to find a job 100+ miles away. That is not a "free economy." That is corporate control."
Joe	"As a man in his early 30's who has worked through the ranks of a multi-million dollar corporation, I strongly support the ban. I'm at a pivotal point in my career and life where applying my skill and knowledge to create something for myself is being held hostage by the corporation I work for. This organization has challenged every employee who has tried to make it on their own or has tried to leave for a better opportunity. When doing so they make it known to the current employees in order to "send a message". While I understand the importance of keeping the secret recipe to a company's success out of a competitors hands, I feel the non-compete agreement is an unethical way to go about it. Instead a stronger NDA

	should be implemented. Even a revamped version of a non-compete could help matters. If an individual holds a certain rank within the company that gives them access to ALL company wide privileged information (bank statements, P&L information, pricing, billing, customer contacts, etc) I can understand the implementation of a non compete. One tactic I have seen used is to bog down a previous employee with court cost whether the corporation has a case or not. If I corporation what's to take an individual to court for breech of a non-compete contract, the corporation should be held liable for covering that previous employees court and attorney fees and also be exposing themselves to a counter suit from the employee for damages. Like I mentioned, I can see the reason for a non-compete but the strangle hold should be turned onto the corporation not the employee."
Ellen	"am a physician and when I became an attending I had to sign a non compete. I work in an underserved area in PA. I see no justification for non- competes especially in an area that desperately needs more doctors. This harms the entire profession and patients. I have witnessed colleagues both attempt to negotiate non-competes and have to move their entire family if the switch jobs. How do we harm a behemoth hospital system by working for their competitor?"
Rafael	"Physicians should have the power to negotiate with their employer and not be held to a noncompete. Nonsolicitation? Fine. But no to a noncompete."
Andrea	"Please void noncompete causes. It has a negative impact on employees and keeps them in jobs that are not serving diem for the sake of not disturbing/uprooting their family life. I feel strongly that doctors need the protection of no noncompete causes. This is an unfair legal practice & I believe contributes to burnout among physicians who end up feeling "suck" & hopeless! Thank you so much for considering this ruling!"
Harry	"Restrictive covenants are the norm in Physician contracts. This further undermines the ability to hire and retain doctors especially in rural area. The restrictions usually take the does completely out of area never to return."
Richard	"The medical and veterenary communities are being conglomerated into large groups. The days of young doctors getting out of scholl and starting practices are gone. The school debt is too high and the cost of starting up is too high. Credentialling is a huge burden to private practice, In response to these changes the restricted covenants need to go away. Theses covenants inhibit a practitioner for practicing in an area dominated by these large groups. The large companies have internal legal representation to dominate and intimidate the practitioners."
YOUR	"#NONCOMPETE Our country is facing an ongoing medical crisis! DEFEAT THE NON-COMPETE FOR PHYSICIANS AND OTHER HEALTHCARE PRACTITIONERS!!!!"
Muhammad	"Hospitals are lobbying to exclude physicians from this. Doctors already work in slave like conditions with 24 + hour shifts, they sacrifice their social and family lives and hospital systems and executives want to abuse them more. Please end this non-compete clause ASAP."

Owen	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I would like to express support for regulation of noncompete agreements. I worked until last year for a glass manufacturer which, fortunately, was unionized. I felt workers there had some level of protection, and if they felt they preferred to seek work at another glass manufacturer, they had reasonable leeway to do so. Everyone should be able to do this. Often people choose to move from one employer to another, or to start their own business, because they have some personal situation where an alteration in their schedule or living arrangements dictates that they do so, or for some similar reason. Someone with a benign reason to move to alternate employment shouldn't be penalized for wanting to use their existing skills in their new job. It is understandable that a business has some things which it reasonably wants to remain confidential, but these things should be more directly targeted by things like trade secret laws, confidentiality agreements, or the like. A person who wants to make and sell glass bottles in Elmira, New York, and is willing to comply with the law shouldn't be restricted from doing so just because she used to work making glass bottles for another employer twenty miles away in Corning, New York."
Edward	"I support removing this, we are a free market economy and that requires free movement of labor."
Christopher	"I am subject to an employer non-compete clause that is tied to a deferred compensation plan. The value of the deferred compensation to me and my family is in excess of $400,000. - a significant amount. The non-compete as written forbids me for working for a competitor within 100 miles of ANY of our company locations. I'm located in suburban Philadelphia where I've lived for over 2 decades and where we are raising a family. My non-compete restricts me essentially from working in my line of work anywhere on the east coast from Maine to South Carolina. The company where I am employed has locations in Boston, suburban NYC, central NJ, Philadelphia suburbs, Baltimore/Washington suburbs, Richmond, and Charlotte NC. One hundred miles from each of these locations essential restricts me from working on the east coast without fear of losing a significant amount of deferred compensation."
Kathleen	"Please outlaw this abhorrent practice. The US has allowed corporations to take too much power from employees and customers in the interest of profitability, as if this was a legitimate, overriding reason to abuse people and the planet. Non-compete clauses stipulate that an individual's skills and thoughts are the property of the employer, which is ridiculous. Companies are glad to hire people with experience gained from education and work, and the knowledge therein, but then claim it as their organizational property. They have no compunction about asking their own employees to share experience from other organizations - witness the revolving doors between industries and their governmental regulatory bodies. While employees should not be allowed to take files and data from a former (or current) employer and give it to a competitor, anything in one's own head, or their own work from independent or prior experience is their own. Anything else is tantamount to slavery."

Brian	"Please end this non compete language. My boss/owner used it to regulate the number of patients I could see. I work as a mental health counselor and I began discussing that I wanted to leave, he drastically reduced my patient numbers and told me he would enforce the non compete if I left. The non compete included my ability to use the internet and 100 mile radius for in-person sessions. I did attempt to violate the non compete and quickly received a very threatening letter from the company attorney. I want to work for myself, nothing I do is propriety, nothing secret no special sauce. It is a tool to prevent competition and is used to abuse employees."
Patrick	"As a healthcare employee the elimination of non compete clauses would give me a lot more control over my financial future in a very small market of Pittsburgh."
Anthony	" I work for an agency that provides ersidential services to people with intellectual disabilities. Due to staffing shortages through the pandemic we have had to contract with agencies that provide direct support staff, typically these positions only require a high school diploma and specific trainings that are state mandated. These staff work side by side with our staff, yet cost us $25-30 per hour (although their staff done receive that amount, it is more like $15-$16/hour) due to sigbificant price gouging that has occured, while our staff start out at $15-$17 hour (although they receive significant benefits such as pension, healthcare, etc?. Benefits usually costs about 28% of annual salary. Becuase these temp staffing agencies all have non-solicitation clauses with us, and non-compete clauses with their staff, many of these temporary employees want to work for us full time, and we want to hire them. Non-compete clauses stop that from occuring. Each temp agency has its own rules on "buy-outs" but a typical one is $12,500 per employee and they cannot work for us for six months from their last shifts with us. Obviously no one is going to resign, wait six months, then apply, regradless of how long they have been "on assignment" with us...these are workers who are already struggling financially and cannot wait for 6 months to pass. For example, we have a temporary employee who asked to apply with us after being on assignment with us for 2 years. We want her as an employee, she wants to accept a position, but due to these very unfair contracts she cannot. WEeare a non-profit organization that cannot afford to pay a $12,500 fee even if the employee agreed to wait six months to apply. These are unfair, uncompetitive and seem frankly un-american in how they can restrict american citizens in a de facto way from working where they want to. Please move forward with this proposed rule and do not give in to the lobbyists from these companies who will surely come knocking."
Donald	"As an employee that was forced to sign a non compete agreement, I would be very happy if you would make this practice illegal. I am in the insurance industry and our agency was purchased by a large company. We were given just a few days to sign the non compete after the sale or we would lose our jobs. While it is perfectly reasonable to require employees to not take and use company files with a new employer. Not allowing someone to work in their industry for a period of two years is basically making me unemployable in my profession. I fully support this rule change, I should be able to change employers and take the knowledge that is in my head with me."

Jameel	"I strongly support banning the non-compete classes as they have done significant damage to Fair competition in every sector of human life especially in the healthcare field. It is time to end corporate Monopoly gear towards lining their own coffers and ignoring greater public good. Ban Non-Compete FOREVER !!"
John	"I support restricting non-compete agreements. I believe they allow the employer to use their power to manipulate the worker's situation by holding their livelihood hostage. Non-compete agreements have are similarities to monopolies and should be prevented in a similar way."
Bryanna	"I agree that physicians should not be restricted to an area of practice based on non-compete clauses. We should be able to change jobs without having to move entire cities and uprooting families and not negatively affect either hospital entity."
Andrew	"To whom it may concern at the FTC: I am a clinical cardiologist practicing in Pennsylvania. I recently relocated my family from Washington DC, where we had lived for the previous 9 years, in part because of an onerous noncompete clause. My first job after medical training was exactly what i wanted in terms of the work. However, i almost didn't sign the contract because of the noncompete, which restricted me from working in any county that bordered Washington DC. Given the geographic radius of the noncompete and traffic in the region, finding a new job outside of the noncompete area essentially amounted to moving. Over the years, my job satisfaction deteriorated due to lack of administrative support and onerous new work requirements imposed by my organization. And yet i felt largely trapped by the many things binding me to the DC area, including my wife's work, our excellent nanny etc. Had i not had the noncompete, i would have left my job at least 4 years earlier than i did and received higher pay and better working conditions from one of several competing organizations. New physicians are often coerced into signing onerous noncompete clauses because of their relative inexperience with contractual matters and their intense desire/need to secure employment as soon as their training programs have ended. A ban on noncompete clauses would greatly improve the ability of physicians, particularly new physicians, to secure employment on fair terms and to hold employers accountable throughout their employment."
Jon	"Most physicians leave their first job within a couple years. Not being flexible to move jobs is harmful to families and communities."
Imaneh	"I would like the the non compete clause to be removed from contracts for physicians."

Theodore	"The non-compete clause in contracts supports businesses efforts to gain market share and strive toward a monopoly, but it does not support anything good for the consumer or the workers involved. Please make non-compete clauses illegal."
Nathan	"As an American Physician , my ability to take care of my patients who I have seen and poured my soul into, however when I leave they cannot come with me which leaves them to suffer the headache and risk that finding a new neurologist entails. Getting rid of physician noncompetes, despite what the American Hospital Association would lobby, would help patients first, and physicians as well."
Catherine	"Please do not allow non-compete clauses, especially for everyday Americans. My cousin moved across the country in 2018 to be closer to family. It took him 9 months to find a job, and in the process of securing it, he and wife found a home near his work and settled in. He was a hotel manager , with 15 years experience, and would be opening a new hotel. Two and a half months into his 3 month trial period, his irate and mercurial boss who little experience running a hotel fired him and subsequently several more members of the leadership team. He was told by his immediate supervisor that he had done nothing wrong, and that she was sorry to see him go—he had been a good hire in her perspective. Needless to say, because of a non-compete clause, he was unable to find a similar job in his field job in the vicinity where lie had just purchased a house for his family. Not to mention the emotional toll it took upon him to realize that lie was now facing an even harder task in finding a new job with the new limitations. He had no "trade secrets" to share or offer, only his regular work experience gained from working in his field. This hits even harder when he did not leave the job voluntarily, but was fired—hitting a person with an additional handicap when they are down. This harms working families and their children. Please get rid of this ridiculous and punitive requirement- -let people reasonably work and provide for themselves and their families."
Kathleen	"I believe that the non-compete Claus is a violation of the workers right to engage with other businesses. Since the consolidation of so many businesses, there is less competition between sectors in markets. So to deny the worker the ability to move to a competitor that person has nowhere else to go."
Benjamin	"I strongly support the ban of Non-competes. I regularly see my employer cut pay and bonuses and then limit the ability of the employee to seek that pay elsewhere. industry experience is vital on a resume, inability to seek employment from other companies within the industry you work suppresses employee value, which is what the companies want. A ban of non competes would force employers to pay the employees market value, treat them well. If they choose not to it gives the employee the right to leave."
Kurtis	"Companies should not be allowed to do non-completes in their contracts."
Silvio	"About time for this anti employee rule to be outlawed."

Kaitlin	"I support removing the premise of non compete clauses. As a veterinarian they are used to bully associates into staying practices where they are abused and underpaid with the consequence of back paying their salary which is impossible due to paying back student debt. Removing this would allow veterinarians, and other workers, the ability to move about the job force to support the communities they live in without the constraints of having to leave their families or backpaying hard earned salaries for the sake of an employers ego."
Rainer	"We need to make this happen. I'm making 40% less then I could be because I can't go to a competing company within my industry."
Johnathon	"Doing away with Non-Competes would allow me to seek better employment within my field without worrying about not being able to provide for my family in between jobs, or feel like I have to start my career over if I leave. I see this as a net-win for employees."
Courtney	"As a faculty member at a western PA health care system, this would be a fantastic way to support our patients needs. The only people that benefit from a non compete is the business. A health care system should retain physicians because they make it a good work environment, not because they hold your community as collateral."
Tyler	"I am fully in support of prohibiting non-compete clauses in all but the most exceptional cases such as matters of utmost national security or those in executive level positions. Non-compete clauses disproportionately disadvantage employees and are broadly unenforceable in today's workforce."
Lesley	"It is far past time to stop letting big business rule our lives. We need to have the freedom to leave a bad work situation, or leave for other reason and find a new job with the same skills. I can agree that a former employee shouldn't reveal insider information to a new one. With losing medical benefits and not being able to go for a new job like the old one, we are forced to slave at pay that doesn't even cover things we need, let alone an emergency. Those who make these rules earn far more in one year than many employees will make in a life time, in part because of this strangle hold."
Electra	"Non-Competes lead to burnout in healthcare workers . Forcing someone to stay at a job in which they are unhappy because they don't want to relocate leads to burnout which in turn leads to poor work performance. This is bad for patient care. Furthermore, non-competes lead to healthcare worker shortages as providers are forced to leave the area if they are unhappy with their employer rather than remaining in the area to serve the community."

Jason	"As a physician there is no greater abuse against us than the non competes. Almost every provider I know has had " to figure out a way around a restriction or a way to pay it off We don't have the money nor time to go to court and fight a health system for an injunction. I have endured this first hand. I had a non compete that was 10 miles from the office or the group's hospital that they worked at. With time there were five more offices and three more hospitals. Some of those offices were opened for only two days a month of clinic only to extend the non compete to upwards of 50 miles. I therefore had to move even when the practice was in financial trouble with eventual bankruptcy. The local hospital would have hired me but wasn't willing to buy out my restriction. Now I am in a community that is a challenge to recruit to with a shortage of primary and specialty care. The local hospital is enforcing restrictions on physicians who don't even have a practice (hospitalists) and NP's and Pa's. This forces physicians to leave a community or travel for up to two years to ride out the restriction rather than stay in a community desperate ihr primary care. This is detrimental to communities let alone physicians who want to stay and help a community in need. If the hospitals are so worried about us leaving for a competitor then they should treat us better. This proposal surely will lead to this as well It will improve competition for providers, improve provider negotiations with health systems, potentially allow for improved work lives and working conditions and most importantly improve access and quality of patient care. What ever excuses the health systems can conjure up as to why this hurts them is purely selfish with no interest in doing what's best for patients or providers. It's no coincidence that lawyers won't put these in their contracts but have forced them upon providers. Thanks for your time."
Dan	"I support the FTC taking action on the federal level to block non-compete clauses in hiring. In Pittsburgh, the problem of non-compete clauses have been most obvious in the health care sector. During a period of rapid consolidation, hospitals have purchased physician practices. Providers unhappy in their new environment have found themselves locked into onerous non-compete clauses with their existing institution, subject to distance requirements. Unfortunately, given that consolidation in health care is not only vertical (purchasing of practices) but also horizontal --- across regions --- these non- competes may apply across broad swaths of territory. A provider that contracts with a health system in Pittsburgh may be prevented from practicing in many areas across the state. I've discussed the problem with providers, who've noted they would need to leave the state to continue caring for patients. The problem is compounded by the chilling effects this creates within the sector. Providers are not only prevented from changing jobs, they are in real fear of getting fired or laid off. They may be afraid to speak out about practices within the health care system for which they work that might compromise patient care. Ultimately non-compete clauses harm providers and communities. In forcing doctors, nurses, physicians assistants and other providers to leave their patients and communities in order to practice, patients and communities are harmed. If the FTC does not have the ability to limit non-competes in the non-profit sector, an effort should be made to provide the

	FTC with that ability. A growing number of communities where non-profit health systems operate are challenging the notion that they are free from profit motive. To exempt non- profit hospitals from a non-compete rule would miss resolving an important part of the problem for communities with consolidated healthcare markets."
Russel	"Please pass this rule. It is unfair to us workers to have our hands tied with respect to employment opportunities."
Sharon	"Having anyone suffer under non compete clauses is a legal way to unduly control the lives of workers. Having anyone suffer under non compete clauses in unskilled, labor intensive vocational positions is sheer torture and so unabashedly discriminatory and destructive it beggars belief How can a person who works as a pizza person, or a home health care aide cleaning the privates of our elderly ever hope to get out of wage slavers if they are going to be punished for seeking a higher paying job? How is this even remotely justifiable? How is this a detriment to a Burger King or a Wawa or anywhere like this? It is difficult to comprehend for those sitting in offices and fiddling with papers for a living how destructive a non compete clause in any kind of a labor contract really is. Want your workers to stay? Pay them a real living wage, respect their humanity and provide a safe work environment. Wage slavery, that is all that this is."
Scott	"I work in a specialized field in healthcare called intraoperative neuromonitoring. Because we are a specialized service that is only required for very specific cases, our services are provided by a national corporation, and hospitals pay us a third party care provider. My company has been taking great pains to eliminate competition in our geographical region. Their footprint is so large, that recent employees seeking to find work with another company have determined that doing so anywhere on the East Coast is impossible. Our company has stopped providing cost of living wage increases. A corporate executive has suggested that our staffing issues will be solved by the absorption of more competitors, while skilled workers in my field are leaving the profession entirely because to keep applying our practice we would have to move west of the Rockies. In addition, I was personally blocked from taking a managerial/director position at a local hospital because our company provides occassional staffing at the site a few times a year. Our work force are being treated like indentured servants, and until there is a legal motivation to be competitive with compensation, I fear that our field will continue to lose qualified people who make surgery safer for patients. I already see the effects of these policies on worker morale and the quality of care that is being provided at our hospitals. My company's values do not prioritize patient care and worker well-being, but they have gotten so big that many of my peers are deciding to leave our profession rather than try to fight against a corporate monster. Elimination of non-compete would greatly improve the quality of life for myself and my co-workers who currently are very limited in our ability to find work with another group. I sincerely hope this proposed law can create a change that forces financially driven corporations to view their employees as a resource for which they need to compete. The experience that is currently being lost to career changes in my field will be felt for years to come. Thank you for this proposal. I truly believe it could life changing for all neurophysiologists working in our country."

Michael	"I am a physician, more specifically, an advanced imaging cardiologist for a health system with a non-compete. My specialty relies on employment at academic medical centers with the capability to perform such studies. My current non-compete disallows me from working within 10 miles of my medical center for 1 year. As a result, if I am to change employers, I will have to move to a new city putting undo hardship on me and my family. Non-competes are not of mutual benefit for both parties of a contract."
Christopher	"Please implement the Proposed Rule. Non-Compete Agreements restrict careers in my industry, and can even make it so people cannot find work in their field, by being limited in where they can work. I am subject to a non-compete agreement currently, which imposes limitations on my career. Job applications often ask if a non-compete is in effect, to which I must answer "Yes", and the potential employers see this. Thank you!"
Kelly	"end noncompetes. This is the only profession in which this is routinely done and it is unethical. As a physician , I find it baffling that this practice still exists"
Lindsey	"I support removal of non-compete clauses. In particular I support their removal from physician contracts . The current standard of non-competes far and away forces physicians to move and uproot their families in order to change jobs; this creates an unfair labor market for physicians. Removal of non-competes is important for all roles, including physicians."
Christina	"Ban the non-compete clause. It is inhumane, predatory, and needlessly punitive to workers who already make low wages. I worked as a home health aide for a while...agencies are taking enough of a cut. I also did test prep tutoring. There I understand non-compete clauses a bit more only because the R&D it takes to create test prep manuals and teaching strategies is intellectual property that shouldn't be then used by another company...but that is totally different than home health aide agencies with low wage workers doing a job that is intimate, critical, and incredibly difficult. Those workers deserve transparency and the right to work wherever they can get the financial, patient-assignment, and schedule that works best for them. This is also an issue of accountability to the clients/patients who didn't really have any choice but to select their own necessary care from this shitshow of greedy and irresponsible agencies. Agencies should increase their wages to retain employees."
Jen	"I feel that non competes make it difficult for patients to access care with the physician of their choice because doctors are forced to leave an area if they change jobs. Often doctors are forced to move their family members away from a desired school location which is detrimental to families with children. I strongly feel that if employers were working with their employees by providing safe staffing ratios and sufficient wages, employees would not be inclined to leave their positions."

Harry	"I was trying to get my comment just perfect, this issue has consumed my life for about 8 yrs now. But they are due today, so here goes. My case will give you the ammo you need to show how obnoxiously a Non-compete clause can be used. Masterfully executed by a man whose clear goal is to put another person out of business, not to protect his own. My uncle is a complete mess with an excellent legal team. 50 years long, the entire Northeast, a list of professions and actions multiple pages long that happen to include just about every way I know how to earn money. Laughably Unenforceable. We were clearly not compensated. Under compensated in the double digit millions. cooked the books to make it appear legit. Just as an example, he had us down for more inventory than him, and his facility is literally 10 times the size. We had no voting rights, or options. All I wanted to do is go back to work and leave the fighting and legal issues behind. Technically unenforceable, yes. But that does not stop the lawsuits. If you sue someone out of existence, what's the difference. My heartfelt gratitude to the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) for their efforts to revise the unfair practice of non-compete clauses. Early next month I will be heading to DC to personally hand every Rep, and Senator a small packet. The gist being to support this rule. It will benefit damn near every person that voted for them, regardless of party. I remain available for anything I can do to help. I attached some of the documents from the litigation that I thought may be helpful.
Philip	"Non-compete clauses should not exist. When threatened with regulation corporations claim they stifle the free market and unfairly restrict business. What are non-compete clauses but a restriction on the market of labor? Make them illegal and restore a tiny bit of the power back to workers."
Sharon	"I am a physician. I have been in practice over 20 years. In that time I have had two jobs and I've had to sign no compete clauses for both of them. These were very restrictive and now I drive at least 30 miles each way to go to work every day. I stayed with my first employer for 17 years. I am more than made up for the amount of money they had to spend on boarding me. These types of contracts are unethical. When I went to work for the University for my first job, I was told if I don't sign it, there's no negotiation at all. These type of contracts give all of the power to the already powerful. Interestingly, my hairdresser has a no compete clause. She can't leave where she is working now because she doesn't have a car and doesn't want to take two buses to get to work. It's time to get rid of no compete clauses. Thank you."
Katherine	"The proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) will be very valuable in strengthening the rights and future opportunities of workers. This will be beneficial to workers in almost every field and location. Employers will be incentivized to compete in the labor marketplace. They will have to treat their workers well ... with more opportunities for professional development, career advancement, better salary and more comprehensive benefits. Employers will not be able to simply sideline workers who leave ... they will have to face the risk they these workers will now be working for a competitor. I highly support this important regulation and encourage its prompt and full adoption."

Richard	"I believe noncompete clauses (also known as restrictive covenants) should not be allowed at the Federal level. As a physician working in Pennsylvania, I have had to sign such covenants in order to work in my field. Most recently my employer (a not-for-profit large health network) sold my practice to a national for-profit group and no longer offer that service line. I had worked for this employer for 24 years. As part of the sale, my position was eliminated. My termination letter included a statement that the restrictive covenant I signed would be enforced. This prevents me from practicing any medicine within 25 miles of any site I practiced in while employed by them for 2 years. That essentially means I either need to move (after living here for 24 years) or retire from medicine and try to find a non medial job to pay my bills and to provide health insurance for me and my family."
Tamar	"I fully support eliminating non-compete agreements for employees. Employers have the lion's share of power in employer-employee relationships and prohibiting required non-compete clauses will help to rebalance that a little."
Robert	"I am a Physician employed by Allegheny Health Network in Pennsylvania. I have a noncompete clause in my contract which essentially prohibits me from working in the Pittsburgh area for a year after my employment would end. If I leave would voluntarily and work at a competing hospital I can understand there position although I still think it is unfair. The point that I am most concerned about is that if for some reason I am terminated, for cause or for no cause, I am still liable to honor the noncompete or suffer a major penalty. At the very least ,if for any reason one's contract is not renewed , we should not be held liable to a noncompete. I hope you are not going to succumb to the hospital lobbies. Thank You."
Alison	"I strongly support the ban of non-compete clauses."
Deborah	"I completely support the FTC's proposed change rule that prohibits employers from requiring employees to sign non-compete agreements. While proponents of these agreements claim that they are used to protect small businesses, they are used regularly by large businesses to suppress competition at the expense of the employee and their future livelihood."
Louise	"Two excellent physicians I consulted as well as a financial advisor had to leave the area because of non -compete clauses. In all these cases we lost excellent professionals impossible to replace in my estimate. Very unfair to our community."
John	"I think employees would be harmed by restrictions on where they choose to work."
Nicholas	"As a physician , non-compete agreements keep us hostage to work for a certain employer. If want to serve a particular community, non-compete agreements necessitate for us to move elsewhere. Also, individual physicians do not have the financial might to fight these larger hospital systems. In the healthcare sphere, it thus keeps healthcare providers hostage to their employers and keep them from serving their community."

Roy	"Dear Reviewer, I am writing to express my concern regarding the noncompete clause in employment contracts. As a physician who sees patients, I strongly believe that such clauses inhibit my ability to practice medicine and also inhibit my wage growth. I believe that such clauses are not only unfair but also harmful to patients and the healthcare industry as a whole. The noncompete clause in my contract limits my ability to work in the same field for a certain period of time, typically one to two years, after leaving my employment. This clause effectively prevents me from practicing medicine in the same geographical area and can greatly impact my ability to support myself and my family. Furthermore, the clause has a negative impact on my wage growth. With fewer job opportunities available to me. I may not have the ability to negotiate higher wages, leading to stagnant wages over time. This can be especially harmful given the rising costs of living and student loan debt for medical professionals. Most importantly, I believe that noncompete clauses are not in the best interest of patients. Patients should have access to a variety of healthcare providers to ensure they receive the best possible care. By limiting the number of physicians available, noncompete clauses can decrease competition and may lead to higher costs for patients. In conclusion, I urge you to reconsider the noncompete clauses. I believe that these clauses are harmful to both physicians and patients and do not serve the best interests of the healthcare industry as a whole. Thank you for your time and consideration. "
Justen	"My current employer uses non-compete clauses in all his employee contracts and leverages employee control by doing so. Not only is it an excessive term of 3 years post-employment, but the range also he set is 150 miles. This would require an individual to have significant change of profession or relocation post-employment. When it is time to negotiate wages, benefits, etc... the terms of the non-compete sting and limit your earning potential for years to come. Employers should not have the power to do this practice as it is unfair to limit anyone's maximum earning potential."
nancy	"Please support workers, mobility and freedom by BANNING noncompete agreements."
David	"I am a licensed mental health therapist . I am extremely grateful that the FTC has taken on this critical issue. I recently (Jan. 17, 2023) allowed my "professional services agreement" to expire with an employer that was seeking to impose more restrictive non-compete terms into an updated contract. This particular employer rents space at existing businesses for the therapists to use. The employer pays none of the overhead costs of those business. Yet, my new contract would have prohibited me from practicing within 25 miles (for 18 months time) of one of these locations that the employer considered to be "theirs." More often than not, the employer has another such location within 25 miles anyway, which pushes the radius of "off-limits" future employers out even further. Also, this employer has expanded in recent years from Western Pennsylvania, into Ohio, New York, and West Virginia. Secondly, my new contract went on to state that I would also be prohibited from practicing Online, with companies such as Better Help or Talk-Space. This would extend the restriction to the domestic (or even international) reach of the internet. The state of Pennsylvania has been entertaining such a Bill for several years now, with no immediate resolution in sight. Again, I am grateful that the FTC sees the inappropriateness of such restrictions. This is long overdue, and cannot come soon enough, in my opinion. Thank you!"

Rosemary	"I am a Family Physician in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses for all workers in the US. Non compete clauses in physician contracts contribute to physician burnout and decrease job satisfaction. Many physicians are trapped by onerous non-competes that prevent diem from moving or being with families. Eliminating non-competes and restrictive covenants for physician would foster flexibility in practices."
Caleb	"I am extending my full support for this proposed regulation to restrict the use of Non-Compete clauses in employee contracts. By forbidding employers from creating these unfair clauses, it will directly motivate them to provide better- -and more competitive- -benefits and higher wages to their employees. If they are so much of an asset to the employer that they require a Non-Compete clause to restrict their competitors from benefiting from their learned skills and knowledge, then they should be able to provide competitive pay and benefits to keep them at the company. The broad effect of this rule would drive up employee wages (by an estimated $250-296 billion as stated by the agency) as employees could freely seek better career opportunities, which aids the general state of our economy. Although anecdotal, I am not aware of a single person who would prefer to be paid less because they worked at a company that restricted their ability to find employment at higher-paying employers at their previous employer's competitors with a Non-Compete clause."
Sharon	"I have been a hair stylist for 36 years and this is keeping me from moving on to make a better living elsewhere. I am in favor of sub chapter J."
Ahmed	"I think the abolition of the non compete clause for health care workers will promote competition and will keep the cost of health care lower. The big hospital network essentially keep the physicians hostage and dictate to them. Sonic of the hospital networks have Hospitals spread over 50 miles and if a physician is not happy with their hospital employer , he/she can not just resign and join some other health entity or go independent. They may have to leave town, sell their house and uproot their family. Essentially being held hostage. I oppose the AI-IA position on trying to exempt physicians from the abolition of the non compete clause. No organization should force a person to work for them if they are unhappy there. They should have the ability to leave that job and get another one without having to uproot their family and leaving their community."
Joseph	"No more non-competes, they are anti-American, anti-pursuit of happiness."

Deborah	"As a physician with more than twenty years of experience, I can say the non-compete severely restricts access of physicians to patients and patients to physicians. It was always about money and control. Now, when medicine is crumbling and well-trained, experienced physicians are hard to find, it is more important than ever to have a larger pool of doctors available to patients. Many people move around in their careers without having to uproot their families, buy new homes and leave their communities. Why are physicians penalized for such a thing? Non-competes are just another deterrent to practicing medicine today. Please end non-compete clauses and help patients, doctors and families."
Brad	"I would love to see this overturned. Way too many employees find themselves under unfair Non-disclosures. Within the current economic culture, I hope that the FTC would overturn all existing and future non disclosures."
Laurel	"I would like to comment in favor of the proposed ban on mandatory non-compete agreements. These agreements have become much more common in recent years and they harm many low wage workers. I read one study that showed that banning these types of agreements would cause wages to rise by $300 billion each year in the US."
Paul	"I support the proposal by the FTC to ban non-compete clauses, especially for healthcare providers . Hospital and health care systems are aggressively pursuing increased market share and competing with each other, while at the same time restricting the ability of their employees from competing fairly in the marketplace. By restricting the ability of highly skilled healthcare workers to seek employment at competitors, hospitals are effectively inhibiting the growth of a free market and consumer choice in healthcare, which results in elevated costs for healthcare consumers. Let the free market reign and help to curb our nation's healthcare cost crisis, both for healthcare systems AND for healthcare providers!"
Tom	"As someone who has been "restricted" throughout my entire career. I have two comments 1.) Employers know that most non competes are unenforceable and use them as intimidation for employees and/or competitors that the litigation is not worth the effort. Therefore they carry untoward sway of employees enduring unsatisfactory conditions, limiting the competition for desirable skills 2.) Certain non-compete situations certainly are valid. Therefore, the rule should simply state that if you desire to enforce valid non-competition, you must pay that employee during the non-competition period. If the non-competition is valid and vital, it certainly must be worth paying for."
Julie	"I am a physician who works as a hospitalist. I am currently working as a locum tenens because one hospital in Erie requires their hospitalists to sign a non-compete (I am not going to steal patients from their hospital as I go to the other hospital. Patients don't select the hospital they go to based on the hospitalist as they don't know who they will get anyways.) The other hospital staffing group has a contract that says I have to comply with what they are telling me to do but that I am accepting all of the responsibility. Those are my 2 local options. I chose neither and have been traveling for 6 years as to not move my family away from our home town. This is a sad state of affairs. But I believe requiring hospitalists, ER doctors, radiologists, pathologists, trauma surgeons, anesthesiologists (that don't have an office like a pain clinic) should never be asked to sign a non compete. In my opinion that is employment restriction and should be illegal as there is no way we are going to compete with them or steal patients from them. It is just controlling, harmful for the community and the physicians."

Megan	"Many physicians (including myself) are held to non-competes that limit patients' access to medical care and force physicians to move their families beyond arbitrary ranges set by their employers."
Curtis	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! I personally was forced into a non-compete agreement as a condition of employment. Although I never had the opportunity to leave my job and take a position with a competitor, I always realized that this was an unfair restraint on marketing myself. Businesses claim to support free markets, but they do their utmost to stifle individuals' attempts to freely market themselves and their skills."
Danielle	"Non-compete clauses can make it more difficult for employees to move on from their current employer. Non-compete clauses should be banned."
Lauren	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. Two years ago I FINALLY found a primary care physician that I felt was invested in my well being. He was an amazing doctor . At the end of last year he decided to leave the hospital system he was employed at. Due to a noncompete agreement he was forced to sign upon hire, he is not able to provide healthcare services in a 100 mile radius. I live in a rural area that has trouble finding quality doctors. I personally lost a highly competent, capable doctor that I trusted with my medical decisions and our area lost a medical provider we desperately need. And this is a nonprofit hospital! I do not agree with noncompete agreements at all, but it disgusts me that it is legal for a nonprofit organization that is supposed to benefit the health of our community to make a decision like this."
Kevin	"Please ban Non Compete clauses! As someone who was basically forced to sign one, I would love to see them banned. In my case, I was an existing employee with the company for 5 years when they decided to implement non compete clauses. I had to sign or I would lose my job. I think that it is unfair that my employer can dictate where I can work."
Martha	"Please pass this rule. The reason Silicon Valley became a successful place for innovation is because they disallowed non-competes. Non-competes inherently undermine the free market for employees. Companies should have to compete to hire and retain workers just as workers should have to compete for the best jobs. Right now companies like Jimmy John's abuse non-competes and put working class people at a huge disadvantage. There is no reason for this other than greed."

Michelle	"Non competes keep workers stuck in low paying jobs with terrible conditions. It needs to be illegal! It exists only as a way to oppress and take advantage of people. The abuse of workers needs to end."
Nancy	"Please insure that physicians are protected from noncompete clauses so they can remain in their community if they need to change jobs. These clauses give employers undue control over people's lives and less incentive to improve working conditions."
Jon	"Non-compete reward corporations and penalize patient access to care. Additionally they put undue burden on providers and their families by corporations and put profit over quality patient care."
Shaylah	"Non-competes should be illegal! Why does one company you work for get to decide where you can and can't work from now on?"
Courtney	"As a Family Medicine physician , I strongly support the ban on non-compete agreements as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for physicians to practice medicine as it should be practiced, in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations and hospitals. Based on data from 2018, 45% of primary care physicians are bound by noncompete agreements. Physicians are largely employed by large hospital systems with large geographic footprints, making it practically impossible for physicians to leave that system without having to relocate or commute long distances. By restricting where a physician can practice, health systems are treating their physicians and by extension, their patients, as commodities rather than people. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the hospital groups to dominate the market and control the physicians. Non-profit hospitals should not be exempt from this ban. Non-compete agreements impeded patient access to continuity of care, limit physician ability to choose their employer, contribute to physician burnout and stifle competition, all of which hurt the patient."
George	"I agree with the FTC's proposed rule to ban Non-Compete clauses. I have been subject to numerous non-compete and similar agreements throughout my employment life. They have never kept me from seeking other employment but in one case the agreement concerned a potential employer so much it almost resulted in them rescinding a job offer, even though my past employer was not fighting my leaving. I have seen them used by other firms to keep relatively low paid workers from seeking hiring paying jobs by scaring potential employers away. These agreements used to be only used for high-level executives but are now being used just to keep wages low"
Jennifer	"I support the rule to end non-compete clauses in labor contracts. They are contrary to a free market and hurt both consumers and workers."
Jeremy	"I agree that non-compete clauses do more harm to the employee and are more beneficial to the employer. If the employee is so valuable, the employer should be doing everything in their power to keep the employee. Non-compete agreements make it harder for employees to find suitable jobs."

Timothy	"I am a veterinarian and business owner for over 30 years. I have seen countless young veterinarians severely impacted by excessive non-compete clauses imposed by their non-veterinarian corporate employers. All of those I know who were negatively impacted either relocated to another state or left the profession! Veterinary Medicine is in crisis at this time due to increased demand and decreasing number of practicing vets. Veterinary non-competes are clearly making the problem worse. Veterinarians top the list of professionals at risk of dying by suicide. The stress of being bullied by oppressive non-competes is making this worse as well. PLEASE move forward with the elimination of veterinary non-competes. Every lawyer I have ever consulted about the employment contract I ask my doctor's to sign have informed me that "veterinary non-competes are not likely to hold up in court if challenged but you should still put one in there." I believe the ONLY reason to include a clause I know will not withstand a legal challenge would be fir the intimidation factor. Please stop corporate employers and all veterinary employers from being able to intimidate and bully veterinary employers through the use of a non-compete. Thank you!"
JAMES	"I started working for my present employer twenty five years ago. Thirteen years ago, the ownership changed, bringing with it a rapid increase in poor treatment of employees and regular, large layoffs. I have applied to other positions in the last thirteen years without success. The reason for this, I believe, is the current ownership suing former employees who go to work in related or the same fields. The company also files lawsuits against customers who hire former PLS employees. An internet search of "PLS Logistics Services", and related terms like "lawsuit" and "non-compete" will validate this claim. During these thirteen years since ownership changed, my salary has increase only twice, and today I was let go by this employer. My wish was to long ago find other employment. I believe the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) would result in companies having to compete to retain and hire current and potential employees, and allow employees to leave toxic workplaces. Worker salaries would naturally result from this competition. Without a non-complete, those applicants (myself included) would be on a more competitive! equitable level with other applicants. Thank you"
Mohammed	"Non-compete clause rule, is very harmful for the community. As a physician , in my personal experience, it put limits and company takes huge benefit by abusing it. I totally against non- compete Clause"
Viswanathan	"This rule has prevented me from opening a dialysis clinic in the inner city area of Harrisburg, where it was needed very badly. Please repeal this law that fosters only unhealthy medical practices!"
Puneet	"I completely agree that non-compete clause is unfair and it should be removed from all contracts"

Sadik	"I agree that there should be a nationwide ban on non competes due to their anti competitive nature. Too many hardworking Americans have their right to work and provide for their families infringed upon by corporate interests. I hope this goes through to protect the TRUE BACKBONE of this country which is the dynamic American labor force."
Carol	"Please ban noncompete agreements. Mental health practices often have these that you sign when you are hired. People don't even know they are signing them. Then when they want to jump to private practice there are all kinds of complications about where they can set up their practice. It is all nonsense and noncompete agreements need to be outlawed. All of them."
Bill	"I have to tell you, every professional I know is extremely happy about this. (close to 400). We are so scared of being sued by the companies and corporations that we work for. It is not fair, how can they legally deny us to work in the same industry for 18 months. This is the best thing that will every happen for the working class people of the USA. Please help us, we are begging you to past this."
Charles	"I am strongly in favor of abolishing non-compete clauses. Conservatives want to get rid of licensing requirements for various industries, but at least these nominally ensure a certain level of quality that can benefit society as a whole. In contrast, non- compete clauses have no societal benefit whatsoever: They only protect and enhance established wealth."
David	"My company moved 180 miles away from where I used to work. I am left high and dry with a no compete so can't even get a job! Non competes must be outlawed."
Andrew	"Yes, please enact this change. Preventing someone from gaining employment is wrong, especially in niche skillsets. A company should not be able to dictate where you can work after you have ended that relationship."
Chris	" Physician non-competes are bad for patients, and bad for providers, leading to bum out and early retirement. Get rid of all non-competes, especially in the healthcare world."
James	"Non compete clauses are actively harmful to employees who are often geographically locked into a region due to cost of moving. They provide almost no protective value for employers outside of the ability to artificially suppress wages by saying there are "saturated" job markets and be actively harming competitors via coercion of potential employees. Make them illegal. And while you are at it, ban stock buy backs or contact someone to start working on it in the appropriate agency. If a company is given government funding and consolidates stock positions over paying staff, then that company should be broken into component parts or taken over as a public ownership by employees. Stop supporting the ultrawealthy and megacorporation war on the working class."

Douglas	"I am in favor of this proposed change. I hope the FTC enacts it asap after the comment period ends. Thank you!"
Jonathan	"I'm a sales person for technology companies . I know no code, and have no company secrets. I'm currently under a 2 year non-compete, which has caused other potential employers to not offer me a job, even though they believe they are not direct competitors. The threat of litigation alone is enough to negatively impact my career. I would strongly support a full repeal of non-competes, past a present. They allow employers too much power, and can be used in arbitrary or vindictive ways to seriously impact the careers of employees."
Patricia	"Non-compete clauses are a real problem. My concern with them is that this clause makes it impossible for workers (especially healthcare workers) unable to change employers. If doctor signs a contract with this clause, they become trapped. The clause usually includes a geographical range. The range always seems reasonable at first but our health systems are growing into effective monopolies as more mergers and acquisitions occur. Government agencies are either unwilling or unable to prevent the trend. I need my doctor to have control over their situation. I don't want to wonder if my doctor is being commercially abused or trapped. This can't provide the best care for me or my family. I wish 'commercial abuse' was hyperbole. Our shared experience with Covid and the treatment of our doctors and nurses has demonstrated that they aren't given the respect that they have earned. Money is even harder to come by. The non-compete clause is a significant obstacle to improving our situation."
James	"I support eliminating non compete clauses. They increase income inequality. They are a tool for making workers poorer and adding to the wealth of those who are obscenely wealthy."
James	"I support ending all non-compete clauses as they suppress workers wages and exacerbate wealth inequality. The rich don't need the game to be so blatantly rigged in their favor."
Jacob	"I am in favor of banning non compete clauses"
Wesley	"Non-profit hospitals should absolutely be included. My non-profit hospital employer specifically told me they were using the non-compete to suppress wages and for staff retention. These hospitals employ thousands of healthcare workers in my community and we should all be free to work wherever we want in our community."
Patrick	"Health care is moving more and more to an oligarchy. Restrictive covenants will be of more and more importance when the geographic reach of these health systems extends over several counties and states. Competition for worker's skill and knowledge is the basis of capitalism. Free and unbridled movement of workers and their ideas is what is needed to bring real change to American health outcomes."

Matthew	"Hello I'm an internal medicine physician practicing as a hospitalist. What that means is that I work exclusively in a hospital with admitted patients. I am under a non compete that would require me and my family to move for a new job. I have no trade secrets. Medical practice is based around standard of care, there are exactly zero trade secrets in medical practice. Non competes must be banned from health care. Currently I'm effectively being held hostage by my hospital system with zero options that don't involve moving, possibly out of state, for a new job. This cannot remain normal. There is zero competition with the non competes in place. Once we're signed on (we need jobs to pay off our loans, not signing isn't an option) then we're their hostage. Doctors in this country are highly educated, generally well paid, rvu generating slaves to the hospital systems who dread and fear a competitive job market for doctors."
Ilyas	"My name is Ilyas Khan and I want to voice my strong support for the Federal Trade Commission's proposed rule on banning non-compete agreements which would protect working individuals from monopsonic companies pushing wages and benefits lower than they would otherwise be and denying workers of opportunities. Non-compete clauses are disastrous in this economy where working class families often need 2 or 3 jobs to make ends meet, where average rents per month are over $1,492 and there are such high levels of college debt. These policies keep people from being able to obtain a second or third job to make ends meet. We believe that people shouldn't need 2 or 3 jobs just to be able to pay the bills but the fact of the matter is right now, many families do and non-compete clauses prevent them from accessing those jobs. Even if jobs are not required to get a job to sign a non-compete agreement workers are often made to feel that they are and feel that it is necessary to sign it to get a job. We need to ban non-compete clauses. They are terrible for workers. Please ban non-compete agreements, for all the working class Americans struggling today."
Jacob	"Striking the non-compete clause is beneficial for the worker. Companies should not force people to stay in bad work places and these clauses are predatory in nature. Force companies to treat and pay their workers better."
John	"I was in the insurance industry and my prior employer insisted on a non-compete. I am not sure it was even an option. When they downsized the branch they offered me a nice severance package. I didn't realize I would never be able to work in the insurance industry again. As soon as a prospective employer caught wind of the non-compete I can't help but feel I was done."
Lawrence	"My employer [...] was convicted of fraud by the SEC (Securities and Exchange Commission) in September of 2022. I left the firm, having a 2 year, 50 mile radius non compete that I signed as a new employer back in 2018. I was subject to attempted enforcement of the non-compete against me, which I found very hard to believe, as I needed to remove myself from the situation from a reputational standpoint. I resigned my employment over an issue that I wanted to have nothing to do with, and yet, my employer still came after me to attempt to enforce the non-compete. My decision to leave has since then been confirmed, as more than half of the staff has resigned and the firm is struggling to salvage their reputation. That

	has not stopped the threatening legal notices from being sent! Below is my general comment, as well as a link to a local newspaper article that I was featured in. I've been following the FTC proposed rule closely! The proposed change is a welcome sign for professionals that have occupations similar to mine. I believe that most entrants to the workforce are not educated on what a non-compete is, and simply will sign what is stuck in front of them, for fear of losing the opportunity, which was exactly my circumstance. The FTC proposal mentions that non-competes are an exploitative practice, and I thoroughly agree with the statement. From my personal experience, it is hard to believe that after your employer is convicted of fraudulently dealing with their customers by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), that they could still possibly have grounds to enforce a non-compete on an employee that choses to move on from the organization in order to maintain their reputation. In my case, I removed myself from a very bad situation, as my employer had willingly compromised their conduct and fiduciary responsibility. I was then left with no recourse or ability to have a practical conversation surrounding the validity of my non-compete. It amazes me that after spending years pouring my time, passion and guidance into all the wonderful relationships I have built with clients, that a piece of paper could possibly prevent me from continuing to do what I love! This type of restrictive behavior ultimately harms the consumer, as they should be the ones that dictate which businesses succeed. My understanding is that if the proposed elimination of these statutes is passed, that all existing non-competes would be rescinded. This would be a huge win for entrepreneurs like me that are subject to attempted enforcement by unfounded harassment and targeted coercion. I think that my unique set of circumstances are similar to countless occurrences where non-competes have prevented innovation and economic liberty to win the day, which is what makes our country so great!"
Richard	"As a radiologist, I work in a professional environment that does NOT include direct referrals of patients to my practice. There is no way that my moving to another job within the predetermined geographic area of my restrictive covenant can harm the business of my current employer. The clause should be eliminated"
Michael	"Removing most non-compete clauses would benefit both workers and industry, by allowing more cross-pollination of talent between companies, and should be enacted as soon as possible."
Carey	"Thank you for bringing this very important matter forward. I would like to provide a simple comment in support of banning noncompete clauses to support workers' growth in their careers and income."
Sarah	"I support this new rule because I think that non-compete clauses are abhorrent. The Congress has done nothing to address this problem for many years now. These restraints on employees go against all theories of free enterprise. What is especially bad is that employers spring these on people who come in to their first day of work after probably having left another job. They don't want to tell people ahead of time because they know how unfair these are. Please pass this rule to make employment fairer for workers."

Srinivas Sai	" Physician and other healthcare workers non compete clauses in employment contracts stifle private practice and promote consolidation of healthcare systems and practices."
Christina	"I've worked for a salon for 15 years and they threaten to sue us with non competes that we signed when we were all very young. They don't offer any benefits or paid training We all wish to leave and open solo studios but we are worried about a law suit:(please pass this bill so we can be free of this horrible company."
Frank	"A non-compete clause has left me as a pharmacist and a potential employer hamstrung. Due to the restrictions in the non-compete, which was required for a job, a job in which I obtained needed experience to advance my career at a small institution, I am unable to obtain employment in the area. Many large institutions do not want a lawsuit against them and I have been turned down for several job opportunities once they find out there is a non-compete in my contract. This stifles my wages and forces me to move my entire family including a pregnant wife to an area not near any family or friends."
Susanna	"Please pass this!!! I have been in sales and bound by non-competes my entire career. It has unjustly caused me significant harm in gainful employment within my fields of expertise. This is antiquated and especially harmful for women who do not receive equal pay and are a single parent."
Charles	"I think this is excellent decision by FTC. I am an engineer by profession and had been stifled by non-compete agrrement in my last job. This decision to remove non-compete clause will be beneficial. Thank you."
Riikka	"As a physician, I humbly request that we do away with non-competes, for several reasons. These include but are not limited to the following: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - private practices, hospitals, and academic centers no longer negotiate regarding the non-compete, which is unfair to the individual for whom location is important (i.e. most if not all individuals) - the non-compete is typically 1-3 years, which makes it difficult if not impossible for a physician to go without work (or to uproot their family and work remotely) before returning to the area. It also makes it impossible for the physician to find a job before leaving their current job, as the wait time is excessively long. Even if the physician gives their group months of advance notice (allowing the group opportunity to find a replacement), it may still be possible to get sued due to the non-compete. - the non-complete typically includes ANY work (even taking call at hospitals) that come within the forbidden region

	- the non-compete is frequently excessively large and includes all current and FUTURE offices of the practice that the individual is signing with (even if those future offices do not yet exist at the time of signing the contract) - academic centers typically have offices throughout the state - or at least spanning multiple counties. This again makes it difficult if not possible to stay in the region (typically for family reasons) if the job is untenable. There is a huge cost to leaving a job and rebuilding ones practice as a physician as one must rebuild their patient base. Depending on the job change, their prior patient base may be out of network. There is also massive incentive to staying at one's job - stable career, stable family, consistent patient base. If a doctor decides to leave a job, its frequently a year or two after the job has become untenable and there is no good option forward if they stay. They should not be punished by a noncompete for leaving and they should be rewarded for giving the group advance notice to find a replacement."
Adam	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. My wife and I are both personally affected by this and would have to upend our lives in Pennsylvania and move to a different if we wished to change jobs. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

Kate	"I urge the FTC a to reject any calls to exempt healthcare workers from non-compete bans. The only sound logic for non-compete clauses is to prevent secret or proprietary information from falling into the hands of a competitor. This does not apply at all to healthcare, where all innovations and best practices are diligently published for the whole community. The only reason hospitals are lobbying against this is because they are afraid that in a world without non-competes they will have to provide non-abusive working conditions in order to remain competitive. Please reject this lobbying, if only to preserve healthcare professions already dealing with terrible burnout and staffing problems."

Christine	"As a physician , I desperately need to have non-compete clauses made illegal. I have $370,000 of medical student debt that I owe to the federal government, so I need to have a job as a physician to support myself and my family at even a modest quality of life. My family has lived in one geographic region since 1710. There are only 3-4 potential employers for me within that region. As a hospital medicine physician, I do not have continuity patients and have no control over what patients in the hospital I care for. I have no ability to go and recruit patients outside of the hospital. When I applied for jobs last year Penn Medicine had a restrictive covenant in the contract that stated I couldn't work at any hospital within 35 miles for 2 years. They would not negotiate any details of the contract despite the wording of the contract saying that the contract was negotiated for. That would mean that if I had taken that job I would have to choose between family and job if I ever chose to leave. I would also have to sell my home if I left my job. These non-compete clauses, impair my ability as a physician to fulfill my moral responsibility to my community and place unreasonable financial and social burdens on physicians, harming public health."
Mahesh	"Non competes increase physician shortages and adversely impact access to healthcare. Health systems (including non profit hospitals) would not get adversely affected if a physician leaves the system to practice and serve patients in the same area. Big healthcare systems use non competes as leverage to suppress physicians from talking about genuine patient care and clinical safety issues- as the physician would have to leave the area if employment is terminated. Non competes in healthcare are absolutely detrimental to both patients and physicians- and need to be completely eliminated"
Roberta	"My husband's company was sold and he had to sign a non compete with the new company or lose his job. The non compete is so broad if he quit or is laid off he is not allowed to work for any company that is within a 100 miles of any of their offices or any company they may require in the future. He fixes printers faxes and helps with networking. It also states he can't work in IT. He negotiated to one year if they let him go from 2 years . They will cripple our family with this document."
John	"I am in support of this proposed rule. Non-compete clauses are restrictive and limit the marketability of workers."
Hannah	"I am writing to support the proposed Federal Trade Commission ban on non-compete clauses because it makes it difficult for employers to get better pay. It also lessens the number of employers working for other companies. This makes it hard for people to find well-paying jobs and for employers to find workers. I hope the Federal Trade Commission will enact this new ban on non-compete clauses."
Michael	"Many physicians are trapped at their jobs or face uprooting there lives to continue to practice medicine. Ending non-compete clauses is essential for many of us and it should include non-profit healthcare systems."
Ashley	"Being a therapist , non-competes are extremely scary when it comes to patient care. Some include date ranges in which we cannot communicate with our

	patients, some of whom have severe trauma histories or suicidal ideations. If a clinician changes companies but is unable to continue meeting a patient, who is at fault if there is an injury or death? Many newly licensed therapists work at smaller group practices as contractors, but are often treated to an employee standard. As an independent contractor who works 30 hours per week for the same company, I believe this should be illegal. Having a noncompete for a contractor is directly going against what the contractor role was created to do. Some noncompetes include mileage in which a clinician cannot create their own company or rent out an office within a certain radius - how is this a safe practice? How can clients continue to work on their mental health and desire to stay alive if they have to change clinicians due to a noncompete clause? When it comes to wages, contractors are supposed to set their own rates and desired payment types, but counselors have to agree to a contracted rate with different insurance companies which makes this very difficult. Some companies contract their clinicians with insurance companies, instead of having the counselor have a direct relationship with the insurance company themselves - which makes it very difficult to leave and be able to work independently. I was also recently informed that pre- licensed clinicians who are unable to practice independently are still being hired as independent contractors at small group practices in the greater Philadelphia area. How is this legal? They are legally required to receive supervision prior to being licensed and therefore cannot work by themselves. No health insurance, no retirement assistance, no paid time off or sick days, no payments towards social security or disability or unemployment by the company. This practice of allowing therapists to be independent contractors should be illegal and is definitely morally gray. Please look into this."
Colby	"This would be an incredibly positive change for American citizens and would clearly help to combat wealth inequality and improve rights of workers. The current environment across many industries is characterized by decreased competition and a few larger corporations. When they require non-competes, this leaves employees with fewer options to vote with their feet and change jobs when exploitative or unsavory business practices are in place. Removing non-competes in my industry, medicine, would be an incredibly positive change for physicians who are increasingly burnt out and unhappy with work conditions at corporation-driven hospitals that do not have the patient in mind."
Matthew	"My non compete makes me feel like I don't have rights. Sometimes it feels like my employer owns me"
Sol	"Non-compete agreements have essentially forced our professions into accepting sub-par wages, work hours, and working conditions. I should not be penalized by employers for wanting to stay in a location for my family and loved ones, and neither should I be penalized for applying other jobs to seek better wages and working conditions. However, non-competes do both, if I want to leave my company for a better job my family suffers and has to be uprooted. Non-competes eliminates a competitive job market and forces workers to accept horrible working conditions. It is a monopoly where major conglomeration are able to strangle workers, progressively decrease pay, increase work hours, and eliminates our ability to negotiate."

Dronacharya	"Non-compete definitely limits the salary of a physician , particularly those employed by large corporate hospital systems. For example, if non-compete were to go away, I would be in a much better position to negotiate to raise my salary by at least 530,000 at least. Non-compete clause is a weapon employers use to subdue employees."
Charles	"As a practicing physician , I have no proprietary knowledge or information and our employers have no proprietary medical or scientific knowledge. My current employer has specifically stated that the principal purpose of the non-compete I am currently subject to is to retain staff and minimize physician reimbursement."
Jim	"My former employer included customers and suppliers to the list of companies for which I was banned. This was presented after I actually started the job. I needed the work so I signed. They used this as part of their strategy to keep employees longer than otherwise, in place of treating us well. I now know that it was not enforceable. Actual lawyers were telling me that I would win any suit brought against me. But the mere presence of the document caused years of worry and anguish. Nobody else should be subject to this kind of treatment. Please do go forward with the rule. Competition for employees is good for both the employees and employers as satisfied, happy employees produce better results overall."
Eric	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. This affects my family personally as my spouse who is a pediatric dentist that signed a non-compete with an office that does not foster a healthy work environment. The non-compete has stifled competition as well as my spouse's ability to sign with another employer that would be more in line with how she would prefer to practice. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. Eliminating non-compete would be boon to American Labor AND businesses. We would not longer stifle anyone from signing agreements that arbitrarily limit a person's potential. This would also signal to companies that America values competition, and that developing a sustainable relationship with their employees, without the need for predatory contracts is valued. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Gregory	"I am fully in support of banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts. These clauses stifle the ability of employees to get better wages and better jobs. They are also a total abuse of power by employers and turn employees into a kind of indentured serf instead of free labor with the ability to better themselves. The faster the Non-compete clauses are phased out, the better!"

Gregory	"I fully support this rule. It is ridiculous that an employer can today in almost all states in the USA, in effect, hold their employees more or less hostage by forcing them to sign a non-compete agreement as part of their employment agreements. END this abuse of power ASAP!"
Joseph	"I'm a practicing physician in Philadelphia Pennsylvania. Philadelphia-based practitioners in my specialty earn salaries that, while quite high, are kept artificially suppressed by non-compete clauses. In countering the proposed rule, the American Hospital Association is attempting to manipulate labor markets in an anti-capitalist manner. Having worked clinically through the COVID-19 pandemic, exposed to a deadly virus on a daily basis, I find it repugnant that a hospital administration association (which represents the very people who personally profited through the pandemic, while suffering near zero risk while working from home) is attempting to punish physicians, nurses, allied health professionals, and all hospital staff in such a transparently manipulative way. Enable to free market to do what it does best - set prices and salaries commensurate to value. Please do not exempt hospitals from this rule. Regulatory capture should have no place in American politics and economics."
David	"As a family physician , I support the FTC rule to prohibit non-compete clauses. This artificial limitation restricts areas where medical care is provided and results in reduced access to healthcare. This is particularly critical to poorer communities that already struggle to recruit healthcare providers. In addition, the FTC should go farther in stopping limitations from employers that limit "moonlighting" or "side jobs" or even provide volunteering services for the same reasons of improving healthcare access."
Patrick	"I firmly support the proposal and I believe it would be a tremendous shame to allow well-funded interest groups to exclude certain groups (eg. physicians) from such important changes. As the evidence shows throughout the proposal, non-compete clauses have been used to artificially lower wages and keep the upper hand against hard working employees. It is a market failure and very un-American."
Dane	"Working in the supply chain/logistics industry provides you ample amount of opportunities to work in various positions to excel at your profession. To limit this with noncompete is an absolute travesty. You were taking away some of the best professionals in this industry from expanding their knowledge and increasing their wealth. There needs to be an immediate stop on what feels like an illegal clause to shackle your employees from leaving."
Arthur	"I support the FTC proposal to ban non-compete agreements. These are not actually agreements they are most often presented on the first day of hire and any refusal to sign them risks losing your new job. Further, they are vague and discretionary regarding what is considered a violation of a non-compete. It is a document that basically locks in your employment to a firm and leaves you with risks for moving onto another company. Thank you for seeking to ban this practice."

Tiffany	"As a physician , I and many of my colleagues have been subjected to non-compete clauses in various hiring contracts. As the research suggests, it leads to diminished pay and decreased competition but in medicine it has far more catastrophic results than that. For example, currently it is estimated approximately 300 physicians die of suicide each year (probably more) and physician burnout is at an all-time high. Non-compete clauses are not a direct cause of either, but they often leave physicians feeling trapped in a miserable situation and help push them toward a negative end. I know that in Pennsylvania, one of my colleagues has been unhappy in his job for at least 5 years but his non-compete is 25 miles or any facility associated with the biggest competitor - which would force him to move should he desire to resign his position. I've heard legislators in Pennsylvania state that their little local hospital could not retain staff if it weren't for non-compete clauses. So these hospital systems are aware of their poor treatment of physicians and are relying on non-competes to force doctors to stay. The other big concern is that if a physician does leave, and re-establishes outside of their non-compete radius, the patients who would like to remain with them cannot do so because they often cannot find the physician. The previous employer will not divulge where the physician moved to, and often internet searches do not show the new location for over 6 months. So patients are being forced to switch providers against their will because of these non-compete clauses. Lack of continuity of care has been shown to have a detrimental effect on a person's health. So the end result is unhappy physicians who are feeling trapped, and when they do finally terminate their employment and establish outside their non-compete radius, the patients' health of their previous patients is going to suffer. It is a broken system that needs correction and preventing non-compete clauses is one step in the right direction."
Leonard	"As a physician , I totally agree with banning non-compete clauses. It is a way for hospitals and insurance companies that own practices to force physicians to stay in their practice at a lower salary once their initial contract is up. If the physician wants to stay in the community where he/she built a practice for several years of the initial contract, they need to take a lower salary offered by the insurance company/hospital at the time of their second contract. This often forces the physician to leave a community where the physician and his/her family have built relationships. They are unable to switch to another practice in the community due to severe (often draconian) penalties if they break the non-compete clause."
Kathryn	"Please pass this rule. Workers should not be limited in their ability to seek employment with different companies in their chosen profession. They should be free to offer their services to any employer in their chosen field."
Janet	"Noncompetes to force professionals to keep working a workplace leads to unhappy workers and exploitive conditions. As a physician , we have a duty to patient care as well as our own mental health. Just like in any job, some times the administration is not a good fit/doesn't support what a physician thinks is best for

	their patients. In those situations, we should be allowed to resign with notice and a transition period but not required to displace our families to find a practice that is a better fit for us. In effect, noncompete allow facilities to force professionals have to compromise their work ethics/substainability/mental health va displacement of their families and patient panels. They serve no purpose in the modern world other than to perpetuate suboptimal work conditions in which we are tied to an employer, which adds to burn out and poured patient care. Please ban noncompetes for the sake of our patients and profession, so that we can fight to give the best care we can "
Jo	"Noncompetes have proliferated beyond their original intent (limiting executives who have access to trade secrets and highly sensitive information) and now stymie regular workers from making an even marginally better life for themselves. It is a drag on the American economy and prevent everyday Americans from a better life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They should be eliminated from past, current, and future contracts."
Avinash	"I work as a physician/cardiologist and restrictive covenants are ubiquitous in my field and are often used to prevent physicians from leaving after they are hired and working conditions/terms/calls/workload/salary etc. are markedly changed. You might be hired with no weekend call and then forced to work every single weekend with a 25% reduction in salary with young children and limited weekend daycare. . . but to leave, you cannot practice in a multicounty radius for 1-2 years!!! How do you do that and raise a family? Often times, for physicians to leave, they would likely need to relocate their home/family entirely. Not practicing during the restrictive covenant would alternatively put my medical licence in jeopardy. Non-compete clauses are anti- competitive, limit economic efficiency, and at its most basic level, are un-American. They should be banned with special attention to physicans to prevent loopholes and workarounds."
Ruthann	"I am so happy to see this legislation finally close to a reality. Non-competes do nothing but harm patients access to care. Please do away with non-competes!"
Jeffrey	"Thank you so much for this public comment period. I'm sure there are so many comments. I am a physician, and a complete Ban on non compete clauses would really push hospitals to treat physicians and other health care workers better through a process of open competition. I take significant issue with the recent America Hospital Association letter and the alleged impact. I think instead competition here could greatly benefit the individual worker. To best highlight how banning non competes would help, I think Dr glaucomflecken said it best. Youtube video link below. Thank you for your work on this https://youtu.be/z9RR81kb5dk"
Kristen	"I am a hospitalist physician that has been through an incredibly difficult 3 years risking my life to take care of COVID patients. Please do the right thing to allow physicians to be exempt from non-compete clauses. Non-competes give bad employers an opportunity to remain bad employers because their employees are forced to either stay with the company or to often relocate if they change jobs. Essentially the non-compete does the following: 1. Bad employers have little

	incentive to make their workplaces better for employees and it makes changing a bad job for a better one more difficult. 2. It often requires a relocation to continue work, many noncompetes prevent job mobility in a very broad area. 3. Employee's families and others who would be negatively affected by relocation are hostage to the clauses. 4. If relocating requires a home sale, there is generally a 5-6 percent loss of home equity at sale. 5. Patients suffer because they cannot follow their doctor to a new practice if they want. 6. Doctors may have to undergo some terrible lawsuits in adverse situations in order to fight the non-compete. If a doctor has a following of patients, those patients have chosen that doctor and should have the opportunity to continue choosing that doctor if they wish. The non-compete often forces doctors out of the local area, and patients, especially those with complicated conditions, do not get the continuity of care they need and desire. While it can be argued that doctors with a patient following should be exempted from the ban because they would take patients away from an existing practice, the non-competes are still being used on radiologists, pathologists, and others who do not have a patient following."
William	"Noncompete clauses suppress competition and hamper free market functionality. Banning them will ensure fair wages and promote economic growth."
William	"I am a long time practitioner in a small subset of specialty insurance. I have seen the steady increase in the use of non-compete clauses mostly in the past fifteen years. I find them non-competitive, not only for the employee, but also for the non-parties to the contract. For the employee, it is for freedom of movement and to negotiate a competitive wage. The non-parties in the insurance business can be 1) the buyers of the insurance product or 2) their agents or brokers, depending on which level of the distribution channel the employee operates. The existence of a non-compete agreement should not interfere with the ability of that non-party to chose whom to do business with. Some other points to consider: a) if a non-compete clause applies to all employees working for a national corporation, then it can be enforced unevenly, depending on where the employee resides. It is patently unfair for an employee to have freedom from a non-compete clause if he or she lives in California, but have that same clause enforced vigorously in Virginia for doing the same job. This I consider to be a violation of an individual's 14th Amendment right to equal protection under the law. This new rule, hopefully, will settle this disparity, provide consistency, and replace the Byzantine patchwork of employment laws across our 50 states; b) savvy employers use the term "non-solicitation" in place of non-compete in an effort to render that part of the employment agreement appear benign when in fact a careful reading is no different than a non-compete agreement. The rule should make clear that any language in an employment agreement that has the same effect as a non-compete will not be legal and treated as such; Finally, c) Non-disclosures and agreements to protect trade secrets and proprietary information are fine. This should protect the business from unwarranted and illegal misuse of their information, which I believe was the original impetus for the explosion of non-compete agreements in the first place. But the use of non-competes have grown completely out of proportion and have become a hindrance to free and fair competition in America. Thank you."

Robert	" Consulting companies have contracts which state that you can't work for companies that they have a relationship with for up to 2 years. That means that you can't get work in the same city. If you get a job at company y and the consulting company had just a chit-chat with company y, the consulting company will claim that they have a relationship and will want part of your salary."
robert	"I am strongly behind the making non competes illegal. Hospitals increasing use this to restrict movement and opportunities for their employees. Rather than compete by working conditions and pay they they use restrictive covenants."
Janet	"Please reduce the ability of companies to require and enforce non-compete clauses. Employers can fire or layoff an employee at any time, for almost any reason, so long as the employee isn't covered by a union contract. People need to be able to find another job in order to leave an employer, or after being let go. A non-compete contract gives an employer the power to prevent someone from finding another job -- even after you no longer work there. I've been told "Oh, don't worry about a non-compete clause, because it won't hold up in court anyway." But the power between the company and the individual is not the same. The company may have a lawyer on staff who can send threatening letters to your potential new job, or handle court paperwork. The individual can't afford those legal costs. I have seen a system administrator have difficulty getting a job because the job that he quit was threatening his other potential employers."
Ryan	"I believe this rule, if imposed, would greatly increase the possibility for the creation of more small businesses. My company restricted me from competing in all counties surrounding the city I work in, requiring me to relocate my family if I choose to leave. It adversely affects the ability for employment choice, free market and the ability to negotiate for better employment and wages."
Anthony	"Non competes can only help an employer and do nothing for the American worker / tax payer. These documents are being used more and more, even in low skilled and paying jobs like service workers. Since corporations can control workers in the industry, they can also control wages and push them as low as they can go because non competes increase job insecurity and fear among those who sign them. Please step in here and help American workers who have "handcuff's" on because of these agreements."
Josh	"I think we need a very narrow list of valid things a non compete can include. Such as you can ban taking your old clients, poaching your former Coworkers, and can't use industry/trade secrets. But anything beyond that should require that the enforcing company pay you full time at the HIGHER OF your old salary OR your newly offered salary, until the term of the non compete expires."
Zoe	"Non-compete clauses only hurt workers. Having competition is a fact of life and should force businesses to treat workers and clients better. If you only have one skill set a non- compete clause could really inhibit your ability to change jobs to better your life; for example if you wanted to work for a new company closer to home, or a different company that offers more pay or benefits for your position."

	Your current employer shouldn't dictate who or where your next employer is going to be. We already have laws protecting proprietary information so a non-compete clause just feels like over the top abuse of power and intimidation."
Ed	"This change in policy would be a huge benefit for me. I have worked at the same veterinary practice in Pittsburgh for almost 15 years. 5 years ago we were bought by a large corporation and I have been relatively unhappy with the direction things are going. My original contract states a 2 year, 30 mile non compete and so I can't work anywhere else in Pittsburgh (a good sized city). My wife and kids are very happy where we live and so my only real options would be to commute to Akron or Cleveland (about 2 hours away) until my noncompete expires. The proposed change would be liberating for me and would allow me to seek employment elsewhere in the city I have grown to love."
Anil	"I strongly support proposed rule by FTC non compete clause rule for benefits of physicians."
KAILASH	"This should pass as corporate employers have taken advantage of physicians "
Tim	"It would be absurd to exclude physicians based on current trends in the labor of physicians. Physicians often had their own practices and their own panels, but now the patients are often assumed to be moreso patients of the hospital than the doctor. Physicians are already excluded from so many other workers rights including striking, unionizing, and more. To exclude physicians from the non-compete clause only seeks to weaken the power of physicians to negotiate for the good of their patients. Example: Ilealdi system tells doctor that they are changing goals and visits will now have to go from 30 min to 15 minutes per patient or they will try to replace diem with less trained professionals or cut the service line, or their salary. If the physician lives in an area where they are already a member of the community, raising their family, etc then leaving becomes extremely difficult and it becomes the patients who suffer."
Zachary	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am fully supportive of the efforts to ban non-compete agreements. In my opinion and generally speaking, workers don't have enough power in the workplace and I believe these efforts will help. As we all know, competition is necessary for fair markets. Thank you."
Kamna	"Non compete clauses have been exploited widely by hospital systems to blackmail physicians and restrict choice for patients. Private practice physicians have disappeared and in the process the relationship of a doctor and patient has suffered. Even the non profit entities/ Hospitals have used it create monopolies in healthcare territories This is extremely damaging to patient health and satisfaction with the system"
Tequilla	"Due to the non-compete clause that I have with my employer, I am unable to continue providing Gender Affirming Care (GAC). I currently work in Wilkes-Bane, PA, which is a rural area and the nearest GAC provider is about one hour away. This significantly affects the health and safety of Transgender patients, many of

	who have limited access to resources and do not have the means to travel one hour away for care. The majority of my patients are from low socioeconomic backgrounds, and when I transferred departments, unfortunately, this left many of them without a provider especially if they are unable to travel. Non-compete clauses restrict healthcare access and delivery, and this affects all patients from all backgrounds. It hurts physicians who are highly trained and are unable to provide care in their communities. Healthcare is already limited due to the physician and nurse shortages, and non-compete clauses only further exacerbate these issues."
Dan	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. Noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. Workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. I have personally been bound by noncompete agreements in the software industry. While I can't say that they professionally harmed me, I always chafed at the idea that my employer could restrict what I did in the future with my career. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Keep up the good work!"
Salvatore	"I haven't attempted to leave my job for better offers several times over the past couple years. I work in the tree and landscape industry, there are no trade secrets or pattens that I could steal and take to another company. I have two daughters in college, and a granddaughter that I'm helping raise at home. Money is extremely tight. The owner of this company has blocked me twice, threatened me, and even stopped paying me because another company made me an offer. I feel like a slave. In addition the work place is abusive to workmen and minorities. It is a very unhealthy environment that nobody can escape."
catherine	"Bravo for considering this rule that would reduce human suffering and benefit our economy."
John	"Excluding physicians from this bill would be an enormous disservice to our profession. We have a right to work just the same as any other healthcare worker. Noncompete clauses disproportionately affect physicians and are injurious to the profession on the whole. Placing limits on where physicians are able to practice hurts not only the profession, but inhibits patient care by intentionally limiting access to providers."
Gary	"This is long overdue. Non-compete clauses put an undue burden on individuals without any recourse for individuals to pursue employment elsewhere."
Matthew	"I am an Emergency Medicine physician practicing in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. I strongly support the abolition of non-compete clauses, not only for myself, but for all workers. These clauses are unnecessary and create unfair burdens for those of

	us who provide emergency services (including nurses, techs, paramedics, EMTs, etc...), where even if we relocated to a different employer, we would not significantly change competition, as we typically do not attract patients/business based on our prestige in the community. It significantly restricts our ability to compete for wages and better benefits, and also harms our patients at the same time. Furthermore, I think this is a strong change for those physicians who DO attract patients based on prestige. Patients frequently choose a certain hospital/medical center because of a specific doctor, rather than the hospital itself. Noncompete clauses make it nearly impossible for physicians to retain their patients if they choose to leave an employer, and therefore, harms patients and decreases patient satisfaction. I think it is in the best interest of workers and patients for noncompete clauses to be abolished."
Aswin	"As a physician who has to live within thirty minutes of my work place non compete clauses will require me to uproot my family if I ever wanted to consider a new job. It limits my freedom to choose where I work when considering all aspects of life. It gives my current employer power in negotiating when negotiating my contract. For example last year during renegotiations I was told by my boss "you just bought a house, your family is in the area and your kids are in the schools why would you ruin all that by having to look for a new job and move." As a patient if I have established care with a doctor I love and that has been caring, empathetic and understands all the nuances of my disease process, it should be illegal to have to go find a new doctor because said physician is changing jobs. The university and hospital cannot just replace a doctor with another body. Physicians practice an art of medicine and no two doctors are alike. It is creating a monopoly when I am forced to change doctors when my doctor leaves and can't work close to his current job. We would not allow monopolies like that in any other field. Stop devaluing individual physicians."
Rebecca	"This is a highly concerning practice for all fields and income levels of workers. Non-compete clauses do not only reduce wages, but also reduce benefits and correction of other ancillary issues. They also restrict movement out of toxic work environments, allowing chronic system wide issues to go unaddressed. For older workers that spent many years training, like physicians, often their first job coincides with their first home and child, increasing their ties to a region, but giving them few options without uprooting their entire family's life. Eliminating restrictive covenant laws must include physicians as well."
Michelle	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. Not allowing someone to change jobs and forcing them to stay where they are not happy or treated fairly is not right. Having to choose between working near home or driving hours away every day is also not right. Please consider passing this rule to allow everyone to seek out better jobs without having to move or drive long distances and miss important family time."
Tara	"I have been a veterinarian for 17 years. My industry routinely uses non-competes for veterinarians to prevent them from leaving a job, working at a nearby practice and potentially having clients follow them there. However, in

	reality they have become a way to prevent employees from leaving their current job, seeking better pay, benefits or a better work environment. In my opinion they have become more of a way to control employees and keep wages stagnant, rather than protect an individual business. Many in my field have no way to work without a non-compete as they are part of most contracts. My current employer has been unwilling to modify my non-compete in any way. Many times they extend well beyond where most clients would be willing to travel to bring their pets. My industry has long had inadequate wages for the level of training, experience and hours worked. COVID related stress has lead to many veterinarians leaving the field. Practices (including my own) are having an extremely hard time finding new full time veterinarians to employ. Many are unable to change jobs and continue to work near their home. Working outside a non-compete may mean moving or enduring an unreasonable commute. This has also lead many veterinarians to be employed solely as "relief veterinarians," working in a role to fill in at practices when an extra vet is needed. This allows vets to work independently and not be subjected to non-competes. I addition, larger corporate groups are buying up smaller practices and imposing very restrictive non-competes on employees. This leads many to quit and find relief work, leaving gaps in care, hours and coverage at many veterinary hospitals. We commonly witness this as there is frequently an unreasonable wait time for pets to be seen by their primary care veterinarian and emergency hospitals now closed overnights or on weekends (with 6-8 hour waits when they are open). In summary, as someone in an industry in which non-competes are common, I do not feel these clauses help business overall as they make it hard to attract new people. They place an unreasonable burden on employees, lead to stagnant wages and acceptance of substandard work environments when options to leave are restricted. My hope is this ban will take place to help my own industry an many others."
Arthur	"I am strongly in favor of a revamp of how non-compete agreements work in this country. Many states already outlaw the practice and many more make the agreements unenforceable (in those states, many employees have signed agreements and are unaware of the legal status). These agreements hurt employees' bargaining power at a time when bargaining power is already fading for employees due to lower union participation and higher education requirements. These agreements are also not good for business. They slow or stop talent moving from economically unproductive areas of the economy to more productive ones. This exacerbates the current labor shortage in many industries, including the current labor shortages in construction, healthcare, and transportation (all relatively high-paying sectors). This hurts every economic participant as it unnecessarily raises the time and money needed to do the projects the economy needs most. These agreements can also make firms "lazy". If they do not feel the market pressure to compete for top talent, they will not try, creating a scenario where workers experience "burnout" more quickly and more often, ultimately causing workers to drop out of the workforce altogether. This further decreases the labor-force participation rate. However, I can see very specific situations where these agreements make sense. I do believe employers may be more willing to invest in new (inexperienced) employees when they sign such agreements. Finns have an understandable desire to generate a return and by signing these contracts, firms have a degree of certainty to base decisions on. I

	also understand that finding highly paid talent is difficult, so I do believe it is a reasonable trade-off for a high-income worker to sign these contracts. There are also rare scenarios where trade secrets are a legitimate concern (however, in most current agreements the term is allowed to be used much too vaguely, or is simply fabricated terminology used as justification). In most of those cases, NDAs would be a better fit. I do believe the best path forward is a middle ground. Allow the agreements in only the rarest of cases: compensation greater than $250,000/year or when hiring new employees with little or no relevant skills and mandate the contracts expire after 3 years. I would like to finish with a disclaimer. I am currently bound by a non-compete agreement with my current employer. While I am relatively happily employed, I know for a fact that my (and my coworkers) current legal arrangement holds back my pay and future opportunities to focus more on work I like. So please take my comment for what it is: a factual and moderate argument made by an individual who has a personal financial incentive to see my plan through."
Matt	"I have been unable to get certain jobs due to non-compete contract that were far too broad and were created with the express intent to crush the worker's ability to leave a job for a better one at a competitor. I've never been privy to sensitive information that I could possibly use against the company. Non-compete's are created to squash the worker and not really protect the employer."
Mark	"I support the banning of non-compete agreements. In most cases, these agreements are written in a way that essentially prevents a worker from accepting a position with another similar organization ANYWHERE in the country. The idea that an employee who works in Pennsylvania and takes a job with a company in California can be in competition and take business from them. Also, aside from trade secrets, etc., an individual worker earning $65k/yr is highly unlikely to financially ruin the business of a multi-billion dollar corporation."
Sean	"Non-competes aren't realistic in this age of a shrinking labor market. People need the flexibility and FREEDOM to choose who and where they want to work without fear of legal actions or having to move their families. If people can make a higher income by switching employers and have a better quality of life, this will pay off for future generations. This also forces employers to pay a competitive wage without making people feel like they are trapped, which when a person feels that way, work productivity decreases significantly. Please eliminate non-compete clauses from the daily life of a health care worker who each day puts their life on the line to help make society better. These people need to be rewarded, not held captive."
Brian	"If you work in a toxic workplace, your boss now controls you like a 'slave'. There is no choice left. This is a free nation, so why would such a thing be allowed?"
Steven	"I am in favor of the Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) rule change that will provide greater support to employees to move within the careers of their choice while encouraging more employee-friendly compensation from employers. While the need for certain Non-Disclosure agreements will protect intellectual property, corporate trade secrets, etc., restricting employees from moving to other employers with their experience does little to protect these corporate concerns. The current restrictions impact employees at many income and skill levels and no more than those at lower skill/pay levels who are prohibited from moving from jobs in close proximity in hopes of enhancing their income and upward mobility. If the implementation of this rule change causes employers to engage in more employee friendly actions to retain skilled employees this is not a hardship, but the fulfillment of a system of capitalism that allows everyone to experience the benefits."

Jeremy	"Strongly support this measure. Non-compete clauses are un-American and antithetical to the values of capitalism and free market."
MELISSA	"I'm in support of this rule. No one should take trade secrets to competitors, yet there are legal remedies for that which do not involve golden handcuffs for job holders. Please enact this for the benefit of a more perfect union in which freedom and the pursuit of happiness is guaranteed."
Gregory	"I am a physician and fully support elimination of non competes."
Nina	"I am a registered nurse for 49 years. These employers have to become better employers in order to keep the employee. This law is cruel, mean and archaic."
Charles	"I am a physician with a non compete and note that these further increase the stranglehold that big health systems have on doctors and consequently their patients. I enthusiastically support the proposed rule!"
Todd	"Non-competes limited skilled professionals upward mobility in a finite market of their respective job, whether it be IT, Education, Healthcare , etc. To be told by an employer that you cannot hold a similar job within 100+ miles is financially damning"
Jon	"As a physician and retired Army Officer, I strongly favor ending non competes in healthcare. Barring a professional from continuing to be in proximity of his/her patients after leaving an employer is an infringement on liberty both for the patient and physician. Non competes in healthcare serve to preserve the monopoly like power employers cultivate in healthcare. It threatens the integrity and quality of healthcare. Its as also stifles innovation and limits the development and expansion of new healthcare delivery platforms."
Joseph	"This is long overdue. As an employed physician that has worked in a number of hospitals over the years, the "non-compete" clauses in the contracts are used as a cudgel against both doctor—and ultimately—the patients. In enforcing non-compete agreements, hospitals are given all the bargaining power in an employment contract and the physician has absolutely none. The result has been the attitude that the "first contract you get is the best," and there is no where to go on subsequent contract negotiations but down after the initial agreement. That has been exactly my experience over 20 years. Hospitals that employ you take the position that you can not leave because the "non-compete agreement" and will push you out of your home and community, and in enforcing them, they routinely do. That is something that should never happen in America, but it has been alive in well for decades in this country."

Lindsay	"I believe that this regulation should apply to all free people in this country. No one body or employer should be able to monopolize or restrict the movement of a licensed individual. We need to include physicians in this as well to allow free trade of our skills and education."
Mark	"I have always thought that noncompete arrangements were unfair. Now that most physicians are employed by larger entities who sometimes impose unreasonable work rules, it becomes more important to allow physicians to "vote with their feet" and leave an unfavorable practice situation. We should not have to leave the area or commute ridiculous distances to avoid noncompete issues. If health systems that employ physicians know that providers can leave and set up shop down the street, perhaps the employers will pay more attention to provider needs and strive to create an environment where practitioners don't want to leave."
Ervin	"I fully support the ban on Non-compete Agreements. As an Account Manager/Sales Professional , I would love to be able to consider offers for my services by competing businesses. Throughout my career I've felt trapped, and unable to enhance my experience and my wages due to these restrictive documents."
Gail	"About 10 years ago, in my position as a Nutrition Clinical Manager in a small city's acute care hospital, I was trying to hire additional registered dietitians (RD). Two qualified candidates that I was interested in had lost their jobs at a nearby hospital - they had worked for a Food Service Management Company and the company's contract was not renewed. These two RDs had (I think it was unknowingly) signed a non-compete agreement at the time of their hire which meant they could not work for another local hospital in the area for a year. They possessed NO privileged information, trade secrets or other such data. They were being punished for doing nothing wrong. And so, they had to seek employment an hour or more away from their residences and I was unable to hire them at that time. In cases such as this, non-compete clauses are unfair and should not be allowed."
Sharon	"Non-compete clauses cause more harm than good. To bar someone from seeking employment at another company can cause lasting harm to that employee's self and family. A better solution would be to ban the employee from taking or using proprietary information from the prior company to the new company. Although this is harder to determine, it does allow a worker to continue in their field of employment."
Alexander	"This is a much needed move by the FTC to promote the freedom of the movement of labor whether that be for better wages or working conditions. Several US States such as California, North Carolina, North Dakota, and Oklahoma have already taken the lead on this issue and either outright banned them, or put limitations on them restricting non-competes to only trade secrets. They impose needless

	restrictions on laborers to suppress wages; and in blue collar industries we have seen complete abuse of non competes used to trap workers in ways that are modern day equivalents to indentured servitude. With notable examples of the company Jimmy Johns in NY restricting fast food sandwich makers to changing jobs to anywhere else that makes sandwiches, and hair salons blocking cosmetologists working for them from ever leaving to work anywhere else. Abusive use of non compete agreements hinders the economy through both wage suppression, abusive labor practices, and hinders innovation. The FTC should move with haste to end these bad practices, and free the labor market from these needless restrictions."
Liliane	"Please remove the non compete clause from employment contracts as it restricts unfairly employed physicians who geographically cannot find another position that is a better fit professionally if it falls within the mileage of the restrictive covenant. It also unfairly burdens patients who cannot find a physician or follow a physician who leaves a position and is forced to find a job far away instead. This disrupts the physician patient relationship and harms both physicians and patients alike. Corporations and private equity groups often gave a monopoly over a certain geographic area and it unfairly limits enterprise and the ability for physicians to find another suitable employment in their geographic area as the restrictive covenants often cover a large swath of a metropolitan area."
Nick	"I am a worker currently under a non compete and I also am in a position to hire other employees. Non competes make it difficult to recruit top talent. It also makes it hard for me to negotiate my own income and value. In order to change companies within my field, I would be forced to sit out of work for a year in between. I would be strongly in favor of a non compete ban. They effectively result in a collusion to pay less for talent. A ban on non competes would promote a free market where the strongest employers would be able to attract the best talent."
Leslie	"Non-compete clauses for front line healthcare workers are ridiculous. Doctors don't have "trade secrets". All these clauses do is raise an unfair barrier to healthcare workers looking to change jobs by essentially requiring that they move a significant distance to accept a new position, uprooting their own lives and the lives of their families. It seems individual healthcare companies are trying to lock both providers and patients into their systems, making it prohibitively difficult for workers to exert power at the negotiating table. It's in the name- it reduces competition. They should be banned entirely."
Rick	"There are plenty of legal recourses against employees who pirate 'Trade secrets'. Non-compete agreements are lazy bullying tactics that aim to suppress the workforce's ability to shop their talents throughout the market."
Cameron	"The non-compete clause makes it more difficult for physicians to practice medicine as they were trained and to the best of their ability. A non-compete can cause a physician to choose between staying in a bad job where they may feel that the standard of care is not upheld and moving their family to a new city. Physicians are leaders of the clinical team but increasingly have limited autonomy and say in the practice of medicine. Removing the non-compete would allow for greater physician input into patient care by means of doctors being able to "vote w/ their feet" and move to a new clinic."

Andrew	"I am in favor of banning non-compete clauses as it goes against free-market economics and hurts the country in the long-run."
SAMEH	"I support banning non compete for physicians as this will improve access and quality of care for patients. This rule mainly work at this point for the big companies who try to restrict physicians going to their competitors Lifting the restriction will help many areas with dire need for physicians who are forced to leave the area because of the enfocrd rule and the threat of suing physicians who will choose to stay in their area of preference."
Stephanie	"As a physician I believe non competes should be illegal. There is already a shortage of physicians in this country and it can make access in certain communities even more limited. I know physicians who had to stop working for 2 years be forced to relocate their families among other awful hardships. It should not be allowed in the medical and other fields. Limiting competition and creating monopolies in UnAmerica and should be banned."
Douglas	"I support the Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM)."
Anthony	"I fully support the abolition of restrictive covenants. Those covenants fly in the face of the free practice of medicine. They hurt not only the providers but the patients too. Should these restrictive covenants end quality of care will improve, access to providers will be simplified and the patient will be made more important and move more to the center of their care."
David	"Non-competes really give an employer the upper-hand over the employee. The document is presented upon being hired and really the employee is made to sign the document under duress, if you do not sign you will not be hired. The employer then has all of the control in the relationship. The employer can fire you or let you go for any reason, knowing that they have the noncompete in their back pocket. Often times the wording of these documents is so loose that they could prohibit a person from working within an industry they have worked in their entire career. Or to speak to people that they knew prior to joining said employer. In short noncompetes allow employers to treat their employees like garbage and the employee suffers in the long term. As an example, I've spent my career in the housewares manufacturing space . All of my professional connections are in this space. A company wants to hire a person because of the experience they bring with them. How is it fair that that employer can say you are no longer allowed to work in said industry when they are finished with you. Non competes are one-sided and benefit bad employers that do not care about their employees. Its predatory and unfair. In theory, I could hire an employee for their knowledge and have them sign a non-compete. As an employer that only cares about themselves, I could then let said employee go, for any reason, and know that I can hold that noncompete over their head. Its an example of being held down and not being able to do anything about it."

Brian	"Non-compete clauses should not be legal. It is outrageous for a company to be permitted to hold anyone's professional skills hostage because they have left their employment."
James	"I am wholeheartedly in support of the non-compete clause rule. A company can own trade secrets, but they do not own the skills of their employees, nor should they have any control over a past employee's career. The whole concept of non-compete clauses is absolutely insane to me. If a company doesn't want to lose a talented employee to a competitor, then that company should work towards making their working environment so good that those talented employees never want to leave. As opposed to what they're doing right now, which is treating the employees like garbage, then trying to prevent them from working for a competitor out of spite with a non-compete clause"
Raj	"Employee Physicians , just like any other employees are being hurt by the non competes. It is a way to create monopolies on the labor market as only one or two hospital systems exist in a given geographic area. It really hurts the employees as they have to relocate the family when the employment becomes unbearable. It does not affect hospitals as patients choose doctors as per insurance and affiliation with the health system. Most employee physicians such as ED, Hospitalist and Radiology, to name a few, do not have a panel of patients that would follow them."
Haresh	"As a physician I am full support of removing non compete clauses."
Gabriella	"Can you: (1) add a civil penalty for businesses trying to enforce non-competes of treble damages enforceable in any state or federal court for having non-competes, plus attorneys' fees and court costs; and (2) broaden the rule to include contracts between businesses?"
Isabelle	"I write in support of banning non-compete clauses. I'm a new physician , and as a resident, I've seen good doctors lose their jobs when the hospital was bought by a bigger one associated with another group (Dupont vs CHOP). The CHOP physicians employed by the hospital could not be rehired under Dupont due to the non-compete. It was heartbreaking and disruptive to patient care when this happened. Healthcare is constantly changing, and the job that we agreed to often looks different than what we signed up for. Non-competes are just a way to keep us chained, especially those who have bought a house, and have kids in school. Thank you for your consideration."
Katherine	"I am a family physician who is concerned with burnout and the loss of healthcare professionals from active practice. Non-compete clauses are extremely common in medicine and cause significant harm. Knowing I can't get another job in my field without moving or a long commute means I have suffered stagnant salaries, increasing productivity demands and increasingly bad outcomes for

	patients. That resulted, for me, in burnout and leaving primary care to work urgent care- a loss to a county where people are waiting 6 months to see a primary care doctor. If I had been able to leverage offers from other companies I would have had at least a little control- badly needed control in a system where big insurance companies own our practices and don't even put doctors names on the door. Please move forward with banning non-compete clauses which are unfairly putting all the control in the hands of the big companies."
Adrienne	"I fully support the dissolution of non-complete clauses in employee contracts. This is common practice in physician contracts is harmful to the employee physician, and their right to work. This is also detrimental general public health who would benefit from better access to qualified physicians."
Kristina	"This comment is submitted in support of eliminating non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses hurt workers and their families by forcing them to choose between uprooting their family to look for a better employment opportunity or staying in a job where they may be stagnating at best or suffering abuse at worst. Please eliminate non-competes."
Michael	"Restrictive covenants, also known as noncompete agreements, represent a unique piece of contract architecture that exists in many business fields and, to be fair, may have merit in certain circumstances. When applied to medical practice, however, these agreements can be particularly harmful. In the days when most practices were privately owned small businesses, noncompete agreements existed to protect an established practice from a partner or co- worker leaving and opening their own practice nearby. Now, however, as medical practices are increasingly owned by large hospital systems, the geographical boundary mapped out by these agreements makes it practically impossible for a physician to leave that system without completely uprooting their life or commuting long distances. For their part, hospital systems should focus more on creating an environment where physicians don't want to leave rather than on creating contract rules that make it difficult for them to do so. Such an approach seems particularly prudent during the current public health emergency, when health care professionals are being pushed to their limits as they balance their own health and that of their families with caring for patients stricken by COVID-19. After all, if we can agree that the patient should be the focus of our common mission in health care, should these noncompete agreements even still exist?"
Bryan	"Non-competes should be illegal since they only benefit the employer while simultaneously making life extremely difficult for the employee. The non- compete can be used coerce the employee into doing more work/hours than originally expected. The employee might feel compelled to deal with every beck and call because if they quit over it, they'll have to travel an excessive distance or pick a new career path because of the contract. If an employee does something illegal, they are liable for legal ramifications, but if they simply decide that they need a new place to work, they should be free to move on."

Kevin	"All professions should be included in this ruling against non-compete clauses, including medical professionals ."
Maxim	"I'm a physician with 23 years of experience in the US and I support the ban on the non-compete clauses. Thank you,"
Mr. Registered	"I am 100% in support of the FTC banning no compete contracts. I wholeheartedly agree with FTC determination that noncompetes stifle competition and therefore violate the Federal Trade Commission Act. I am currently employed by a regional health insurance plan in an administrative operating role . Upon accepting my role years ago, I had to sign a non-compete agreement. If I did not sign this document, I would not get the role I have worked so hard for. If I did sign it, I would be in my non-compete forever, yes, there is no end date on this organizations non-compete. So now I have basically two options, change the industry I have been employed in for over 25 yrs or find a lawyer. Both are very unrealistic and not fair to any employees. Thankfully, I am fairly happy at my current organization, but there will be a time in which I am going to have a very difficult decision to make. Allegheny County, in Pennsylvania is dominated by just two health care organizations. With that being said, unless the FTC does something to alleviate non-competes, I'll have to see an attorney when the time comes. Non-competes take the power away from the employee and essentially reduce their ability to provide for his/her family. Thank you for weighing in on this issue that affects so many!"
Aaron	"Love it, non-compete agreements stifle progress and limit employees significantly"
Aaron	"Non-competes are a hindrance to free trade. I would like to take my skills to another company but am restricted in my employment agreement. I will not share confidential business information with my future employer and I will not solicit employees or customers from my current employer. However, I am still barred from employment. This restriction stifles business expansion and my family's earning power."
Michael	"As a practicing physician , I strongly support the proposed rule and the elimination of non-compete clauses, particularly in medicine. Patients deserve to feel confident that they can have an individual relationship with the doctor of their choice near their home, regardless of that physician's current employer. The relationship is with the patient and the doctor, not the health system employer. There is no societal value to limiting a physician's ability to continue to serve the people of a certain area based solely on a disagreement between the health system employer and the physician employee. When I was applying for my first physician job after residency and fellowship, I wanted to serve the people of my hometown in rural upstate New York. The largest, near monopoly, health system, offered me a job, but the contract had a 13-county wide non-compete clause (well over a 100 mile radius). Essentially, if I had taken the job, I would have been locked into a contract that stated that if I wanted to practice medicine outside of that health system, I would have had to completely leave the region, a large portion of the entire state. In many ways that contact could essentially be understood as an agreement to not practice medicine in my community if I was not practicing under the employment of that system. I did not agree to that contract, but struggled to find other employment as the few other competitors in the region had very similar contract terms. These clauses severely limit the American people's access to quality physicians and healthcare in their regions. They create circumstances that enable near monopoly control of healthcare services by a very small number of entities in a region, artificially increasing healthcare costs and limiting patient access in most markets in the United States. Non-compete clauses are anti-competitive. They should be banned."

LuAnn	"Non-compete clauses are overused and should probably be banned altogether. They create hardship for many employees. My daughter was fired from a gymnastics gym because she wouldn't sign the non-compete clause for coaches who don't even make much money. And the clause didn't even follow the state regs about nc clauses! The owner ended up taking my daughter on as a sub at a higher rate and at daughter's schedule discretion!"
Alexis	"I am fully in favor of banning non-competes. I recently came across an article on the inquirer about a home care agency attempting to sue an entry level direct care worker who spoke no English for thousands of dollars. I also worked for that same agency and I also signed a non-compete. Although the non-compete was not enforced against me, I'm sure if I had went to an agency that was a true competitor my employer would have enforced the document preventing me from providing for myself and my family. I have potential candidates that I interview who want to leave this agency but are afraid of the backlash from signing a non-compete. There's a difference in having a clause that protects an organizations proprietary information and an agreement which restricts a professional with a specific skill set from moving on or excelling in their career. It's just a bad practice and it keeps the pockets of the rich full while those of us living modest lives lose our livelihood and ability to care for our families and pushes us back to ground zero to now either move outside of the confines of the contract or move into a new professional career which just doesn't seem realistic."
scott	"I would like to support removing of the non compete clauses. This employment tool for hospital systems has only negatively impacted me as a physician. I have left a small town in idaho over this because I could not seek other employment closer and I am stuck in my current position because of a non compete at this point I feel this negatively impacts patient care and the health system in general. This amounts to no more then a modern indentured servitude where we are tied to our current employer by force not by choice. Removal of this rule will only positively impact healthcare as a whole thanks "
HeatheR	"As a physician, non-compete clause are very harmful. When one wants to leave a job they often have to travel over an hour from home for several years. Often patients who want to stay with that provider than need to travel also."

Andy	"Non competes are unfair to worker as we are deprived of the opportunity to freely change jobs without a period of time where we have to obtain a temporary job to provide for our families until the non compete period has passed. I am directly affected by this situation and deeply unhappy in my current job, but fear of not being able to provide for my family or being taken to court by my current employer prevents me from moving on. These practices are cruel and unfair particularly to the middle class which is struggling more and more to make ends meet. Please outlaw the current practice on non competes. It offers nothing to the employee but everything to the employer"
Lelia	"Non-competes need to go. Employees of any company should not be forced to leave their homes just because they want to switch employers. Working for a company you are miserable in only leads to poor work performance. This in turn hurts productivity and innovation. In a free country we should at minimum be free to switch employers."
Debra	"I support making non compete clauses illegal, especially between physicians and large hospital systems. Noncompete clauses have deprived patients from receiving medical treatment and have prevented highly skilled physicians from practicing in areas of need."
elbert	"Pls amend this rule; it's corruption at its worst. A non-compete clause only helps the employer and doesn't protect the employee."
Patrick	"I am incredibly grateful that your organization has asked for public input on this. I am absolutely in favor of abolishing non-competes. My father signed a non-compete clause with a large health network (UPMC) that has a history of being vicious and difficult to work for. When he was let go he couldn't work anywhere within our county and had to get a job about 38 miles away. Non-competes hurt American workers, and they hurt the little guy. My father couldn't harm an organization that makes $15 billion dollars per year, but UPMC could hurt us (via a non-compete). Thank you for taking the time to listen."
arti	"I would recommend banning non-compete clause in contracts. I have needed to sign a noncompete clause contract with every employer I ever had. It does not make sense that big employers have this much control over employees."
Ketan	"It is a very good idea. I think ftc should also protect new owners buying existing business so that they are financially not hurt. Law must be somewhat flexible and not absolute"
Sam	" Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities."
Dustin	"I, Dustin Paul, DO, support REMOVING non-compete clause."

Joe	"Non competes should be illegal at this point in our country. We need to allow the employee to have some protection and some ability to move to a better life if they have the chance to acquire it. Let's not forget the American dream."
Andrew	"Recently tried to recruit a physician to our practice who was being terminated from his employer, but had a 10 mile restriction on joining any healthcare entity. This physician was retired from his outpatient practice and only seeing inpatients (in critical care). Our hospital was recruiting him to only see inpatients and is 11.2 miles from his hospital by car on google map but less than 10 miles on a map. Our region is very hilly. This employee would not have been drawing from his old hospital's patient panel as he only saw inpatients and he was terminated by them. In addition our group recently had to resign with our organization and have a 10 mile restriction (air miles) from employment with an healthcare entity for the initial term (3 yrs), plus 2additional. If we are terminated this continues for the full 5 years. Please put an end to these outrageous restrictions. I acknowledge a need for hospital's to protect their patient panel, but with a shrinking healthcare workforce we are struggling to recruit within our region and if terminated fumed to relocate our families and leave patients without a provider. Our attorney noted in conversation that the state legislature has a committee looking at this issue, but the larger healthcare entities use their lobbyists to keep it suppressed."
A	"Non competes stifle competition and should be illegal. This should absolutely include physician contracts as well. Medical institutions require leaving physician to go across town, often uprooting their families, to stifle competition and this should be an outlawed practice as it forces a physician to leave the community. Including physicians in this non compete allows them to continue serving their community."
Dr. Physician	"Hello, I am a physician practicing and living in rural PA. I recently had to find a new job. There is a competitor clinic less than a mile from my house. Instead of being able to work there, I now have to move 100 miles to another town in PA for a new job. I have to uproot my family. This has cost me over $5000 and countless hours cancelling rental contracts, movers, insurance, etc. I think non-compete clauses should be banned. The government needs to take care of its doctors. Business owners will have the ability to hire doctors regardless of their arguments. My new job made me sign another non-compete which, if I decide to leave, will basically ban me from working in the whole city to which I am moving. So, I can see another major move coining in the next 10 years. Having non-compete clauses decreases salary which when coupled with the high tax bracket that I am in, basically decreases my work satisfaction. Please ban non-compete clauses and give more rights to workers. Thank you so much, Physician."
Jeffery	"I fully support removing non-compete clauses from employer contracts. Simply stated it limits or eliminates completion for services; capitalism is built on a foundation of completion. By limiting workers from performing similar services for any given period of time in their chosen profession it perpetuates an environment that breeds substandard services from effected fields. This is direct opposition to the tenets that created strong business and strong industry for the nation. Limiting workers choices in any given area or profession is a recipe for substandard businesses to essentially make indentured servants out of workers who are left with few options in their chosen field. Let's make a return to the true spirit of a free market economy; where organizations and people are free to compete."

ELAINE	"I want to see non competes banned"
Erica	"Non-compete clauses are used by hospitals to keep physicians from seeking better employment. The situation effectively becomes indentured servitude. Please end the noncompete clause."
Madhusudhan	"agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage."
Robert	"Non-compete clauses not only ban workers from changing employers to improve their situation, they eliminate the need for the employers to compete with each other for employees. When an industry in general uses non-compete clauses, they are protecting each other from the need to attract employees by offering better pay, working conditions, etc. Thus non-compete clauses have two adverse impacts on workers, they keep them stuck in a job they want to leave and they allow employers to offer below-market compensation. I am completely in favor of rules that forbid non-compete clauses. Of note, many years ago I had a small business in a field that frequently used non-compete clauses. I purposefully did not include these in my contracts with employees, because I thought it was unfair. This actually did end up costing me business, but even so, I do not regret the decision."
Jose	"Please ban non-compete clauses. They are even used in medical training to prevent trainees from competing. They have proliferated massively in medicine and affect patient access."

Matt	"I believe this rule should be removed as I have been negatively affected by non-competes I signed which forbid me from working at specific companies even when that company didn't apply to my business unit. I was denied a position for a company that competed with a sister BU but not mine directly and the company that intended to give me an offer was afraid to hire me because they had their name on the list for a different BU. In addition, my current company has a non-compete that includes a company with multiple BUs and I am trying to get a job at a company for a role that is not directly competing with my current position which is focused on a specific industry. I will not be working in that industry in the new role but the company I am interviewing with is skittish about the non-compete and considering dropping my application because of this. The reason seeking new employment is that current company is not keeping up with market rates for m my line of work. I asked them for a raise last year based on positive performance metrics and they denied it saying that my pay was in line with the market. However, during my job search it is apparent that my position in similar companies would pay me 15-20% more than I currently am being paid. In both cases the non-compete did exactly what the FTC is claiming they do- stifle wages and prevent career advancement. ."
Robert	"I support the banning of non-compete clauses in general and realize business executives and leaders will object to it completely, so I recommend a compromise. Non-compete clauses for individuals making less than $400,000 per year should be unlawful unless the individual is fully compensate, with full health benefits, for the full period stated in the clause. Full compensation includes all bonuses and equity awards that would vest during the period specified in the non-compete clause."
Nikki	"I am against non-competes. I wanted to climb the proverbial career ladder- and I finally made it to Director level only to be slapped with a non compete. The non compete has knocked my mental health as I feel like I have no options. Healthcare is all I have ever worked in and now I work for the largest health insurer with nowhere to turn- I'm now middle aged, the sole provider for my family looking down the road with very limited options. The non- compete had me completely deflated. When applying to other jobs the application questions usually ask if I have a non-compete- and I respond in the affirmative. When I was originally given my offer I had accepted the job- then the next day I received additional paperwork which had included the non- compete. I felt it was all a slight of the hand. I don't ever want to sign a non compete. I believe it makes emoliyees feel powerless, makes me feel like I've limited my future prospects, it only benefits the employer. The far reaching provisions feel as though I've been handcuffed. There is also another issue- if you want to keep what is rightfully yours -something you've earned- like stocks, you are then even more so locked into a non compete. It's absolutely ridiculous and the practice needs to stop."
MARK	"Completely banning Noncompete clauses is not good for businesses, or for that matter employees. If Noncompete agreements (NCA) are banned, company secrets walk out the door, hurting the business. At the business side, the business will further restrict the business trade secrets employees have access to,

	restricting their ability to contribute to the business and do their job. I suggest a 2 part solution. 1) NCAs will only be allowed for officers of the company. Not worker bees or lower managers. 2) NCAs would be allowed, but for the period of time following employment the agreement covers, the company must continue to pay the officer full salary, benefits, bonuses and raises S/he would have been entitled to (if employment had continued) during the time following employment. This ensures the departing employee does not suffer economic nun, and also safeguards business secrets. If the trade secrets are as valuable as the business believes, this is a very small price to pay. A potential 3rd point might be, if the departing employee accepts a new job at a non competing firm at a substantial pay cut, the employee would continue to receive the benefits listed above, but assign the new lower wages to the original business for the time remaining in the original NCA."
Stephanie	" Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am in full support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. I work in Human Resources, specifically Employee Relations. The main reason I ended up in this field is because I want to do my part to make the work environment a positive one for employees and managers, which in turn will lead to more positive experiences for customers. Instead of forcing employees to stay at a job through noncompetes, we should be providing great pay, benefits, and leadership to encourage workers to stay with their current employer. Everyone knows that turnover is a huge cost to any organization, but limiting career opportunities for your employees is not the answer; creating an amazing workplace is. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Adam	"Physicians should be included in any ban on non-competes"
David	"As a privately employed physician I fully support banning non-compete clauses in physician contracts. Doing so will support proper physician compensation, fairer treatment of does, and be less life disruption if physicians change jobs."
Rebecca	"Non compete clauses are unethical. Both myself and my husband have been offered jobs in our profession with non compete clauses that say we promise not to work in our (specialized) field within a year of leaving the job or we can't work independently in addition to the job. It makes sense a company doesn't want you to actively draw business away from them by advertising your services directly to their customers, but telling an employee you simply can't find work is unduly exploitive. If jobs don't want to face competition or a loss of talent, they should offer the best services and employment standards so that competition is inherently deterred rather than relying on cuffing their employees with such unfair practices."
Kevin	"Non Competes are always predatory and anti worker. There is never a case where the public at large benefits from Non Competes. It is a horrible way for a company that no longer has any claim to the effort and abilities of a worker, lock them from moving to another company, hobbling that worker's opportunities for the malicious benefit of their previous employer."

Joseph	"This is a common sense decision that will immediately improve the lives of working Americans. Non-competes have been abused by employers for too long. Many people covered by these agreements are in low wage positions. All this serves to do is hurt middle and low wage workers at the expense of employers."
John	"I sold my real estate business on June of last year thinking that by binding together we could accomplish much more than each of us separately. I signed a non-compete clause and now I regret it. I am treated very unfairly and my hands are tied. Before the sale I was a top performer. I finished last year with it being my worst in almost 20 years. I feel like they purchased my business to shut me down so that their team could prosper, which they did. Please rule that non-compete clauses to be illegal so I get out of this situation. Thank you. You are welcome to please reach out to me for any questions."
Mark	"I am all for banning non compete agreements. Non compete agreements are detrimental to worker compensation. My wife's company required her to sign a non compete before she started work and it is an abuse of power. There are no trade secrets to disclose, it is simply there to force her to stay with that company and promote stagnant wages."
Debby	"It is important to end this rule for most jobs. People need to be able to move freely from employer to employer, especially in low paying jobs. Having liberal non-compete clauses benefits employers to coerce employees to stay in untenable positions. People need to have the freedom to change jobs when they think it is necessary."
Cher	"I work for an agri-business and was forced to sign a non-compete several years ago. It would ban me from working for any competitor or supplier for two years. I have extremely limited access to confidential information and have already signed a confidentiality agreement that would cover that concern. This prevents competition by impeding my ability to freely sell my labor, talents, and experience."
Nadeem	"Excellent initiative. Hospital CEOs of non profit organizations making millions while MDs & CRNAs are being restricted with draconian non compete clause. Non compete must end"
Michael	"Non completes should be eliminated to help workers that help run the U.S. Economy. It limits a workers ability to find a better opportunity."
Carla	"Thank you for this. These practices are widespread in the health care industry , and result in hurting patients, who often cannot afford the time or money to travel and follow their practitioner to another practice. I have been subject to these over the years, and am glad someone realizes how deleterious they are to healthcare."
Hannah	"I support the banning of non-competes. Being a dermatology Physician Assistant this has hindered my ability to switch jobs in my local market. You are forced with the decision of leaving town or forcing yourself to stay at a job that doesn't make you happy for one reason or another."

Elizabeth	"I read about this proposal from the Philadelphia Inquirer. A health care aide was sued by her employer for following her patient when he moved to another agency. As a health care aide myself, this is a very common occurrence, and not only should the aide be allowed to continue caring for her client, but she should be protected from a lawsuit from her previous employer. I realize that she signed a contract, but even if she had known the full ramifications of quitting to work for another agency, and the potential for being sued, she might have still signed the contract. In this case, because the welfare of her client was a priority, along with her paycheck, the entire concept of limiting someone like her to a geographic area and with a term limit puts an undue burden on both the client and the aide. The basic human need for dignity and welfare is entirely compromised with a contract like this, written with greed and intimidation underlying it's content."
Michelle	"This is long overdue, especially for hospital workers, physicians and other staff . It is harmful to the public at large to not have physicians be able to work at surrounding sites that may be in need."
Samantha	"Non-compete clauses need to go. They hinder a healthy workforce, and do nothing to encourage competitive wages. They serve only to restrict the rights of the people being paid to work for the company."
Randall	"Do not regulate physicians employment options. Non competes affect people's ability to seek care and adequate availability. There is no reason physicians should be excluded from this law. None whatsoever"
Kyle	"I feel that the non-compete clause in medicine hurts the patient and allows to the employer to have more power/control over the staff with non-compete. Removing non-compete clauses will increase freedom of medical providers , make the employers treat their staff better and increase free market drive and access to care. I feel that it should not be legal to have this type of monopoly allowed in the medical field."
Bogdan	"Literally in the middle of this now. I left my old company because I HATED my boss and my pay was being dropped. My friend also had his pay dropped so he left also! My old company heard chatter of people comparing so they threatened with the non compete and used scare tactics to get people to stay! Instead of people improving their lives AND income, they are being forced to work somewhere they don't want to! Is this a form of abuse? I think so!"
A	"Non-compete agreements have become increasingly mandatory as a condition of employment in many sectors. This runs afoul of the basic tenets of the free market and imposes undue burden on the individual's right to contract"

Dr. Russell	"Non-competes should be outlawed as a restriction of freedom & gives too much power to corporations over the individual."
Ruth	"Non compete rule takes away individual's freedom of choice. Corporations should not have this power over an individual."
Debasmita	"Would like to see this apply to physicians too."
Miss	"I am for the new law making non- competes illegal. I am a recent Nurse Practitioner graduate looking for employment. I have declined positions requiring non-competes, in PA regions that are in need of providers. I believe non-competes are harmful to communities in need of providers, and further increase Healthcare disparity."
Sandra	"I recently read with interest that the Federal Trade Commission is proposing a new rule that would ban employers from imposing non-compete clauses on their workers. I have been a veterinarian for 30 years and within that time frame I have both signed contracts with non competes as well as required employee doctors to sign contracts with non compete clauses. The standard reason why a veterinarian would have a non compete in their contract would be so that they do not open a clinic right down the road and " steal" clients. Veterinary medicine has changed significantly in the last 30 years. The profession struggles with supply of enough veterinarians to meet the demand of clients. Corporate ownership of veterinary practice has become almost the norm. Specialty veterinary medicine has become a much more significant part of veterinary medicine as well. There are a large number of pet owners that are willing and able to pay for specialty care. Corporate ownership of specialty practices in particular has reduced the likelihood of new hospitals opening within the same area as there are too few specialists to assume that they will be able to hire from outside the area. While the specialty hospital may be owned by different corporations, compensation and treatment of employees and costs to clients are similar between them. Some specialties in particular have a very small number of veterinarians board-certified in their specialty. Corporate specialty hospitals are more likely to have and enforce aggressive non-competes that will assure that a specialty veterinarian has to leave the city that he or she is practicing in if he is no longer happy working at the specialty practice. This is unfair to the specialist as well as limits competition from independently owned specialty practices that could give owners more of a choice in where they want to seek specialty care. Prices may be higher at the corporate veterinary hospitals because they have a significant management chain of people off site that need to be compensated as opposed to a smaller independent specialty hospital where all the money is retained locally. I believe these restrictive non compete clauses suppresses wages, hampers innovation, and blocks entrepreneurs from starting new businesses as stated by the FTC. It prevents a professional who has invested a significant amount of money in his/her training from moving to different hospitals within the same city and they are forced to move their family to somewhere else entirely or continue an employment in which they are unhappy."

Priya	"There should be no exceptions for doctors to the removal of non competes. Our lives/families deserve just as much consideration as anyone else's."
Louis	"Employers have used the non compete clause/contract as a hindrance to employees success. I have a marketable skill, I must benefit from the open market. In addition, employers use their timing to take advantage of those afraid to speak up upon hiring. Thanks for your consideration"
Jacob	"As a future podiatrist , I know from many of my friends the anticompetitive nature of non-compete clauses. They force us into unfair contracts and give us little recourse to leave our current position and force us to move somewhere else. Non-competes are also used by practices that have offices all across the state. For example, there is a large practice in the state of New Jersey with offices everywhere. Guess what happens if you try to leave the practice: you are forced to leave the state of New Jersey. That's despicable!"
Carol	"Please ban employers from doing Non-compete clauses. Employees, workers, and entrepreneurs should be able to work for whoever wishes to employ their services. Medical Doctors should be allowed to move to other opportunities without moving far away. It gives unfair advantage and control to the Employer."
Michael	"I understand that the FTC is considering a ban on "non-compete clauses" in employment contracts. After thinking about it a bit, I can see these restrictions as a form of serfdom, it not outright slavery. A person who is doing well in a job; but wants to advance themselves cannot leave to do so. That is he is tied to his place of employment. Serfs under Czarist rule could not leave without the permission of their lord (known then as a Boyer). What's the difference? The American revolution threw off colonial mercantilism, encouraging innovation and competition and in less than a century became the world's largest economy. A position that allowed us to win two World Wars against almost overwhelming military enemies. Why would anyone want to allow these gag rules to restrict our economic growth? It is clearly in the country's best interest to ban these restrictions."
Jack	"I have read the proposed rule regarding non-compete clauses, and would like this chance to make some comments. In short, I fully support this proposed rule, and believe it is essential to establish the principles outlined as soon as possible. As a medical physician , I have been on "both sides" of the situation, as an employer for many years, and as an employee for the past eight years. In both instances, I believed that non-compete clauses were unfair, and detrimental to physicians and patients. In today's world of employed physicians, this is an even greater problem. Large healthcare organizations exercise tremendous power, and now frequently use non-compete clauses to restrict a physician from practicing their profession. One excuse often provided is the "investment" made in the development of someone's medical practice. This is a weak reason, and not one that should be used to allow such clauses. If an organization is able to offer quality healthcare, then it should never be a problem if one particular physician leaves but practices in the same geographic area. The only real reason for these clauses relates to control, and ability to force other terms on a physician. There should be no exceptions in the case of any healthcare worker, whether a physician, nurse, or advanced practice provider. I am very pleased to read this proposed rule, and hope to soon see its enactment."

Alexander	"I firmly support the FTC's proposed change to non-compete clauses. While originally developed for high level executives with potential trade secrets, it has extended far beyond where it should. As a veterinary resident , I am matched to a program with no opportunity to negotiate a contract. As a result, many of us begin 3+ year residencies where we are forced to sign non-compete clauses or lose out on our hard-fought-for spot. After making our home in a new location for 3+ years, we then often have to uproot our families because our non-compete clauses cover all the other hospitals in the area. This leaves hospitals in the area without residency programs to have more difficulty filling their openings and it leads residents to having less bargaining power, both not beneficial situations for the free commerce that is so vital to our country"
Elizabeth	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. Before I retired, my company had a broad non-compete agreement that seemed to read as though it was impossible to get a different local job in my field (IT) and my industry (Insurance and Financial services). So nothing I had studied and no prior experience that I had could helped me get a different job near where I lived. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Abraham	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, As a 32 year old software engineer , I've had my fair share of experience with non-compete contracts, and let me tell you, they're not pretty. These agreements can feel like shackles on the mind and career. They limit our mobility and flexibility as professionals, preventing us from exploring new opportunities and taking on different roles within our field. And where's the fun in that? We should be able to spread our wings and fly, not be tethered to one employer for fear of legal repercussions. But it's not just about our individual growth, non- compete contracts can have a negative impact on the entire industry. They stifle competition and innovation, restricting the flow of talent and ideas between companies. Can you imagine a world where the same people and the same ideas stayed put? Boring, isn't it? In short, non-compete contracts are bad for everyone. They hold us back, both as individuals and as an industry. We deserve better then that. agreements."
Lori	"Non-compete clauses are unethical and create an inequity between the employer and the employee. Often these clauses can restrict employees from working at all in their geographic area even in situations where there is significant demand for medical providers in primary care fields. I strongly feel that they should be illegal.

	Unfortunately even in situations where one would deem them "unenforceable" the new employer is often afraid to fight the battle and may not make a job offer."
John	"I've been a business owner for over 40 years, I've been an angel investor in startups and a coach/consultant to growing companies. I have never seen an instance where a non-compete clause was beneficial to the overall economy or to innovation. I applaud your proposal to eliminate them. It will benefit the American workers and the economy as a whole."
Mike	"The need for this regulation is best visualized by imagining the "perfect" no-complete clause. In a perfect world (as viewed by a small, very wealthy minority), over 90% of jobs would require such a clause. The clause would prohibit alternate employment of any kind, even self-employment, within an unlimited area, for an unlimited time. In short, most workers would be forced to "consent" to chattel slavery by some owner, even if they had some small range of options in which contract to sign. The government overseeing and enforcing those contracts would be in flagrant denial of the 13th and 14th Amendments, not to mention basic humanity and common sense. Given that some regulatory limit to these clauses is needed, the next question to ask is where that may be. To read that 20% of employees are subject to them is already quite shocking. The intent clearly appears to be to keep them working for employers they do not prefer, due to the practical difficulty of moving for ordinary people. That effect differs from the "perfect" scenario only in degree. Critics of your proposal may say that intrusive rules should be enacted by legislation rather than regulation. However, this is anything but an intrusive rule. Its effect is to prevent public resources and public coercion from being misapplied toward private, non-competitive purposes that severely constrain the rights and lifestyle of the ordinary citizen. I believe the current economic situation makes it very important to pass this regulation without delay. The country is facing a serious crisis from inflation, due in large part to lack of genuine competition in the marketplace. Even though your proposal may tend to raise employee wages by promoting competition between employers, it should be obvious that allowing some 20% of workers to change jobs immediately, without moving from state to state, will reduce the level of "structural" unemployment. That should providing an immediate infusion of job candidates into the economy, comparable to increasing the unemployment rate by the same quantity, but without the associated social costs. With faster job transfers, employees should be able to compete for higher wages _and_ companies should be more capable of entering new markets and offering cheaper products. This win-win combination should help to tame inflation the way that most people want to see it tamed -- by pressuring company leadership and investors to accept reduced profits. That in turn should have an effect comparable to raising interest rates, making bonds more attractive relative to other forms of investment, but without creating inflationary pressure by increasing the financial needs of mortgage payers. Please follow the lead of several states and move forward with this measure to restore the right to work to all Americans."
Audrey	"I oppose non-compete agreements. They do not apply to most jobs. They only serve to obstruct freedom of movement in the United States. Companies used health care to hinder a person's ability to change jobs. Now that that is no longer possible, companies seek to indenture employees by use of these 'agreements'. The non-competes restrict labor markets and give an unfair advantage to the employer. People are not free to seek a better life for themselves and their families"

Michael	"I would like to comment on the Non-Compete Clause Rule(NPRM) I was a part owner of an agency for 13 years without a Non-Compete or Restrictive Covenant, In March of 2019 our agency sold out to another agency, without any Non-Compete or Restrictive Covenant. On April 1, 2022 the owner sold out to a Company and we were pretty much told that we needed to sign this restrictive Covenant or not have a job. I complained that why should they restrict me on my having 16 years worth of clients, whereby if I left I would not even be able to speak with a current client. I did leave to go to another agency on April 2023. I was reminded of the Covenant'Non-compete and advised by them that I could possibly be sued if I ad any further relationship with a client. I have attached a copy of the covenant for your perusal. I think it is extremely invasive for my future earning Thanks."
Vik	"Please implement this at the earliest. Non-compete are fundamentally wrong and limit and individuals freedom and liberty and makes a worker a slave in essence. This rule should apply across to board to all employer, small, large, for profit or not for profit (frequently used as shield)."
chuck	"Please BAN non-compete clauses."
Ruth	"It is simply wrong for businesses no matter their size to force employees to sign papers which disallow them from working for other companies that have a similar business if they choose to leave. Those "rules" should never have been permitted by the FTC, the Dept. of Labor. or anyone else. How that was allowed to creep into all kinds of businesses is not clear, but it needs to stop. It condemns people, particularly in small markets to keep working for an employer under terrible conditions at lousy wages. It just needs to stop completely. Now, if someone takes a company secret elsewhere (not too likely), then they can be sued for stealing information. That is a different story altogether. So, make these ridiculous non-compete parts of a contract gone."
Jay	"Don't listen to the lobbyists! Get rid of noncompetes. How can they really say they support a free market and continue to fight against the market truly being free?"
Jessica	"As a physician , I want non-compete clauses removed from physician contracts. This change allows doctors to choose to remain in a community where patients know and depend upon them, while also standing up for themselves as employed individuals."
Christopher	"I am a Pennsylvania resident living in Erie County. I support any effort to ban non-compete agreements. I worked as a vehicle salesperson prior to and during

	the Covid lockdowns. With the dealership being closed due to state Covid regulations, and lack of inventory due to national car shortage, I experienced a large reduction in pay. I began to search for another job, and was informed by my employer that the hire paperwork I signed years ago included a non compete agreement. The document prohibited me from working as a vehicle sales person for 24 months within a 50 mile radius of the dealership I currently worked for. This put me in a financially difficult position. I was not making the money I was used to, and was not able to take my skill set elsewhere. I could not afford to move, nor did I have the desire to. After speaking to former employees of the dealership, I was told that my employer would jump at the opportunity to pursue legal action if his noncompete was not respected. My position at the dealership did not involve working with proprietary information in any way. This cost me the opportunity to take employment options that would be more lucrative and not require a 100 mile round trip daily commute. I do not believe I was compensated in any way in return for signing the noncompete agreement. In effect, I was forced to enter a new field of work or accept lower pay in comparison to similar business. As a citizen, taxpayer, and employee, I do not believe noncompete agreements benefit employees. I believe they do benefit employers, because it gives them leverage over their employees to keep them in uncompetitive earning ranges by removing their opportunity to move to a more competitive employee. Thank you for reading."
Steven	"I'm an anesthesiologist. I think non-competes are anti competitive and punitive and drive down local wages. They exploit vulnerable populations that cannot work elsewhere. They prevent people from leaving a bad job because eventually you get entrenched in a neighborhood and it's very difficult to leave. Please eliminate this ridiculous clause from being possible."
Bethany	"I believe non-compete clauses contribute greatly to work place dissatisfaction, reduce work ethic, reduce learning and expansion within a field by limiting an employees learning opportunities, and may ultimately reduce local economy in a community because of dissatisfaction of employees."
Damian	"As a current medical student and future physician, the AHA's attempts at creating an exemption for physicians in regards to eliminating non-competes directly impacts the availability of patient care, increases system consolidation, oppresses competition, and drives specialists away from underserved areas. The only benefit to exempting physicians is to healthcare system shareholders and executive compensation."
Tatjana	"I am absolutely for banning non-competes. I am a physician with a young family that doesn't want to move. It is forcing people to stay in the hostile, toxic practices and be miserable."
Dennis	"I support the elimination of all non-compete restrictions for all workers. It has long hampered creativity and innovation as well suppressing earning potential for millions."

Ed	"After being subjected to noncompetes myself over the years. This is one of the best things I have seen, to counteract such limitations allowing individuals to advance and further their careers instead of being stuck in situations where they have no other options but to stay. Great Idea!!"
Emily	"I believe that non-compete clauses should not be allowed. As a physician , non-compete clauses are prevalent in my field and restrict doctors for moving from toxic work environments or re-negotiating terms and this hurts patient care."
Perry	"It is truly appalling that an employer can punish a former employee by suing them for gaining beneficial employment and continuing to employ their skills in the same industry. Treating employees like slaves should be illegal, and refusing to allow people to find gainful employment outside of an abusive employer is beyond the pale and only serves to embolden the malice of the wealthy."
Steve	"Non competes are used as leverage by employers against their employees. It makes it very hard for someone to make a living when a n/c is in effect. You can take a job with a company while not in violation and if that company expands its operations and becomes a violation, what are you supposed to do? I'm all for banning non competes on every level."
Mark	"I strongly support the proposed rule. Non compete clauses have been routinely included in physician employment contracts for many years and have been used to abuse employed physicians. A frequent scenario is where a young physician joins a group after completing training and is promised specific hours, working conditions, advancement to partnership which induced him/her to accept the position. When these promises turn out to be false, the physician is left with the unfair and unsatisfactory options of just putting up with the situation or relocating his family out of the area to avoid being sued for violation of the restrictive covenant. This practice has become more onerous in recent years as a result of hospital system mergers and purchase of independent physician practices by these hospital systems. These systems have imposed much more stringent restrictive covenants in their contracts in terms of geographic area and duration, and now often include financial penalties if the physician violates the restrictive covenant. Most young physicians have little choice but to work for a hospital system at this point, and are not in a financial position to defend a lawsuit brought by a large entity. If restrictive covenants were not allowed, the systems employing physicians would be incentivized to treat them fairly because of the potential of the physician leaving to work for a local competitor if treated poorly."
Michael	"Please prohibit the non-complete clause. The practice is hurting lots of workers and undermined the basic principles of free enterprise. It is outrageous that employers can require their workers to sign such a clause. Please rule against this practice."
Rayman	"Non-Compete clauses are a deterrent to individuals being able to change jobs to better themselves. Although some clauses may be very limited and are reasonable, most are overly broad and restrict legitimate movement of workers."

	Reasonable ones are the exception. Workers have no choice but to sign them as there is no possibility of bargaining over the scope and length of the restrictions."
Charlotte	"I don't think employers should be able to hold this over any employee There is so many good people stuck at jobs and can't move up or better themselves"
Brian	"I strongly support the proposed change in eliminating non-compete clauses from employment contracts. I am a resident physician nearing completion of my training and beginning searching for jobs. It is very stressful knowing that if things do not work out with my first employer (as frequently occurs with early career physicians) that I would need to move my family out of state in order fmd a different employer."
Anthony	"I support the proposed rule. As a primary care physician who is contractually employed by a large health system, I have seen the shortage of primary care physicians worsen because of non compete clauses in our contracts. When employment conditions worsen for burned out front line health care providers, they have little choice but to move far away from their long time patients which hurts patient care. Large corporate health systems wield non competes like a gun to keep employees hostage."
Mark	"If not competes are still going to be allowed, the employers should be required to pay full salary for the time of the non-compete. Why should it be the employee who suffers? Plus, often the non competes are unnecessary and vastly over broad."
Charlie	" Physicians should NOT be excluded in any way. We are workers like everyone else and deserve equal protection. Any argument made by big hospital are just to under pay us. We deserve freedom like everyone else."
Dominique	"Please take away non compete so independent contractors can compete and earn a living wage. Licensed independent clinical Social workers are being forced to sign these clauses so big companies like Walmart and Teladoc can monopolize the Telehealth market and squeeze small solo providers out even though theses small community integrated providers have been serving the community for years."
David	"Stop hospital greed and allow PHYSICIANS TO PRACTICE MEDICINE!!!!"
Michelle	"It should not be legal to have a non-compete clause. I work 7 miles from my work and have a non-compete clause for 25 miles for 2 years. My family lives in the region, so it is very inconvenient if I want another job in the local region."
Scott	"As a person that works in a field that requires non compete clauses I can say without a doubt it is used to hold us back. They use it to keep us with them and not have to increase our salary. It's has nothing to do with us using our knowledge against them but rather to control us. The same reason companies don't want unions in our country anymore. The companies want to keep us as poor as possible so they have control. Put an end to this unjust action and free up our country."

Matt	"I am a physician working for a large health system and in favor of eliminating non-compete clause in our contracts. It should also apply to nonprofits that are owned and run by for profit insurance companies. Eliminating the clause will help preserve the patient-physician relationship and ensure continuity of care. It would be a "win" for the patients we serve. There are no trade secrets that would be lost in the health care sector."

lisa	"Non-Compete agreements are contractual slavery! My child was offered full-time position upon completing college internship. Naively she signed non- compete without legal representation. In the beginning she enjoyed work which gave her confidence to buy house and get married. Employer slowly changed terms of contracts, service area, and reimbursements. Methodically they began to schedule long work hours, biweekly on-call requirements to perform services at hospitals across (2) states. Reducing her to 4-days off in a 4week period. Human resources and Legal team boasted of iron-clad contracts when she complained about work conditions. Deterioration of mental and physical health eventually forced her to quit. Employer then demanded S25K reimbursement for breaking contracts, or 55% of her already reduced 545K salary.  That non-compete left her unable to use education and/or certification to find a new job in 5-states. The entire state of New Jersey and 55miles outside any PA, or, NJ hospital she serviced during employment. She was forced to retain a lawyer. Dissolving contracts took months and employer brazenly withheld final expenses. Her career suffered. No longer actively logging required hours to maintain certification while working in similar field for less money. In her tenure 3-fellow employees had same story. Non-Compete agreements are contractual slavery! Stop this practice. FOR GOOD - FOR ALL."
Dennis	"I have never been able to understand a non-compete clause for any physician in any employment situation. I disagree with non-compete clauses completely"
Afnan	"To Whom It May Concern, Non-compete agreements make it very difficult for employees to maintain and switch jobs. It's not fair to be forced to not be able to work for a competitor for a set amount of time as living expenses (especially without a job) are difficult. Even getting a temporary job unrelated to the non-compete is not helpful as it does not allow a prospective employee to gain meaningful experience the same way a full time job does. In spite of these challenges, how does one define the criteria of a non compete? Merely switching from one job to another in the same industry does not necessarily mean the new company the employee gains employment at is a competitor. The upsides to abolishing non-competes are many. These include employees being able to work on their passion projects outside of work, furthering innovation. This is actually how Jobs and Wozniak started Apple while working at Hewlett-Packard. If there was a non-compete stopping them, Apple would not exist today. The other upsides include far more opportunities for prospective hires as they do not have to wait to apply and get a new job in the same industry. Please abolish non-compete agreements as they restrict talent and make industries less competitive."

James R	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Mausumi	"Hospital non-competes hurt the patients and populations that desperately need care! Expand the language to include non-profit hospitals!"
Ashad	"Here are a few ways in which non-compete clauses can negatively affect physicians working at non-profit organizations: Limited Career Mobility: Non-compete clauses can limit physicians' career mobility and their ability to seek out better job opportunities, even when working for a non-profit organization. This can be particularly problematic for physicians who are passionate about serving a specific patient population or working in a particular field of medicine, as they may be unable to pursue other opportunities in those areas if they are bound by a non-compete agreement. Reduced Access to Care: Non-compete clauses can also limit patients' access to care, even when provided by non-profit organizations. If a physician is the only provider in a certain geographic region or for a certain patient population, patients may have to travel long distances to receive care if the physician is bound by a non-compete agreement and cannot practice in the area. Negative Impact on Health Outcomes: Non-compete clauses can negatively impact health outcomes for patients, even those receiving care from non-profit organizations. If patients have limited access to care due to non-compete clauses, they may delay seeking medical attention, which can lead to worsened health outcomes. Reduced Compensation: Non-compete clauses can also limit physicians' earning potential, even when working for non-profit organizations. Physicians who are bound by non-compete agreements may be unable to negotiate higher salaries or benefits, as they have limited options for pursuing other job opportunities. It is important for the FTC to address these concerns and take action to limit the use of non-compete agreements in the healthcare industry, in order to protect the rights of physicians and their patients."
Omar	"This is a wonderful initiative, that needs to continue and must be enforced to ensure a proper free market that is fair towards the workers"

Andrea	"As a physician , it is very hard to change jobs. I would have to leave my family or move my entire family to another metro area. The cost is so great that it promotes stagnation, burnout, unhappy employees, and unmotivated employers. A free market should allow employees to change jobs when it's best for them, without the undue burden of relocating an entire household. Employers who are listening to their workforce and creating good working conditions do not have to worry about excessive turnover. Employers who have abusive labor practices shouldn't be allowed to trap skilled practitioners and hold them hostage in their own towns."
Steve	"I strongly support the proposed rule to ban non-competes. I am currently unemployed due to being prevented from starting a business or working in my industry (in technical/engineering services) under the threat of legal action from a former employer. While working for the employer, I had no access to any sort of company secrets or sensitive information and believe the non-compete I had to sign to work for the company is entirely unenforceable. Yet, my former employer has made it clear that they are willing and able to force me into a costly legal battle if I attempt to work in my industry in any capacity for the next year, a tactic that also intimidates current employees from leaving the company. I've personally seen this tactic used to lock employees into their current company under threat of legal retaliation if they want to leave and remain in the industry. Enforceable and unenforceable non-competes have both caused, and continue to cause, massive harm to American workers by preventing free and fair mobility and competition. Very few workers can afford to fight a legal battle against a former employer or wait a year or more without working in their industry of choice. Employers should not be able to retain employees by intimidation or by threatening legal action and devastating financial harm to their workers."
Donald	"This is long overdue. There are no trade secrets in medicine. Noncompete clauses are intended to make it onerous to leave employment, rendering them somewhat indentured servants. I fully support this rule, and applaud your efforts."
Donald	"I am strongly in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses for physicians . All physicians practice medicine. There are no trade secrets. No-competes are used as an economic cudgel to have physicians accept less than comfortable work conditions, because the social, professional and economic burden of changing employment, due to the non-compete, is too great. Hospital systems want physicians as serfs, limited in their ability to move off the land, rather than employees."
Mark	"I support the ban for non-compete agr"
Randall	"Ban noncompetitive agreements"
O	"I am a physician , and because of the noncompete I signed in Pennsylvania, I have to basically move to another city for a new job. I should not have to uproot my entire life just to get a new job. Thanks. We need to get rid of non competes so that physicians can have rights."

Arthur	"I am in favor of the government making it illegle to enter into or maintain non-compete clauses. I work in medicine and I believe non-competes adverse affect patient care. Patients develop a relationship with their physician and if a physician leaves a health system, they often have to go many miles away making it difficult or impossible for the patient to maintain a relationship with that physician. Many large hospital systems use non-competes to obtain a predatpry monopoly on physician services that is unfair to the physicians and not in the best interest of patient care"
Manju	"Restrictive covenants and non competes for physicians are inherently unfair. This adversely impacts patient care and exacerbates clinician shortages. They need to be outlawed."
Amy	"Non compete clauses should be removed from physician contracts. Having them in place has the potential, for competing hospitals, to lock in lowers pay rates in a local area which is unfair to the physicians. Non compete clauses could also cause inability to staff underserved hospitals."
Amanda	"I am a mental health counselor (licensed professional counselor in Pennsylvania). The company I work for Springfield Psychological, made me sign a non- compete. The non-compete says, among other things, that I can't work for another company that offers mental health services within 7 miles of my office. (It initially said 10, but I negotiated down to 7.) I am a 1099 contractor, and when I first started, the company paid me 50% of the insurance rate for each session with a client. However, they refused to give me the total rate the insurance company paid, so I essentially didn't know what I was making until I received my monthly paycheck. They have since changed this, and I now receive a flat rate for each session. I have learned through the grapevine that new hires are making up to $20 more per session than I am. I am trying to figure out how to get out of this contract, as the working conditions aren't good. I am constantly thinking through different scenarios in my head, trying to figure out if this job opportunity or that one will keep me from being sued. Additionally, the contract I signed says that I can't take clients from Springfield Psychological with me to a new job. From what I understand, this is not enforceable, as clients get to decide where they will attend therapy. However, when I was hired, HR told me that the company would likely not enforce the non-compete unless I "took" clients from Springfield Psychological with me to a new job. Essentially, the company is using the non-compete to pressure therapists to not inform clients of their choice in treatment location. I am in favor of ending the non-compete, as it has negatively affected me."
Seth	"I am in strong support of the proposed rule change. As a speech-language pathologist who trains SLP students in an educational setting, many of our students go in to work in private practices after graduation. And, many are forced to sign non complete clauses that force them to stay working at places that devalue, under compensate, and under support them. Removing this barrier directly supports worker rights, increasing equity."

Diane	"Please change this rule that forces people who are geographically limited to stay in unhappy positions.... Recognizing that there are some situations where employees may abuse having a nearby competitor as an alternative workplace, more commonly non-competes in medicine do not protect large health systems who are unaffected by a physician leaving, but are a constant unspoken threat to physicians looking for better pay, benefits, or even a move into a leadership role that is not available."
Brenton	"I am for abolishing noncompete clauses."
Nathan	"Put an end to this please!!"
Michael	"As a resident physician about to start my first job as an attending physician in a few months, I can tell you how as I went through the interview process different healthcare facilities use the non-compete as a negotiating tool and if you want to reduce the mile radius a small amount or which locations of their system it involves they want to cut your salary significantly. It is blatantly used to depress wages"
Alexandre	"Banning non compete clauses will benefit both employees and bring more job opportunities and competition not only in competitive markets and regions, but also promote growth in areas dominated by a single institution. Noncompete clauses offer no benefit to any party, essentially just forcing employers to relocate and thus negatively impacting the local economy or forcing them to undertake work from home/tele radiology jobs, and negatively impacting patient care in the long term."
Melissa	"As I write this comment I am 17 months into a 24 month non-compete imposed by my former employer. Non-competes allow health care corporations to continue to drive down wages and increase workload for physicians without fear of competition. As a result of increased burnout, more physicians are choosing to leave jobs that demand longer hours, increased non-clinical workload, and poor staffing. Many chose to leave the field altogether rather than relocate their families to start a new job. Provider shortages increase and the patients suffer. Removing non-competes would force large healthcare systems to compete for the highest performing physicians and allow physicians to remain in their community where they are able to serve their patients while achieving professional satisfaction. In my former practice, four of the five pediatricians chose to leave the healthcare system due to poor management and poor patient satisfaction with the system. Two of us may practice in the area again after our non-compete expires. The other two have left the community and will not return. All of us have left behind patients we had known for decades. A similar exodus occurred in the family medicine department. There are plenty of jobs for those of us who left but we are prevented from taking those jobs by our non-compete clauses. So the community lost multiple physicians in short period of time. This archaic practice leave patients without access to high quality care in their own communities."

Rob	"I am a physician and it is fairly standard to see a non compete in a contract. This creates an environment where the employer(hospital based healthcare in my case) does not have any motivation to make for a pleasant work environment. It therefore creates disgruntled physicians and poor healthcare outcomes. Any employee unhappy in their job and feeling stuck will inevitably do a poor job and create more dissatisfaction. In this case an entire patient base feels the effects. Non competes are cowardly as they indicate an employer does not feel they are good enough to hold onto their employees without a mandate."
Donna	"Why should an employer be permitted to hold an employee hostage in a job with a non-compete clause? With more and more consolidation of industry, particularly the healthcare industry, it is increasingly more difficult for an employee to move to a position that is a better fit for herself or her family. Employees should be able to move to a job regardless of the milage distance from the current employer."
PURNA	"Thank you so much. This means lot. I was going through so much because of no competition thing with previous owner. They keep telling me I can run new business an so on. Now this make me feel so happy that I am able to run my own business and create so many new platform for others starting my own businesses. Thank you thank you thank you."
Tom	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth and prevent frivolous lawsuits."
Gabe	"All American Home Care has a reputation of harassing caretakers with using scare tactic . I was an employee there and witnessed them cheating aides out of over time wages and they have had legal issues over it. In addition if a client chooses another home agency it's consumer choice. You can not blame the aide if they leave. And if the aide chooses to go to another agency it's their right. All American tactics to scare uneducated home care aides. They should def be investigated. Legally you can not force a client to stay of an aide to stay Provide better services and they won't leave"
Richard	"The NPRM clause used by businesses are essentially anti -democratic in nature curtailing the right of workers to seek better employment circumstances. Allowing these measures to continue curtailing worker rights is to my mind unconstitutional. As the Supreme Court's ruling that corporations are people is being used as justification for these clauses highlights why the ruling by the FTC is needed."
Richard	"Non-compete agreements are to ensure corporate control of employees. There's no other reason for these agreements."
Kelley	"I believe that non-compete clauses (aka restrictive covenants) should be completely eliminated for every field of work. I believe they are inherently un-American and represent a severe restriction on free-market. They disproportionately harm American workers and benefit large corporations. I am a physician , and non-compete clauses have been used by large hospital systems to maintain control over us, mistreat us, and strip us of all negotiating power. We get much lower salaries than we are owed because of them. Hospital systems know that we either need to stay and deal with our mistreatment and inappropriate pay, or we need to uproot our entire lives and families in order to leave. In addition to being completely unfair to physicians, non-complete causes also harm the patients that we have taken an oath to serve. Medical practices historically were independent mom-and-pop small businesses, and restrictive covenants were thought to be necessary to ensure that your business partner could not just abruptly decide to set up shop directly across the street and lead you to bankruptcy. This scenario is now the rarity and is no longer valid, as the majority of physicians are now employed by major health systems. (Although even in the above scenario, I'd make a strong argument that Americans have the right to a free market, and if you provide a better service, you should not be worried that your patients will leave you). The major problem is now the fact that most physicians are now employed by major health systems, and restrictive covenants imposed on physicians by a health system prevent us from being allowed to practice within a large geographic vicinity for at least a year or more. They also prevent us from being allowed to tell our patients where we will be going and where they can reach us. We are simply expected to abandon our patients without a word about it. And with major health systems, the geographic area of the restrictive covenant has grown much larger; with many contracts now including a radius around not just one single location, but all of their hospital and office locations. For a major health system, this can lead to an entire region spanning multiple counties, and sometimes multiple states, being off limits. For one particularly large health system in Pennsylvania, you are almost black-balled from practicing in the entire state. As soon as I see a patient's name on my schedule, my brain is immediately triggering all of my memories of that patient's care. I remember that 5 years ago she came in with abdominal pain that ended up being inflammatory bowel disease after being misdiagnosed 3 times. I remember to myself that if she has any new abdominal complaints that it may be related to this. I remember that her mom (who I also treat) has a history of malignant skin cancer, and so if this patient is here to see me today for a skin complaint that I need to have high suspicion for cancer because it is genetic. These things are all ingrained in my memory because I have cared for her and her family for years. These are not things that can be found in a medical chart. The physician-patient relationship is sacred and it should not be hindered by multi-million dollar healthcare systems any longer. If physicians are mistreated by a system and have the desire to no longer work for them, we should have the freedom to continue to practice in our own communities, without having to move and uproot our lives to a new geographical location. We should have the freedom to continue caring for the patients that we have cared for years. No one will know these patients' history more than we do. It is ingrained in our minds and our hearts. Not allowing this relationship to continue, simply for the financial gain of million-dollar health systems, is a danger to the health of these patients. It is also a large barrier to the ability of a physician to practice and earn a living. It is a violation of our rights to practice our trade. Now, when we are mistreated by the system which employs us, we have 3 options: continue to deal with it and get burnt out, uproot our lives and move somewhere outside of the restrictive covenant, or completely leave the practice of medicine (which many of my colleagues have done). None of these options benefit the patient whose life we have cared for. This is becoming a dangerous situation in my opinion and a serious hindrance on our rights to practice medicine, the rights of our patients to choose their own physician, and our rights as American citizens."

Rachel	"I'm writing to express my support for the Federal Trade Commission January 5th Notice of Proposed Rulemaking (NPRM) to prohibit employers from imposing noncompete clauses on workers. Noncompete clauses hurt workers by restricting them from pursuing better opportunities that offer higher pay or better working conditions, and hurt employers by preventing them from hiring qualified workers bound by these contracts. Noncompete agreements stifle competition, squash independent entrepreneurship from developing, and severely limit economic liberty. There are other ways for employers to protect trade secrets and other valuable investments that are significantly less harmful to workers and consumers. We know this because the three states in which employers can't enforce noncompete clauses - California, North Dakota and Oklahoma - continue to have flourishing industries that depend on trade secrets and other key investments. This change would promoting fair competition in labor markets. I couldn't be more in support of it."
Georgina	"I want to voice my support to end non-compete rulings in contracts!"
Logan	"I fully support and endorse this rule change. While I have never personally been affected by an NCC (that I am aware of), the field I work in makes liberal use of such contracts and it would be devastating to be on the receiving end of an NCC due to my limited employment opportunities. Beyond that, the idea that corporations can create safe spaces to avoid competitive market forces and keep their employees bound to them like serfs is both detrimental to the economic health of the country but also the nation's soul and overall stability. A discontented populace is never a positive for the status quo."
An	"I support the new rule to get rid of non-compete clauses. Non-competes chain employees to their place of employment and stifles innovation."
armen	"This is a proposal that should have been made long ago. As an employee I wholehearted support this law."
Michael	"I am strongly in favor of the FTC stepping in and banning non-compete clauses. As a surgeon myself, I have seen these extremely unfair rules in practice frequently. Hospitals use them to force surgeons and other physicians out of town if the surgeons want to seeks a better job. The rules literally make families' lives miserable as they are forced to pick up and leave for a different city, pull their kids away from schools and friends, and sell their houses just to move out of the radius of a non compete. It makes the lives of healthcare workers miserable, causes undue stress as well as financial hardship, and is an extremely unfair negotiation tactic. These rules are not going away without the FTC's help. The time to end these practices is now. If you want to improve American healthcare for its workers and its patients, this is a direct action that can be undertaken right now."

Roger	"Non-compete clauses are a great burden to those who are forced to sign them in order to enter certain industries. They should be banned!"
James	"Non competes only limit the worker and are archaic."
Thomas	"I'm hoping this is the comments section for the Non-compete clans. If not could you please remove this to the proper area. Non Compete P clauses On fairly restrict personnel and employees from changing jobs While forcing them to travel inordinate or on realistic distances to maintain employment. I can understand a 1 or 2 year non-complete claws for jobs that provide on the job training but after that it becomes unrealistic to state that it is not sustainable for employers."
Alvin	"I agree with removing noncompete clauses, particularly in the domain of the Physican practice of medicine. For too long, hospitals and health systems have been permitted to unfairly restrict physicians from caring for patients that depend on them through these restrictive covenants that only increase profits to hospitals at the expense of patient health."
Christopher	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Catherine	"As a resident physician who will be joining the workforce in a few short years. I support this proposed rule. In this day and age most employees will change their job within the first 5 years of employment. Finding the correct fit can take time. A person should have the freedom to do this without being forced to move to another state/city."
JAMES	"As an employee of an IT company , currently working in the Commonwealth of PA, a few years ago I was coerced into signing a non-competition agreement, even as an existing employee of almost 15 years (at that time). The notification to me read something like "During a review of our records, we see that we do not have this document on file for you. You have until 4pm Friday to sign this non-competition agreement." --- At the time I was working as a subcontractor for another IT company, who had better benefits and pay structure. I first went to my management chain and asked what the possibility of switching to them was - before signing this document. They were non-committal, so I signed and sent it in (the way the email was written, it seemed like there was a "sign by 4pm ... (or else!!!)" implied, and I was in no position to lose my job. Later the other company asked me if I would want to work for them if they approached my employer and asked for a release, I said yes, they did, and were told "No". So a decade later, I still work for the same company. There were a few years of faltering steps to get me a pay raise or two, and life goes on. What I did not immediately realize is that in the Commonwealth of PA, employer requiring employee to sign a non-competition agreement must be accompanied by something of value (as a condition of employment, that could be the employment itself, but as an existing

	employee, it would mean a bonus, promotion, raise, etc.) For me, I received nothing - and the following action between employers resulted in some dismal management practices berating me for being an ungrateful employee. But I digress. By the time I pushed back to HR and legal and ethics teams regarding this, I just received a boilerplate answer of "At the time you signed this contract, we believe we were following the laws and rules of the Commonwealth and see no need to take further action." — I eventually made peace. Because of the nature of my work, switching to a new employer without relocating and still being able to do what I specialize in wasn't going to happen unless I could afford to take many months off between the jobs. And, I do enjoy my work, so it is what it is. All of this story is to say, that I think the Non-Compete Clause Rule should go into effect, banning NCP. It may be too late to fix my circumstances. But for other staff and employees, it may make the difference in having a successful career versus being stuck in a dead-end job."
Andrew	"As someone that has been effected by a non compete, I whole heartedly support this. I made my living in my field for a decade before taking a role with a company that offered a better wage, yet had a non-compete buried deep in their contract and of course in the excitement of onboarding, I did not review. When it came time for me to move on years later, I was sued the moment I left the company without any proof or knowledge that I was even staying in the field. Months and thousands in legal fees later, I was left without a job or any prospects and I had to essentially lose years of my life working outside my field of expertise for much lower wages in order to make it back. Don't I have a right to work? Isn't it stifling progress by supporting an entire industry of lawyers and "turn and burn" employers whose entire goal is to target ex-employees and make their life a living hell? Additionally, I kel like this whole process is stunting further growth of the economy and forces experts in their field to essentially delay any progress or innovation they might have been able to develop prior to this unforeseen detour in their professional lives. I think we should move on from all non-competes, and our country will be much better for it."
Chase	"Noncompete agreement for H1B Visa workers is extremely unfriendly because there's a grace period for H1B Visa workers to change jobs. The grace period is as short as 30 days which is easily below the noncompete period. Some employers have noncompete period set for over a year WITHOUT pay. In a situation of lay-off unfortunately, this essentially forces non-resident workers to exit the country which was not the original intent of noncompete agreements."
Jason	"Please, it makes such a big difference to me as a human being and it's unfair that hospitals can do it."
Bryan	"As a 24 year old in the work place (I was recently terminated for standing my ground and not signing a non compete contract) I worked a highly skilled job installing fire suppression systems (requires state certification that goes to myself not the business I was employed for), not signing that contract led me to be terminated, but it also led me to a new job with more career advancements, a higher salary(in the same feild) , I tell all my former co workers to not sign it."

	Employers walk all over us young generation in the work force (maybe that's why so many are not entering it). Here in America you shouldn't not be prevented from the right to earn a decent living, and these papers do just that. Their contract stated I couldn't work in the felid 2 years after employment. I would be working a minimum wage gas station job if I had signed that contract. Let we the people be free and allowed to work. They are one sided documents that only look out for the employer. On a side note- there is no such document with unemployment, Or urinalysis and that sort. Why is the working class held to a different standard 9 It's wrong to be terminated for being forced to sign a contract that does NOTHING for me. Thanks for reading, let's get this passed to help us Americans during this unpredictable times!"
Brendan	"My name is Brendan Wissinger and I want to voice my strong support for the Federal Trade Commission's proposed rule on banning non-compete agreements which would protect working individuals from monopsonic companies pushing wages and benefits lower than they would otherwise be and denying workers of opportunities. Non-compete clauses unnaturally prevent competition between employers for employers, allowing employers to have a power of monophony over workers, thereby keeping wages and benefits unnaturally low, preventing workers from going to other places and preventing workers to fight for higher just wages that allow them to put food on the family dinner table. These non-compete clauses, affect workers even if they only affect close competitors because workers are who to go college or technical school have training and they need to pay back loans as well, and there are a lot of jobs that require college or technical school that only pay $10-$15 an hour and that isn't enough when rent is $1,492. If they can't go into a field they are trained in or have experience in because of non-compete agreements they'll be much less likely to paid with the same or higher pay and benefits. We ask that you institute this rule that bans non-compete clauses. Thank you!"
Corey	"I think this is well needed. I'm in a non compete that doesn't allow me to relocate within a 2 hour radius for 1.5 years after termination. This limits my potential to seek another job in my career. I feel this is also suppressing my wages and limits my ability to negotiate. I'd like to see this rule passed to allow for my competition on these often over reaching requirements."
Patrick	"My name is Patrick Wolkoff and I fully support this proposed new rule. Non compete clauses not only take the power out of the hands of American workers, but also restricts the economy and keeps it from growing. The freedom to change employment is a vital and irreplaceable American liberty that must be protected at all costs. Good for the FTC for fighting for American workers and the spirit of free competition in the marketplace!!!"
Cullen	"I support the banning of non compete clauses, specifically for health care workers and physicians. I am a physician and banning non competes would make it easier to work in a competitive labor market in my local community, and would be a benefit for myself and my family."

Kim	"I believe employers should NOT be able to have non-compete clauses. I personally do not have one but my daughter-in-law does. She is an excellent hairstylist who works in a shop that is often times a hostile environment due to owners. She is unable to leave due to this clause and the distance she would be required to open a shop for herself."
Elizabeth	"Noncompete agreements for physicians reduce the number of physicians in the workforce by forcing physicians to retire, move out of state, and uproot families when working conditions are poor. This can reduce the number of highly skilled medical providers in the state and reduces choice for patients. Nonprofits should not be exempt from this regulation because they impose the same restrictions on the medical workforce with these practices. I am a highly skilled medical professional faced with the decision of having to move my family and uproot friendships in order to find better working conditions. My area already has a shortage of physicians and non physicians are largely taking over this healthcare system to the detriment of our patients."
Zhan	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, am writing to express my strong support for the proposed ban on non-compete clauses within employment contracts, particularly as it affects physicians . As a healthcare professional, I have seen firsthand how non-compete agreements can have negative consequences for patients, healthcare providers, and the industry as a whole. Non-compete clauses often limit access to care for patients, especially those in rural or underserved areas. Physicians who are bound by these agreements may be unable to work in areas where their skills and expertise are desperately needed, leading to longer wait times, higher healthcare costs, and decreased quality of care. Moreover, non-compete clauses can also drive up healthcare costs by restricting competition among healthcare providers. When physicians are unable to move to new employers, they may be stuck in a job that pays lower wages and offers less competitive benefits. This can drive down wages across the industry, resulting in less incentive for physicians to provide high-quality care. Finally, non-compete clauses can also have a detrimental effect on physician job satisfaction and career advancement. Physicians who are unable to leave their current employer may feel trapped in a job that does not align with their career goals or offer opportunities for growth and advancement. In light of these concerns, I strongly urge the FTC to consider eliminating non-compete clauses within employment contracts for physicians. By doing so, we can help ensure that patients have access to the care they need, healthcare providers are able to negotiate fair wages and working conditions, and the industry remains competitive and innovative. Thank you for your consideration of this important issue."
Danielle	"Noncompetes are terrible for workers and are very unfair, especially when the employee is employed by a large organization. Workers should not be trapped in bad jobs!"
D	"I fully support the proposed ban on Non Compete contracts. I agree that is a "exploitative practice that suppresses wages" and I think it should go away."

Richard	"Regarding "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No.P201200", I agree that non-compete clauses should not be allowed because they hurt workers and limit competition."
Hector	"This is a horrible way to don't let the employees to get much better pay ! I'm totally disagree"
Jane	" Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change."
Zachary	"I support the Non-Compete Clause Rule that is being proposed. I hope that my personal experience that I express below helps the commission make a decision that doesn't only benefit me but thousands of others in similar situations. After college I got a role in the recruitment industry on the agency/consulting side with a small firm that focused on niche industries In construction, engineering, and manufacturing. When I started I was asked to sign a non-compete without any understanding of what that means. The non-complete at that time outlined that I was not able to work for any other firm for a period of 2 years that crossed over in anyway to the work that my firm does in these specific industries. After being there for a couple months I was tasked with building a new industry for Civil Engineering that was not previously established at the firm. After about 2 years of employment with the firm there was a co-worker who left and joined a company that was a client in his industry not a competing recruitment agency. After he left we all received an updated non-compete that added we are now not allowed for a period of 2 years to join a competing agency firm OR a company that falls in the industry we are recruiting for. In addition to that upon signing the new agreement we were given a bonus of $300. I am still with the company now but have recently decided to look into other employment opportunities and this non-compete will hold me back significantly in finding new employment as all of my experience in the professional world has been in recruiting in the Civil Engineering industry. For reference, the Civil Engineering industry has thousands of firms across the US who would see my experience as highly beneficial to their business and because of this non-compete I am bared from working at any of them. This has severely limited my potential employment opportunities and put me in a position where I am going to have to find a new role in a completely different industry which will come with a pay cut because of my lack of experience in other industries. I have put my life into building this industry at my current firm for almost 5 years now and all that knowledge gained in that industry is going to be for nothing because of the non-compete. I have a new-born baby at home and taking a significant pay cut at this time is something that will change the future for my family in a negative way. At the end of the day if I was to leave and work for a company in my industry not a

	direct competitor there would be such a minimal impact on my current firms business but they don't see it that way. The new clause will allow not only me but thousands of others in similar situations move freely in the market without having to take a step back in our careers and will allow for strong career growth and increased opportunities. I hope that the commission sees the harm in these non-competes and how it is negatively impacting the lives of many people. Thank you for your time."
Perry	"Non-compete clauses in contracts should be hands-down eliminated in the U.S. I have been the victim of non-compete clauses (except in CA where they are not in existence) for 24+ years in Medicine, as have many of my colleagues in Ophthalmology. The employers uniformly use these clauses to control your salary, patient assignments, bonus pay. Essentially, it is a strong hold they use against you to work you hard with zero recourse. You are left to take it or leave it. They use physician employees for 1 to 3 years typically to build up accounts receivable, use your good will to build up a practice, then come up with some nonsensical reason to terminate your contract or not renew it. Then you have to practice outside some zone which is usually outside their drawing area. Even if another practice wants to hire you, they cannot because the original employer holds the reigns for 2 years minimum This is an absolute sickening and abusive practice which has been permitted for years. Take states that don't have non-competes in Medicine: they treat you completely differently as they know if they abuse you or don't pay you properly, you can move across the street. The whole premise of the noncompete to protect the business is over called. In this day and age, no one opens up a new practice as it is prohibitively expensive. Please get rid of these unfair noncompete clauses."
Harmony	"I believe eliminating noncompete clauses would improve the quality of American lives"
Michelle	"I am strongly against non-competes. It limits the free market and is against everything America stands for."
X	"It seems to me that if an employee works at a company for 20 years and demonstrates their loyalty and if the principal owner(s) sell the company for a billion dollars, the owners get compensated which is fine but the employee potentially gets a watch, a pat on the back, possibly dismissed because new owner downsizes and employee may have boxed themselves out of a new job because they signed a non-compete clause. I can see multiple scenarios where it doesn't sound equitable."
Katie	"I would like to support the proposed rule banning non-compete clauses for employees. As a veterinarian nearly 10 years post-graduation from veterinary school, this has affected me professionally in restricting my job prospects and ability to earn a living. Nearly every contract I have been presented with or signed in my career has contained a non-compete clause inclusive of at least a 20 mile radius, and was applicable during my employment + 2 years following cessation of employment. I concede that non-compete agreements were likely designed for more reasonable situations, such as owners of a business agreeing that owners are restricted from selling their equity and starting a competing business one mile down the road. However, the majority of clauses developed in veterinary medicine today are predatory and restrictive, essentially trapping employees in a particular job without reasonable geographic mobility—even if the employee leaves on good terms. I have several colleagues who have stayed in jobs in which they are miserable for fear of the legal consequences of violating their non-competes. I know another handful of others that are commuting over an hour (myself included) each way to work in order to work at an alternative location outside of their previous employer's restrictive area. One anecdote of importance is that these non-compete agreements are often in the contracts of veterinary interns and residents, most of whom are matched to post-graduate training programs via The Veterinary Internship and Residency Matching Program (VIRMP). This program uses an algorithm to match applicants to institutions, and there are significant professional ramifications for a intern/resident who declines a position at an institution at which they are matched. This limits, and in most cases precludes, contract negotiation. Interns and residents are also almost never provided with institutional contracts prior to applying or ranking programs. Given the competitive nature of the matching system and the realistic possibility of not matching, most interns and residents are pressured to "take what they can get", for lack of a better term. As an individual with a professional degree, during my residency I was paid 536,000-538,000 per year. While this may not be an entirely unsustainable salary in isolation, residents are often required to live within 10-15 min. of the residency-associated teaching hospital due to emergency on-call requirements. This stipulation can significantly limit housing options, and thus affordability. Couple that with an average student debt load between $ 150,000-$180,000, and the financial picture for veterinarians seeking advanced training in a residency is quite bleak. Wouldn't it be nice if a resident who was motivated enough to provide per diem veterinary services to another hospital and supplement their income could do so without fear of breaching the contract for the residency they worked so hard to get? Unfortunately, to do so one must find a companion animal hospital over 20 miles away (sometimes 40+ miles away if you are providing mixed or large animal services), and also obtain written approval from your section chief. Granted, I recognize that applying for and accepting a residency was a choice. However, I would also bet my current salary that if one were to survey every single pet owner whose animal underwent general anesthesia during the years I was a resident, not a single one of them could tell you the name of the resident who anesthetized their pet. This is also likely true in my position as a veterinary anesthesiologist. Therefore, in my experience I don't feel as though non-competes have been tailored to keep individuals from specifically taking business to another hospital. Rather, they have been used as a tool to provide intense friction to those seeking additional or alternative employment opportunities. Now, I am a managing partner of the specialty veterinary hospital and between myself and the other veterinarian owners, we have all agreed not to include non-competes for our employees. It is something we feel strongly about. While I would hope that stances like this in private ownership could pressure both corporate and non-corporate owners to do the right thing as well, I truly believe that regulatory action will be the only thing to effect lasting change in our profession. I have attached two protective covenants that I have received in my career. I have removed the names of the institutions,

	because quite frankly it is not important which individual institutions they are. The point is, these types of non-competes are pervasive in the industry from academic, corporate, and privately owned institutions alike and what I have attached are just two examples of the likely hundreds that are out there."
Heidi	"As a Nurse executive, I would agree that this rule is indeed important. I am held to a non-compete as others in my corporate building from the executive suite to our cleaning service. My non-compete keeps me from working in any other healthcare-related position in a 30-mile radius as do those in other disciplines. That means our cleaning lady could not work as a cleaning lady anywhere in a 30-mile radius and I find that excessive. As for myself, this non-compete has permitted the company to treat me poorly and dictate my ability to leave unless I move. These actions are unfair and need to be corrected. I believe some companies may utilize the non-compete appropriately while others, like mine, abuse its power. I would support the removal of the non-compete or at least a version that would have oversight and strict rules to follow. With the lack of workers created by the pandemic, having a very restrictive non-compete is damaging"
Dennis	"I am in agreement of this non-compete clause being illegal to implement."
Hong	"I am a vascular surgeon currently practicing in PA. I would like to express my FULL support in removing non-compete clauses in labor contracts. It is a fact that the vast majority of physicians, especially those of us in procedural fields, are no longer in private practice arrangements but are now 'hospital employed.' I have negotiated contracts with several hospitals since completing residency and fellowship training During all of these negotiations I have been informed that a non-compete agreement is mandatory and no contract would be offered without it. These agreements serve to limit our ability to stand up for ourselves and our patients. Due to these often extremely large non-compete agreements we are often unable to leave our current hospital without uprooting our entire family. In my case, my non-compete clause written in my contract prohibits me from being employed by any other hospital/practice within the entire Berks County for TWO years. Of note, is the fact that as a physician on call we are required to live within a certain distance of the hospital. Especially as a vascular surgeon, I must be able to respond to the hospital within 30 minutes for a bleeding emergency when on call. This combination of a requirement to live close, and non-competes which are often in excess of 25 miles makes it impossible to switch to a new job without the difficult dynamic of moving houses, families, schools, etc. My husband and I are both vascular surgeons living in PA. If one of us would need to leave our job due to untenable working conditions, it would likely result in our moving out of Pennsylvania completely due to the non-competes we were required to sign to secure a position. I urge you to provide support for this measure in any way you are able. Removing non-compete agreements would improve physician retention within Pennsylvania and be an enormous boon to many middle class Americans. I very much appreciate your time and attention to this matter and would be happy to discuss further at any time if I can provide more information or assistance in any way."

Andrew	"I support the proposed rule to ban the use of non-compete clauses by employers on their employees. This practice prevents competition, maintains artificially low salaries and benefit packages. This practice is found throughout the video journalism industry where some journalists earn minimum wage. The lack of true competition prevents journalists from capitalizing on opportunities that arise."
Danielle	"I used to work in Center City Philadelphia at a bank. Workers from All American Home Care Agency would come in to cash or deposit their checks. After awhile we became comfortable with each other, and they would share the awful working conditions they were provided. Including the low wage, for work that is taxing. A no compete clause should not exist in most industries and it only protects corporations. As do most rules lobbied by them. Please work to get rid of this rule so the working class can seek fortunate opportunities and not be punished for it. If you have a skill in one workplace, it is yours to take to another workplace, not theirs to keep."
Jeff	"Noncompete clauses that don't protect genuinely proprietary information are abusive and should be banned immediately"
Robert	"To Whom It May Concern, I am a business owner and executive in a small software company with approximately 50 employees that has operated for more than 20 years. While we included a non-compete clause in our early employment contracts, I came to realize that these clauses were not fair to our employees and we removed them about 15 years ago. We operate in a highly competitive technology environment in which the knowledge people gain while working for our organization can easily be transmitted to another organization. However, I have come to believe that as long as they are not violating confidentiality or copyright law, this transfer of experience and lessons to other organizations in our ecosystem is, on balance, beneficial to everyone as it contributes to an open knowledge ecosystem that benefits both individuals or society over both short and long term timeframes. That said, when my organization has had assets acquired by other firms, I have had noncompete agreements imposed on me. While these agreements have limited my action as an executive and entrepreneur, they were understandable within the context - the acquiring firm did not want to pay for an asset while enabling me to create a new competitive product. These noncompete agreements have had three key components that I believe made them relatively fair: they were limited in time (2 or 3 years), they were very narrow in scope, and they were limited only to senior executives or shareholders. Further, they were part of a larger financial transaction in which there was clear compensation the the agreement not to compete. I therefore urge the FTC to move forward with the banning of noncompete agreements in the vast majority of employment contexts but to not ban them in all contexts. The contexts in which they are used should be limited in time (no more than 3 years), limited in scope (not prevent employment in an entire industry, but, rather, to a specific, narrow type of work), and have be limited to senior executives, major shareholders, or other highly compensated individuals. Thank you for the opportunity to provide comments and input."

Michael	"Worked at a MSP (managed service provider) doing server setups and client on boarding in Virginia. Started at 43k. They actively went after anyone that quit the company and went to other MSPs, which made it very hard to find relevant work in the area. Granted, the idea of poaching clients in that industry makes sense, as it's easy for a sales person or support person to take a dozen clients out of --400 if the business saves money. And one of our competitors literally got bought out by xerox, and they were trying to poach every employee. There's a thin line to walk here to make it work. Outright banning them doesn't fully make sense, imo, especially from a sales standpoint. At the worst, the length of time should correlate to the person's total monetary take home including overtime and bonuses."
Bridget	"Non-competes for health care providers are nonsense and stifle competition. There is very little that is proprietary about practicing medicine. A non-solicitation agreement makes much more sense than a non-compete. Non-competes should be reserved for higher level executives with access to actual trade secrets. They were never intended to be used blanketly across all levels of professions. Their abuse is egregious and needs to stop."
Amy	"Non-compete agreements should be abolished for all employees except those at the highest executive levels. They limit the ability of workers to advance in their careers and serve no legitimate purpose except to shackle people to jobs they seek to leave. People should be free to compete in an open labor market just as companies are."
George	"See attached file(s) Attachments Restrictive Covenants"
Jane	"Non-competes should be illegal in all but the most senior professional situations and in that case paid 'Garden Leave' should be mandatory Taking away someone's ability to work is plain wrong."
Eric	"Non-compete clauses are normally heavily in favor of the employer. These agreements eliminate competition and the basic rules of capitalism - that is, supply and demand. Workers are put at a distinct disadvantage regarding the sale of their labor. It is especially true for younger workers just entering the workforce and are unaware of the ramifications non-compete clauses can cause in future employment. Non-clauses should be unlawful."
Lisa	"I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. I have lost my business to a non compete after abusive business practice from my partner, and had to start over lost entire business to fires and a mudslide trying to start over in another part of the country because I had s non compete and could be sued. I was extremely successful in my business field and had been an early entrapeneur online in the w-commerce space."

	I have lost my business savings, life and marriage due to the unnecessary burden of a non compete, it actually ruined my live economically and personally and sometimes you can't recover. I have had several now at the small businesses that have hired me, it kept me from working near where I live and had me commuting hours to my home and now my health has succceed ass a result, I had to drive hours to work to open a business and hours then to co Mute Dudu g the fires and catastrophies(fires happened then the mudslide) had a non complete which forced me to drive hours from Where I live also due to cost of housing and the noncompete. I was forced to drive for hours to be a business owner -commute for hours even during disasters, no where to stay! It is all horribly sadly connected. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
James	"Any regulation like this must be thoroughly thought out. Although the rule does not specifically ban non-solicitation agreements, sonic speculate it may open them to legal challenges. Non-compete/solicitation agreements (within reason) must be available to small businesses to help protect them. There are many cases where employees have access to confidential/proprietary information which they can easily steal and use to directly compete with the existing business. I personally have a business where, prior to using non-solicit agreements, had an employee leave my business, steal at least some of my customer list, and use it to directly contact them. This is a business where there are limited customers with the product I support and finding those people are part of the challenge of running the business. Why should an employee allowed to steal the benefits of my work locating and securing these customers for my business`` Banning these clauses would make it very easy for someone to go work for a company for a short time, take critical information, and use it against the business. My business does not prevent anyone from working for a competing company. This should be allowed. But there must be options for businesses to protect themselves from unscrupulous employees who will steal information, trade secrets, customer lists, etc. Small businesses work hard and invest a lot of money to develop these things and having no protection could be devastating to many businesses."

Rhode Island | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Rhode Island:

	"I feel that non-compete agreements in contracts for physicians should be illegal....We should be able to change jobs just like anyone else and not have a non-compete agreement. We have sacrificed enough of our lives (most of our 20s getting paid less than minimum wage for the hours worked) for the good of the general public, that we should not be forced to uproot our families to get a better job once we are attending physicians. If people are wondering why...people are not wanting to go into medicine, this is one of the reasons. If you want to have physicians in 30 to 40 years, if you would like to see a physician for your own care rather than a nurse practitioner or a physician assistant, this would be a prime thing to eliminate. Signed, A Burnt-Out Primary Care Physician" -Heather
	"I'm a personal trainer and have been in the fitness industry for about 10 years. Non-Compete Clauses make it next to impossible to leave a gym or studio that has a toxic work environment and management. This leads to good coaches leaving the profession and, more importantly, clients being unable to truly receive the best coaching and services that they could be receiving. I fully support banning Non-Compete Clauses. Make it happen." -Nicholas C.
	" I am a Business Development Representative in Rhode island....Each company I have worked for has forced me to sign a non-compete as a condition of employment...I was still party to a non-compete from two employers ago in the same industry....I reached out to my former boss, the owner of the company I was in a non-compete with and let him know that...I have 3 young children, and despite my best efforts the only opportunity I was seeing after a month long job search was to work for a competitor. I asked if he would be willing to forgo the non-compete...He informed me that he had already engaged his attorney and planned to enforce my non-compete should I proceed with the offer...Non-competes force employees to stay in jobs, because we see no way out and tear a lack of opportunity if we leave. It forces us to pass up higher paying offers from competitors who see our value. No one should feel stuck in their job and forced to work for lower pay due to intimidation from their employer." -Brie
	"This is a huge problem in the mortgage industry. Companies like Guaranteed Rate have massive legal departments and are not afraid to sue anyone that leaves. As a competing mortgage company this reduces the number of candidates we can recruit....This would definitely open up the ability for mortgage professionals to seek alternate employment without the fear of having to deal with the massive litigation fees for the hiring company as well as the employee. I hope this thing passes and levels the playing field...."

Constituent First Name	Comment Highlights
Charles	"This is a great idea to spur innovation in the US and empower employees."
Noah	"I am a 23-year-old parts driver . I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Linda	"As a single mother with two children to support and over 20 years in a single industry this immediately and negatively affects my ability to support my children. My current employer has just laid me off Monday and is requesting an additional elevated non compete in order to receive my last two weeks pay. I need this pending legislation passed asap so I can continue to work in my given field....But I know of so many others dragged to court over this from former employers. We cannot allow non-competes to continue!"
Stephanie	"Non competes stifle growth of the economy and limit the wages my family can make because of a small competitive market. Getting rid of non competes would allow me and my family to earn higher income based on my qualifications and eliminate legal ramifications for pursuing better wages."
Ray	"I am against the Non Compete Clause. I believe the Non-Compete Clauses by employers are forced upon employees and perspective employees. An offer by an employer is valid only if a perspective candidate accepts and signs the Non-Compete. Trapped. After 30 years in an industry, an employee is not allowed to move within the industry? Signing an agreement that actually calls out, by name, the competitors names and vendors one cannot work with or work for. That is what I am facing. Am I an indentured servant at that point? You Bet. All without compensation for not working for 1 - 2 years. When one brings 30+ years experience to the table then has to sign away the value of that experience to gain employment, this is an outrage. This does not allow fair competition between competitors for experienced, knowledgeable prospective employees too. When work environments are dysfunctional, toxic, and exclusive, without opportunity for advancement, so one needs to move on, move forward, yet are held back because of a Non-Complete Clause is just not right or fair to all involved, including the employer and employee. Sure, Mr. employer says, sure you can leave, be on your way, yet one is bound by a Non-Compete Clause? This is a restraint for any type of fair play. These big companies want it all, they want their cake and eat your cake too. Please, impose a ban on all Non Compete Clause, not only moving forward, yet, also, retroactively."

Tyler	"The existence of non complete clauses is an affront to what the USA is built upon. We wish for a free competitive market and yet businesses are allowed to literally have clauses which allows them to trap workers in their company. I am a physician moving across the country for a new position this year. My current group has not worked out and because of non compete clauses I am forced to relocate my family to be able to work. If the new position does not work out I will be forced to relocate again and again. In the current situation only work for one group in a given location and will be forced to move if the group does not work out. This puts me at a significant disadvantage in negotiations, the group knows that I will not want to move my family giving the an incredibly unfair amount of leverage in negotiations. They know if I quit I will be forced to relocate. This causes my wife and I great anxiety as we worry that the group may not work out and we will be forced to uproot our kids time and time again. We just want to choose a place to settle and raise our children. This practice needs to end please put a stop to it."
Brittany	"Non-compete clauses in contracts nationwide should be banned. They were used to the benefit of hospitals and to the detriment of physicians during COVID. Even in states (CT) where the government created a ban on physician non-competes to protect MDs during COVID, many hospitals tried to "grandfather" physicians re-signing contracts into a non-compete clause."
Jason	"Non-compete clauses are the most egregious form of monopolistic corporate control, because it creates a monopoly over people's livelihoods, for no advantage other than keeping their employees under their thumb."
Jared	"I am whole heartedly in support of this proposed rule. I am currently under a non-compete agreement that is preventing me from securing gainful employment and have experienced harm from non-compete agreements in the past. I agree that employers use non-compete agreements to restrict an employees freedom and diminish the employees bargaining power, wages, and economic opportunity, because I have experienced this in the past and I am experiencing this currently."
Christopher	"Please ban the unfair and uncompetitive practice of non-compete agreements from workers. I used to own a painting contracting company and I used them myself to prevent employees from starting their own businesses. In hindsight, I see them as an immoral and underhanded tool designed to take opportunity away from others."
Timothy	"I support the move to ban non-compete agreements."
Gene	"There may have been a legitimate time for these non compete clauses, but it not now. Now is the time to eliminate them!"
Christopher	"This long overdue. Non-competes are a sort of slavery." Work here for a reasonable paycheck or leave and be poor." It is just a trap. Theft of confidential information is a crime, as it should be, but non-competes only lock employees to their employer, no matter what. Grossly unfair."

John	"I strongly support eliminating non-compete agreements. They are presented as a non-negotiable part of the job agreement and the employee has no meaningful ability to modify the terms in his favor."
Tamar	"Please compete noncompete clauses and stand up for physician rights."
Tom	"Non compete clauses are fundamentally discriminatory against employees who wish to seek better opportunities. They give a company undue power over them, disrupting their ability to make a living by preventing them from working in their field at a different employer."
Christopher	"To whom it may concern; I'm writing this in regards to concerns about non-compete clause changes potentially exempting physicians and other allied health professionals in response to a letter from the American Hospital Association. In their recent comments, they claim to represent "more than 270,000 affiliated physicians , 2 million nurses and other caregivers" in opposing changes banning non-compete clauses. Notably, they do so after mentioning the hospitals and large employers they primarily represent, and give a false impression that the health professionals would prefer to keep non-compete clauses, something I find laughable. Few employees would support keeping themselves trapped in a job for fear of being locked out of their hometown if they leave. I myself recently signed on to take my first attending job. One of my major criteria was picking an employer that would not have a non-compete clause in my contract. I'm moving back to my hometown area, a rural/suburban corner of Arkansas, which has a physician deficit, especially in my small field of rheumatology. Word from some of their physicians was that many felt trapped in a system that mistreated them, with fear of leaving due to non-competes that were selectively enforced. There were even non-compete clauses for hospitalists, who have no clinic patient panel that could possibly follow them anyway, and had no employer-level knowledge or trade secrets for a non-compete to even protect. And yet, non-competes were standard at most, until I found one that realized that their patients and physicians benefitted from a more free, open market without non-competes. Physicians should absolutely be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it greatly limits their ability to negotiate their contracts and instead offers large hospital systems an unprecedented advantage over physicians in the marketplace. There is a large increase in physician burnout and allowing the market place to be more free would allow physicians more flexibility, and allow their patients more choice. Additionally, the last time an exemption of this nature was granted by the lobbying from the American Hospital Association (Jung v AAMC 2004) resulted in decades of delay for improving resident physicians' ability for fair wages and benefits; this is still an active struggle today. Please do not make the same mistake again for physicians of today and the future."

Jacob	"It is absolutely insane how we allow corporations to have such a stranglehold on labor by requiring non-competes for all of their employees. Rarely are non-competes actually protecting a corporation from any trade secrets getting out, and they mostly discourage labor mobility which has a proven positive effect for both the workers and the new companies that they move to. I support banning non-competes and rendering all existing ones null and void."
Bruce	"I am a well paid professional without much (if any) propriety information and I still worry about this. Applying this indiscriminately puts yet another drag on the average worker (on top of oppressive schedules, limited benefits, rarely a livable wage, etc.). Let companies compete with salaries, benefits, and loyalty to the worker."
Nicole	"Non competes should be banned. Please consider terminating this clause. I know someone personally it effected. All she wanted to do is work. Let us work!!"
Viktor	"The majority of workers covered by Non-Complete Clauses are covered under an assumption of trade secrets or insider information. This assumption is faulty in a significant majority of cases and restricts workers unfairly from utilizing learned skills and benefiting from them without geographic relocation, which can unfairly require a worker to substantially personally compensate for geographic relocation, support themselves by alternate means (degrading their associated skills) to wait out the clause timeline, or to accept lesser benefits or wages with the firm which the clause is held with....As in one of the examples provided within the rule documentation - a standard sandwich shop employee is not in a position to receive trade secret information, vendor information, or insider information which would harm the business measurably. This employee should not be restricted from applying the same skills at a comparable business. Alternately, an employee of the same sandwich shop specializing in procurement or in ingredient production may be aware of vendor information, pricing plans, or, rarely, trade secrets. While a competing company could have use of this information, such information would either persist for longer than the standard duration of a non-compete or be non-valid after a time period less than the standard duration of a non- compete. In either case, a business would have legal recourse if they could reasonably assert that a former employee was using that information incorrectly and was providing a clear unfair advantage to a competitor. Pre-emptively barring this employee from seeking work from a competitor because of a perception that they will automatically provide an unfair advantage to a competitor is an assumption of guilt before innocence. Consequently - this should be considered a universal rule, without exceptions for any particular commercial industry. In the modern age of cybersecurity and cybercrime, it is just as easy if not easier for a given individual, group, or state-sponsored entity to extract the equivalent information (or greater) from companies than a single individual or group of individuals leaving a company to work for a competitor could provide. Such cyber exfiltration is more and more common and should be considered of far greater threat to business information than workers seeking the best benefits and/or wages for themselves and their families"

Matthew	"I usually don't get political, but I have been subjected to terrible non-compete and non-solicitation agreements for my entire career. I truly feel that it has negatively affected my ability to earn better wages for myself and my family and prevented me from gaining better working conditions throughout my entire adult working career. Non-competes, especially in the case of laid-off workers, are ridiculous. People > Corporations."
Edward	"Agree to ban them as exploitation of physicians by health systems. This contributes to doctors leaving the work force."
Bradley	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Please ban noncompete agreements. For most workers noncompetes are used without justification, signed under duress, and open employees leaving a company to unwarranted legal retaliation. Companies are also put at unnecessary risk when hiring employees if they have ever signed a noncompete agreements. They also shrink the pool of candidates."
Ryan	"Non-compete clauses are unacceptable and a method for businesses to control ex-employees. If businesses are concerned about an employee leaving for a competitor, they should provide better pay and work environment. If they fired/laid-off the employee, then they also have no right to decide where an employee goes. Non-compete clauses do exactly as intended, limit competition. It's unacceptable and should not be allowed."
Matthew	"Non-compete clauses hamper workers' freedom to change their working conditions. There may be a small, rarefied scope of fields in which non-compete clauses work to slow corporate espionage, but for most workers they are a needless obstacle to bettering their own station. Please, for the good of American workers, ban the use of non-compete clauses in future employment contracts and void such clauses in existing contracts. Thank you for your time."
Alexandra	"Yes, let's ban non-compete clauses. They help corporations and highly paid executives and hurt the working and middle class. It's outrageous and elitist."
Mitt	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Most importantly, non-competes restrict freedom. They are bad for consumers, bad for workers, bad for families, bad for business, and bad for society. They only serve to enable mediocre business owners to exploit their workers and local tax payers. Non-competes are anti-capitalist and anti-American. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

South Carolina | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for South Carolina:

South Carolina Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual SC Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual SC Worker Earnings
1,745,274	$858,798,497	$492

Jennifer	"Please do not exclude physicians from the non compete rule. Physicians should have the ability to choose their own working environments and be able to change jobs without penalty like anyone else. Thank you."
Kristen	"It defies logic that noncompete clauses were ever allowed in the first place. American workers deserve the right to work for whomever they choose wherever they choose. We should not be forced to accept lower paying positions or be forced to uproot our families to find a better job. Do the right think and end this now. If the US government does not end noncompetes it will be because of corporate greed."
Nitesh	"Non-compete clause is a plaque of modem society and it is a violation an individual's right to work. Large organizations use this clause to bully physicians into working under unsafe conditions and prevent free movement of labor. Most physicians are not privy to business dealings of hospital and they are no threat to the interest of these hospitals. As a Physician, I strongly oppose Non-Compete clauses and support freedom to work."
Callie	"I support doing away with non competes. Our company makes everyone sign one even though SC is a right to work state. We aren't able to go work for another company and support our families - even if we are laid off."
McLaren	"I don't understand how restricting competition is a good thing."
William	"I support the ftc on this matter. Non-compete clauses reduce marketplace competition."
Mike	"I strongly support the FTC banning non-compete clauses, including rescinding those already in effect. These are one-sided and predatory clauses that for too long have been used against workers by employers and hiring parties to unfairly exert control over them, including preventing them from seeking a better position. When a company or management is doing a poor job, or they don't offer the right situation for a worker, then the worker should be free to leave and continue their work elsewhere. Please ban non-compete clauses! Thank you."
Lauren	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses give employers far more power over their employees' lives than any rational society should allow. Please bring this unjust practice to an end."
Kathy	"I support the proposed rule to ban exploitative noncompete agreements. Right now, noncompete agreements are being unethically used across the country to prevent workers from quitting their jobs for a better offer. Competition drives

	markets — and when noncompete agreements eliminate competition in the labor market, employers don't have an incentive to give their workers better pay, working conditions, or benefits. One in five American workers have signed noncompete agreements --- and it's a problem across industries. From Jiffy Lube mechanics to Amazon warehouse workers, employees across the country are unfairly bound to their jobs by noncompete agreements. Jimmy John's even tried to use noncompete agreements to prevent their employers from working at any other establishment that serves sandwiches. A ban on abusive and excessive noncompete agreements would have a huge impact on our economy: Estimates show that banning noncompete agreements could grow paychecks for American workers by nearly $300 billion per year and open up new career opportunities for 30 million people. With corporate profits at obscenely high levels, corporations' excuses about wage increases creating huge losses have lost credibility. Pass this rule immediately."
Lawrence	"On January 13th 2023, as a result of a corporate merger, my position was eliminated Included in the separation document that is required for me to get my severance package, I am forced to agree with a non-compete clause. My company was a global company that merged with a global company. They have 10's of thousands of clients and subcontractors. By agreeing to their clause to receive my severance, I am basically unable to get employed in my very segmented industry of Electronic Security. Please stop this practice of employers unlimited overreach, even after they terminate the employee. Thank you. Best regards, Lawrence Burgio"
S	"This must pass and it must include healthcare workers - from MD physicians to technician workers. EVERYONE must be exempted from no compete contracts and the hospital private equity 1% cannot be allowed to get their way with healthcare worker exemption"
Jose	"I am a practicing physician and throughout my professional career have worked in underserved and suburban areas. Noncompete restrictions in contracts hinder the ability of a professional to deliver quality of care in front of the financial interest of the employer. There is a growing shortage in the number of medical subspecialties and now even primary care providers for the population of the United States of America in general, more so in rural and suburban regions. Noncompete restrictions hurt the population because when a physician may have any kind of disagreement with an employer (the great majority of those putting financial interests before quality of care) the physician cannot stay in the community and continue to serve the population that he/she has cared for, in some instances for many many years. The Freedom of one's decisions to provide the best care possible should not be obscured by the fear of having to uproot one's residence and in some cases family just based on verbiage included in a contract that typically employers are unwilling to negotiate. The free market, and individuals decisions should guide the geographical location where a person can be successful or a person chooses to seek medical care and not financial interests of corporations which headquarters are usually 100s of miles away from the area in question."

Paul	"I agree there should be an end to common non-compete clauses. It definitely prevents people from being able to expand their own opportunities. They are typically put in place with the employee under duress of not being able to start a job or keep an existing job. I agree with not being able to share a companies intellectual property from a technology perspective. But if a person has years in an industry and builds contacts from several companies/clients over the years it should not be considered intellectual property or restricted by a non compete."
Kathryn	"I support banning Non Compete Clause Rule. This is a positive step to helping particularly lower income people from derailing their work and career opportunities."
Judith	"As more and more physician practices are owned by hospitals, especially in primary care, noncompete clauses have become pervasive and harmful. When physicians cannot move a practice within a community without prolonged waiting period or a huge payout penalty, they and their patients are harmed. Physicians are forced to move and patients forced to find a new provider in a saturated market. This sort of financial imprisonment needs to be made illegal."
Matthew	"Absolutely, ban non-competes. They are horribly restrictive. I believe that they constitute an unfair and predatory business tactic."
Clayton	"Please end non-competes. As a worker I should have the right to navigate the free market to optimize my own work and compensation."
Christine	"I have worked for over 30 years in the Tecycling Industry and am barred by a non-compete to work in this industry should I leave my company. This is an agesious law/rule that prohibits me from getting a higher pay and furthering my career. In no way does this have anything to do with non-disclosure agreements. Please recind this ridiculous and constraining Non-compete clause by employers."
Eileen	"PLEASE ban noncompetes! This has long been a tool used by corporate conglomerates to suppress wages since to leave your job you can't go work for a better paying competitor in town, you'd have to uproot your entire family and move. Banning this would force corporations to treat their workers better!"
Shannon	"Dear Legislators., please vote to make Noncompete clauses illegal. I am a board certified family medicine physician of 21 years. I have had patients who I served for many years. When I decided to leave my job, those patients were left without their trusted Doctor because I had to move away from the "restricted area" of a non compete. These current regulations only serve to hinder care, ensure further breakdown of the medical system and penalize physicians from finding a practice that is not solely concerned about money rather than quality of care. From one physician standpoint, the system is broken. Allowing physicians to choose a position they feel will allow them to give good quality care directly to patients without having to move from their home, or traveling to other areas so as to not have a legal obligation of Noncompete hanging over them frees the system. It would allow access to patients with the same doctors who know them, have an established patient relationship with them and provide consistent quality care. I ask that you vote to eliminate Noncompete clauses. From a non physician standpoint I also believe this to be true as it does not encourage fair market rights. It does not encourage innovation and stimulation of local economies. This law is outdated and should be revoked"

Tara	"As a Licensed Counselor, I believe that Non-Competes should be banned. They are harmful to the therapeutic connection and leave many clinicians deciding between litigation and client abandonment. Mental Health Care should be protected in that if you find a counselor you like and want to continue if they are leaving the current practice, you should be able to continue with that counselor without repercussions. Many other states do not allow non- competes, and it is time for South Carolina to follow suit."
Amanda	"I support the rule to end non compete agreements. It puts people in a corner if they decide to leave their job but want to continue in that industry. It's either they start a new career or stay st a job they might hate."
Blake	"As a fourth year medical student and future psychiatrist, I have already seen how non-competes hinder good healthcare delivery. Doctors who would stay in underserved areas by opening their own practice are prevented from doing so by non-compete clauses in contracts. Instead they are forced to move away to new areas far from where the patients who they have already established with are. This leads to a lack of continuity in care and fewer doctors in underserved areas if there is one group that has been imposing non-competes in that area. Often times new medical graduates will want to work for a group for a few years before starting their own practice. So for example, if a new grad joins a group (and the group imposes a non compete clause) in an underserved area (it is usually easier to find jobs in underserved areas, so this scenario isn't uncommon) but then with a few years of experience wants to open their own practice, they will have to leave the area. Thus the group continues to maintain a monopoly in the area, patients are abandoned by a doctor who could have helped them for years, and the area remains underserved by healthcare providers. Of course there can be people who start a new practice in an area before agreeing to work with another group, so a group imposing a non-compete is not a true monopoly. However, in a time when healthcare stability is desperately needed in so many areas, any regulation that pushes talent out of an area needing healthcare is damaging to that area. Non-competes are certainly doing just that. This rule would be a big win for patients everywhere, especially underserved patients. I urge the FTC not to listen to the lobbying of large corporations who want to keep their bargaining power and put it above the interest of consumers—in this case patients."
Elizabeth	"Dear Federal Trade Conunission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them

	from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter. Sincerely, Elizabeth Dray"
Abigail	"I am writing in support of the FTC's ban on noncompete agreements. In veterinary medicine, non compete agreements are onerous and place significant stress upon those who sign contracts with them. If all goes well at the clinic, there is no problem. However, should the employee seek to switch employers they may find they are limited to rather excessive time/space limitations which would essentially require them to move in order to continue working, particularly for some specialties. Emotionally and financially this can be extremely distressing. For those seeking veterinary care, it may mean more limited options and suppression of less expensive competitors as the veterinarians find themselves limited in their ability to practice due to their non competes. I am not as familiar with non competes in other professions, but assume that it must be similar. Thank you for your consideration, Abigail Duvall, DVM"
James	"The current situation with noncompetes accelerate the physician workforce shortages that we are currently experiencing. There are many physicians that are forced to cut back clinically or leave the workforce entirely because they can not change jobs. The current situation with non competes make it difficult for physicians to speak out about poor patient care conditions at their current employer. This is due to physicians being "tied" to a certain employer due to non compete clauses. This causes physician to not speak up/take issue with things such as poor care delivery, poor quality care, unsafe workplaces, etc. A single physician leaving a hospital does not typically cause a big financial issue. If it does, the hospital needs to evaluate what role they played in the separation. If many physicians leave in a short period of time, the hospital needs to evaluate what role they played in the separation. Hospitals have had unfair advantages due to non compete clauses and have not provided good workplaces. The current proposal by the FTC needs to be revised to include non profit hospital systems. The majority of hospital systems in the US are designated as non profit hospitals and would not be impacted by the currently proposed changes. The current rule would yield an unequal playing field compared to independent physician practices and for profit hospitals. The rule definitely needs to be applied to non profit hospitals as well."
Cory	"To whom it may concern, I am writing with regard to the FTC's consideration of a change to address Non-Compete Clause rules. I am both a business owner, and an individual in the employment of another company. My primary means of supporting my family is my employment as a salesperson for that company. So, I am writing from the perspective of an employee. It has been my experience with non-compete clauses, that they unfairly limit competition in the employment marketplace. The FTC has taken significant steps to prohibit anti-competitive business practices, from one company to another. The FTC should address anti-competitive business practices in the employment workplace as well, and do so with the utmost haste. Non-compete clauses have the effect of prohibiting an

	individual from moving from one employer to another, thereby severely limiting that individual's ability to increase their own wages, or to improve their standard of living. On the other hand, they also limit the ability of companies from hiring the best and most experienced employees. Because they cannot leave without making a radical change to another industry, the employer does not pay the individual what they are truly worth, so the non-compete keeps wages down for affected workers. In addition to this, it has been my experience that potential employers will hire younger workers, versus those with more experience, to avoid the ramifications of hiring an individual under a non-compete. Effectively harming older workers more significantly than younger, less experienced people. I am, myself, under a non-compete agreement with my current employer. It has had the effect of prohibiting me from moving to another employer within my industry. It has created a high level of career dissatisfaction and limited my compensation. Beyond limiting the potential move from one employer to another, in the event that an individual gets terminated by their employer, and is under a non-compete, that document can prohibit the individual from gaining employment within the industry where they have expertise and experience. Because of this, it has the effect of keeping the American workforce from reaching its full potential. Furthermore, in the event that an individual leaves one employer for another, where a non-compete is in effect, where both the employee and the new employer have every intention of following the non-compete from the prior employer. Regardless, the former employer files the previous employee and the new employer, causing significant financial harm to both entities. I see this as a form of anti-competitive business practice, from multiple perspectives. Myself, I would like to see the FTC ban future non-compete agreements and clauses and nullify any that are already in effect. But in addition, I would like to see severe penalties put in place for companies that pursue legal action, or engage in other forms of harassment, against individuals in the company's attempts to enforce these agreements and clauses. I wish you all the best, and hope that the FTC takes action firmly and quickly as outlined above. Attachments FTC Letter"
Jimmell	"I am a practicing pediatrician for the last sixteen years. Since 2015, I have been an employee of a hospital owned practice in South Carolina. At the end of my contract this year, I plan to open a medical practice of my own. I do have a non-compete clause that states that for two years after termination of the employment agreement, that I cannot work for any competitor within a 30-mile radius. The 30-mile radius is problematic for physicians who are unhappy with their current employer and wish to find employment elsewhere. Case in point, the federally qualified health center in my town needs pediatricians. However, I am contractually bound to this non-compete clause and I cannot work there for two years. Think of all the underserved children that I could be serving if it were not for my non-compete clause. Also, the vague wording of any competitor concerns me. As one of the largest employers in my town, who would the hospital consider its competition? One would assume that the clause refers to another hospital. However, the hospital owns most medical practices in town as well. The only opt out is to start an independent practice or not practice in my field of pediatrics for another entity within a 30-mile radius for TWO years. These non-compete clauses end up placing all the power unfairly into the hands of large hospitals by limiting where a doctor can practice medicine. In the days post COVID, with the mass

	exiting of physicians from the front lines of medicine (by early retirement, shifting to nonclinical jobs or even sadly suicide), the time has come to get rid of this antiquated practice that has always favored big corporations over employees and small businesses. The fact that non-compete clauses interfere with competition may have been under the radar, especially in medicine, as there previously was much competition with private practices. However, for the first time in 2020, the share of physicians in private practice dropped below 50% according to the Physician Practice Benchmark Survey. Since 2012, the trend of healthcare systems buying up private practices, continues to erode competition in the medical industry between hospital owned physician practices and private practices. The competition now predominately occurs between the larger healthcare systems and the independent practitioners have been feeling the squeeze. The pressures of medicine including the loss of physician autonomy, the mounting administrative duties, and the lack of understanding of the sanctity of the doctor-patient relationship from hospital administrators have caused physician burnout at alarming rates. According to a recent bldg article by Dr. Peter Grinspoon at Harvard, "The US is expected to face a shortage of primary care physicians ranging from 21,000 to 55,000 by the year 2033." That is an alarming statistic for a nation that is also increasingly becoming unhealthier. I am so glad that the Federal Trade Commission is finally looking at this. Especially now with the rising doctor shortages and new concerns for patient choice and autonomy, these clauses explicitly hinder solutions for both. The elimination of the non-compete clauses would immediately give physicians the freedom to consider other options for employment or small business ownership. It would also provide patients more choices for where they can receive their medical care. I believe the elimination of the non-compete clause in contract agreements among physicians and hospitals across the country, will increase competition in the medical industry, but ultimately it will increase competition in all areas of industry. I plan to leave my employed position and start my medical practice non-compete in tow. I am hopeful that you will agree that non-compete clauses should be eliminated from all contractual agreements. This may be the impetus the medical field needs to right the ship before it sinks. Thank you so much for your consideration."

S	"Non-Compete agreements are the equivalent of modern-day, corporate enforced, slavery and having the governments of the various states be complicit in their enforcement is shameful. Companies have designed these repressive, self-serving and oppressive agreements to eliminate ordinary competition, restrain employee mobility, and suppress wages in the relevant labor market. Seeing the FTC finally lead action to eliminate these oppressive agreements is a welcome change that many others and I are happy to support."
Todd	"Healthcare non-compete clauses are a significant contributor to decreased access to care (particularly pertaining to rural settings), drive up the costs of healthcare while simultaneously lowering the value of care provided, and worsen patient safety outcomes. The sole benefit is that they allow large healthcare organizations to maintain their market share and stifle competition. As a physician from a small to moderate sized southern city, my plan was always to seek exceptional training elsewhere, and bring that expertise back to my home community to help advance the care of pulmonary disease locally. The city has a hard time recruiting outside talent, as it is not a particularly attractive market to those from other regions of the country. Therefore, I saw my return home as a success - an opportunity to gain a new and well trained physician who was likely to have a career that would span several decades. Instead, I find myself stuck working for a large hospital system that is continually cutting costs, continually understaffed, and has degrading facilities. I am not able to provide the care I feel my patients deserve within this institution. However, I am stuck working for a poorly managed organization if I desire to stay in my home town, serving the community I love due non-compete issues. The non-compete clause forces me to continue to provide care that is below my capabilities and below my patients' expectations. The non-compete clause forces my patients to stay within the current hospital system. The non-compete clause actually impairs people like myself from coming home and serving their community. It is largely able to attract outside talent only by offering large sign-on bonuses and elevated salaries to bring people into a community they do not know. In turn, these hires often only stay for the first 3 years of their contract (once the sign-on bonus no longer binds them) before moving on to another area of the country where they are not restricted by the non-compete. The non-compete discourages the timely reporting of patient safety issues (or even fraudulent billing practices) by physicians due to fear of repercussions from institutions to which they are chained by the non-compete. The non-compete is anti-capitalistic, and is low hanging fruit in regards to the numerous and significant shortcomings of the United States Healthcare System."
Thomas	"This is common in the medical profession and is significantly impacting patient safety and care when physicians cannot switch jobs in the same area to provide needed assistance to other hospital systems. At the same time administrators switch systems all the time for better paying jobs."
Michele	"Non-compete exacerbates physician shortages! And patient access to physician-led care! We shouldn't be stifled to say where we are abused. We need freedom to leave at will and go where we can practice in a nurturing environment."

Michele	"Non competes area way to hostage physicians. Why hold a physician back because you don't want to treat them well. You don't hold nurses or any other medical staff this way. Stop the non compete!"
Stephen	"I strongly support an out-right ban on non-compete agreements for individuals entering into an employment agreement As a young professional (28) ¹ have already had negative experiences with non-compete agreements that are too broad. Rather than limiting working in a specific role, non-competes are too general and lead to outright bans from industries. While employers do invest in the employee, the employee is also investing in themselves and in the company. To argue that a financial and time investment is being made by an employer but not being made by the employee who is actually doing the learning while performing is lackluster. My specific non-compete after discussion with legal counsel was Bound to be un-enforceable as it was inhibiting me from working in non-competitive industries an non-competitive roles in the same industry. The cost and time had to be incurred by myself to and many other may be unwilling to pursue that risk furthering the employer power in negotiation. While working in a sales role, I was being inhibited from transitioning into supply chain management from a non-compete with a 2 year, nationwide range Non-Disclosure Agreements and Non-Solicitation Agreements are already in place to protect industry and trade secrets of employers without negatively impacting the employee. Employers unfairly bundle these agreements into one agreement as well Since leaving my previous employer and the non-compete, I have been able to realize salary gains of 45% and transitioning into a role that better fits my skillsets"
Alane	"This is a step in the right direction to protect workers from slimy and biased corporate tactics to exude control over employees. Non-compete agreements restrict workers from quitting their jobs and taking new jobs at rival companies or starting similar businesses of their own within a specific time period. In doing so, these agreements have unfairly denied workers the freedom to change jobs, negotiate the better pay, and start new businesses. The FTC itself estimates that a ban on these agreements could increase wages by nearly $300 billion annually as they allow workers to pursue better opportunities. It's about time the government does something to benefit its electorate rather than politicians corporate donors!"
Corinne	"Please vote to end non-compete clauses for employees"
Tessa	"As a physician who has been subject to non-compete clauses I wholeheartedly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. My non-compete barred me from practicing medicine within a 10 mile radius of any office of my employer's practice for a period of two years. That would have barred me from working at any of the local hospital systems or most practices in a 3 county radius. Now that I am planning a return to full time practice I know that I cannot sign another non-complete clause like that one, which significantly limits my ability to choose a practice that is best for me. I think it is also important to remember that non-compete agreements in physician practices not only affect the ability of physicians to freely seek new employment but may indirectly affect the ability of patients to choose their healthcare provider. While I understand the desire of a medical practice to keep its patient base, that should not happen at the expense of patients. I firmly believe that a patient should have the ability to choose continuity of care with a trusted physician over profit for a medical group. Non-compete agreements in physician practices prioritize keeping patients (and physicians) hostage for profit over allowing them to make decisions about the best medical care for themselves as patients and physicians."

Steven	"The FTC must include franchises in the ban on noncompete provisions. The noncompete in a franchise agreement limits a franchisees ability to make a living at the expiration of the term even if the franchisee terminates the agreement. It enslaves franchisees to choose into signing a renewal agreement with much worse terms than their current agreement because they are locked out from earning a living if they don't."
Elizabeth	"Please pass this and make it cover all employees. I am an equine veterinarian and my current non compete is 30mi past our coverage area for two years. Our coverage area is over an hour wide. This means that I would have to move in order to get a new job. My boss knows I would have to move and it negatively impacts my contract negotiations because she knows I do not want to move. Removing non competes would make it better for employees to advocate for themselves."
CHARLES	"I couldn't agree more. Non-competes stifle competition, am absolutely key component of capitalism. It not only suppresses employee wages but also makes small businesses unable to compete for the best employees to suit their businesses hence making them less competitive overall."
Jamila	"The current non compete clause, especially in health care , is unconstitutional"
Candice	"I am in favor of banning all non-compete agreements. It harms me in my creative industry. My ideas are my own, I should be able to use them to benefit myself instead of waiting years because a company that was not paying me enough in the first place put a non-compete in my employment agreement."
Lindsay	"Our lives have been dramatically affected by a 3 year non-compete. My husband wasn't able to continue his career where we were at and the company who held the non-compete agreement had so many attorneys on staff and billions of dollars - there was no hope to fight it. So we had to move across the country with our three children to be able to support our family. Non-competes give some employers extra bargaining power to get employees to sign such agreements which leaves many employees in a less than ideal situation and they are stuck. Non-competes harm competition by blocking workers from pursuing better opportunities and by preventing employers from hiring the best available talent. Please vote no to non-compete agreements!"
Dean	"'Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness". Non-compete agreements are by no means an agreement. They represent unilateral threats of continued unemployment made to coerce a signature, designed to maintain power over an employee long after the employment is terminated. I am victim of such an agreement. I made the decision to terminate my employment because of the personal habits and business practices of the owners which were detrimental to the employees and the future of the company. I do not feel that because of a non-compete agreement signed under duress that anyone should be forced to stay

	employed in a toxic environment or not be allowed to work in their chosen industry within 2 states for 2 years. Non-compete agreements should be repealed to allow more competition and allow the public more options for goods and services and put pressure on bad owners and companies to change or get out. Thank you. Dean K. Carrie	"Being in a non compete was truly one of the worst things I've had to deal with in my career. Not only were my former employers unethical and immoral but then when I finally got the courage to leave I had to search fin- jobs outside of a 25 mile radius. It cost me money and my mental health dealing with their aggressive behavior towards me for over 2 years. Get rid of them, they only work for the employer and allows them to treat employees however they want because they know they have them captive."
Scott	"I have applied for many different leadership opportunities at my company and have been entertained by none of them. I have more experience than any of the managers I report to, most of the time I am training them how to do their job. I have an opportunity to grow my career at a competitor but cannot afford being jobless for 6 months due to the non-compete I signed in order to qualify for a bonus. The non-compete was signed 2 years ago, and since being required to sign it to be eligible for a bonus, they have not paid any bonuses. I love the work that I do, but not the people I do it for. Now I'm stuck in a dead end job until I can save up to be jobless for 6 months."
Carole	"Pm surprised this isn't already the standard It makes so much sense that a person can go to another company if they are being mistreated at their job. To require that they cannot work for another company doing similar work is ridiculous."
Kelly	"As a physician, I should not be restricted in where I may practice and therefore the community I live in, by my employment contract. Hospital systems create non-compete clauses with physicians with restrictions of 50-100 miles. Hospitals want to hold non-compete clauses over physicians as a way to keep them in undesirable contracts and poor staffing conditions. This restriction therefore affects patient care and quality by not allowing physicians to leave poor care situations to move to other hospitals. The expansion of some hospital systems to include multiple hospitals may restrict a physician to move out of state in the setting of a non-compete clause. As an emergency physician, I am not going to "steal patients" from a hospital system, nor or many other physician specialties. This would negatively care in rural communities. Please do not allow corporations to continue non-compete clauses."
Jonathan	"Noncompete contracts are an unjust means to force employees to remain with an employer who has no incentive to maintain competitive business practices and fair treatment of their employees, knowing that the employee bears the full financial and personal consequence of leaving employment. If during the course of the contract, an employee is mistreated and underpaid, they must either go without employment or pay fur their high skill set for the terms that may even extend beyond the working contract period, or relocate themselves and their family to a new location. Such a burden places an unfair binding of the person to their

	employer. The employee bearing this financial debt without pay is nearly modern indentured servanthood and why I, as a physician impacted by these non-competitive and unfair contracts, support the FTC proposal to prevent employers from entering into noncompete clauses with workers, and require employers to resend existing noncompete clauses."
John	"I was required to sign a contract with a non-compete clause when I taught at a for-profit college. I don't think there would have been an attempt to enforce it if I had accepted a teaching assignment at another school, but it certainly made me think less of my employer. The proposed rule is entirely reasonable. Existing IP laws are more than sufficient to protect legitimate interests of employers."
Daniel	"My ability to earn a living has been severely limited by a non-compete agreement. When the company I had been a sales rep for (for 19 years) was bought out by a much larger company, I was forced to sign a non-compete agreement just to keep my job. When my new employer let me go after about a year, they informed me that I couldn't call on any of my existing customers many of whom I had developed and called on for over 20 years. This was to be in effect for the next 18 months. I was later hired by a former competitor and began selling for them. Without the ability to call on any of my former customers (about 100 accounts) I was basically starting over as a brand new sales rep with lots of prospecting and cold calling. Needless to say, my income dropped dramatically. I was later wrongly accused of visiting some of my former customers and threatened with a lawsuit. At this point, I had to hire an attorney to help me deal with these false accusations and threats. This process was very costly and at my own expense. This issue is still pending and I worry about it every day. Many others are laboring under the same restrictions as I am. The unjust practice of forcing people to sign a non-compete agreement as a condition of their employment needs to be stopped."
Tait	"I support a ban on non-compete agreements, they increase employer power in an already unbalanced power dynamic between employees and employers. They also drive down wages and decrease competition."
Benjamin	"As a veterinarian, I strongly am in support of a total ban on non-compete clauses. It is standard in our profession to expect a non-compete clause as a basically a requirement for accepting a position. As a result of this, veterinarians are limited in their ability to negotiate, beyond being willing to uproot your life and move as a negotiating tactic. I personally know many veterinarians who have faced hardship over the consequences of non-compete clauses when leaving a bad work environment. The worst part of the situation is that from my understanding, most non-compete clauses are not legal or enforceable currently as is. The problem is that the mere threat or mention of enforcing a non-compete clause, prevents veterinarians from being able to consider their options. A personal friend that I know was sued for breaking a non-compete clause, and legal fees were at least $20,000, which fortunately were paid for by his new employer. This is completely one-sided and unfair practice to limit the geographical range of veterinarians, especially considering that the veterinary industry is riddled with depression and suicide. We need to empower workers to have the right to maintain residence in a location, while being able to negotiate for their own best interests without worrying about non-compete clauses."

Matthew	"I am a Resident Physician in the state of South Carolina practicing to become a board certified Family Medicine Physician. It has come to my attention that groups like the AFIA are advocating for physicians to be left out of the FTC noncompete ruling. I believe that this would be a grave mistake. It is physicians and other providers, not healthcare systems, that do the vast majority of patient advocacy for the community. Crippling our negotiating power severely reduces our ability to adapt and improve our services to better serve our patients. It disincentivizes our employers to heed our concerns about these issues and is a significant driver in work dissatisfaction, burnout and healthcare labor force shortages. Institutional policies currently determine - Who we can serve: determining which insurances we can or can't accept without physician input, delaying or preventing access to care for an untold number of patients. These patients then show up to the emergency room for complications of untreated medical issues, leading to astronomical bills with poor collection rates and increased financial burden to the patients and taxpayers. - How we serve them. For example, limiting our ability to perform certain procedures we are sufficiently trained in, both delaying treatment and increasing the cost burden to the patient and taxpayers by necessitating extraneous specialist involvement when not medically indicated. As physicians we currently have very limited ability to fight for new equipment and staff necessary to expand and improve the quality of procedures and surgeries. - Where we can serve: Punitive measures assessed by non-competes create severe financial penalties for young physicians, both increasing risk of relocation to positions in areas with severe health disparities and discouraging discerning, intelligent people from pursuing medicine as a career in the first place. As it stands, many young physicians have to choose between serving their community in environments detrimental to their mental wellbeing, switching practices and financially crippling themselves beyond an all time high student loan burden, or abandoning their home communities to avoid financial ruin with no guarantee of a better scenario in the new practice. For these reasons I believe physicians and all healthcare workers with patient contact should be included in the abolishment of noncompete contracts by the FTC."
Sal	"It would be mundane to reiterate what is already known by the FTC. A "covenant not to compete" ("Covenant") is a restraint of trade as well as burdensome to workers. It has long been contrary to public policy. To help explain better why, I can give a viewpoint as an orthodontist (dental specialist). As an employee, after signing a Covenant with a 2 year and 5 (or 10) mile restriction, if I begin to work for a company that I soon find out emphasizes profits above patient welfare, I am faced with a difficult dilemma. If I do what is best for the company, I break my ethical duty to the patient which is to do what is best for them. If I instead rightfully put the patient first, I have created a stressful work environment where I must fear for the loss of my job. With a Covenant in place, this means a move to a different city. This is very burdensome on the dentist, but even more so on his children. Fortunately, I have always put the patient first (even before my family) so I can look myself in the mirror; unfortunately, it has caused repeated moves in the last 19 years which has made things very difficult for my 5 children. While it is easy for even an outsider to see how stressful and disruptive it is to the life of my family, what may be less apparent to the same outsider is what Covenants do to the general public. For example, if the company charges $5,000 dollars for a set of

	braces that I do well, but it is delivered in an office that does not treat its patients well from a customer service point of view, those patients might seek another office. In a smaller town, that may not be possible which would require a significant drive to another town for the patient. However, if a Covenant were not in place, I could open up my own office in the small town, give them an exceptional customer service experience along with the same clinical result for the same $5,000. And I could likely give it to them for less than $5,000 because I would not have a bloated corporate structure which is full of inefficient parasitic load (aka, middle managers). This would force the corporation that I left to find ways to reduce overhead to become more competitive. Hence the public benefits. Some Covenants include language regarding 'Trade Secrets'. In all my 19 years of practicing, never have I been privy to these supposed trade secrets. Why? Because there were never any. I was clinically trained in school and for business training, we learned through the school of hard knocks. Owner dentists all seem to think they have invented the wheel. But business generally run the same: some more efficiently, others less efficiently. If some "supposed" trade secret were learned while employed which allowed more efficient operation. the subsequent taking of this information by the employee to another business or his/her own business startup could only help the public pay less due to the increased efficiency. With regards to the sale of a business. I can see the FTC's point here. If a dental practice owner sells his practice for $2 million dollars, then that is a large yoke on the new owner's neck to handle for many years. If the former owner opened up the next day right next door, it would basically be seen by patients as a transfer to next door. The new owner would be left with none or few paying patients. Yes they would have nice expensive equipment, but they would have a large loan and no income stream to service that loan. Meanwhile the former owner would open his new practice for $300,000, pocket $1.7 million and have an instant income stream. The new owner would close and the public has not had any increase in competition. I want to thank the Commission for turning its attention to this long standing problem which has been not only injurious to workers, but also the Public."

John	"I strongly feel non competes should be thrown out. Let workers move freely among the workforce. Most companies that enforce non competes are started because they didn't have one."
Ashleigh	"Large hospital systems are drawing the life out of doctors and they have become so big it is impossible to "get out of their zone." Doctors should be able to care for patients. Period. There should be NO stipulation of where a board certified, licensed doctor can work"
Ashleigh	"As a physician wanting nothing more than to provide excellent medical care to my patients, I am currently struggling with a noncompete versus a hospital system, who has managed to have a monopoly in the southeast. As the company gets bigger, the patient experience and well-being becomes less and less important. Physicians work hard to become doctors and should be allowed to take care of patients wherever and whenever available. Please get rid of this antiquated law and stop allowing the hospital systems to become so big that they no longer focus on patient care."
Kellen	"The potential positives from the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule far outweigh the negatives. Employees should be able to use experience garnered from working in their field to their advantage. The non-compete clause as it stands today

	hampers production and allows for businesses to become stagnant. If there is no competition, the original business will not innovate. The proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule will encourage industries and businesses to innovate which in turn would render a better product or service. Although this might hurt smaller businesses that have more specialized products or services, the best product or service on the market should win."
Matt	"Non-compete is a completely archaic and outdated process, especially during a time when we are seeing tech layoffs hit all time highs and many of those who have been laid off will not be able to easily get comparable jobs because they have non-competes that are valid even after a company forced RIF. Non-competes exhibit the ability to continue to work as well as innovation based on continued improvement."
Mary	"Technology companies are currently making non-competes broad and required to sign before starting at a company Banning these are essential for growth of the United States technology sector. I cannot support this more."
Cindy	"I totally agree with this change. I am in a situation right now where the employer is making changes which will decimate my number of clients because they will not like what is happening. Yet if I leave and want to service these clients many of whom I have worked with for 30 years I will have to pay 115% of fees charged the prior 12 months. I cannot afford to do that. So the clients will still leave over this and my professional practice will be decimated! Thank you for proposing it. It will probably be too late for me but will help another person."
Anthony	"Please do this. Sick of my employer thinking they have leverage on me due to a non compete. This will create competition, curb inflation, and increase wages. As it stands now the owners sit back and do nothing and collect all the money while holding us hostage. Please get this done for us!"
Marc	"I fully support this effort and it is long overdue! Let me use myself as an example. I work for HB Fuller company, as of —6 years ago as part of an acquisition. I'm technical - specifically a chemical scientist working in R&D. I'm an excellent employee and my boss and his boss would love to promote me, but they can't and won't even try because they know that I will not sign a non-compensating one year Non-Compete (no compensation during the period of non-compete) that you agree to abide and argue with under the law and courts of Minnesota (I live in South Carolina) - H.B. Fuller requires this of all new hires and promotions. I've never signed one because I was acquired from a bought company. I will never sign this because, if the company decides to lay me off, I would not be able to work in my field of expertise for one year - rendering me untouchable by the field I specialize in and having to settle for a new field, of which I'd be at a severe disadvantage for hire or salary. As it stands, an evil company with a reputation of non-competes could simply suggest to another company that their new hire has signed this, even if he or she didn't, and pretty much destroy his or her job offer. I can't believe this sort of thing is legal, and I beseech you to pass this rule - companies should not be able to hold any employee hostage to bad treatment or poor compensation by threat of a non-compete."

Marc	"I have previously commented on this proposed rule with full support of it as written. I feel compelled to make an additional comment after reading reporting on your comment process with some asking for concessions to your rule, such as not making it retroactive or limiting the rule to low-income employees (which may leave them intact for the most targeted of employees — professionals and scientists who are not executive level). I disagree with these changes. In the spirit of the chief complaint against your rule, that companies fear employees may disclose confidential information if they change jobs, but little acknowledgement that non-competes grant unprecedented power to an employer over an employee --- I propose that if you were to make any change to your proposed rule, it would simply and only be this: In any situation where a non-compete is allowed, then said non-compete MUST compensate said employee at least full salary and benefits during the period of non-complete, regardless of how the period of non-compete goes into effect. And this should be retroactive to all unexpired non-competes agreed to before this rule. It is awful that non-competes stop an employee from seeking the best compensating job they can find, but the two greatest fearful situations arising from a non-compete are 1) A company lays off said employee (essentially declaring that employee to no longer being useful to the company) and that employee cannot practice his trade anyway elsewhere and 2) that working conditions become very bad at a company for that employee, but an employee must endure it to continue to practice his trade. I posit that if companies' only concern on eliminating non-competes is to safeguard their proprietary information, then they should have no problem compensating employees with full salary and benefits throughout the period of non-compete if the period of non-compete is in effect, whether it be by layoff or resignation. I think, with the requirement that non-competes carry with them always full salary and benefit compensation during the period of non-compete, you'll find that most companies will stop using them."
Lee	"As an Emergency Physician working in a competitive market, non competes significantly hamper our ability to find work or leave abusive employers without having to move. There is no reasons to exclude physicians. Our local nonprofit hospital is the worst offender. Please do not exclude anyone. This is abusive to physicians who have no due process and no current ability to organize."
Taylor	"Non compete clauses stifle competition and harm a physicians ability to practice and earn an income for their dependents. A non compete can keep you in a situation that may not be ideal but can't leave out of fear of having to uproot the family. Lastly the non-compete clause harms the patient doctor relationship which should take precedence over a business"
Thomas	"As a worker, I do not want to be held hostage on mandatory non-compete clauses. If a company doesn't want to compete with the market they shouldn't be able to limit a workers fee rights to find work at another company just so their current company can pay them less. Please don't fail the public and bow to lobbyist money and do the right thing. We are so close."
Hallie	"Non competes are detrimental to physicians. It allows for no negotiation of salary and traps you in a terrible job or forces you to leave your home."

Tyler	"I support the banning of Non-Compete Clauses. In our previous city located in Georgia, my spouse, a Physician Assistant specializing in Cardiology, had grown weary of her current practice and was ready to find a new employer. However, due to her non-compete contract she was unable to find another job in cardiology within an extremely large radius. To find her new job, we ended up moving out of state to the Charlotte, NC area. So as a result of this non-compete, we were forced to uproot our lives, move out of state, and re-establish ourselves in a new area. The state of Georgia lost out on our tax revenue, in addition to the small businesses we used to support. And worst of all, the patients in that community lost out on being cared for by a skilled and knowledgeable Physician Assistant."
Joe	"These documents should be illegal and no longer allowed. They are anti-capitalistic. These does are used in to many none specialist positions and are now abused. I do not think companies now how to correctly use these without abusing them. I have heard that companies making people sign them after employees accept a job offer."
Veeral	"100% support the rule. Non compete clauses restrict physicians from working and earning a livelihood particularly if they were previously associated with a hospital, because the hospital monopolizes the area. In time of such health care need, these non compete clauses make no sense"
Kevin	"Doctors are highly skilled professionals who have invested years of their lives and a significant amount of money in their education and training. They provide essential medical care and services to their patients, and their skills and expertise are in high demand. Noncompete clauses are legal agreements that prevent employees from working for a competitor or starting a similar business for a specified period after leaving their current employer. Here are some reasons why doctors shouldn't have to sign noncompete clauses: 1. It limits patient choice: Noncompete clauses can limit the ability of patients to choose the doctor of their choice. If a doctor is prevented from practicing in a particular area, it can be challenging for patients in that area to access the medical care they need. 2. It restricts access to medical care: Noncompete clauses can limit the number of doctors available to provide medical care in a particular area. If doctors are prevented from practicing in a particular region, it can result in a shortage of medical professionals, which can lead to longer wait times and reduced access to care. 3. It can be unfair to doctors: Noncompete clauses can prevent doctors from practicing medicine in the area of their expertise, which can be unfair to them. They may have spent years building their reputation and developing a patient base in a particular area, and a noncompete clause can prevent them from continuing to work in that area. 4. It can impede innovation and progress: Noncompete clauses can prevent doctors from working on new and innovative medical treatments and techniques. If doctors are prevented from working for a competitor or starting their own practice, it can limit their ability to develop new ideas and advance the field of medicine. In conclusion, noncompete clauses can be detrimental to both doctors and patients. They can limit patient choice, restrict access to medical care, be unfair to doctors, and impede innovation and progress in the field of medicine. Therefore, doctors should be allowed to practice medicine in the area of their expertise without being forced to sign noncompete clauses. I, as an independent physician, support the FTC proposal to eliminate noncompete clauses."

Wesley	"Non-compete clauses disrupt our family's life forcing people to move outside of rural cities where anesthesia providers are needed for no real benefit to the company that requires it beside forcing workers to stay at one hospital even if better opportunities exist. It is anti-competitive practice and limits and disrupts providers lives. Please eliminate this as it is a corporate overreach and is unnecessarily harming families and rural communities"
Bethany	"Hello, As a Family Physician and medical school faculty member, I urge you to remove non-compete clauses. We already have enough problems getting adequate medical staffing in rural areas. Non-competes further disincentivize Physicians. Physicians do not want to risk getting trapped into a bad job or forced to uproot their families when considering new job locations. Thank you for your time and consideration regarding removing these excessive restrictions."
THOMAS	"I would like to share my thoughts on why Non Compete clauses should be illegal as it pertains to my specific industry & situation. I am a Chartered Property & Casualty Underwriter in the Insurance industry. I work for an underwriting firm that contracts out to several Excess & Surplus lines insurance carriers. We then underwrite P & C insurance policies for retail insurance agents in our designated area. We have many other competitors who provide the same type of service. These competitors: Also contract out to the same E&S Insurance carriers as my firm does Also solicit business from the same Retail Insurance agents as my firm does The main thing that separates the underwriting firms who operate in this space is service and technological innovation (which allows for better service to the retail agent). Upon my hiring, I was required to sign a 2 year Non Compete Clause stating if I resign or get fired I cannot work for any competing firm in this space for 2 years from the day of my exit from my present firm. If the other firms also have contracts with the insurance carriers that my firm has contracts with then those contracts are not exclusive and/or proprietary contracts. If the other firms call on the same retail insurance agents that my firm calls on for business then those retail agents are not exclusive and/or proprietary intellectual property. But yet, my firm restricts me for 2 years from taking a job, with a competing company that operates in this space. Rather, my Non Compete prevents me from furthering my career and providing a better financial opportunity for my family. Sincerely, Thomas
Sarah	"I am a resident physician and would like to specifically advocate AGAINST proposals to exclude physicians, nurses, and other skilled workers from changes to the non-compete clause rule. I live in a fairly small state (South Carolina), and my observation is that noncompetes negatively impact appropriate distribution of physicians within the community. Hospital systems use them to suppress wages and prevent flow of physicians through the community, which sounds fine until healthcare workers forgo public hospitals entirely in favor of private practice because they aren't sure if they can endure low wages and adverse conditions in the long haul, and they don't love the idea of literal banishment if a job doesn't work out. I appreciate the "poor little rich girl" view that some people take of this, despite young physicians drowning under hundreds of thousands of dollars in education debt that is required as an "entry fee" to be allowed to serve our communities, but it really is a serious and significant public health concern. Furthermore, I would ask why we specifically should be denied the rights of ordinary citizens. I do not matter more than anyone else, but I hope that I also do not matter less. Thank you for your consideration."

Stacy	"I am strongly in favor of eliminating all non-competes. This is h I am strongly in favor of eliminating all non-competes without exception. Especially for healthcare which should not run firstly as a business but foremost for patient care. Holding physicians and nurses to non-competes is in no one's interest but the corporation."
Brian	"Non Compete is a ridiculous archaic way of thinking People should be able to find work in their career field no matter how close it is to the company they left. I support the proposed rule by the ftc to end Non-compete agreements. They are unfair to employees seeking better opportunities. They also hinder those working in right to work States from finding employment in their chosen field."
Seth	"I'm a resident physician in Charleston, SC. This would be massive for healthcare. A lot of times patients lose their physicians because they leave a company or other group due to disputes or poor support staff or a myriad of other reasons, and unfortunately in those cases a lot of patients are hung out to dry without the physician they've had sometimes for multiple years. Sometimes there isn't a physician readily able to replace that individual as well and it can be difficult to find a new physician to resume their care and it's detrimental Watching corporate entities gut practices which essentially forces a physician out and then their forced to move is a story that is far too common in recent years. Having continuity with patients and also the providers in the city you work in is so important and getting rid of a way that corporations disrupt these relationships because of their interests would be a huge boon for patients and physicians alike as the people making these decisions do not understand the harm these noncompete clauses cause from a clinical standpoint."
Jeffrey	"Please take action against non-compete clauses. Iain a physician and have been negatively economically impacted by a non-compete clause. Non- competes are harmful to the medical profession and to patients who want to maintain a relationship with their physician instead of with a corporation. I am an emergency physician and my wife is a physician assistant. I work in an Emergency Department and the non-compete made it impossible for me to be the medical director for my wife's medspa because they viewed it as a competition. They had a one year post-employment clause as well which was detrimental to my wife's livelihood. Due to the radius of the non-compete our only option is to move to a different city. It's an American privilege to be able to work hard and make a living but these non-compete clauses take away the American dream."
Erin	"I agree with eliminating non competes. Companies are given more rights than individuals. People should be able to work where they please in whatever capacity that is and not be forced to move or have extended commute time just to be able to work."
Erin	"Noncompete clauses are predatory and only in the interests of big businesses. In a free society people should be able to change jobs without having to move! I am a physician and my noncompete clause directly harms people of my community. Should I leave my job, I'd have to move out of my town to find work and deprive the community of a physician."

Mitchell	"The use of non-compete clauses against common workers is an abusive practice designed to undermine the free market. It has absolutely no place in America and should be banned. If a company really wants to keep you off the market for a period they should be able to but only if you're paid at your full wage plus a premium for the entirety of the non-compete. Something akin to Garden Leave as it exists in the UK."
Alec	"I'm currently bound by a non-compete agreement with my employer. I have been at my current job for 5 years, and I do not believe that I will have another opportunity due to the non-compete. The only way I can get another job in my field is to move and relocate my family. I live in the area where I grew up and my whole family is here, so I feel trapped in my job for the long haul. There are good opportunities for me to transfer to another business, but I cannot get another job due to my non-compete. I work with a guy who has been at his job for 18 years without a raise, he has not been given any additional vacation time, and all he has done is work his life away without growing in his job. Our employer didn't have to allow him to grow financially or just give him more time off for his service because he has all of the power and my friend couldn't leave. Please make it illegal for my employer to enforce this non-compete clause in my contract. This would give me so much opportunity to better myself and family."
Michael	"I was recently fired for reporting my company to the Department of Labor because they pulled a scam on us and stole tens of thousands of dollars from we, the ground level workers. We are pest control technicians. My company became toxic all the way to the very top including the parent company. Very corrupt! They pulled a scam where they offered an incentive paying additional commission above our usual commission. 20% above pest control services and 10% above termite services. That was what they told us and unlike every other incentive they've ever offered, this time they refused to put it in writing In the end, some techs received a small percentage of what they were owed and some of us received none that was owed us. I worked very hard and EARNED the technician of the year award for the mid-Atlantic region and they did not give it to me and gave the award, along with the paid 3 night trip to New Orleans to the technician who was telling on me. The work environment there was extremely toxic. Management terrible! The workers terrified of fighting it. They fired me to get me out of there because they knew I reported them to the authorities. They fired me three days after I advised them that I had reported them and that retaliation against me is unlawful. Then, only to try to paint me as a criminal myself, which is what criminals always do to the good guys, they hired armed security to guard the office against me and even provided the guard a photo of me as to whom to look out for. Very humiliating and most definitely unnecessary!!! I got a job with another pest control company and when my clients found out where I went, they have now began to move to the company I went to work for. When they call me to service them and sign a new agreement, I simply refer them to the manager to sign them up. It did not take long for the toxicity of the poor management to find it's way to the clients. They cannot keep workers nor do they train them properly. They are two months behind in their services. They are performing February services in April! On top of that, they have increased their prices about 10% to make up for all the cancellations and refunds they have had to give. They are terribly dysfunctional, and their customers are very unhappy and that is why those customers are seeking me. I loved my clients and

	they loved me. I was ranked #2 in the entire company of 1100 technicians for cancelations. My customers did not leave me. They even told me that the only reason they stayed with that company was because they were loyal to me because of my loyalty to them. They became my true circle of friends and I truly want to continue caring for them. There is a whole lot more to my story! Now, I have received a letter from their attorney accusing me of soliciting their customers and telling me I am not allowed to work in pest control within 75 miles of the city where I live. I am in strong support of the legislation to ban non compete agreements."
Amaris	"I support the FTC to ban non-competes. I work as an RBT doing important work. However I can't provide services to people who need them because of predatory non compete clause from my former employer."
Adam	"As an employee that would need to either be unemployed for 1 year, or move to an entirely new city to find a new job, I support this rule change. I am a professional with a noncompete with a 10 mile radius, which completely encircles my entire town. To get a new job, I would need to move to a new city, creating a tremendous amount of inefficiency and waste."
Ben	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to you today to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. As a physician, I am deeply concerned about the effects of non-compete clauses on the health care industry and on the patients we serve. Non-compete clauses restrict healthy competition and limit patient access to specialty care. These clauses give employers an unfair advantage during contract negotiations, allowing them to limit the number of physicians available to treat patients in their region. This reduces the quality of care available to patients and can lead to longer wait times for appointments. Additionally, non-compete clauses often require physicians to relocate their families, disrupting continuity of care and making it difficult for patients to continue receiving treatment from their preferred provider. Non-compete clauses can also prevent physicians from taking advantage of new opportunities and taking on additional responsibilities. For example, if a physician is offered a position at a larger practice or hospital, they may not be able to accept the offer due to a non-compete clause. This prevents doctors from advancing their careers and providing the best possible care to their patients. The proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses is a step in the right direction and will help ensure that patients have access to the highest quality of care. I urge you to pass this rule and help create a healthier and more competitive health care industry. Sincerely, Benjamin D, M.D."
Ronald	"Non-competes are yet another chain corporation use to suppress wages and control employees. It allows them to not compete to retain their employees by limiting their ability to earn a living without having to uproot their lives and moving away. Non-competes must go."
Andre	"The non compete rule should include all medical providers including physicians. Non competes limit access to care and force physicians to endure terrible working conditions. It'll be the ultimate act of subservience to the for profit medical corporations if physicians are excluded from this."

Lauren	"This would help people in my profession tremendously. I am a Physician Assistant and was forced to sign a non-compete in order to renew my contract. Later, the company I work for discriminated against me for trying to take time off for maternity leave. I tried to find another position in my field and my company threatened to sue me. My company has made it impossible for me to practice somewhere else without leaving the city that my family resides. They haven't given me a cost of living raise for almost 10 years, but still won't allow me to look elsewhere without threat of being sued."
Patrick	"Please make this proposal LAW ASAP! I currently had my wages cut in half because of a non-compete and I have to pay for lawyer fee's for both parties and my ex-employer is trying to collect on money I haven't even paid taxes on. I can not afford the legal fees or the stress this is putting my family through. I thought non-competes were suppose to be for learning a business secrets but I was never taught anything and was convinced to leave my management position with my old company for a "better opportunity" only to make less than I was making I feel he lied to me and treated me poorly just to get me to sign his non-compete only to get rid of his biggest competition in the Myrtle Beach area. I was never taught or shown anything. this non-compete just says I worked for him and now I cant work near my home for 2years to provide for my family. I now have to drive hours away to make half of my usual earnings I can't believe this evil is allowed."
Kaitlin	"This would be such an incredible help. I am in a healthcare IT role where we've been told we can't work in any IT project management job for a year if we choose to leave. I've stayed with the company 12 years, even though I am wider compensated compared to consultants in our field. The fear of being without a comparable salary for 12 months keeps many of us - myself included - locked to the company. Colleagues in the market are making $30,000- $50,000 more for equivalent work, and get paid overtime wages. If we had the opportunity to move around the free market, my corporation would have to become wage-competitive rather than keeping talent for less than we are worth."
James	"Noncompetes in healthcare unfairly restrict healthcare providers. We are beyond the small town practice model with large corporations now controlling healthcare. Healthcare practitioners are now either forced to move (disrupting their families) or leave healthcare (in a time when they are sorely needed) to honor these agreements which are unfortunately more compulsory then optional in our current system."
Aaron	"Upon graduation with a four year degree I took a very low paying job in my career field. AFTER quitting my job and moving across country I had to sign a non compete agreement to keep this job. I feel that I do not work in my field of study due to having had to sign this 21 years ago. There is little to no place for a non compete clause in todays labor force."
Eric	"should apply to nonprofits as well a large majority of physicians are affected"
Laura	"I've been a physician for the past 14+ years. Non-competes seem to be standard in our contracts. The mileage and timeframe that are put in place make it extremely difficult to get a new job without relocating. For instance, with my most

	recent job I could not work within 25 miles for about 2 years. Any job that was available was over an hour drive each way. That's not conducive to spending time with my family and at the time newborn when I'm spending my time commuting. In the end, I relocated to another state for a job. I once again have a non-compete and should I need I/want a new job in the future I will be in the same situation I was just in. Why should I have to choose commuting an hour+ each way versus completely uprooting my family so that I can work??? It's kind of ridiculous. The reasoning behind it is also ridiculous. Patients go where there insurance covers them so it's not like I'd be stealing a whole patient panel away from a prior job. It's all about money and profit, which is very disheartening."
Sanford	"Noncompete clause is held by large hospital systems stifle competition, and lead to ineffective hospital management maintaining power, despite stagnation within their workforce. For large businesses, such as hospital systems to include noncompete, clauses, as a rule, is anti-competitive. Initially, building noncompete clauses will lead to increase cost for hospital systems with some workers may depart, this will ultimately lead to more favorable power dynamic for physicians and cost savings as redundant admin positions and positions with no healthcare value are eliminated to provide resources where physicians see will help their practices run more efficiently. Particularly in small towns, healthcare quality will be expected to improve with competition."
MARK	"My best guess is that in 80-90% of cases, a non-compete is just a bad idea. As a small business owner this issue really hits home. No business wants to spend time, effort and money to train a new hire, only to have them jump ship. A non-compete seems a simple answer but is basically worthless for all but a few types of businesses. Most businesses would be better served by offering a bonus for time served for an employee retention plan. Nonetheless, this is not a "one size fits all" situation and some businesses should have the ability to mandate a non-compete. Completely banning non-competes is a terrible idea. Sincerely, Mark "

	“I previously worked for a lawn and landscape company but was forced out. My previous employer had us sign a non-compete agreement. Upon my leaving the company I decided to do some research on starting my own company...Once they heard I was doing research they had their lawyers send me a cease-and-desist notice...Noncompetes are a severe hinderance to the individuals' right to provide for themselves and their families and only serve to keep as much revenue in big businesses pocket. Noncompetes are merely a crutch to allow them to do the bare minimum in regard to input and rake in the maximum revenue. Banning such practices should not only be considered but should be mandatory.” -Matt Swaney
	“I'm a sportscaster working as a weekend sports anchor in a small television market.... I sought out a position with startup organization that would allow me to essentially lead a sports broadcasting department....I would have also seen a boost in my salary. However, due to a noncompete clause that my current employer was not willing to reduce or waive...I remain at my current post with almost no hope of promotion and, furthermore, almost no way to work within my city in something resembling my current role...As much as I love working in broadcasting, I can't continue making the wages I'm on and support a family for much longer...I'm hardly alone in this and know many others within the media/broadcast industry effected like this by noncompete clauses....If you ban these clauses there will be real world benefits that people of all incomes will feel.” -Zach B.

I've done my job by creating sale[s] and business but my company has failed to meet the demands of the customers which results in lost accounts and lost wages on my behalf. I have a 2 year noncompete clause and how can my company hold me to it when I've done my job and they failed me? Doesn't seem right. I would like to move on but unfortunately at my age that's hard to do. I would like to see the non-compete go away.” -Rob Buxton

Taylor	Thompson	"Non-competes that last the lifetime of the employee and give leverage to the employer to threaten the employee during any attempt to negotiate are abusive to labor and the families they support. My noncompete would mean I could not work in my field anywhere in the US as it reads that I can't work any place we are currently, or they have plans to go to...This is not fair to me or my family, or frankly my field to restrict me from working. Please find a way eliminate noncompete as they decrease competition but also, they limit people from sharing their expertise and having the freedom to work in their filed.”

	"As a practicing physician I have seen non-compete clauses drive away many physicians from their communities and keep others in abusive situations with employers. Non-compete clauses are bad for communities, bad for patients, and bad for medicine at large. Please support a free labor market and implement this ban." -Harry C.
	"I am a software engineer...Non-competes are prolific among software developers, and they serve only to dampen career ambitions and punish developers for leaving. When you work within an industry, you develop a level of domain knowledge that makes you increasingly valuable to others in the industry, and non-competes stifle that by forcing you to avoid the industry you've just invested yourself for at least one or more years thus diminishing your value, especially in rapidly changing fields. This...limits the mobility of developers within a certain industry giving rise to an artificial ceiling that you can't break through unless stay at a single employer, thus limiting your salary prospects since, on average, a software developer can enjoy a 20% increase in pay by simply moving jobs....They are anti-worker in every shape and fashion and should be illegal." -Josh R.
	"The no-compete clause is the absolute worst experience I have ever had in my industry and I work in broadcast. I signed a 1 year no-compete many years ago. 4 years later, I still can't compete in Knoxville, TN, the home where I have been raising my family. It has become a 'forever no-compete'....it will now be 4 years that I cannot get a T.V. job in Knoxville, TN even though, I am one of only 507 Certified Broadcast Meteorologists in the country.... This is broadcast tyranny, at its worst. It needs to be overturned now and forever, especially in Tennessee, where it is especially egregious. Sadly, there are others here in Knoxville who are dealing with the same kind of oppression. It does not feel like the United States of America. The "no-compete" needs to go." -David A.
	"I am a CRNA (Nurse anesthetist) and my entire group was forced to sign a NCA immediately after a takeover or lose our jobs.... This practice should be illegal...this does nothing but kill the heart of capitalism that makes our country great and punish laborers in all fields.... we are talking about workers being forced to become indentured servants or move. Ban Non-Competes and promote the liberty of workers." -Deborah C.

	"I am a practicing veterinarian in the Middle Tennessee area....I had to make the difficult decision to leave my beloved colleagues and patients and move to a more flexible corporate role with a start-up company. My non-compete...was a whopping 15 miles for 2 years. Relocating really isn't a good option...I was not even performing actual clinical work in the state of TN. The mental duress this has caused me...have been immeasurable. Many of my clients are now forced to drive for over an hour to be seen in a location that is situated outside of the non-compete. In my opinion, it does very little to protect the interests of the actual companies and is more a bully maneuver to intimidate and rack up legal costs in pursuit of enforcing them. They are antiquated and need to go, for both the sake of both the medical professionals and the consumer." -Katie C.
	I worked in railroading for 23 years. We were required to work mandatory overtime...We were forbidden to contract out, seek other employment, perform any secondary employment, start a business or lease/rent out our personal equipment or operate outside or within Corporate positions, while employed as a railroad worker....We as contract workers were not allowed to seek employment with or start our own non-contract business while employed with the company. We were only allowed to work, the work the company mandated, the hours they appointed, at the location they dictated. -Thomas S.
	"Non-compete clauses in contracts hurt massage therapists like me and so many other industries. They're unethical and harmful. There is absolutely no need for them. There are plenty of clients and customers to go around but non-compete clauses often prohibit the city you can work in by creating a mileage parameter or other restrictions that make working within your industry at a different company almost impossible. And it makes the opportunity for opening a small business within that industry almost impossible. They do nothing but attempt to protect toxic management and companies." -Jacob W.
	"I work in the private investigation industry where a total of about ten companies commands the entire market. These companies consider themselves having national reach. The entry level employees making less than $50k a year are subject to two-year non competes in which we are not allowed to accept offers from competing companies. Due to the low number of companies, this creates an unfair competition and drives wages down...This career is my livelihood, and my father did this before me. It sickens me to see giant companies put a foot on what my father and others built. Please release us from these chains and allow us to make a competitive living." -Joshua W.

Greg	"I am in favor of eliminating the non-compete contracts. I have been unable to work for six months now due to a noncompete, because I do not have the ability to move outside of the region in order to continue my professional career. I have had to rely upon early retirement withdraws in order to take care of my family currently I'm working for basically 1/3 of my former salary until my contract ends in July so please remove this noncompete clause expeditiously."
Bret	"Non-competes do nothing but take volition away from the independent American. We live in a country based on the best system yet developed for governance: Capitalism. Capitalism only works if both sides of the coin, employees and employers, are able to fluidly negotiate to the most productive line of work. Non-competes hinder employees from moving to the better position, which hinders our Capitalist system from rewarding the better business. Please rid our nation of non-Competes."
Aaron	"I live and work in Tennessee, and my employer forces me and my coworkers to sign these non-compete agreements. I've witnessed my coworkers leaving on good terms to work for another company with the 'ok' from the owners, then two weeks later absolutely destroying their credibility at their new job by threatening their new employers with lawsuits, along with the employee unless that person gets terminated. It's absolutely an abusive tactic that removes hard working trade workers from an industry for no benefit at all to anyone but the owner's ego. Non-competes should be illegal for this reason. Hard working trades men and women should be encouraged to work and develop, not needlessly oppressed."
Chris	"While I am not directly impacted by non-compete, I am indirectly impacted. I have pets so if my veterinarian is impacted by a non-compete clause then that affects me as well. My pets deserve a doctor that I approve of, and it is difficult to always find the perfect match. When I do, I don't want to lose them due to their having to move or something. So please, no non-compete clauses for veterinarians. Please end them. Thank you."

Bhagirathbhai	"Can't agree more. Non-competes are used across the board to limit fundamental right to work and earn livelihood. I am a physician specializing in stem cell transplantation in patients with blood cancers. This is a very niche field with limited job opportunities since stem cell transplants are done at very large academic hospitals only....where I work there are two transplant programs within 2 miles of each other and both uses blanket non-compete clauses (10miles/for 2 yrs) with no exception if employer decide to terminate the contract without a cause. Non-complete effectively eliminates physicians ability to job different practice. More importantly, it severely limits choices for our patients who are forced to pick one health care system instead of his/her physician of choice. It also disincentives employers to make any effort in improving working conditions since they know we don't have any option but to uproot our families and move to different state if we want to still practice medicine. This became obvious during COVID19 pandemic where physicians were forced to pick up extra shifts without adequate support or compensation. I fully support FTC decision to blanket ban all previous and new Non-complete across the board."
Matthew	"Please eliminate noncompetes! I can nearly double my income and not uproot my family (kids 6/8/10 years old) in order to do so. I whole heartedly support this."
Lindsay	"Please BAN noncompetes!!! It will help our family significantly and not force my husband to relocate away from us for two years."
John	"This is a very important topic. Physician mobility is important not only for quality of care, but also for preventing position burn out. Position burnout also leads to decreased access to care for millions of Americans. Restricting the ability for some of the practice in the area after spending decades in training and starting their families integration into the communities should not be legally allowed."
Douglas	Dear Chair Khan: I am a practicing physician, certified by the American Board of Internal Medicine in the specialties of Internal Medicine and Cardiovascular Disease. For patients, the lack of access to physicians and medical care is a critical problem in the United States. Non-compete clauses, by restricting where and how a physician can practice, exacerbate this problem. Moreover, if a non-compete clause forces a physician to re-establish practice in a different geographical area, his or her patients must scramble to find another doctor. At a minimum, this disrupts the patient's medical care. However, frequently finding another doctor in a timely manner is simply impossible. Additionally, non-compete clauses stifle innovation and retard competition....”

Elizabeth	“Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades providing substandard care, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change....In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations....When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency....We can better do this if we are able to hold the systems accountable. Getting rid of non competes en mass will help this.”
Georgia	“Support for ban of noncompete clause is 100percent. Please do away with requiring this.”
William	“I live in TN, here there are noncompete clauses in almost every industry and every job at every level. Most are not enforceable, however, they are a scare tactic to try to keep people who don't know their rights exactly where employers want them, trapped and desperate. For example, you see them even in minimum wage jobs where the employee is never privy to any company "secrets" or sensitive information, why does a pizza delivery place like Domino's make its delivery drivers sign one then scare them with the idea they could go to court over the fact they decided that maybe another delivery chain would be a better place for them to work? It's absurd and on some levels abusive.”

Randall	"This new rule to ban non-compete clauses would be amazing and help workers. I fully support this rule."
Michael	"Banning Would Be Great. They seem to be a terrible disadvantage to workers."
Leanne	"Employers need to stop trying to make it harder for employees to make a decent living."
Drew	"Please ban this as our country was built on the basis of this and this has become a tool for corporations to manipulate employees. Time to bring back fair and open competition and pay people what they are worth. Please Ban non-competes."
Gary	"...Presenting tools as non competes as a means to cause undue physical, mental and financial burdens to employees and their families....Business wants to control competition by targeting the employee by forcibly signing Non Competes, Forced Arbitration and Forced Non Disclosures. Business chooses to burden their employees as a means of keeping them from forcing higher wages and greater benefits....Controlling wages, benefits and turnover permits the businesses to control expenses and leverage employees. Non Competes also allows Business to lower wages, shed benefit cost, vacation, holidays etc....It also allows business environments to be more controlling, toxic and abusive. Non Competes have gone from competition as a new business start up to the abusive use to influence employee behavior and movement....This is a NEW form of modern day involuntary servitude! Non Competition Clauses have nothing to do with Competition! Non Competition Clauses are anti-worker (employee) tools to stifle growth of wages, turnover and benefits! Also intended to stifle free market ideals to protect their own market share...."
Gary	"NON-COMPETES ARE A CLEAR VIOLATION OF THE 13TH AMENDMENT. NON-COMPETES ARE A CLEAR VIOLATION OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION..."

G.	“Non competes deserve more scrutiny from excessive abuse of power over employee rights. The ability to limit and control employees from making a living within an immediate area. This over reach of power is abusive....Non Competes are unnecessary and PRESENT a undue burden on the employee to find gainful employment as a laborers or want to be business owners. Non Competes have warned off employers from hiring. Employers have become concerned of being sued as well. No one company should have any control over employees choices once they left their employment....These blanket involuntary and arbitrary tools squash competition, enslave employees to substandard wages. Competition is not a threat to any established company! Non competes are...enslaving workers to stay with unethical and abusive work environments....Non Competes are anti American, Anti Democracy, Anti Worker and Anti free market. It is complete violation of a free market ideology. One supervisor told me "If you don't sign these documents. There is no job!"
Greg	“I fully support this Non-competes limit freedom and vastly hurt the marketplace.”
Geric	“I am 50 years old and I have been working for this company in Tennessee for 7 years. I have an opportunity to go and make more money before retirement but I have 1 year Non-Compete that is standing in the way for the prospective hiring company. I feel trapped by a decision I made 7 years ago and I have made this company a lot of money as a salesman and manager. I am not a President Biden fan but this is a great thing to help the middle class. Please get this passed ASAP so companies cannot hold people hostage. Thank you.”
Christy	“American healthcare and American physicians are increasingly employed by private equity or for-profit entities. These companies seek to limit care by creating monopolies within geographic areas that supress physician's ability to speak up about safety, control costs, and ensure that our healthcare ethics are well represented using our training. In healthcare alone, implementing this rule will allow for better care, more access to physicians, and decrease the power that for profit companies have over the health and wellness of American society.”
Erin	“This could help me greatly. I am an aesthetic nurse and after my contract is over with my current employer, I will have to drive 20 plus miles if I want to work somewhere else. This puts a strain on my family and finances and limits my growth potential.”

Jacob	“Non-compete agreements should absolutely be banned. Case and point: I have a non-compete agreement where I work, I've been verbally abused, had my commissions docked, and blatantly (on recording) told to commit insurance fraud on the company's behalf... I refused to do so, in doing so starting a never-ending problem with the company where they now look for anything and everything to single me out and yell at me for.... Long story short, this led me to look into leaving the company, which brought up my non-compete. But since I have this non-compete, if I leave the company, I have to completely change industries (anything to do with construction) or move 50 miles away. This is absurd! So now, I'm forced to leave the company because I refused to break the law for them, and I'm forced to move and or completely change industries? This should not be allowed at all. Having non-competes agreements does nothing for the employee but wreak havoc but gives employers the freedom to treat their employees extremely poorly with little to no fear of the employee leaving because he/she is bound to an agreement holding them in place without a viable way out of a bad situation....Non-competes take away free enterprise, freedom to work where you choose, and gives employers way too much power without fear of competition or repercussions and potentially puts employees at risk of what's essentially extortion. My goal is to start my own company, and when I do, I will never have a non-compete agreement whether its standard process, widely accepted or not.... Competition and entrepreneurship are a beautiful thing. Isn't part of what we have the right to in the USA the right to life, Liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? Couldn't you say that a noncompete directly inhibits one's ability to that pursuit? That's the way I feel and everyone else should too. I've been robbed of my happiness to no fault of my own and now have to seek legal action to have any hope of getting it back and I would never wish that upon anyone.”
Chase	“I've worked for the same company for 16 years but have only been under a NCA for the last 6. While I understand the argument for the investment a company makes in hiring and training an employee, a NCA only makes sense if it's tied to an end date that balances with the training period. Since I entered my NCA, my income growth has slowed considerable from the first 10 years, and the company's attitudes towards incentives has shifted as more employees have been asked to sign them. I agree that they decrease competition and support this proposal.”
Michael	“I believe that non-compete clauses hurt consumers, stifle economic growth, and prevent workers from improving their workplaces and personal growth opportunities. I further believe that non-compete clauses are fundamentally un-American as they prevent citizens from freely exercising their right to pursue

	happiness. Shortly after graduating from veterinary school, my wife entered into a contract with a local veterinary hospital in our hometown.... We realized that the non-compete clause in her contract prevented her from working in our hometown whether she resigned from her position or was terminated by her employer with or without cause! When she asked to renegotiate that part of her contract, she was told it was not up for renegotiation. At that time, she decided to leave her place of employment. For the next three years, she traveled at least 30 minutes away (many days much further) to find work as a relief veterinarian. This caused her to sacrifice time with her friends, family, and pursuing hobbies and other activities that brought her happiness. Her employer was more worried about preventing her from becoming competition than they were about anything else related to this issue."
M	"Why are we still having this conversation?? The year is 2023, it's time this antiquated idea is ditched. Women and minorities are being hurt financially by this. It's time that they are free to make a decent living not dictated by those of a higher power. EVERYONE deserves to make a decent wage!!!"
Ahmad	"I believe noncompete clauses are unfair to both patients and physicians and allow employer to take advantage of physicians because they know how hard it is for physician it will be to leave current practice and relocate especially in the current housing market and expenses of relocation. I have non-compete in my contract that bans and from practicing 30 miles radius. My patients are not able to see another physician in the area including my hospital system employer due to every provider being booked six months in advance. Noncompete will cause discontinuity in my patients care and lead to bad outcomes. Noncompete clause is sacrificing patients' health to put more money in big hospital systems CEOs' pockets."
Brandon	"Non-compete clauses further disenfranchises hard working Americans and limits their ability to move through the free market."
Muhamed	"Please end the no compete clause that hurt physicians from departing other practices or organizations."
caroline	"Definitely support making non-compete clause unconstitutional. Non-compete clauses are detrimental to the employee and only benefit the employer. How can one prevent someone from using their skills to support themselves or their family?"

Nicholas	"I am currently working a job which is withholding wages and has not rescinded a non-compete. This gives my employer the ability to abuse me and I can't go work for someone else."
Randolpho	"While I support the spirit of this proposal, I worry that it does not go far enough.... I agree that such a contract is anti-labor and should be disallowed, you are not banning non-compete agreements that are in place WHILE employed. Non-competes that are in place during employment affects employees who wish to do additional contract work on the side or even to have a second full time job should their economic situation require it. While this rule is a great step in the right direction, it's not the end of the road. I strongly urge you to consider changing your language to eliminate ALL forms of non-compete contracts, including while employed."
Minoo	"As a practicing physician for 20+ years, and in a field of organ transplant where I can only work as an employee in a hospital setting, the noncompete agreements, have a chilling effect on the ability to provide quality care, and deliver value in our local community."
Jason	"Dear FTC and Chair Khan...This rule should apply to physicians just like any other skilled worker, no matter if they work for-profit or non-profit entities...non-competes affect physician autonomy and well-being in so many ways. Burnout and general malaise of such a noble call is running rampant and many of the contracts' physicians are placed in is often the cause. Patient access to healthcare is also suffering due to these non-competes. Physicians cannot help in areas that patients need because they may be working 10-15 miles away at another location. Healthcare will not suffer and will benefit from more competition, which in turn should help patient outcomes."
Ned	"Non-compete clauses make it very difficult for physicians to transition jobs as their lives change. Hospitals, on the other hand, can hire at will which leads to an unbalanced free market. This leads to increased burnout among physicians, which leads to decreased quality of physicians ultimately for patient care."
Andrew	"I am currently being pressured by my employer to sign a non-compete document and NDA. The NDA is somewhat understandable. However, the NCA is unacceptable. Its draconian nature creates a poor work environment and culture. One where employees work and produce results based on fear and anxiety

	rather than pride and a striving to excellence. It introduces a level of resentment into the employee/employer relationship with the employer basically admitting that maintaining a desirable workplace and environment is so low on their list of priorities that they will seek legal help to ensure they are not required to do so. When equal effort could be placed on maintaining a fair, competitive and desirable workplace that would produce far superior results. My employer requires all employees, even those at $14/hr to sign these. It is a predatory practice that needs to be done away with."
Sarah	"...I appreciate what you all are doing and pray this ban goes through next month."
Nathan	"I request that you ban these noncompete clauses, as they cause so much difficulty for no compelling reason. Thank you."
Mary	"Non-compete agreements for physicians should be made illegal. In the case of physicians, these agreements can have a detrimental impact on patient care and access to healthcare services. Non-compete agreements for physicians can limit patients' access to medical care, particularly in rural or underserved areas, by preventing doctors from practicing within a certain geographic radius. This can lead to patients traveling long distances to receive medical care, which can be particularly challenging for elderly or low-income individuals. It can also lead to an increase in healthcare costs as physicians who are able to practice in certain areas can charge higher fees due to decreased competition. Moreover, non-compete agreements for physicians can prevent physicians from pursuing alternative opportunities that may better serve their patients' needs...non-compete agreements for physicians can also have negative consequences for the physicians themselves. These agreements can limit their ability to negotiate their salaries or benefits, as they may not have the option to leave their current practice for a better opportunity. Additionally, it can restrict their ability to pursue their chosen field of medicine or to work with patients they have developed strong relationships with. In conclusion, non-compete agreements for physicians can have far-reaching negative consequences for patients, healthcare providers, and the healthcare system as a whole. I strongly urge the government to consider banning non-compete agreements for physicians and to work towards creating a healthcare system that prioritizes patient care and access to medical services."

Laura	"I am a young physician with $350k+ in debt and almost every physician contract contains a noncompete clause. This prevents me from practicing medicine where it best suits me and my career and can negatively affect my family as well if I end up having to quit or leave. Additionally, this could negatively impact patients with whom I have established relationships with."
Kevin	"Ban non-compete clauses immediately. They harm workers and only protect corporations."
Lusine	"... Physician non-compete clauses are unfair and should be illegal. They decrease flexibility and harm morale. They hinder appropriate competition."
Christin	"Non-compete clauses allow hospital administrations to use scare tactics to prevent physicians from reporting patient safety issues. It also makes it so physicians are tied to one organization and eliminates healthy competition for the market and contributes to driving up costs. People are forced to stay in abusive situations and employers have no reason to change."
Rory	"I am a doctor working in pediatric genetics . I am unable to move jobs due to a non-compete clause. This stops me being able to start my own company that would allow me to treat more patients with genetic disease. Therefore, this clause harms patient care by limiting the amount of work I can do. Therefore, I think this is a great change of rules and I welcome it."
Michelle	"I strongly support a decision to ban non-compete agreements. I work in the real estate industry and while working as a property manager within my real estate company, I was forced to sign a non-compete agreement. I was brought into my supervisors office and forced to either sign the form (5 years AFTER my employment had started) or get fired on the spot with no paycheck that week. Having no other option for income, I reluctantly signed the agreement. I worked for years to build relationships with these clients and many of them wanted to buy and sell homes with me as their agent, only to be told no and that I had a non-compete agreement in place. This has resulted in me losing out on thousands of dollars of income to my family and has caused my client data base to be reduced by at least 70%. I can't believe employers are allowed to dictate the livelihoods of tax paying Americans and hope this law is changed soon.”

Louis	“Rich need to stop being allow to control workers future???”
Jason	“Non-competes are bad for consumers, workers, and innovation. The only value they have is for small-medium size employers that want to stifle workers’ wages and competition. Full stop. Non competes are shackles for workers.”
Steven	“I fully support this rule. I am currently under a noncompete with a company that is under performing and has since enforced a hiring/promotion freeze thus limiting my chances for upward mobility. I find it completely unfair for me not to be able to seek employment elsewhere in the industry I've been a part of for last the eight years due to this noncompete.”
Joseph	“This proposed Non-Compete Clause is long overdue, and will be a great help, particularly to lower income workers who are basically trapped by the present conduct of many industries. I support it enthusiastically.”
James	“I am a graduating resident physician ...the non-compete clauses in every contract I see keeps me from being able to gain any leverage with my potential employers despite my specialist training and procedural skills...I would both have to move to a completely different city it state because one of us in trapped in a predatory non-compete is one of the most challenging parts of deciding where to practice....Please press on in undoing the legality of non-competes. They stifle competition by keeping all the power in bureaucratic hospital systems' hands despite my hands and mind being what actually heals my patients.”
Nick	“I support banning Non-Compete clauses in the US. They stifle innovation and limit opportunity. In my previous role, I signed a non-compete clause and when the company took a turn for the worse, I was forced to be very careful to find a new job in a different industry out of fear of breaching my non- compete. There wasn't any proprietary information I was privy to that would have help similar companies anyway, but nonetheless I was barred from accepting positions from them due to my non-compete contract.”

Ashley	"As a physician, I oppose non-compete clauses. We deserve the right to work."
Susan	"I applaud this document and support it fully. However, it is absolutely vital that physicians and other medical personnel are included. Not only is it discriminatory to carve out certain professions from inclusion, it reinforces a tremendous hardship. Physician employees should have every protection afforded to other employees.... Non-compete clauses in physician contracts essentially enslave physician employees, as it is nearly impossible to change employment without selling one's home and uprooting one's family. There is no logical reason why a spouse would need to move and change jobs, nor why children should be moved from their school and community, if a physician wishes to change employment. Non-compete clauses detrimentally affect provision of healthcare services in rural and underserved areas, as local physicians are unable to seek employment in their community if they choose to switch jobs. Removal of non-compete clauses for physicians would result in healthcare employers improving work conditions and employee satisfaction, which would directly improve the quality of health care. For example, a hospital that provides adequate staffing would attract healthcare employees and improve patient care, while a hospital that chronically understaffs will be forced to improve the working conditions or not be competitive in hiring employees. Without non-compete clauses there is no incentive for healthcare employers to provide adequate staffing and resources for safe patient care, because employees are essentially trapped in their jobs. I strongly encourage you to provide all physicians and health care workers with the same advantages of this proposal as any other worker."
Josephine	"I have a strict non-compete on my contract. It lists two counties that I would not be able to have employment in for 24 months past my termination. I have a new job that I will be driving 45 minutes to one office and another 1 hour and 15 minutes each way to avoid this non-compete. This clause is a disservice to the community receiving quality care. My colleagues and I would greatly benefit from Banning Non-Compete Clauses."
Ron	"I agree with the FTC - any and all non-compete agreements should be void... Companies use it against employees to prevent them from going to a competitor. Pay your employees what they are worth, or you may lose them. Value your employees. Technical info related to proprietary products could result in certain agreements- computer, pharmaceutical, etc."

Joseph	"It is very important to ban non-compete clauses
Kelly	"Kudos!!! Thank you, first of all, for considering this change. I work under a non-compete that has not only a time constraint, but a large geographical one. I would have to move my family, have my children change schools, and sell my house in order to change jobs OR sit out of my line of work for a year. I highly recommend, on behalf of workers like me, that the FTC do what it can to eliminate non-compete restraints."
Kelly	"I just received the draft of my new contract with a company that I have been with for 12 years. The contract includes a non-compete for 2 full years with the inability to work within my county and / or within a 10-mile radius from my current office. My county is large; the total area of 526 square miles. To top it off, there are no increases in wage for cost of living during the initial three years and the contract renews automatically. Of note, I have not had a raise in 3 years. I feel like I am stuck and that the non-compete language is a huge part of it. This same contract is reportedly being offered or has been signed by more than 300 of my colleagues. Please, please help level the playing field for the average worker. Thank you for considering."
Josh	"Non-Compete clauses are archaic and are never in the interest in the employee. Do away with them for good."
Grant	"I am fully in support of the FTC's proposed rule on Non-Compete Clauses. I have been pressured by employers to sign non-competes that would have kept from finding another job in my field for years. One employer let me go because I refused to sign the non-compete. Even if a court would not uphold the clause, the cost of litigation is extremely prohibitive to an employee and so makes it an unfair and effective tool for employers to push employees around."
Joseph	"I will be working in Nashville, TN as an anesthesia professional after graduation in December of this year. The largest provider of anesthesia in Nashville is AMG, which requires a non-compete clause. Being that this company has contracts with the majority of medical institutions in the greater Nashville area, it severely limits the ability to be able to work as contract labor for any of those facilities. Non-compete clauses in healthcare severely limits availability of medical care to patients. Please vote to end non-compete clauses."

Brennan	“Non-competes are completely immoral and stifle what little opportunities workers have in negotiating better wages and improving their financial situation. It is completely contrary to the ideas and values of free market competition. If employers fear losing valuable employees, then employers should give the employee reasons to stay and grow with the company, not strong arm them into staying in unwanted positions over fear of lawsuit. I fully support this rule to ban non-compete agreements in all workplaces.”
Rosa	“As a physician, I find it disheartening that you are trying to exclude us in noncompete clauses. We are slowly being stripping of our autonomy, increased demands on workload with pay cuts. Now you want to limit our ability to work a practice in an area without having to move. What is your motivation? This is only leading to our burnout and undermining our ability to care for our patients and have a life at the same time. A physician should also be included in this committee and decision-making process.”
Otis	“I completely agree with banning these anti-competitive agreements. The individual typically has no leverage in the negotiations with a potential employer.”
Jordan	“Yes, non-competes are silly. Anyone who wanted to move to a better job should not be encumbered by a non-compete agreement.”
Glenn	“I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. That is antithetical to the freedom the constitution guarantees. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone.”
Sloan	“I would like to comment in favor of the proposed rule and add additional context. I interact with a national anesthesiology company that uses noncompete language to bind employees. Recently, it has become increasingly clear that the company also uses noncompete clauses as leverage for negotiating hospital contracts. Last week, the company issued notice of withdrawal of

	services from a very large community hospital in my town. Implicit in this was the fact that the anesthesiology providers (both physicians and nurse anesthetists) were bound to the company through noncompete language, and that this withdrawal truly meant that this large hospital would be without anesthesia coverage and thus significantly compromised in providing critical services upon which our community relies. It is important to note that anesthesiology services are becoming increasingly scarce, especially in the hospital setting, and loss of a large practice like this would be a long-term endeavor (months to likely years) from which to recover. In the meantime, critically ill patients would suffer from the lack of access to care. Elimination of noncompete language as proposed would protect hospital systems from such abusive negotiation tactics. It would allow the employees of the anesthesiology company to remain employees of the company if that is favorable to them, but it would also allow them to separate from the company and continue to service the hospital if the company were to fulfill its threat to withdraw services."
Julie	"I strongly encourage you to adopt the proposed rule changes for non-compete agreements. I'm among the millions of Americans living in states where these agreements limit our career flexibility, and effectively remove our capacity to advocate for ourselves in the workplace- because we have no alternatives. This oppression robs even the best employees of creativity and destroys the potential for a vibrant, mutually respectful work environment. Our country flourishes when its people are allowed to flourish, not when we are either locked into a circumscribed role or shut out altogether from being a part of the work force...."
Juan	"I am a practicing Physician (Neurologist). My specialty is in great demand and everywhere I have worked patient access has been an issue. I typically have wait times of over 6 months to see new patients, some who have urgent medical needs, which leads them to get second tier-delayed healthcare and suboptimal outcomes. I have had to move in two occasions in my career due to a non-compete, causing not only substantial personal, family, and financial disruption, but more importantly leaving communities deprived of much needed services because the interests of the employer through a non-compete were placed as a priority over the needs of the community. Employers, in my case health care entities who employ Physicians, ought to create other types of incentives that reward longevity, advocacy and engagement within the organization, and provide a network of safety that encourages retention, rather than force it through non competes, which breeds hostility and only benefits the employer at the expense of access to healthcare. Therefore, I wholeheartedly support a ban on non-

	compete agreements and applaud the actions of the FTC in doing away with this unethical (at least in healthcare) practice.”
Virginia	“My husband, a physician boarded in internal medicine, nephrology and critical care, and father of 3 children, had a non-compete working for a private practice in Pensacola, FL which after 5 years employment paid him below average salary and continued to increase his on-call schedule. We had to leave the state for him to be employed and to get fair compensation. This was a great disruption for our family - home, schools, and my career. It took us 18 months to sell our home at a loss, our children struggled in their new schools, and I lost my business. The economic losses were great - paying mortgage, utility and insurance costs on an empty house, rental housing, utilities and insurance for the new location, loss of my income, and costs to be licensed - medical, driving - in a different state. The worst, is that the patients in FL suffered a lack of timely medical care because not only my husband left, but so did another nephrologist.”
Andy	“Some contract holders and hospital administrators control emergency physicians through exploitative contractual provisions. These provisions include restrictive covenants that control where emergency physicians may work upon contract termination, violating their professional rights and effectively preventing them from advocating for their patients. The threat of termination from a hospital medical staff, as well as a restrictive covenant, may prevent physicians from advocating for their patients if the hospital or contract holder opposes such advocacy. AAEM joins other professional organizations in taking this position. The American Medical Association strongly discourages the use of post-employment restrictive covenants in physician.”
Aaron	“I am under a non-compete agreement with my current company. Signing it was a condition of a recent promotion. I'm very happy at my employer, but I am worried about my ability to provide for my family if I was to lose my job. I support the ban on non-compete agreements.”
Angela	“I completely agree that noncompete rules should be gone. This is a old fashioned rule and creates problems for people who want to get away from an overbearing boss/company. I think its long overdue to get this rule gone.”
Berneet	“I do not have a non-compete now, but I have signed contracts with a non-compete before as a physician and had to move when administration abruptly changed the terms of compensation and the way the practice was run. I was rapidly burning out after the changes were implemented, and it was hurting my health. I

	knew that if I kept going, I was going to hurt my patients by not delivering the best possible care that I knew I could provide. I know what it feels like to have my autonomy suddenly challenged and have nowhere to go without having to move from the area entirely. But that was exactly what I had to do for my sanity - I moved. As stated earlier, at my current employer, I do not have a non- compete, thank goodness!! But after a change in leadership, some of my younger colleagues who came later did have to sign them. It amounts to a golden handcuff on our ability to practice. For physicians, it is not always about salary - it is also about burnout, patient care, on-call requirements, personality conflicts, changes in leadership, autonomy in our practice of medicine, disputes in how our productivity is measured, among a myriad of other factors that determine our satisfaction in the practice of medicine. And the practice of medicine is changing ALL the time! I understand that our employers (usually large hospital systems) do invest time and money in our onboarding, and the initial contract at hire can reflect a time limitation during which they should be able to recoup that initial investment and know that we aren't going to leave before they do. But there needs to be a limit on this, after which we should be free to leave without having to move homes and families to do so. We may start under one set of administrators or department leadership, then there is a change in vision and leadership, and all of a sudden, the mg is pulled out from under our practice and everything is different. I feel for my younger colleagues who can't leave as easily as I can. There should be no exceptions for any type of employer-worker relationship, despite the salary or "learned profession". Burnout and physician suicide in the US are real problems. The suicide rate for physicians decreased in Europe over time, but not in the US. We have a big problem with the practice of medicine and the way health care is run in the US. Abolishing non-competes is literally the least we can do to make this a tiny bit better."
J	"Non-compete clauses only protect employers who are unwilling to make their businesses the one people prefer to work for. It is a shameful business practice that only the uninformed or desperate worker will agree to, and they need to be outlawed."
Caleb	"NCCs should be banned in this country they are anti competitive practices which stifle American workers ability to earn higher wages."
Marcus	"Non-competes are inherently unfair. As a physician I was effectively forced into a non-compete when my company changed ownership. I had to choose between giving up 5 years of relationships with my cancer patients, staff, and professional community vs sign the contract. So I signed. Now my ability to negotiate wages is extremely limited. That's unfair. There are no - trade secrets" or other benefits the new company provides me in exchange for this non- compete. The non-compete only benefits one party and is thus inherently unfair."

Carson	"I had to sell everything I had work for in my career to fight a non compete which I eventually lost. These contracts are not equitable and no employer should use them to hold an individual hostage in an industry."
Eric	"I strongly support ending non-compete agreements. They limit the ability of physicians to leave a toxic employer and still care for the patients they have been seeing. Hospitals take advantage of the fact that physicians will stay in a bad work environment to continue caring for our patients."
Kathleen	"Please end this archaic practice. Employers should do the right thing by paying and treating their employees well instead."
Freddie	"I have an existing non-compete and it has certainly factored into the decision not to leave my current employer. I am supportive of the proposed rule change."
Alexandra	"As a physician , I strongly support the proposed rule to end non-competes and request that physician contract are included. I believe that my oath to care for patients should not be limited or challenged by the business dealings of health corporations. My duty is to my patients and a non compete clause could restrict my ability to care for patients in need."
Tariq	"There should be no "Non compete clause " for the best interest of the patients. These clauses are completely against patients interests and the free market values."
Jeetendra	"The non-compete clauses cause tremendous damage and hardship to the employees that are subjected. It is even harder for physicians as it is not easy for them to switch jobs. Physician wanting to change job must leave town and this keeps him/her tied to an employer that does not pay them fairly or treat diem well. Non-competes must go for healthy competition for talent. Please do not allow any loopholes. Current set up is one way where employers control everything."

Amber	"I am an attorney in a college town in East Tennessee. I've seen first-hand how non-compete clauses destroy lives. Noncompete clause may have been created to protect trade secrets, but they are now being utilized by unscrupulous business owners to stifle competition and keep wages low. The most egregious abuses I see in my practice are in the salon industry. Salon owners seek out talented stylists straight out of styling academies. They encourage them to sign a contract with a non-compete clause. And then salon owners 1.) fire them so they cannot work at any other area salons, or 2.) treat them like indentured servants because, well, they are. The stylists are not able to leave and go work elsewhere unless they leave their industry entirely. This is a financial impossibility for the stylists who just paid for their education and licensure. When they try to extract themselves from these onerous contracts they face expensive litigation. Please consider that enforcing non-competes bankrupts families and is an unnecessary infringement on free and fair trade."
Peter	"This law has prohibited me several times from seeking employment in the industry that I have spent my entire career. In many cases I have had to wait years to pursue a job in the same industry. It is highly unfair to the employee. A signed confidentiality agreement would still protect a company from trade secrets while allowing an individual to earn a living in an industry that he or she has worked in for years. The non-compete should be abolished."
Noah	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements."
Mark	"Non-compete clauses keep employees hostage and prevent economic freedom for those forced to sign an agreement like that. It is one sided and unfair to employees."
Lisa	"I have been recently affected by a Non-compete and it has put my livelihood at great harm. I worked for a company for over 20 years and left for very good reason and went to work for another company and was sued and lost my case just in December of 2022. This began end of September 2022 and at this time I am unemployed and unable to work in 3 states due to the "employment agreement."...This industry has been my livelihood and I love what I do but I have zero income and 6+ months to "wait it out" until the contract expires. I can not make the money I was making in my career field due to this and I am having issues with finding work because it will only be for a few months until my contract expires. I do not feel that anything that has happened in my case has been fair or just. I have the right to make a living and do what I love....So in my opinion this is MUCH needed!...We live

	in the United States Of America and I live in an at will state and feel anyone should be able to make a living and provide for their families in a field of their choice.”
Stanford	“I have lived most of my life in a Medicare underserved area with limited numbers of physicians and almost no specialists. The effect of non-compete clauses in these areas renders the ability to provide good health care by forcing physicians to relocate even though they are already in the area, familiar with the patient demographics, and trusted by the public - to leave the area. This forces patients to travel (sometimes hours) to find another physician or specialist to provide treatment. Based upon this fact non-competes have a direct and detrimental impact on the lives of the citizens living in underserved areas. In addition, there should not be an income cap on any such rule since most physician salaries would render the rule meaningless and cause the same harm to patients who live in such underserved areas.”
matt	“I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and hams working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! Let us do something worthwhile for the common working person. Thank you very much.”
Kyndall	“Hello, I am writing to express my support of this proposed rule.... I am currently under contract with a non-compete clause that prohibits me from working within 35 miles of my current employer's office. Due to the nature of my work (I am a home birth midwife), this really limits my ability to leave my current position and accept job in my profession or even to start my own practice. Due to the language of my non-compete and the nature of my work, if I left my current position I would have to get an entry-level job outside of my profession in order to work and have any income. This really affects my livelihood and ability to provide for my family as the current breadwinner for my family. I am 100% in support of banning the non- compete rule.”
Abby	“YES, we need this non-compete ban. I am a midwife practicing in Knoxville TN, and I was required to sign a non-compete (along with other local midwives who work for another practice). Our area is in major need of more midwives and in addition, midwives in different areas of town. But because of the non-compete we've all been required to sign, and what is considered "nominal", it really is hurting the people who need us most. There is no

	shortage of business, I think it is so incredibly unnecessary to have to have a non-compete. Please ban it, midwives here in Knoxville TN will thank you!"
Ross	"I'm glad the FTC is looking at this regulation. I'm currently subject to an overly vague and ambiguous non-compete agreement. I left the firm that subjected me to this to work for a competing firm. I made this decision because my old firm could not match/keep up with wages in our industry (Local/County Government Consulting). This move was the best decision for our family - our first child is due in June 2023 and we just got done building our first home....I don't agree with non-compete agreements for mid-management staff, like my role as a project manager. I don't make decisions about new business to pursue, nor do I make project pricing decisions or make decisions that will direct the company. I simply left to receive a more competitive wage and receive the opportunity to "move up the ranks" within the new firm. I believe individuals should have the ability to do better for themselves without the threat of lawsuits. Our country was founded on the life, liberty and pursuit of happiness principle and I believe non-competes eat away at a person's ability to provide for their families. I appreciate the chance for public comment and would be happy to further discuss my situation if necessary."
Denise	"I'm a contracted employee at a rural hospital in Maryville, TN. My main concern is if a hospital decides to terminate contract, I cannot be employed by the new contractor. This potentially hinders hospitals to make needed moves to improve and move on to the best contracted service as the hospital fears lapse of coverage and dollars lost and not being able to continue surgical services due to these noncompetes and not having anesthesia at our hospital....Please vote to do away with noncompete clauses to our fundamental workers of our country. Especially healthcare workers who have been working through tough essential times our country has most needed us."
Jonathan	"I am for doing away with non-compete clauses in contracts and support this potential rule change. As a physician, I am under such a contract with my employer, and would have to move to a different county to work. It would force me to leave my practice which I've spent years creating and start from scratch."
Joe	"Include Franchisees in non-compete ban."
Karen	"I am an Enrolled Agent which is a credentialed tax expert. I am qualified to represent clients anywhere in the U.S. on their behalf to the IRS for audits or other issues....I worked for H&R Block and

	am under a noncompete clause. I am not allowed to work with tax clients for myself or any other company within 50 miles of the Greater Knoxville area for 2 1/2 years. H&R Block has blacklisted me because I turned in a co-worker to HR for unethical practices without going through my office manager. The manager retaliated by claiming I was prejudiced against my co-worker due to her race (wrong) and suspended me for cause. I now have only ONE job option: to work for Intuit helping people do their own returns as, in this job, I do not meet with clients. Intuit is only allowing me to work 23 hours per week. If I want to do anything else I have to leave my field thus make less money per hour and start all over at 64 years old. I studied for months and took a 9-hour test to earn my credential. There are many people who would like for me to do their tax returns for them. I have to turn them down and refer them to someone else so they can still get assistance. I am overqualified to sit in an accountant's back office and do returns...I can't afford to live on Social Security and do not wish to move away from my home. Please unshackle my hands and pass the rule to end non-compete clauses. Thank you!" dylan	"I have a current non-compete that's holding me from doing the only thing I've done for almost twenty years. The term is 24 months and I'm six months in. This can't be legal. I need to make a living and I can't do that with cease-and-desist letters telling me not too."
Marty	"I am supportive of ending non-competes. This year my position along with over 200 others across 34 states was eliminated I am in TN and had an opportunity to take a position in leadership with a competitor which would have expanded my opportunity for growth and it would have been a promotion. After the new company reviewed my non-compete they could not present an offer to me without facing legal issues. I'm wondering if a company is the one who acts in ending one's position or alters the initial work agreement if the employee could be released and free to work to go back to work, having an opportunity to expand. Instead for me I'm having to change fields totally instead of leveraging my leadership abilities in the field of my choice. I brought my experience to this current company and within 6 months they ended my ability to work in the trade I enjoyed. Thanks!"

Wesley	“Non competes limit innovation and force people to be stuck at a job that will burn them out until they quit and go to a power education job. On addition if you're laid off or fired and have a non compete you had no choice in the matter and now you're out of work and unable to contribute to the economy or fees your family.”
Julian	“Every person should have a right to work and earn a living in any career they have invested themselves in. No employer should have the right to dictate who they are allowed to work for or interact with. It is the equivalent of indentured servitude. If an employer or employee chooses to terminate their relationship for any reason, there should be no punishment for either party looking to better themselves. The enforcement of a non-compete agreement negatively impacts one's ability to earn a living and provide for one's family and should be illegal.”
Matthew	“Please implement this change. Non-compete clauses are a major drag on our economy, weaken competition, slow innovation, and are simply unfair in the vast majority of cases. These non-compete clauses are an unfair burden on the back of the average American worker.”
Christopher	“Please include physicians. We are people like everyone else. Thanks”
Justin	“I went through absolute hell fighting a non-compete that my previous employer tried to threaten to enforce. While they realized this would never hold up in court, that did not prevent them from having their attorneys send threatening letters to me and my new employer with the goal of getting me terminated from my new sales position. The practice of employers forcing prospective employees to sign non-competes as part of their job offer is so unfair and restrictive on the employee. In many cases it causes undue hardship on the individual by preventing them from working in an industry they have been in their entire life. Corporations have deeper pockets and can easily threaten to sue, forcing the employee to lawyer up and bear...that expense which compounds the hardship even more for the employee. This practice needs to be banned once and for all as everyone should have a right to work for a company of their choosing!”

Abhimanyu	"Most of my career, non competes have kept my wages lower and me stuck at one job. This stifles upward career movement. Last job I left, old employer even went to my potential new employer to threaten them that they can't hire "my employee". Good thing the new employer stood their ground and told the old one to back off. The feeling of being caught between that argument and unemployment was very stressful. Employers seem to use their position to bully you and potential new employers into staying. Had my new employer not stood up for me, I would be unemployed. Very thankful the new employer stood up for me, I am making substantially more now because of it. Non competes, whether verbally implied or written in a contract, are modern day indentured servitude. Non competes are completely the opposite of the competitive part of capitalism, instead non competes protect the employer from competing for the best talent."
Josh	"My father is currently being sued to enforce his non-compete agreement. This agreement was signed 30 years ago and never renewed. Litigation is costing my father thousands of dollars he does not have (he's in sales, no college education, lives in a small town). I want to comment on non-competes especially unfair effects in small, rural towns like the one my father lives in. If you are a small town guy, there are only so many places you can work and apply your skills. With non-competes, this would mean that my father would have to move a long distance just to find another job in his lifetime career field. The idea of a 61-year-old man would have to pickup and move from the only place he has ever known to keep using the skills in the area he has built his whole life is not functional. Employers should not have this level of control over employee as it bounds them and subjects them to unfair, sometimes abusive treatment by people with resources to fire them and make sure they can never earn a living again in their small, rural town. This FTC rule is important and should be enacted. Non-competes are predatory except in very limited cases."
Adam	"I highly support banning non-compete clauses. Anything that hurts employees and competition in favor of corporate welfare should be done away with."
Rachel	"As a family doctor in an area where there is a shortage of primary care providers, I am deeply troubled that you would exclude doctors! Doctors! Primary care doctors like me are the backbone of the medical system of this country! We build relationships with our patients and should be able to move freely and where we get paid most fairly. Patients are not entities to be owned by a hospital- they are human beings we care for!"

Kartheek	"I am in support of the FTC Non-compete clause rule. I am a physician (neurologist) working in East TN where wait times to see a neurologist can be about 6 months. If a physician wishes to leave his current employer/practice, there are non-compete clauses which prevent the physician from working in the same county for 2 years. If the physician does not like his/her current practice, then the physician is forced to move to a different city or state, even though he/she is inclined to stay in that underserved area. This is an immense loss for the patients that the physician serves."
Pram	" Physicians should not be excluded from this as excluding them means they will be subject to the no compete clause that is seen as unfair. If they decide to leave their hospital they will have to leave the community thus depriving the community of the care they provide. Physicians should be given the same rights as others."
Patrick	"Non compete clauses benefit the corporation and hams the employee in every instance. I was let go from a role at the companies wish and I was still held to a non compete that prohibited me working in any capacity in my field of training for two years. I didn't quit and go to a competitor. I was fired and told I cannot provide for my family at another place of business. The practice is unfair at best and at worst it is cruel."
Malcolm	"Restrictive covenants / non-compete agreements restrict patient access to preferred physicians and caregivers. Restrictive covenants / non-compete agreements cause interruption of care to patients with complex and/or chronic conditions which, especially in cardiology cases, can have serious negative impacts on patient outcomes. Restrictive covenants / non-compete agreements stifle innovation, which is detrimental to patient care. Restrictive covenants / non-compete agreements have adverse effects on physicians work life, including practice autonomy, workplace culture, burnout, etc."

Andrew	"I feel that noncompete clauses are harming, American competitiveness, and reducing the quality of life of American workers. For this country to succeed, we need to balance the interests of capital versus those of the workers-- right now, things are far out of balance with the rules favoring the interests of capital over those of the workers. The country will be stronger with a more balanced approach. Specifically, with this rule itself, companies need to retain talent based on the merits of the company and its management, not with anti-competitive contracts. It's fundamentally un-American to be beholden to specific organization."
Roger	"Restriction of practice prevents physicians from pursuing the best interests of their patients. Non-competes have no place in medicine."
I Am	I fully support the Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM), as written today. Why should my former employer control who I work for or where I work? Every business has "proprietary information". In my opinion if the company is a long running, successful business, it's not because of the knowledge or information it controls. Too many companies wield non-competes as a means of limiting economic mobility, income growth and talent exploration. There is no commonsense reason that a non-complete is required if I push a wheelbarrow, man a screwdriver, flip hamburgers, system admin a room full of computer servers, work as a paralegal or sell used cars. If you work me like a dog and I decide to work for better wages or conditions, as an American I should have full, free will to work for your competitor if the pay and work environment benefit me.
Sherri	"One of the companies that I had worked for and forced the noncompete non-solicit document to be signed otherwise you would be terminated refusing to do so. Six months later I resign from die company to do something totally different in the industry. The CERT company was quick to find out where I went to and had that letter sent to the president of the company stating I am not to be working in the same industry for two years!!! I had attorneys look it over and said there was no conflict. But because it was in die same industry was a conflict. Logistics is a broad ward that can apply to anything Needless to say I was out of work for two years as a result. I will not sign this document ever again. One time was costly..."

Nathan	"Good morning, as a new physician I would like to voice my support for this rule. It is well known that after completing training, up to 70% of physicians stay in the area in which they trained. This is partly due to the fact that employment as a physician has several extra layers of verification that require references and the nature of physician hiring is that employers prefer to hire someone whose professional behavior and working knowledge is a known variable. In short, new physicians do rely on their mentors/teachers a lot of the time after graduating I e 70% stay near their known support group, the group of references. The hospital system that employed me did have me sign a non-compete. As I was newly married, I needed health insurance for my wife and I could not wait for other offers to process. AAN (American Academy of Neurology) state the average number of RVU (Performance Units) per general neurologist is 5000 and the current average starting salary is 290,000. This health system has taken advantage of me as a newly graduating physician by expecting 6000 RVU a year for 260,000. This non-compete won't allow me to work at the hospital across town for higher salary. I have a huge student loan burden, it was up to 500,000 dollars this year. I paid down 100,000 and now my wife is leaving me because she thought I was stealing from the family. The point is that even a relatively high salary with a high debt burden requires the ability of the physician employee to compete and to market their talent in a fair way. There is no way, that single, newly graduated doctor is going to be a meaningful financial threat to a health system. It's just not a realist claim that an individual poses a threat to their bottom line. I propose that the non-compete is a forcing someone into labor it feels like compulsory indentured servitude."
Brian	"In the media advertising sales industry, non-compete clauses have been enforced for years.... Companies rely on this intimidation and the fact that they can afford lawyers that most employees cannot. There is also an unwritten collusion among companies. If you apply for a job within the market, the first question you are asked is whether you have a non-compete.... Media sales is a very specialized profession. It doesn't translate well to other types of sales positions. If the status quo remains the same, our only alternative is to move to another market or choose another profession. I've been in media sales for thirty years. The latter is not a viable option and the former is not ideal with children. We feel trapped. This is America. We should have the freedom to work without hindrance. The argument that we will be sharing trade secrets upon moving to a competitor doesn't hold water. We all know the approximate rate levels of our competitors. All local media outlets subscribe to competitive platforms that tell us our individual market share, where (in detail) local businesses are advertising, and more. It's time for the non-compete to go. If companies want the best talent, they can treat us like it without holding us hostage within the same market."

Nikky	" Physicians - especially those of specialties (such as sleep medicine) that are in high demand, but low supply are often tied to long-term noncompete clauses. As towns and cities expand populations are unable to be served with healthcare due to these noncompete clauses. Often the care in question is preventative nature, and would other wisely through the healthcare system, saving millions of dollars if the noncompete clause did not exist, or was unenforceable. Noncompete clauses only add more barriers to providing care especially in population-dense and lower socioeconomic class areas."
Kruti	"I support a federal ban on non-competes. As a physician , I believe that non-competes are an undue burden and have been significantly harmed by a non- compete in my career. Non-competes lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. This has immense negative consequences on individual patient outcomes and the overall health of communities and could be prevented by banning non-competes."
Mark	"As an engineer , I have been subject to mandatory non-compete agreements for my entire career. Based on my experience, I can confidently state that these agreements stifle innovation and keep skilled employees from earning a living based on the skills they have developed both through education and their career - even if they are laid off. I fully support this rule to combat the use of non-compete agreements."
Amy	Please put a stop to non competes.
Marjorie	"Non-compete clauses have been used in ridiculous ways and area damper on growth in the economy. They should OT be allowed."

Michael	"Please end the non-compete exclusivity contracts....I am asking that the FTC end this abuse involving exclusivity contracts."
Eric	Non-Compete Clauses unfairly limit workers earning potential job opportunities. A worker can be barred from their trade as a result of leaving a company's employ. This is unfair and predatory. The Non-Compete Clause Rule must be ended. Thank you.
David	"The corporate use of non-compete clauses to stifle competition and keep hospitals locked into failing agreements totally ignores the original intent of non- competes to keep people from taking corporate secrets and short cutting their way into a business. There are no secrets that doctors use. We practice medicine, help people, and get paid for it. The idea that suing a physician for leaving a bad practice model is going to help patients improve or hospitals perform better is clearly ludicrous. This is simply a business tool that acts to prevent any semblance of competition and fair practice."
Fran	"I wholeheartedly agree with this proposed ban. I have looked for several jobs over the last year and have nailed die interviews and received offer letters, only to be turned down twice this year due to die non-compete agreement I was forced to sign by my current company. PLEASE PASS THIS BAN - it is preventing people from bettering their careers and lives as it stands now."
Elizabeth	"Non-competes are un-American, restrain trade, and are used to threaten workers into compliance even when they are unenforceable under state law. As a young attorney I faced down nationally known firms hying to bully Tennessee workers with non-competes that were completely unenforceable under Tennessee law. Other workers didn't have access to attorneys like me. A strong federal stance against non-competes can only make a stronger, better American workforce in a time when our workforce is weakened because of COVID deaths and disability. Let's get non-competes out of business and let workers choose."
Leigh	"Hello! I worked for a company for 12 years and signed a NCC when I started, otherwise, I would not have gained employment. My job was commission only throughout these 12 years, but during the course of my tenure, my commission rate was lowered

	FIVE times. I worked diligently for many years, and after the 4th and 5th commission rate decrease, it became impossible to pay my bills. My employer could do anything he wanted to me, yet still held the NCC over my head when I made the choice to leave the company. Working 12 years in an industry became my career, but then I was being told I could no longer work in this field, even though I would not have resigned if my commission rate was still the same as my starting rate....Starting over at my age has been difficult, and I am in constant fear that I will be sued for trying to make a living in the job/career I enjoy...Employers should not be allowed to force employees to sign such clauses. Ban them! Any employee willing to work, and loves to work, should be able to gain willful employment. Thank you for considering my comments!
Michele	The noncompete clauses in physician contracts keeps physicians in indentured servitude. It prevents them from leaving toxic work environments where promises were not fulfilled. Big private equity companies and hospital systems have deep pockets and lots of attorneys and fight to the death! Physicians do not have the money or the power to fight these corporations. Patient care suffers because physicians leave the area of the noncompete clause. hospital systems and PE firms have taken over medicine for profits ahead of patient care. Noncompete clauses only feed their bank accounts and shareholder's pockets. This is all contributing to physician bum out and physicians leaving die workforce early further worsening the physician shortage and causing more access to care issues for patients.
Michele	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. As a physician, I have seen firsthand how these restrictive agreements can have detrimental effects on patient care, physician recruitment and retention, and healthy competition in die healthcare industry. Non-compete clauses are unfair to both physicians and patients alike. They give employers undue leverage in contract negotiations, as physicians are often forced to agree to them in order to secure employment. This can lead to inadequate compensation, lack of job security, and other unfavorable terms. Furthermore, non-competes often require physicians to relocate their families away from their current practice, disrupting continuity of care and limiting patient access to specialty care. ...Without these clauses, physicians will have greater job security and the ability to practice medicine in the same location for extended periods of time, providing continuity of care and better access to specialty care for patients. I strongly urge the Federal Trade Commission to move forward with the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses in for profit and non-profit physician contracts. This ban is essential to promote fair competition and ensure that patients have access to quality healthcare.”

Mary	“Non-compete clauses are unfair, inequitable, and un-American. Anyone should be able to quit a job without penalty.”
Catherine	As a primary care physician , I had to sign a noncompete clause to obtain my job. I needed to leave my job for health reasons temporarily. I cannot get a job in the county that I live in now as the noncompete is 2 years long. I have had to switch career paths to working for an insurance company in order to provide for my family. This clause punishes people for leaving toxic jobs or leaving for any reason. People have to move out of their hometowns to get alternative jobs costing them thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars. I went to medical school to serve others and heal suffering, who is serving me? Who is protecting me? The only person that the noncompete services is the hospital administration. It does not serve the first responders or first line providers. This should have been made illegal decades ago.
srishti	“I support! Wholeheartedly!”
clark	The non-compete clause is fundamentally taking away die rights of an individual to pursue happiness.
Erin	Ban non-competes! It should be illegal to prevent someone from getting a job in their field of work/study/experience if they leave one company. Non competes prevent low income workers from being able to go out and get a better job.

Steven	"My daughter is currently being sued by a past employer. Thank you for changing this law. It's horrible to make people sign a non compete to get a job."
Monika	"Eliminate the non compete clause...Let's move with the times."
Santiago	"I think is crucial to remove this clause for contract - a piece of paper can't stop a physician to take care of patients who are looking for their help and assistance"
Jennifer	"I'm in healthcare in rural Tennessee bound by a noncompete. I am trapped in my current job unless I want 30-60 minute commute daily due to my noncompete."
Cary	"All my homies hate non compete contracts, they should be illegal"
Stephanie	"Let us practice where "we live. This doesn't do anything but like access to care
ROSA	I believe this rule should pass. From personal experience I know there are individuals that take advantage of these non-compete agreements by adding ridiculous stipulations. This makes it extremely hard for individuals to seek work elsewhere without violating the agreements. You almost have to change professions in order to make a living. Please pass this rule, it would benefit many people.

Sarah	"All non competes should stop. They interfere with the private market for best doctors."
James	"As an executive in the information technology industry for over 30 years I have seen non-competes rise from a narrow tool to limiting senior or specialist personnel with access to trade secrets, to a blunt anti competitive tool that seeks to handcuff employees at all levels to a dependence on their current employer. The size, complexity and punitive threats associated with these agreements has also grown extensively. They are presented with job offers on a "take it or leave it" basis at a time that the targeted (future) employee is emotionally disadvantaged as they know resisting will likely result in the job offer being withdrawn. This change in regulation is essential to provide a levelling of the power balance for employees and remove die implied 'indentured servitude' effect. I whole heartedly support the FTC's movement in this proposed rule."
clint	"In the past, non-compete clauses could perhaps be justified when the employed individual had access to strategic plans, confidential information and various sensitive areas of the medical practice. Now, however, under non-compete clauses, the physician is treated no better than an hourly wage employee in a fast food restaurant. They have no access to strategic planning and no input into vital medical decision making especially in terms of insurance issues and choice of cardiac devices such as pacemakers, coronary stents and defibrillators. Those critical, complex decisions are being made by Corporate Headquarters whose primary criteria is who will give them the best deal. Before non-compete clauses a physician could choose the best care and best medical devices for their patients, often taking the patient to a competing institution that had the appropriate device or equipment that the patient needed. Furthermore, under non-compete clauses, physicians are forced to practice in substandard offices, substandard working conditions and sometimes with substandard employees. This creates a toxic environment. As physicians, we must regain the freedom to be totally committed patient advocates in order to attain the best level of care. In summary, non-compete clauses must be removed."

Viviana	“Non-competes are completely immoral and stifle what little opportunities workers have in negotiating better wages and improving their financial situation. It is completely contrary to the ideas and values of free market competition. If employers fear losing valuable employees, then employers should give the employee reasons to stay and grow with the company, not strong arm them into staying in unwanted positions over fear of lawsuit. I fully support this rule to ban non-compete agreements in all workplaces.”
A	I am voicing my support for banning of all non-compete clauses. As a family physician in a rural area, non competes have been used coercively against me to make me either accept hostile working conditions, lower pay than my male colleagues or lose my ability to provide for my family. I would have to move my family and uproot them from school, friends and supports just to be able to support them. My story is true of thousands of physicians nationwide of all backgrounds, genders and specialties. We do not threaten the massive corporations and health systems that subjugate us to these punitive and mandatory arrangements. Please, ban all non-compete clauses — they directly lead to health care provider shortages as many of us have left communities we would have gladly stayed and cared in if only our non-competes did not exist.
Jeremiah	“For the last 2 1/2 years I've seen this prevent truck drivers from coming on with the company I work for. Since they are in a non-compete, it prevents us from being able to hire them. As a recruiter I have lost about 100 drivers due to this, which is unfair to those drivers.”
Beth	I believe non-compete clauses are nothing short of small-scale corporate bullying against a vulnerable workforce population. They inhibit free enterprise and employee workplace mobility.

GABRIEL	"Please pass this rule. Non compete clauses have personally affected me, affected my colleagues, and been used legally against other colleagues. I know of no individual whom they have benefited."
Brett	"The rule is currently being interpreted as not being applicable to nonprofits, and this includes hospitals that operate as 501(c)(3) entities. I am currently trapped in a low-paying job because of a noncompete at such a facility. My entire family lives in this area, and so my options are: 1) Leave my family and move elsewhere. Note that my organization's noncompete is so broad that it "protects" them for many miles around any of their outposts rather than just my principle place of work. So it essentially covers a large portion of the state and increases daily as the organization continues to grow. 2) Continue trapped in a low-paying job solely because of the noncompete. I applaud the FTC's efforts to take on this problem, but there is no reason that "nonprofit" hospitals should continue to be allowed to subjugate their employees in perpetuity. Please re-write the rule such this would have broad applicability and also apply to 501(c)(3) organizations."
Joann	"I started my job search towards the end of my Family Medicine residency. Since I had a child still in school locally, I especially did not want to uproot the family a mere three years after we moved here. What I found as I interviewed was a different story however and I was saddened to learn that non-compete clauses were alive and well. When a large conglomerate of a medical practice is worried about having patients "stolen" away form them by an individual physician who is first starting a practice in town, something is wrong with that huge practice. And something is wrong with the loss of what this country was built on; die ability for every individual to earn a living and work for themselves. The non-compete clauses need to be banned for once and for all. Thank you for your consideration."

Darren	"The company I worked for was sold by the owner to a larger company on a Friday. We had to sign a non-compete clause by noon on Monday or lose our jobs. The non-compete essentially bans me from working for any client the company has worked with over the past year. This essentially takes away my ability to work in an industry I spent 30+ years in. We were strong-armed, no doubt about it. We had no say in the sale/purchase, and limited ability to take our skills elsewhere. We felt enslaved. Non-compete is not good for the employer as it keeps disgruntled employees from moving on, and it's not good for the employee as it feels like shackles."
Michael	"I believe that non competes should be non enforceable. They have been used for years by hospitals and large conglomerates to lord over physicians and prevent them from being mobile and taking care of patients. In a time when we need more physicians, we cannot be legally excluding their practice simply because they choose to change locations"
Patrick	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, non-competes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more non-competes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. As a sole proprietorship, I work with different companies as an independent contractor and initially had a lot of confusion due to some of their language around non-compete agreements. Setting clear standards that protect workers and small business entrepreneurs such as myself from large corporations with huge legal teams will help promote flourishing of workers and small businesses in our new modern economy. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."

David	"I am a physician and agree with the abolition of non-compete clauses and strongly believe physicians and other healthcare professionals should be included. Hospital systems have only gotten larger and are increasingly the only option of employment for many physicians. Hospital systems use non-compete clauses to prevent you from leaving despite increasingly worse conditions to work on, as they know they don't have to fix any issues you have with them as you cannot leave and work for a similar organization in the same city without uprooting your family. They essentially allow hospital systems to hold you hostage as most physicians, especially younger ones, have significant medical school debt and cannot go a significant time without working"
Marc	"Physicians should not be limited by a non-compete clause. Non-compete clauses hurt competition for physician services in large cities, and have no effect on rural settings."
Aubrey	"To whom this addresses, I have been at my company for 17 years-- my first job out of college. I loved it and it was a dream job; however, it's a very different world now. The cost of living in metro Nashville has sky-rocketed and the pay hasn't. I have coworkers who have been there longer than me and still have seen no advancement or promotion. Our business model has shifted and our concerns aren't what they were 20 years ago. The trainings and educational programs we used to do are not longer offered. Sadly, we work in a very niche section of the music industry and all have an enforceable, vague, and strict NCA. With no where else to work, and no advancement in this company, we are becoming poorer, losing opportunities, and being stifled in our careers. An end to our NCA would let many of us move on in our industry. This would open positions for new graduates (who often can't find work in Nashville's competitive music industry), put years of experience into other sectors of the music industry, and finally stimulate the inflating economy of Nashville. With the great resignation, we have already welcomed three new college graduates to our team of 15; something that I had not seen happen since my generation was hired and forced to stay. I am exhausted from doing the same exact job for 17 years! I'm ready to move on and this Non-Compete Clause Rule would give me the opportunity to forge ahead in my career!"
A	"I support the rule banning non-compete clauses. The FTC's role in regulating fair and competitive markets makes this rule change an institutional priority for the FTC. Companies are made of workers and those workers must be able to participate in the

	market in order to maintain fair and competitive markets. Non-compete clauses are used as legal a psychological retention mechanism and undermine the concept of a free market where workers can choose where to (and not to) work. I have also seen that entry-level employees, with no prior job experience, are being forced to sign non-compete clauses that severely limit their potential contribution to the workforce. These employees are often too young and inexperienced to realize that their signing a non-compete will drastically affect their next career step.”
Joann	“Health care workers, especially physicians, have put much of their lives, time away from family, and have incurred hundreds of thousands of dollars in educational debt in order to practice in their field. If a work situation does not work out, for any reason, that worker should be able to pursue any opportunity they desire no matter the location, or even better, to hang a shingle and open their own practice, if their license allows that option. They have been through enough delays in order to practice in their profession and help people, and also have family stability and involvement in the community where they have practiced and are known. A large corporation will barely feel the difference if some patients decide to move away from one practice to follow the physician that they have come to know. It is good for the physician, good for the patient, and good for the community. Thank you for your attention to this matter that has been around way too long.”
Neil	I am in support of this rule change. Non-Compete clauses stifle innovation and create a more stagnant job market and overall economy. They also add to the power imbalance that already exists between employers and their employees. This rule change will benefit the vast majority of Americans.

Alicia	“Non-compete clauses are an unfair way for employers to have control over their employees after they've left the organization. It limits one's ability to find employment within reasonable means which impacts an individuals ability to maintain their home, food, safety. Please remove non-compete clauses to more freely support those who simply find employment elsewhere.”
Hannah	“Non-complete clauses increase racial and gender wage gaps by disproportionately reducing the wages of women and non-white workers. Non-compete clauses decrease innovation and entrepreneurship. Non-compete clauses reduced physician labor mobility. This negatively affects patient care as it inhibits physicians leaving low quality health system practices and creating innovative practices which provide higher quality, more efficient patient care. I fully support elimination of non-compete clauses, especially for physicians and other healthcare clinicians.”
Morgan	“...The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population...Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompete in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change....”

Matthew	I work in healthcare , and I have seen the detrimental affects non-compete clauses can have. The company (Mednax) staffing our hospital's Neonatal ICU suddenly lost die contract. The hospital decided to control it's own staffing, which is well within their right. The biggest issue came in that Mednax had forced all employees to sign non-compete agreements. This resulted in employees in the NICU, all highly trained medical professionals, being unable to find employment in a NICU in this city for a period of three years, as stipulated in the non-compete agreement. People had to choose between uprooting their families or finding a new line of work. This was not good for anyone, except for Mednax to use as a way to hold die hospital hostage to their contract.
Prashant	“Non complete clause is keeping wages low by reducing competition. Employer won't even consider renegotiating contract even after 5 years. Despite persistent inflation wages are not keeping up and people hire up and administration are making more money while lower workers are getting paid no wage increase. Non-compete clause for physicians especially the ones working in hospital setting is completely unnecessary and only serves the purpose of keeping salaries low for a long time and prevents workers from moving to a different employer or are forced too uproot the whole family and take them to a whole different place.”
Sherry	“I'm writing to support the rule proposal banning non-compete clauses in employee contracts. People should be able to leave jobs -- especially essential jobs like those in healthcare, hairstylists, car mechanic, etc -- and still take another job near their home. People should not feel compelled to keep working in toxic environments. It is even worse that sometimes people who are laid off still cannot work in their own field! In addition to the toll this takes on workers, this becomes a burden on the state when highly employable people cannot take a job and stay on unemployment for longer. It is also an environmental problem because many times these people must commute long distances

	due to the details of their non-compete clause. Employers got along fine for decades without them and they will again. Thank you.”
Sherri	“We are a freedom-loving people and one of our fundamental freedom is freedom of movement. Non-complete clauses reduce workers' rights to change jobs, seek promotions, and better their lives. While I understand the reason why companies that invest in a great deal of training or who deal in highly sensitive information would be concerned about a worker taking those secrets to a competitor, we are now seeing gross misuse of these clauses to trap workers in low-paying jobs.”
Vicki	“Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. As you know, noncompete agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. My former employer enforced a noncompete agreement when I submitted my resignation and informed them I accepted an opportunity to become the controller for one of their clients (so much for transparency). Rather than staying in my position as a senior tax professional and being fired at a later date, left the firm as I planned. Fortunately, I have the resources to do so ... Many in the same position don't. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements.”
Scott	A blanket ban is a bad idea. However, a focused ban would be acceptable.

Liz	"I am a happily employed associate veterinarian. Though I have no desire to change jobs at this time, I am still bothered by the terms of my non-compete. I believe there may be a place for extremely (!) 'mild non-competes - i.e. Such that might protect an employer from a former employee opening a competing practice within a 3 - 5 mile radius. Other than that? They should be banned."
Mark	"I accepted a position with a company that never mentioned a non-compete until the first day I started the job. This should had been disclosed in the offer documentation. In most cases, a non compete is not about protecting proprietary information. Instead, they are used to keep from providing competitive wages and benefits. I have worked in electrical distribution sales for 25 years. There are no patents, new innovations, or secrets to protect. It doesn't make sense for a company to tell me I can't work for someone else, for any amount of time. Please ban all new and existing non- competes or non-solicits. At the very least, they should only apply to R&D jobs not hairdressers, sales, and etc..."
John	"Non-compete clauses are mostly absurd gifts to employers, gifts from workers. In those few cases in which non-compete clauses are justified -- e.g., trade secrets, insider knowledge of business plans -- couldn't most of the real damage to businesses be eliminated by just putting a floor on the salary below which non-compete clauses are forbidden. $200,000/yr. comes to my mind, but most workers would not object if the floor were much lower than that."
Alex	"Companies invest considerable resources into building a business...a type of intellectual property or trade secret that is not protected by patent regulations. While some of this can be protected by secrecy agreements, it is very difficult to forensically prove that a departed employee who has used their knowledge of business practices and structure to start, or work for, a competing business has done so in violation of a secrecy agreement. We do recognize that the breadth of employees covered by non-compete agreements may be worthy of scrutiny, as evidenced by the oft-cited example of a security guard being prevented by working for a competitive company...."

Texas | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Texas:

Texas Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual TX Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual TX Worker Earnings
10,599,295	$6,535,957,999	$617

	“Non-compete clauses are absurd. When I worked at a burrito place, they claimed a non-compete. I couldn't go down the street to another burrito shop because I might bring with me the knowledge of how to roll a tortilla around a mess of rice and beans. If you don't see the absurdity in that situation, you have no place making decisions that affect other people's lives. It's out of control. Stop allowing corporations to have control over the lives of people after those people leave the corporations' employ.” -George B.
	“I served my country in Afghanistan for over 2 years of my life, devoting my life to the service of others. The sacrifices for my country and the experiences of that war shape the work effort and devotion I have for my craft, which is and always will be to help others. I work in the medical equipment industry where I serve veterans and injured Americans with their recovery from injuries and ailments. At the time of my hire I signed a non-compete because, well, I needed the job. Due to my devotion to helping others I have gained the trust of my providers and customers who also follow the same desires and goals in their career. I understand that my job is sufficient enough to make a good life for my family, but there are better options for my patients and providers. Because of my non-compete I have to fight and attempt to keep my providers from using a better alternative treatment option. The concept of forcing someone to fight for your inferior product at the possible expense of patient care, all because your employee is forced by law to "serve" you feels extremely un-American and unconstitutional....As it stands now, I am legally forced to work for my company out of fear of a mega million dollar company ruining my life and my families livelihood. Patients will continue to face the possibility that their outcomes could be diminished and ineffective. Pretty sure that's not what I fought for. Please ban non compete agreements for the sake of American progress.” -John R.
	“I fully support eliminating corporations' powerful overreach in using non-competes. I was let go from a major gaming retailer. In order to receive severance after 18 years I had to agree to a 2 year non-compete that included 'any organization that buys, sells or trades gaming or pop culture products' This specifically called out Walmart, Amazon, Best Buy, Microsoft, Sony, Nintendo, Google, Facebook, Hot Topic... the list was almost a page long and ended with 'or any other deemed competition even if not named'. The non-compete is wildly overly broad and there is virtually nothing that I had access to that could be used to profit a competitor over my former employer. This basically eliminates me from pursuing a job in most retail and entertainment industries for 2 years.”

	"I am a pediatric radiologist. My employment contract contains a two year non-compete clause that would effectively prohibit me from working in my metropolitan area. To buy out of it requires a payment of 2 years of my gross salary. My specialty is mostly connected to children's hospitals, which are only found in big cities. If I were to leave this job, the next closest children's hospital outside the non-compete zone is 3.5 hrs drive away. I would have to move my whole family. Non-compete clause gives my employer an unfair leverage over me. It allows them to pay a lower than market rate salary. This also has a negative impact on recruitment and, as a result, we are chronically understaffed." -Neil F.
	"I worked for a concrete supply company in Grand Praire and was offered a job making way more money for a concrete supply company in Dallas. They drag me to court and lawyers got involved and i had to be moved to a different department. I felt like i didn't something wrong but all I was doing was making things better for my family. PLEASE get rid of the Non Compete. All were trying to do is take care of our families." -Cameron
	"Physicians are very intelligent, when it comes to things medical, but not when it comes to contracts, and they consistently sign contracts, agreeing to noncompete. When they finally realize they're being treated lower than market value, they are trapped, and their established patient care suffers if they leave the practice. It causes harm. Physicians are generally ignorant when it comes to management, and there is no trade secret they are stealing. Noncompete is simply a way to restrict fair competition." -Geo V.
	"I'm writing to support the adoption of the Non-Compete Clause Rule by the FTC. As a prior healthcare executive, I was forced to insert non-compete clauses in clinician employment agreements as part of negotiation tactics for business contracts. These non-compete clauses use staff clinicians as pawns by corporate entities (Team I USAP, NAPA, NorthStar) to secure and maintain business contracts. Because of this, anesthesia clinicians are forced to leave their job and many times travel outside of their communities for work, leaving hospitals with fewer staff members to provide care to patients." -Wendy O.
	"7 years ago for the first time in my life as a mother I was able to improve my sales skills in order to support my daughters and myself without any government assistance as well as make investments. The company I have been working for the last 7 years sold to a larger corporate company that forced us to sign a noncompete, but with doing so also lowered the commission rate. This has put my daughters (oldest daughter going into her senior year who wants to go into

	forensics/military) in a big bind. We and many others will benefit greatly to do away with non competes period.” -Lisa H.
	“As an entrepreneur, I find non-compete agreements to stifle innovation and opportunity. We all share in the hope of achieving the American dream. That hope should not be taken away for prolonged periods of time by a few hundred words of fine print legalese.” -Shinggo L.
	“I'm a dental hygienist. My work preference is with the elderly providing mobile dental cleaning. Those jobs are few and far between and some companies make you sign a noncompete clause in order to work there. Companies treat you unfairly when you're an employee and you are then forced to go back into a traditional dental office because of the contract. Not fair to me that I can't continue doing what I love.” -Teresa

Constituent First Name	Comment Highlights
Jeff	“Noncompete clauses that don't protect genuinely proprietary information are abusive and should be banned immediately.””
Dr Maria	“Noncompete clause for doctors, providing care in the community should be made illegal. Patient care suffers when this is practiced by hospitals and corporations.”
Thomas	“I've been defending a lawsuit from a prior employer for a non-compete agreement for almost 4 years now. I was 18 years into my consulting career when I went to work for this company. After they let me go following a "restructuring" in which my position was eliminated, they then filed suit less than month later after I become employed with a consulting firm that does not compete with them. They claimed that because all technology was integrated, it was impossible for me to not have the potential to compete with them and they sought to end my new employment. The judge found the non-compete overly broad and illegal on its face, and despite no evidence of any competition between the companies, he restricted my employment for 1 year. Based on that unfortunate, and incorrect ruling, my former employer is now seeking attorneys fees from me in excess of $500,000. $500,000 with no actual taking of business, employees, or even a shred of evidence of competition. Non-competes should be banned universally for employees.”
Faisal	“There should be no non compete for hospital employee physicians like inpatient hospitalist, Intensivisit and other inpatient only fields. Also there should be no non compete if person is simply switching his job without opening a competing practice.”

Michael	“Speaking as an employee currently under such an agreement, the biggest issue I see, is that employers in particular industries and markets have adopted these as a hiring condition universally creating near collusion results. They have a captive workforce and have no true incentive to give normal wage increases or benefit improvements, knowing there's not much to worry about.”
Robert	“While they can protect employers proprietary information, goodwill, and investment in training employees, non-compete agreements also have several disadvantages. First, they can limit employees' career options and earning potential, especially in industries where a few large employers dominate the market. Second, they can discourage entrepreneurship and innovation by making it harder for employees to start their own businesses or join startups in related fields. Third, they can lead to legal disputes and costly litigation, particularly if they are overly broad or restrictive. Finally, they can harm economic growth and competitiveness by preventing the free flow of talent, ideas, and investment between companies and industries.”
Debbie	“I support eliminating the non-compete agreements for lower level employees. Any employee below the CXO level should be able to change employment without limits on where they can work!”
Paul	“I agree that workers at any level except for the C-Level should not be subject to non-compete clauses at any time.”
Caroline	“Dear Commissioners, I am writing to urge you to use your regulatory power to protect workers' right to work in their communities. While there may be valid narrow arenas in which non-competes make sense to protect trade secrets, the breadth of their use in the service industries is not a question of trade secrets. The widespread use of non-competes in service industries results in depressed wages for low wage professions and essentially requires migration in a time in which housing and education are major challenges. This is burdening the shrinking American middle class and exacerbating economic inequality, among our most pressing national issues...Please act to end the broad use of non-competes in service industries and support a healthy, competitive labor market for middle class Americans.”
VINCENT	“As a physician , non-competes limit where I can practice and force me to stay in a bad job so that I don't uproot my family. Competition is good for physicians and business. My wife got just 4 weeks of maternity leave. If there was adequate competition and the elimination of non-competes, these benefits would have been much more.”
Azizul	“ As a physician , who are the top one percent earners in the United States, I think federally banning noncompete's is a very long, awaited an appropriate action by our government. Noncompete can be very predatory, selective, exclusive, restrictive, which can prevent and delay, any professional growth. I think this new proposed law will be great for physicians and non-physicians to allow for a better market and improve competition for a healthier growth in all markets from medicine, tech, industrial, scientific/research and more. I hope the government makes a decision and bans all non-compete.”

Andrew	“Non-compete agreements are very common in the technology business related to software development. These agreements are very limiting since gathering experience in a given field can be a key factor to get higher paying jobs or being able to leave for better opportunities or more stability. They create a substantial imbalance of power between employer and employee. An employee should be able to monetize their work experience by being able to apply for jobs that are substantially similar to their current employment.”
Ishaq	“I am in favor of eliminating noncompete law. It is hanging sword on the employees especially physician head and most the employer abuse it. There should be no noncompete and everyone should be free to practice wherever they want. It will creat a healthy competition.”
Christopher	“Non-compete clauses are a way for companies to lock employees into predatory contracts that prevent them from leaving to work for competitors. I have personally witnessed non-compete clauses force people to stay at a company while said company stripped them of their benefits and pay, because there was no where for them to go outside of the radius of the non-compete. They are a practice of big business to force workers into poorer working conditions, and should be done away with.”
Zeshan	“Noncompete restrictions hurt both workers and competing businesses. I believe the FTC SHOULD pass the ban on non-competes!”
David	“I am currently working at a below market pay rate for a Data Science company . Many potential employers won't even give an interview if an applicant is subject to any non-compete irrespective of the details. It's essentially a "check the box" disqualifier. This is causing me a hardship.”
Jeff	“I think the ban on non competes will have a positive impact on the economy in two ways. First it will create more opportunities for entrepreneurs as they will beunencumbered by noncompetes. As an nursing executive , noncompetes have personally limited my ability to pursue certain job opportunities or create my own business. Second, it will put further pressure on employers to treat their employees well. Employers will no longer be able to use the leverage of noncompetes against employees to maintain the awful status quo. Instead employers will have to treat their employees with better pay, benefits and working conditions.”
Aaron	“Non-compete agreements are not acceptable under any circumstances. As a former business owner , their only purpose was to limit employees' ability to change jobs and negotiate higher pay. I knew that they would sign because people were desperate for a job. As an employee, they have limited my income dramatically because I could not work in my field of expertise and therefore completely change profession every time the work environment became unbearable. 1100 percent support eliminating these agreements. This will also force employers to pay employees fairly because now they have options.”
Alison	“If the FDD content/terms have been changed by the Franchisor at the time of the Franchise Agreement renewal, the non-compete should not apply. I request the FTC include franchises in the ban on non-competes in the event the Franchisor changes the FDD from the first contractual agreement to the next. With my franchise , the FDD content/terms have changed dramatically since I first signed it, which forces me to choose between signing a renewal agreement with much worse terms than my current agreement, which I don't want to do, or not be able to work in my field of expertise."

Stephen	"I have been in the HVAC industry full-time since 1999 and I have been training in this industry since 2014 to present. I signed a non-compete in 2019 with my current company and as I have an amazing job offer to train for another company in the same industry, I am limited to this one-year agreement and I cannot take this new opportunity. This really limits me to advancement and now I am stuck."
Jonathan	"As an employee with a non-compete, I have had to decline offers and have been denied offers because my non-compete is overly broad and any new employer is concerned about potential litigation. This has cost me several thousands of dollars in base salary. I believe non-competes do more harm to employees than good. Employees should have the right to work for whomever they desire without fear of litigation. Any company that is afraid of a former employee poaching clients should be more concerned about why that client is leaving rather than the former employee taking them."
Amin	"I would support new rulings for NPRM to remove non complete clause in contracts. most of the tech companies use non complete clause in contract or in addition to contract to prevent employees to join another company in the same field. In long term, non complete clause gives the employer the opportunity to keep employee underpaid since employee cannot afford to stay out of job for the period of 1-2 years."
Miranda	"I am currently being denied the chance to be hired in a senior role for an amazing agency due to non compete. I would be paid 30K to 40K more than what I'm making now, and I would be working for a more diverse team (women, people of color, more friendly to LGBTQIA+). So, exactly as it is being reported right now, the noncompete agreement keeps me from getting better pay and having better working conditions."
Adriana	"I am a small business owner and I don't think NCAs are fair to employees. Please protect the worker's right to earn a living. Non-compete clauses only protect the company. If anything limit their stronghold (distance, time, etc)."
T	"I am in full support of this non-compete clause. The current non-compete I am in is hurting my family's ability to take advantage of my skill set to simply earn more money. The non-compete is essentially creating a monopoly in my niche in which my former employer takes full advantage of with little to no competition. Anyone that tries to compete with him, he takes to court and spends thousands of dollars on high price lawyers and bullies us to comply and not go through civil litigation. If I was to lose the civil suit, it would be hundreds of thousands of dollars and the risk is too high for me."
Kevin	"Please do not listen to the agencies fighting to stop your rule against non-compete clauses. These are lobby groups supporting big business. Non competes hurt the average American and it's time to stand up for us. Tell big businesses no. They argue that non-competes will cost them millions in labor costs which is true because it puts more money in the people's hands. Non competes hurt the people! Stand up and fight for us and tell the lobby groups that you hear them but you will not support them."

Gruman	"I wholeheartedly agree with the noncompete ban. Most employees don't know of any trade secrets worth anything so that argument is false. They are just designed to trap employees. The customer suffers because the employee does just enough to not get into trouble. Anybody who thinks noncompete clauses make sense for anybody but high level business executives is not smart."
J	"I support removing the non compete agreements. I suffered loss of wages and restriction of employment by entering into a non compete with Parametric Solutions inc. Who are currently under investigation with Pratt and Whitney (Raytheon) for participating in a "no poach" scheme aimed at reducing the wages and mobility of skilled workers... As an engineer the companies I work for already own any and all ip and patents generated. Further restricting employment is anti-competitive."
T	"I work in the staffing industry and my previous employer, Kelly Services, had see them. They laid me off after 17 years (and at 60 years old). They told me they'd stop me from working for any competitor for a year. Period. I was lucky, my boss trusted me (I would never do anything unethical) and made an exception. But at 60, to be "lucky" to get around this? That's not right. Please force employers to limit non competes to protection of their IP. That's fair. Not being able to work is not!"
Priya	"End ALL non-compete clauses! Including non-profit hospitals. This is another form of slavery."
Andy	"I support a complete ban on non-compete agreements. I have practiced labor and employment law for 31 years as an attorney. Non-compete agreements area way to keep employees handcuffed to their employers and prevents tens of millions of workers from being able to accept a better job. There is no business justification for having non-compete agreements except it allows businesses from having to raise employee pay."
Scott	"Non comps for non executive employees who are employed at will is anti competitive and harmful to employees who can not leverage their chosen skills as needed. They should be abolished for all industries, not just tech companies."
Mark	"I support ending non compete clauses."
Michael	"Non-compete clauses in veterinary medicine impede the ability of the individual veterinarian to make a living under their license, while forcing them to work outside of their solemn oath to serve the community through the relief of animal suffering. These clauses are now used solely for the benefit of large corporate employers to hamstringing employee veterinarians. They are unethical and should be banned."
Dr. Vijaya	"Please remove the non compete for physicians as they should be able to work independently without big corporate world or other employers bending their arms backwards to help their patients."
J	"1100% support this. At Kyndryl , a non-compete and non-solicit agreement is used in exchange for minimal stock options but once you leave, which I did on Jan 31, they send legal notice to stop and desist to scare you of a pending lawsuit, to prevent you from doing business with clients where who you worked closely with to see if they'd consider doing business with you again at a new company (stifling competition and pay) as well as asking colleagues if they'd be interested in applying for new roles which stifles pay...Let's get this done."

Mark	"I support this rule. Noncompetes not only negatively impact one's ability to earn over time, but can also force unhappy, displeased employees from seeking a better quality of worklife elsewhere. It has never made sense to me, that a healthy, viable company would ever want to require unhappy employees to remain in their employment...This rule is long over due - and I wish you the best in getting it finalized with as little friction (lawsuits, etc) as possible. My family and I, thank you very much."
Suman	" Non competes are just used to suppress wages and harass and threaten employees with potential law suits and court battles. We should be free to work for who we want. I congratulate the administration in bringing up this issue and I fully support the intent to ban all non competes."
Gregory	" Physicians must be included! It is imperative that physicians not be excluded from this proposed rule. We have families and hospitals/employers non-compete us completely out of town and often state when things don't work out. It was threatened to me twice in my 15 years in practice already and is why I'm completely solo now."
Kamran	"I support banning all non-compete agreements. As a doctor they have truly hurt my ability to practice and take care of patients. I feel if I speak up against unsafe practices at my clinic or hospital I will have to move and therefore I keep quiet."
Satish	"Non-compete should be banned. Particularly in medical practice it really hurts patient care and after a well established doctor- patient relationship, patients are forced to find another doctor or travel far to see the same doctor if he leaves a current employer. Non compete rules hurt this and there is no reason to enforce them at all to begin with."
Sharon	"I support the banning of non-compete clauses."
Mary	"I truly hope the removal of non-competes is pushed through! I am a 52 year old female with many years until retirement. I am the primary breadwinner raising two daughters 13 and 15 years old with my husband. I have a chronic medical condition that does not prevent me from working nor requires any special accommodations yet treatment is very expensive without insurance as is COBRA. As of Dec 1, 2022 I was laid off after 4 years of employment. I am currently engaged in an EEOC claim against my former employer on sex and age discrimination and retaliation. My former employer has me trapped under a non-compete while they continue to profit on the deals I closed or had in play prior to my termination. While they profit from my efforts, I am watching my savings dwindle to pay COBRA and other living expenses... I understand companies don't want to hire people only to work a year or two and then jump ship and steal clients, but where is the protection for the individual?"
Vivek	"I think it would be a wonderful idea to remove non-compete agreements. They often lock employees into a firm and keep them from getting gainful employment. They are unfair to workers but they also hurt the economy as a whole. They prevent people from engaging in their most productive activities. Getting rid of non-competes will help workers and help the economy."

Adeel	“Non-competes are inherently unfair to Physicians who want to provide care to patients. there is no good reason to prevent physicians from providing good care to their patients by allowing hospital systems to think of their bottom lines only and prevent physicians from practicing in the area of their choosing. Furthermore, not- for-profit hospitals should not be excluded. Given a significant number of hospital systems are considered not-for-profit, but still generate considerable profits for administrators and CEOs.”
Rajendra	“I totally support this proposed rule. Pin one of the many employees affected due to non-compete clause. This is especially enraging as there is no competition or taking business away in my profession (hospitalist). I'm not able to seek better job opportunities in the area because of non-compete agreement. This becomes especially cumbersome when families and children are involved. Uprooting multiple lives seems like the only option with non-compete clause. So, in many instances it used as an intimidation tactic by employers.”
Lakshmi	“Locking physicians into non compete clauses limits access for patients to healthcare. Physicians and non profit hospitals should not be excluded.”
Rachel	“Non-competes give companies excessive power over their former employees. Companies shouldn't have any power over former employees. Once those ties are cut, they should be cut. Forbidding non-competes just makes sense.”
Brad	“Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare. particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients.”
Ray	“As a worker with a non-compete in place I can say that it negatively affects my ability to provide for my family, I can't go and do my current job for another company for 18 months even atler they change my pay structure (lower pay), change company benefits, decrease the size of my account base or anything else that negatively effects me and I have no recourse. I say the benefits outweigh the cost, companies that have good policies in place and treat their employees fairly will out perform the companies that don't causing those companies to up their standard or fall to the way side and lose market share. I say do away with it.”
Mahmoud	“Incredibly unfair to force ANY employee, physician or otherwise, into a non-compete if there is absolutely zero intellectual property that they can take with them.”
Karry	“Please ban non-competes. Being locked out of competitors after being laid off is awful.”
Loren	“O have a right to work, and non-compete clauses limit that right. As an American I should have full liberty to add value to the legal economy in any way I am able and wish to do so, and contractual elements which hinder that liberty (i.e. non-compete clauses) should be illegal. As companies have been trending towards rewarding loyalty less and less, the wisdom shared amongst workers is that the only way to get a real raise is to move to another company...Companies must be made to feel competitive pressure not only on the cost of goods but the cost of labor as well -- any other arrangement strains the credibility of calling ours a "free" market."

Maitham	"As a surgical oncologist , I appreciate if the noncompete clause is not applicable for physicians, so they can work locally and stay close to their families It's also unfair for patients, especially patients with cancer, to change their care provider because that provider cannot stay in town due to the noncompete clause?"
Taylor	"Non-competes slow technological progress and suppress wages."
Karenia	"Non-compete clauses keep people at jobs they don't like, or worse keep them at a job where they're being abused because they can't work in their own field it's crazy that this is a thing. This is extremely anti-American worker and pretty much everybody here is an American worker."
Ashfaq	"I completely support to remove die Non- compete clause for physicians .. with the market dominated by Private Equity and large hospital systems, it becomes almost impossible to change a job for physician unless they leave the area (usually whole metroplex)."
Omar	"Please pass to save the demise of modern medicine ."
Michael	"Please ban non compete clauses. I should be free to work where I want. No one should be able to tell me where I can and can not work."
DAVID	"I'm 100 percent for this ruling, many professionals are without jobs because of non-competes and based on age and/or industry experience if they take another job its much less in pay since its out of their expertise or cannot find a job. Many people will fight the non-compete just to survive with a job at another company but its at a huge cost with lawyer and court fees and that's if they win. The non-compete needs to go away!"
Amber	"The non-compete is being used within the medical community to keep wedges down. As a specialized physician , private equity groups are buying our practices and keeping wedges lower than median. If I did not have a non compete, I would either change jobs within my local community or start my own practice. This is a bipartisan issue! Non competes put companies profits over the individuals rights to work within their field of expertise."
Kalyani	"A physician's livelihood is placed at risk with a noncompete clause. No other businesses use this to restrict their previous employees from going next door to another employer. Why should physicians be held to this standard The noncompete clause is detrimental to patients and their health care if they are unable to drive to where their doctor now must practice medicine d/t a noncompete clause. There is a huge physician shortage and this alone should get rid of the noncompete clause in every physicians contract."
Moustafa	"I strongly oppose excluding physicians from the new Non-Compete Clause Rule ban. Physicians suffer the most from these restrictive practices and in most occasions we have to leave Cities and states with most needs and suffering significant family hardships due to the current non-compete."

Muhammad	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Exempting physicians from prohibiting a noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations."
Muhammad	"I'm a psychiatry resident in Dallas who is currently seeking employment. Noncompete clauses limit my ability to see patients and are worsening the mental health crisis in this country."
Manmeet	"Support Ban on non compete."
Vivek	"I am completely in favor of forbidding noncompete agreements."
Braden	"It is unfair for companies to enforce a non-compete for employees. We live in a capitalist country, and competition in all aspects is required in order to succeed."
Thomas	"Non-Compete clauses can serve a good purpose in narrow circumstances but as they are practiced today it is far too open for abuse. It would be worth sacrificing the benefits of non-competes in those circumstances for the benefit of society at large, if they were banned entirely... It is obvious why businesses want to apply these to more workers every year and it is unamerican, non-capitalist and just more importantly WRONG."
Kiran	"I agree that non compete should be abolished."
Patrick	"I am in the Transportation Industry and have been for 18yrs. Non-Competes defy our basic freedom as a citizen. How is it fair for an industry to say I can't work in the same industry that I have been for 18yrs because of a Non-Compete. The principal value of that alone is not a fair system. America has been about fair competition in business."
Sarma	"I fully support the Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) FTC is proposing, It will help employees a lot to grow in their careers and also help improve the competition in the market.. Several employers are taking undue advantages of their employees at present due to lack of this rule."
Thanigaivel	"I like to ban the non compete agreement."
Rafay	"Non Compete must be illegal. It limits opportunities and wage growth."
Laura	"Non-Compete Clause Rule would mitigate the potential harm caused by non-compete clauses that may unfairly limit job opportunities for employees and reduce competition in the labor market. By prohibiting employers from enforcing non-compete clauses for certain categories of workers, such as low-wage workers and those who are unlikely to possess trade secrets, this could help promote a more competitive and dynamic labor market. NPRM could also provide greater clarity and consistency in the use of non-compete clauses, which could benefit both employers and employees. NPRM has the potential to promote a more level playing field in the labor market and enhance economic opportunities for workers."
M. Umair	" Physicians should also be allowed to have a non-compete opinion. They should have an option to provide care to their patients regardless of restrictions from their previous employer or group."

JoBeth	"I am a board certified Family Medicine physician . I am in total support of the FTC proposed elimination of the non-compete rule, banning this practice. As a, currently, hospital employed physician, it is disheartening to know that I would be unable to open a practice in the same location that I currently work. The AIIA and some other big businesses are against this proposal because they worry about their bottom line. What about the physicians with families that have to be uprooted from their homes and communities because they cannot practice with X miles of their current employment?"
Ashley	"I am writing in support of the proposed ban on non-compete clauses. In this volatile work environment, employees may be laid off at any time by an employer but are not offered the same level of freedom to leave and move on to another company. Non-compete clauses restrict career & income growth for workers and keep workers in toxic work environments. In place of a non-compete, companies can offer NDAs and Non-Solicit clauses to protect competitive advantage, proprietary information, and client stability."
AR	"Please end non compete. Where are people going to go if they can't use their skills and experience? Start from scratch?"
Colin	"Please follow through with outright banning, or at least severely curtailing, non-compete agreements. I have watched too many ordinal)/ employees be afraid to leave their jobs due to the apparent threat of legal action. As noted in the FTC filing (and as I have personally observed), even in locations where non-competes are unenforceable they have a chilling effect on the labor market. That chilling effect viewed in aggregate is regular employees being afraid to seek better opportunities elsewhere. Non-compete agreements also give employer's an unfair ability to artificially reduce employee pay be disallowing marketing and use of their skills."
James	"Should be codified in law."
N	"It is not fair to tax people with no-compete clauses, and make them enslaved to an organization."
Hussien	"I am an MD in practice for 25 years, I think removing die non compete clause rule would be greatly helpful."
Elizabeth	"Non-compete clauses are terrible for all involved. Workers aren't free to move to better opportunities, and companies are denied qualified applicants for job openings."
Tagos	"I'm on board with banning "non-compete." It is a practice that genuinely stifles hardworking Americans from making a living."
Arlene	"My former employer fired me and tried to have me sign a non disclosure agreement that would have kept me from doing the same work (Administrative Director with a commercial construction company) anywhere else for a period of FOREVER. If I had signed the contract he then would have given me a severance pay of $5,000. But I didn't sign it because 5 years of suppressing my hard earned work experience and hindering my monetary growth was not worth a one time $5,000 severance pay. It was a disgusting and BOGUS "offer"!!"
Samara	"I believe this would be a positive step in making a more competitive market. It will serve consumers and not just the corporations."

Wrenn	"I am a physician with a 50 mile 3 year noncompete. Even if I practice telemedicine from my home in a state a thousand miles away it is a violation. If I work for a company in another country which has a presence in my current area, it is a violation. Currently, there is an acute shortage of radiologist physicians throughout the world. Noncompetes harm patients by limiting access to physicians. This is especially true in rural areas. For example, with a 50 mile noncompete, I cannot serve patients in adjacent rural areas. Patients are also harmed because hospitals cannot have access to the specialists they need because of noncompetes. Noncompetes are particularly harmful in healthcare since individual health suffers."
Syed	"Non-compete clause is not fair and discriminatory!"
Arun	"I am physician working in Dallas as a neonatologist and highly recommended to include physicians in the proposed non compete rule."
Nidhi	"I don't support non compete clause."
Jared	"I write in support of the suggested rule change. In light of the current state of the job market, non-compete agreements especially for entry-level work are not only unnecessary, but chilling to upward mobility for workers. In addition, they are just plain unnecessary. They are not needed to provide additional protections to companies save for those in high-level positions who are harder to replace and may have significant essential knowledge to that company. I support the ban on non-complete agreements going forward."
Shawn	"I support this rule for all of the reasons which it was conceived. The company that I work for has a broadly overreaching non-compete clause that forbids me from working in my own field for myself or anyone else for an entire year. Additionally, it forbids me from working with any of my clients for a period of three years. I shouldn't have to switch careers for a year just to be able to sustain my and my family's lives. And three years is a long time to wait to reengage with former clients. Especially if they have moved on from using that company. This needs to pass. Non-compete clauses are inherently one- sided and only protect businesses, and not individuals."
Brian	"I am strongly opposed to non-compete clauses, there is nothing more unamerican than being forced to switch industry or move away from your hometown because a corporation doesn't want an employee to compete. Isn't competition the bedrock of capitalism?"
Jeff	"Please end this! It is effecting me and my family right now with I can't work at other hospital systems after they fired me. It's all I have done for 20 years and what I know. This is not right!"
Kelly	"I think this is a wonderful idea."
Christa	"An immediate ban on all non-competes is what we need. A non-compete is just a way for a company to take advantage of a employee. Enforcing non-competes are costly - on both sides- and hinders an individuals ability to grow their career. Not to mention that if a company were to treat their employees the way they should, employees would not want to leave."
M	"I signed a non-compete in May of 2022 as the company put me on leadership incentive plan. I was the operations director for this company in Texas. Fast forward to February of 2023 and I was offered my first opportunity to become

	the General Manager of a facility about 15 miles from the plant I worked at for the former company. After turning in my notice and explaining to my former boss that I had an opportunity to advance my career he seemed happy for me. I was released from the company the day after I turned in my resignation and the following day was contacted by the CEO and Owner of the company. The corporate office is in Minnesota and I worked at the Texas facilities. Both the CEO and owner informed me that I signed a non-compete and I really needed to read that....They know employees don't have the resources to fight them in court and they also know they are affecting careers when they do this. I am all for removing non- competes, at the same time would never hold any of my employees back from bettering themselves.
Rick	"Non compete clauses need to go away. Companies are not going to do things to foster retention."
Amy	"Please vote to eliminate the non-complete clause. As a physician in a mid-size city, it is near impossible to get mother job here because of the long distances in these clauses. I shouldn't have to move and uproot my kids if a job doesn't work out. This only protects the administration while punishing the hard-working physicians."
Joe	"I spent 3 years living in another state to meet non-compete requirements from a contract. The personal impact is that I had a house that I love and didn't want to sell, and a family that didn't want to move since my wife has a career of her own that was going well in our current location. So we lived apart, and commuted back and forth. The inconvenience and personal impact was huge, but there was also 3 years of rent in another state, a car purchase, separate insurance policies to meet state requirements, commuting costs, and opportunity costs, so the financial impact was significant as well. When finally moving back to my original location, I had to sign another no-compete again at my next job. The future impacts are real - again. No-compete clauses have had a major impact in my life decisions and direction, as well as the costs listed above. There are ways to protect employers with non-solicitation agreements, and intellectual property rules, that are effective. Removing non-compete clauses would remove a huge unfair burden for individuals, who may have no option to avoid these industry standard clauses. Please implement the proposed non-compete clause rule!"
Randy	"Completely unfair and stifles innovation in our economy."
Alejandro	"I started my career at an ad tech Finn that instituted non-competes for new grads. The clause pushed young and ambitious people to leave the city or to leave the industry. What is the point of experience and skill if we are forced to reset progress between jobs. Disallowing non-competes would be an enormous boost to young people and ambitious people of all ages at least. Moreover, removing the constraints will allow talent to funnel more efficiently to where it ought to be. I support the removal of non-competes.:
Melissa	"Abolishing the non - compete will allow people to have free will to work for who and what they deserve. Non compete contracts restrict employees' ability to work for a different competitor. This can become very problematic if the employee has highly specialized skills that are in demand in a particular industry. Also, with no competes, employees may have to accept lower wages to remain employed in their field. This is because the employer knows that the employee can't easily leave for a competitor, leaving less leverage to negotiate higher wages to provide for themselves and/or their family."

Brandon	"I can attest that I personally have been reluctant to change jobs due to a non-compete, and have heard similar experiences from my peers."
Flora	"As a physician , I truly believe that noncompetes harm patients and die people who take care of them. I have zero access to my hospital's intellectual property so why can they dictate where I work after leaving them? They should not be allowed to monopolize physicians and healthcare workers. Please ban noncompetes and create a healthy workforce that requires employers to take care of all their employees."
Rex	"I fail to see what benefit a non-compete clause can have for society as a whole. They are inherently an enemy of free markets and serve only to restrict that freedom. Some may claim "IP theft", but that is a load of B.S. If that was a serious concern the other company would prefer that the employee actually stay at the first company and keep them updated. The only exception here that I could see needing to exist would be in mergers and acquisitions when that industry is mostly made up of die people who work there."
Zack	"Non-competes do not create a fair market. They benefit employers but not the employees. Please allow the country to thrive with fair markets. Make non-competes illegal."
Philip	"I am a 20+ year employment lawyer . I have both enforced and busted a wide variety of non-compete contracts in industries from talk radio to space science. I have never seen a situation where the legitimate business interests of the former employer were truly threatened by a former employee competing. I have read the cases where it might have occurred, but I have come to regard those as rare exceptions...I have represented workers whose non-competes were facially invalid under Texas law. Their prospective new employer did not want to challenge the non-competes because it wanted the employees to sign similar agreements with it."
Ashley	"I am an employee rights litigator in Dallas, Texas. I frequently handle non-compete cases on behalf of employees...Employers can often be heard to complain that the cost of training is high, and they might lose money if someone leaves early. That is true. But that is the cost of doing business. It is fundamentally anti-competitive to try and pass those costs on to workers (many of which, it must be said, are already deeply in debt because they've paid exorbitant amounts of money for "training" in the fonn of higher education). That is not the answer. If an employer wants to attract and retain skilled workers, it can and should do so through competitive salaries and benefits, healthy working environments, and opportunities for advancement."
Cy	"Non-compete clauses are anti-democratic and anti-labor."
Graeme	"Non-compete clauses in employment contracts restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor or start a competing business after leaving their current employer. This practice harms employees, limits competition, and stifles innovation. Research shows that non-compete agreements can have a negative impact on employee mobility, wage growth, and job satisfaction. Employees who are subject to non-compete agreements are less likely to change jobs, negotiate better wages, or seek out new opportunities that might benefit them. Moreover, non-compete agreements limit competition by preventing skilled workers from contributing their knowledge and skills to new businesses.”

Gabriel	“There is something distinctly un-American about barring individuals from liberty and the pursuit of happiness by limiting economic opportunities to whatever company a person happens to work for at the time. If we are indeed a capitalist society, let's act like one.”
John	“I am a therapist . Non-compete clauses are common in our contracts. Non-compete clauses generally favor employers more than workers. They also cause problems for people in my profession by often forcing us to work far away or forcing us out of areas entirely. They also have created more problems than they solve. In my area there is a shortage of available therapists which has created problems for providing services.”
Paul	“I strongly support the Non-compete Clause Rule NPRM. These clauses have been used by businesses to deny employees the right to job mobility and caused reduced compensation and facilitated the abuse of employees.”
Cameron	“I worked for a concrete supply company in Grand Praire and was offered a job making way more money for a concrete supply company in Dallas. They drag me to court and lawyers got involved and i had to be moved to a different department. I felt like i didn't something wrong but all I was doing was making things better for my family. PLEASE get rid of the Non Compete. All were trying to do is take care of our families.”
Paul	“I support die effort to eliminate non-compete clauses and have been subject to them myself.”
Namirah	“Non compete clause forces physicians to work in environments regardless of bum out. Large hospital systems are utilizing this by applying the non compete to any where they have a clinic or smaller hospital. The only option left them is to leave the city altogether uprooting families and children. This is emotionally and financially draining.”
Katherine	“It takes many years of hard work and dedication to become a physician . The majority of us are concerned with learning to properly and effectively take care of patients with little thought to the business aspect of medicine. When we enter into our first employment contract we have little guidance on how to negotiate and most of us cannot afford the advice of an attorney. We do not realize that once we accept a job with a noncompete, we have effectively reduced our work options in that location to one. Fast forward, we have a family and children are in schools with friends they do not want to leave.”
Chad	“I am currently under an non compete agreement that I was required to sign. I am a builder of large scale infrastructure and am the only person to every build a project at the scale and speed before. I am one of only a few in my industry that have successfully executed this accomplishment. My employment was terminated without cause and now the company will not allow me to work in the industry for 1 year. The company I work for bought my business, the concepts , processes, and systems were designed by my team. The non compete is to control competition, because without die non compete, I could build a new business hiring 400+ team members and building value in rural America.”

Stephanie	“As a physician non-competes are very difficult, because they can make you have to relocate just to get out of your contract, when all you really want is to find a different job. I don't want to leave my home, I just don't want to stay in the current position. And, the patients want to Follow the physicians, when geographically possible. Business should not be allowed to control which doctor the patient can and can't see. It's the patient's choice to continue with a specific provider. Forcing the provider out of their mach is not in the patient's best interest. It's only in the interest of the business owner. It actually damages important patient-physician relationships. The amount of trust and energy from both the physician and the patient is more than just the dollar amount.”
Fabiola	“I am in academic medicine. The purpose of graduate medical education is to provide the knowledge and skills that doctors need to treat future patients. In Texas specifically, academic programs want more physicians to stay in Texas so that they can care for Texas residents. Recently, a hospital administrator suggested adding non-competes to medical residents/fellows, because if a fellow is hired down the road at another hospital, our hospital may lose patients. This kind of thinking hurts medicine and doctors abilities to care for patients in their own home town. Pleas consider eliminating non competes. They are particularly harmful in medicine.”
Richard	“I support this, in particular the provision that requires employers to rescind existing non-competes. I am a physician, residency training program director, and chief of service at a large public hospital in Dallas, Texas. Too often I see our newly minted doctors accept harmful non-compete clauses in their contracts because they feel the pressure of massive loan payments looming, and frankly don't yet know their own worth. It's predatory of hospitals and medical practices to do this, and for large state-run institutions like my own, who have affiliated medical schools, it is counter to their mission. They claim to exist to train doctors who will stay and serve citizen of Texas, and yet they make their new doctors sign a contract that expressly inhibits their ability to do so should they leave the institution. It's ludicrous...I am heartened to see the FTC take up this mantle. No doubt hospital and other corporations will lobby against this (using $$ made by doctors by the way), so I implore you not to make exceptions to this. Resist their whining and their political contributions.”
Saima	“Non compete laws is severely detrimental to patients, as physicians who leave or are fired from an organization are not allowed to provide die same safe and familiar care as their own physician who now has to work in a limited geographic territory for a specific period of time.”
Abhisek	“The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market threes should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients.”

Derek	"Non-competes area classic case of "Good Intentions gone wrong". What started off as a tool to reasonably protect proprietary processes and workflows of a business has been manipulated into an overly effective strangulation on competition and free market economics. In the present day, Non-competes are abused into being an artificial Market Wage suppressor for job positions across all skill levels, including the more entry-level focuses positions like assistants or telephone operators."
Robert	"Please outlaw non competes for physicians ! I've seen too many good physicians leave town because they were not getting appropriate compensation from their group but their patients and referring doctors loved them and how they practiced medicine. The option of staying in town and switching groups or going solo etc was negated by the non compete."
Rosemary	"I am in support of this law, it is long overdue."
Christo	"Please allow for physicians to not be subject to the noncompete rule. It unfairly gives employers a distinct advantage to drive down wages by preventing doctors from working in the same area and causing doctors have to choose between work and where they want to live."
Stephanie	"I fully agree with eliminating the ability of employers to insist upon non-compete clauses for their employees. I have a doctor who was being overworked and underpaid by his practice, and wanted to find another job in our large metro area (Dallas-Fort Worth). But because there was a non-compete clause in his contract, he was forced to take a tele-health/remote job working for a practice in another state. That means he can't treat me or other patients here in Dallas, even though we need his health care right here - and he still lives here, he just can't work here. These non-compete clauses don't just hurt the workers, they hurt the whole community who need a thriving workforce who is gainfully employed and paid a fair wage."
Niles	"There is a legitimate argument that a non-compete violates the Forced Labor Act. 18 U.S.C. 1589. A person violates the Forced Labor Act if he requires a person to act by any of four means: (1) by means of force, threats of force, physical restraint, or threats of physical restraint to that person or another person; (2) by means of serious harm or threats of serious harm to that person or another person; (3) by means of the abuse or threatened abuse of law or legal process; or (4) by means of any scheme, plan, or pattern intended to cause the person to believe that, if that person did not perform such labor or services, that person or another person would suffer serious harm or physical restraint."
Michael	"This is possibly the greatest action the FTC has taken this century, and is certainly the best move the Biden administration has made. Non-Complete clauses are not only embarrassingly and vehement ally un-American, but they are at their core anti-Capitalist at it's most basic level. The Invisible Hand applies to the work force too, and workers have an inalienable right to take their work and talents to wherever they deem is the best fit/opportunity for them. Thank you for this Rule, and I cannot support this enough."
Kristen	"I am a physician and I was very pleased to see this proposed rule. I have been affected by non-competes several times over the past 7 years. First, I worked at a clinic owned by a large hospital. The organization closed the clinic

	and one individual said the non-compete would not be binding but they did not have the authority to say then. Then I was planning to join another physician but she wanted a 40 mile non-compete. That should not have even been on the table as a point of discussion. I did not join that practice. While finalizing a contract at another private practice, I informed the owners that I would not accept a non-compete because this clinic was very close to my home and I did not want to have a restricted radius if I left. They assured me that I would not have a non-compete; however, there was one in the final contract and I would have had to walk away from an otherwise excellent job so I did sign it. Unfortunately, COVID hit within the year and income plummeted so I was let go at my time of contract renewal. The lawyer made sure I knew that the non-compete was still in force. This made finding a new position during COVID very difficult. I now own my own clinic and will never sign another non-compete. It is just another huge headache for physicians and I am happy to see that it might be at an end."
Paul	"I am in favor of banning non-competes in medical contracts. Thank you."
G	"Non-compete clause is oppressive and must be abolished."
Mike	"Long over due. Companies have become more demand from employees while keeping wages down. Life outside it work should not be used to fire a person. Creativity should be encouraged not liable. Non competitive businesses are mining die American dream. Mandatory arbitration is even worse."
Mena	"I wanted to write about my experience with non-competes, as a rural gastroenterologist. I worked for a non-profit hospital system for many years in rural Texas. I was always bothered by the fact that the hospital administration gloated in meetings over the profits the gastroenterology department (consisting of only myself) made from the preventative, life-saving procedures I performed. There were multiple times when patients that paid self-pay prices later reported to me that they fell in deep medical debt because of the procedures I performed, often being charged tens of thousands of dollars in facility fees. One patient even informed me that lie had to shut down a beloved restaurant he owned in the city to be able to afford the close to $60,000 he owed for two colonoscopies I performed on him. Furthermore, my clinical staff and support staff was being whittled away "due to cost-cutting measures" as hospital profits increased from the gastroenterology department of which I was the only physician. I ultimately felt that I could better serve my city by opening a private practice in the city and performing my procedure in a surgery center. Thankfully, I discovered that my non-compete was not enforceable. I was able to, thus, open a practice and serve this population and provide higher quality care while costing the health care system much less."
Keith	"I disagree with this non compete clause. Companies use this as a threat to keep employees from leaving."
Aaron	"I am personally in a position right now, due to my employment, where my future will be greatly affected due to the option for companies to create Non-Compete clauses. My contracted position is attached to an expiring contract that is set to expire this year and, if the Non-Compete policy is not changed, or outright removed, my next employment options would be drastically smaller ter the next 365 days affecting my very livelihood. Not to mention I am a father and husband and my family's livelihoods would also be at stake. I feel it is an unethical and immoral practice that an employer can effectively choose who you can, and can't, work for once you are no longer with them."

Adam	"End non-compete agreements now."
Bradley	"I would hope this gets pushed through as it would help promote more stable job growth."
Jonathan	"Non compete clauses are legal forms of indentured servitude that only serve the interests of a few. I am in healthcare and witnessed the abuse this provides in creating intolerable working conditions for physicians, nurses and other ancillary personnel. I work for a "non profit" organization that perpetually expands, while decimating benefits and alert staff yearly how they will do more with less resources."
JESSICA	"I feel these need to be dropped. I was a Sr Tax Analyst for Block and they allowed me to be threatened by my co-workers, belittled, bullied and begged me not to call corporate aid they would handle it and never did then LET ME GO. Then flagged me with a no compete for 2 years. Original agreement was 2 years from 1st contract and then changed once I would not allow the on going disrespect. It isn't right to stop me a mother of 5 kids from working because I wouldn't sweep their nonsense under the rug. So much happened in that place and I am constantly being punished for other people's actions."
Acacia	"As a physician in a pediatric sub specialty. I currently work for a large hospital system, covering a hospital in an underserved area. There is a 2nd hospital near by owned by a different group where one other of my same sub-specialty works. We are the only two physicians of the same subspecialty that live in this community. Due to our non-competes we can't work to cover each others patients at the different hospitals."
Nathan	"I personally have not had non compete non compete clauses hurt my career, but they have hurt my fathers' career and the career of my close friend. Please ban non compete clauses."
Sarah	"Because slavery is bad, I urge you to not let corporations tell Americans where they can work after employment has been terminated. I worked in a new restaurant every year in college because I never knew what my schedule would be; this law would've kept me at the low-paying, sexually-assaulting (restaurant) joint all 4 years. Get reasonable about American rights."
Elisha	"I totally agree to do away with the non compete. They make no I worked for a company for several years and gave them my all. I quit due to several reasons and went to start my own business. They sued me to shut down my new business due to a non compete that they claimed i signed. (which i did not) Due to the unexpected expense of an attorney i was finically put in a tight spot. I went to court but because the ex employer had more money and the court favored them for reasons i lost and had to shut down."
Mary	"I encourage the FTC to impose the Non-Compete Clause Rule without delay to ensure workers have every opportunity to further their careers in the locations they choose. My family was forced to move states due to a 250 mile, 5 year non-compete that a former employer coerced us into signing. When the work environment became toxic we had no choice but move hundreds of miles from our established home. I implore you protect workers and their families from this gross and unfair practice.”

Minale	“Non-compete clause is restrictive and against the core value of individual rights. Not good for patients too”
Siva	“It will give freedom to physicians and flexibility for patients to choose their hospital depending on their physician.”
James	“There is a shortage of inpatient PMR physicians in rural east texas. Because of a non compete clause I am forced to not do inpatient rehabilitation for 2 years in East Texas and the closest positions are in Dallas. These patients suffer and have to travel further for care because die main hospital in Tyler makes all physicians sign a 2 year compete for any work as a physician.”
Amanda	“I am in favor of the non compete ban. The majority of companies that have them are not using them to bully previous employees and even treat or pay them poorly while they are still employee. I would understand a non disclosure agreement, ensuring any "trade secrets" aren't passed around from company to company, but not a contract on a human being themselves and having control over their livelihood.”
Joshua	“I am a physician . As private equity and large corporate entities have moved into medicine regional monopolies and duopolies have appeared throughout the country. This has stifled the growth of small practices. The entities already receive a competitive advantage in the market place against independent physicians via —facility fees" they can charge even in outpatient practices. Non competes are used through out the increasingly uncompetitive and monopolized marketplace to restrict the movement of physician practices and limit patient access.”
Tricia	“I'm an Otolaryngologist . Noncompetes serve large healthcare entities and harm patients and doctors. They allow for coercive retention which is anti-American and anti-capitalist. We need to incentivize hospitals and healthcare systems to improve working conditions for physicians to prevent bum-out and help maintain the physician work force. Physicians aren't learning proprietary information from the hospital that they can then use to steal patients. There are already too many patients and not enough doctors. Hospitals need to value physicians.”
Harlene	“I support the proposed ban on non-compete clauses.”
Mark	“Please ban these needless and harmful outdated agreements permanently.”
Stephen	“I am commenting to support the FTC in banning non-compete and similar employment agreements. I and a Certified Prosthetist who treats people living with limb loss (amputation). Noncompete agreements in this profession have limited competition between local companies and prevents clinicians from continuing treatment if they leave the employer for any reason. This restricts patient access to the top tier clinical care they need and deserve. Non compete contracts in my local market have pushed good clinicians into other professions or out of large geographical areas which negatively impacts patients.
Adib	“Hello as physician non competes are a negative to patient care and overall health care. Big hospitals /corporations use it for control and it should be illegal to include in contracts and enforce.”

Dana	“As a physician, I support a federal ban on noncompetes. In addition to repeatedly seeing colleagues suffer in employed positions that no longer serve them, or leave medicine altogether because a noncompete prevents them from seeking other employment within a reasonable distance from their home, I have personally been impacted by a noncompete clause. I recently left a private practice which had become economically unviable. My noncompete involves 5 overlapping 30 mile diameter circles around my metro area, eliminating any practice within a reasonable commuting distance. that restrict physician practice are definitely adding to the problem of deteriorating access to care.”
Andrew	“As an employee who is currently subject to a non-compete clause, I feel there is ample justification for their removal to promote a more fair employment landscape in private industry. Prior to taking on my role, I was a long-time government employee and only had a rough awareness of the concept of a non-compete, happy that such a concept would not apply to me. When I received my first job offer in the private sector, which I ultimately took, I reviewed the non-compete language and found it very jarring. I am essentially unable to work in my current industry or in any industry adjacent to my own (providing the same sector of customers with similar services) which nearly eliminates me from the job market which I chose to enter.”
Sheryl	“This rule should have been enacted years ago. It was only in 2019 that a young relative of mine was asked to sign a non-compete agreement, after being hired. This position was a data entry position paying $13/hour. The agreement required the employee to not work for a their unidentified competition, within 100 miles of every big city in Texas, for one year from leaving their employment. No exception mentioned if the company lays off the employee for lack of management skills. Interestingly, the 100 mile radius from Fort Worth transcends the border with Oklahoma, a state that has made non-compete agreements illegal. This issue must be addressed on the federal level so that all are dealing with the same set of rules. The newly hired employee who was faced with the decision to sign that agreement on the 3rd day of employment, regretfully had to refuse, was told all employees were required to sign the agreement. The employer cut a check for that 3 day old employee as though they were a contract employee for 3 days of work instead of the regular employee they has hired.”
Angela	“Non-compete clauses are Anti-American, period.”
Carolyn	I “agree with banning non-compete clauses. It keeps people from bettering themselves because they cant apply for a job using same skills that will have better pay or working conditions.”
Jonathan	“I am a plant manager in Texas who has worked in the petrochemical industry for 24 years. I am currently under a Non-Compete, which has hindered my career by stifling opportunities to expand or promote. The company I now work for also uses the Non-Compete as a punitive tool. For example, the executives recently changed bonus programs for all the managers and salespeople, which is less favorable to all individuals. They are also are not conducting employee reviews which are tied to performance raises. When I approached the President about these rule changes, he commented that I could sign the paperwork or not. He knows that my Non- Compete binds me, so leaving for a more favorable work environment is not an option because I would have to leave the industry."

Sean Matthew	"Ban non-competes!"
Brian	"My former employer is restricting most employees from working or consulting in any industrial business and prevents all employees from working for a vendor, customer or any industrial business located in the united states. That is unreasonable and should not be allowed....A employee who sells forklifts/loading dock equipment in Texas for this company cannot go to work selling industrial detergents or manufacturing equipment in Florida. This change needs to be paid to allow people to work hard and further there careers."
Mark	"Non-compete agreements are too restrictive and should be outlawed. They limit an individual's ability to provide for a family."
Sean	"I support the Non-Compete Clause Rule."
Alison	"It will also greatly put private practice that won't fall under this designation at a great disadvantage. Given that the operating model of not for profit health systems may not be significantly different than for profit health systems, this rule seems arbitrary and much to the advantage of several of our country's largest and most profitable hospital systems that happen to have not for profit status in name."
Jerry	"I believe this is the right thing to do for employees. Companies hold non compete agreements over employees head so they cannot leave to better the life. A employee who is good at what they do should not be held captive to an employer and threaten to be sued if they choose to leave for a better opportunity to help them and their family. It's should be the employees right to work and with who they work with and what they work for their future."
Robert	"As a person who has had the terrible experiencing of having to sign a non compete, I can succinctly say they are used to strong arm workers and supress wages. I was let go from a company I had signed a non compete with back in August. Keep in mind, they let me go. They tried to enforce my non compete saying I couldn't find work at competitors in the market and when I applied for a job outside of their market and scope of work they tried to go after my friend whom I approached about the job, saying he recruited me out, which isn't allowed because he was a former employee. Its absurd."
Tina	"There are instances and it is more common that you think of where people are forced to work in a very unprofessional environment, discriminated against when you are the only woman, sexually harassed, and treated disrespectfully but being under a Non-Compete makes it very difficult to leave a profession that you have worked in making a nice salary for 20 plus years to start over in a new profession likely having to take a substantial pay decrease. You would think it is easy to go to court and prove and defend yourself, but you would be amazed at the people that will get on the stand and lie under oath in an effort to protect their position with the company. You also lose the ability to negotiate strongly for salary increases because the company has the upper hand is fairly confident that you are not going to leave, so you are pretty much stuck with what is offered to you."

WILLIAM	"Please, do this. This will be good for the economy."
Mahboob	"There shouldn't be a non compete, it's used to mainly abuse the partnership in a practice. Practicing environment can change over time, relationship b/w individuals can change overtime, the promise made can be manipulated so if I joined a practice, and it's not a good fit after working with them, I should have an opportunity that I can practice in that area without being submitted to a slavery deal. So, if I have a family, with kids going to school and wife working a job, it's too much of a burden to relocate to another city and try to re establish yourself, get a job for wife, send kids to new school."
Virginia	"Agree with this proposal. Non compete clauses should be banned."
Lindsey	" Physicians absolutely must be included in the noncompete legislation. I spent 14 years of my life and hundreds of thousands of dollars to become a physician and we are constantly abused from all sides: By insurance companies, by oversight committees, by hospital administrators, etc., and the noncompete problem is one of the most glaring issues. We have a shortage of physicians in the US--ESPECIALLY in my field of Endocrinology . The answer is NOT to replace them with less trained/qualified PAs or NPs. The answer is to remove the obstacles that prevent appropriate physician practice. We are talking about people's lives and well-being here, and by that I mean physicians AND their patients. Do what is sensible. I am tired of corporations being God in America. Physicians and patients deserve better.
Debra	"I am writing as a citizen and contractor who has concerns about no compete practices in their current state. I am a Certified Registered Nurse Anesthetist who has been practicing for 15 years. I have been subject to no compete practices since my career began. I live in Texas where we are supposed to have some protection against these practices but most hospitals honor the no competes because they don't want to pay attorney fees to fight them. situations, where someone isn't allowed to get a more permanent position because someone else is making money off of their work.
Ishwara	"Non compete laws esp as pertinent to physicians and health care providers stifle competition and innovation. Most of the physicians are now entity employed that gives greater control of physicians to the network they work for. Non compete clause indirectly allows decreased supply of certain specialities in an area."
Andaleeb	"As sworn advocates for their patients, physicians bear a fiduciary duty to always prioritize their wellbeing. However, the corporate practice of medicine is outlawed in numerous states. Furthermore, noncompete agreements create a dilemma for doctors by placing them at risk of compromising ethical medical practices and placing their employers' interests above their patients. Physicians are entitled to the same freedom of movement as any other individual."
Marvin	"The era of the non compete clause in any contract is used to thwart competition but also intimidate workers to accept less pay and or less desirable work environment. These practices are used in medicine by big clinics and hospitals to three someone who leaves a practice to basically totally leave the area . This is inconsistent with the free market and the equal opportunity of job access and career development,. It is not that someone has stolen trade secrets or the formula for Coke and is setting up business making Coke. The rationale for continuing the non compete clause is flawed and antiquated. I strongly support its demise and non enforcement. I am a physician.”

John	“I respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed. noncompctes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and fir profit hospital systems.”
Bryan	“Please remove die ability for employers to include this kind of non-compete language in the contracts. It is anti-competitive and bad for die USA economy.”
Ian	“Non-compete clauses severely suppress wages in many positions, especially those in the service or hospitality industries. I worked as a scribe in a large, very busy emergency room in Fort Worth and was forced to sign non-compete clauses that prevented me from going between companies that worked at other hospitals in the area...I lived in a house with 3 other roommates, all of us with income, but was never able to save despite working in the industry for over 8 years. Please ban non-compete clauses in contracts.
Cheryl	“Non-compete clauses are only in the best interest of the company. They should be banned and allow workers to make their own decisions for their own advancement. Individuals are more important than companies or corporations.”
Daniel	“I am a physician in Texas. A ban on non-competes would be a major win for the physician worker and patient safety. Currently, hospitals and private equity-owned physician practices use the non-compete to take advantage of physicians. If a physician is bound to a non-compete the employer knows that they cannot leave their job without likely a major disruption to the physician's life such as selling their house and moving to a completely new city. Because of this, employers have an unfair advantage.”
Victoria	“As a physician I fully support this clause. Our nation is already suffering from a massive physician shortage that has only been exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic. We cannot afford to limit where physicians can practice when more and more are retiring early due to burnout.”
C	“I fully support the Commissions stance to outlaw non compete's. These legal agreements force an employee who has built a career to be subjected to legal action if they decide to change employers in die same market. Thus, this gives the current employer leverage over pay and other benefits knowing that the employee cannot leave for a better opportunity in the job market in the same industry. Its a very plantation mentality that these non compete's create and extremely limit the employee to continue their career in the same field.”
Tyler	“Non competes say it all in the name, they are anti competitive and they should be banned for many reason, the greatest of which is the fact that they are a tool used to suppress and deny workers opportunities to find better jobs.”
Stevan	“I am in favor of the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule as I agree that employers should be prohibited from entering into non-compete clauses with workers. I'm a physician and I practice in a specialty that provides care for complex medical conditions. I am grateful for the opportunity to serve and provide care to my local community. As my employer required a non-compete clause in my contract, if I were to leave my current practice for some reason, the non-compete clause would require that I leave my community and move to another city in order for me to continue practicing within my specialty.” .

Kyle	“As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Sincerely, Concerned Fourth Year Medical Student. ”
Victor	“Noncompete clauses are destructive to Non-compete clauses are detrimental professional's lives forcing them out of their home and many times out of their community.”
C	“Please do not exclude physicians from this rule.”
Parth	End non competes for doctors and health care professionals. The hospital administrators that want these policies do not have non competes so why should die health care workers and doctors. The USA is a free market economy. Let the free market dictate.”
Scott	“Thank you FTC for protecting the rights of workers from the predatory practices of businesses. This change is much needed! Businesses should be compelled to compete for workers just as workers are compelled to compete for the business!”
brian	“End Non-competes. Period. They do nothing but hams the typical employee trying to better their life. NDA's protect the employer from having their secret sauce recipe revealed. Non-competes are simply an overreach by employers to continue to exert control over exiting employees who they treat like chattel both during and after their employment period.”
Muhammad Anis	“I have been medical practice for 23 years and always been troubled with non compete clause in our employment contracts I understand when someone is hired by individuals they concur costs and use their resources but to have someone leave the are where they have spend time and energy to built a reputation and especially when there is physician shortage nation wide is not fair . There should be better way to end the practice I strongly suggest to make this non compete clause as illegal There could be some reasonable monetary number added to compensate employers cost if the contract is broken.”
Laura	“I am a health care worker, US Army Veteran, mom, and small business owner . I have owned a small business since 2016. I own an elective ultrasound facility that provides ultrasounds for expectant moms. I have an excellent reputation in our community and on social media...I sold my home and all of my belongings for the acquisition. I moved my son and I into a 1 bedroom apartment to fulfill this dream that would quickly turn into a nightmare...Sadly, at that time I found a franchise that offered a business model in which they claimed they would provide everything I needed including the physician. I began to research into it a bit more by gaining work as a contractor for them. This is when the first non compete agreement was presented to me...My attorney told me there is a statue of limitation on how long I can question the validity of an FDD, and I found out I had signed a non-compete clause in which I would be restricted from operating under my own name or gaining employment from a competitor for 5 years or 30 miles from ANY current location... There are dozens of people in my exact same shoes because of this franchise and this fraudulent CEO. Sadly the laws are not in favor of the little guys. The laws are in favor of exploiting people who just want to make a living.”.

Taylor	“As a commissioned employee, I welcome the opportunity for non-competes to be voided. I have worked in a commissioned role as an IT Recruiter within healthcare for the last 10 years. Due to my non-compete, I am not allowed to recruit for another company within this industry for 12 months after departure. This makes it very difficult to continue a career in a specialized industry. My employer just recently cut commission rates from 18% to 25% which has greatly affected my income. Due to my non-compete I am not able to seek positions offering a higher commission structure. I am able to pursue other recruiting opportunities in another industry but the learning period to make a comparable income to what I'm currently earning would take quite some time.”
Shri	“Noncompetes have deprived me of my livelihood. Despite being laid off, I am not able to work in my industry because of a noncompete. The company got all my ideas and then prevented me from working for anyone else after letting me go. It is not American nor is it freedom.”
RYAN	“As a Sales rep , I believe this would greatly benefit myself and earned wages in my market. The non-compete documents only hinder others like myself from scaling our income. I believe sales is a ton of service work, if we happen to move to another job due to harsh environments, we would now be able to take our book of business with us. Therefore increasing our value with the current company or with the next.”
Christopher	“Noncompetes should be illegal. They prevent employees from working in the field that they've payed tuition for once signed for a certain period of time. Sometimes even for years with no monetary compensation. They stifle free market competition. It prevents an employee from starting their own company and offering better services (sometimes even for a better price to the American consumer). Employees often don't have the financial means to fight these in court (even if they have a winning case). It places a huge financial burden on workers.”
Anunaya	“Please do not exempt employers who have a status of NPO (not for profit org). Most of the hospital systems and physician employers are registered as NPOs. They however, have similar work culture as 'For profit' organizations. From die perspective of the employees there is virtually no difference whether they work for an NPO or 'for profit organization'. If not changed, the rule will leave majority of employees on healthcare unprotected from the intentions of this rule.”
Erik	“In 2020 my employer for over 10 years decided to sell to a private equity group. In order to remain employed with the new company I was asked to sign a new more restrictive agreement with the acquiring company. The new employer would also be reducing my compensation by 60%. There was considerable incentive for my employer to position the NCA as a tool to limit career options. The agreement was an industry wide ban preventing me from working in any field of insurance (where I spent the prior 12 years). This was connected to the earn out and other income the seller would receive with no consideration of my (the employee's) 60% reduction in pay. In January 2021 I started my own insurance Agency with zero clients or income. My former employer sued me 50 weeks after my resignation in an effort to restrict me from contacting former clients 1 year after my resignation. I do not feel a company can force employees to remain under a NCA while offering no consideration and reducing compensation. Employees (not owners) of an organization being sold experiencing a substantial reduction in income should not be forced to remain employed or unable to seek employment elsewhere."

Victoria	"Because of their non-compete I was unable to seek out another company to work for in the same metroplex , despite owning a home and having family here. If I wanted to continue working in my prior field of work I would have to relocate to another state entirely to stay outside of their "geographic area" and it was a two year non-compete agreement.... Employees are powerless unless they want to uproot their families and lives and relocate."
Chris	"I fully support the banning of non competes. Non competes are a highly restrictive way of retaining employees."
David	"Been in Medical Field 30 plus years Sales and management. I have seen friends suffer because non compete agreements, the cost of legal to defend themselves, inability to get promoted because didn't want to sign a new non compete, and families needing to sell there homes to downsize during times when didn't have a job."
Jason	"Please accept this comment in support of Non-Compete Clause Rule. The company I was working for decided to sell to private equity. With that sale my compensation structure was to be cut drastically and they required I sign an even more restrictive document to receive that reduced compensation and stay employed. I left that employer to start my own company. We are currently in the middle of a lawsuit due to mainly breach of non-competition. I just don't see how non-competition and non-solicit agreements can be upheld when, to remain employed you must sign a more binding agreement and receive less compensation for die same job you had been doing."
Chelsie	"My family has been personally harmed by a non complete clause. My husband was a loyal employee of a company for 10 years. After 10 years of helping this company double in size, the owner sold to a international company. At this time, he was informed that the new company would be decreasing his pay SIGNIFICANTLY. According to his non complete, he was unable to leave his job and continue working in the industry he has grown to thrive in and provide a living for hos growing family. If his non compete was non existent our family wouldn't have endured YEARS off suffering and strife. Please ban non-competes so other families don't have to suffer like ours did."
Chris	"Non-compete agreements give full power to corporate institutions thus allowing for the indenture of millions while the 1% benefit from their labor...If a lawyer is needed to understand the document then it is clearly written to benefit the employer...If employers listen and respond to employees needs, then they will not want to leave. Lastly let's not forget, "government of the people, by the people, and for the people..."

Derrick	"Non compete agreements are nothing more than a way for companies to intimidate workers into performing prolonged service. When enforced they generate legal activity that does not serve the public good. They are a tool to monopolize talent and consolidate power. They are a drain on the economy. I find no place for them in democratic society."
Jason	"100% noncopy clauses should be banned. It stifles die free market that we're built on. It hurts employees, and it hurts companies from bettering themselves by either growing or going out of business because they're not growing and changing and becoming better. It encourages people to find the right fit and live happier lives and do what they can for the betterment of the country."
Jeff	"As a physician employed by a large single specialty group that has a very aggressive noncompete clause, I believe that noncompete clauses definitely restrict ones ability to relocate, advance their career with other groups, or decide to leave a group without harsh consequences."
Adam	"Many executives who are less than 10% owners in private equity backed, private company transactions are currently prohibited from working in their area of expertise due to restrictive non-competes. They may have been paid a fee, severance, or received a transaction bonus - but often times that money paid pales in comparison to their income potential which they cannot pursue for several years."
Robert	"Such non-compete clauses were a regular feature of employment agreements with consultant firms supplying software/computer code writing services in the San Francisco/South Bay areas. As an employee, I constantly operated under apprehension as I was transferred from one company to another, likewise as I transferred from one consulting firm to another. On one occasion I had difficulty presenting mathematical results at a professional meeting. The rapid transmission of discoveries is widely believed to substantially contribute to that industry's economic success. I congratulate your staff for impressive literature review and summation."
John	"Please make non compete clauses go away."
Dr. Fouzia	"If a job does not deliver what it promised on the employment contract and physicians want to leave, then the non-compete clause essentially makes them choose between moving by uprooting their families (spouse's job, kids' schools, different house, etc.) OR staying in an oppressive situation. This is not about patient safety. It is a way to cut costs at the expense of the physicians and patients. Pay the physicians what we're worth or let them compete with you. Patients should also have the freedom to seek care wherever they want. Patients should not be treated as the property of a health- system or insurance network. Non-complete clauses go against both the spirit of democracy and capitalism."
Jose	"This is great. I had a n awesome offer with better benefits and incentives. However the non-compete clause and a $2501c bs liability clause forced to let it go."
Michelle	I support the Federal Trade Commissions' proposal to prevent employers from entering into non-complete clauses with workers, which will not only increase an employee's opportunity to pursue better employment opportunities, as well as encouraging more entrepreneurship and encouraging higher wages.

Bryan	"I support the ban on non-compete Clause. I work in the consulting industry and risk being sued."
Robert	"END THEM, period. These hinder the American worker from taking advantage of & being competitive in their industry or field and the job market itself."
Ton	"I respectfully ask the FTC to make non-compete "agreements" illegal. In my careers have worked across multiple industries at all levels from hourly assembly to CEO. These clauses can be damaging to careers and can make it very difficult to start-over in aligned industries - even if the job is different. In the workplace where right to hire and fire at will is the rule, these clauses give an unfair advantage to the company. The company can hire or fire me at will, but I can only choose to quit and find work outside my industry."
dustin	"Banning non-compete agreements for physicians is a necessary step to improve patient access to care and promote competition in the healthcare industry. This proposal would allow physicians to practice freely and choose the best job opportunities for their careers, while also benefiting patients by improving access to care and potentially lowering healthcare costs."
Mace	"As a physician , I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. These clauses are an unfair and restrictive practice that hurts both physicians and patients. Non-compete clauses give employers too much leverage during contract negotiations. They can limit a physician's ability to earn a fair wage and can make it difficult for them to find other employment if their contract is terminated."
Brian	"I am writing to express my concern regarding the prevalence of non-compete clauses in employment contracts and to support the proposed rulemaking to limit or even outlaw their use. I believe that non-compete clauses are antithetical to the fundamental principles of freedom and opportunity that America values so highly. Non-compete clauses can have a detrimental impact on employees, stifling their ability to seek better opportunities and build their careers. In many instances, employees may find themselves in a form of indentured servitude, as they are restricted from working for other companies within their field of expertise for extended periods after leaving their current employer. This not only hinders personal growth and economic mobility for the individual but also stifles healthy competition and innovation within industries."
Lisa	"Thank you for this proposed legislation. As a member of the workforce that is directly affected by non-compete clauses, I feel strongly that they should be abolished. Employers should be driven to create a workplace, including compensation, that entices an employee to stay with the organization because of reasons other than a non-compete. Please consider passing this legislation."
Louis	"I strongly support the banning of non-compete clauses implemented by employers. I spent a decade working in a niche industry . I signed a non-compete after I joined a company and was told that it was a condition of my continued employment. After extracting as much operational knowledge as they could, the company forced me out and threatened me with legal action if I took a job with one of their competitors. Non-compete agreements are grossly one-sided in favor of the employer. Eliminating non-compete agreements would be a great step towards an even playing field. NDA's and non-solicitation agreements are reasonable measures to prevent workers from harming companies. Non-competes only harm workers."

Brad	"A non compete often causes damage to that particular profession by forcing people to continue working for an entity or move out of the area to seek employment. Please remove and ban no compete language from all contracts."
Tom	"Non-compete clauses are an abuse that employers force upon employees and they should be eliminated."
David	"Non-competes in the healthcare sector only hurt patients. Hospitals are opposed to it purely for power reasons. Not allowing a patient to see their chosen physician because of a prior non-compete clause is anti-American. I hope you decide to break this rule and help all Americans."
Jennifer	"I strongly support this proposed rule. A 10-mile radius is in most our the clauses in my area. This leaves downtown Houston or Galveston as main options. These are too far to drive & insane traffic problems. I have to stay fairly close to my special needs son's school as I am the only person who can pick him up & tend to needs. I have no family support. My husband has cancer. I cannot leave this area. The medical field is short staffed. People are burnt out & leaving the field. We cannot continue to lose great workers at this rate. We need to be more understanding of people's individual needs (I.e. finances, health insurance issues, mental health, illnesses, chronic medical conditions). Workers in the medical field care for our nation. We need to take care of them also."
Usman	"Non compete is an unfair practice for employees. removing people from their locations desired due to a job change does not make sense
Juan	"I am an Insurance agent and in the insurance industry the non-compete agreement is the law of the land. So, you are trapped in a job where if you don't sell enough you get fired, but at the same time you can't get a job with a company that do similar type of business for a full year. ALSO and this very IMPORTANT , companies change compensation commission plans every year, and of course is not to pay you more but less. The non - compete agreement allows them to pay you less every year for the same amount of production and you can't leave to another company that pays more. GET RID of the non-compete agreements please."
Guadalupe	"Non Compete agreements would require me to fmd employment in my chosen profession 100 miles away or refrain from working in an industry I have develop over a 30 year period. At 52 years old I could not imagine starting over in a different industry for a year. I was told when I was hired, and told that the offer was dependent on the non-compete agreement, and then latter when it was changed, a few years later that I had no choice but to sign the revision. I could probably hire a lawyer if I quit but that would be very expensive. It absolutely effects my ability to better my self or entertain better employment offer."
Jessian	"The greatest abuse with non-compete clauses is by hospitals which deem themselves "non-profit" according to the language included here, they would be exempt and continue these abusive practices. Hospitals lock their physicians in these insane broad non-competes requiring up to 1-2 years of salary in fees if the physician violates these. The clauses often make a physician choose between living in an area with family vs moving remotely to survive. Patients should have the right to choose who they want their care from regardless of who employs the physician. These "non-profit" hospitals which feed their profits into their administration to remain non-profit are afraid good physicians will "steal patients" as they move."

Nadeem	"Non compete clauses for physicians do not serve any significant purpose for society and only aim to trap physicians in their jobs, they usually produce an undue burden on physicians who have to uproot their families just because their contract ended or they decide to change jobs. Non competes harm healthy competition, There is not a single physician I spoke with who supports non compete clauses. We support the FTC in banning them."
Laxman	"Non compete clause should have never existed it is banning hard working people enriching rich."
Michelle	"The non-compete clause rule limits Americans access to be able to support their families in this country."
Jan	"I and my husband are in total support of eliminating the non-compete clause rule. We applaud the FTC for pursuing the rule change!"
Purujit	"To the FTC, Please implement this rule and abolish the unethical, exploitative, oppressive and un- American practice of non compete clauses. The workers of this country will be eternally grateful."
James	"is with great enthusiasm that I would like to comment on your proposed rule banning employment non-compete clauses. Since 2015, I have been subject to an non-compete clause limiting my ability to be employed outside of my current company (Pediatrix) within 20 miles for a period of 2 years if I decide to leave my position. This has significantly limited my ability to seek other opportunities and has suppressed my compensation to below- market levels for years. Throughout my employment, I have never been privy to "trade secrets" or other so-called knowledge/resources that would harm my employer if I left. In short, the non-compete clause is an iron shackle I greatly look forward to the FTC abolishing this unfair employment clause. I suspect any person who defends the non-compete is either not subject to one. Thank you for sticking up for the "little man/woman"
Helene	"I would like for the non compete clause to end. It's onerous for citizens and it overly protects businesses."
Christie	"As a psychiatry resident physician who will be joining the physician workforce in 2.5 years, I am extremely in favor of this rule. Non-compete clauses are frequent and incredibly frustrating in physician job contracts, and can often go to the extent of making it impossible for a physician to stay in the same geographic location or even city when they are contemplating a change. While some contracts may give the option to pay a fee to waive the noncompete, this fee is again onerous and a burden on physicians. Banning noncompetes would be a dream come true!
Sara	"Excellent proposed action. No group should be excluded from this change! Please ensure the change is truly universal."
James	"I'm an attorney . I've seen non-competes both in my work and in my personal life. Aside from edge cases where highly- compensated executives are restricted from job-hopping to competitors and using deep knowledge of corporate business strategy to gain an advantage, they exist to restrict wages and tie workers to jobs, not to protect confidential information. It's grossly unjust that workers paid a barely living wage can't go out and find other work because they have to sign a non-compete as a condition of basic employment. I thought we were done with serfdom."

Tim	"I am writing to support the Proposed Rule limiting employers' abilities to engage in non-compete clauses. I believe it will benefit healthcare workers and others to have the freedom to pursue employment of their choosing, and that their wellbeing will translate into the wellbeing of patients and others benefiting from the workers labor."
Fernando	"This has been remarked by many physicians on this website already- but as a resident doctor with a long career ahead, I cannot think of a greater disincentive for the talented to enter our field and serving our aging population than following the American Hospital Association's advice and allowing non-compete clauses for physicians. Liberate our labor just as you liberate everybody else's, and if our contracts are actually fair and desirable there should be no problems from the perspective of hospital administrators. If in fact they are not, you will be writing a wrong on behalf of me and my colleagues. Thank you for your consideration."
Leonardo	"It is essential to include physicians and non profit hospitals in the final rule."
Alex	"I was interviewed, but not considered for a position at a competitor due to my non-compete clause from my former employer. The hiring manager wanted me to join the team, it could not get past the legal implications of the non-compete. This position is not in the same department as my old position (old position was a subject matter expert job, new job would have been in business development). I was not considered because my former employer sued this competitor when an individual moved to their company, where the individual could not work for 6 months."
Karen	"Working as Nurse Practitioner in state where contract is required Texas This is a huge lift to the nurse practitioner industry!! Thank you for supporting our effort balance health care among providers!!"
Kristin	"My employer is trying to implement a non compete clause for me, which as an anesthesiologist who doesn't follow patients but only sees those referred by surgeons, doesn't make any sense." Why should my job prospects be limited by a forced non compete clause?
Zenus	"The proposed FTC rule to ban noncompete clauses in employment contracts has sparked debate in the healthcare industry where noncompetes are common. Physicians argue that noncompetes are bad for physicians and patients alike, as they discourage market forces and limit physician mobility, ultimately contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians are often forced to uproot themselves and their families if they want to switch jobs, which can hold them hostage to unfavorable working conditions for years. Noncompetes can also prevent physicians from pursuing opportunities that would be a better fit for them personally, contributing to burnout and ultimately exacerbating the physician shortage. While there are nuances to this discussion, noncompetes should be eliminated for both not-for-profit and for-profit healthcare systems to maintain access to quality care.”

Katye	“I support your proposal to ban Non-Compete Clauses. It's simply not fair to hinder career advancement while binding employees to an employer who often takes advantage of them because they know the employee will struggle sitting out an NPRM.”
Katherine	“Yes, I support banning non-compete clauses. They are common in my industry (veterinary medicine) and are mainly used for vindictive actions towards employees trying to get a new job. They have no positive function in our industry other than to intimidate people from moving companies which prevents personal and professional growth. FTC, thank you for taking action on this!”
Maria	“I am in the Aesthetics field , and I 'ye been forced to signed the non compete in order to get a job . It felt horrible , I can not get now two jobs, hands tight to make more money . Thank you gov for die new law that is holding us down . This is a country of freedom.”
Anderson	“Non-competes limit the competitive nature of business; they do not add value to the market and limit freedom to pursue your own best interests. The idea that because a worker has become experienced through their own work makes them valuable to another company is reasonable, refusing to pay them the market rate by means of a non-compete contract is absurd.”
Hunter	“Non-compete contracts for rank and file workers are unconscionable. After viewing the New York Times opinion video on the experience of hairstylists, dental technicians, and car part salesmen being unable to get jobs near their homes, I am sickened. Please help American workers keep food on the table by ending these non-compete contracts.”
Travis	“My employer Quantlab Financial for 10+ years has held me to a 2 year non-paid non-compete in Texas. The finn trades in financial markets around the world and uses legal handcuffs, the courts, and their money to suppress employee options / paid. Recently it's been revised, but my only option was to sign the new version or unemployment. If you don't void all non-competes outright, please consider leveling the field by requiring payment of on total compensation for the time not just base pay.”
Peter	“Non compete clauses are Un - American . I support banning the.”
Joey	“I agree with this proposal and believe that non-compete ageements should be made illegal. It's ridiculous that these agreements were ever allowed in die first place. In order to have a free market economy you must have a free moving labor force. Any unusual exceptions could easily be fixed with a non- disclosure agreement. In the case of expensive training some agreement could be made to continue to work for the company that invested in your training for about a year or so. Just long enough so that the cost of the training is covered and not wasted.”
William	“Ban non-compete clauses! They unfairly disadvantage people seeking new job opportunities and potential employees don't feel they have the ability to opt-out of them. People have a right to choose their place of work and shouldn't be punished by their former employer's ego and greed for seeking employment elsewhere.”

Harith	“As physician in the medical field, having a noncompete within hospital system create extreme challenges to provide patient care, and continue to affect the life of patients and doctors. in my situation I family of two doctors it's particularly challenging. The noncompete significantly affect our chances of having jobs and providing care for the patient if one us lost his/her job. Those noncompete prevent us from looking for a job and continue the care to our patients in the same geographical area which will add significant delay of care and unsatisfaction. The patients will have to look for new physicians. Certain noncompete will even prevent you from practicing medicine with in the same city. I think it's wrong, morally incorrect, and unfair for both of the physicians and patients.”
Eric	“I am an anesthesiologist and have had my career disrupted by a non-compete clause forced on me by a large, national group. The inability for me to easily provide patient care at locations of both my and patients' choosing only hurts the American healthcare system. I implore the FTC to ban non-competes throughout the country so that doctors and other healthcare providers can treat patients to the best of their abilities.”
Rachael	“I am writing to urge you to consider supporting the ban of non-compete and non-solicit agreements in die United States. These agreements have become increasingly common in many industries, particularly in the tech and service sectors. Unfortunately, they have had the unintended consequence of limiting worker mobility, suppressing wage growth, and hindering innovation.. These agreements have had a negative impact on worker mobility, wage growth, and innovation, and have become overly broad and commonplace. Banning them would help to promote a more competitive and innovative economy that works for everyone.”
Abby	“As a physician, I believe we should NOT have a non-compete as there is a shortage Nationally and it is going to get worse.”
Irfan	“Physicians should not be bound by non compete clause.”
Maria	“I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements.”
Farzin	“As a physician, doing away with non-compete agreements, would mean that I can continue to care for my panel of patients if I have to move jobs. This would most of all, benefit the patients that I know best. They wouldn't have re-establish care, which is costly, but can also mean large gaps in care for them.”
Gabriel	“I read this proposal carefully. I never thought about it before in this way. I completely agree with the FTC that noncompetes stunt progress in various industries. I agree that a noncompete clause forces an individual and his family to be locked to a single organization for geographical reasons even when the individual may want to explore another opportunity in the same region. If someone works for company X in NYC and has a noncompete, they may not be able to work for company Y in the same city. Even if after 5 years the employee feels it is time to move on, they may not be able to because their family, their kids have already set up roots in NYC. It seems unconstitutional to force someone to be in one company even when they have serious concerns with their company's performance or their practices>”

Kristin	"Please get rid of non-competes. It only damages patients ability to stay with their physicians. They typically require physicians to move out of their continuity if they decide to changes jobs. It will also motivate corporate run health corporations to treat their physicians better."
Marian	"Physicians are the only healthcare employees subjected to non-compete clauses and should be exempt from this imprisonment. Other healthcare staff receive high levels of pay and are free to work at more than institution and change jobs at will. Nurses, respiratory therapists, pharmacists and administrators have more freedom. Physicians are forced to remain in toxic work environments, forego opportunities for advancement and/or lose significant research opportunities due to these clauses. Because most organizations now operate out of multiple locations the radius causes a physician to pay large amounts of money to relocate and disrupts families. Wellness and resilience are compromised and physicians leave the profession due to these restrictions. Physician extenders, like nurse practitioners and physician assistants have more freedom than highly trained specialists. Also, many hospital organizations are classified as "non-profit" even though the leadership is paid millions of dollars. Physicians at so called non-profit organizations should have the same opportunities to easily change positions as others."
Daniel	"I am a doctor and I am very much in favor of this rule change. I would however ask that non-profit hospitals be included in this rule change as the ubiquity of non-competes for doctors, many of whom are employed by non-profit hospitals, is a significant detriment to my profession."
Danielle	Please ban all non compete clauses from private, public and non profit hospitals and medical practices. It limits the proliferation of research due to lack of competition as well as prevents movements of the best and the brightest to where they are offered the best. It is completely unfair tactics that only benefits the hospital administrators.
Mary	"Providers have been held hostage to hospital systems with limited means for negotiation for fair salary and work life balance by non competes. For example. I have seen no cost of living increase even with yearly contract renewal. In fact, benefits have decreased despite record inflation. Non competes force physicians who are trying to advocate for healthy work life balance and pay commensurate with training and student loan burden, to uproot lives and patients lives by requiring them to move beyond non compete region. This leaves patients to try to get in and establish with a new provider and possibly in a different system. Burnout is a huge factor for physicians and is also no doubt factors with non competes. I also have colleagues who have been unable to relocate and have left clinical practice secondary to non competes. This is an antiquated practice and does a disservice to physicians well-being, ability to continue to practice clinically as well as the patients we serve." subodh	"I am a physician who practices in a city which has majority private equity backed practices. Only 10% of all treatment are done by private doctors. I have seen higher rate of price increase in last 5 years due to this consolidation. Patient care is affected as private equity is focusing on revenues generated than health care outcomes. The low revenue good doctors are let go. The non competes prevents many going to open their own practice which will cut cost down. The non competes are not enforceable ie 100 miles but do not have the financial depth to spend hundreds of dollars then go to arbitration and risk of unknown outcome.”

Feibi	“I support a federal ban on non-compete clauses in employment contracts. I am a physician in the Texas Medical Center, a dense area which contains over a dozen hospitals. Most of the hospitals here have a non-compete clause with a radius of 10-15 miles which effectively prevents a physician from working for any other hospital system in Houston. This is grossly unfair and prevents physicians from leaving undesirable hospitals with poor working conditions or poor management. This leads to increased burnout. Twenty percent of physicians plan to drop out of the workforce in the next two years. This problem has only been accelerated understaffing of our fellow healthcare workers. Working conditions for all healthcare workers need to improve Banning non-competes would pressure hospitals to improve working conditions to retain staff.”
Vamsi	“I am a physician , specifically a surgical resident, about to finish and start my cardiac surgery fellowship. I understand that non-competes have been used by some small practices to preserve market share in rural areas. However, their overall function in medicine is to simply raise prices for patients by preventing competition from physicians who know the market, by keeping rival hospitals from hiring them and preventing them from working in the area. Furthermore, on a personal level, many physicians are devastated as their families may be based in one area, but they are forced to travel hundreds of miles to work due to a non-compete. However, this regulation will be ineffective if it only targets for-profit entities. I urge the government to NOT EXEMPT non-profits or ANY entities whatsoever in medicine from enforcing non-competes against any healthcare worker.”
Sreedhar	“I whole heartedly support the ban on non compete clauses in health care. They are terrible for die patients and for the care providers and cause totally unnecessary burden to the system.”
Andrew	“I am a physician working in the United States, and I strongly support the FTC proposed rule on non-compete clause. Non-compete clauses are harmful to physicians, and I have personally been harmed. About 10 year ago, I specifically had to seek out physician jobs without non-compete clauses because my spouse was in the last year of graduate school, and we were planning to move to the suburbs after graduation. Specifically, non-compete clauses have wide geographic coverage and would prevent me from changing jobs to an employer/hospital in the suburb we planned to live. Therefore, I had to choose a job without a non-compete. This job without a non-compete had an annual salary $75,000 less than a comparable job that did have a non-compete clause. By limiting non-compete clauses, physicians will have the opportunity to seek out more employment opportunities. Greater physician mobility is also critical to address public health priorities, such as improving physicians' ability to change to employers in underserved areas.”
Brian	“A broad non-compete clause functions in the same way a monopoly does. It's limits options and forces adherence which undermines a free market.

	Employers have protections in the area of intellectual property and in work products, which are fair and reasonable. Artificial limitations that decrease competition are bad for employees, damaging to consumers, and harm the economy at large."
Iade	"non competes hurt patients in die end because predatory bospital and clinic systems can continue unsafe practices and abusive working conditions for physicians by holding die threat of non-competes over the physicians who might be tied to die geographic location due to family responsibilities."
Liz	"Non competes are should not exist. They create an employment monopoly to the detriment of the public goods. It's a moden form of the fiefdom that's intrinsically anti-American. Workers are prevented from leaving for better opportunities."
Andrew	"I adamantly support the proposed rule. I believe, if enforced, the rule change will redistribute wealth to the middle and lower classes in a time of rampant wealth inequality and racial inequity. Furthermore, the requirement of employers to inform employees of the proposed mle change is particularly appealing to me due to the persistence of predatory workplace practices in which employers in localities that have banned non-competes require their employees to sign them despite not having the legal standing to enforce them. When the leading cause of death for certain demographics in this nation is heart failure due to cortisol, the stress hormone, blocking arteries, this should be criminal."
James	"I support this bill. I currently cannot work in my field as I let a toxic work place but had a non compete that must be signed before starting work in Texas."
Carlos	As a son of immigrant parents, the United States of America was seen as a land of opportunity. A place where one's hard work, self determination, and studious endeavors enabled them to be the most prosperous in their field of study or employment. For this reason, I believe non compete clauses are a scour of the Earth and a drain on competitive nature and pro capitalistic mentality of the United States."
Sandra	"This is ridiculous. How do they expect citizens to make a living in life ?"
Kayla	"I support an end to non-compete clauses. As a physician these restrict my ability to practice a hard earned trade near my home and family without significant burden either financially or geographically. Physicians and other workers have earned die right to practice in good conditions with adequate pay and support without fear of legal action for pursuing other opportunities."
Daniel	"This is a necessary step to prevent employer abuse of employees and may go some way in breaking up tech monopolies."
Blake	"As an employee for a tech company, these non-compete clauses harm my chances to work elsewhere in my industry. They also stifle competition. We can support intellectual property without hurting people who want to innovate on new products and technologies in the United States. We can and should end non- competes."
s	"Restricts competition. Bad for consumers."
Kira	"Note non-competes are being slipped in and signed as `NDA's' in many business settings. The elimination of non-competes almost without exception

	would benefit those most vulnerable to exploitation. Parents with children in local schools/community support are uprooted unnecessarily due to employers unfair entitlement to personal skills obtained during the employment period. By allowing them freedom of movement to pursue higher wages and advancement in their careers without undue stress of alternative employment and lack of application of acquired skills for up to two years post employment (as upheld in Texas); or dramatic changes in geography required by the geographical limitations imposed which inordinately effect those with children or limited financial savings who have to weigh the personal and financial strains of moving outside and/or significantly increasing travel time. Individuals (mostly women) are constrained by child care responsibilities or resulting additional care costs resulting from changes in geography / increased travel requirements. Advanced/sought after skill sets/knowledge are unfairly controlled by business owners who are able to excessively limit competition and financial advancement in individual careers via non-competes. This has personally affected my life as a mother holding an advanced doctorate degree; a primary caregiver to young children and the need to refuse employment and access to increased career skill acquisitions due to legally enforceable non competes that would require my travel time to increase 45+ minutes each way (311a day) to utilize personal skills acquired during employment for a tenn of 2 years post employment.”
Hannah	“Noncompetes are archaic and harmful in many ways. By restricting the ability to work, employees are forced to stay in jobs that they are unhappy with and work at a lower production level. It inhibits employees from finding better offers. In healthcare, it limits the amounts of providers thus can work in certain areas and raises the cost of healthcare. Noncompete agreements should be abolished.”
Anonymous	“I support banning non-complete clauses, especially in healthcare, where an ever increasing number of physicians, nurse practitioners and other providers are employed. The healthcare corporations continue to consolidate and enlarged, profiting handsomely from employed physicians and practitioners. There is almost no bargaining power on the part of the physician or practitioner once they are employed. Corporations are able to cut corners to save money in terms of manpower mostly, while the doctors and nurses are daily making sacrifices to make sure patients needs are met. The relationship has become almost universally unhealthy and asymmetrical, which is why so many people are getting out of healthcare. The only bargaining chip is to leave the healthcare system, but the systems don't care because they see employed physicians, practitioners and nurses as human capital, which can be replaced. Meanwhile, there is a great burden on the physician or practitioner and their families if leaving employment means also leaving the community.”
Paul	“This enforcement should also mean that as unstable as the economy has been at every level, no company should bar you from working a second job to help make ends meet.”
Bilal	“I support of this proposal to ban companies from monopolizing the economy by enforcing these ridiculous non-compete clause rules. I also support the ban of Training-repayment agreements, it's the responsibility of an employer to train their employees, and it's the right of employees to quit their jobs for whatever reason.”

Stuart	“Love it. I completely support.”
KW	“Please see attached comment supporting the ban of non-compete agreements and a case study regarding the impact of Private Equity in the healthcare setting.”
Sandi	“As a former practicing attorney in Texas, I have been concerned about the misuse of non-compete agreements for years and fully support the Commission's proposed rule banning their use. My experience in both private practice and as in-house counsel has allowed me to see the evolution of these agreements go from a valuable and fair tool for business owners to a bludgeon to hold down even low-level employees. I have seen them go from one-off agreements for unique transactions to standard practice for hiring employees. They were once crafted by corporate lawyers in connection with a specific transaction and directed at very senior personnel who typically had a large payout or some contractual job security. Today, they appear to have devolved into a document crafted primarily by litigation attorneys for new hires with little to no bargaining power, no contractual job security, and scant, if any, truly competitive information...In my prior practice as a lawyer, I represented different types of businesses and ultimately became the Assistant General Counsel for a large corporation. As such, I saw legitimate circumstances for reasonable non-compete agreements, but not many. Most of what an employer wants to achieve could probably be satisfied with a targeted non-disclosure agreement rather than these paralyzing non-compete agreements. Accordingly, I wholeheartedly support the Commission's proposed rule.”
Fausto	“The honest aims of non-compete agreements are best carried out using other tools, such as trade secrets and patents. We don't need to limit the free movement of labor to protect capital investments in technology. Rather, we should eliminate non-compete agreements across the board while also clarifying trade secret and patent protection laws.”
Felicia	“This issue is tremendously important. Please ban non competes. - Physician in TX
Javier	“Non-compete contracts are antithetical to capitalism. They have no room in a market that prides itself on competition. Why should one company with poor customer service prevent the flourishing of new ideas and better service in the market due to a non-compete clause? Our market should reward not just innovators of new ideas but people who can improve existing products and services. Companies that are allowed to stifle competition with non-compete clauses are encouraged to provide mediocre services. Our country and economy deserve better!”
Sasha	“Please pass. Very important for protecting workers and allowing us to seek fair working conditions.”
Lisa	“I support the FTC's BAN on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. The FTC estimates that banning non-compete contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million.” “Americans and raise wages by 5300 billion per year. That makes a real difference to real people on a daily basis. This policy will make it easier for more American workers to earn what they're worth!"

Sasha	" Physicians should not be specifically excluded from this."
Lindsey	"I strongly support an initiative to ban non-compete clauses. In medicine, they are often used in physicians' contracts and continue in perpetuity. Not only does this decrease competition amongst hospital, it encourages bad behavior on the part of the employer knowing how difficult it is for the employee to leave. Additionally, it is hating some physicians that cannot move to stop practicing medicine altogether. This is obviously a huge concern with a growing shortage of providers. Thank you for proposing this important change."
Eric	"Noncompetes are the modern equivalent of indentured servitude. They restrict the ability of individuals to work in their chosen field and earn a living. Just like slavery, noncompetes restrict the freedom of individuals to make choices about their own lives and careers. This is particularly harmful for workers in low-wage jobs, who may have few options for alternative employment and may be forced to accept poor working conditions or low pay...Furthermore, noncompetes can also be used to discriminate against certain groups of workers. For example, employers may use noncompetes to prevent women or people of color from leaving their company and finding better opportunities elsewhere."
Eric	"I'm a physician at a not-for-profit. I have a non-compete. In the age of physician shortages, it is critical that this practice is curtailed. The law needs special wording to make sure that healthcare workers are specifically exempt from noncompetes."
Damla	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. As a physician , I have seen this limit my colleagues' ability to leave an abusive work environment. We should all be able to pursue individual opportunities and not be beholden indefinitely to oppressive more powerful employers. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Glen	"I strongly support the FTC's proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule to ban employers from requiring their employees to sign "noncompete agreements." In reality, these documents are not negotiated, voluntary "agreements," but contracts of adhesion prospective workers are forced to sign as a condition of gaining employment, or avoiding termination of their existing employment. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, suppressing wages, and preventing career advancement. Employers can adequately prevent unauthorized disclosure of trade secrets with non-disclosure agreements (NDAs). Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."

Atharva	“As a physician (TX, T3309), I fully support the proposed ban on noncompete clauses. Furthermore, this rule absolutely must apply to physicians. Noncompetes are anticompetitive and pennit abuse of employees and the spirit of the medical profession itself in favor of profits for the few megacorporations that can afford to wade through the goliath heaps of regulation in any healthcare market. Ultimately this is solely at the expense of patients and their care.”
Sherrie	“Completely support a ban on all types of non-compete clauses. They negatively impact our patients and clients by playing a role in the shortage veterinarians available to see patients. After working for two multinational corporations I can say without reservation diem are no unique business practices to protect, they all run in the same, spectacularly inefficient way. I was even more shocked to find some of my friends who work in jobs paying less than $20/hr are also subject to non-competes. That's ridiculously unfair to them and their ability to earn a living. Thank you for allowing this comment.”
Daniel	“Noncompetes within the emergency services restoration industry is staggering innovation, limiting the potential wage increase, prevents unionization and further decreases the talent pool.”
Dru	“I am a tenured law professor at South Texas College of Law Houston. I teach courses on Administrative Law and regulatory subjects. I have published more than three dozen law review articles and have authored chapters in academic monographs. I SUPPORT the FTC's proposed rule. The federal statutes that give the FTC authority to regulate anticompetitive monopoly-seeking activities also authorize the FTC to promulgate regulations to combat labor monopsony power from making labor markets less competitive. Noncompete agreements are an exercise of employer monopsony power, and also increase that monopsony power. Employer monopsony power can also increase monopoly power in consumer markets. It is long overdue for the FTC to address this, and it is more fair to address it through a uniform rule than to do so piecemeal through adjudications.
Stephen	“It is not a level playing field for this rule to be based on the state that I live in when I have been a remote worker for a company that was based in CA and is now in NC. This rule does not promote competition between companies and works by instilling fear - "you clan be sued personally if you violate this rule". It is time for this anti competitive practice to go away.”
Adam	“Large hospital systems and "not for profit" hospitals (where they pay the CEOs 10M+ in compensation a year) should not be excluded from banning non- competes related to physicians in healthcare. Non-competes are used to strong arm physicians often requiring moving to change jobs no matter the circumstances to continue a career in your specialty. Do not exclude healthcare, hospitals, and physicians in this legal change.”
Linda	“Noncompete clauses should be outlawed for all employees. It limits a person's right to earn a living. All Americans have a right to choose where they work. Noncompete clauses hinder that.”
Kevin	“I'm an ER physician. Non-compete clauses have recently been used to allow a hospital to end my IC relationship with them. Myself and two other physician's were effectively fired because the hospital sold the ER physician staffing

	contract to a competing company. The two staffing companies had current and previous issues of business maneuvering and lawsuits. Hence, the old staffing company had a non-compete clause. The new company refused to pay the clause out any of us three MD's. The hospital also refused citing very tight budget. Hence, we were let go. The insane thing is that these non-compete clauses didn't appear in any of our own contracts with the original staffing company. It was in the contract between the hospital and the original staffer's. Hence, the MD's were fired and the emergency room lost three doctors due to a clause NO ONE signed. I won't go into the legal aspects and exceptionally poor business practices here, but, obviously the clause of non-competition has effected thousands of patients and the regional medical doctor environment. Non-compete clauses are a scourge upon both free market business and a danger to the public. A business being able to affect a physician's ability to see patients is absolutely unethical at the very least. Evil at the most. Government, in its entirety, should only function to protect the population from any threat, domestic or not. This is exactly why the non-compete clause should be BANNED in the US! GET IT DONE!"
Grant	"My wife is a veterinarian, and she is subject to a non-compete clause in her contract. In her case, the sole purpose of the clause is to suppress competition, as the restriction is that she cannot work at a practice that is closer to her current practice than a certain distance. This rule does not protect intellectual property, it simply prevents my wife from moving across the street and having the new practice put up a sign saying that Dr. Goodyear is now there. Non-compete clauses such as this invariably depress wages and limit competition, and that is not a good thing I'm a nuclear physicist, and I work for an Oil and Gas company designing and developing tools that help companies take measurements deep underground that tell them where oil and gas are located. I also have a non-compete clause in my current contract that limits location (essentially anywhere in the world where oil-and-gas exploration is performed) for 1 year after leaving the company. In my case, the clause supposedly exists to protect the company's IP, but there are other mechanisms for doing that. Moreover, Oil and Gas is an industry where downturns and layoffs are extremely common, and nowhere in my non-compete clause does it suggest that the non-compete fails to operate if I am a victim of a reduction in force. (My current company will tell you that they have never enforced a non-compete against an employee who was laid off, but nothing in my contract says that.) Companies in this industry do work within the non-compete clauses, complete with hiring into areas that do not overlap overmuch with the previous employment until the time limit on the non-compete has elapsed, but this certainly depresses competition and wages. We are in favor of a ban on non-compete clauses."
Daniel	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I support the ban on non-compete clause."
Douglas	"Non compete agreements restrict competition and significantly impair innovation Economic impacts to individuals and society is net negative by huge margin."
Eric	"In the medical field, there are multiple non competition agreements which are completely unfair and prevent a physician from practicing their trade if they leave a group or a hospital system. It can significantly affect a physician's ability to make a livelihood. This should be eliminated immediately. Most physicians come to employment with all the skills from their training necessary to practice medicine and the group or Employer contributes nothing to the practice of medicine that the physician didn't already have. Please make these non competition agreements illegal immediately."

Drew	" Physicians often enter regional markets dominated by only one or two health systems, and noncompete clauses are rampant. Should an employed physician see a deterioration in leadership, contracting or reimbursement, they are left with no option but to pull up stakes and relocate, starting their practice all over from scratch. This is a preposterous imbalance of power. No worker should feel compelled to uproot and move their family out of a settled geographic region and discard years of personal relationships and trust just because a work environment becomes unfavorable over time, when other options exist. Abolishing noncompete clauses will free doctors to stand their ground, maintain their preferred place to live, and seek the best possible work environment and reimbursement for the work they do."
Kedar	"Hospitals and other corporate entities that increasingly employ physicians, like insurance companies, too often trap physicians and their patients by coercing doctors to sign anti-competitive non-compete clauses. In short, these harmful contract terms prohibit medical professionals from leaving an employer without giving up their ability to continue practicing medicine, for a competing hospital or even as an independent clinician. Nearly half of physicians are bound by a non-compete clause. This means that even when physicians feel the hospital, insurance company, or corporation that employs them hampers their ability to treat patients to the best of their ability, or endangers patient safety, they are essentially coerced to stay and keep quiet, or give up their patients and the practice of medicine in their community."
Jill	"I have been forced to sign noncompete contracts for employment as a physician . It allows employers to not treat us always fair as relocating is hard on families and they know this. Please ban it."
Daniel	"As a primary care physician of over 15 years I have seen the damage that non-compete contract clauses have done to our profession and more importantly to our patients. They lead to reduced patient access and exacerbates physician shortage in medically underserved areas. I personally know physicians who had to leave these areas and their patient panels behind. The patients can wait months for a new physician to move in to the area or the patient has to travel vast distances to seek care. Non-competes hurt competition, patients, and individual physicians and other workers. Please vote to end them."
H	"I am in support of banning "non-compete / Solicit" clause. This type of clauses are unfair for employee whose knowledge asset is created in specialized field after years of hard work, dedication and loyalty with current employer. And when the time comes for the seasoned employee to get benefitted from his hard work and move on there are some companies who try to stop and negotiate a deal showing this clause in the form of small paragraph somewhere in employment agreement signed in extreme hurry during the joining process."

Ivvanee	"I am an Ob/Gyn physician that was restricted from leaving a private practice that did not share the same clinical practice philosophy with me. Our styles of managing patients was quite different. Having a restrictive noncompete clause made it difficult for me to leave this practice where I was not thriving. I was unhappy everyday I went to work. It made me question the immense investment I made in time, effort, financial expense and in delaying life's stages (like starting a family) in order to complete the clinical training required to be a board certified physician. The conflict in management styles, although both within the standard of care, led to moral distress in relation to my patients who could sense the tumult. In order to work elsewhere, I had to uproot my family to move to a different town, loose my clinical network, sever the close relationships I nurtured with my patients and take a large financial loss all to establish a new practice. All of this just to be able to work. To be able to care for my patients in the best way they deserve and provide for my family. Now I am in academic practice at an institution that does not require noncompete clause as part of my employment contract. As a result, I feel reassured that I will never be trapped again in a dysfunctional relationship that benefits no one at a detriment to many. I am thrilled to hear that on January 5, 2023, the FTC proposed a new rule that would ban employers from imposing non-compete clauses as they appear to violate section 5 of the FTC Act, which covers unfair employer practices."
Alfred	"We should ban such draconian clauses. This is USA and not a communist country. People should have freedom where they want to work and live."
Joshua	"Good afternoon, I am writing in support the proposed non-compete clause rule for ALL workers, including physicians. The same considerations for non-compete clauses should be taken into consideration for the betterment of all workers in the US and pursuing a doctoral degree should not exclude a person from receiving fair treatment in the labor market at the hand of corporate medicine. Hospitals already exploit resident physicians by paying those doctors less than custodial staff, and in some cases less than minimum wage. Physicians are already unfairly treated in regards to other professions by the effective monopoly that is the NRiMP, and hospitals are happy to further this exploitation by mandating non-compete clauses. Physicians are arguably the workers that are in the most need for federal protection with this type of rule. Please do not let the loud voices and deep pockets of corporate medicine over shadow the need for worker protections in the medical field, and do not add an exception for a group of professionals that has absolutely zero bargaining power."
elizabeth	"As a legal recruiter for the past 25 years, I am so happy to see this. I was fired from a 4 billion company in 2002 while being #1 in sales in that company and was told by my manager that I would not be sued. They waited until I was 6 months up and running with a lease, employees and more before filing the suit which effectively destroyed my business. I was doing well and believe I would have really had something wonderful had they not sued me. Non competes keep employees in jobs that they are not happy/comfortable in because of the threat of a lawsuit. Not cool."

Satyanarayana	"Non compete clause is bad , it should be banned. I am waiting for President to act stat."
Megan	"Yes, I am in favor of the non-compete being removed. I am a physician and when working for larger institutions, we have significant non-competes that can force you to move cities due to the distance issued in contracts. I fully support getting rid of non-competes to allow physicians and those in medicine to continue to serve a community/city if they choose to move employers."
Sairah	"Non competes are unnecessary and should be illegal. In medicine they decrease availability for communities to access Healthcare solely for financial benefits to institutions."
Nadia	"Noncompetes in medical centers where all of the academic jobs are clustered essentially force physicians to leave the city if they leave the institution. Institute a non-compete instead of treating your workers better so they don't WANT to leave is immoral."
Linda	"Non-competes only favor businesses and to keep physician salary low and not let them vote with their feet when these businesses under-value them. In addition, it flies in the face of patient access when already there is a dearth of physicians in specific regions for the community. Leaving that job means patients may be left without that specialist especially in rural areas. Non-competes do not work for patients, do not work for physicians, and only work to limit and hinder care and increase business interests."
Stacey	"Non compete clauses for my specialty (psychiatry) are a barrier to patients receiving access to care. It is incredibly burdensome to change practice models. And incredibly expensive. But non-competes shackle psychiatrists to broken systems which contribute to burnout, does retiring early, and ultimately contributes to the shortage of psychiatric capacity in the system. Non competes need to end. More corporate medicine needs to evolve their cultural ethics."
K	" Not for profit hospitals should be included in the scope of this regulation. Many physicians and nurses who serve the most vulnerable populations are hampered in negotiating the best rate for their labor due to unfair non-compete clauses which are forced upon them as conditions of their employment. County hospitals, Medical Schools, and Teaching Institutions are not beyond such anti-labor practices."
Manish	"I heartily welcome abolishing non-compete completely. I signed this document in 2012 without knowing the Unplication. I am going through the pain and realize this can devastate a family. Removing this clause will bring completion in the labor market and also provide opportunity to employees in their career growth. I Vote in favor."
Mona	"Non-compete clauses should not be allowed. They allow companies to have too much control over employees and make it so that an employee cannot leave a bad job without relocating their families and lives. With the rise of large hospital systems and corporate medicine with many branches, non- competes could require someone to relocate very far. Medical Offices will tell you it's to prevent poaching of patients but you can prohibit direct solicitation of patients without controlling where someone works."

Lorraine	"This should be illegal. Fundamentally, there is no compensation for keeping someone out of the labor market. If they want to restrict someone from making a living, then the one that wants that needs to pay that individual to stay out of the market. In states where there is employment at will, this is particularly egregious because workers have very little protection from abuse or unfair treatment. No one should be able to keep you from earning a living."
Mona	"Removal of non-compete clauses is essential. Right now many physicians (and other healthcare workers) cannot leave jobs without relocating to different cities, even different states. As hospital chains grow to have many locations, it can be almost impossible to find a work location that meets the non-compete requirement, again without moving large (and growing larger) distances. This means that physicians will sometimes accept poor work conditions which ultimately affects patients because they may not have any ability to leave. These rules need to apply across the board without exception. Non-profit hospital chains should not be exempt. They are also growing into large systems (just look at the Texas market) so would create the same problems for an employee who wants to find new employment
Rohit	"Non compete clause on workers or FTCs is being used to harass employees and make their life very uncomfortable. Employers make huge margins on FTCs and they don't pass any benefits to employees and in addition prohibits employees to change employers by using non compete clause. This is crime in my mind. This non-compete clause should be immediately banned in a democratic and capitalistic country like USA."
Geo	"Physicians are very intelligent, when it comes to things medical, but not when it comes to contracts, and they consistently sign contracts, agreeing to noncompete. When they finally realize they're being treated lower than market value, they are trapped, and their established patient care suffers if they leave the practice. It causes harm. Physicians are generally ignorant when it comes to management, and there is no trade secret they are stealing. Noncompete is simply a way to restrict fair competition."
Jessica	"I 100% agree with Chair Lina Khan. It was my freedom to look for another job November 2022 because I felt I was limited in compensation with my employer. I was offered a better position and more pay with my new employer. When I submitted my resignation with the previous company, the owner set me aside and told me I wasn't allowed to call on any of their clients at all for 20 months. Being in sales, that holds me back from selling a potential $2million sales revenue in relationships that I had gained for the last few years. I hope this Non-complete clause gets ruled out. I live in Houston, Texas and agree 100% with this- "FTC's proposed rule would promote greater dynamism, innovation, and healthy competition."
Dan	"As a Regional Sales Manager, myself and my co-worker worked for a company that was sold to a sister company. They came in and completely changed our structure, how we were paid, and how we earned commissions. Basically told us we were taking a massive pay cut and there was nothing we could do about it and because of our vague non-compete we didn't have many options. I ultimately had an opportunity to leave both the company and direct industry so my non-compete was moot but my co-worker was asked to resign and when he went and worked for a new start up, he was ultimately sued for violating the non-compete. The company tried settling the suit by demanding that not only he quit his current position but to agree to not be in any outside sales role in the entire state of Texas. This needs to happen to protect workers and their ability to provide for their family.”

Josh	“Honestly I think it's time we got rid of no-compete clauses.”
Michelle	“Please do pass this rule. Ban non-competes completely. I have been in a legal battle for over a year because my employer thinks I am competing. I can not even find a job using the skill I know because I signed a non-compete. Non-competes are helping companies taking advantage of the employees. Employees become stuck in a toxic situation that they need to pay their bills, so they stay with the company for lower wages in fear of not being able to provide for their families. These non-compete are given to lower income wage earners as a whipping tool for companies. I am living proof of it.”
Hanan	“Great proposal, 100% support.”
Hope	“I support the ban of non-compete clauses. I work in a highly specialized niche of the healthcare field - Orthotics and Prosthetics . I have been a committed employee to the same office for the first 12 years since graduating school. The office focused on pediatric orthotics which was an interest of mine. Due to the need for specialists I developed the skills needed to be improve my craft and create deep relationships with patients and referral sources. I could have remained a mediocre employee and not excelled but I did not. It was my own work ethic and passion for caring for my patients that drove me to learn more and help them advocate for great care. The company had many changes in leadership over the 12 years that I work there and I weathered them all. I signed the non-compete when I started working there as a resident. I needed a job and had no understanding of the impact that the non-compete would have on me and my career. It is an unfair advantage that big companies have over individual workers who don't have the resources to fight them. How is that large companies able to practice capitalism to the full extent while the workforce is bound and limited from doing the same?”
Christi	“Please follow through with banning non-compete clauses. They are extremely unfair to workers. Professionals work hard to get ahead and a non-compete unfairly sets them back. It is unbelievable that any company can require that an ex-employee cannot work to support themselves as well as contribute to society as a whole.”
Emran	“the FTC needs to pass the rule in 2023 and the sooner and better, we need to improve worker's wage , improve the economy and allowing folks to get better jobs now rather than later.”
Evan	“A non-compete has almost wiped out my savings and kept me unemployed for months. A company who was laying people off weekly and on the hunt for a buyer enforced its Non Compete on the 2 people of color out of the 5 that resigned. There were no trade secrets shared and no solicitation of previous customers, only employment to a competitor. Basically, a company can treat its employees like disposable resources when it comes to mergers, acquisitions and budget cuts, and then claim the employee is too knowledgeable to work for a competitor under the non compete clause. The defense cost me over $6000

	and still resulted in a forced termination. To add insult to injury, the previous company also sued for the money they lost after the resignations. This insinuates that the only reason for decrease in business is due to the fleeing employees and not service issues, pricing or industry gossip like clients knowing they are looking to sell. LLC's and Inc's have more money to fight legally, so it almost always is the "David vs. Goliath" scenario without the biblical help of God. There is also the employee experience in an industry that needs to be considered. If an employee has contacts and connections in an industry for 20 years, that person is more than likely bringing contacts and business to the employer. It is unjust to tell that person they can no longer market their personal contacts because they marketed them at a new employer. Yes, it makes sense if this employee is new and would not have known these contacts without employment to said company. It does not make sense, if the company had no idea about these contacts until delivered by an industry veteran. So it is in the best interest of the company to hire a well-connected employee, have them sign a non-compete, and once the growth starts to diminish, cut their bonuses or employment. They do not have to worry since that employee cannot go to any business that affects them. This brings on another patriotic point. If the only companies hiring when you have been laid off or terminated are competitors, are you now supposed to not provide for your family for 2 years because of a company's greed? Let's be honest here, the only reason employees leave is because of "leadership" or "compensation". If that person is so "valuable", pay them their worth, not sue them to ruin them. If that person, and others have expressed an issue with FIR about leadership, address it so all parties feel heard. A Non-Compete and the Judges that honor them are nothing short of Civil War plantation owners."
M. James	I have been subject to non-compete agreements in two different careers. First as a television journalist when mandatory non-competes prevented my working at other nearby television stations. Second, I am required to sign non-compete agreements in my current career as a hospital-based physician. These non-competes prevent my working at other hospitals, healthcare companies, and certain organizations within specified areas of where I work. In both cases, these agreements are harmful to employees, depress wages, benefit large corporations and companies and hurt American citizens. Currently, the American Hospital Association seeks to exclude physicians from the proposed legislation. I strongly oppose their effort to exclude physicians. As someone who has been subject to these agreements for my entire working life, physicians should absolutely be included in this rule-making despite any efforts from hospital or insurance lobbies to exclude physicians.
Rhiana	"I am an ER physician who has had to move far more than me or my family have wanted to because of non-compete clauses. I have left jobs due to unsafe staffing and inadequate patient care but each time I must weigh doing the right thing by my family vs doing the right thing by my patients. Non-compete clauses serve to strip physicians of their ability to care the patients and the community by forcing them to leave these communities or work in a place that is unsafe. There is nothing proprietary about any of the institutions I've worked at that was threatened by my leaving and working somewhere else. There is nothing special about a Methodist institution vs an HCA vs a county hospital in terms of patient care or policies/procedures. A non-compete is simply used as a method of compliance for physicians and ultimately the patients suffer for it. It is time to end non competes for physicians so we can move to rural and underserved communities without fear of being pushed out of that community by speaking up against hospital abuses of patients. Physicians take an oath to first do no harm, but non competes are harmful to the practice of medicine. Please vote to exclude non competes and allow physicians to fulfill our oaths.”

Sam	“Non-competes often leave employees with two realistic choices: stay at your job, or be unemployed. I am hugely in favor of seeing them leave, and know many people it would impact positively.”
David	“As a physician employed by a large local group, non-compete clauses limit the freedom to leave one group and go to another group in a local area. Some private groups and large hospital systems have such a large regional presence that even in the fourth largest metropolitan area in the country, it would be impossible to seek other employment in that entire region if non-compete clauses were enforced. While the group I am employed with does have a non-compete clause, I know of several incidences where it has not been enforced, therefore they probably should not be included in a contract.”
saul	“I am an employed physician at a non-profit health care system in Houston, TX. I like the spirit of this proposal but I don't think it goes far enough. The a large percentage of us physicians here are employed by non-profit health care systems, and these non-profit systems are growing each year. If we get mistreated or fed up with our employer we are forced to uproot our entire lives and our families or drive long distances to get another job. I would love you to expand this to protect us from these predatory practices of so called Not-for-profit health care systems.”
Julie	“Please ban non competes. It hurts the American worker”
Bo	“I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone. Corporations can't have it both ways. Either the worker is an EMPLOYEE in which case a non-compete clause is a negotiable part of the employment agreement, or the worker is a CONTRACTOR in which case a non-compete clause violates the contractor's right to sell their services to other prospective customers.
I.	“noncompete to me isn't fair stops someone from working in the field that they can feed their family.”
Arpan	I strongly support legislation to remove non-compete clause for physicians . This clause allows corporations and hospitals to push individuals and disallow them the freedom to practice medicine without the pressure to abide by their patient and revenue targets. If individual wants to do any patient care that is good for patients but against financial interests of corporations, they have a sword hanging on their head that they will be fired and due to non-compete they will need to move out of the city. I strongly support to include physicians in this legislation.

Jason	"If the FTC is to make a rule against non-compete clauses, then there shouldn't be any groups excluded. American Hospital Association trying to get physicians or other healthcare provider groups excluded from this proposal would defeat the purpose. No industry employee should have to deal with noncompetes. It's unfair that a change in job may require you to completely relocate your family when a non-compete is in effect."
Rebecca	"Please support the ban on non-compete agreements."
Ann	"Please end the legality of non-compete clause. In Texas, non-competes are not enforceable. However, employers can still sue and force employees into bankruptcy. End this terrible inequity. I had $80,000 in legal fees. I did win, but because in Texas, I was unable to recover costs. I had to file for bankruptcy. If I had not fought, the employer would have been able to take summary judgment against me."
Jamie	" Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations (which I have personally suffered under) as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."
Alwin	"Dear Commissioners, As a physician , I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. Non-compete agreements are contracts that prohibit employees from working for a competitor after leaving their current employer. These clauses are often included in physician contracts, and they have a detrimental impact on the healthcare industry and the patients we serve. Firstly, non-compete clauses restrict healthy competition by limiting physicians' ability to work for other healthcare organizations. This is particularly concerning in areas with few healthcare options, where these clauses effectively create a monopoly, depriving patients of choice and limiting the quality of care they receive. Moreover, these clauses give employers an unfair advantage during contract negotiations. Physicians are often required to sign these clauses as a condition of employment, leaving

	them with little bargaining power. This situation can result in an unbalanced power dynamic between physicians and their employers, which can result in suboptimal employment terms and conditions. Additionally, non-compete clauses can result in mandatory relocation of physician families, which can disrupt the continuity of care for patients. Physicians may be forced to move to a new area for employment, which can mean leaving behind their patients and disrupting their relationships with their healthcare providers. Non-compete clauses also limit patient access to specialty care. Physicians with specialized training and experience are often in high demand, and non-compete clauses limit their ability to provide care to patients in need. This restriction not only limits patient choice but can also result in longer wait times for appointments and suboptimal care. In summary, non-compete clauses have a significant negative impact on the healthcare industry and the patients we serve. By banning these clauses, we can promote healthy competition, empower physicians to negotiate fair employment terms, and ensure patients have access to the care they need from the best physicians available. Thank you for your consideration of this important matter. Sincerely, Dr. Alwin Lopez Physician, specialist in nephrology.
Edwin	"I'm an emergency physician and there should be no place for non-competes in the contracts of emergency physicians. We do not carry a patient panel and patients go to the nearest ER or ER of preference but not for individual physicians. Non-competes only provide companies, corporations, and/or hospitals leverage to undercut or decrease pay when profit margins aren't as large as they want them to be for shareholders."
Stephanie	"I am a veterinarian of 15 years. I have been impacted by non compete clauses twice in my career and currently working through the second one. I worked at my first job in rural south Texas for 4 years. When the job no longer fit the needs of my family (the stress was preventing me from becoming pregnant) and the quality of medicine was declining, I needed to quit. However, being a recent young homeowner with a mortgage and school loans, packing up and moving wasn't a great option. I was forced to do relief work and take a longer term position over an hour away from my family, all due to a non compete clause. I am now in a similar situation. I have been part of a local rural community for nearly 10 years, my children attend school here, and I established and run a non profit education foundation for our school district. When the veterinary clinic I worked for changed owners it became clear that it would no longer be a viable long term career choice. I now work an hour away in another county for the next two years because of the non compete. Non compete clauses have been standard practice in Texas and are often easily upheld. It has been near impossible in my career lifetime to have found a job that doesn't have one. I now, and only for the two years, work for a corporate owned clinic in San Antonio and still had to sign a non compete that spanned 5 to 10 air miles in any direction for work or practice ownership. Non competes are devastating to rural communities and the medical professionals that try to establish their lives there. Ending non competes allows businesses to have fair competition and to provide families with stability.:
John	"I believe this is not only a long time coming, the way employers hold current employees' captive with the fear of a lawsuit or other actions should be eliminated I fact in many cases it is a requirement of employment. Even for those employees that not only have non-compete clauses, but for those who also have an employment contract. One would say the environment for employees with non-compete clauses is boarder line slavery to that organization."

Wesley	"Please, please get rid of Noncompete clauses for employment agreements. They've been holding back progress in industry for years and they are getting worse every year. Thank you."
Dr. Brent	"The proposed non-compete clause rule is very much needed, especially in the dental field where many dental service organizations are placing non-compete clauses on their employees that are way too restrictive. This not only hurts the employee dentist, but the general public as well as it limits access to care."
Brent	"Non competes have no place in business. Employers can use them to control and restrict employees from working in die same field, often completely unfairly. PLEASE make them unenforceable."
Edd	"I'm a physician in private practice who helps train future physicians. I frequently review proposed employment contracts for these new physicians. Their contracts always contain NCCs that prevent these young MDs from working anywhere near the contract area if they leave when they finish their original contract. These contracts are frequently for jobs in medically underserved areas. Non-compete clauses for physicians limit access to medical care for patients in all areas and only serve to protect medical monopolies. There are no trade secrets to protect in medicine. The practical effect of these NCCs is to raise the cost of and limit access to medical care. NCCs for physicians and other medical providers should be outlawed."
Blake	"This bill needs to be passed. The concerns expressed are beyond valid, to the point of being blatantly obvious. If an employee asked their employer to sign an agreement that said, "We (the employer) agree to only use (Employee name here) for this task. If we decide to terminate the employment of this person, we will wait one full calendar year before hiring, or assigning these tasks to someone else." the employee would be laughed out of the office. Employers are in a position of power, and have a responsibility to their employees. If an employee feels that signing a non-compete agreement is a condition of employment, or a condition for promotion, he/she is being forced into the agreement, no differently than with a threat of physical violence. For some, the threat of physical violence is actually more appealing than a threat (real or perceived) to the safety and comfort of ones family. Once an employee signs an agreement like this, what motivation does an employer have to properly compensate the employee? It is wishful thinking to believe that all, or even most, companies will adhere to a strict moral code in these situations. In reference to the adjustments to state law, or the specific wording that works to apply a non-compete to only a certain geographical area, those are great steps. However, the truth of the matter is that when you start a new job, or receive a promotion, you are given multiple documents to sign and the details can get lost in the mix. While it is true that it is the individuals responsibility to properly read and understand what he/she is signing, it is too easy for this wording to be misinterpreted, misrepresented, or purely incomprehensible without the advantage of a law degree. It is growing more and more true these days that employees area commodity or a service like any other. If we feel that Americans shouldn't be forced sign an agreement to only purchase groceries from one particular store, buy vehicles from one particular manufacturer, or only eat at one particular restaurant, we shouldn't support non-compete agreements. These agreements give an employer a monopoly over an employees time and finances and run counter to the free-market, American dream we claim to love and support.

Dustin	"This would be fantastic to have changed since it prevents competition. If this doesn't go through then there will continue to fewer competitors across different industries and that could likely effect communities negatively."
Angelica	"I am in favor of this rule. Non-compete clauses are being extremely overused. Employers are using them as tool to intimidate employee, prevent their upward mobility, ability to increase their earning potential, all the while not offering these opportunities within their own organization. Non disclosure clauses are enough to cover the employer. They could file injunctions within that clause."
Bryan	"I wholeheartedly support the ending of the noncompete agreements. I have been under a noncompete agreement for 23 years and would very much appreciate die opportunity to grow my career."
Bob	This non compete rule is LONG overdue.
eric	"This ruling is a long time coming. I am in the medical field and non-competes area ubiquitous part of life. It is interesting to note that attorneys have disallowed enforcement of non-competes in their field for some time and in all 50 states. They cite that the attorney-client privilege is sacred and that there should be no restriction on a client picking an attorney. I think that most would argue that the doctor-patient relationship is equally sacred but in most states physicians do not have these same protections. It is obvious that they should. Non-competes are damaging in all professions but I can speak of the damages in the medical field first hand. I am currently subject to a non-compete after I left my job. My former employer has sought legal relief which is still ongoing. There are at least 5 other physicians (in a 6 month period) who have also left this employer. Obviously, there are some unfavorable practices. The irony of a non-compete is that even if the employer is unscrupulous, the employee is still forced to honor it. Speaking first hand and talking with these other doctors, I can tell you that the amount of hardship on the patients who simply want to keep their doctor is alarming In the middle of a pandemic and high inflation (including gas) all of these patients were forced to travel 15, 25, and sometimes 50 miles to see their doctor that they trusted and who was forced to leave the area for no fault of the patient's. This really is not in the interest of public policy for the citizens of the state (Texas in this case). Furthermore, the duration of physician non-competes in Texas is usually two years. It is rather clear that even if the employer did have a business interest to protect it would not require 2 years to do so. Most patients will have made up their mind about what they are going to do within the first 90 days of their doctor leaving (chiefly because most patients have chronic problems that need treating). At that point they are either going to give the new doctor a chance, follow die old doctor, or pick a

	completely third option. Any additional time after this is simply a punishment to the doctor who left and in no way protects any business interest. I agree with other comments that a simple NDA/confidentiality protect any secrets. In our specialty there really are not any "secrets". Doctors learn their skills and training and sharpen them through CME activities and courses on new devices. Employers rarely if ever offer any training even though this is in most contracts. I truly applaud the FTC's efforts on this. It appear that there are going to be legal challenges to the FTC's authority to perk-gm this action. I am very hopeful that in the end the right thing is done and this practice goes the way of the dinosaur and die do do bird into extinction. If so, America's workers and general public will be better for it Thank you for your attention."
Steven	"This really is long overdue! For a very long time, employees have been held hostage to companies, so many of them using NC clauses for any and all positions. NC Clauses used by companies only benefit them, not the employee. I have heard from friends and acquaintances many times that the company terminates the employment, but conveniently "reminds" the now former employee that you must leave the industry! This puts people and families at a great disadvantage financially. Another tactic is for a competitor to poach, they have this new employee sign a NC, they gather all wanted info from them, then terminate, but now they have a NC. And can a person financially fight this? Not really, the legal fees are extreme for individuals, not the companies, plus this individual is now unemployed. Please do the right thing for American families!"
Kerry	"Noncompete clauses are being used as a way to maintain control over workers and to prevent them from having competitive wages. Many markets are small, preventing workers from having the ability to leave toxic or low paying conditions. They should be made illegal as the prohibit improved accessibility to such fields as healthcare, news and information, and human services."
Deanna	"I am in favor of banning non compete agreements. In my 10+ years in the workforce I have only ever seen them used to abuse the rights of less privileged employees by their employers. An imbalance of power needs to be taken into consideration when most Americans are navigating today's job markets. Corporations and business owners use non competes to deny individuals and consumers their right to a competitive market. Please consider the rights and the good of the majority of our nations people and not just the few who hold the majority of our wealth."
Kim	"I am a 55-year-old medical transcriptionist/scribe. We are a very small community and tons of the "outsourcing" from several scribe platform companies go through just a few companies. These are requiring non-compete contracts with INDEFINITE ends - "at any time in the future " Ending the non-compete would be most beneficial to those of us who are the workers. We have no interest in sharing "secrets." We do not care because we are working for less than a livable wage and just want to feed and house our families. If a provider finds a good scribe and wants to follow them, they normally have to end their contract and work with their clinic management/ownership. Penalizing the workers is wrong."

Dan	"I believe that non-compete is oppressive that it limits competition, restricts individuals from create their own business, or working for another organization in a similar industry. I believe the FTC should ban non-compete clauses. I do believe that the rights of the organization in regards to Intellectual property, trademarks, and patents must be maintained. A former employee, contractor with this type of knowledge should not be allowed to leverage the IP, TM, and patents and rebrand them as their own."
Betsy	"As an individual that is the product of a joint venture between 2 companies I am now forced to sign a non- compete cause. It is disturbing to me as I had very little to say about my future when the companies joined and now have to sign a non-compete clause which limits my ability to move to another clinical research position, even as a consultant. In this economy workers need to be able to make choices especially when the companies we have faithfully worked for do so and it is not good for our future."
Timothy	"I am currently in a lawsuit with my non compete. I am looking forward to the FTC voting to ban non compete agreements. We will file for a summary judgment as soon as it becomes law. Thank you"
Sunil	"We need to get rid of non compete and even arbitration agreements. These can very easily result in wage theft and only work to the benefit of the employer while de-enfranchising the worker."
Andres	"As a physician we should be allow to an open market without restriction that can affect our families . We should be allow to look for better options without repercussions. And stop the big companies to dictate our careers."
Jennifer	"I want to talk about my husbands non-compete contract he has signed with a group of orthopedic surgeons . He merged his practice with another group and since they have grown to over 30 physicians taking care of thousands of patients. Some of his patients have been with him for 20 years. Some of his patients are sons or daughters of his previous patients. They trust him. He is one of the few doctors who speak Spanish. He takes care of every aspect of orthopedics including spine. The group has become increasingly difficult to navigate and every year his noncompete is more and more strict. I have encouraged him to leave but he would have to leave town and his patients for a number of years. Non-compete contracts have NO place in the medical field. Doctors are supposed to help. There are enough patients for everyone and I would love nothing more than for the proposed law banning non- compete contracts to go through. For continuity of care, for safety, for professionals to have choices and opportunities."
Judy	"My child worked in the commodities reporting business for years for several companies. She became proficient and wanted to start her own reporting business, but had to move abroad to avoid harassment by a vindictive, much better financed company. We've allowed cannibal capitalism to run this country and our middle class into the ground. She and her family are doing very well abroad, changing their citizenship, enjoying affordable, 1st class, free public education and affordable healthcare and housing. We've lost one of our very best to an EU country. I get to see my only grandchild weekly on Skype and rarely in person. When my mother dies I'll be joining them permanently."

Daniel	"I am an orthopedic surgeon. Non-compete clauses are anti-competition and unconstitutional. Instead of hospitals treating their employees properly and hiring enough staff, they rely on the fear that staff can't reasonably leave their jobs because of non-competes. Don't let hospital lobbying keep this legislation from moving forward."
Sean	"I strongly support the FTC's proposed rule change regarding Non-Compete Clauses. As a physician , Non-Compete Clauses directly contradict the ideals of Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness. I became a doctor to care for patients and provide for my family, not to be entered into a form of servitude to employers. Leaving a job should not require uprooting my family as it currently stands. Non-Complete Clauses give doctors the choice of continuing to work in underpaid and unsatisfying jobs or leaving our homes, pulling our children out of their schools, leaving our friends and families behind, and relocating to a new area. This goes against the American Dream. Please push forward this rule change -- for me, for my family, and for other workers around the Nation attempting to do our best for their families."
Manuel	"It is absolutely ridiculous that during a physician shortage that we as physicians are being forced into non competes as patients wait months on end to see a physician resulting in worsening patient outcomes I highly encourage you to stop physician non competes being enforced"
Rachel	"I see these clauses used across the board to restrict workers' freedom to find better working conditions. They affect everyone from Nannies to professionals like me (a physician). These clauses are particularly pernicious to people with young children, because being forced to move to mother city in order fir a parent to change jobs would be incredibly disruptive for children's lives. As a physician mom I urge the FTC to make non-compete clauses illegal. Thank you!"
Richard	"I am a 62 yr employed Cardiologist who doesn't want to take call anymore; specifically, I don't want to work weekends and holidays anymore. I have been on call in one form or variety since the mid 1980s. The employer states that they cannot meet my request and, as a result, come the end of the year when my contract ends, I will be unemployed. I'm not ready to stop working but the non compete clause in my contract makes it likely that I will stop working This is a shame as good MDs don't grow on trees and an MD shortage already exists. If the non compete did not exist I could continue to work in the community for an entity that would welcome me to their group as an office MD without call responsibilities and I would be able to continue helping patients. My options now are to ignore the non compete and continue working while accepting the legal risk in doing so, sit out a year and then return to work, or pay my employer the sum of my previous year's salary. Ridiculous. How is a single Cardiologist a threat to the large; publicly traded company that employs him? Do I have some corporate secret that I am going to pass on to a competing health care system? Of course, I don't. Non compete clauses should be banned."
Derrick	"All non-competitive agreements should be outlawed. Any company engaged in this practice should be held criminally liable for trying to endorse poverty and should pay out all associated legal fees for the individuals coerced into this practice and the affected individual should have 3 years with of salary paid to them within 1 month of the company being found guilty of this practice.”

Elisa	“I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! I also commend this ban as a way of stopping some of the egregious monopolizing we are seeing by companies who try to eliminate competition through deception.”
Joshua	“I support getting rid of the rule. It's extremely damaging to anyone trying to better themselves in a professional manner and just another tool for bosses to not do better by the people who work their ass off for them.”
John	“All healthcare workers (physicians included) should not be allowed to have non compete clauses. If physicians are allowed to have non competes than all healthcare providers should be held to die same standard. Patients should be allowed to choose their doctor even if they leave a hospital and go to another location. This is something we allow in healthcare but find "unethical" for lawyers.”
J	“We need this law to be implemented. Due to non compete i will have to leave city with family if i have to leave the job”
Ian	I am a pediatric surgeon , practicing for the past 10 years. When I finished fellowship, I joined a private practice that had recently been acquired by a nationwide physician management corporation. Over the next ten years I was always the most productive or second most productive surgeon, and developed a great relationship with patients and pediatricians. Over the last 3 years, referring providers became increasingly disaffected with the group and began to refer to another group in town. I was given the opportunity to leave my group, join our county hospital to help continue building our pediatric trauma program, improve care and join hospital leadership. I elected to do so, but my non compete, which I signed 10 years ago, prevents me from operating or seeing patients in clinic. The company also attempted to even stop me working as an administrator, but relented after I hired a lawyer. I could of course as the hospital to buy my non compete out- but imagine asking the county taxpayers to fork over more than a million dollars to a private company based in another state so I can get out of a non compete. So I cannot operate on newborns through 18 year old patients in our region for 563 more days. While I enjoy my administrative role very much: I wanted to be a trauma surgeon when I was 13 years old. I wanted to be a pediatric trauma surgeon when I was 15 years old. Since leaving high school, I went through 8 years of more school and 9 years of training so I could take care of babies from 420 grams (my smallest patient ever) to 212 kg (largest teen so far). I personally made millions of dollars for the corporation (and they paid me well- so an even trade), and represented them locally, regionally and nationally to the best of my ability. But now, because of a contract I signed 10 years ago, I have to watch over other peoples' shoulders while they do the one thing I have dedicated my life to doing, and it is heartbreaking.”
Sujatha	“I as a physician strongly support the ban on non compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations.”

Govardhan	“Strongly oppose non compete clause for employment of physicians. This is not less than modern slavery of intellectuals. America is land of opportunity and freedom but the non compete doesn't give that perception. Physicians should be given freedom to practice without non compete clause. Healthcare work force should have fair employment practice.”
Paulina	“Please do away with non-compete clauses.”
suman	“It prevents physicians to practice independently without hospital influence. Non compete clause should not be part of physician contracts.”
Vij	“ Non-compete is great weapon for corporate companies to promise, bait, then switch & then torture the employees unreasonably by increasing work & decreasing pay. The skilled employees with families & ties to die place have no where to go.”
Napoleon	“Please ban Non-Compete Clauses in contracts. Current employers utilizing non-compete clauses put a significant restriction on potential and current employees making it prohibitive to work where you live should the employment cease.
Christian	“I am an anesthesiologist who works in a market filled with non compete clause companies. These clauses unfairly limit competition and drive physicians both from the market in which they live and the profession as a whole, directly contributing to local and national shortages. These clauses support local monopolies by hospital groups in order to control and limit the freedoms of professionals who are prisoner to massive student debts in order to become qualified. I fully support the complete elimination of non compete clauses.”
Karen	“Please get rid of non-compete clauses. They stifle competition in the job market, lower wages, and limit opportunities for workers. Non-competes are a tactic by employer's to keep wages down which ultimately decreases tax revenue.”
Nicholas	“I am a physician who is strongly opposed to non competes and approves of the change. I have seen many of my colleagues harmed my non competes. They suppress health care wages and limit flexibility to practice in the area. Patients have been directly harmed by having health care professionals prohibited from working in their geographic areas. Patients and health care professionals will be directly harmed by leaving non competes in place.”
Javier	“As a Texan born and raised American citizen, I find this rule to provide the proper form of protection to maintain our freedom of employment and movement. Non-Compete Clauses are bad fair agreements that limit worker's ability to obtain economic prosperity as well as limits national economic growth for the sake of protecting corporate interests. Federal government agencies are beholden to protecting the citizens of the United States of America, not corporations. This rule serves as a fundamental protection for the economic interests of the overwhelming American public. Personally, as medical student that will be graduating as Medical Doctor this year, May 2023. I dissent with the AHA's comment requesting: "At the very least, any and that the FTC finalizes

	must specifically exempt physicians and senior hospital executives or, more generally, highly-skilled, highly- compensated employees using, for instance, categories that are already well-established in federal law under the exemptions from minimum wage and overtime pay provided by Section 13(a)(1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act." There request undermines the value of American physicians who want to provide quality medical care to their communities. By financially limiting a physician's ability to move and practice in underserved areas at will, this harms communities at need for sake of corporate profiteering. Physicians ought to be included as protected workers under this proposed FTC rule as these professionals serve the public's best interests as they relate to medical care. Most physicians are employed and most states provide At-Will employment. Combined with Non-Compete Clauses that limit a physician's ability to continue working in their community if they leave their employer, this severely limits the community's access to quality medical care. Both citizens and physicians deserve the most access to quality medical care which this rule supports. Dissenting opinions such as those proposed by the AHA, are made in bad fair, favoring corporate greed over patient care."
Kris	"I would love the opportunity to share my recent experience with leaving my firm after eighteen years under the confines of a strict non-compete agreement. My business was practically destroyed and, more importantly, the entire experience was not in the best interest of my clients"
Kimberly	"Please go through with banning non-competes and have it apply to healthcare jobs in general. Currently doctors are often subject to non-competes that lead to them having to leave their community in order to continue practicing medicine. This is especially problematic in areas with rural populations or telehealth. If a dr works at several hospitals associated with one practice (often commuting many miles in the course of the week), not being able to practice within the geographic area can lead to the community completely losing that person as it is rarely affordable or good for keeping up skills to stop working for a year or 2 waiting out the non-compete. It is also becoming a larger problem with increasing use of telehealth. Some doctors work in clinics across the state. When noncompetes cover this, large parts of the state can be blocked out, sometimes leading to physicians leaving the state or retiring early. Physicians build strong roots in their community. They should not be forced to leave because a hospital executive wants to force that doctor to either continue working for them or not work at all. Thank you for working on this very important topic!"
Hyman	"Non-compete clauses in health care area terrible component for physicians, mid-levels. They only benefit hospitals/large health care organizations and can only worsen patient care. They should not have an exception in the ban."
Thomas	"I strongly support the conunissions adoption of this rule to bad noncompetes. As a veterinarian who is currently under a non compete which was absolutely required by the multinational corporation I work for, I feel this is an unfair practice that tragically hampers workers rights. With the increased corporatization in veterinary medicine, doctors and even some technicians must choose to sign noncompete or else not work in certain markets as noncompetes are common practice in the veterinary industry. Once a veterinarian establish their families in a community, non competes all but guarantee they must uproot their families or stay in an undesirable workplace. Noncompetes restrict the free movement of labor within our free market and are destructive to workers, their families and their communities". "Noncompetes are un-American, anti-free market and disproportionately favor large multinational corporations at the expense of their employees."

TED	" Physicians are intimidated by their hospitals and contract management groups. Many are afraid to point out events, policies and corporate mandates that are dangerous to patients because of non-compete clauses in their contracts. Please include physicians, dentists and other highly educated and skilled healthcare workers in the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses."
Umang	"Non competes should be removed from medical practice completely from each and every kind of setting including exempt and non exempt employees. Only setting that it should be valid would be in research and innovation related employment."
Alan	"Noncompete clauses are nothing more than a form of trapping employees, particularly health care employees, into a job that potentially mistreats them and penalizes them if they feel that their work conditions are unsustainable and just overall poor for their well-being. It's nothing more than a pro corporate and anti worker agreement. Only benefits the powerful and penalizes the weak."
Deepa	I as a physician strongly support the ban on non compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the corporate hospital groups to dominate the market and control the physicians.
Kiran	"Employers use non compete clauses to restrict and control the employees rather than to protect any legitimate employer interest. I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, as proposed in Matter No. P201200. Kiran Cheruku"
Brandon	"I love this idea and I think it will empower workers across the country. This will also have a direct net positive on my life as a worker. In my field the only well paid work is mostly for competitors so my quality of life drastically drops if I cannot move to a competitor. I think we should protect the worker here rather than the company."
Ryan	"A fantastic idea. I am trapped in my current job making less than I could elsewhere due to a non-compete clause. It is corporate serfdom. Too bad this will never pass because it allows companies who have lobbyists to pay less to employees."
terrick	"Im all for getting rid of the sneaky NPRM?"
Monica	"Please end all non-competes. It significantly limits free market competition and forces workers to stay in bad employment situations. They are toxic and hurt employees and the public. "They are a tool of big business and corporations to manipulate workers and effectively hold families hostage in bad situations.
Abigail	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting

	noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers' rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. I urge die FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A concerned physician."
David	"Please include physicians in this law. We desperately need help to fight against being run out of town by mega hospitals."
Jay	"As a physician in a large city in South Texas. I have recently had to sell my private medical practice to a large corporation. Within the contract is a non-compete that extends to the entire county, basically prohibiting me from acquiring any similar position as I currently hold with them as an internal medicine physician working in a clinic. That is the sole position I am able to do — as I am no longer qualified to hold an alternate position working outside of a clinic as I have not maintained the skill set nor accreditation necessary to practice within a hospital over the past 20 years of operating my private practice . It's not possible to do so in todays healthcare environment. With this non-compete I am effectively prohibited to practice my only realistic career within the entire city of over a million people which constitutes the majority of the county. This is completely ridiculous, but yet as an individual, the corporate attorneys have all the power and refused to modify such a clause in the contract. We have a shortage of primary care physicians and yet I am prohibited to practice and provide that service in the same city once I have worked for someone else?! These clauses absolutely need to end!! In this case it's literally inhibiting public health. And these clauses should NOT be allowed to grandfather in either.
Chandra	"I support banning of Noncompete clause"
trinity	"This is something people ESPECIALLY in the beauty industry have been begging for! Employers are taking advantage of their employees and their future growing careers!"
trinity	"I work in the beauty industry and we have been fighting for this in Texas for so long. These non competes they have you sign are unreasonable and hinder employees from growing in their field. Employees are scared to leave a workplace even when they are treated horribly, the work conditions aren't reasonable, or they feel uncomfortable working at a place for many reasons but they stay because there employer has made sure they signed a noncompete and now they are out of a job. You should respect your employees and pay them what they are worth instead of using fear tactics and having no competes in place to keep them.”

Sarah	“Really great idea! Will protect workers! Employers should be working harder to keep their employees if they want them to stay, rather than using their power differential to keep employees stuck where they are.”
Alex	“Yea this would be amazing.”
Aaron	“Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to you as a physician anesthesiologist, who is bound by a noncompete clause. I am writing in strong support of your proposed change to eliminate noncompete clauses and/or make them illegal in contracts. I think that it fundamentally restricts our freedom as physicians, employees and citizens, to be bound by a noncompete clause that essentially forces us to move cities, if we no longer wish to work for our current employer. If employers mistreat us, undervalue us or otherwise create a suboptimal work environment we should have the right to leave and work elsewhere, without having to uproot our lives to another city. It is not as though we are taking trade secrets or intellectual property with us as physicians. Furthermore, let it be known that the American Hospital Association does not speak for physicians when it states that it is against the elimination of noncompete clauses. I cannot think of a single physician that I know that is in favor of noncompete clauses. I respectfully ask that the FTC pass the proposed rule to illuminate noncompete clauses from contracts. Sincerely, Aaron Garza, MD”
Jessie	“I agree that non compete clauses should be banned for all employers. I am writing on behalf of physicians who are frequently stuck in a job that doesn't best suit them or forced to move to a completely different region because of a non compete clause. People should have the freedom to work where they want to work and the employer can then compete on fair ground to keep the best employees.”
Alexander	“Y'all should approve this rule, non-compete rules are anti-worker and therefore anti-american. We aren't a country for companies, we are a country for the people.”
Jeff	“I am a sales professional in the HR world in Texas for a somewhat large private organization. I have been with the organization for approximately 7 years. My company record is spotless with no incident and I have been a high producer for the organization. Over the years of gaining experience with virtually no industry training from my organization in my field I have been approached by recruiters with opportunities of advancement with outside organizations. Meanwhile, my organization did not give me consideration when an obvious opportunity for advancement was available. At this time I postured that I had been recruited away and wanted nothing more than an opportunity to promote and do more with my career. My CEO's comment: "Well, you do have a non-compete." Using it as blatant leverage over an exemplary employee. I believe in employers of choice and a free market for the working person to be matched with these employers. A move for no more "ownership" of employees is a step in the right direction.”
Sherri	“The non-compete clause, among many other things in America, like the tax code, is bent in favor of corporations and against workers. I've worked with government contractors before who got less than two weeks notice they were terminated. Add on to that the inability to go seek another job in your specialty immediately? Awful. I fully support the Non-Compete Cause Rule.”

Robert	“Please vote against very unfair non compete clauses. They are not fair to workers.”
Alex	“I voice my strong support of the proposal for change concerning the non compete clause for businesses in America. I am an ear nose and throat surgeon practicing in San Antonio Texas. The current noncompete environment hinders new business formation, business growth, and freedom of employees to find the best match for their talent and personality. It is common practice here for a surgeon to basically be forced to sign a 2 year +, 15 miles + noncompete clause to join a group. Inevitably employment fit changes over time, but strapped by onerous and non competitive clauses - employees are forced to grind it out, or leave the Practice and then be forced to work remotely, causing a large family strain, move, or not work at all. I have seen this play out negatively for several friends within the last year. The current status quo also enables employers to rely on this clause to keep talent in lieu of providing better leadership, stronger working conditions, helpful innovative changes, etc. I have recently started my own private practice, and hope to bring a local colleague as a partner, but she is strapped in a noncompete clause that single handedly leaves us negotiating with her employer from a compromised position. I would never consider offering aspects of our proposed relationship if I wasn't trying to essentially buy her out of her non compete. In my view, her employer has done nothing to "earn" this high ground of negotiation, and my colleague had no choice but to sign a non compete in order to find work a few years ago. The ENT surgery market in San Antonio has in many ways stalled in progress over the last 20 years on account of noncompete clauses, which have kept dozens of surgeons from exploring new (and arguably better) ventures within our community. Please - help us to Unshackle the healthcare workforce by passing the proposed rule change! Especially in healthcare - free competition facilitates higher quality and affordability! Thanks”
Soukaina	“To whom it may concern, am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians . The exclusion of physicians in the proposed FTC non- compete clause rule is frightening for the state of medicine, and is driven by lobbying from American Hospital Association. The American Hospital Association does not represent physicians, but rather hospital systems that continue to exploit physicians at all levels of training and practice, and focus on their bottom line of generating more money. I have witnessed first hand the consequences of non-compete agreements on entire healthcare systems. In 2019, Atrium health acquired an entire hospital system in Charlotte NC, previously called Carolinas Medical Center. This is a not- for-profit hospital and community safety net, and a tertiary referral center tier most of western NC, northern SC, and east TN - which covers a very large geographic area that is underserved medically. The anesthesiology group contracted with CMC was not able to reach a favorable agreement with the new atrium management, leading to the immediate termination of EVERY anesthesiologist that worked at the hospital. Their noncompete agreement was over 100 miles effectively forcing all of these physicians to move out of state for new jobs. The chaos that

	ensued for weeks while the hospital struggled to cover the gap by hiring physicians from other states was detrimental to patient care and safety. These are the true effects of NCC that we as physicians deal with it day-to-day. The majority of hospital systems in the US are not-for-profit, and yet they are part of large networks like Atrium which buy all the small medical groups in a regional area, effectively eliminating most competition. Furthermore, these same not-for-profit hospitals pay their CEOs millions of dollars while advertising nationally that they must maintain non-compete agreements to lower cost of care by maintaining physicians pay from ballooning. The physician shortage is further compounded by the thousands of physicians that left the practice of medicine due to burnout from numerous reasons including COVID. Medicine is in a perilous state. Without protection for physicians, we will continue retiring early from medicine with career spans of 10-20 years rather our predecessors who practiced for 20-40 years. The young physicians of today which I am one are burdened by high student loan debt of 200-600K, heavy administrative burdens, pressure to work more and do with less, and spend even less time at the bedside with the patients. Without physicians protections, many of us will leave the clinical medicine behind, and opt for industry consulting jobs or for alternative fields all together... The wait time to see a neurologist at a large metro area is on average 3-6 months, sometimes longer. The loss of even one neurologist in underserved area due to a noncompete clause would be detrimental to a community for years to come. On average, it takes 2-3 years to advertise and interview for 2-3 years before being able to fill a neurology position. that is 2 years without access to care for 100+ of miles to a neurologist. I urge you to ban non-complete clause rule for all physicians, and give us back the power to care for our patients the way that they deserve."
David	"Non-compete clauses are responsible for my near financial ruin. At 57 years old, I was let go of a company and really had no choice than to take a stock share buyout, which included a very vicious non-compete that included that I could not re-enter the industry I was working in. At my age, I soon found out that coming back in at an exec level in a completely different industry, one that I'm not familiar with, was extremely difficult. It's delayed my ability to get a job to replace that income, and now I'm nearly bankrupt. Non-competes only work for the big guys, the small individual people, the workers, managers and executives (we're people too), get hurt."
Craig	"As someone who has worked in the broadcast news industry and subject to noncompete clauses, I would like to strongly encourage the adoption of changes that would make noncompete clauses illegal. I support the reasonings of the FTC for proposed changes."
Brenda	"I work for a company that has a lot of high profile clients. However, because of a non-compete agreement the company has us sign upon onboarding, employees have to wait a year before they can even apply with some/any of these companies. I have lost out on many possible positions because of these non-compete documents we have to sign. My company has not given me a raise in over 5 years."
Lee	"Please pass this. Non compete clauses have plagued the younger generation of work force and enforced fear to keep us at a company"

Luay	"The non compete clause is against patient interest and provider's wellbeing. Forces them to work under whatever the corporate wants and against medical ethical education. Help us to dissolve it and fight it."
Carlos	As a physician I think that non compete clauses stifle competition and leave lopsided deal in favor of the employer. Often, first time job offers for physicians in private and large company based practices are abusive to the junior physician. Getting rid of noncompete clauses would ensure that employers/practices treat junior physicians correctly. L	"I agree with this clause 100 % non competes hurt innovation and growth!!! Pass this and lets GROW AGAIN! -Uncle Lou"
FAROOQ	"Non compete clauses between employers and workers should be unenforceable because when a worker signs up for a job they have no power to bargain, the clause is an adhesion contract, take it or go away situation. It is high time to bring fairness to the workers."
Anthonyt	"I am currently held to a very strict non compete agreement, also known in the industry as a "hostage agreement." When I signed this agreement, it was basically sign it or I don't have a job. I do not have trade secrets, company secrets or any high level knowledge of how my company works. These non-compete agreements have held me back from promotion opportunities within my field of work due to the fact that I cover the entire North America on a technical aspect with electronic equipment. My company is a very large company with access to the best lawyers, and that has scared off any potential companies from hiring me even though they told me I would be a perfect fit for the next level within their company. This is not only happening to me, but anyone in my company that is trying to better their financial freedom by promoting or taking higher level positions at other companies. Companies are holding us hostage so we have a job and know we cannot leave. By making non-compete agreements illegal, it will allow much more competition for higher paying jobs and for companies to pay competitive wages in technical fields. If I was terminated or voluntarily quit my job, I would essentially not be able to work within my trained industry anywhere in the US or Canada the two years. That is an extreme employment hostage situation if I have ever seen one."
Scott	"Please do not exclude physicians from this rule. Noncompete clauses should protect proprietary information. A physicians knowledge is not something that should be controlled with a noncompete especially when there are areas of underserved patients. As it currently stands, noncompete clauses are utilized by hospitals to restrict physicians from more competitive opportunities and often cause physicians to have to "uproot" their current lives to move outside of a non-compete area. With the amount of people fleeing healthcare professions at this time please consider not removing physicians from this rule as a small effort to keep more physicians in the workforce."
Midge	"I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, as proposed in Matter No. P201200. Non-competes have been extended far beyond what they were originally used for. Non-disclosure agreements are a different thing. The types of employees that are often subject to strict non-competes are so broad. They include people who have no access to proprietary information. I believe they are used to intimidate employees from leaving. I would appreciate the FTC helping to protect these workers from unfair labor practices. Thank you."

Antonio	"My name is Antonio Alvarez, I 'am a Pathologist working in the southeast border of Texas since 2006. I really welcome this proposal and I think it is about time to ban noncompete clauses. I have witnessed and suffered the effects of these restrictions used for the benefit of employers only. In my case for instance, as a pathologist I don't see patients directly, I analyze their tissue samples under the microscope to render to the requesting clinician my diagnostic opinion of patient's disease. So if I decide, for whatever well-grounded reason to change jobs, but at the same time remaining within the small cluster of hospitals that we have in this region, I can not. The employer, which is not the hospital, but a home made small pathology group argues that I'm taking away his patients, when in fact, as I said I don't deal directly with patients but with other physicians, who obviously they wont follow me, they have already their working facilities. As a consequence, the occasions on which I have insisted on my purpose, the employer has threatened to sue me legally if I remain working within a radius of 25 miles for 2 years. Then, what are the other options the employer offers me: (1) a "buy out of the contract", which means I would have to pay him what ever dollar amount he decides, and this could be the equivalent of 3 to 12 months of gross income; (2) reaming working for him under his contract conditions and (3) moving out this region. This third option is by the way, the one I have been following all these years, but this implies higher costs in transportation, housing, meals, family issue, etc. That is because I have to move to nearby cities like San Antonio, Houston, Corpus Christy where they don't have the same needs of pathologists as we have at the border which is considered as a medically unserved area. To conclude, I sincerely wish the best to the FTC commission to ban employers from imposing draconian and coercive noncompetes on employees."
Amanda	"Shame on you for not including physicians in the non-compete conversation. There's absolutely no skill I have that an employer has given me."
Thomas	"Stop the inhumanity of noncompete clauses in workers contracts!"
Lillyvette	"Non-competes have prohibited me from making a living as a fitness and wellness professional to such an extent, that it hurt me economically. I opened up my own business that was different than my previous employer, even though it was different and I told him I was going to focus on a different area in wellness, my previous employer sued me. I ended up having to hire an attorney to defend myself and when it was all said and done, I spent close to 12,000 in fees and penalties. My employer had been paying me $14,thour as a fitness professional and his night shift manager, where I also kept the books for that shift and made sales for his business. The owner no longer came into his studio in the afternoons or evenings and I would close the facility in the evenings. Non-competes keep us from earning a decent living -- whether we go out on our own or start our own business. Depending on where you are based in the US, does help dictate your income. If you have someone who limits your opportunities, things can get financially bad in a short amount of time. It's time we got rid of this antiquated system that disallows us from having decent wages without any gaps in our career.”

Homero	“Fellow Americans, I have myself been a victim of non-compete agreements. At one of my past places of employment, my employer required this non-compete as a condition of employment on my first day on the job. I was not informed of this agreement when I first signed up for the role. I was told that if I intended to work at the company in question, I would have to agree and sign the non-compete agreement. I begrudgingly agreed, as I had quit my previous job in order to secure this job. It wasn't after one year of service at this firm and not receiving a raise that I decided to look for opportunities elsewhere. It was then that I eventually found a job in the same industry in the same city, just 15 minutes further away. It was then that the non-compete agreement became a problem. I wanted the job and I wanted to earn myself a 50% raise. I ended up seeking legal counsel and discovered enforcing said non-compete would be cost-prohibitive- it would cost me $20k to defend and the old company $30k to enforce. Basically, the whole thing is just a scare tactic to maintaining good employees from getting ahead and earning a better living at another Company. I decided to bite the bullet and leave to the competitor- deciding to risk a potential lawsuit. At the time, switching jobs make a significant change in my life. I was able to afford a better standard of living for myself and my family, as well as develop exponentially from a professional standpoint. The anguish and aggravation this non-compete agreement caused is something that no fellow American or any other worker from any nationality should have to endure in the U.S labor market. The U.S. is the land of opportunity. Each and every individual in this country has the ability and opportunity to better one's self and deserves to earn a competitive wage, dictated by the labor market. Non-compete agreements shouldn't stand in the way or hinder a worker's ability to increase their earning potential. End non-compete agreements & God bless America!”
Mohammad	“ Non compete is bad. It takes away the freedom of choosing work location which puts employee in weak and unfavorable conditions for the benefit of monopolies and big corporates.”
JOSE	“ I think this would be a great opportunity for entrepreneurs. to start their own ventures, I myself was a business owner, and sold my company to a larger corporation. during Covid. I stayed on as a managing employee and signed a non-compete agreement. Now that my industry has flourished, I am trapped thinking of an exit strategy on how to go back to what I had prior to selling.”
Katie	“Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 The proposed banning of non compete clauses is long overdue. Non compete clauses restrict the rights of employees' freedom once they are no longer employed with a company. These clauses within contracts provide companies protection from healthy competition, and therefore allow for companies to mistreat and/or undervalue employees without consequence. Although the argument can be made that an individual has the right not to enter into a contract with a non compete clause, it is often the case that over time, as companies and leadership change, an employee may begin to disagree with the changes or newly implemented policies within the company. The employee is then unfairly trapped in a company they are unsatisfied with in order to avoid a life changing move.”

Bob	“Physicians should not have to sign non-compete clauses with hospitals. Physicians are ultimately who allow hospitals to operate and obtain revenue. Using non-compete clauses to coerce physicians into settling for poor working conditions because they cannot work at a neighboring hospital is wrong. We are the ones who sacrificed the time to obtain our MD's, we need to be allowed to seek fair market value rather than stuff the pockets of MBA's and hospital administrators. Working conditions are so bad that female MD's only last on average 7 years in the workforce and burnout.”
Joslin	“As a healthcare provider and employee, I find non-competes unjust to the employees. Non-competes allow for companies to not work hard at retention as the non-competes are often restrictive and inhibit true market labor. Employees should be allowed to go to the best company with the best benefits. Am NDA would allow fir companies to prevent employees from disclosing information to competitor. Non-competes only benefit companies”.
Dustin	“I agree with banning the use of non-competes in the workplace. I have worked in several industries, including the upscale, gym, hospitality, industry, construction industry, among others, in which these non-competes prevented employees from making wages that were necessary to achieve with rising inflation. I was forced to enforce these, in which I made a career change, as in each situation it was not the right thing to do. Please do away with these noncompete's. We don't need big government, we need a government for the people.”
Laura	Please ban non-compete clauses. As a physician, I am now trapped working for a corporation that is motivated by money only and I am unable to leave. I am underpaid and overworked and my freedom is severely and unfairly restricted.
Paulo	First and foremost, THANK YOU for championing this cause. As someone who has been recently negatively impacted by a non-compete (attached), it has caused me and my family great emotional, and financial strain. I've always strived to operate above board, I stand by the notion of not poaching clients and employees but find it incredibly selfish and bias for a company to mandate that an employee is not able to work in an industry (globally mind you) that he's been in for over 30 years. That's like telling a doctor he can't practice medicine if he moves from one hospital to another. Alorica has a record of suing employees (bullying really) upon their exit yet fail to recognize the constant misses and lies in their commitments (promotions, equity, bonuses, etc.) that by and large led to an individual choosing to move on. My non complete matures on 7/15/23 and I suspect this ruling will not occur before that, however I stand with you, support you and will champion this effort until a favorable ruling is made as it will have tremendous benefits for future employees that currently are under an NDA. Thank you thr your time. Attachments Alorica Non Compete minus Signature
Patricia	“When a worker starts a new job, he or she doesn't know a great deal about the whole situation of this job. So that person show not be forced to sign a noncompete agreement that could result in their working in a seriously bad situation sometimes or maybe most of the time-- or else leaving that job (with work experience from it) but being unable to get a different job that might be considered to have some competition with the bad first job. This is extremely unfair to the new worker in a job and should not be allowed. For sure!"

Trenton	"I have a non compete as an independent contractor with my company. I sale graduation products. Contractually my company can lock me up for 4 years. Or at least take me to court we are owned by a private equity firm Bain Capital). My company can raise prices & I have no competitive choice or say in their policies. The end result is my customer pays more. I have no idea how I can be held to a non compete as an independent contractor with no support (insurance,401k,etc..) from the company. Thank you"
Sandra	"I believe that non-compete clauses put a stranglehold on our economy. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Martha	"I agree with the proposed rule by the Federal Trade Commission, that non-compete clauses are unfair. They stifle competition and the ability for workers to go out on their own and have a new life. It's a very unfair system that employers have been foisting on workers. I completely disagree with employers doing this -- I am not for workers taking trade secrets away with them; that is not what this is about. Be fair to workers."
Victoria	"I support this change. A non- compete only prevents an associate from obtaining employment, creates a threatening and distrustful environment between company and associate, and stifles an associate's ability to grow in an industry. A condition of the annual incentive plan in one of the largest healthcare providers in the nation requires employees to either enter into a non-compete and restrictive covenant that limits a worker to obtain gainful direct employment. Failure to accept this means the associate loses stock (options, restricted, and/or performance) without means to recover that financial loss. This non-compete includes excessive time (36 months), territory, and even the area of business restrictions. It also restricts associates from solicitation of other associates and places nondisparagement or other legal restrictions on fomier associates. If you work in the administration side of healthcare such as government programs Medicaid, CHIP and Medicare, and/or commercial insurance the non-compete would unreasonably place economic hardship, and future opportunities upon its employees. This non-compete, and many others, also clearly conflict with the Restatement of Contracts. Yet companies continue to threaten the livelihood of associates that have left a company. It is disturbing to think a company can prohibit or restrict reasonable and gainful employment for 36 months simply because they may operate in the same or similar area. Such limitations not only affect the growth and financial status of the American worker but asserts one company's day-to-day operations are so unique that working with another company would somehow compromise its intellectual property or place the new company in such a competitive advantage it would significantly harm another. Further, there are instances when companies severe employment. Whether they make that decision upon performance or a reduction in force is irrelevant. The company chose to severe employment for its employee then prohibits them from employment with another company in the same field or territory. This diminishes competition, ruins reputations and negatively affects the livelihood of the American worker. I support the change in the law to protect the American worker from being disenfranchised by companies restricting former employees from obtaining gainful employment within the same or similar fields or with perceived or actual competitors. Please enact this change as soon as possible.”

Devin	“The elimination of noncompetes must include physicians . The best care is provided by independent, physician-owned practices which survive only by providing quality medical care and putting patients first. Corporate practices which hire young physicians and entrap them with onerous noncompetes are one of the many destructive forces in medicine today. There is no logical reason to disempower physicians by excluding them from this bill; the MIA's push to do so is driven by corporate greed and is not in the interest of patients, physicians, or small business.”
Jenna	“I'm a new graduate I did not have the means to hire an attorney to review my employment contract that was given to me about 4 months after I had already started. I joined a practice that had been my family's veterinarians since I was young and assumed they had my best interest in mind. My non-compete was for the full county I lived in and for 2 years. I was told when I was hired I would have the opportunity to buy-in but after 8 years I could see this was not in their plans. When I refused to sign another contract with a non-compete, I was told I would no longer be employed after 30 days (they want to sure they could take their vacations before I left). After spending over $50,000 to contest the unreasonable non-compete, we had to make the decision to move on. I moved to Texas and my husband had to stay in NM until our house sold and he could find another job. NM is a state that is starved for professionals and large animal veterinarians, however due to the non-competes driving many talented people out of the state, our communities suffer. Had my employers practiced quality ethical medicine, pay fairly and provide benefits, I would not have wanted to leave. If employers treat their employees right, people would stay. A person's livelihood should not be dictated by a piece of paper restricting a person from helping their communities to do what they went to school to do. Non-competes are antiquated and it's time for a change. 14 years later I have never signed another non-compete and my current employers understand there is a mutual benefit to make the workplace the best it can be and having a loyal and dedicated employee.”
Heather	“I strongly support abolishing non-compete clauses and appreciate your attention to this matter. I would like to comment on methods companies use to enforce non-competes, as there may need to be specific language to prohibit these practices. My employer, for example, holds hostage a portion of our retirement funds until the non-compete agreement has been satisfied. If I choose to leave the organization, I will not have access to those funds until two years after separation, and only if the non-compete is satisfied. The funds are not vested until those requirements are met. If I do not satisfy the non-compete, I lose those funds altogether. Presumably the spirit of this proposed rule would prohibit the vesting issue also. I am concerned, however, that the opposite will happen (that a larger proportion of savings would be subject to a waiting period, or risk losing the funds altogether if working for a competing organization) if this is not specifically stated. I appreciate your consideration.”

Don	“As a small business owner of many years, I support die FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses depress worker wages, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth. I have numerous friends and acquaintances who have been required over the years to sign non-compete clauses which hurt their job mobility. They were all concerned about these agreements' impact on their future employment and income.”
Cathy	“I oppose non-compete clauses because it eliminates fair competition in business and practice. It allows large corporations to own practices and monopolize by preventing practitioners that leave their organizations from ever practicing in that same area. Every American has a right to practice their trade and craft in any location, as long as they are abiding by the laws of their location. Non-competes are not lawful. They are only a means to quell competition.”
Clifford	I fully support this amendment.
April	“I began working for a State Farm insurance agent in the small Texas town of Buda. Part of my new hire paperwork included a no compete clause for 36 months after employment by his office. I quit after 2 weeks because it was not a good fit for me. I didn't even sell any insurance policies yet but am fearful of applying to any other insurance company because the non-compete clause I signed threatened legal action if I were to work for a competitor that sells similar products (auto, homeowners, life, or health insurance). I feel trapped by this for the next 3 years. How can an employer I worked for briefly control my life for so long?”
Priscilla	“I support this ban. As a dentist , my first job out of residency was very toxic and it was hard for me to quit because I was very limited by my noncompete. My mental health took a toll, and a few of my coworkers felt the same.”
TIMOTHY	“I support elimination of non compete clauses. As a nurse practitioner these clauses prevent me from accepting positions in places that would boost my skills, and my ability to improve patient care if they are within 40 miles of my previous employer who tontines to open clinic across the state. This will leave me no choice but to relocate to a different state to work in the field I am best suited for.”
Nihar	“Do not exclude physicians from non compete relief. Hospitals have had a monopoly on physicians and their respective families for too long. It would be an absolute disgrace not to relieve everyone including physicians from this heinous rule.”
Jocelyn	“Non compete clauses discourage employers from actually working at others ways of employee retention, including a good work environment.”
Zane	“Non competes should be banned for healthcare workers at any hospital, it is very harmful to patients and healthcare in this country when physicians and other healthcare workers are forced to leave a community due to hospital politics leaving patients unattended to. I am a patient that had 2 doctors leave on me because of their hospital and I have been struggling to find care, these doctors are from here and have family here, however, non-compete forced them to leave their hometowns and their patients.”

Tina	"I'm in favor of banning non-competes. I witnessed a colleague who had legal action taken against her regarding a non-compete. It devastated her financially and professionally because she didn't have the means to fight back. The two industries were not even in competition. The lawsuit was a bully action as a result of several employees leaving the company. Rather than take responsibility for their poor retention, they have often used lawsuit tactics in an attempt to making leaving scary. This happened to several people. In addition, it has become obvious throughout my career that there are very few truly original trade secrets. Business acumen, hard and soft skills are not trade secrets. I'd be cautious about the idea of NDA around trade secrets. Confidential information is different from trade secrets. Businesses would call their consultative sales process a trade secret. It's not a trade secret, it's a skill set. Preventing people from working in an environment where they would use their skillset would be as restrictive as a non-compete. Thank you for considering this ban. No one should be prevented from earning a living. People should be free to forward their careers and leave toxic companies without penalty."
Christopher	"This proposed rule would positively impact myself, and millions of other Americans across an incredible number of industries. It would also help promote and foster healthy competition; a value that helped build this country and one that we are sorely lacking today. Americans would have the ability to better their situation without worrying about how their current employer might retaliate. It would promote employers treating their workers better as a form of retention, rather than the threat of punitive actions. There is a growing attitude among the American people that their government is not representing the will of citizens outside of the ruling elite. This ruling could go a long way in helping restore the trust the working and middle class have lost in the federal government. As it would be a demonstrable change that gives workers autonomy over their labor, at the expense of businesses' bottom lines."
Christian	"I fully support this. Making it fairer for workers and giving them more opportunities is always an easy choice for me. Please do this as the American worker could benefit greatly from this."
Jim	"I have a non-compete agreement with my former employer TTEC. After 12 years I was released and now have no health insurance. I have a non-compete which is stopping me from taking another job in my industry. I can send you a copy of it if you would like."
Joel	"I'm a family physician in Central Texas. After being in private practice for 15 years, our group of 10 doctors was purchased by the largest hospital group in America. Because of Stark laws, fair market value etc. the purchase was for a minimal sum. For the last 13 years despite having 600 New patients call each month that we are unable to see the hospital group has not expanded our practice. In fact, during the last two years through retirement and physicians quitting because of Covid our number is at five. When pressed on why they are not expanding or replacing our physicians it is plain to see that they want to replace us with mid levels. We have a noncompete of 10 miles and 300,000 for buyout. Despite being a desirable community, a rapidly growing number of patients are unable to find physicians to care for them. They are getting disjointed care at best. We would like to fight this noncompete, however, their in-house lawyer's would make our legal fees astronomical. We encourage you to do what's best for the American workers and patients. Please carry out this bold plan for positive change. Thank you."

Randall	"I fully support this measure. While I've never been subject to a non-compete clause in my duties as a software developer my wife is a Physical Therapist and has always had trouble with overly proscriptive non-compete clauses being added to her work contracts. It's prevented her in the past from leaving jobs to pursue higher wages which directly affects our family's material well-being. Non-compete clauses, especially for blue-collar workers, suppress wages and give too much power to employers. My wife's situation is just one of many in our friend circle who are locked into similar situations. It is so nice to see genuine government action that helps the average citizen and I hope to see more of this in the future. Best of luck in getting this passed and upheld."
Adam	"Non-competes have little to no benefits that a patent should not already cover meaningfully cover. Non-compete agreements limit the ability of employees to seek better job opportunities and higher wages. If a person has skills and experience in a particular field, they may find it difficult to leave their current job and join a competitor if they are bound by a non-compete agreement. This can result in lower wages and fewer opportunities for career growth, which can be detrimental to the individual and the industry as a whole. Non-compete agreements stifle innovation and competition within an industry. When workers are restricted from moving between companies, it can create a barrier to entry for new competitors and limit the exchange of ideas and knowledge between companies. This can result in a lack of innovation and progress within the industry, ultimately harming consumers and the economy. Non-compete agreements are also harmful to small and medium-sized businesses that may not have the resources to enforce or defend against such agreements. This can result in a concentration of talent and resources among larger companies, leading to an unfair advantage in the marketplace. If a smaller company has a meaningful innovation that sets them apart from competition they are largely protected by things like patent law, not non-competes."
Charles	"Greetings. I'm writing today to support the FTC's proposed rule changes to ban non complete clauses. I agree with Senator Warren of Massachusetts that this ban should be left as broad as it is currently written. I've worked in several workplaces that had employees with non compete clauses and the work and the employees all suffered. It dries up competition and it keeps people from taking a risk in or out of the workplace. It stifles creativity and creative problem solving. These agreements serve no one but the corporations who use them again and again to scare workers into staying in line. Thanks for your time Sincerely, Charlie Sears San Marcos, Texas"
Farook	"I'm against non-compete for the following reasons: 1. My doctors must relocate when they quit or are fired which means that I lose access to care. 2. It stifles competition and quality of treatment. 3. It limits innovation. 4. It decreases employee leverage."

catherine	"End non compete. It is rigging the system in favor of the "bosses" who lock people into jobs at stagnant wages. Its ridiculous and steals away one of the few was to increase wages/salary and build a better life."
Neeta	"No one should be able to limit the ability for one to have work. Too much control from hospitals and CMGs. Non compete clauses should be banned."
Katie	"I fully support banning non-competes for physicians . My husband and I are pediatric subspecialists which are already rare and adding a noncompete is restrictive. We had to uproot our family of elementary and middle school kids and move away from close family to get better jobs with essentially 25% pay raises and less clinical expectations. Although I can't prove it, I think that the noncompete at our previous institution (which was very restricted) allows them to pay way under market to physicians. My previous colleagues are all in similar situations of wanting to live near family so continue to stay in low paying and high call/clinical load jobs. We had not gotten raises in several years despite already low pay and high call/clinical expectations. Unfortunately it is a not for profit institution so would not be covered, but I hope this would extend to those facilities as well. Everyone at my previous institution was unhappy and it showed in many ways (morale, patient satisfaction, clinical outcomes, culture) and just felt toxic and no longer an option for us. My current institution also has a noncompete but supports physicians so much better. I don't understand how restricting physicians' livelihoods is legal in this country."
Christopher	"I am an Orthopedic Surgeon in Georgetown, Texas. I have been involved with two prior employment agreements both of which had noncompete clauses. The first company would not let us out the contract even though they were going through bankruptcy. They threatened litigation and I was forced to stay with the company until they decided dissolve the company. Noncompete clauses for physicians completely eliminate my ability to negotiate a better contract or to seek another employer unless I am willing to move my family and leave the patient base that I have spent the last 20 years building. Noncompete clauses for physicians have nothing to do with the stealing of a company's trade secrets and serve only to prevent us from negotiating a better deal for services. This is totally against a free market system that allows workers to improve their situation. If someone is unhappy at work they should have the freedom to go and work elsewhere and not have to uproot their family or relocate their practice to get around a noncompete clause. Every employed physician in this country will support this legislation."
Amara	"Non compete clauses if kept in place should be reasonable. They often however have such a large radius that finding another job becomes impossible unless you move. Not reasonable"
David	"Ban non-competes! A company shouldn't prevent you from working somewhere else after you quit."
Mark	"As someone in the health-tech field , I can attest that non-compete clauses have prevented me from taking some jobs, and delayed my hiring at others, costing me significant lost wages, extended time without work, and the need to go on unemployment. Companies have other means of protecting their business rather than creating a blanket restriction on ANY job in ANY related field."

Steve	"I fully support this new rule. If anything, it should be expanded to prohibit employer mandated non- solicitation agreements as well (wherein an employer prohibits former employees from recruiting current and recent employees of the company to move elsewhere). Non-compete agreements area huge problem for our economy in multiple ways: They both unfairly suppress wages for workers by drastically reducing their options to move for a better offer and suppress innovation by preventing workers from moving to innovative startups. They are effectively forced on workers by employers who are in a much stronger negotiating position at hiring time. Any agreement that an employee has to enter in order to begin employment is effectively made under duress. Given that the alternative to the prospective employee is unemployment and destitution, that a lot of duress."
Charles	"As an employed physician, geographic non-competes mean I have to leave my city if I want to take a different job or open my own practice. This hurts both employees with similar non-competes, patients and other medical workers."
Tricia	"I have family and friends who have found themselves struggling to gain new employment out of fear of reprisal due to a non-compete. They remain unemployed supported by govenunent unemployment benefits or take lesser paying jobs as "temporary" fix to tie them over until they can look for a job in earnest in their field of expertise. It is abhorrent to see people suffer in not being able to care themselves and their family because of the restrictions a former employer places upon them to find gainful employment after a departure. The non-competes I have seen include phrases that the separation could be for cause or not cause and no lesser application of the mandate even if the employee worked at the company for as little as one day. People are handcuffed to sign it or face not being offered the position or terminated. The companies say it is a choice, but it's not a choice in practicality when people NEED to work, and when an individual objects, die response is "it's non-negotiable."
Paul	I'm a medical director of an anesthesia practice in Austin, Texas and can attest to noncompetes being a terrible detriment to physicians. We are unduly restricted by corporations with in-house legal teams that come over the top like a tsunami if a physician attempts to extricate themself from restrictive covenants. Furthermore, we are unable to get market salaries like professionals who work for Google and Mehta just a stone's throw from our hospitals. US citizens should not be enslaved by corporations. We should all have the right to leave our jobs and pursue greener pastures. Noncompetes only repress people and their pay while corporations prosper. Please protect physicians too."
John	"Please ban non compete clauses. They are unfair."
India	"Non-compete clauses for physicians are arbitrary since there are no "trade secrets" in the practice of medicine. This should extend to include not for profit hospitals as well since they employ a large number of physicians. Businesses should be incentivized to treat their employees well if they want to keep them. I am a doubled boarded physician."
John	"I am a physician and have seen first hand how hospitals and other large practices use non-competes as leverage to control physicians, stifle competition and wages, and hurt patients who are often left confused when their physician of many years suddenly disappears. There are no trade secrets that companies need to protect by the use of non-competes with physicians. Please ban non-compete clauses and allow the market to work freely!”

Terry	“As an ER physician non compete clauses have been a pain in many of myself and my colleague's experiences - I work and live in Austin where realistically there are only 2 big ER groups here and we are unable to work for any other groups in this area. This essentially limits ER physicians in choosing one or the other and if they have families in the area and they either have to completely change jobs and relocate the family or never leave their current job no matter if there is better pay or opportunities nearby. This is highly detrimental to the work force and unfairly keeps people trapped in their positions mainly because of a fear of not being able to find work in the immediate area or cannot afford to do so at the cost of moving an entire family. If there is a fear of trade secrets being exposed then companies already have a way around this with NDA's, there is absolutely no reason to not give people more freedom to find jobs that better fit them.”
Catherine	“I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage . Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people.”
Anne	“ I'm glad to hear that and I'm happy to hear the noncompete clause is being challenged.”
Khoa	“I am a physician with a non-compete clause with my employer. I feel that given this, I am unable to serve the rest of my community should I choose to leave my group. I am an anesthesiologist who takes care of patients. I do not take or hold anything proprietary from the company that I work for. Therefore, a non-compete clause does not do anything to protect the company. It only forces us to work for them indefinitely. Thus, we are all trapped by a big corporation. I am definitely against non-compete clauses and look forward to the dismantling of this.”
Hans	“I am IN FAVOR of banning non-compete clauses -- this is an easy win for the average worker, since non-competes have grossly outgrown their initial uses. The fact that sandwich shops are using them to prevent minimum wage workers from getting other jobs is just wrong. Being able to let our corporations to compete with each other fairly for the best talent is the ideal way to keep our democracy and economy healthy.”
Jack	“Generally there is no justification for non-compete requirements. They actually just allow employers to keep wages artificially lower than the market would dictate.”
Aaron	“Non-compete clauses are Un-American, non competitive, and anti-capitalist. Therefore, they should be banned.”
Jesse	“Non-compete clauses are being used to mislead workers and limit freedom of choice. Non-compete clauses should be illegal. A standard NDA is enough to keep proprietary secrets safe. Non-compete clauses hurt the economy by keeping good workers in bad jobs. My sister-in-law was sexually assaulted at work but was stuck in the job due to having signed a non-compete. She is a single mother and could not afford to be out of work so she had to stay in a dangerous and abusive job run by criminals.”

Stephanie	“Non-compete agreements have been shown to stifle innovation and entrepreneurship, as individuals with valuable skills may be deterred from leaving their current employment to work for other companies, start their own business, or join a startup. The proposed rule by the Federal Trade Commission Non- Compete Clause Rule (NPRM) is a step in the right direction towards protecting employees rights and promoting a competitive job market. The rule, which aims to limit the use of non-compete agreements, recognizes the negative impact that these agreements can have on employees and the broader economy. While there may be some trade-offs to limiting non-compete agreements, such as potentially decreasing the value of companies that rely on them, these should not come at the expense of workers' rights and economic growth. These types of contracts can be particularly harmful in fields like biotech where knowledge and experience are highly specialized and limited to a few companies. Restricting skilled workers from leaving employment stifles competition and innovation. As a scientist, preventing me from using my experience to further my professional career strips any value away from me as an employee if I were to ever leave my current company or field. Non-competes are too broad, and even when unenforceable, elicits fear from the employee and any other businesses from engaging in new employment for fear of potential retaliation. Overall, non-compete agreements are harmful to workers, restrict job mobility, and hinder innovation and entrepreneurship.”
Jason	‘For doctors ; noncompete will hurt patients and patients care. Doctors will end up most of the time unable to find a job in the area if the leave their current employer and they will be forced to leave to another city to find a job Employer provide no intellectual right with the hired doctors as most of the time they didn't participate or helped in his training or skills in the past . The opposite, doctors are the one who build the employer reputation. Noncompete creates mental, financial and logistic hurdles for all partners in the healthcare system .”
Eileen	“Workers need to have this rule repealed. If a worker has access to trade it company secrets, those employees usually get compensated for their non compete clause if invoked. It is just wrong and bad policy to stop people who don't have access to those secrets to non compete clauses. If the company wants to tie up the employee with a clause, make it two way. The employer must pay the salary of the employee for the length of the clause if enforced. Otherwise, this is modern salvers and must be stopped.”
Sara	“Non-compete clauses as used today have a single purpose which is to promote corporate control over markets by preventing competition. This severely limits the consumer's right to choose where they would like to obtain services and goods. It also limits the availability of highly specialized services causing harm to the community. For example, I work in an highly specialized field of veterinary medicine and, as such, I provide a high demand service. I was trained through an internship and residency program, not provided by my employer and had many years of experience in the field before taking my most recent position. I know no trade secrets, I practice high quality veterinary specialty medicine and have no ownership in the company. For the majority of specialists in my field patients are waiting months to be seen. I recently left a job in a large metropolitan area that we wish to continue to live in. I had a non-complete clause that we negotiated heavily, but yet, there managed to be very vague wording that severely limits my ability to practice in the area without risking legal action. So, rather than being able to provide much needed specially care to patients, I am watching patients dying on a waitlist to see the single, corporate owned practice in the area. This is not beneficial to anyone, least of all the pets and owners who are having to wait to be seen for life-threatening disease that could be managed for some time if diagnosed promptly. I fully support the ban on non-competes, as it truly would open a free market society and prevent corporations from gaining even more control over the market than they already have."

Ryan	"As a physician in Austin, TX, I believe this proposal is of critical importance to our future in this world of corporate medicine."
Michelle	"I strongly support die FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement."
Lauren	"I am a surgeon and an independent contractor . I am 12 years into my career and originally ran my own practice. I joined a group without a noncompete. Three years later this group has been purchased by a private equity corporation which has brought its own contracts to the table. Even after heavy negotiation, I signed a new contract to continue as an independent contractor with a 10 mile radius 3 year noncompete which would knock out a large part of my city and the area closest to my home. I have a family. children, and a husband who owns a company within this same city. I am still frustrated. By definition, an independent contractor can do outside work. I receive no benefits from this company. I just receive income for surgery services per my contract percentage. This company is not spending money to market me, I am not learning a new business, no one is offering new training, no one is paying for continuing my education, and there are clearly no amazing trade secrets to be learned. I am bringing value to them as a seasoned well established surgeon. They bought the group and continue to pay me for my services. There is no case for a noncompete to be enforceable. Problem is, this corporation has deep pockets and I am one person. Taking a noncompete to court would cost tens of thousands if not more and would cost me lost income as I wait for a ruling. It's the perfect David and Goliath intimidation/bullying scenario that harms professionals such as myself. Physicians generally don't make the income we made in the past. We don't have vast reserves of money to fight hospital systems and big corporations/PE fines. These systems generally add no value to our abilities and services and yet they are allowed to legally impose noncompetes. My contract is only valid for a year at which time they can opt to change my compensation to less or remain the same indefinitely because there will be no incentive to offer me more (despite my production, good will or changing times/inflation) because they know they have me trapped geographically and socially. I understand that some practices bring people in who are not established in a city/community and spend money to the tune of many thousands to on board a doctor, market them, buy special ized

	equipment that only serves that doctor, and credentials them. Is that typically worth a $300k or $500k or more buyout? Not at all. I'd suggest a system to account in real dollars for a noncompete buyout that makes sense. Invoices that prove out the investment in the professional. Allow the doctor a low interest loan or no interest loan for the onboarding upfront. Or, create a noncompete buyout dollar value that actually reflects the money invested. Don't want a doctor leaving and moving across the street? Create a 1-3 mile noncompete for one year. Even 10 miles can knock out a city for practice. Doctors are in more debt generally than ever before coming out of med school and are now being paid less. We need to make life and career fair for them and their families. Stop allowing unfair noncompete practices to continue to harm us. These are already legal gray zones. Funn them up and limit the reach. It's far past time for this. Stop large practices, hospital systems and private equity groups from continuing to control and suck us as dry as they dare for every last dollar."
Aruna	"Am a physician with a 30 mile non-compete clause. This means if I am no longer a good fit for the company I work with I essentially have to relocate and my patients would have to find a new physician in an area where appointment times can take 6+ months or more for pulmonologists. This punishes elderly patients with chronic medical conditions for whom travel is limiting. Please get rid of these non-competes as they hurt patients and physicians"
Alexander	"I strongly support the proposed FTC rule change banning non-competes. Non-compete clauses stifle competition and cause real economic and social damage and distress to the many workers are essentially forced to accept them as a condition of employment."
Rachel	"Non-compete clauses should be illegal. Job changes are a frequent part of life and people should not be punished because their company is concerned they will lose clients. If they are really so concerned they have an inferior product, then the company should focus their efforts on creating something better. This way everyone benefits."
Samuel	"It was a little more than four years ago that I was hired by a large physician group following completion of my five year general surgery residency and an additional one year fellowship. At the time I was recruited, I was told that their goal was to build a multi-disciplinary 'Center of Excellence' within the next five years which would allow me to have "at least" a 50% focus on my sub-specialty. Given the needs of the group, I agreed to continue seeing patients with other surgical needs, and was told I would be expected to do "some" endoscopy. I liked the leadership and the partners, and ultimately, signed a contract that included a covenant not to compete, which was non-negotiable. I relocated my family and my practice grew rapidly...but it became evident fairly early on that the job was not what was advertised, and that the primary need of the group was for physicians who could perform colonoscopies, which was actually about 70% of the patients I saw in the office and the procedures I was expected to perform every week. On average, I would do between 70 to 80 of these a month, even though this is typically only a small portion of a general surgeon practicing in a major metropolitan area. Every effort I made to develop the role we initially discussed was met with push back by the same people who hired me, and I quickly realized that a change was necessary. Late last year, I was approached by the only major academic center in the city who offered me

	an incredible opportunity...a chance to practice 100% in my area of expertise, and to train medical students and residents. I jumped at the chance, but was soon met with disappointment as I was told by my employer that I either had to stop practicing for 12 months, or pay a six figure buyout of the restricted covenant. Seeing that I am still in the midst of digging out of a half a million dollars of medical school debt, this was a daunting decision, one with significant financial consequences, especially as I would be taking a pay cut in transitioning from private practice to teaching. It seems so unjust that a physician can join a practice under certain promises or communicated expectations about the role, and then have the employer fail to meet those or perhaps even change them after you've signed the contract and started the position. At this point, I have only two choices...move my family to comply with a restricted covenant or pay the buyout to take a dream opportunity. With that said, I was thrilled to hear that the Federal Trade Commission is considering banning these clauses. I believe it will force employers to compete for the skills we worked for over decades of training instead of holding us in professional hostage. I wholeheartedly agree with this decision and hope a ruling comes quickly. Thanks for your careful consideration and time."
K	"I completely support the ban of non-competes. They are prohibiting people from making a living doing what they know how to do. It also allows companies to threaten legal action if someone leaves for a competitor, thus making some employees feel trapped as they want to avoid legal action. Even in a state like Texas that is not keen on enforcement of non-competes, a TRO can still be ordered in the interim which could result in termination from their new employer. It needs to be clear that non-competes are now unenforceable across the board. I am unfortunately stuck in a very volatile company right now with a non-compete and a CEO who has personally threatened to take me to court if I leave for a competitor. I have seen him take other employees to court over the matter. It is also especially unfair to hold an employee to a non-compete when they have been laid off or fired. They didn't choose to leave but now have their hands tied from finding comparable pay and position that is following their career path they have already built. I am seeing the argument that this will allow the theft of trade secrets or intellectual property, however, those two subjects are already covered by the law. It is called theft. for a reason. It is also unfair to clients who may want to move their business to follow the employee. We shouldn't be allowed to tell buyers who they can and cannot work with. It is a free market and should be treated as such. In summary, these non-compete contracts allow for abuse of employees who are too afraid to leave, limitation of the free market, and career mobility. Regarding the M&A non-competes due to sale of a business, I don't have an opinion one way or another."
Samip	"Non-Competes serve as a hinderance to employees as they limit career options. This limitation is especially noticeable in skilled areas where these workers are in high demand. Restricting workers' options can suppress innovation and restrict economic growth."
Michael	"Please Ban non compete agreements."
Thomas	"I am very much in favor of this rule! It would help me enormously as an employee in a very competitive sector."

Emma	"I work in the mental health field, specifically in the emerging field of novel treatments for treatment resistant depression. As the fda approvals unroll to include psilocybin to the already approved ketamine, companies will continue to include non compete clauses that limit providers in their practice, often requiring clinicians to move out of their communities if they want to continue practicing without waiting the 2 years. I am in full support of this proposed rule to eliminate non competes and think if it remains in place it will greatly hinder the leaders of our field to continue to improve quality delivery models of care."
Aaron	"Non-Compete clauses are a terrible restriction on freedom, for both the worker and the market in general. Competition is good and is the fundamental reason that the US has been so successful over the years. Non-compete clauses can lock workers out of any advancement in a smaller market when the worker doesn't have the option to move out of the area. This is not a free market, this strips those freedoms away. Please ban non-compete clauses."
Carla	"Delegitimize all non- competes. They stifle workers and healthy competition."
Suneet	Physicians deserve the opportunity to be in charge of their own careers. Gathering expertise, determining what is in their best interest, and growing a practice is something that should be encouraged. It leads to practice excellence and innovation. Removal of non-compete clause rules from physician contracts is long overdue. Thank you for helping to make this a reality."
Laurie	"Dear Commissioners, I write in support of American workers who have been subjected to unfair and often devastating non compete clauses. If this trend of favoring corporate rights over the rights of individuals continues, democracy will surely die. It's already on life support. But you have the power to act against this injustice. I agree with Chair Lina Khan that "The freedom to change jobs is core to economic liberty and to a competitive, thriving economy." Please act now."
Daniel	"I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, as proposed in Matter No. P201200."
Amanda	"Non completes are terrible for patients, physicians , communities and the economy. I have personally been subject to a noncompete, which forced me to leave my patients and my family to travel to a different state to practice medicine. There is a physician shortage Banning physicians from working, because of noncompetes, isn't good for healthcare."
Jeanette	"I am a 30 year old in accounting profession . As someone who plans to start my own firm, I am worried how the non-compete will impact me and is a reason for delay in starting my own firm. This is economically a disadvantage to the U.S economy as research has shown that smaller firms give more back to local communities instead of big firms that more likely than not send their taxes abroad."
Chris	"I support eliminating non compete contracts."
Ilana	"Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care,

	inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market throes should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency."
Angel	"I am a physician and fully support a ban on non-compete clauses in healthcare. These are always targeted at physicians, yet many advanced practice providers such as nurse practitioners and physician assistants do not. Aside from the undue burden that physicians endure in having to move and uproot to get another job, most importantly many communities lose needed specialists in their area due to non compete clauses. This adversely affects the health of many communities, but physicians are often left with no choice. Thank you!"
Paula	"Non-Competes definitely need to be squashed. What employers can do is non-disclosure or language to prevent poaching clients. Non-completes prevent people from working. If an employer terminates employment for any reason, such as downsizing, the person terminated cannot find a job within a suitable distance. Non-competes greatly impact one's livelihood."
John	"Non-compete clauses are bad for the economy and bad for workers. I support eliminating them."
Lisa	"As a single mother of 2 daughters who I have raised on my own with less than 500.00/month in child support and for the first few years of their lives had to get help from the government to make ends meet between the cost of childcare and basic needs I am in full favor of banning non competes. 7 years ago for the first time in my life as a mother I was able to improve my sales skills in order to support my daughters and myself without any government assistance as well as make investments. The company I have been working for the last 7 years sold to a larger corporate company that forced us to sign a noncompete, but with doing so also lowered the commission rate. This has put my daughters (oldest daughter going into her senior year who wants to go into forensics/military) in a big bind. We and many others will benefit greatly to do away with non competes period."

Sondra	"I do not support non-compete clauses. It limits individual freedoms and by taking away competition limits career and salary advancement opportunities."
Hari	"Regarding: "Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" Restriction of medical professionals is not good for patient care and competitive marketplace for real service delivery is a must for healthy nation."
Charu	"I support eliminating non-compete clauses in physician contracts. We should be able to find the best job for our professional and personal lives and not be restricted by non-compete clauses that hinders appropriate workplace competition. This lack of competition has stagnated physician wages over the last several decades and is discouraging talented students to not join medicine."
Dax	"The FTC's proposed NPRM is welcomed but it does not go far enough; non-compete clauses should be banned without any exceptions whatsoever. There should be no doubt that such a contractual term is null and void and cannot ever be enforced for any reason. These contracts hold back innovation, reduce tax revenues, and undermine our ability to compete on equal footing in a world economy increasingly dominated by China. Competition is what creates vibrant products, technical innovation, and serves the national interest. Competition and associated profit motive is the spirit that drives the American economy. Why would we ever allow incumbent monopolists the power to engage in rent seeking behaviors that constrain wages, reduce innovation, and undermine American competitiveness to such an extent? There is a reason California leads the world in technical innovation despite its high taxes and expensive cost of living: among many other things, it simply bans non-competes as a matter of public policy. They cannot be enforced and everyone knows it. You can't recreate silicon valley in Massachusetts because, as smart as all the people there are and in spite of the excellent engineering talent available, noncompetes ensure there is not a free market for skilled labor. The simple fact of the matter is that noncompetes are not agreed to between equal parties. They are not agreed at all. It is a contract of adhesion. As an individual, at some point you must accept this unconscionable term of employment or you must starve. There is no room for an equal negotiation. An engineer or scientist or accountant or any professional of any kind is handed a pile of papers on the first day of employment and told 'sign or you're fired'. That's what happens. These are not agreements in the first place. To the extent that they are ever agreed, it is under duress. There is no true benefit or consideration paid to the engineer or professional party entering into a noncompete. Not only do noncompetes stifle technical innovation and reduce productivity (by keeping workers stuck in one position at one company under threat), but they also serve to artificially reduce worker wages and therefore reduce taxable income writ large. These clauses increase dependency on welfare by reducing worker wages, reduce government revenue by suppressing the tax base, and undermine technical competitiveness or innovation by holding workers in positions that underpay them or do not represent the best use of their technical skill. There is simply no good reason for these 'agreements' to exist or to be enforceable. Ban them. Leave no exceptions. Let the market work without monopolist distortion. We need to be able to compete against China more effectively. Noncompetes are holding us back in so many ways. They must go"

Matt	"I am in strong support of banning Non-compete clauses. This is just a way for companies to keep control over employees (current or former). If I left my company, I would have to drive 2+ hrs or move cities completely to stay in the same field I have built my career in."
Stephen	"I would like to voice my strong support for the Non-compete clause rule. Although I have seen these clauses abused by companies to restrict the mobility of low wage workers, even when they are not intended specifically to stifle worker mobility, this is the impact that they have. Workers acquire skills within a specific industry but become captive to their employer because they are unable to switch to a new job in the same industry without facing a period of unemployment for the duration of their non-compete clause. This also allows employers to pay lower wages and restricts the career earnings growth of workers. Employers have other options to protect their legitimate interests including NDAs, non-solicit agreements, and other agreements which specifically protect intellectual property without laying claim to the more general skills of a former employee."
Danielle	"As a hospital employed physician (at a "non-profit" hospital) the current culture of non-competes restricts where my family can live and work. As it stands, if I want to change jobs, I would have to uproot my entire family and disrupt my children's education. I know that hospitals want to be protected from doctors "taking patients away" but ultimately, our job is to serve patients and deliver health care. Doctors who can do their work in the settings that fit them best is best for patient care. In my case, I am a hospital employed physician who only sees patients in the hospital and cannot "take a group of patients" if I leave. There are other ways to protect the internal workings/policies/intellectual properties of institutions/companies that don't limit physicians/other employees and keep us from serving patients better. Please get rid of non-competes for ALL hospitals, not just non-profit hospitals."
John	"I am an independent business owner that recently started my own engineering firm in 2022. Mentors all made mention of making sure I didn't have a non-compete with my then current employer as I was planning my new venture. Not having one allowed me to pursue my entrepreneurial dreams and I would never enforce one on a future employee. Firms should attract and retain employees with their wages, benefits and culture. Firms should attract and retain their clients with pricing, service, and execution of promises. Non-competes are negative levers employers activate to allow them to, out of greed, complacency, and/or malice hold workers hostage from pursuing the American dream of starting a company (and running that company based on thick values). The reason I started my company was to be able to provide a higher level of service to my clients, for a lower price, with the personal benefit of better tax incentives afforded to business owners as well as a projection that my take home pay, if successful, would be much larger. The consumer of my product is benefitted with an additional selection in the marketplace, and my competitors may be forced to lower their prices to successfully compete. America's values have been and should remain as steadfast supporters of competition in a free market, and we should continue to the world with our citizens' (and immigrants') innovations! I look forward with great optimism towards the worlds of possibilities in all different sectors of business that will open up when the majority of workers are free to pursue the American Dream with one less hinderance! E Pluribus Unum, John (JP) Sullivan”

Elizabeth	“I support the Federal Trade Commission prohibiting the use of non-compete clauses with employees, and suggest that the FTC next turn its attention to non-solicitation clauses required by vendors in their contracts with customers. As for non-compete clauses, one of the things that Texas gets right is its historic opposition to and suspicion of non-compete clauses required by employers with employees, however enforcement here is sadly lacking and the practice continues unabated, with employees largely unaware of die probable unenforceability of the restrictions. Employers already have a sound and effective legally enforceable means of protecting their competitive commercial information that meets die criteria of trade secrets: non-disclosure agreements. The doctrine of "inevitable disclosure" even allows former employers in qualifying circumstances the pre-emptively restrict die subsequent employment of high-ranking executives whose follow-on job is so similar in role and responsibility to their previous role that a court agrees that there's no way to perform the subsequent job without improperly exploiting the trade secret information obtained from the prior employer. Trade secret doctrine already protects the competitive commercial information of employers who take the appropriate steps to protect such information. Non-compete agreements, on the other hand, require no evidence that the employee was in fact privy to trade secret information, bear no relation to the employer's efforts to otherwise protect its competitive commercial information, and severely economically penalizes employees for the sole act of seeking another job. The documented effect is a grossly anti-competitive impact to the labor market, with employees prevented from leaving low-paying, abusive, or dead-end employment without relocating themselves and their families to another geographic location or starting over in a different industry. Ironically, trade secret doctrine is more flexible in that it recognizes an employee's right to use their general skills and knowledge at a subsequent employer, regardless of the fact that they developed those general skills and knowledge while engaged in work for the former employer. I heartily welcome this proposed rule, and hope to see its restrictions applied both to employees and contractors, both of whom can be adequately restricted from improperly exploiting a prior employer's commercial trade secrets through proper use of NDAs.”
John	“Please adopt the non compete ban. Americans want to work, but are being banned from working by non-compete clauses.”
Thomas	“Companies already have a disproportionate amount of power over workers. If they want to lay you off, no notice is required across most of the nation. If you want to quit, you are supposed to give two weeks. There's already an imbalance in power. Interfering with someone's ability to work after they leave is wrong unless there is something VERY clearly proprietary that ONLY they understand. Just being in the same field or industry is not a reason to interfere with someone's ability to work. It would be awesome if the federal government at least pretended that they care about workers. Oppose non- compete requirements. It's bad for workers.”

Cynthia	"Non-compete clauses harm healthcare workers and only benefit the corporations. Please ban this so that corporations will treat healthcare workers better!"
Mike	"I oppose any mandatory Union or any other such mandatory membership. I support the right to work."
J	"When looking or fording a job, nothing should stop you. Including a company that has any sort of non compete clause. These are old fashioned and need to go away. Since when does a company get to dictate where you get to work? Old practices should go away. This should be removed across the board."
Tomek	"I would agree with the proposed rule in removing non-competes. I am a CPA and was forced to sign a do not compete with my employers, years after I had started working for them. I would say it was the mid-point of my 13 years with the CPA firm. I recently made the tough decision in switching CPA firms due to the lack of upward mobility and wages that were below market. This switch meant that I could not keep by client base without significant compensation paid back to the former CPA film, for the most part this was outside my means. So I decided it was better to start over and rebuild a client base versus being stuck in a less then ideal situation. I was unable to communicate with any client, which left them in a less than ideal position as tax season rolls around and they are without their preferred tax professional. Even if they want to leave my prior employer, they can not choose anyone at my current firm to prepare their taxes without ME compensating my prior employer. This puts them in an less then ideal position due to the fact that my prior employer has communicated that they do not have anyone to service them at the moment, but they will eventually get someone to help them. So their choice is stay with a firm that may not be able to prepare the work, or find someone new that they are unfamiliar with to prepare their returns. So the do not compete has impacted my former client base more than it has impacted me, and that seems to be the biggest negative impact in me switching CPA firms. I do have to rebuild a client base, but they have to fmd someone new that has to be taught the in's and out's of their financial lives. There is a lot of trust that goes into that, and outside anything they can control, they now have to fmd a new CPA they are comfortable working with."
Matthew	"I'm an Optometrist based out of Amarillo, Texas. I worked at a local 2-doctor clinic for five years from 7/2017-7/2022. I decided to leave this office due to shady owners and a poor work environment, but, I had a non-compete clause for 1 year spanning 'Smiles from die zip-code the office was in. 15 miles from that zip code covers the entirety of Amarillo so if I left I would have to travel for work for an entire year. I ended up accepting an offer across town that serves a completely different type of demographic with a start date beginning after the non-compete period is finished. I'm 6 months through the non- compete and I've had to drive 2 hours to work in Lubbock a couple days out of the week to be able to afford student loan payments. Meanwhile the previous practice only has to pay 1 doctor's salary and is booked out several weeks ahead because there are only so many places that accept medicaid. My new practice does not take medicaid. This non-compete period has been entirely unnecessary and had caused my family and I all sorts of undue stress. I made my old employer a lot of money and they're still profiting off of the large volume of patients I took care of while I was there. There was no intensive investment they made in me besides credentialing in the very beginning. Employees should be able leave poor workplace conditions without having to travel out of town to make ends meet. In parts of the country a 15mile non-compete can really mean the closest demand for certain types of work can be 125 miles away, as in my situation."

Christi	"I strongly oppose noncompetes in healthcare for any workers. I am a physician and noncompetes affect physician mobility and pay which causes access problems for patients and encourages businesses to neglect their workers."
Bob	" I am an insurance agent in Texas, and am currently negotiating with my employer to release a non-compete agreement. I have experienced firsthand the last few months that this non-compete agreement hinders me significantly in regards to forming a new business. Ideally I would like to start my own insurance agency but am currently prevented from doing so due to a non-compete clause. We are already somewhat limited in employment opportunities here in rural West Texas, and additional restriction narrows that down even further. I'm finding it difficult to find a path to provide for my family during the two year period, and therefore am considering scrapping the new business idea and remaining at my current job. I truly believe that this rule or an alternative could be beneficial to me and countless others as well as the economy in general. In a sense, I feel trapped at my current job, and ultimately I feel hobbled from achieving my full potential as a future small business owner."
Robin	"I support doing away with non-compete clauses and allowing workers more freedom to seek better jobs and higher wages."
Rami	"Should ban the rule agree with FTC."
Jeremy	"I think this absolutely helps Americans who are struggling with unhealthy work environments. People who want to leave for competitive pay and better standards of living should not have to worry about lawsuits from former companies."
Jon	"As a physician , I am currently working for a private equity-hacked corporation. The contract that has to be signed for employment is extremely restrictive, limiting potentially my employment options solely because the private equity-backed corporation has invested or theoretical interests in groups nationally. This puts all the power in the private equity company hands and gives me severe theoretical and potential hann to career possibilities."
Eric	"Non-compete clauses are unAmerican. They limit people's ability to improve their employment opportunities, and wages."
Kevin	"I support the Non-Compete Clause Rule that is being proposed by the FTC. Non-compete clauses are an anti-competitive practice that should not be legal. I believe that free markets should dictate the value of labor, and employers preventing their employees from seeking employment elsewhere only serves to drive down employee wages. The passing of this rule would create a direct positive impact on my life. My fiancé is training to become a physician, and non-compete clauses are common in the medical field. Oftentimes, physicians are forced to uproot their family's lives and move out of town if they want to seek employment elsewhere. Not only is this damaging to the personal lives of the physician and their ftnnily members, it is also damaging to the health of the physician's patients who no longer have access to their physician. Non-compete clauses should be illegal and all existing clauses should be immediately voided."

Ben	"Non-competes are anti-competitive and in general in opposition to the American way of life. We can't keep letting corporations use these to clamp down on individuals that oppose them. This is how these are used in actuality despite what the original purpose of non-competes was. Please get rid of all non-competes to allow for more competition and more mobility between jobs. They do more harm than good."
Nadia	"This would be an excellent rule for nurse practitioners especially those living in small communities or underserved rural communities."
Bruce	"Getting rid of non-competes is a great idea. I've been unable to change jobs due to a competitor due to fear of legal action. This also caused me to stay in the same position and not realize my actual worth for far too long."
Chris	"Please stand with healthcare workers and support us against unnecessary sanctions and retaliations. I was fired from an independent pharmacy and had to live under a non-compete for 2 years. This was in West Texas in a sparsely populated area. I was fired because according to the boss "our visions didn't align". His vision was selling the pharmacy I had helped build with the promise of ownership at 2 years six months and he fired me at 2 years 4 and a half months. He then sold the pharmacy 2 months after firing me and then passed my non-compete on to the new owners and still threatened me with a civil lawsuit if I visited the offices of doctors/nurses in the town I worked in. The new ownership did not run the business as well as when I was in charge and caused a mass exodus of customers and the doctors ended up finding me anyway. I understand the owner has the right to fire for any reason but the fact that I was then open to potential lawsuits and litigation after pouring myself into the business seemed cruel and unreasonable. Please end this trapping of healthcare workers into unsatisfying positions and allow us to move about freely without retaliation! Thanks for reading!"
Greg	"To whom it may concern, I am writing to express my strong support for abolishing noncompete agreements. As someone who has experienced the negative impact of such agreements firsthand, I believe it is time to take action to protect the rights of workers in all industries. For 23 years, I worked as a medical device representative for Johnson and Johnson. Like many employees, I signed a noncompete agreement when I started my job in 1999. At the time, I didn't think much of it - I was excited to have a job and didn't want anything to jeopardize my employment. However, over the years, I saw the power dynamic between employers and employees shift as noncompete agreements became more common. Instead of being a mutually beneficial agreement, it felt like companies were using noncompete agreements to control their employees and limit their career options. In my case, Johnson and Johnson reduced my income four times over the years. When they implemented a 25% pay cut, I knew it was time to leave. But because of my noncompete agreement, it was difficult to find another job in my field. Even though I was willing to relocate and take a lower salary, I was limited by the terms of my agreement. This is a common experience for workers in many industries. Noncompete agreements

	restrict employees' ability to find new jobs and negotiate better salaries. They give all the power to the companies and limit workers' options, making it difficult to leave a job even if it is no longer a good fit. I believe that noncompete agreements are unfair and should be abolished. Workers should have the freedom to pursue their careers and negotiate their salaries without fear of being limited by an agreement they signed years ago. Companies should not be able to use noncompete agreements to control their employees or limit their options. I urge you to support legislation that would abolish noncompete agreements and protect the rights of workers in all industries. It is time to take action to create a fair and just employment system that benefits everyone involved."
Whitney	"Noncompete agreements are unfair and exploitative. They should be illegal."
Melissa	"I am for making the Non-Compete Clause Rule. This past September I was suddenly fired after coming forward about sexual harassment I was receiving. I was fired less than a week later. I have attempted several times to have a lawyer take my case on a contingency, but there's a possibility my past employer will not pay the lawyer fees due to being bankrupt, so no lawyer will take my case. Since then, I have been sent a Cease and Desist letter by my past employer. In this letter, he tried to add an additional clause to the non-compete I had already signed in the past when I had been hired. I did not respond to the Cease & Desist letter because my past employer is trying to prevent me more from working for others. Not only has he sent this letter, he has emailed via other accounts, stalked me on social media, and lied to my past clients about my reason for being fired. I hope this rule passes so that myself and many others can find decent paying jobs, without the harassment of past employers."
Katrina	"I agree with the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule for several reasons. Most importantly, non-compete clauses are often misunderstood and "buried" in confidentiality or employment agreements on or before an employee's hire date. Secondly, in instances where used for positions non-related to sales, business development, or intellectual property companies are wrongly holding front line and technical employees "hostage" in an effort to hurt their competition's hiring abilities. Lastly, employers in states where at-will employment is the norm, companies are attempting to "have their cake and eat it too" by entering into what essentially becomes an employment contract when including a non-compete clause, yet wielding the so called "at-will" rights over employees. In my over 14 year career in Human Resources, I have seen first hand instances of companies tricking employees into signing documents containing a non-compete clause before they even start their first day of employment. Imagine being excited for the job offer from the company you have been hoping to go to work for and receiving an electronic batch of numerous documents to e-sign from direct deposit information to confidentiality agreements and handbooks. You excitedly sign and return only to find later you are now caught in a non-compete agreement preventing you from working in the same industry for another employer. Companies who hold their employees hostage with non-compete agreements in an attempt to hurt their competition by removing a group of skilled candidates have no pressure to treat their current employees in a safe, fair and professional environment, forcing them to

	often endure subpar work environments and wages in order to avoid risking the income needed to take care of their families. Companies using non-compete agreements for the majority of their workforce should not be allowed to mention "at-will" employment in any of their policies with those employees including employment and new hire paperwork, employee handbooks, and employee training. If an employee is under "at-will" status they have the right to leave their employment at any time, with or without notice and should be allowed to then go to work for another company in the same industry without fear of recourse. Many non-competes would not hold water in a court of law but companies know they can scare people into compliance with the threat of lawsuits, lawyers and exorbitant legal fees that an out-of-work person cannot afford. These same companies also know they can scare their competition into submission with the threat of legal action when one of their former employees is hired. Finally, it is a completely unfair practice toward any front-line, hourly or lower salaried worker. These are hard working people that simply want to make a living and if another company is offering something better than the first company should have taken better care of them rather than holding non-competes over their heads. Thank you for your consideration."
Matthew	"Fully support the proposition. I am unable to start a consulting company in the field I work in, due to a non-compete. I do receive a yearly bonus for the acceptance of the contract. My question is, does this quid pro quo preclude my ability to exercise the provisions if this is passed?"
David	"Companies with bad business models should not be kept solvent through wage suppression and employment intimidation through NCAs. NCAs hurt competition, workers, and are susceptible to abuse and abusive practices by employers. Living in a small rural community makes it infinitely more difficult to change employers operating in bad faith due to NCAs. Please ban and rescind the use of NCAs so this abusive practice ends."
Rizwan	"I strongly support banning non-compete clause. It works against community benefit and strengthens big institutions' monopoly. Talented employees lose their freedom of work with it. US government please go for banning the non-compete clause."
Jorge	"I am currently in Texas under a non-compete clause. It is 50-mile-radius! That means that if I don't work for them I have to move to a different city even though my family remains here. It significantly limits my options."
Jesus	"I have to say that this is the best policy decision that the Federal Trade Commission has made in the past 20+ years, let alone the last few years. This would be a huge win for labor rights and ultimately the economy at large. The Federal Trade Commission should go even further and do something about the irresponsible Supreme Court case that can shoulder the costs of a company resulted from a labor strike onto striking workers."
Sterling	"I support banning non-compete clauses. I am a physician and non-competes are standard in employment contracts for my specialty, and I agree that they have driven down wages."
Maria Teresa	I am a physician in El Paso TX and my coworkers and I have a non-compete clause that prevents us from being able to expand our services in an already underserved area. Furthermore, to (change) our individual contract with our current employer to allow more flexibility to the non-compete clause is nearly impossible, and to cancel the non-compete one must request this to the CEO/Founder of the national company we work for. Non-competes are hurting the communities we want to expand services to and it should definitely be prohibited in the healthcare field to providers. Please help us to continue and expand services much needed to the population. Thank you so much for hearing our requests! Caring Physicians in El Paso, TX.”

Kristine	“Appreciate the review of NPRM specifically for physicians . With the current non-compete rules, physicians (MDs/DOs) cannot work and support the community they are located in because they are "owned" by one particular company. There are NO trade secrets in the career of a physician. Allowing doctors to work wherever and how ever much they may want will improve access to care. We are all humans. Having a physician see you or your loved one in a reasonable time can alleviate clinical progression of an illness, improve suffering. Please remove non-compete clause rules for MDs and DOs.”
Thomas	“I support the FTC intent to ban non-compete clauses. It is an unfair practice that is designed to stifle the freedom of a worker to choose the best workplace for themselves. This is my own personal opinion.”
Rachel	“As a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine , practicing in the state of Texas, it would be amazing if you would end non competes. These have plagued my profession and prevented colleagues from working near their homes and home towns for years. Please end these controlling restrictions. The whole Veterinary community has their eyes on this ruling hoping you will do away with non competes.”
Mel	“The non-compete clause is like a Damocles sword over employees - it stifles competition and renders employees unable, in some cases from Non-Compete clause is like a Damocles sword over employees- it stifles potential and renders employees helpless in some situations to better their situation - why should a non-compete clause prevail in a "Free" economic society?”
Cristina	“I'm a NP and have some thoughts on this. Non-compete clauses are predatory as many physicians (even corporations) do still to this day exploit Nurse Practitioners and get them to sign contracts that won't let them safely (financially) leave. The equivalent is when hospital systems were giving away cars and 20k sign on bonuses up front to bedside nurse staff for several years of service where they would be sued if they left before the service time line. Many NP's are overworked and miserable in working conditions that are dangerous to their license and the patients they serve in non-compete contracts. Non-competes should be done away with. It speaks volumes for employees to stay in a position for an extended period of time without a non-compete and that should be the standard. People should be able to evaluate turn over without non-competes when applying for work, and employers should be able to evaluate themselves, if an employer needs to exploit someone to get employees, that speaks for itself. Best, Cristina Quinones MSN, APRN, ACNPC-AG.”
Kevin	“Non-compete clauses cause great hardship on workers, forcing them often to move, incurring great expense. The "buyout" clause is often for an unreasonable amount. The justification for these is ostensibly to protect "trade secrets" that are more often than not common knowledge and not "secret", so therefore these clauses serve to just restrict trade and competition. Moreover, the time period (i.e. 2-3 years) required is often unreasonable. The end result is that the worker upon having his/ her contract terminated is deprived of the ability to continue working to make a living."

SCOTT	"I fully support getting rid of non-compete clauses. The clauses result in protection of business entities over the happiness of the workers. Those businesses are already bigger than the people they hope to oppress."
Karmen	"Please end non compete agreements. It hurts hard working citizens that have excelled in a certain trade that are forced to work in unsatisfactory work places. We cannot afford the lawsuit that follows, but the business owner can. I am on the brink of losing my ability to continue to work within my professional niche due to a non compete agreement. I put up with two years of a frustrating work environment and couldn't do it any longer. Please help. - Karmen, a registered nurse from El Paso, TX."
JakeJake	"Please get rid of the non-compete clause. It is not right to the people."
Sunil	"I wanted to thank the FTC for beginning the process for removing non-compete agreements. I spent my entire career in the corporate world , and my experience is that this tool was used to limit competition, and ultimately to fewer options for employees. My key points are as follows 1. Non-compete's area pro incumbency tool, one that stifles competitiveness, which in turn is bad for our economy, and individual employees. 2. It consumes labor in creating and enforcing it: this labor is non productive. Our economic adversaries would marvel as these self inflicted wounds I applaud the FTC in moving forward in this important endeavor."
Joyce	"ONE IN FIVE Americans have been forced to sign noncompete agreements at the time they were hired, leaving these workers with lower wages and worse benefits. It's clear as day that noncompete agreements are bad for workers — but the Chamber of Commerce is demanding the FTC keep noncompete agreements legal. Please find against this ruling. People should have the right to work wherever they want to go after previous employment!"
Guillermo	"I signed a non-compete agreement in June 2018 when I was laid off. My employer at the time wrote the names of 33 companies I could not work for, for a period of 18 months. The severance package was only for 6 months. My life has not been the same since. While I was able to get a job in February 2020, I am not laid off again and had to sign yet another Non-compete. This madness has to end."
Kenan	"I for the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses."
Sylvan	"Non-compete clauses should be banned for all employees. They prevent worker from exercising one of the most important rights they have, the ability to seek better working conditions."
Carol	"I support this proposed rule by the FTC. It is an extremely positive step toward empowering employees to seek better opportunities and more secure financial stability."

Xavier	"Non-compete clauses should be abolished, especially in healthcare and hospitals. The hospital lobby falsely claim that hundreds of thousands of their physicians support non-compete clauses. Free competition and freedom to move is good for patients, healthcare workers, and the economy."
Patricia	"Get rid of noncompetes."
Dennis	"A person should never be prevented from making a living at what he is prepared to do."
Frank	"Non-compete clauses are unAmerican and biased against workers Eliminate this unfair practice."
Allen	"I am strongly in favor of eliminating non-compete clauses in contracts. I have witnessed first hand the destruction such clauses have wrought to our healthcare system. I am an emergency physician and by the very nature of my job interact with almost every medical specialty and department of our healthcare system including physician contract groups, hospital healthcare entities, and health insurers. I can tell you that non-competes dramatically increase the cost of healthcare to the average American and limit care to the most fragile of our great nation by tying die hands of physicians who would otherwise seek to expand their patient base to serve more people. Specific examples include draconian non-competes for the most sought after specialist to limit which hospital they can see their patients. These corporate groups then use this leverage against health insurers and hospitals to force ludicrous compensation for executives and limit the pay to the actual practicing physician specialists. A prime example of a corporate group that uses this business model is Mednax. Mednax has an entire business model built on the use of non-competes to limit availability of critical physician specialists while extracting huge sums from health insurers and hospitals. These costs are passed on to the average American. The way this works is a physician specialist signs a Mednax contract that includes a draconian non-compete. As time moves on, the physicians pay is decreased while the demand for the specialist services dramatically increases due to population expansion. The physician attempts to leave Mednax or at least expand their care by adding hours with another hospital or group but because of the non-compete, they are told they can not. The physicians that do are relentlessly pursued by legal and forced into submission as a means to scare the rest of physicians who have very little legal knowledge. Mednax then negotiates by maintaining the limit on these services and thereby severely limiting care to populations that the physicians would otherwise seek to serve. My wife, a Pediatric Critical Care specialist physician, who cares for pediatric trauma, solid organ transplant, post open heart surgery, post open craniotomy surgery, and ECMO (heart lung bypass), narrowly avoided such a draconian Mednax contract which has trapped many of her colleagues. She now travels between three hospital systems because the demand is so great and Mednax has limited physicians with similar talents and experience to a single hospital system. It is absolutely tragic what these patients are put through. The contract which her colleagues signed (and I prevented her from signing) called for a 2 year non-compete in a 50 mile radius with a buy out of 2 years of salary! Thus, if any specialist wanted to leave Mednax to serve more patients they could not without moving out of the city

	more than 2 years or paying 2 years of salary. Even then, Mednax has used legal means to pursue specialist that return after two years and essentially harass those specialist. My wife was verbally threatened by Mednax attorneys when she refused the contract and told they would work to prevent her practice in in the city by leveraging the healthcare entities they "controlled." This is insane! We worked hard to care for patients, not become indentured servants to fill the coffers of corporate scumbags who make money by limiting care to the populations we serve! Please help us! If you need examples, her colleagues could provide many."
Gardner	"I strongly support the elimination of non compete employment clauses particularly in regards to charter schools. Such clauses are a violation of the original intent of charter schools."
Craig	"Noncompete agreements help corporations, and hurt workers. In a free enterprise system, there will always be a tension between die worker and the boss. If the boss could do all the work himself, he would not need the worker. Yet to make as large a profit as possible, the boss wants to pay the worker as little as possible. If the boss alone controls how much a worker gets paid, then the worker most likely will get paid too little. The result is that many corporations try to keep worker pay down as low as possible. But if worker pay is too low, societal instability is the result. Past instances of this kind of instability is the cause for the existence of the USA. On thing that lowers this instability is when workers are free to move to better paying jobs if their skills merit it. Noncompete agreements prevent this, and therefor hurt workers, eventually increasing social instability. The only reason these agreements exist is to help corporations keep pay to workers low. A secondary result of noncompete agreements is the slowing or preventing of worker-generated innovation. I support making noncompete agreements illegal - it will be better for workers, and in the long run, make businesses stronger."
Madeleine	"This is an excellent way to protect workers. As a physician, I have been personally affected by this punitive rule. It forces workers to stay in unjust employment situations, because to leave would mean moving their entire family, from their homes and communities. It allows employers to hold its employees hostage."
Cathy	"Non compete clauses are unethical, and remain a tool used by large corporations to limit competition. I agree with making them illegal."
John	"I entered into a non-compete at 35 years old to gain employment. 10 years later I have had an offer to join a competing business. The non-compete has caused discussions to stall. The effect is the loss of increased income and professional opportunities to elevate myself in the industry. A lot has changed in my life over the last 10 years as children have grown older and we are now looking at colleges. Increases in living costs have also continued to increase at a faster pace than income increases. The threat of enforcement of my non-compete is costing me an opportunity I've worked 20 years to achieve."
Lauren	"Strongly favor the ban on non competes. As a physician in an underserved specialty and location, noncompetes not only limit my productivity, but more importantly limit patient access to high quality medical care."

M	"As a physician, a noncompete is unethical and allows corporations to rule over providers and the care they provide. The options are to comply or to completely uproot your life as the noncompetes are usually extremely prohibitive."
R	"Absolutely non-compete clauses should be rendered moot. This is LONG overdue."
derek	"I've owned companies in the specialty finance sector for 2 decades and used non-competes as a basic tenet of my employment agreements. That said, prior to me starting my own firms I was an employee and operated under these agreements and felt they were unfair and limited my ability to move forward in the industry. Eventually I was able to negotiate a release and move out on my own, but it was not easy and most people will not be able to achieve it - I was lucky. As a result I've tried to have basic fairness in my agreements with my employees and contractors and thus tremendously limited the scope to which I held people. For example, I only require 1 yr, vs the more common 2 years, and the language in my agreements effectively makes it just a non-solicitation of customers. To be clear, I support removing non-competes and agree that many companies use it to unfairly control employee's. I am under a nc currently from selling a company (now that I DO feel is fair) and will be starting a new firm in approximately 1 year. I am 100% confident in utilizing only a non solicitation clause and removing any connotation of a nc - its unnecessary. The actual desire to protect confidential information can be done in other ways such as the one mentioned, as well as creating better work places, paying people better, and finding competitive advantages in other similar ways to retain employees such as profit sharing, flexible work spaces, locations and times, and vacation time to name a few."
Nishant	"Physician here Affected by and have lived thru non compete clause Was practicing in small town Texas, employed by the local hospital. Unforgettable the work environment was toxic with low pay. As the only doctor in town, I had to leave the town due to non compete clause. 3 years later and still there is no physician in town Non competes will dramatically help reduce physician shortages inn rural areas."
Justin	"I heavily support this rule. Non-compete clauses are routinely abused and used to keep low-wage workers from finding better employment. This rule will enhance job mobility and greatly benefit workers. I might suggest adding a provision about lower worker pay after the compliance date. I could potentially see a scenario where an employer argues a portion of wages or bonuses were contingent on a non-compete clause."
Cody	"The non compete really limits you to improve your career. I am being sued over a non compete currently and these big corporations think that they own you. I had an offer from a great company to join their team and now the I have to fight for my livelihood to support my family. The great company that hired me was order to fire me a week into my transaction due to the non compete. They refused to let me go and now they are being sued currently as well. How is this good for anyone to have in place and needs to be banned!"

YU	"When it comes to Healthcare providers , we have shortage of primary care and mental health professionals. Noncompete clauses further decrease access to those providers."
Sunil	"I support eliminating non compete agreements as it doesn't benefit the worker. I was impacted by this when I was changing jobs a few years back. I had to spend money to see lawyers and cover my bases to make sure a huge corporation does not come for me and my family. It was an extremely stressful time for us and unnecessary because these companies make you sign a non compete agreement even though you might not be privy to any proprietary or confidential information. These multi million dollar companies make enough profit and it is about time some of it is passed on to the workers who actually do the work."
Robert	"These favor large companies at the expense of small working men and women! It's dumb and unamerican."
Lorissa	"We have a physician shortage. This seems like a small and easy piece to solving the shortage puzzle."
Dr.	"I am a physician who lives and works close by where he grew up. I currently work for a private equity company and given my current noncompete I am effectively stuck in the current job that I work in unless I move far away. It is unfortunate given that I have many patients who I have worked with for years and trust me that I would effectively have to abandon to move on to a new job. My current job has recently stopped matching our 401K thus hurting my prospects of retirement. They did not give any reason for doing so. Our overall productivity is not down and they are not paying staff anymore than before. It appears they are simply trying to squeeze more profits out of their clinics. Additionally, we will start losing our staff soon as they can get better benefits elsewhere. They also pay us a lower rate than what is standard for my profession in the area but I did not have any other reasonable options when I took this job given that corporations such as the one I work for keep buying practices. These clauses trap physicians into jobs that they cannot get out of while holding their patients hostage. I have parents and in-laws that we have to take care of so moving would not only be financially difficult but socially as well. Historically physicians would stick with a practice because they would eventually be offered partnership but given the private equity take over this option has been removed. Now that I am more established I have the knowledge to start my own practice with a large loan but am unable to. Additionally, I have considered joining the local medical school to teach students and residents but am unable to as this falls within my noncompete."
Natalie	"I am 100% in favor of this both as a worker and as an employer."
Sylvia	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Jaeon	"I have been told that non profits would be excluded from this ban. Many healthcare systems are technically non profit but function as a for profit entity as can be seen especially in the Dallas Fort Worth metroplex. As an employee of a non profit health system, I am currently underpaid and unable to seek out other opportunities for 5 years due to a strict non compete clause. I would strongly encourage the FTC to not exclude non profits like large health systems who employ tens of thousands of workers from the non compete ban."

Tamara	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses! My husband has been a working as a striper in the pavement and asphalt business for 20+ years. This is a very skilled trade that takes years to master. His current employer is asking their employees to sign a Non-Compete agreement wherein they could not work for any competitor, start a competing business, etc. for 1 year after being terminated or quitting and for a 200 mile radius. This would absolutely bankrupt us if he signs it! This type of contract is in no way mutually beneficial and frankly, other than the current employer I cannot see how this benefits anyone, the economy, fair trade, etc. We find this unfair in that this would require him to change his trade and basically his affiliation with the the industry he knows, which at this stage in our lives is a totally unreasonable expectation. Please consider passing this ban in order to allow workers, especially at the trade level, to seek out better paying jobs without having to move large distances or retrain. My feeling is a non-compete agreement really only makes sense at an executive leader level in large corporations where the employees have access to very confidential and potentially damaging information. I mean, really? Can you ask an electrician, doctor, nurse, painter, etc. to not work in their profession for a year or within a specified distance? It is ridiculous and in my opinion asking an employee to sign who has very specialized skills needs to be unlawful!"
Latasha	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. As a physician I have directly felt their impact and saw how it impacted the patients I was no longer able to serve since I had to leave the community in order to leave my job."
Kathryn	"Who hasn't been stuck in a job they desperately needed to leave? Well, non-compete clauses essentially trap employees in the ongoing nightmare I get why companies want them, but if they don't treat the workers well, the companies deserve to lose people. Ban these clauses, or at least restrict them severely."
Brad	"These clauses area bane on the existence of employees in general. I work in healthcare and would like to point out that physicians hold no trade secrets and practice independently. Non competes exist only to limit the physician-patient relationships outside of a branded healthcare entity. It exists to stop negotiating and stifle benefits and competition."
anonymous	"As I work at the manufacturing level of a large industry supply chain , I see first-hand how a non-compete clause truly destroys the opportunity for an honest individual to better their career. I've seen how an employee who works for a failing Wholesaler is unable to move to a more successful Wholesaler to better their career because of the scare tactics of the non-compete. As a result, this forces the employee to settle for less benefits/compensation and be less productive because their passion is stifled and the wellbeing of their career, which feeds their Family, is threatened. One employee leaving, should not cripple a business in the fast-paced Markets and world that we live in today. Non-competes do nothing to improve the employee or employer."

Mark	"On the first day of work, my 17 year-old son brought me an employment contract the employer required him and a parent to sip). It was seven pages long. The compensation was $10 an hour. The contract included, "The confidentiality provisions of this Contract shall remain in full force and effect for a period of 15 years after the voluntary or involuntary termination of your employment." (15 years - not a typo) In the non-compete section, the region was "Texas," the term was 2 years after termination, and the competitive businesses included "all businesses that offer tea beverages, fruit beverages, desserts, pastry and bakery products." The company refused to modify the contract. My son was refused employment. I have experience dealing with contracts, so I was able to stop this ridiculous agreement which could have limited my son's employment in the future, but that's only because my son is 17 and a parent signature was required. It is not reasonable for employers to impose such onerous provisions, especially for low wage workers."
Michael	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am writing to support the ban on non-compete agreements. I recently just started a job, signed a contract, and on day one was handed a packet of papers that included a non-compete. This wasn't mentioned anywhere in the interviews. I am a software developer and the idea that the skills that I develop on my own to accomplish a task can't be used elsewhere is ludicrous. I did the work. It was my efforts that built this product. While it may not be enforceable for me, it is still enforceable for others who work at the company, especially those who do more manual labor than me. Please ban non-competes. They are anti-American and anti-competition. Sincerely, Michael DiLeo Austin, TX"
Bradley	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. As someone that is currently held back by one, we are unable to have the freedom of the market to be paid appropriately for our talents. If you pass this, it will go down as one of die first major actions from our government that is FOR the people instead of against the people... in a very long dine. Sincerely, Bradley Priesmeyer League City, TX"
Keeram	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Bravo on your ambitious and just new policy. As a meaningful 2nd act following your contribution with the article "Amazon's Antitrust Paradox," your effort to contain the ubiquitous Non-compete agreement deserve praises on multiple fronts, and I list them as follows: 1. Its principled approach addressing fairness and freedom of the market as a whole: I'm not an economist by trade, just a fan. I've read Capitalism and Freedom by Milton Friedman, and Capital in the Twenty-First Century by Thomas Picketty. Some points that I've absorbed and believe to be rational is that concentration of wealth (and power) is not a bug but a feature of a "late stage" capitalistic economy. That wealthy and powerful enterprises will over time continue to accrue power in self-interest, utilizing every seismic changes in evolving economic landscape barring governmental intervention. Some of these methods include Licensing, Accreditation, and least justifiable: Non- compete agreements. Milton Friedman engages in thought exercise by exploring what would happen if Medical Licenses were to be abolished, and establishment of replacement tiered market-based system. In comparison, abolishing Non-compete agreements seems much more workable and productive in addressing market' wealth concentration without upturning societal

	cornerstones. In promoting stability in a well-functioning society, banning NCA addresses its anathema: positive feedback system of wealth concentration and its effort to subdue the challenge to said concentration via opportunity and meritocracy. 2. Its viability as an anti-competitive strategy: Non-compete is a low-hanging fruit that is significantly easier to legislate/ enforce compared to other anti-competitive measures (some of which I do not wholeheartedly agree with). There are significant enforce-ability/ legislative issues regarding Licensing, Accreditation, and even company specific anti- competitive suits. Examining Epic vs Apple (why is Apple's 30% deemed noncompetitive when Valve's Steam taking 30% cut is widely accepted by the market?), the unsatisfying execution and ruling of Microsoft antitrust suit, and difficulty addressing other market titans such as Amazon. The ruling and arguments appear haphazard and not well-reasoned. Addressing Non-compete agreements is strategically viable because it empowers workers by addressing wide abuse by employers, and it does it with gentle economic forces. It can be tactically faulty to take the cleaver to large companies for the sake of being large, regardless of whether its success comes from truly good business models/ management or harassing behavior. Whereas addressing NCA evens the market field between employers and employees. This can even empowers companies who truly invests in the long term health of the company and truly good workers who deserve the pay and good employment practices. This can align long term economic health incentives with effective business/ management practices. 3. Its alignment with the political will of the people: Non-compete agreements are seen as grandfathered evil. People who enter the workforce see it as ever-present part of the society that is ubiquitously unpalatable. It's about as popular as Robot-callers. Ticketmaster fees. Scalpers. Horrific customer service of internet installers (COX). Waiting 1-2 hours at doctor's offices. Just because the current form of the market and regulations have made the unjustifiable practice ubiquitous does not mean it should be continued without oversight."
Stephen	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As someone who works for and hires for a small business, I see talent migrate from small businesses which don't have noncompete agreements to larger companies for a variety of reasons. However, if someone wishes to leave a large company for a smaller company, they are often blocked by a noncompete agreement. This imbalance places undue burdens upon the small businesses which make the American economy what it is. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
CECIL	"Support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses! I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Toni	"Noncomplete clauses are only to benefit the employer and deprives employees from the benefit of utilizing their own body of work when they leave. Attrition is the consumers right if they so choose. Retention occurs from acting with integrity and service, not entrapment."

Collin	"I strongly support the proposed rule banning non-competes. They are inherently anti-labor and distort the market for labor unfairly. I am a worker subject to a non-compete that limits my ability to move somewhere else and apply my skills. I would have to move somewhere for which my skills are secondary, rather than places that could directly use my expertise. I understand the need for companies to restrict the flow of their confidential information, but that should be handled under separate, specific agreements, not non-competes. In my own case, much of my skill relates to open source software, where confidential information is not a major concern."
George	"I support the proposed rule. I am a technology industry worker (software engineer) and generally fairly pro-business in my viewpoints. However, in my view, noncompetes create a chilling effect on a lot of innovation that would otherwise be possible for employees, either via forming small businesses or by creating artificial barriers for them to move around the industry. I would support one additional limited exception: noncompetes which enumerate direct competitors the employee cannot work for, and, critically, which are personalized per employee, listing the exact reason the employee cannot work there, and with the opportunity for the employee to negotiate the criteria of the noncompete. This would allow businesses to protect closely-held trade secrets from direct competitors who may otherwise hire those people away to learn the info (arguably the original intent behind noncompetes). However, the vast majority of noncompetes do not fall under this umbrella; they much more closely resemble contracts of adhesion where the employee has no negotiating power, and those should be forbidden."
Craig	"Me, my family, and every darn hard-working associate I am surrounded by are totally against enforcing the non-compete rule and are tired of the discriminatory favoritism of defending dictating businesses over poorly defended average Americans! Thank you for your consideration."
Brandi	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. They inhibit people from seeking work in their field of study or use of their special skills. Time away from their chosen field can greatly affect their standing within that industry and create a gap in their work experiences that could affect their overall career. It enables employers to have too heavy a hand over employees, and in my opinion goes against "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness." A person should be able to seek employment at any time within their chosen field without consequence. Giving too much power to the employer negatively affects the employees and society as a whole. There is no protection or benefit to an employee at all and little to no motivation for an employer to be a good employer because of it."
Camille	"The current standard of allowing companies to impose 'non-compete' on employees severely hampers our ability to direct our careers in a manner that best fits our abilities. I am currently in a Toxic work environment, with management that exploits my input. If I leave, I have to start over with a new company, instead of taking the relationships, knowledge and skills I have developed, with me. As a Business Development Manager, I have built many

	hooks of revenue generating business for others: several times I have been released once I've grown the business to a certain level and my commission checks are far more than they want to continue to pay. When that happens, my income level starts back over where it was years before, and I have to build it back up again. It has hampered my ability to raise my children, buy a home, pay for college tuition, buy a car, and on and on. I WOULD BE SO GREATFUL to legally work my way up financially, based on my efforts, and not be held down by someone's bottom line."
Ian	"The attached .PNG file is a snippet from an employment contract that I am currently bound to according to my former employer who is heavy handedly threatening to seek legal remedies against me. The language therein is an excellent example of the kind of abuse, manipulation, and ultimately, servitude imposed on people and commonly found in these contracts. In this case, preventing me from engaging in any possible way in an entire industry, which uses my sales & marketing skillset developed over a lengthy multi-decade career. Moreover, it attempts to limit my ability to provide for my family anywhere on the North American continent. I strongly support and urge the FTC to ban non-compete agreements and restore freedom and liberty to the common man so that we can optimally provide for our families. Existing Non-Solicitation and Non-Disclosure agreements already protect the employer's rights without needlessly trampling on a worker's right to move about freely in a marketplace rich in opportunities. Please pass the ruling! You have my support. Attachments NON-COMPETE Snippet of MMI Contract

Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. "As a physician treating more that 6000 people a year, I have passed up years of productive business choices because of perceived threats from my own company to sue me for just working. This has stunted growth in my area and led many of my colleagues and peer to drop out of the medical field altogether in the face of overwhelming corporate pressure. PLEASE help hundreds of thousands like me to fmally be free of contracts that no lawyer would ever allow themselves to sign. This is a just cause. " As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Stephen	"I have been a pioneer and thought leader in a technology space for nearly a decade, while the space itself is not much more than a decade old. On the outset of the COVID shutdowns of the economy, I took the opportunity to branch out on my own, build a new and independent competing platfonn in the space and recruit co-founders. In 2022, investors did an asset and talent purchase of our IP and team to join what was promoted as a roll-up of a larger parent company, which we later learned was all under false pretenses. After only 3 months post acquisition, my co-founders and I learned that our equity and incentives were all falsely based on the value of a roll-up reorganization of a larger company which never occurred, and only a short time later, that our investor/CEO had been draining the agreed upon funded runway of our operations, as capital for other side investments, which we were not privy to the terms of, and paying himself a 1/2 million dollar salary. time and effort."
Chris	"As an engineer from the tech industry who does not live in California, non-compete agreements are something I have long worried about. I think it is important to note that I am not a leftist. I am an independent that skews slightly center-right. At their core, non-compete clauses go against the self-determination ethos that America is supposed to be about. They also cut against things like free markets and competition. Corporations are getting out of control with the amount of power that they have both in terms of what the law allows and the power they can exert via lobbying on government agencies and politicians. The proliferation of non-compete agreements is anti-freedom and takes us closer to tyranny. Non-compete agreements aren't just had for workers, they hurt businesses and reduce the economic dynamism that is central to the success of the American economy. ## Non-competes are Bad for Workers I. This has a chilling effect because it discourages seeking new employment by making it more difficult to leave an employer and damaging your future career prospects."
Parker	"As a physician and leader in medical education, I support this non-compete clause rule. Almost all physicians enter a non-compete to practice in an area, which has always been ironic, because lawyers who write these contracts do not accept or use non-competes within their own profession! As hospitals and large health care organizations monopolize the health care industry and buy up physician practices, more physicians are employees with non-competes with devastating effect. Organizations do not have to be responsive to physician feedback or needs or fair negotiation because physicians don't have the ability to vote with their feet and move to another job in their city. Often these non-competes are 25 miles or 100 miles which basically precludes one to continue to live, work, raise family in the same location as their current job. Please pass this rule to create fairer labor conditions and drive competition and innovation rather than stifle it."

Christine	"I am writing to oppose exclusion of physicians from this rule. Beyond the comments that others have made, I believe that allowing non-compete clauses to apply to physicians would have deleterious effects on patient care. Many fields in medicine are highly subspecialized and those subspecialized physicians must be allowed mobility to practice in environments that best allow them to serve patients. For example, if a subspecialty physician relocates to work in an organization that ends up not supporting her clinic and not allowing her to serve patients to the best of her ability, prohibiting her ability to move to another organization in the same area will result in negative consequences for patients in that area—namely, lower service levels than could otherwise be offered if she were not subject to a non-compete clause."
Na	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Non-competes should not be a thing. They violate the whole premise of a free market and innovation. Corporation should be doing more to keep employees not housing them by legal means. You should work at a place because you want to not because you have to or are bound by a non-compete. Especially in finance. If lawyers don't use non-competes then why the hell should normal people use them."
Caitlin	"I am in support of regulations to curtail the use of non-compete agreements. I have seen firsthand the bad impacts ranging from impractical to outright harmful that such agreements can have on employees who want to grow their careers in a given field. The use of non-disclosure language, by contrast, seems perfectly reasonable to me. A business has the right to protect its innovations for at least some amount of time. It is unreasonable to give them any control over a person's right up freely enter a contract with any future employer they choose. Previous employers should have no power to affect those relationships."

Anonymous	“I'm a cardiologist working in El Paso, Texas which is a medically underserved area. I'm working in a hostile work environment and I'm planning to resign and continue to serve the people of El Paso. However my contract has a non-compete clause that limits my options and basically makes me to move out of El Paso. I think non-compete clause is unfair to physicians and public in large especially in medically underserved areas.”
Reece	“I am writing today to indicate my favor for the proposed FTC ban on non-competes. I am independent Landman currently bound by a non-compete agreement with my broker. It is crucial to include contractors as part of the proposed ban. Over the past 13 years, I have watched my broker weaponize the non-compete and attempt to intimidate fellow Landmen into staying under his firm's umbrella without so much as a cost of living raise in their 10-12 years working for the broker. In most cases, the broker is making more, per day, than the landman themselves. A tenured and experienced Landman in the office is billed out to clients at $525/day. The broker pays the Landman $175/day and retains 5350/day. This is the type of predatory management that is perpetuated by the non-compete.”
G	“I am a medical doctor and I agree with the banning the non-compete clauses from our contracts. We don't have trade secrets and this is limiting access to care. Additionally some positions like hospital medicine don't have a client base that a physician can take with them when they change positions.”
Yadira	“I completely agree, workers deserve the opportunity to look for better job offers to improve professionally, we all work for a better future for our families and these contracts limit you a lot.”
Iram	“I totally agree that non-compete contracts should be eliminated, I am currently in one and it is very frustrating to know that you have to reject better job offers where you work just because you have a signed contract, I think we are in a free country and as such These contracts affect our freedom to decide what we consider best for ourselves and our families because we are all looking for economic stability and professional growth and this limits us a lot.”
Victoria	“I am absolutely in support of this proposed rule. While the purpose of non-compete clauses are understandable, they have been completely twisted outside their original intent, and at this point, serve to strangle competition and the economy more than uphold it. Additionally, they absolutely infringe on a citizen's right to work where they please. Non-compete clauses are being abused, and this rule, if put into effect as I hope, would help to rein in that abuse.”
Bhoja	“I as a physician strongly support the ban on non-compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations.”
Son	“Dear Chair Khan, I am writing to express my strong support for your proposed rulemaking to ban non-compete clauses in employment contracts, especially with regards to effects on healthcare industry. Non-compete clauses have become increasingly common in healthcare employment contracts. These

	clauses restrict healthcare workers from practicing medicine in a specific geographic area for a certain period of time after leaving their current employer. While non-compete clauses were originally intended to protect a healthcare provider's patient base, they are now being used more broadly to restrict mobility and stifle competition. There are many reasons why non-compete clauses are harmful to healthcare workers and the industry as a whole. First and foremost, these clauses limit patients' access to care. If a physician is unable to practice in their area of expertise or in a certain geographic area, patients may be forced to travel long distances or go without care altogether. This can have a devastating impact on patients' health and well-being. In addition, non-compete clauses can stifle innovation and competition in the healthcare industry. By restricting physicians ability to practice medicine in a certain area, these clauses limit the flow of talent and ideas in the industry. This can ultimately hurt patients by reducing competition, raising prices, and limiting access to high-quality care. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can have a particularly negative impact on physician job mobility and career advancement. Many physicians may be discouraged from seeking new job opportunities or starting their own practices due to the restrictions imposed by non-compete clauses. This can limit their ability to advance in their careers and negatively impact their earning potential. It is argued that non-compete clauses are necessary to protect healthcare providers' patient base and trade secrets. However, there are other ways to protect these interests without imposing such severe restrictions on physician mobility. For example, healthcare providers can implement confidentiality and non-disclosure agreements that protect patient information and trade secrets without prohibiting physicians from practicing in their area of expertise. Furthermore, it is argued that non-compete clauses are necessary to incentivize healthcare providers to invest in physician training and development. However, these clauses may actually discourage physicians from pursuing training and development opportunities, as they limit their ability to use their new skills and knowledge in their future careers. In conclusion, I strongly support the FTC's efforts to ban non-compete clauses in healthcare employment contracts, particularly for physicians. By doing so, we can protect patients' access to care, foster innovation and competition in the industry, and ensure a level playing field for all participants in the healthcare industry. Thank you so much for your attention to this important matter.”
Sarah	“I strongly oppose non competes. They are unethical and a way for employers to punish employees. All workers including physicians, should have unenforceable non competes. They should be done away it.”
Geetha	“Why should the doctors be excluded from Non compete protection. This is making sure the doctors are enslaved to die hospital and can't move- what century do we live in”
Doctor	“As a physician (radiologist) in a large city in Texas, I am stuck at my mediocre job due to my non-compete, which prevents me from working in this city for one year after I leave. When I joined fresh out of training, I tried unsuccessfully to negotiate down the non-compete. It was either sign the contract or get another job. The company that I work for owns numerous hospitals and imaging centers all across city and the non-compete is very restrictive. The noncompete radius include the entire county and a distance

	from all hospitals, which effectively excludes the entire city. Despite the city having nearly 7 million people and a large medical center and multiple thriving employers, I cannot get another job here without violating the non-compete. I cannot afford the buy out clause which is about 5x my annual salary. I love this city, own a home and have young children in school here. I am the primary bread winner in my family and cannot afford to not work for one year. It seems very unfair that I would have to sell my house and move my family to another city to get another job, when there are plenty of better employment opportunities right here in my city. My employer suppresses our wages because they know that we are stuck. Non-competes only benefit the employers. They do not help physicians or patients. Non-competes should be illegal. After all of the training that I have done, I feel that I should have the opportunity to stay and work in my city for a different employer. There are plenty of ways to incentivize workers to stay long term (competitive wages, positive culture, respect, retention bonuses, etc) rather than trap them with a non-compete. My employer should not be able to keep me from working and providing high quality medicine to patients in this entire city. On behalf of all physicians stuck in a similar subpar situation, please end the ridiculous non-compete clause. Make employers pay us fair wages and treat us better. Thank you."
Todd	"I am currently under a non-compete that hinders my ability to take a job in my area of expertise for eighteen months after I leave the company. I am a very specialized employee and have become a leader in my field. Unfortunately, the non-compete is so over-arching that I cannot leave the company and work in my field of expertise in any state that my current employer operates or "is thinking about operating ht." Eighteen months of inactivity in my field is a death sentence to my career. The only reason that I signed the non-compete was in exchange for equity in the company that turned out to be worth 12% of what was verbally committed. I have already had one prospective employer remove an offer due to the clause. Even if I feel that I have the grounds to break the clause, I, like so many others do not have the means to fight my current employer in the courtroom. The removal of non-compete clauses would be a huge benefit to people in my position across the United States."
Susan	"The medical field is limited because of this. The pandemic is a perfect example where we could be helpful but because of non compete unable to. For example in i.t. world, top employees can pursue lucrative positions and advance in their career. We want what is fair, and we want to work."
M	"Please universally ban non-competes. They have become abusive and overstretching anything reasonable. They unnecessarily restrict employees from getting jobs even in unrelated occupations. Employers abuse them to limit employees' ability to switch jobs, helping employers keep wages low. The only people for non-competes are lawyers (who make money representing abusive large companies suing employees who can't afford to defend themselves) and abusive companies. Please help the 99.9% of the rest of the population!"
Elizabeth	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete agreements. My husband was laid off by his employer of nearly 15 years, and he is now unable to be employed in his field of expertise for an entire year. They gave us 6 months of severance, and although we hired an employment attorney, they would not give us any more."

	How can this be legal? My husband cannot work for his previous employee, but he also cannot work liar anyone else in this entire industry?! Non competes only harm hard working Americans, and stifle healthy competition between companies. Please ban non competes, and protect Americans!"
Jay	"Non-compete's are used too often to keep physicians in their employed setting to the detriment of not only the physician but the patients. For example, if there are dangerous or illegal practices, the physician won't speak up because if they're fired they can't find work in their city anymore. If they do end up leaving, they often don't work until the noncompete is over, if that period is longer than 6 months then they'll likely have to explain the gap in their application as well as to the medical board. They may not go back to practice at all. In a time of critical workforce shortage this is a disaster. The only entity the noncompete serves is the large corporate health system who is able to treat employees with much more abandon due to this practice. They also have much more legal strength vs the individual physician if it is applied unfairly and so the physician usually does not fight it."
Courtney	"1/00% think this should be pursued. This is a huge thing employers push in the medical field, a field that is already short staffed. By doing away with this we can decrease short staff issues amongst clinics."
Abraham	"There are several reasons why a rule banning non-competes should apply to physicians. Firstly, these agreements can limit patient choice and access to care. If a physician is unable to practice in their specialty or geographic location due to a non-compete agreement, patients may have to travel further or switch to a less experienced provider. Secondly, non-compete agreements can negatively impact physician autonomy and job satisfaction. Physicians may feel trapped in their current job or unable to leave to pursue other opportunities. This can lead to burnout and a shortage of physicians in certain areas. Thirdly, non-compete agreements can stifle innovation and competition in the healthcare industry. Restricting the ability of physicians to start their own practices or work for competitors can limit the availability of new treatments and services and drive up costs for patients. Lastly, the use of non-compete agreements in healthcare may not be necessary or effective in achieving the intended goals. Other forms of protection, such as trade secret laws or confidentiality agreements, may be more appropriate for safeguarding proprietary information or patient relationships. Overall, a rule banning non-compete agreements for physicians could lead to increased competition, innovation, and patient access to care. While healthcare organizations may argue that these agreements are necessary to protect their investments, the negative impacts on physicians and patients outweigh these concerns. Therefore, a rule banning non-competes should be considered the healthcare sector, specifically the physicians
"Darren	"Non competes should be outlawed as they take away die ability to earn and grow in careers. If it takes 5 years of working (10,000 hours) to become an expert at your role and once expert status s achieved the employee may want to make more money but may be limited by a non compete to move to a another company that sees the potential for that employee and has the means to pay. Non competes create a lose scenario for both companies and employees."

D	"I believe the dissolution of non-compete agreements to be a profound change for good. The press page for ftc.gov states, such a change should be to enable change. Employees shouldn't be held to an employer through coercion but through instituting a work environment and compensation package that doesn't encourage them to leave. Businesses should still be permitted non-overly broad non-disclosure agreements. The protection of trade secrets is still vital and enforceable. However an employee's worth should be determined by their general ability to contribute and not a short term market change by disclosing strategic information. While some might view the change to be government overstep, I counter that worker/management relationship should allow for workers in a free market to sell their labor to the bidder that best aligns with their price. This doesn't stifle capitalism, rather it unleashes it by removing more banier and permitting fluidity. Additionally, workers are subjected to layoffs with little to no notice and often with limited to no severance packages. While management knows of these changes and those being let go have an opportunity to plan a departure. Barring more radical changes to the disclosure requirements for layoffs, this will give workers some ability to continue to provide for themselves quickly and reduce government assistance."
Andy	"The best time to do this was long ago. The second best time is now. Long overdue ban on an unjust and unreasonable clause."
K	"Please ban non-compete clauses for all employees, especially physicians. Non competes can have a significant negative impact on doctors and patients in a community. If a physician can't treat patients within a certain geographic area, this limits access to healthcare for those in need. This is especially a problem in small rural areas where there are already not enough doctors for the community. This also reduces competition between systems and would give an unfair advantage to non for profits when their operations are quite similar though tax status is different. Systems want to keep non competes so they don't have to fix the problems physicians bring up. There has to be a balance in competition that means systems won't take advantage of physicians trusting in these non competes that will force doctors to stay in bad situations. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access. Thank you your time.."
Adriana	"Non-competes affect patient's access to a wider variety of physicians, therefore limiting access to healthcare. In addition, it is not fair for physicians, who sometimes have to uproot their families because of this. This is specially true for those of us in highly specialized fields, working for non- for profit health care systems or hospitals."
Courtney	"I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there

	may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter. Sincerely, Courtney Davis, Ph.D., LSSP, NCSP.”
J	My group was taken over by private equity. My position was "eliminated" in their efforts to cut cost, etc. The group went to enforce their overly broad non-compete which would in effect force myself and my family to move from the area. They had a mileage radius from each facility they provided services, given their monopoly in the area, that resulted in the entire metroplex to be included. I could not move my family since I was also caring for my elderly parents. Since my state is a "right to work" state, I hired a lawyer and filed suit against them. I eventually won the suit after being sidelined for 6 months. And ended up with a large legal bill. The cost was tremendous given lost wages and legal fees. The emotional toll on my family was also significant.
Zenus	“Include physicians as a profession that is restricted from having noncompete clauses in their contracts. These noncompetes keep doctors stuck with their employers who do not care about the wellness of their employed physicians, only how much profit they can squeeze out of them. This is a HUGE component of physician burnout (or more recently termed moral injury) and has contributed to physician suicides or simply leaving the profession altogether, further worsening the nationwide healthcare staffing shortages. A mentally healthy physician will be able to better care for the health of their patients. Please support banning noncompetes for physicians.”
Addison	“ I support the banning of non-competes.”
Wara	Physicians should not have a non compete. Some specialties, for example Anesthesiology and emergency medicine are unable to subvert patients.
Deborah	“While there may be extenuating circumstances in some industry regarding "trade secrets", these can be handled with a non-disclosure agreement. I am a physician and my university imposed essentially non-negotiable non-compete agreements of 2 years and 25 miles from their main campus after termination of employment. We were forced to sign a new agreement every year as part of our contract. Frankly, it did not make sense - the university has satellite office all over the metropolitan area, including outside the 25 mile radius. Additionally, the non-compete was not universally applied - physicians who were employed prior to a certain date did not have a non-compete clause. The "buyout" was 2 years of salary which, in my case, would have been more than $500,000 dollars. Non-compete agreements are unnecessary, manipulative, controlling and violate employees' rights to make a living at the location of their choice. I strongly support this legislation to stop non-compete agreements!”
Mary	It's great to see this law abolished!! When companies are able to take advantage of workers; that's a problem! Not only does it effect the workers ability to make a living but it also affects the consumer paying for it. Our Economy is suffering because of this.

Alejandro	I totally agree with the disappearance of non-competition contracts which are very restrictive and deprive you of economic and job stability, they are unfair and you are a slave to your employer
Skyler	"I wholeheartedly support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements."
Nirav	"I agree with the Federal Trade Commission's proposed rule and specifically disagree with the American Hospital Association's objection to the this on the grounds that non-compete clauses provide power to form a monopsony which harms markets. It also has a additional effect of encouraging some of the most qualified people to avoid an sector of the economy or type of job because they are aware of the power of employers or payors. In the specific instance of healthcare professional markets, non-compete clauses are standard findings toward the middle or end of long employment contracts signed by individuals with student loan debt. This finding itself makes the contract suspect if almost all other contracts available to that person also contain this type of restriction. With regards to monopsony, healthcare markets have consolidated such that for each job type, there is usually only 5 or less different employers a person may work for in a 20 mile radius from their home. Since some of the employers who have different names are actually owned by the same parent company, this number may be even lower in lower cost areas as the last 15 years of low interest rates have allowed for extraordinary levels of debt funded buyouts of existing local providers."
Cody	"I am speaking as a physician . Non-compete clauses are routinely used to limit work options and worker satisfaction, to drive wages down, and to effectively bind workers to jobs they may otherwise wish to leave. There are no legitimate arguments for limiting where a physician can work -- medicine is not subject to "trade secrets". Furthermore, modern hospital and clinic practices are [igned in a way to maximize geographic coverage, meaning that a "10 mile radius" may not sound too constricting, but this is inclusive of all clinical sites including satellite clinics, which are often peppered strategically throughout a metropolis so as to effectively exclude an entire city from a physician who wishes to work elsewhere but is bound by a non-compete. This does not benefit anyone but those systems with the most power and leverage in negotiations! Removing non-competes would allow for fairer agreements and contracts and would place the onus back on the systems to ensure they are providing a work environment that is conducive to well-being of the workers. It is immoral to prevent a worker from practicing their trade. Signing a contract without a non-compete is effectively not an option in most cases - - every major and minor hospital in my area demands a non-compete in their contracts. This is especially egregious in a time of severe physician shortage. Dissatisfaction with working conditions in the context of a non-compete means physicians are either going to leave the medical field entirely or leave the area, disrupting patient care and patient-doctor relations. My comments as written are limited by my experience as a physician, but are built on foundations that are true for any trade or worker. In the end, non- compete clauses as practiced and enforced are beneficial to few and harmful to many. They should be abolished."

Gina	"Non competes are unfair to American workers. They should be banned ASAP."
Dawn	"I agree that Noncompete clauses should be banned. As a hospitalist, I am essentially NOT able to move my practice or practice patient board to a different hospital if I choose to leave my current employment. A noncompete essentially is a burden to me and would force me to move out of the area i reside in to seek for gainful employment elsewhere. Not only is it unduly unfair to me as a physician. It also causes no gain/or loss to the employer except to cause headaches and burdensome financial headaches to the employer for enforcing if they so choose and to me as an individual contractor to have to look for gainful work outside of the clause."
mitesh	"I am a physician . I have worked for a company for several years that grew across the state of Texas. When I joined the company, it only provided services to hospitals in Dallas. However, over the years, it grew to provide services to multiple hospitals in all of the large cities and several smaller cities in the state. When I decided to leave the company, my non-compete clause stated that I could not work for any competing entity within 5 miles radius of any of its hospitals. Essentially, that meant I could no longer work in Texas for 2 years!! I had to leave to Indiana. I am highly in favor of a federal law that bans non-compete clauses. Even as a physician, non-compete clauses create economic havoc for the workers. Please allow the ban on non-compete clauses to be passed in the legislature. Thank you."
S	"Non compete clauses should be illegal they are unethical, place all power in the hands of employers/large corporations and limit the ability for physicians to practice medicine and patients to have access to care"
Majid	"I strongly support removing noncompete rule as it causes a lot of hardship to physicians and contributes to burnout."
Jessica	"I wholeheartedly support banning non-competes. Physicians should have the flexibility and freedom to seek positions elsewhere if their current employers are not providing what they need without having to uproot their lives and move to different parts of die state or country. Creating competition is necessary to maintain appropriate health and wellness standards."
Karen	"Not competes ensure hospital systems maintain and monopolize Physcian labor and are not in line with our country's values of free market labor and capitalism."
Mohammed	"I'm in strong favor for abolishing all non,-compete clauses."
Ashraf	"Freedom of choice of work is an essential worker right. The idea that workers can be forcibly made to chose between continuing to work for an employer they do not want to work for or forcibly leave their home and uproot their families to a different location for years is unamerican and a horrible tool to control labor. In healthcare particularly this is forcing physicians to depart their area and sever their physical closeness to patients they have cared for in the area, depriving patients of valuable continuity of care and forcing physicians to continue to work under forced and unfavorable conditions. Please abolish and ban all non-competes."

Harris	“ I was employed at university of Texas southwestern Dallas from 2010 2015 They treated very poorly there was non compete for 30 miles . I had to move to different city and drive daily almost 2 hrs . I had good opportunities in Dallas, because of the non compete nobody offered me job. They did not want to fight with big universities for non compete. High time this practice should be stopped. Physicians should have the freedom to make their decisions to work they want. Some places physicians are slaves no freedom and stuck in lousy workplaces. Please stop non compete.”
Dylan	“I whole-heartedly agree with this proposal. Mom-profit hospitals should not be exempt from this rule. Individuals should not suffer at the expense of corporate greed and profits, and right to work is paramount.”
Sanjeet	“Non compete clauses should be abolished, it will improve patient care and create healthy strive to retain good health care workers x.”
Kristin	“As a physician, banning non-compete clauses would do miracles for well-being and burnout. Currently, these clauses keep physicians with no other option than to continue working for abusive corporations. If they could no longer force us to work for them, they will then be motivated to actually treat us well and keep us because we WANT to stay. They are allowed to treat us poorly because there is no other option for us. If we work hard for them, they should work hard for us as well.”
Hardworking American	“I personally believe this is the best thing that can be implemented to ensure a fair working culture without big corporation and agencies manipulating and forcing employees to be underpaid and always remain in jeopardy if trying to switch jobs. Companies can use this to keep employees trapped in a horrible work culture, working environments or simply anywhere the employee doesn't want to work. Incorporating this policy would ensure that all the employees are treated equal and they have the ability to maintain their own career path and professional livelihood. why should any company have the ability to control where an employee works as long as he's not violating any major trade secrets which can be kept confidential under an NDA. What does an employer achieve out of incorporating a noncompete other than suppressing its own employees and making them feel suffocated. I've personally been in situations where I was getting 20% to 30% pay increase, but I wasn't able to take that opportunity due to unfair and cruel noncompete clauses. I wasn't going to disclose any information but why couldn't I compete? I have a family that I need take care of, kids that I need to pay for. Why couldn't I get an opportunity that was a better fit for me and my family due to an old illogical policy that has not been removed out of a time in the Age of Technology? We say we promote job competition and fair policies, but is it really fair to anyone other than big businesses and corporations trying to oppress hard- working American citizens. I've been praying for something like this to be introduced into the United States corporate environment and now my prayers are coming true, please don't let me or the millions of Americans who want this down.
Juan	“Absolutely agree with removing non compete clauses from contracts given to employees by their employers. As a physician, I have suffered the consequences of these unfair restrictions-covenants. Freedom to select a job versus restrictions to voluntarily leave a non satisfactory job is the most appropriate way to proceed. I appreciate the immense effort put to remove non compete clauses."

Jessica	"I agree with this proposed ban for all employees. My company wrote this into an award (stock) and was in such legal text and a 10 page document I didn't realize what I signed was not just base on the award but the terms of my employment. Now I can't get a job in my industry at all!!! Not only are companies taking advantage of low paid workers but also leadership and those making over $150k. I shouldn't be tricked into a non-compete via a stock award. This severely limits my employment opportunities and I'm in a job that has a toxic working environment. I f'eel stuck. Please help the workers who make American great!!"
Josue	"I support the proposed updates. The general populace should not be bound by non-compete clauses."
Frank	"The current non-compete clauses for low-level workers is simply employee abuse. There are no "trade secrets" involved. Such clauses are manifestly intended to bind workers to their employers in perpetuity, making them latter-day versions of indentured servants. The proposed rule change will do away with this massive injustice. Please resist the corporate pressure and approve the new rule."
Lucas	"I support this rule. My consultancy company recently prevented me from converting to the company I actually do work for everyday. So, I'm faced with a choice of leaving a job I love or letting my career stagnate. Meanwhile, they continue to make free money off my paycheck. This is rent seeking behavior that slows economic progress."
David	"No one takes a job thinking it will not work out just as people don't get married with the expectation of divorce. Under current non-competes the employer can get "remarried" the same day but the employee must sit on the sidelines for a restricted amount of time which makes no sense. Employees are coerced into signing non-competes as part of the job offer and are required to put themselves and the financial health of their families at risk in order to be hireable. The idea that employers must work to not only attain but retain talent should not be a novel one. Getting paid what you're worth without the threat of unemployment is about as American as it comes."
S	"I am a new physician (graduated during the pandemic) in a sub-specialized medical field. To attain this level of education, I studied for 10 years of theoretical knowledge (BS + MS + DO) and 5 years of clinical training (residency and fellowship). When I started my first job, I was excited to come back to the city where I did my medical school. It allowed me to mentor students from medical school. However, due to issues with colleagues and hospital administration, they are not renewing my contract. Now I have to move to another city yet again. There are other hospitals in the area who could use my services, but this organization is known to enforce non-compete. Not sure what the hospital is so scared of physicians, but let physicians decide where they want to live, earn and serve - why do hospitals get to play bully?"
Fahad	"Absolutely support to end non compete to enhance public healthcare. By the time physicians start serving community and trying to work in favor of public, they get forced to follow individual organization policies which sometimes are against better patient care and if they don't comply, they are forced to move out. Loss of community care at end. I believe it's the public who loses the most here as the doctors who don't compromise their principles in patient care are forced out of community by this non compete clause which is kind of forced on them “

Atif	“I am a physician and I want non-compete clause to be made unlawful as it is hurting employees and private enterprise in die of small businesses. Big corporations are taking advantage of physicians and this is against my right to choose where I work or if I can practice independent from influence of my employer.”
Jackson	“Noncompete clauses, do not help the free market and only seek to harm workers.”
A	“I agree with removing non-compete clauses, especially with regards to essential services such as healthcare. These clauses promote monopolies by shutting out independent practitioners in an area, and lack of competition places patients at risk of serious adverse outcomes as health systems become complacent. Society as a whole has nothing to gain from non-compete clauses as the FTC has so rightly pointed out. Thank you for your efforts to protect Americans from corporate over-reach.”
Nathaniel	“I am sadly familiar with the anti-worker tool that is a noncompete agreement. To that end, I am writing today in support of your effort to ban these anti-competitive contracts. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. like me. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction. even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements.”

Constituent Support for the FTC’s Noncompete Rule

Utah | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Utah:

	"I am whole-heartedly in favor of getting rid of all non-compete contracts. My husband was "forced" to sign a non-compete after working for a small business 2 years after he started working for the company. It was either sign the contract or lose the job. After he worked for the company for 14 years and facilitated the growth of said company to a multi million dollar company, the owners son took over and fired not only my husband he fired my daughter as well. The reasoning for the firings was questionable at best and he was then held hostage by the non-compete. He didn't work in the industry he had spent his entire career in for 13 months because of the NC and when he got a job 13 months later AND 75 miles away he was served with a cease and desist. We spent almost $1000 in legal fees fighting the agreement and his former employer ultimately decided to not pursue further legal actions "at this time." He didn't take any proprietary information or recruit employees from his previous employer, he simply wanted to work in the field he knows and loves. NC's are disgusting, they hold people hostage. They stifle fair competition and ultimately hurt the working class. I agree with non disclosure contracts in that an employee can't take trade secrets from one company to another but non-competes are different. If a company has to rely on NC's to retain employees, perhaps they look at the culture of their company and make adjustments so employees want to stay. GET RID OF ALL NON- COMPETES!!!" -Rachal
	""I have had an extremely poor experience working for a company that enforces a non compete. I am a BCBA and provide ABA services for children that have autism. My masters degree is very specific and I can only work in my field with my degree. I worked for a company for 2 years and finally decided to leave after months of dealing with a toxic work environment and unrealistic expectations. My non compete required me to not be able to work in my state for one year. I could not move states as my husband works for the state in Utah. There as year + long waitlists for ABA services in Utah and because of the non competes in places so many children are not able to receive services as there are not enough providers for the need. I strongly believe that banning non competes will benefit the mental and behavioral health services in my state and give children access to more services that they currently do not have." -Brittany

"After a 40-year career with the company I worked for, where I started as an hourly laborer and worked my way into upper management, I was unceremoniously downsized. I was given no warning but asked to leave company premises that day. I was presented with a non-compete document and told that I must sign before I left. It stated that I would receive severance pay amounting to three months' salary, but I had to agree not to compete in any way with my former company. That requirement prevented me from finding a job with anything close to the compensation I have been earning previously. One might ask why after 40 years I was downsized. I was only told that my job was being eliminated. Subsequently the company hired several people at less than half my wage. This all took place about 6 months after the company flew me to our headquarters in Dallas and presented me with a 40-year pin. After a celebratory luncheon, when I returned to work, I found two envelopes on my desk. I opened the first and it had a letter delineating raises for the coming year. They ranged from 2% to 6%, and the letter advised I would be receiving 6%. I opened the second envelope, and it explained that I would be receiving my full incentive pay of 40% of my base salary for the previous year. My annual review came later and stated that management was happy with the job I was doing managing our nonstandard product lines nationwide at 6 different plants. There was no hint that they would soon be ending my career. I was left to seek work at less than 1/3 of my previous compensation. There were many competitors in our industry with whom I would otherwise have been able to apply. But the non-compete clause precluded that possibility. When I was dismissed, I was 59 1/2 and too young to retire, but 'too old to hire.' I was fortunate in that I had been planning to retire at the minimum age for Social Security, and so had put away sufficient funds to carry me through this episode my life, but I will never understand the callousness and contempt with which I was let go and why our government allows corporations to throw people away at will. Further, in my state of Utah I was left with no recourse since Utah is a 'right to work state'. That phrase should be changed to the 'right to fire without cause.' When I consulted with a lawyer specializing in labor issues, he stated, 'BEI you got screwed, but in Utah there's in nothing you can do about it.' Noncompete clauses add insult to injury, leaving the 'victims' to deal with extreme difficulty caused by greedy corporations; the suffering is unwarranted!"

"I strongly support the proposition put forward by FTC to dissolve current non-compete clauses. I am a small animal vet in a city of 120,000 population, there is a MASSIVE need for veterinarians in our town as the current pet: veterinarian ratio in our city is 14,000:1 conservatively. We are drowning in cases and need more staff, but the use of non-competes has lead to a veterinary care desert in this state as well as many others. Because of non-competes, I am explicitly barred from opening a clinic in our city, the city north of us, and 2 cities south. Not because there is a lack of available clientele, but because a multimillion dollar company prefers a monopoly on the city enforced via non-competes. The thought of a single veterinarian having to leave an area already so desperately in need of vets just because some massive corporation says so is wrong, unethical, and directly opposes the American Dream. Non-competes crush the economics in the area, forces monopolies, and in the cause of

	veterinarians, causes preventable death and suffering of fluffy loved ones due to lack of access to medical care." -Lauren
	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I am writing as a Utah Republican precinct chair, biologist (1977 BS Biology, magna cum laude, Phi Beta Kappa, 15-year secondary teaching certificate), lawyer (1979 JD), and member of the Union of Concerned Scientists. I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work. Please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Virginia." -Virginia
	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, As someone working as engineer in the semiconductor industry, it is important for me to be able move between employers within the industry. This is especially important now with the growing of the semiconductor industry and bringing semiconductor manufacturing back to the USA. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Christopher" -Christopher
	"As an American worker, I have consciously weighed my employment options and prospects with the potential limitations imposed by noncompete clauses, and I absolutely agree that these clauses affect workers' mobility and employers' talent pools. I work in biotechnology and even then, while it may be appropriate to have a contract outlining intellectual property rights and restrictions for a set period of time, limiting my ability to work at another lab that does research in my area only harms the pace of scientific progress and my ability to use my knowledge and skills to the benefit of my employer _and_ society. Workers aren't idiots. We can keep our proprietary knowledge to ourselves for a year if we need to move to a new employer. We're not out looking to sneakily undermine our previous employers, we just want to better our lives. And lastly, for women and other marginalized persons in the workplace, the protection afforded by employment mobility and freedom is CRITICAL. I have been subject to either direct sexual harassment or toxic workplace misogyny at EVERY SINGLE job I've ever had. I need to know that I can freely seek a safer, healthier work environment without being excluded from my narrow biotech niche." -Emily

"My experience with a non-compete led to the painful decision to sell my house to survive. I am a mid-30s Utah native. After high school, I joined the insurance world as a Property and Casualty Intern with a large national insurance brokerage. Following my 4 years (during college) with the insurance broker, I became a Licensed Property & Casualty Producer. I enjoyed a successful career with 2 reputable and large brokerages in Utah selling business insurance. My husband of 5 years joined an insurance recruiting firm, recruiting licensed insurance professionals in Utah (primarily) and a few adjoining states. We were living the dream. During a trip, I sustained a significant TBI that led to 5 years of total disability. Social Security Disability sustained me during that time of many doctors appointments, medications, etc. Following a very long fight, I decided to try to go back to work. After hundreds of rejected applications, I approached my husband about hiring me with his firm. He got me in touch with the owner and she hired me. I began working an entry-level job for the first time in 5 years...After 2 years of working, the owner pulled my husband and I into a room and decided 'she didn't want to work with us anymore' and that would be our last day. She handed us a small severance packet (2 weeks for me, 7 for him), and our noncompete agreements we had signed at the beginning of employment. She made sure to emphasize she would enforce the agreements. The noncompete banned us from seeking employment with any clients that we had worked with for 1 year past employment, or with a company that we might have provided services for. It also prohibited us from pursuing any form of recruiting from any type of insurance entity including retail companies, carriers, wholesale companies, or any adjacent insurance business. It prohibited any direct or indirect competition with the firm. It went so far as to forbid us assisting or contacting any company employee, prospect, candidate or other person that we had dealt with or acquired knowledge of (I personally touched over 10,000 records of insurance professionals...) as a result of working for the firm. It also forbid us from working with any competitor for 12 months. The noncompete covered all 50 states geographically. There was a buyout option of a large percentage of the previous years billings (which would have amounted to over $250k) or a one-time extremely excessive fee... We literally had to sell our dream house because of a noncompete. included all 50 states) but we were expressly forbidden."

Constituent First Name	Comment Highlights
Ryan	"As a physician I strongly support removing non-compete clauses from contracts. In rural areas patients already have limited access to healthcare, and it can be made worse if a physician leaves. Patients should be able to keep seeing the same doctor, no matter who the doctor is employed by. Non-compete clauses can also be detrimental for the physician's family as well, as they may have to move to find employment."

Mohammad	"Please end the non compete rule it hurt so many doctors and much more many patients and kill competition"
R	"Ending non-compete is a no-brainer. Of course we should remove non-compete clauses. The increased peace of mind for employees, and the removal of an unnecessary "safeguard" for firms will result in a stronger U.S. economy. Everyone wins."
Colby	"As an aspiring entrepreneur in the real estate space , I am in a relatively small market where one company dominates. I recently ended my employment with them. They use non-competes to restrict competition and trap employees. The abolition of non-competes is paramount as small towns/cities grow. Please abolish them."
Brian	"I think the proposed rule is a great idea. If an employer wants to retain an employee they should provide good benefits and good working conditions. Employers shouldn't be able to coerce workers to stay in jobs they don't like by threatening to sue."
Harrison	"First and foremost, non-compete agreements can hinder an individual's career growth and mobility. By restricting a person's ability to seek employment within their industry or field of expertise, these agreements can potentially lead to a loss of valuable skills and experience. This not only affects the individual's career trajectory but also limits the talent pool available to companies in the same industry. Secondly, non-compete agreements may stifle innovation. When employees are unable to transfer their knowledge and skills to other organizations, the free flow of ideas and information is restricted. This can result in reduced competition and hinder the overall growth and progress of the industry. Moreover, non-compete agreements can create a sense of mistrust between employers and employees. Employees may feel that their employer is attempting to control their professional lives, which can damage morale and foster a negative work environment. Lastly, enforcing non-compete agreements can be costly and time-consuming for companies. Legal disputes can arise when an employee challenges the validity of a non-compete, which can result in significant legal fees and lost productivity. In conclusion, while non-compete agreements may offer some benefits to employers, such as protecting proprietary information, the potential downsides seem to outweigh these advantages. It's worth considering alternative approaches, such as investing in employee retention and creating a positive work environment, to foster loyalty and maintain a competitive edge."
Russell	"Non compete agreements suck. Get rid of them."
Irene	"My previous employee made me sign a noncompete as condition of employment indicating I cannot work within a five mile radius of my former company. I live in a fairly small city, so five miles is significant. After three years, I left the small company of mental health counselors to form my own solo practice. I have asked my previous employer to release me from the non-compete, to which she requested

	$30,000 by December 31, 2023. I would like to be released so I can work closer to home, so am really hoping this law goes into effect. Thank you!"
Graham	"I am very much in support of this ban and the research behind it. Thank you"
Kyle	"I support FTC proposal to ban all noncompete clauses in employment contracts."
Hunter	"Non competes are a violation of our pursuit of happiness. No entity should be able to tell me I can't work somewhere I've been selected for and am qualified for."
Dominique	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! My boyfriend is in an industry in which he had to sign a noncompete and now he is limited in the work he can pursue for the next year."
Joshua	"Simple comment in favor of this action. Please continue all too rare actions like this in favor of protecting the lower and middle class from exploitation."
Marina	"As a physician, I am strongly opposed to any non-compete clause for physicians in any practice setting. I gave up a decade of my life to get the education and training (and went into $240,000 of debt) to become a physician . I have spent countless unpaid hours charting, troubleshooting, and learning on my own. No practice should be allowed to lay claim to my knowledge or clinical skills. Non-competes are unethical and unreasonably restrict the personal and professional lives of physicians in this country."
Jared	"As someone that works in the technology field as a generalist , a noncompete clause is often too broad, and can be interpreted that I cannot do any other computer work until the noncompete clause expires, which would make me take a job outside of my field of expertise for months or years until the clause expires. I urge the elimination of noncompete clauses for employment."
McKenzie	"If my current company required a noncompete, I would not have taken the job. I spent a decade obtaining a PhD and then 6 more years building on that expertise to be qualified for my current position. I can't just change career fields, and that's essentially what a noncompete would require me to do if I wanted/needed to find a new job. Not being able to take my growing experience to the same field at a different company would require me to stay whether I wanted to or not. What is the goal or motivation a company would have for implementing noncompete clauses? If it's to protect IP and trade secrets, an NDA will serve that purpose. The only other reason I can think of for companies to use noncompetes is to block employees from seeking different or better opportunities for themselves. Companies should have no say in such a significant decision of the working individual. Workers should be free to make employment decisions regardless of their current employer's desires to retain their workforce. If noncompetes are being used for retention purposes, I would suggest

	companies explore other avenues to retention that get at root cause for why an employee is considering leaving (e.g., increased wages or benefits). Noncompetes appear to be a lazy company's way of staff retention. A company should not be able to limit an individual worker's decisions on staying in their current position by essentially making it so the worker could not use their experience to go somewhere else. After all, job applications require applicants to list applicable experience—how are applicants to fill out that portion of the application if they are unable to use their past experience to apply to the new job? I guess employers who require noncompetes only want to take experience gained from the previous employers and then establish the noncompete and pretend to "own" the experience of the experienced worker they hired (?). I am fully in support of this proposed ban on noncompete clauses and for the requirement that companies eliminate, and communicate elimination with employees, all existing noncompetes."
John	"As a journalist, I've spent over a decade honing my skills in product testing and reviews across two employers. Both companies include non-compete clauses in the contract. Fortunately, the first company cancelled my non-compete as the result of a layoff allowing me to continue my work. Unfortunately, the current state of my very specialized career means that retraining for another field would put a significant financial strain on my livelihood as I'm the only adult in my household able to work. It also makes it many times more difficult to transition into a similar industry without a pay cut, as I'd have to start in an entry level position again. This would render my current experience and expertise useless in a job hunt. So I'm forced to stay with an employer that is continually rolling back benefits and locking down the freedom of disabled employees like myself who make reasonable requests for accommodations to perform our jobs most effectively. I am fully in support of the new rule restricting the use of non-compete clauses."
Dustin	"I have been employed by the same firm for the past 19 years. Unknown to me when accepting the position, I was expected to sign a non-compete clause on my first day. The clause placed significant limits preventing me from changing jobs while still working in my chosen profession. The non-compete clause my employer has in place limits my ability to work in the field worldwide (excluding the African continent). The initial non-compete from when I started was for a term of 5 years after I quit. That has been revised to 1 year due to changes in laws in my state. While I have wanted to change companies for years, I am not in a financial position where I could afford to not work for a year before I start another position. Effectively, this agreement has kept me in the position as the employer wanted, it has also limited my wage growth significantly. While I have thought of risking everything to change employer, I have been hesitant to quit as I have also seen my employer take legal action against other former employees. The threat of legal action adds to the fear that I would personally face legal costs that could bankrupt my family. I strongly support the changes to this rule allowing for greater flexibility in employment options for all workers without the risk of legal action."
Dina	"And submitting an anonymous comment. I respectfully submit the attached comment in support of the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. This is the corporate equivalent of indentured servitude and is completely unconstitutional. But then again our constitution was built on slavery. End this now."

Kami	"I am an entrepreneur at heart. I have been in several network marketing businesses as well as started several of my own from scratch. In 2015 I started a thaand had great success. I was encouraged to join the company to help my friends and family members. I decided to do that and had so many people interested in it. I build a large business quickly. When I signed up for the company I did so quickly and without much thought. I thought at the time I was not starting a business but simply helping my husband, parents and a few friends. I did not read the contract. Every year we have to pay an additional S 100. Apparently this "renews" the contract with any new rules they add even though they don't tell us and to see the contract you have to search for it. Here I am almost 8 years later. The company has not created any new products, there is 10000xs the competition there used to be in that market, and my business is no longer flourishing. My income is half what it was in 2019. It is also something I have tried to use again without much success, so my personal belief in it is wavering. I thought about joining another network marketing company to have another stream of income. I consider my job a social media influencer. That is what I do for "work". I build relationships, I build followers and I post valuable content about all different things. I have now found out that according to the company, as an independent contractor for (Optavia). They 'Own" my social media. I am not allowed to use it for any other network marketing purposes. Even if I decided to resign they claim to "OWN" my social media for 12 months after that. This INCLUDES if it is not a competing product. They are a weight loss company. According to them I could not even use my social media to sell jewelry. I also can not even sign up fora company if it is competing, which I am learning is EVERYTHING in the health and wellness industry. I found a water filter I really enjoy and wanted to sign up to sell that. It is not competing, if anything it is complementary. You need to drink water when you are losing weight, so good water is important. Because it is considered a health and wellness industry product I would need to GIVE UP my multi-million dollar business I have built to sign up to sell water filters. This is totally limiting my potential, my income and my happiness. I had no idea this is what I was agreeing to (in 2015 it wasn't) I'm not sure when they added all this but it was not something that I even knew until I went to do it. It is not something they enforce until you are successful, so you see so many others doing it you never think it is something you can't do. My social media is mine. I created it. My hard work grew it. I work on it daily and I should he allowed to promote anything I want to promote on it. Them saying they own it is unjust and simply being used as a threat and punishment for !awing the company. Please pass this law. Please allow entrepreneurs to stay free, creative, excited and motivated. Take away the bondage that these companies are threatening against us to keep us promoting their product. My social media is my livelihood. It supports my family. If we let companies control that it is a very slippery slope to what they can control. Thank you,"
Randal	"Non-compete agreements as a technology worker have bound me. To be an employee, I was required to sign one. If I rejected the agreement, I would be denied the job. Having been unemployed, this feels like having to sign under duress. I worked with the firm for three years and eventually decided to move on to advance my own career. However, I could not start my own business doing the same work. The non-compete agreement stated that I was not to perform IT services for businesses and individuals for two years in any geographic area covered by the firm.

	The owner pursued damages against other employees who had signed and tried to do their own business. Essentially our entire state, Utah, was off-limits."
Brianna	"END NON-COMPETES! They have too much of a hand in ruining people's livelihood."
Ellis	"I believe that non-compete clauses should be eliminated. I am most familiar with non-compete clauses in the healthcare industry, specifically for physicians , so that is what I will comment on. Non-competes effectively create regional monopolies that favor the private equity employer. Ultimately this results in decreased access to specialty services especially in rural areas, and is used by the employer to stop physicians from speaking up about patient safety issues. If a physician speaks up about care issues and gets labeled "a problem" physician, this puts their job at risk. When coupled with a non-compete, this puts physicians in a position where speaking up and advocating for patient care could result in that physician having to uproot their lives and their family to move many states away, depending on the language of the non compete and if one employer is the predominant employer for a certain region of states. Employees are often trapped in unsatisfactory positions for decades as they cannot afford to break the contract and move while at the same time paying off exorbitant student loans. This contributes to moral injury and burnout, and thus decreases patient satisfaction and quality of care provided. Non-competes impede the operation of the free market between physician labor supply and available positions. Non-competes disproportionately favor the employer and create hardship for the employees and should be eliminated."
Daniel	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, As a pro worker individual I heavily support this change. Ban non competes Sincerely, Daniel Denison Wellsville, UT"
Eric	"Non-Competes should be eliminated completely. It is unfair a family has to move if one decides to leave their employer or drive 1-2 hrs away from home. This is unfair and costly to families, mine included. Non-Competes are very restrictive and costs us money since we had to relocate to a new state to avoid a non-compete agreement. GET RID OF THESE RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS NOW. Veterinarian and Finance here (both fields have non competes). They are Terrible."
Sean	"Hello. I am a citizen of the United States who works in the financial services industry . I am writing today to show my support for the proposed rule change to disallow non-compete agreements. While I do think there are limited circumstances when such an agreement would be viable, 99% of the time they are not needed and are used as a tool by employers to punish their employees for leaving their position. If we as a country believe in your right to work and your right to pursue your own endeavors, than no person or company should be able to control what you do with your professional life. I strongly urge the FTC to eliminate non-compete agreements altogether. Free market countries do not restrict the movement of workers between employers. I am no academic but from what I've read this change would also lead to an increase in workers' wages; something that is very much needed in this time of great inflation. Please give the power back to the people and make this rule change. Thank you."

Hunter	"I agree that there should be a nationwide ban on non competes due to their anti competitive nature. Too many hardworking Americans have their right to work and provide for their families infringed upon by corporate interests. So I support banning them."
Emily	"I strongly support a ban on noncompete agreements. Employers that want to ensure they retain employees they've trained (and thus their knowledge, skill, and expertise) should focus on offering competitive pay, benefits, growth opportunities, and a great working environment."
Daniel	"The FTC is absolutely right to prohibit noncompete clauses. They area form of employee abuse. I once worked for a medium-sized publishing company in Utah that included a blanket, nationwide noncompete clause as standard in its employment contracts. Even though I was able to negotiate the scope of the clause down to Utah, it still had a negative impact on my career when I was unable to move out of state as I had anticipated. My career would have been very different--and positively so- -had the FTC rule been in effect at that time. The rationale that noncompete clauses protect trade secrets is bogus. The company I worked for claimed this as their primary reason for including them, but they had exactly zero trade secrets worth stealing. It was, rather, a first indication of a workplace culture that was downright abusive to its employees. Finally, the proper role of government regulation is to preserve competition in the marketplace--including the overall labor market. For that reason alone, noncompete clauses should be illegal. But they are also abusive, and therefore the FTC should adopt this rule and enforce it with extreme prejudice."
Michael	"Please implement this. Stop making mega corps feudal lords and slave owners"
E	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200. As a trained and boarded physician , I stand behind making this antiquated practice of non- compete clauses a thing of the past."
Stephanie	"Noncompetes have a negative effect on patient care. Hard to recruit specialist have to leave the area to continue to practice if they want to change practices"
Justin	"I have signed 2 NCC, the first one made it hard for me to find a new job in the same industry. I hope to never live to find out on the second. With all the layoffs happening i am scared it would."
Elena	"As a physician and a mother, a non compete clause can cause undue harm to my family if better employment opportunities arise in my community. These are difficult to enforce and takes away my liberty and goes against our free market values."
D	"I support banning the Non Compete Clause in contracts. It takes financial and basic freedom away from the hard working middle class and gives too much power to corporate America"
Chance	"As someone who as signed a non-compete agreement in every single job I have ever had, I think this is a brilliant idea. I have been forced to work in various different industries because of these non-compete agreements, never being able to utilize the non-proprietary or unique skills that I learned in that job into another job. I was

	threatened with a lawsuit by an employer the first time I tried to take a job that vaguely competed with that company and I haven't tried since. I strongly encourage this to go forward and think it's a very clear and obvious rule to pass. It allows greater competition in the industries and allows workers to utilize the skills that they developed into new companies who are willing to pay more for someone with that skillset From my experience, companies absolutely use these agreements to suppress competition in the industry, they take every opportunity presented to exercise the non- compete agreement if they think it is being violated, and they use it to coerce employees into staying with their current company instead of taking a job that would give them a better opportunity and pay for the same or better job. Overall, this idea should be celebrated for increasing competition in industries and help reform predatory businesses from undervaluing, under compensating, and manipulating their employee's with fears of lawsuits and becoming unlikable."

Katie	"Hi, I am a registered nurse that has worked in aesthetics for 15 years. I was at the ceiling at my current employer with no growth potential. I chose to abide the year non-compete. To say that it dwindled my savings and caused a lot of heart ache is an understatement. Multiple lawyers and fees still came up with the same answer, you could lose all you earned. I feel non-competes are a detriment to our economy and the capitalist American dream!."
Chelseigh	"I agree! I am currently in a legal battle with a former employer fighting this exact thing. We have won all of our hearings so far, and are the first court case to have a judge accept a claim that noncompetes are violating ADA laws. Non-competes are so unethical, especially in the human services field. When there are wait lists that

	exceed the non-compete window, businesses have no reason to enforce a non-compete, since they would not be able to serve all of the clients on their waitlist regardless. There are other ways to protect business interests, such as non-solicitation and non-disclosure agreements. Non-competes are truly only being utilized as a form of entrapment, to keep employees stuck. Treat your employees well and they will stay."
Ijeoma	"Thank you for bringing this important issue to the table. I am an obstetrician/gynecologist currently in training sub-specializing in infertility. Within the field of infertility, non-compete clauses can last for 1-3 years and there are currently active clauses that would prevent a physician from being able to work in several states if they were to leave their employer. I am in the middle of interviewing for jobs in a city where there are several practices (both academic and private sector)- all with non-competes. After working towards this goal/being in training for 16 years, one of my biggest fears is feeling tethered to a medical practice that may no longer be the right fit for me or my future family due to non-complete clauses that would necessitate that I either 1) have an extended commute (less non-working time), 2) not work, 3) work remotely from family/friends, or 4) I am forced to move and completely leave the area. Removing non-compete clauses will remove shackles from employees and encourage respectful behavior between all parties involved."
Zach	"I am against non compete clauses and think they should be banned."
Nathan	"I chose not to take a job just after I got my master's degree because I wouldn't sign a noncompete. I wanted the option to open my own business but feared I wouldn't be able to. It kept me out of a profession entirely. For the sake of competition. I feel like non-competes are generally bad and could be banned, as long as contracts requiring non-disclosure and other protections of proprietary information are maintained."
Matt	"Non compete agreements are nothing more than modern slavery. Companies use these to scare employees, change their pay, and make them work for less. They also force employees to sign these documents months and years after they are already employed and threaten termination if they don't comply. Please abolish non-compete agreements. If companies took good care of their employees, they would never leave. Instead, they force people to work underpaid and overworked. Non-compete agreements are toxic and unfair to employees that don't have the financial stability to fight them in a court room against billion-dollar companies. It's our evil."
John	"I signed a non-compete without really understanding what I was doing. I feel like it's affected my ability to maximize my earning potential in my career. If I could go back in time, I would have never signed it. If employers want to retain good talent, then they need to take care of the employee."
Spencer	"Non-compete agreements hurt American consumers"
Steve	"Please make non-compete clauses illegal. As a physician, I have been subject to non-compete clauses my entire career. They have interfered with my ability to maintain steady working conditions. In the event I choose to change a job, I have to move. The AMA and American Board of Emergency Medicine strongly oppose noncompete clauses and advocate for their physicians not to agree to them in contract negotiations. In many cases we don't have a choice as the large hospital corporations say "agree to the noncompete or you will not be hired". This is an unfair practice and the government should step in. Thank you, Steve King M.D."

SAM	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. I do not like the idea of having to move whole industries just to get a better job, simply because a company I may work for has these non-competes that keep me from immediately working in that same industry/line of work for someone else. if I want to change jobs in the same field to earn more and/or to work at a better place, then I and everyone else in this country should be able to do that. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Ken	"NON-COMPETE CLAUSES SHOULD BE ABOLISHED. ALLOW PEOPLE TO WORK AND COMPETE."
Ryan	"Non-compete clauses prevent employees from changing jobs while staying in the communities they have set down roots in. This prevents employees from pursuing better opportunities due to concerns about uprooting their families I think communities are best served by retaining community members long term so they feel a stronger commitment to improve their own community. I believe employees are best served by having the freedom to pursue job opportunities without the constraints of overreaching job contracts.."
Nathaniel	"Please enact and enforce this rule! Job mobility is a cornerstone of the free market and the American way. The free market cannot create ideal conditions for workers unless they have the freedom to move to better jobs."
Elizabeth	"I strongly support a nation-wide ban on non-compete clauses in employment contracts. I am a veterinarian and have been negatively affected, as have my colleagues and clients. They are being used by private equity firms, which are consolidating veterinary practices, to reduce competition for employee veterinarians. This prevents veterinarians from starting their own businesses and from changing jobs. This hurts individuals earning power, and reduces consumer choice for care for their pets. These clauses in employment contracts are banned by some states, and are often overturned by judges, but these kinds of legal battles are financially ruinous for veterinarians. Please ban non-competes, ensuring that those already in force cannot be enforced. Thank you."
Greg	"I fully support the banning of non-competes in employment agreements. Corporations wield far too much power over employees already. It is bad enough that in this country many employees do not go on to start independent businesses for fear of having to pay for expensive health insurance. Getting rid of the non-competes in contracts will at least allow greater mobility for employees to switch employers."
Karl	"I support the proposed FTC rule to ban non-compete clauses. I believe such clauses represent an abuse of power by employers."
Isaac	"Non-compete are a joke and should be banned. Anything you learn is your knowledge and you should be able to use it where ever. We should have freedom to work!!!! Freedom to work!!!"

Benjamin	"This is a ridiculous idea that restricts the rights of citizens for corporate gain."
Faraz Khan	"As a physician , I can attest how the non compete is causing problems with healthcare access. In Utah some healthcare companies have a 30 mile non compete. Basically if they leave their job they have to leave the state. In some specialties which is already short staffed this has detrimental effects on the community. There are various such examples in Utah with one example of the non compete causing shortage of cardiac Electrophysiologist in Saint George Utah as the doctors had to move away from the city to avoid the non compete. There is no reason why a worker or physician should be punished to leave his community / work in search of better job opportunities. If the non compete is removed the companies will have to instead provide better work environment/ pay to incentivize their workers. This will be beneficial for the workers, resulting in better work environment. And in case of physicians, improve health care in the community by allowing physicians to stay in their area of interest/ need."
Stefan	"I believe that banning non-compete agreements would bolster the economy significantly. An employee who is growing his skillset in his domain but wishes to change companies should be allowed to, as their skills have grown to a level where they will be able to make a much larger, positive impact. Being stuck in a company because you can not join an adjacent company leads to resentment and a severe drop in productivity. Non-competes harm the free market and lower efficiency, and they also cause a great deal of stress for the people affected by them."
COURTNEY	"I support banning non-compete clauses. I am a mental health nurse practitioner in Utah. To gain employment, I had to sign a 12- month non-compete clause for the entire state. I would have to be unemployed for a year or move out of state, none of these are viable options. Please help workers be free to seek out new employment. This keeps our jobs and the economy competitive. Non-compete clauses are only helpful for employers who want to trap their employees in bad contracts. They don't lead to better economic outcomes. Non-competes cause wages to stagnate and interfere with free enterprise. Please ban non-compete clauses."
Marcia	"I am strongly in favor of banning companies from utilizing non-compete clauses in employment contracts. These clauses limit the ability of workers to find better opportunities and pay by restricting access to jobs where their specific areas of expertise can be best leveraged."
Jerich	"The Non-Compete clause is unethical and should be illegal as well. Non-compete clauses are inherently anti-competitive, as they prevent employees from leaving a company to work for a competitor in the same industry. People should be free to work for who they want to work for - that should be a fundamental worker's right. It should also be a fundamental right for a company to hire who they wish to hire, without being barred by a candidate's Non- Compete Clause. The only thing that a Non-Compete Clause does is damage the economy by stifling competitors from naturally growing by limiting a key resource for company growth: people. In addition to stifling company growth within the industry by limiting the people a company can hire, it also has a chilling effect on the rights of workers. If an employee is employed by a company that has a Non-Compete clause, that employee is less likely to leave the company for a better alternative, even if the company they work for is a hostile work environment."

	They would have to spend a period of up to several years doing some other job for potentially less pay if they were to leave, before they could return to the industry of their expertise. If Employee A wishes to leave Company A to work at Company B, but Company B is in the same industry (for example, cloud computing), Employee A must then work at other companies for a period of up to several years before they are allowed to work at Company B. While there is an argument to be made about Non-compete clauses preventing the sharing of trade secrets, the sharing of trade secrets is already contractually barred and punishable."
Michael	"I strongly support doing away with this unfair and damaging practice."
Dan	"Please consider doing away with non-compete clauses and restrictive covenants. In my circumstance, I am a 36 year old that has dedicated the last 14 years of my life to college, medical school, residency, then fellowship. I just recently signed a contract to join a medical group in a new city and state, and will take my young family with me. The non-compete clause that I was essentially forced to sign puts undue risk on my family should this position not work out due to unforeseen issues. I would hope that the amount of time, sacrifice, and education to make it this far would allow me the opportunity to work and contribute to a community without the added pressure of feeling like I have no alternatives in my employment."
Spencer	"A non-compete clause from a very large hospital group prevented me from being able to practice in child and adolescent psychiatry in a high-needs rural area. It was a disservice to me, to my family, and to the community."
Jakob	"My name is Jakob. I am a relatively young neurologist who, like so many colleagues from the same generation, have experienced the result of market forces over the last 20 years, and thus been thrust into an employed position, rather than a position with part ownership. The majority of us physicians are now employed, rather than practice owners or partners. Therefore, the rules of what it means to be a physician in a particular community have changed since the initial regulations allowing for non-compete agreements among physicians were allowed to take hold, despite medicine not being the initial target for non-compete agreements. In this context, I wholeheartedly support the FTC's non-compete clause rule (NPRM). The historical justification for non-compete agreements was to protect an employer's intellectual property from appropriation. This could include product information, or - these days - software. Now that physicians are officially more often employed rather than practice owners, these same agreements have become far more commonplace, and have become a tool for large healthcare system to intimidate and artificially restrict job mobility, just as they have been used by large corporations for their skilled workers in the technical industries. Now, in the so-called 'tech world,' research demonstrates that limiting non-compete agreements appears to have fostered competition. By extension, this has improved the capacity of the best workers to be attracted to innovate within the best environments for them - something we all benefit from, now, with everything from ChatGPT to smartphones. Moving back to medicine: a more dynamic professional marketplace benefits patients and their physicians. But how is this possible, one may ask? Employers will have to focus more attention on the value proposition for their physicians not just their salaries but also working conditions, peer collaboration, professional development, career mobility options, and

	how they can make value for their patients. Employers that genuinely empower their clinicians will retain them for the long haul. At the same time, physicians motivated to stay within a system actively attempting to improve patient care will ultimately lead to patients receiving better care. Ultimately, I am but one physician. There are many corporations that believe they stand to lose from this rule, and so I understand the lobbying efforts behind limiting the scope (or outright negating) the NPRM are at a fever pitch. This likely includes hospital systems, their parent companies and, indirectly, large insurers - and that, on its own, should give one pause. This is especially true in the United States, which remains the only major Western nation without a universal healthcare system, and with the most expensive care and medication relative to health outcomes. In this context, if the major groups against a proposed regulation are massively wealthy corporations, while those for it are patients and their physicians, where does the typical arc of history likely bend for the just outcome? With regard to the wider world of non-compete agreements in the US. I invite you to read the following excerpts from a recent interview with Evan Starr, an economist at the University of Maryland, who puts into sharp relief the necessity of the FTC's non-compete clause rule far better than I can...The aforementioned excerpts: "[An] argument is that, without non-compete agreements, companies will share less with their employees, stifling innovation. What do you [think]?' 'Non-compete agreements are such a blunt tool to use when more narrowly tailored tools can suffice. For example, firms have nondisclosure agreements, which can prohibit workers from sharing information. They have trade-secret laws. The non-compete agreement is the most blunt of all of these, because it protects things by prohibiting mobility in the first place...' People will say, 'Well, I need to train my employees, and I need to restrict their ability to leave after I train them so that I can recoup my training expenses.'" This idea has been around for a long time, and some states do recognize special training as a legitimate interest for enforcing a non-compete agreement. But here's the issue: If you take a worker who has been trained and the non-compete has been used to justify that training expense, why does the non-compete agreement apply ten years into their tenure, or twenty years into their tenure, well after they've repaid the training expenses? If the non-compete is really about justifying the training expenses, all you're concerned about are those early years, when the worker hasn't repaid them.' 'You just figure out how much you are going to have to spend on training the worker. If you're going to send them to get an M.B.A., for example, you know exactly what that cost is, and then you just have a training-repayment contract...'"
Taylor	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to ban non-compete clauses. I am a physician and non-compete clauses are often used to limit areas in which physicians can practice after they part ways with a healthcare company. In the current setting of shortage of physicians of all specialties nationwide, non-compete clauses only further limit access to healthcare for many with already-limited access to healthcare. A physician who is affected by a non-compete clause is left to either uproot their family and move to an entirely different state in most instances, or to work in a different field for a year until their non-compete has expired. This is a poor use of all of the taxpayer dollars used to help train this country's physicians, and a missed opportunity to provide healthcare to many who would otherwise go without."

Mark	"I fully support the prompt implementation of this Non-Compete Clause Rule as proposed by the Federal Trade Commission. Non-compete clauses are an affront to the spirit of American free enterprise and contradictory to the intent of anti-trust regulations. They exaggerate and flagrantly abuse the lopsided power differential between employers and employees to, at the individual level and at their worst outcome, effectively incarcerate employees in professional servitude. Non-compete clauses codify an imbalance of power between employers and employees to the detriment of employees, and are tantamount to extortion. Locked out of geographical areas for prohibitive durations following departure, employees seeking alternative employment (including starting their own business) in their chosen profession may be so discouraged by the punitive obstacles a non-compete clause creates that they may feel trapped in their current arrangement. This prevents individual growth and advancement while rewarding employers who abuse, underpay, or otherwise take advantage of their employees. Employees are effectively forced to forfeit at-will terms and surrender power over their own career destiny to employers, administrators, and owners whose motives do not necessarily align with the individual employee's best interests. At the societal level, non-compete clauses primarily inhibit free-flowing competition and market forces. Secondly, but of more significant consequence and far greater concern, non-compete clauses hurt the American citizenry reliant on the professionals burdened by such contractual stipulations: for example, doctors, dentists, therapists, veterinarians, and the patients they care for; accountants, attorneys, financial advisors, and the clients they counsel; architects, engineers, designers, contractors, estimators, inspectors, and the individuals and communities they design and build for; artists, musicians, chefs, caterers, restaurateurs, beauticians, barbers, cosmetologists, stylists, and all the folks whose lives they enhance. Patients, clients, and communities establish deep, trusting, and even fiduciary relationships with individuals across myriad professions that transcend the specific employer. These relationships must be held in high regard and protected, as are other immutable core values upon which American society is built. Non-compete clauses undermine these hallowed relationships. With the specific exception of business owners in the sale of their business, as noted in the proposed rule language, non-compete clauses should be immediately, retroactively, and universally banned. Violators should be held liable for such devastatingly punitive damages that employers are effectively deterred from any further attempts to nefariously strongarm past, present, and future employees with non-compete clauses."
Mark	"Non complete clauses prevented me from practicing in a city that I love and that has a doctor shortage. I used to be an interventional radiologist in Las Vegas, my radiology practice was sold by the partners when I was an associate to a private equity company called Radiology Partners. The quality of the group quickly declined and I left but had to leave the state to continue to practice in order to avoid a non-compete clause."
Tanner	"I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses in employment contracts. As someone who has witnessed the negative impacts of non-compete clauses firsthand, I believe this rule is critical to protecting the rights and opportunities of workers, promoting fair competition, and fostering innovation. As a delivery driver for medication for hospice patients, I have firsthand experience with the frustrations patients and their families face in navigating the healthcare system. Patients often express to me their difficulties in finding and

	accessing quality care, and I have witnessed how non-compete agreements can exacerbate these challenges. For example, when a healthcare provider is bound by a non-compete agreement, it can limit patients' access to the providers they prefer, causing delays in care and frustration for patients and their families. As someone who is on the front lines of patient care, I strongly support the proposed rule that would prevent hospitals from requiring healthcare workers to sign non-compete agreements. I believe it would help to promote fair competition, enhance patient choice, and ultimately improve the quality of care for hospice patients and their families. Research[1][2] has shown that non-compete clauses can limit workers' ability to find new job opportunities, negotiate higher wages and benefits, and pursue career advancement. These clauses can also stifle innovation and competition, ultimately harming consumers. By banning non-compete clauses outright, this proposed rule would help to level the playing field for workers and promote fair competition across all industries. It would allow workers to move freely between jobs, seek out better opportunities, and negotiate higher wages and benefits. This would ultimately lead to better outcomes for both workers and consumers. Opponents of this proposed rule may argue that non-compete clauses are necessary to protect businesses' investments in their employees and prevent them from losing valuable staff members to competitors. However, I believe that these concerns can be addressed through other means, such as offering more competitive wages and benefits or investing in training and development programs for employees. In conclusion, I strongly support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses in employment contracts. This rule would protect the rights and opportunities of workers, promote fair competition, and foster innovation."
Jacob	"As a vet student one of my biggest concerns about beginning to practice is potentially having to sign a non compete just to find work. I 100% am against non competes and they are an archaic and predatory practice."
Sara	"The vast majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when

	physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Sarah	"I am a physician, trained in pediatrics and fellowship trained in sports medicine. I am applying to and considering offers for my future position at this time. Noncompete clauses are present almost universally in these contracts which is bad for me personally as I may want to find a job which suits my needs better in the same local area without uprooting my family. This is bad for the patients as we all know that increased options leads to better care as choice factors in and the provider which meets the most needs of a patient is the best provider. And it's bad for capitalism as more competition leads to better prices for healthcare consumers. This should not be an issue and should be outlawed. It feels as though non-compete clauses are a leftover of bygone times. It allows an employer to have a shameful amount of power over an employee. This needs to change."

Emma	"I am a young adult just entering into the dog grooming industry . Trying to find a job has been harder because everyone wants a non-compete to be signed. I have been offered a 5 year as well as a 2 year, but why would I, someone who needs to build their own clientele to earn money, sign something that would eventually keep me from making that money that I worked for. I don't understand having to not participate in the industry that I went to school for and plan to make a living off of because of non-compete contracts."
Elizabeth B	"I would like to submit comments on the proposed ruling to end non-compete clauses in contracts. My son is currently experiencing the hardship this non-compete clause has created in the pursuit of his career. He has worked for 10 years as a chiropractor . He entered into his contract directly out of his schooling. I believe his employer knowingly used my son's enthusiasm and lack of experience to the employer's advantage when he proposed the contract. This employer has used this clause to impose fear and bind employees without fair compensation; having denied raises as promised etc. Further, the contract stated that if he left his employer he would not be able to work in his field within a 20 mile radius. This is particularly damaging since the geographical area in question lies in the middle of desert area with no communities outside of that 20 mile radius. I believe it is unreasonable to require him to uproot his family. In addition, this clause can be interpreted so broadly skills that vary greatly in the profession are not considered as to whether they actually compete at all. For instance, my son has received specific training for a type of chiropractic not related to his current practice. Further, my son paid for this training on his own and did not use work hours to obtain the certification and training. I believe there is a better way to provide for the needs of employers and the community. it is more than fair for an employer to include protection in contracts for Non-Solicitation. Any proprietary skills, methods, marketing etc. learned in the process of work should certainly be protected by the employer. It is reasonable to expect employees to respect and uphold these boundaries. Certainly the intent of good law is to protect the employer from loss as well as protecting the employee and providing good business practices to benefit all parties of the community. However, this clause can be manipulated to benefit only the employer. I therefore respectfully submit this clause is unreasonable and should be discontinued."
Cade	"I support a ban on non compete agreements"
Tara	"Hello, I am a mental health provider and am currently bound by a non-compete. This non-compete has made it impossible for me to practice within my geographical area. Non-competes are damaging for patients and should be disposed of. They potentially limit the number of patients that are able to be seen by providers within specific meas. This can be very damaging for someone with severe mental health issues and should be considered unethical in my field of practice."

Denia	"Excellent proposed legislation! For too many decades, workers have had to take inferior positions, outside their field, at significantly reduced wages, as non-competes play through. In my opinion, "just compensation" should include the amount of wages that would be lost, during the non-compete timeframe, if employers will still be allowed to use them."
Miles	"I am in agreement with getting rid of the practice of Non-Compete Clauses within employment contracts. I, myself, have been victim to these practices and had to move my entire family after leaving a position. I work in the healthcare industry where these types of non-compete clauses are all over. I have had situations where my employer doesn't want to give me a raise or increase the salary with cost of living so the only way to improve my economic situation is to leave to pursue a different job with another company. I have had to move 4 times in 5 years to be able to make my life better for me and my family. If there was no such non-compete clause within my employment contract I wouldn't have had to move my family to take a better job position. I really hope the FTC will vote to abolish non-compete clauses in order to help the American worker be able to make the best decision for improving their economic position while making life easier to support their families in the areas they desire to live."
Pete	"I support this measure. I am a 1099 worker (non-management, non-white-collar) forced to sign a non-compete in order to keep my job. I am in Utah, which is a right to work state -- meaning that I can be terminated for no reason at any time and am legally unable to find another job in my industry. Thank you for doing this."
Cheri	"I am currently bogged down by a non-compete that is stifling my ability to grow my business. Having a rule like this is vital to business growth and the ability to open up the free market. In my situation, I was an independent contractor with a real estate brokerage. I have since obtained my brokers license and opened up my own brokerage. My previous broker forced a non-compete on all who worked there, stating that we are not allowed to work with any client we had while with them for one year. The problem I am running into, is my clients joined me, not the brokerage. They are loyal to me, and are extremely frustrated and unhappy about the fact that they cannot continue their work with me. When an independent contractor recruits, retains, and builds a relationship with their clients, they should be able to keep those clients when the current company no longer fits their needs or makes changes that stifle their ability to grow. This law would prevent unfair practices being enforced on people by organizations who use non-competes to control and bully their employees and independent contractors, without any accountability on their part to provide the best services and environment for the workers and the clients. I am in full support of this rule and encourage you to pass it quickly. Thank you for your time."
Sarah	"Banning or limiting non-competes is extremely important to protect the freedom of American workers to work where they choose, without having to leave their industry or give up their career. Everything that a business would want to accomplish with a non-compete can be done through non-solicitation, non-disclosure, and confidentiality agreements. There's no excuse for trapping employees in a particular company."
Bethany	"I am working for a company that is going under and is being bought out by another. I have personally seen the non-compete clause being wielded as a weapon to hurt people and keep them from seeking employment at other companies. They are trying to bully those with them into signing into the new company using the noncompete they signed with the first. The new company has an even worse (longer and farther distance) than the one before. These do not help the economy either because a lot of the people are just choosing not to work for the 6 to 18 (18!!!! Unreasonably long.) months and they are just not going to be able to buy anything extra or vacation or anything. Some moved in with family til it is done. These need to go!"

Robert	"I am a physician and work for a large, multistate Health Care System, Intermountain Health. They hold us all hostage with our noncompete clauses that they force us to sign. I was able to negotiate mine to 15 miles, normally they require 30. But it still would significantly impact my work location, and it does hold me back from work options I wish to pursue. If the noncompete didn't exist, Intermountain Health Care would have to become significantly more interested in my happiness, and would have to be much more competitive in their compensation and retention efforts. They employ 3000+ physicians in their physician division, and we are all held hostage by this agreement. I look forward to your repealing this legal tactic for them, as do most of the physicians and practitioners in this group. The ability to move competitively would be a godsend to us. thanks again."
Christopher	"Comment Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners , and people like me all across the country. I am building a business that I will definitely face the challenge of finding help with non competes who I am not able to lift up with better opportunities for their future. This will empower business owners and workers like myself to build a better economy that works for the people and the businesses. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Colin	"Get rid of non-compete clauses for ALL healthcare professionals , including doctors, nurses, physician assistants, nurse practitioners, etc... They are unethical and compromise competition in the labor market. This favors corporations (ones that make billions each year) and keeps skilled laborers down. Let workers work!"
Lance	"My most recent experience with non-competes and how companies treat employees is along these lines: I was hired remotely at a well known manufacturing company , and about 2 years into me being there we were in hyper-growth mode and got acquired by another company that was PE owned. Within the areas we operate, we have brands that are 100 years old, market share leaders, and legacy product lines that are owned and used regularly by 99% of American households. Within one year of the merger, my company had started letting some employees go that I had worked with, and a select few individuals decided to leave because of the changes. They ultimately landed at companies considered competitors, but a more accurate description would be they now worked in "adjacent" categories (the new companies were in the larger overall category, but their product offerings played in categories where at the time had no presence - only potential future concepts we were looking to explore). After these few individuals left, it was discovered that all of us who were hired on at the original company pre-merger did not have a non compete agreement in place, and immediately we were given ultimatums that we had to sign one or consider working elsewhere (my boss told me if I didn't sign it I would likely be let go). In the non compete agreement the verbiage called out that any eligibility for merit increases, bonuses, etc. would also withheld if I did not sign the agreement, which was simultaneously incredibly broad and covered the entire overall category

	spanning any product type that I had sold during my career. I.e. - it would limit my ability to work PERIOD for 18 months within the area that my expertise and relationships have fostered essentially my whole working career. There was also no explicit difference called out between me electing to leave the company myself and being let go, so I scheduled a call with our head of HR (who also happens to be the head of our Legal department). I raised my concern to this individual that this document raised alarm bells for me, as there is nothing in there that protects me in the event that the company decides to let me go. The Non Compete would still be in force, and I would not be able to work in my area of specialty for almost a year and a half, which was alarming. I was told that Non Competes are extremely hard to enforce, and the only way to realistically "keep" me from going to work for a competitor would be to pay me the new salary the competitor was offering just so I didn't work there. Essentially confirming to me what everyone else needs to know about non-competes - they're smoke and scare tactics to limit employees from opportunities they may have at other companies to ensure let church and turnover. Period. If the concerns regarding non competes really center around intellectual property, information leaks, etc. then my recommendation would be to firm up the other agreements that companies require employees to abide by. But freedom for individuals to elect where they work is necessary to ensure it's a fair market where the value an individual provides is not limited by enforced fear or legal intimidation because of non compete clauses that are one sided. Conner	"This is a rule that should definitely be implemented. Non compete clauses serve only to hamper working people throughout the country, allowing the wealth gap to grow even larger."
Shaida	"Agree that non competes should be banned. I am a doctor who had to fight against a non compete to care for patients and to work in the city I live in."
McKay	"Non-Compete clauses only protect the employer and do nothing to protect the employee. I work in a very specific line of security and I cannot work for any of our competition so I'm limited to applying to jobs where my expertise cannot be fully applied. In this manner I am forced into lower compensation with potential future employers. This only harms me and makes it difficult to leave current employment without changing to a completely different market where my knowledge and skills would not gain me much of anything. I hope my opinion will be considered. Thank you!"
Domini	"Noncompete clauses make it extremely challenging to earn a living in your field of expertise after a voluntary or involuntary termination of employment. A company should not be able to prohibit someone from choosing to work at a different company that may be offering better compensation, culture or benefits. Including a non solicitation clause and keeping company information safe is a completely different subject and should be enforced. As someone who also hires at my firm, I have had to not consider hiring a skilled candidate because they have a noncompete. So biased and unfair to the candidates."

John	"As I retired engineer with a long career in multiple industries I am writing to express my strong support for the Non-Complete Clause rule. There are many ways that an employer can protect legitimate intellectual property interests without restricting the ability of technical staff to seek other employment. In the rare instances where a non-compete agreement is considered consistent with the public interest and enforceable it is essential to protect the worker by requiring the former employer to pay substantial economic compensation during the non- compete period."
STEVEN	"We need to get rid of non-compete clauses now and in the future. Currently, my wife is dealing with a non-compete as a health care worker making it so she can't leave and get better work to suit her needs in the same industry where she lives. It holds workers hostage and should be illegal. Workers are already hound to not share trade secrets and other confidential information but making it so they can't get better work in the same area makes it a hostage situation that leads to worse pay and worse working conditions."
Jay	"I strongly support the proposal to eliminate non-competes. I work in an industry that is hard to get your foot in the door, and relies more on work experience than education. My employer has made it a habit to hire younger individuals such as myself. They assured us that the non-compete agreement was standard practice, and they had never seen it enforced. Over time though, the company offers far less than competitive raises, resulting in pay that is substantially lower than market standard, with poorer working conditions. The non-compete prevents us from working in the entire state for a year in any related field. But it's okay, because at this company "they are never enforced", and we are afforded great experience (true). Fast forward a few years, my coworker finally got the courage to start looking for other jobs, and received an offer from a nearby company at almost 100% more compensation, plus other perks. He brought it up to our management, who immediately called the other company, threatened to sue, and completely burned the bridge for my coworker. My coworker is now stuck perpetually working for a company that doesn't want him anymore, but my employer will retain him for as long as he wants due to the blow to his pride that would occur of one of his employees left for another company. All of the other coworkers, including myself, will either be forced to relocate our families and explore job options out of state, or endure a company that has us trapped into below market compensation, resulting in a lower quality of life for ourselves and our families, reduced ambition and thus productivity, and reduced morale. Non-competes should be banned if we truly believe in a free labor market where employees are rewarded for their efforts, with high- performing companies being able to attract high-performers. As the old Soviet workers used to say...."We pretend to work, and they pretend to pay"."
Shaleen	"I worked for a behavioral health company for 9 years from 2014 to 2021. In 2020 I was given a non-compete agreement. I authorized behavioral health services for this company and I was 100% self taught. I was never trained for my position, I just had to learn it as I went along. I was paid $16.50 an hour and almost everyone that worked there was underpaid. I ended up leaving this company to work in the same line of business and now I am being sued because they claim that they had provided me with hours of specialized training for my position. This company put non-compete agreements on every single employee no matter what their position was. I am very grateful for my new employer as they have covered the cost of attorney fees because otherwise, I would be screwed. Please put a stop to non-competes especially for low wage workers."

Mahika	"Non-competes stifle growth. Companies only need to safeguard their Intellectual property. Ban non-compete agreements that serve no purpose."
Michael	"Non-Compete clauses serve only employers, not employees. They're used as a means of control over employees, effectively chaining them to overbearing employers. Please do away with these ridiculous clauses!"
Scott	"Dear FTC Commissioners, I'm writing with regards to Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No.P201200. I strongly encourage you to adopt the rule, with minor modifications as necessary to address any narrow and specific requirements to address the protection of major proprietary information. This rule will protect and enhance the earning potential of American workers, stimulate the economy, incentivize innovation, and level the playing field between employers and employees. Thank you for your service to our country."
JJ	"I am a career technology/software sales rep who continues to get taken advantage of by my employers who force me to sign a non-compete and then continue to lower my earnings year after year because they know I can't progress in the same industry outside our company cause the non compete. Please look out for workers and end non- competes. This is only helping the rich and hurting workers"
Milton	"This rule change would affect so many people working in a positive way. Anyone that has had to sign one of these "non compete" contracts knows how limiting it can be after working for a potentially harmful company. This will protect people working quickly and effectively if implemented properly."
James	"As a podiatrist the non compete agreement I have signed is needlessly restrictive and harmful in finding appropriate employment. I made almost $400,000 less than what I brought to our practice after taking out business expenses and 10% to build up the practice. If the non compete agreement were outlawed then I would be able to negotiate a fair percentage or create a new practice in my desired location. Instead of paying for the practice owners house remodel I could pay off my student loan debt. On behalf of podiatrists nation wide please remove non competes!"
Rachel	"I am a general pediatrician . My ability to change jobs is severely restricted by my current non-compete clause. I support elimination of non-compete clauses"
David	"I would like to see non compete clause done away with"
Michael	"Non competes stifle innovation and freedom About one in five American workers—approximately 30 million people—are bound by a non-compete clause and are thus restricted from pursuing better employment opportunities. I have seen managers do terrible things to employees, threaten them , barade them - lock them out of working for a YEAR a entry level person making 45k a year being locked out of work for a YEAR legally over going to another company in the same space is so unfair and

	unjust The tech market as a whole was literally built on the foundation of people leaving big companies to seek innovation This is the one of the worst business practices in america and only hurts the economic development of the country"
Pro	"I don't think a company should be able to dictate where a former employee works after they are terminated, voluntary or involuntary. Employees dedicated their time to a company, but those companies don't own them nor should they decide how they earn a living after they are no longer employed for them. I completely understand a sales rep or any other role not stealing or taking clients of that former company, but you should not be banned from working for a competitor or business in the industry you've worked. I've been with my current employer 18 years, but if I decide to leave the company or they let me go, I should be able to use my skill set, knowledge, experience, and expertise to gain employment and bring value to another business. I wouldn't and shouldn't go after my old clients, but I should be able to find new business without the fear of not being able to earn equal, comparable, or better wages elsewhere."

	"As a licensed veterinary technician who has been in the field for over 10yrs I have seen the toll non-competes take on veterinarians. They are forced to stay in bad clinics or forced to move or commute several hours to another clinic. They force doctors to choose between practicing a quality of medicine they can feel pride in or leaving the area where their family lives and their children go to school. Corporations and businesses also have more room to mistreat staff when they know their staff is trapped. I hope the FTC will support this ban. Very few individuals benefit from non-compete contracts, they are especially hard on new doctors just starting out." - Siobhan
	"I am a physician in a rural area. I have seen physicians lives impacted badly by non compete clauses that essentially make it impossible to make choices that are best for themselves, their families and often patients by moving on from positions, even after serving years or decades, due to non compete clauses that have remained in their contract, forcing them to, in many cases sell their homes, change their children's schools etc to seek employment. Non compete clauses cause undue suffering for physicians who might be mistreated by their employer or asked to provide patient care in ways that is unsafe, or doesn't protect patients. As physicians we have lost so much of the ability to advocate strongly for our patients and safe patient care in corporate medicine. One of the last tools we have is our ability to vote with our choice of employer and to leave when we have exhausted all ability to negotiate safe patient terms and seek alternative employment. John	"My former company had me sign a non-compete and after three years of working hard and selling over a million dollars in annual revenue, they not only never gave me a raise, they fired me. I have extremely close relationships with all my clients and they have threatened lawsuit several times to me for writing these clients over to my new organization or even talking to them. Please ban all non-competes as it allows companies to take advantage of their employees. Since I have a very small niche', it has been difficult to find new contacts and I have been forced to get a nighttime job to feed my children."

William	"Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC estimates that banning non-compete contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion per year. Worse yet, when you get laid off (I have been laid off five times in my career), you are limited in moving on to another similar position. These were all in Information Tech and one of my layoffs ended up taking a huge pay cut to work in retail because of a non-compete clause."
DIANA	"Ban exploitative non-compete agreements - they destroy lives!"
Lisa	"Please enact the Non-Compete-Clause Rule. Non-compete clauses prevent competition and result in higher prices as well as personal suffering. They also cause considerable personal torment: If people want to leave a bad work environment, or seek higher pay, they have to either leave their chosen work or move out of the area. People should not have to leave the area to continue in their chosen line of work. One example: Our local hospital system uses a non-compete clause with its doctors. This prevents doctors from working at other sites in our area. If they want to leave they have to move far away. This reduces competition and is one of the causes of our rising health costs. *charges much more for simple procedures than do the few independent practices in our area."
Glenda	"I support the FTC ban on non-compete clauses. Such clauses are an unnecessary restriction on a worker's freedom of employment. I haven't noticed that executives are banned from employment in competitive situations."
Whit	"Absolutely ban these clauses. Competition is always good. No exceptions. Stop coddling billionaire owners."
Anne	"As a physician who values my relationship with my patients, non-compete restrictions can sever my relationships if I'm in an untenable work situation and need to leave. The only exception should be employees in a field that has proprietary information. This is not the case in medicine"
Kate	"Non-Compete Clauses are punitive without purpose for the vast majority of workers."
Elizabeth	"Regarding the proposed law eliminating non-compete agreements between an employer and an employee, I recommend that the law be adopted within 3 months of the adoption and publishing in the Register, and enforced within 6 months of same. Employers are unnecessarily hindering the ability of workers to change jobs within their chosen field and industry, in an effort to hold them hostage to said employer. It is a burdensome and unfair labor practice."
Bruce	"I support the non-compete clause rule, because it unfairly hurts workers and suppresses healthy competition. I am not anti-business. I worked for the same company for 25 years, and left only after an acquisition that was somewhat

	mismanaged. I had a non- compete clause in my work agreement at the time, and the irony is that as a professional (an engineer) the human resources director specifically told me at my termination that I need not worry about the non-compete clause as the company would definitely not try to enforce it in my case. I can only surmise that the primary reason is they did not think my skills and background would put me in a position to seriously compete in their core business, and that was reasonably correct; for the last seven years I've been doing very well as an independent consultant but not in direct competition with that company in any tangible way. The reason my history is relevant is that it demonstrates the selective, discretionary aspect of the non-compete clause for my relatively privileged, professional situation. A similar informal waiver would almost certainly rarely if ever be offered for the vast majority of skilled and unskilled, hourly jobs - the very jobs that stand to benefit the most from healthy competition and marketplace portability. Arguments that such a rule would hurt business interests are likely to be spurious, especially in the long term and in the big picture; while inability to implement or enforce non-compete clauses in work contracts may lead to increased wages, those increase wages over time lead to increased buying power and healthier businesses. They are also likely to result in higher worker satisfaction and thus to increased productivity and lower turnover, all of which help businesses. As a small business person I strongly support implementation of this rule."
Ben	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete clauses, and I have experience with these clauses negatively affecting my family and quality of healthcare in the region in which I live. A number of years ago, my father worked as a pediatric trauma surgeon in a large US city with two "level one trauma" hospitals, the only such hospitals in the region with this highest level of accreditation. Due to the economic standing of many of the people my father treated (his unit cared for many underinsured/uninsured patients), the hospital he worked at actively deprioritized and understaffed his unit to try to minimize their cost of care, resulting in deteriorating working conditions for him. For a long time, my father was the only surgeon in his unit, and I remember one summer he was seemingly on-call every day, working what felt like 80 hours every single week. Despite being unsatisfied with these conditions, my father did not want to leave his job as he had a no-compete clause that would prevent him from working for any nearby hospital for months. In this way, the no-compete clause encouraged both the exploitation of my father and the bad, profit-seeking behavior of the hospital by locking him in to a suboptimal contract where the hospital could get away with minimally staffing their trauma unit. In turn, this also significantly degraded the quality of care the trauma unit was able to provide, and with this being one of the only two level one centers in the region, this is a significant public health issue. These trauma centers often deal with very important issues such as treating children with gunshot wounds or lifesaving operations on babies in the neonatal intensive care unit. After a couple years my father grew tired enough of this situation to quit, and as a result of his no-compete clause, had to take an extended hiatus from working before being able to find another job. This further reduced the quality of care available to all in the region, as pediatric trauma specialists are not very common, and every one not working is one Chats could be saving lives on a daily basis. But, because the hospital decided to prioritize worker retention through a non-compete clause, they took (in my opinion) active steps toward degrading the quality of medical care in the region."

Rafael	"I support banning non-compete clauses."
Herb	"I strongly support eliminating non-compete clauses from employment contracts. There is no justification for limiting labor mobility, especially for low wage workers. These anti-freedom clauses should be the exception in labor contracts and only pertain to high wage workers with proprietary knowledge that could cause substantial damage to a company. The purpose of the FTC commission is to promote competitive markets; no-compete clauses are a clear violation of your charter. I just watched a video at today's New York Times about non-compete clauses which shows how harmful and unjustified these cotracts are and which has motivated me to write."
Susan	"I support this rule to ban non-compete contracts. I currently work for a financial institution and signed a non-compete almost six years ago when my job title, pay, and life circumstances were much different than they are now. Effectively my company is preventing me from earning a wage commensurate with my experience and skills. Thank you for proposing this change!"
Gunter	"Physicians regularly are required to sign non-compete clauses in nearly all clinical and academic employment contexts. This stifles clinical research and adds to already difficult staffing challenges. The notion that physicians should be beholden to non compete clauses in the midst of a healthcare crisis driven largely by understaffing is counterintuitive. There exists a wealth of writing and data on the adverse effects of non compete on physicians and on patient care. Get rid of non-compete"
Kim	"Non-Compete agreements should be banned. Everyone deserves the chance to increase their wages and or better their work environment. The argument that a company will train a worker who then leaves in a ridiculous argument that only serves the employer. Once trained a worker is indeed more valuable and should be compensated as such. The so called protections for employers is at the expense of the labor of the employee who many times would have to leave their home to find the same employment due to a non-compete. There is no incentive for the employer to financially take care of and reward employees who would readily be snapped up by another local employer. How is that fair? The employee's worth should be based on their ability and the market. For example take an argument that a specialized medical doctor hires a PA and assists their training in that particular specialty should be able to keep that PA solely working in their practice or be forced to move to another location far away (in areas like where I live it would require a physical move of home or several hours of driving per day). The argument that the PA could easily learn another specialty is a disservice to the hard work and tremendous effort as well as profits earned from that PA for the doctor. A good PA who is earning financial rewards thr the doctor's office can be paid far less than their value under the guise of "I trained her/him." The ban would include training repayment if it "is not reasonably related to the costs the employer incurred for training the worker." That is fair. Let that doctor pay fair market for the services or let the PA move to another office who will so. We hear fair market value and capitalism used as a defense for business, well it should also be a defense of the worker. No worker should be shackled to an employer and geography should not force continued employment long after it is helpful to the employee. No worker should have to uproot their family and move in order to change jobs. It is indeed time to foster innovation and preserve competition. End the non-compete clauses now!"

Jared	"It is critically important that the federal government enacts this measure to protects its citizens. There are no good faith companies or employers. They will enact lifetime non-competes if allowed to. The government protected the public good against robber barons, and it needs to find the guts to do the same thing in the 21st century. America has been completely taken over by a small number of plutocrats and this type of labor law is a crucial tool to unwinding the capture of the state by the ultra rich."
Tony	"As a contract employee for government and private sector contractors, and as a private sector employee, I've been required as a condition of employment to sign various non-competes. The effect of these was to lock me into particular employers and reduce my power to negotiate my rate. The cherry on top was being laid off during COVID and as a condition of my severance package, I had to agree not to work in the finance industry for a year, effectively forcing me to leave that specialty in order to seek a new position. This was unreasonable and unfair, but rejecting the severance wasn't an affordable option, and there was unemployment insurance to fall back on. I'd rather have looked for work, but my former employer made that the least acceptable option."
GEORGIA	"Non-compete clauses are bad for workers, and bad for the economy, and consequently bad for society as a whole. The FTC estimates that 30 million US workers, many of them in low-wage jobs, would have better career opportunities with this rule in effect, and wages would rise by $300 billion a year. This would be good for everyone, as more money would be collected in income taxes to fund essential services."
GEORGIA	"I strongly support the proposed rule. 30 million U.S. workers, many of them in low-wage jobs, would have better career opportunities with this rule in effect, and wages would rise by $300 billion a year."
Sue and John	"We support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses."
Dee	"Non-competes harm employees. They keep people trapped and financially ruin the vulnerable populations. How does the "free" country accept that its citizens' freedoms are restricted by corporate greed? Non-competes also stifle competition and innovation. There is no benefit to our citizens in the long run!"
Carter Joseph	"I wholeheartedly support this change and think it will be good for the economy"

David	"The only valid purpose of a non-compete agreement is to protect intellectual property. There are already laws sufficient enough for that purpose outside of a non-compete agreement. Non-compete clauses are most commonly used to retain and underpay talented people by denying them the ability to work for another company if they should leave. The states that have banned or severely limited this practice have it right and it's time for the federal government to get it right too."
Whitney	"Do not allow the American Hospital Association to successfully exclude physicians from the new FTC non compete rule. Why should physicians be treated any differently? Non competes ruin lives, keep workers in toxic environments or make them move their families and entire lives. Don't you want your doctor to be happy to show up to work and not disgruntled because he or she can't leave?"
Suzanne	"I am employed by a corporate veterinary organization as an associate veterinarian. I currently work in the state of NY. I have held 3 other associate positions in the 17 years I have been a veterinarian. In all cases, I have been subjected to a non-compete clause in my contract. While I have been fortunate that these clauses never caused me undue harm, they certainly could have based upon circumstances. I have always felt that non-compete clauses are illegal, immoral and quite reprehensible. Yet, what choice does one have when the dream job comes with one AND all the subsequent clinics in the area have them as well? I have always held the notion that should it come down it, I would go to court to fight for my right to have agency over my life. It is unconscionable that an employer could terminate my contract and I would not be "allowed" to find a job near my home. If an employer was not providing me with a healthy, vibrant and lucrative work experience, I should have the right to leave the practice and become gainfully employed, anywhere I choose. I support the FTC in its Non-Compete Clause Rule and I deeply hope that there is resolve to bring it forth. Thank you for the opportunity to comment."
Thomas	"Until this proposed rule was publicized, I was unaware that Non-Compete clauses existed for employees other than corporate officers or director-level employees and above. This is absurd. The notion that a sandwich maker or counter worker can materially affect the performance of a corporation by leaving and accepting employment at a competitor beggars the imagination. This Non-Compete Clause Rule should be accepted."
Heather R	"I was subject to a noncompete when I left a corporate position leading the retail company's diversity efforts. It included a long list of other retailers that could conceivably been competitors. The list was over-broad in my view and included companies all over the US. The non-compete was time limited to one year so that was good but it definitely constrained my ability to enter into future employment or to do consulting. I strongly support this rule. The legal nondisclosure agreements that people holding trade secrets have to sign and that continue after leaving a job should suffice to protect companies. Noncompetes hurt workers."

Susan	"Hello, I am a pelvic floor specialist in the state of Vermont. I have certifications, trainings, and a doctorate education. I am currently being held at a place of employment due to a non compete that I signed, regrettably so. I would love to be able to offer and extend my services to more rural areas of Vermont, but unfortunately my hands are tied. For me, this issue is not about pay, but more so about occupational justice and healthcare accessibility. I appreciate you taking comments and considers a ban to non compete agreements in the United States."

	"I have been in the Asphalt business since I was 16 I do sales now and am 53 a non complete basically gives the employer any reason they want to cut pay or other compensation without having to think about recourse from the employee. If I had to stay out of my field for a year I would (lose) everything. How is this fair especially in a blue collar industry" -Tom
	"I am as software engineer currently subject to a non-compete clause. This discourages me from seeking new jobs with better wages or with better employers. I was wary about accepting a job with a non-compete clause, but it was non-negotiable and I lacked legal counsel to help propose or advocate for changes. I still lack such legal counsel, and have no idea where I might find them. The software industry has every incentive to make these clauses standard; they cost employers nothing, and make it so employees face legal repercussions if they leave seeking better employment. The description of what constitutes a competitor is vague, and seems to contradict the idea of being an at-will employee - a moderately broad interpretation is that you are "free to leave" so long as you do not take another job in your profession for a couple years, a financial burden almost no employees can or should be expected to afford. As such, I am wary to leave my job, despite knowing there are companies offering better financial compensation and intangibles (e.g. work/life balance), for fear of legal retribution. In short, non-compete clauses are unethical and interfere with the functioning of free-market economics, shackling employees to companies and thus dramatically decreasing the pressure those companies feel to improve their employees' experience. In my time at this company, I have not gotten a pay raise despite high inflation and good performance; there hasn't even been a discussion. It would be incorrect to assume had policies would become public knowledge and keep employers at bay, thus providing pressure to change. Employees who feel shackled to the company would not want to sabotage it by spreading ugly truths, thereby hurting profits and increasing the risk of their own salary being cut. So the cycle is self-perpetuating; companies can make more profits by limiting employee freedoms even after their term of employment." -Christopher

	"I almost cried tears of happiness when I saw this potential ban. Non-competes area way to avoid the responsibility employers have of making the work place a desirable place to make a living. A non-compete is dismissal of those obligations. By making me sign a non-compete, it tells me that my employer owns my immediate future. It means they can ignore the issues surrounding why someone would want to work for a competitive company (competitive pay, declining culture, benefits, involuntary change in responsibilities, etc). It's lazy. There a variety of reasons why one would want to leave their employer. These non-competes only address one or two reason why and ignore the other reason rooted in basic humanity. Maybe the boss that hired me left and my new boss is horrible. As a result, my mental health deteriorates due to lack of good leadership and clear expectations for example. I get an offer to work for a competitor for a 30% increase in pay (currently getting barely 2% cost of living raise every year which is not nearly enough to keep up with inflation). So because I signed a non-compete, I'm stuck getting low wages indefinitely unless I take a year break to work in a different industry...The sad thing is, if my company decided they didn't want me anymore, they could just fire me. AND, I STILL can't work for a competitor, even if I'm fired. Until one year has passed from date of firing. So, what is a person to do? Switch industries in the middle of a budding career? Take a pay cut? Spend a bunch of money training in a new industry? I have two kids and (am) kinda in love with what I do, I just do not enjoy my company. Imagine millions of Americans out there who are being jailed by their employers. That's a million people who could develop depression. Will some of these one million people react differently to this work-related depression depending on their chemical makeup? Can it compound with the already dire situations millions of Americans face every day? Do a majority of these millions of people have children? Are children's development and mental well-being heavily reliant on mental well-being of parents?" -Taylor
	"I strongly support the plan to invalidate all employee non-compete contract clauses. My husband and I are physicians and we have had to move our family four times since leaving medical school in order to fmd adequate and fair employment. Many health care employers are private companies and their priority is profit instead of patient well being. Trying to find a job in which we can fix:us on outcomes instead of profit has taken many years. We have three children and we had to move to new towns, new houses and new schools due to these non compete clauses. We are not trying to steal trade secrets or patients. We simply want to work in a stable environment in which we can focus on caring for our patients. I believe that non compete clauses are very unfair." -Mary
	"As a True American who loves this country, and believes in the Free Market, I hope and wish the FTC will do the right thing and end non-compete clauses. They are antithetical to the Free Market and as such have no place in the American workforce." -Taylor

"As a yoga instructor who is both self-employed and employed by various studios and clubs, I write in opposition to non-compete clauses in employer-employee contracts. If enforced, non-compete clauses could prevent me from earning an income in my community outside the limited opportunities with one employer. This would place an intolerable burden upon me and other instructors working under the non-compete clauses of our contracts. Non-compete clauses in my field of fitness instruction give employers unwarranted control over their employee's ability to earn income in our field of training, especially in smaller communities like mine where there may only be one or two studios or clubs where fitness classes are offered. The effects of the sudden shut down of fitness clubs and yoga studios during the pandemic revealed the vulnerability of those in my field when we are held back by non-compete clauses. In order to continue to earn an income during the shutdown, we had to create our own online classes and reach out to find new students unaffiliated with die clubs and studios who had employed us. Many of my friends were unable to meet the challenge, and they turned to the community for financial and survival support during the pandemic As the pandemic conditions revealed, non-compete clauses can put a burden on local communities when those subject to the non-compete clause find themselves unable to earn a living. Non-compete clauses create an inequitable power dynamic between employee and employer, and they should have no place in our field of fitness instruction which is notoriously underpaid."

"The ability for an employee to ensure they are optimizing their career and earnings potential has been greatly hampered by non-compete clauses especially related to the Defense industrial complex and its largest employers...These employers take advantage of the opportunity to reduce competition within contracted positions. The federal government is the one who pays the price when a prime or a sub on a contract could afford to pay more to a Subject Matter Expert level employee but because of the non-compete rules between contract competitors they cannot be retained in support of the contract at the wage level that would entice them to stay. This leads to reduced productivity as the support team has to train new employees more often. Ultimately, it is the Tax Payers who fund this chum in contracted positions when one company underbids to win a contract. I have been witness to this repeatedly throughout my career supporting the military as a federal contractor. Talent leaves because they cannot be retained by company A at their wages (most notably when salary increases are not given in line with inflation skill level increases) and company B on the same contract could hire them for retaining their knowledge and skill but the non-compete doesn't allow that. The employee is left to find an alternative employer who treats them in line with their perceived compensation value."

"I am entirely against non-compete clauses. My son was undergoing testing for food allergies with the goal of desensitizing. There is one allergy clinic in a 25-30 mile radius, as well as it being the only one on our side of bridges, tunnels, and heavy traffic. Our preferred doctor had been required to sign a 12 month non-compete clause. When she left the practice, our whole desensitizing came to a halt because the owner of the practice is not proficient with food allergies. When the 12 months ended, the pandemic had created horrible circumstances for the doctor to set up her new practice. It's now over 3 years since she left that practice, and the desensitizing will not happen for various reasons. Instead of being able to open her own practice she now works for another, larger clinic for one day a week. If the non-compete clause had not been signed, my son would be finished and on his maintenance dose. The owner of the practice who made her sign was well over 75 years old, but was so petty that he didn't want competition. Get rid of non-compete clauses."

M	"This comment is regarding the Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200. As a single mother who has returned to the workforce after years of caring for my child with a disability , I am at a serious disadvantage due to my employer's noncompete clause. That clause prevents me from improving my economic situation and advancing my career, by prohibiting me from seeking employment with clients who experience my work and are willing to hire me. I have had to refuse offer of employment because of this clause. My clients are my only chance to advance my career. Yet, these are exactly the same people I am prohibited from seeking employment with, by the non-compete clause. That clause has kept me stuck with my employer for years, and counting. I strongly support the elimination of the non-compete clause. Thank you for the opportunity to comment on this critical rule."
Chirine	"Please eliminate the nine compete clause. It is impacting patients health."
Sara	"I think Non-compete clauses are quite inhibiting to employees. My non-compete is a 10 mile radius for one year to work in any like physical therapy clinic , referring physician or create a business of my own that would be in competition of my current physical therapy clinic. This is super inhibiting to the employee where my company does not fully value or support my interests and instead I am stuck in a job that is not supporting me. I think they limit an employee from growth opportunities that exist. By taking a year off this would hurt my family but it would also hurt the patients I see as I work as a specialist and there are only 5 other therapists in the northern VA region that treat die patients I do. It is quite a

	disservice to the public when health care professionals can not switch to work for companies that would support specialists."
Syed	"Considering the shortage of physicians particularly in rural areas it is important for a willing physician to continue providing health care to the community irrespective of the employer. The reality is, patients will seek treatment from a clinician he or she feels comfortable. Preventing a physician to serve a community due to non compete clause is unfair for the patients and families. I strongly oppose non-compete clause in the contract."
Emily	"I would fully and entirely support this. It does not even seem legal for non-compete agreements to exist. What happened to the free market? I'm a doctor and it was hard for me to find a job without a non-compete clause in the city. It was important for me to avoid these, because in a city everything is close and the clause typically describes a radius. These exist SOLELY to favor the organization rather than the worker. They allow organizations to undervalue their workers."
Yamin	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. I feel that noncomplete agreements for standard level workers are examples of corporate overreach and an attempt to take have excess control over their employees. I strongly believe that banning these noncompete agreements will help ordinary Americans.. Thank You."
Almotasembellah	"It is modern day slavery for clinicians where health care system blackmail to stay unhappy in a job or leave the whole area where your family has all their relations, schools and activities and were you belt a life for yourself and your family. It defies the basics of American principles of free market and competition and encourages monopoly. Most health care system in US are not for profit with CEO's earning millions of dollars and all of them should be included."
Ashely	"I am an emergency medicine physician. Non-competes are a danger to patient care. While this is great for a company trying to make money this is terrible for patient healthcare. An example in Florida: A friend and fellow emergency physician saw that a company was under staffing an emergency department and people were dying in the waiting room. When the doctor tried to bring this up and have the staffing fixed the medical staffing company fired her. These medical staffing companies have one goal: money. Their only responsibility is a fiduciary responsibility to shareholders. They do not care about patients. Because of the common corporate requirement to sign away due process in physician contracts there were no repercussions for her firing. The physician was fired and was forced to leave an area where she's been living in serving the community for over 30 years due to the non-compete in her contract. When physicians see dangerous practices being performed by companies they need to be able to speak out against these issues without fear of repercussions. They cannot do that if they do not have due process and if they have a noncompete for the area that they live, especially in a time where corporate medicine is taking over the hiring and firing positions and other medical practitioners. The sole purpose of a noncompete agreement is to be able to control medical providers. There's no other purpose to it. This does not serve our communities and should be disallowed."

Cindy	"I am a physician , and there are absolutely NO good reasons to have non-compete clauses apply to physicians. In the medical field non-compete clauses are used in the same way as in other industries: to prevent physicians from leaving bad jobs. I currently have a physician friend with four children who now has to drive 50 miles to her clinic job because she left a poorly managed private-equity owned hospital-based clinic. Without the non-compete clause she would be able to spend time with her family because she could have worked as a physician closer to home. There should be no physician "carve out" in this rule to exempt physicians from the non-compete clause rule."
Sherry	"Banning noncompetes is essential for those employees who are only experienced in one type of field of work. My husband has worked in the asphalt industry for over 35 years and is very educated in that field. For him to have a noncompete which bans him from all asphalt companies creates a heavy burden to try to find another job in another trade making the salary he needs to support his family for the duration of the non compete. IT's understandable to have some type of legal contract for ex-employees to not give away company "secrets" or details on how a company bids and gets work or sells products. Forcing an employee to stop working in a certain trade that they have done for many years for the terms of a noncompete can be financially devastating."
Arham	"This is an incredibly important rule and I strongly support it as a college student seeking tech internships. Many companies have extensive non competes that are unreasonable and unfair."
Julie	"Please adopt this proposed ban on non-competes as a final regulation. Non-competes are harmful to employees, employers, and the economy. No worker should ever be forced to move or give up his or her livelihood for any amount of time in order to take or leave a job. While an employer may argue that this is "voluntary" and "contractual," the imbalance of power between employer and employee often makes it a contract of adhesion. Employers are also harmed by non-competes as non-competes limit healthy chum in the workforce that brings new ideas into a company. The economy suffers as worker pay is limited by these agreements. This is a long overdue regulatory action that aligns with the spirit of liberty for all Americans. Thank you."
Rebecca	"Iain a small animal veterinarian that works full-time. I am also the mother of three small children and my financial contribution to my family is significantly more than my husband's due to the nature of my profession and additional schooling. My current non-compete clause prevents me from easily finding a more suitable place of employment as it consists of a 18 month, 10 mile radius if I were to terminate my contract. In a middle sized town this negatively impacts my ability to leave the currently toxic work environment, as well as to find a financial situation that would be better as it would require me to drive an extra 30 minutes each way. My husband is a high school teacher- he leaves for work at 6:30am so I get all 3 kids ready for school prior to leaving for work. Adding 30 minutes to my already 20 minute commute if I were to leave my current job and

	have to work outside of my noncompete would therefore mean we would need to hire someone to get children off to school in the mornings. Noncompete clauses prohibit employees to find jobs that either could provide a higher salary or better benefits or a better fit. A noncompete clause preventing an employee from easily providing for their family puts them in a situation where they are not happy with their work place and contributes to mental health concerns. Veterinarians have one of the highest suicide rates of professionals and part of this is lack of job satisfaction and limiting a person from finding a more satisfactory position due to noncompete clauses is part of that. I believe preventing someone from providing for their family financially by limiting where they can work and contribute to society is unconstitutional."
Glenn	"Thank you for this proposed rule. It is long overdue."
Sam	"I support the proposed ban on the use of noncompete clauses. As a veterinarian who has both owned a private practice and worked at private and corporate practices, I have seen these issues from both sides. I believe that these clauses are often strong-armed from applicants at the time of negotiation or signing and most do not contemplate that not all jobs will pan out as planned. Some work environments become abusive or toxic. Some employers fail to provide benefits and salary that is well deserved. Some employers refuse to invest in modern equipment or upgrade the work practices as information and technology evolve which handcuffs employees who want to advance in their careers. Having these noncompetes gives the employer an unfair advantage with respect to future contract negotiations and may by their very nature force an employee to work at a job that is either not suited to their style of medicine or personality. Some employees may be forced to submit to a very negative work environment because they can not afford to move the entire family and have their children change schools etc.. I have always believed that an employer that pays a fair wage and treats employees well will always be able to find and keep employees."
Joseph	"I whole heartily agree with dissolving the non-compete basis. It restricts the employee from having the freedom to choose. It reduces accountability and competition in the market. How can companies be accountable to their employees if they at the same time restrict the ability of the employee to earn a higher income at a protentional competitive company. People have talents, skills and abilities, these should be able to be marketed freely in the marketplace. Employers should compete to offer the best compensation package and the best workplace environment to keep and retain employees. I am impacted and my income has been limited. I am not able to be promoted and I have reached my highest income bracket. My performance is exceptional. I am under a non-compete. Should I just stay with my employer and put my head down and work hard with the hope that I can achieve more and support not just my family, but my community and this country? Or should I risk leaving, take my skills and abilities on my own or to a competitor and risk litigation because of a non-compete? I am also a person who is protected by the American with disabilities act. I am stuck, I support dissolution of enforceability of the non-compete. Free market capitalism is the way to grow our county and also allow higher earnings for employees."

Connor	"This is great! Thank you for pushing this change, you will be helping workers like me all around the US find better jobs, be able to move more freely between jobs, and increase pay. Thank you!"
Ronald	"I am a physician . Non-competes have no place in medicine - especially for specialties such as Anesthesia, ER etc where the patients don't choose their own physician. Non-competes are used solely to control physicians, to decrease their employment options and to depress their wages. Physicians don't have trade secrets. Non-competes should be completely banned for physicians - and for all professions for that matter. They serve only as a method of control. Nothing more. They are extremely harmful and totally unjustified. I'm very glad that the FTC is looking into them. They should have been banned long ago."
Dylan	"Please ban non-competes. Workers should be able to work whomever they want whenever they want."
Thomas	"As a physician that has needed to transplant my family multiple times because of a non-compete clause in Virginia, I support 100% any legislation to reform this practice as it not only puts a inappropriate burden on the individual (and their family if applicable) but also stifles competition."
Brian	"Physicians need to be included, they are already forced to work because of crippling student debt they should at least be able to leave their place of work without having to move their family"
Clifford	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Non-competes are a toxic barrier that companies use to stifle future competition. Startups need protection; established companies do not - their market presence is already an advantage. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Clifford Berg Reston, VA 20191"
Cynthia	"Please ban non compete clauses in medical contracts. These lock physicians into situations that can be abusive or hostile, and force physicians to move hours away to change jobs. This is disruptive to their patient population as well as to the doctor and their family. Particularly egregious are non competes that include all entities owned by the corporation, and that last any longer than a few months. The only reason for this is to trap physicians in poor situations, and to ensure revenue flow that should belong to the physician remains with the corporation"
Jeremy	"I have been a physician in practice for 10 years. Non-compete clauses make health care workers live in constant fear of what would happen if we lost our jobs. For example, if for some reason, I no longer worked for my current hospital, my non-compete clause would force me to relocate my entire family including school-aged children, just so I could continue to practice medicine. After all the years I put into school and training and the debt I incurred and the hours that I keep taking care of patients, the inability for me to change jobs without packing up and leaving the area is very unfair."

Brendan	"As a veterinarian , I have been severely distressed by the restriction placed on my family by non compete contracts. These are so rampant in veterinary businesses now due to corporate buyouts of practices, that simply refusing to sign one is not an option. They serve only to further the profits of these corporations. I felt trapped in a job that was very stressful and combative. In order to leave the non compete radius I've had to drive 45 minutes further away from my home everyday. These non competes harm veterinarians, and practices who are unable to recruit and continue to work with disgruntled trapped employees. Businesses should work to retain employees like us through training, pay, work environment, growth and gratitude. Non competes are simply traps. Importantly, this severely stifles competition for workers and drives up costs to pet owners. My understanding is there is no historical legal precedent for non competes the way they're applied today. They should be eliminated retroactively. Thank you for taking the time to consider this important issue and our opinions."
Ahmed	"I strongly support this proposal. As an experienced specialist in human language technology , there are only so many companies that can afford or make use of my talents. Since I am also an entrepreneur and I am always building something, I find non-competes detrimental not only on my ability to contract with companies that insist on a non-compete, foreclosing my ability to contract with someone in my field after I have completed my work with a contractor, but also my ability to create and innovate. We already have NDAs and Patent laws to protect companies from unfair disclosure of proprietary information or the infringement on intellectual property. Noncompetes serve not purpose and only result in unnecessary worker hardship."
Justin	"I am in favor of banning none-compete. This would benefit the working class greatly."
Rachel	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. I am an OBGYN in private practice in Virginia and my employer would not remove or modify the non-compete clause of the contract, which states I cannot function as an OBGYN in the area for 2 years. Without threats of litigation I cannot work as an OBGYN hospitalist in a city 30 minutes away, which is not competing with the practice. The next closest hospital system or private practice location is over an hour away. I have spent nearly half a million dollars to become educated to practice as an OBGYN. Based on the noncompete I must either spend countless hours on the road away from my family while spending more money on gas, new tires, etc., or uproot my family (and lose their jobs) & move away from friends and relatives to a new city. Please consider passing this ban to allow workers to change employers without having to sacrifice either their homes, their occupation, or their wellbeing."
Michael	"Onerous non-compete clauses are common in my field (veterinary medicine), with little ability to negotiate for fair terms especially as hospitals are purchased by large corporations. Rather than protect businesses, these clauses restrict licensed professionals from seeking employment within what is usually a large radius. In states that ban non-compete clauses, there is little evidence that the free movement of employees produces a burden on employers that is any different from what is seen in states that allow these clauses. I believe that a ban of non-complete clauses is the only ethical way forward for our labor force because the restriction on our freedom to work only hurts workers and consumers."

Suneetha	"Please include physicians as a trade that will benefit from removal of noncompete clause. The individual physician is often at the rim and Mercy of heavily lobbied corporate healthcare institutions that enforce punitive practices that virtually make it impossible for physicians to earn livelihood and forced to endure employment in sub optimal and disadvantage of conditions"
Michael	"I fully support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. I am a pediatric hospital medicine physician. Non-compete clauses are extremely common in my profession. Some limit working for another provider in die same city, other limit any outside work anywhere. I pose no risk to any employer by working for another employer in my spare time. My patients do not come to the hospital because I work there, they come because they prefer that hospital for various reasons. The non-compete only serves the purpose of limiting where I can work and therefore makes me obligated to only work for one hospital system. This leads to limited availability of physicians, mid-level providers, and other staff. It also has forced myself and many of my colleagues to avoid working full time. We are better off working per diem for several different employers to avoid non-compete clauses. This means we don't get benefits and must purchase our own insurance, fund our own retirement, etc. This also means we must travel to other cities away from our family to work. This rule is long overdue and should be implemented as soon as possible."
Pat	"I firmly believe that getting rid of the non-complete clause would benefit the work force and the individuals capacity for earning I'm a DoD contractor , working part- time, who feels limited in my employment opportunities, because I have to sign a non-compete clause saying I won't work for another government or state agency until at least one year after I terminate my employment in my current position."
James	"I am a physician and these clauses take advantage of us. I have worked >13 years in training where I have been subjected to countless being taken advantage of with low pay and paying for basic amenities. These clauses allow hospitals to low ball physicians and treat them poorly since are committed by these ridiculous non competes. I want to be able to live in the city my family is in and work somewhere I am valued for my commitment to patients. By not allowing non competes, it will force administration to pay fair wages, treat the work force as not expendable, and allow physicians the freedom to find the best job for them. Physicians are taken advantage of for years and the most trained people in the hospital. They sacrifice decades and should not be punished or taken advantage of."
Heather	"Non-compete agreements should be completely abolished. Not only does it effect specialty trained/skilled medical providers to earn a living, but it negatively hinders the patient-provider relationship."
Heather Callahan	"non competes are unfair, especially for medical providers. it infringes on the provider-patient relationship, as well as goes against public interest, in addition to negatively impacting a professional's right to earn a living."

Jeremy	"Please end do not compete rules. I am a physician and if I left my position I would have to move out of my area to get another job. It is not a fair situation for employed physicians."
D	"Non-compete clauses are cruel and predatory, they benefit nobody and harm everyone. If you believe in a free and fair market you should be opposed to a non-compete clause, and if you believe in worker's rights or regulations you should be opposed to non-compete clauses. They hurt businesses by restricting the workers they can hire, they hurt workers by restricting their negotiating power, and they hurt innocent bystanders when people are forced to move for their jobs. Banning Non-compete clauses should have happened decades ago, but better late than never."
Mary	"Noncompete clauses preclude me from assisting in helping to alleviate the severe staffing shortage in my area of anesthesia care providers. As a result my fellow citizens, neighbors and community members often suffer prolonged scheduling times or cancellations due to the lack of resources to provide for their care. My noncompete limits me to working ONLY in my facility and not locally to assist my community. Noncompetes are deleterious not just to the providers but also to the community at large."
Jay	"I have two perspectives on non-competes. I worked for a company that did not require non-competes for any of our positions. Very often when trying to hire for skilled positions candidates that we were hiring were subjected to non-competes. This limited their ability to move to companies that paid better wages, offered better benefits and retirement opportunities. If you treat your associates well, pay them well and provide them with upward mobility, then they have no need to look elsewhere, which is why we never chose the route of non-competes. Now, where I am currently in my career, I was let go by said company after a 31 year career. Simply, a new manager had a difference of opinion and wanted to bring in his own team. In order for me to receive my 2022 bonus and severance package, the company forced me into signing a 1 year non-compete. This greatly limits my potential at finding a job and supporting my family. They walked away from me, I didn't walk from them, so holding me hostage for 1 year without being able to work in the industry is unfair, unjustified and overreaching, so I am carefully watching how this plays out and would greatly support eliminating this old policy."
Daniel	"As a routine rule, the use of noncompete clauses in the practice of medicine should be banned. Physicians and other providers should want to stay at practices for positive reasons such as the positive experience of treating patients with any practice and/or the reimbursement received by employment in a practice or hospital. If at any time the physician or provider wishes to leave that practice and continue to practice in that same area that should be their right. It is very difficult, if not impossible to start private practices in the current era with electronic medical records, and the burden of human capital management. I personally have had a negative experience as a result of noncompete clauses, where I was influenced by the promise of a partnership in a practice, only to not be offered a partnership when employed. I was forced to leave the area and the patients that I was treated. Unfortunately, I was not the first and may not be the last to encounter this dilemma. Please ban non competes. Let healthy competition be the norm. This will hopefully end un fair employment practices within the practice of medicine"

Caroline	"Non-compete restrictions area form of indenture. They MUST be made against the law as a matter of public policy. In historic usage, an indenture was an agreement to bind someone as a laborer. Those agreements usually included a benefit such as training which are typically absent from modern employment agreements. Those subject to an indenture had little control over employment. Adequate employment is essential to survival in the contemporary United States, and I hope that is not the type of arrangement we want as the basis for our employment arrangements. In the old days, non-compete agreements were enforceable only against uniquely situated senior executives. When I first heard about widespread non- compete agreements, I dismissed such suggestions as unenforceable. Now it seems that some court and or politician has made the extremely imprudent decision that these provisions are enforceable. How does an individual employee harm an employer by working for a competitor? I can think of only two ways: by receiving improved compensation, thereby potentially increasing the going cost of labor in the marketplace and/or by going to a competitor that takes advantage of the employee's unique skills and abilities to make the marketplace more competitive. It would seem that both are desirable outcomes, not undesirable ones.... for any but the former employer. When further considering non-compete agreements, we must think about the possible conditions which precipitate a desire for an employee to change jobs: an employee may be under-compensated. They may be subject to poor treatment in the workplace, including being subject to conditions that are unsafe. They may be subject to discrimination or harassment. Is it public policy that such employees should not be allowed to leave without being sued? Additionally, it is critical that employees be allowed to find work within a reasonable distance of their homes. Moving is not a realistic choice for many individuals or families for a variety of reasons. Perhaps work does not provide sufficient income to fund a move to a new region and new living quarters. Perhaps the employee has family members with special needs who cannot reasonably relocate. Maybe family members are dependent upon the employee for care. The unfortunate reality is that many if not most Americans live excruciatingly close to the poverty line. The necessity of moving or taking a job at a lower rate of pay may be enough to push them into that abyss with potentially dire implications for entire families We cannot permit private employers to ransom the right to work because they do not wish to pay competitive wages or maintain a workplace that attracts workers. This is anti-competitive, anti "free market" and not the sort of society any of us wishes to inhabit."
Jill	"Due to an enforceable noncompete in Virginia, Carilion hospital systems successfully dismantled a large neurology practice then enforced its noncompete until the majority of neurologists left the Roanoke valley. Today, we have approximately 1/2 of the neurologists we need and Carilion will still not relax its noncompete clause. The new neurologists coming in were trained by Carilion so that we are not bringing in new thoughts or outside training and wisdom. This recycled local training deprived patients of valuable resources all in the name of protecting a multi-million dollar a year profit giant. Please outlaw noncompetes so that we can return to a healthy medical system in our underserved area. Thank you!"

Dereck	"Good afternoon, To whom this may concern. I was recently subject to a cease and desist from a prior employer regarding insurance sales . I left on good terms and at one point looked to come back to the organization when I was advised that they could not afford to bring me back onboard due to the change in housing industry and the impact it had on insurance sales. I worked closely with the vice president in which they advised once they could do so, they would reach out. It was at that time, that I realized my options were limited, and having been in the industry 10 years, had the knowledge to do so on my own. I was vetted by a big name company and asked to join as an Agency Owner at which point I successfully onboarded. Because my "business" operates within 50 miles of their location, I have been told that I must stop all business and prove that I am not doing something that impacts their bottom line. 1, one man, against a company of 60-100 employees. In a market that is not saturated in the available Loan Officers, Real Estate Agents, Title companies and more to have access to in the entire state, I...one man, am supposedly going to cause harm to their financial stability. I write this comment to you to say that I was left demoralized, left with a feeling of being insufficient, and have done something wrong even though I did nothing of the sort. I write to say that this is an unfair practice, and in a world of constant evolution and the hope of change, this form of engagement for employees should be removed entirely. 1 am simply trying to provide for myself and wife and have no ill intentions on taking business away from anyone. My only goal is to provide a service that is sought out by everyone and to try to legally enforce that I must move 50 miles away, or to not engage in something that is similar to what someone else does is imposturous and takes away from anyone who is looking at entrepreneurship or simply working for another organization who may have their best interest."
Laurel	"I am writing to support getting rid of non competes/ restrictive covenants. I am a physician , currently very happily employed by the department of veterans affairs taking care of our nation's veterans. At my current job as a federal employee I do not have a non compete but also have no plans on leaving. However prior to my current position, I was employed in private practice and the restrictive covenants I had at my previous employer and the non competes I was presented with when I was interviewing (as high as 60 miles for 2 years from a major state academic hospital) were prohibitive. I would have to move my entire family/husband/child to an entirely new city in order to be gainfully employed. I am a doctor- I don't carry trade secrets only the training my undergraduate, medical school, and residency provided. It is unreasonable for employers to prevent employees from leaving (by preventing the ability to obtain a similar position elsewhere). I am in full support of removing non competes. Respectfully, Laurel Cununings, MD FAAD"
M	"Non-competes stifle competition in the economy and must be done away with."

Matt	"Please ban non compete agreements! They can make it so hard to find another job. Even if there are places where you can work, finding out what positions and companies are ok can be a huge burden on job seekers. it's already hard enough finding a job that fits my skills, provides the benefits I need and is in a suitable location. I don't need more restrictions, especially when they only benefit the employers while I'm out of work."
Clayton	"As a business owner , and often an prospective employee (with partner companies) I've seen non-competes proliferate from the C-suite down to workers at Jimmy Johns (sandwich workers)! They are unfair, hurtful, and punitive. I often see companies punitively enforce these from some 'lack of loyalty' litmus test. But if you believe in the freedom of the market then noncompetes are nonsensical. Furthermore, IF you were insist someone not work in a given industry for a period of time... then pay them at their market value to sit out (like a college coach). Non-solicitation agreements are fine. And trade secrets must be respected. However noncompetes do nothing to on those ends. Did you even know that lawyers, most major firms, don't have non-competes because they know it's just an invitation to incur expensive litigation. Do what is right after all these decades of being anti-worker. End non-competes and you know what? You'll find it's actually pro-business. The only businesses that truly want non-competes can't ... compete."
Jennifer	"Any congressional leader in support of the abolishment of non compete clauses stands firm for individual rights and freedoms. We are not slaves. We are professionals and rather than imposing harsh rules against competent individuals companies should seek patents rights for their scientific advancement."

Luis	"I fully support removal of non-competes clauses. This sometimes causes individuals to have to move great distances in order to continue working within their own profession. That should be illegal!"
Marsha	"Noncompete clauses benefit no one except for People at the top of big corporations. My son has been greatly mistreated by his employer, who at the last minute decided to use a non-compete agreement to punish him for trying to leave to make a better life for his family. But it seems according to the law we have little to no recourse. There needs to be a rule to protect employees."
Nicole	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" I am a physician who has been placed in the uncomfortable position of dealing with a noncompete clause when I left my last employer. I should have the freedom to work where I want to. After all, I am not a piece of property. The better question is why I left in the first place. Profits are always priority which is precisely the problem. I am in entire agreement with their removal."
Jean	"Non-compete should be eliminated. All physicians agree! California is great in this regard. Thank you for doing this."

Laura	"I support the banning of non-compete clauses. If companies wish to maintain competent workers, they should do so by offering the best wages and benefits rather than by the coercive use of a non-compete. Competition is key to innovation. If a company cannot compete with those that offer the possibility of better living conditions for workers (without whom the company would not survive), then that company should either make itself competitive or dissolve."
Melinda	"Please do this! I have lost thousands in income due to non competes. This would change my families lives in so many ways. My job is client based so all my clients are going to my boss and she has made comments to drive business away and my hands are tied. I truly need this to help my family."
Kim	"Posted in another Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care and ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter."
Jim	"I strongly support the proposed rule. Given the other protections available to employers, non-compete clauses are an unreasonable restraint on workers' ability to pursue alternate employment."
David	Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. I have personally been impacted and know many colleagues who have been personally impacted, despite being line-level employees with no sensitive knowledge or any meaningful business impact. Employment power is still heavily skewed to the employer, and there is no meaningful mechanism to negotiate non-competes, or even to be aware of them prior to accepting an offer of employment. I have tried multiple times to request a full copy of employment agreement before accepting an offer, and most companies are unwilling to do this. Further, even though most non-competes are overly broad and likely not enforceable, the average citizen does not have the legal fund to tither determine this or defend themselves. All an employer needs to do is send a cease and desist letter to the new employer, and the new employer can simply rescind an offer just to play it safe. The employee has no meaningful recourse. Non competes continue to enforce the skewed power dynamic between employer and employee--limiting or banning this practice would help to even the playing field between corporation and individual."

Victor	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Freddy	"I work in the insurance industry and have a very niche client base. During 5 years, I had single handily sold over a million dollars in revenue to my company. They never gave me a raise, they never gave me an annual commissions, and when I asked for this - their response was to fire me. I was able to get a job with a much more reputable organization- but due to my non-compete/non-solicit agreement - they have threatened both me and my clients that can no longer work with me. They have since ceased providing any service for these clients and they all want to leave- but unfortunately to the agreement that they made me sign - they can not come to me for 2 years. My client base is very limited and now I am either forced to learn a new trade or be without having these clients. I took a large pay cut without these clients and have 3 children, one with special needs."
Victoria	"In the fullest pursuit of fostering a competition between businesses to promote financial growth, labor rights, and innovation, the FTC should go forward with die removal non-compete clause. The FTC should continue its legacy and purpose of striking down unfair labor practices and allow laborers die flexibility and peace of mind that they can leave a company to find better pay and business standards without fear of retribution from former employers that would stifle an individuals financial and personal prosperity."
Christopher	"As an anesthesiologist , I have been contractually bound by non-compete contract clauses which would force me to move to a different area if I ever wanted to change jobs. Yet, I have no private patients. I have no proprietary knowledge of my corporate employer's business secrets, and my corporate employer has no knowledge of practicing medicine. The only purpose of my non-compete clause is to create a local monopoly and keep wages down and working conditions poor. Non-compete clauses are generally contrary to free-Arlen forces, but especially for those of us in medicine who are not stealing customers. In addition, while there is a nationwide shortage of anesthesiologists, non-competes are against the public interest."
Elizabeth	"They should be banned and illegal."
Grace	"Please ban non-competes. Sincerely a pediatrician"

Jeffrey	"Non-compete clauses in physician contracts place profits ahead of patient care and provider wellness and should be ended."
James	"I am a physician working for Medstar health. They standardized my contract and introduced a non compete clause after I had been working for them for 10 years. I had little choice but to except the change in contract. Five years later when they decreased my salary by 16%, I left. I could not leave the area for personal reasons. The only option I could find is 1.25 hours away. This impacts my patients as well. They now have to travel further to get the care they need. Please abolish the non compete"
Janelle	"Would help the medical community with its staffing shortages due to locums and travelers, and equalize pay within geographic areas over time."
Jenny	"Non-Compete clauses area detriment to both healthcare workers and those in their care. If a healthcare worker sees an unmet need in their own community they are often hampered from innovating by starting something new because if they leave their employment they often cannot work in their own community. This causes some healthcare workers to feel trapped because they do not wish to move nor can they remain in their community without employment Eliminating these clauses also encourages a spirit of cooperation between healthcare offices and institutions and collaboration leads to better patient care. When healthcare workers are free to innovate in communities they know and love, the patients' needs are better met and patient satisfaction is higher."
Kathleen	" I appreciate the opportunity to comment on the Federal Trade Commission's Proposed Rule regarding non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses keep workers stuck in jobs they wish to leave; this Rule is immensely important to those workers Training repayment agreements (known as TRAPs) also keep workers stuck in jobs they wish to leave, and should be banned along with non-compete clauses. I am writing to share my experience with a TRAP. I am an airline pilot, and I was forced to sign a TRAP with Ameriflight, one of the largest cargo companies in the US. The company flies outdated, retro-fitted-for-cargo, multiengine turboprop airplanes to final "outstations" for UPS, FedEx, and DHL. Outstations are remote cities near the larger hubs where the larger jets fly in. I flew cargo from San Juan, PR to many of the islands along the archipelago of islands stretching to the SE, including St. Croix, St. Thomas, St. Marten, Dominica, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Antigua, St. Kitt's, and more. I worked long days, flying alone (all operations were single pilot), and had to wait for hours on tarmac ramps, waiting for personnel to load and unload. It was grueling work, and as the Pandemic eased and travel re-opened, a major opportunity for career advancement into flying passenger jets came along. I decided to take it, knowing I'd be forced to pay back $20,000 to Ameriflight. I have been making monthly payments on my debt to Ameriflight since I departed in Nov. 2021. I have several more years to go. I am the class representative for a lawsuit against Ameriflight challenging the legality of their TRAP, and I spoke out against Ameriflight and was featured in an article written by Dave Jamison of the Buffington Post (https://www.hufThost.comientry/ameriflight-pilot- training-repayment- provisions_n_63a2214ee4b04414304bc464). I received an

	incredible amount of support from labor advocates, but also a shocking amount of "retributive justice" from the aviation community in the form of online "doxxing," and threats of blacklisting at aviation companies. I had one person comment to me that I "will never have another job in aviation again." Thankfully, at my current airline, I am a union member, and my airline and union supports my efforts to defend pilots' rights and represent my numerous colleagues that Ameriflight has bound into debt. As the aviation industry rapidly shifted to a "pilot's market," Ameriflight ended its use of TRAPs for new hire pilots. The truth was that pilots have many options when it comes to career progression now. However, they are keeping those of us who left before they made that choice trapped in our debts. They want to punish us for seeking better lives, better pay, better working conditions, and thus leaving their employ. I hope my efforts are able to right this wrong against me and my colleagues, but you are in a position to stop this forever. I have put myself out on the line to stand up for what is right, and I hope the FTC is willing to take the same kind of stand against labor injustice as I am. Thank you for considering my experience, Kate Fredericks"
RL	"As a worker at a senior level this practice is horrible for workers. Companies have employees sign it even in right to work states. They require the signature or won't hire a potential employee. It is exploitation. Their argument is that no is forced to sign it, they can work elsewhere. Not really true. It is one of the last pieces of paper a new/potential employee is asked to sign prior to employment. It isn't discussed prior to that. They know it isn't legal in right to work states and say their lawyers will just litigate employees into the dirt if they try to 'violate' the truly illegal document. It is abhorrent. Many agreements are for two or more years after leaving a company! It is so harmful to workers ability to make a living. Make. Ore many. My current employer won't pay money after a lay-off unless we re-sign the agreement! Horrible unfair labor practice."
George	"My current job as an employed physician has a one year noncompete that has a radius that includes all major hospitals within a 1 hour drive from my home. I arrived at this job a mid-career surgeon. The practice did nothing to develop my career; they provided no training nor advertising. They pay me a salary that is significantly lower than what I earn for them. What right do they have to restrict my ability to work? If I wish to leave, they should not be able to force me to choose between a 1.5 hour commute and moving my family. These laws restrict competition and seek to entrench power in the hands of already extremely powerful hospitals."
Donna	"Please ban companies from using these non compete clauses for rank and file workers. It is tremendously unreasonable for a company to prohibit a middle manager or line worker from bettering their salary and working life by getting hired at a competitor. It's a form of price fixing. In the past, at least companies were promising some levels of job security and pension benefit for loyalty and restrictive employment rules. Now, there is no reward for staying with a company; only punishment and legal action if you try to improve your salary and benefits. It is time to give regular people a little power and control and stop giving all the power to companies."

Shannon	"PLEASE ban non competes! As a nurse anesthetist, I have been threatened with enforcement of a non compete in 50 mile radius for 2 years. It has forced me to travel to a job in a different city over an hour away and has put a huge burden on myself and my family. These non competes make no sense in my industry and have no place in it. They are used a bully tactic by big business to threaten and force employees to stay despite poor working conditions. I am extremely pleased that the FTC has recognized die huge imposition that these unnecessary clauses place on working Americans, especially in healthcare. Thank you."
Paul	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to express my concerns regarding franchisor/franchisee non-compete clauses, which have the potential to stifle new business formation, reduce earnings of franchisees, and have other negative effects on competitive conditions. As a I tome Instead franchisee owning two franchises and employing 150 individuals in Virginia, I have experienced firsthand how these clauses can be exploitative and coercive. I bought an existing I income Instead franchise around two years ago. This business has been in existence for 25+ years and has employed 1000's of people during that time. I purchased the business with the use of a $4M SBA loan. As part of purchasing this business, I was forced to sign a non-compete with the Franchisor. A week after purchasing the business, the Franchisor was purchased by a venture capital backed company, Honor. Since then, the Franchisor has been making considerable changes to our business model, franchise agreements, and franchise standards. Some of these include shortening the franchise tens to only 5 years, introducing performance standards which will increase royalties for most people by 40%, introducing a technology fee without supplying new technology, and are requiring monthly financial statements. They are also pushing franchises to change business models where they would shift employment of my current employees to the franchisor, would contract with my clients directly, and relegate me to new business development. They have created an uproar within the Franchise network in addition to a tremendous amount of uncertainty. Because of the non-competition in my Franchise agreement, I have no choice but to accept the changes, sell my business or close my doors. Because of the uncertainty they have created it is extremely hard to sell my business. I cannot close my door, or I would face financial ruin by defaulting on my SBA loan. I cannot operate my business independent of the Franchise and I cannot open a competing business anywhere in the United States. The Franchisor knows they have this leverage and are using it to force change that hurts me and benefits them. What makes matters worse is that when I signed my franchise agreement, it was a "take it or leave it" situation, and the same will be true when I renew. I However, if I walk away, I will lose a significant portion of my net worth, which is tied up in my business. Additionally, the non-compete provisions restrict my ability to continue my business or start a similar one at the end of my franchise term. These terms are drafted by my franchisor's attorneys and are completely non-negotiable. I would like to purchase additional Home Instead franchises. I have capital ready to deploy and potential acquisitions identified. However, because of the uncertainty associated with the actions of the franchisor and the hook up the non-compete, I have decided not to pursue the acquisitions until the situation resolves itself. I strongly believe that these non-compete clauses are exploitative and coercive, and that franchisees lack bargaining power in the context of their relationship with franchisors. I urge the FTC to take action to protect franchisees from the negative effects of these clauses, which can stifle innovation, reduce earnings, and harm competitive conditions. Thank you for your attention to this matter."

Stephanie	" Medical non-competes are unfair and unjust. Jobs change, leadership within organizations change, and physicians just have the ability to seek employment in the same area that they have set up their lives. I stayed in a challenging work situation longer than I should have because of a non-compete. I have seen families torn apart from one parents having to move away for two years due to job issues. There are enough patients to go around such that competition should not be a main driver to keep non-compete clauses. Please eliminate them!"
Ceresa	Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. I don't think there is anything wrong with businesses wanting to protect themselves, but not when it's at the expense of employees can pursue their own careers. Instead, what I propose is the enforcement of non solicitation agreements to protect both employers and employees. I recently moved from a state that does not enforce noncompete agreements (NY) to one that does (VA). As a licensed psychotherapist , I have not been able to continue seeing my long time private clients remotely from New York and establish myself in Virginia because all employers here forbid it, even though there is no competition. So I have to choose between giving up my clients or not working in Virginia, despite moving here with the hopes of planting roots and starting my practice. I had hoped to both keep my clients and find a place to work while I prepare my practice. Noncompetes are forcing me to choose between businesses in different states that have no bearing on another. I truly appreciate the work you are doing with this and ask that you please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements so we are all working on a fair playing field. Sincerely, Ceres/
Mary	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people"
Brenna	"I wholeheartedly support prohibiting companies from requiring or enforcing non-compete clauses in their contracts. While I understand businesses' desire to protect intellectual property (in other words, profits), non-competes have extremely detrimental impacts on workers across the country. These contracts trap workers in low-paying, abusive, or otherwise unfulfilling jobs by preventing them from freely seeking employment elsewhere, which is a basic tenet of our economic system and necessary for capitalism to function. Further, employers (in essence) rent the talent and labor of their employees—they do not own it in perpetuity. That is, non-compete contracts not only harm our economy, but they should not be allowed on principle, as they give employers ownership over deciding where individuals apply their own personal labor. This is morally wrong and should not be permitted."

Mary	"I support the removal of non-compete clause rules."
Keith	"I have been in the same industry since 1983. My previous employer was acquired by a private equity firm, and I was asked to sign a noncompete agreement in order to stay employed. I did not agree to this and was let go. A previous competitor heard about this and offered a position in their firm without a noncompete by phone. When I walked in to meet them for the first time, they said before I got in to their office, that I needed to sign a noncompete agreement. Luckily I had other offers without that agreement. The comment from the first offering company was that it was not enforceable so I should just sign it. I said that I would only sign it if I knew that this was a great company and that it was an ideal workplace. A former colleague of mine was told to sign a noncompete before she could get her paycheck. Our government needs to regulate this. I understand that many employees jump ship for more money. I look for ethics and good morale. I was with my previous employer for over 10 years before they were acquired. It was a giant red flag to me that they wanted such an agreement in place as part of my job offer."
Eric	"Non compete restrictions represent a critical infringement of an individual's right to earn a living. They should be fully banned. Adequate protection of proprietary information is provided for under current law and potential civil penalties."
Joseph	"I am a strong supporter of the abolishment of non-compete provisions. It is an obsolete provision that serves only vindictive employers. Many control- hungry employers use this clause to keep their finger on previous employees and limit their options as a form of spite. This provision was never intended to limit one's ability to work and provide services to their community. It was intended to prevent the direct and intentional use of trade secrets to the advantage of others and to prevent "stealing" clients. Instead, it is being used as a revengeful and inappropriate disciplinary tool against those that leave hostile work environments. Please pass this rule and remove this form of punishment against hard-working, honest people."
Yaoming	"I am supporting elimination of noncompete clause in physician contracts."
Darren	"I am a subspecialty physician employed by a large academic center that requires ALL its physicians to sign non compete agreements . My non compete agreement happens to extend to a neighboring rural community where my subspecialty services are (badly) needed. I have tried for years to convince the administration to allow me to offer services to these patients under the academic institutions umbrella. These pleas have fallen on deaf ears. I would love to start a clinic to offer quality sub specialty services to these patients in a rural community but cannot because it falls within the zone of my NCA. Thus, in my case, a NCA is directly reducing patients timely access to quality healthcare that my employer refuses to provide OR allow me to provide. This is an example of how the consumer (in this case patients) suffers as a result of these agreements. Please move forward with the rule change. You will see access to healthcare increase across the board."

Laura	"Individuals should be allowed to work wherever they choose. Having non-competes in place hinders autonomy and creativity, not to mention innovation. There are those who are working in hostile environments and cannot leave to transition to a better environment due to a non-compete. The notion of non-compete laws are outdated and non democratic. Please reverse this and remove non-compete rules."
David	"I support the non-compete clause change."
Saul	"I strongly advocate for banning non-compete clauses. The US Chamber of Commerce argues that "Attempting to ban noncompete clauses ... ignores the fact that, when appropriately used, noncompete agreements are an important tool in fostering innovation and preserving competition." That's the point. The Chamber ignores the fact that they are rarely used "appropriately." Instead, they are used widely to stifle innovation and competition in completely inappropriate contexts - they have become a defacto expectation for most jobs. Businesses have clearly demonstrated that they cannot be trusted to apply noncompete clauses "appropriately." Please ban them and help American workers compete for jobs they are qualified for."
Rumaisa	"There should be no noncompete for physicians"
Steve	"I'm a veterinarian newly leaving residency from an academic institution, and every place I looked to find a job carried a non-compete clause with it. I'm preferentially making the move to the NYC metro area to be around family, and there aren't a ton of open options for me to exist in that area (maybe 3-4 hospitals that have the capacity to support a veterinary ophthalmologist). I ended up signing a contract that has a 2-year non-compete clause that prevents me from working in the entirety of NYC if I leave the practice, which kind of locks me out from being able to have a job around my family if my new job doesn't work out. After going through residency and all of this schooling, it's unfortunate that my skills and expertise is limited by someone trying to predatorily protect their business interests rather than consider the life events that surround picking a particular practice or geographic region of the country."
Linda	"Non compete clauses are management's way of keeping workers from being able to change jobs. Workplaces do not have national secrets - most employees especially frontline employees have very little knowledge that would benefit a rival company. These non compete clauses should be illegal in almost all cases."
Yolanda	"As a physician and constituent, I would like to support the Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) proposed rule to ban noncompete agreements in physician employment contracts. Noncompete agreements in health care impede patient access to care and disrupt care continuity, deter clinicians from advocating for patient and workplace safety, limit clinicians' ability to choose their employer, and stifle competition. Noncompete agreements also contribute to burnout and can worsen mental health by forcing clinicians to remain in unsustainable work environments. Despite well-documented clinician shortages, many health care employers still intentionally restrict physician mobility and workforce participation via noncompete agreements. Now more than ever, our nation's health care workers need Congress' support. I therefore wholeheartedly support the FTC's proposed rule to protect patients' access to their physicians and ensure physicians can freely practice medicine in their communities. Warmest regards, Dr. Yolanda Harold"

Raafiah	"INCLUDE PHYSICIANS."
James	"Non-compete clauses are inherently anti-competitive business practices and serve to limit practice options and harm local communities. When my last hospital practice shut down, the non-compete would not permit me to work in any county that had a hospital belonging to the health system that formerly employed me. As a result I had to move my family out of state, depriving the local community of a subspecialist physician."
Robert	"The ability for workers to find employment must be without ANY restrictions. Period."
Erin	"Non compete clauses are such a burden to people in industries such as groomers and hair stylists. They hold you hostage to your employer even if the work environment is abusive/dangerous. These industries should be able to further their careers and protect themselves by not being held prisoner to their current employer by a non compete clause. It creates toxic work environments when an employee is forced to continue working at a location they no longer wish to or risk not being able to find employment within a drivable distance of their home due to a non compete"
Betsy	"It's hard to put roots down and become a part of a community when you know that if you change jobs, you'll have to leave the area. It's especially hard when you have a family, a house, community involvement such as in church. Non-compete agreements really limit where you can work, and unfortunately there are lots of reasons you might want to change employers but stay in your local area. Sometimes you take a job as an associate vet and find it's not as good a fit as you thought. I think non-compete agreements should not be allowed. One person shouldn't be able to "own" the business in a 5 mile or whatever mile radius around them to prevent competition. It's up to them to offer top quality service so they don't lose business when an employee leaves. Employees have a right to work where they want and where it best suits their livelihood."
Jason	"As a veterinarian , I've signed seven non-compete agreements over my career. Unfortunately, it is difficult to obtain employment without one. Twice, I've had to move my family long distances when no longer agreeing with management strategies of previous offices (rural areas often have a larger radius for non-competes). While the goal of the non-compete may be to protect a business' market share, I'm not sure that should outweigh the damage the forced agreements have on stifling competition and limiting mobility. It's my belief that labor markets would be better off without them."

Joshua	"This is fantastic and should have been enacted years ago. The IT industry is riddled with horrifically broad noncompete clauses and needs to be regulated, as they are clearly incapable of self regulating."
Kimberly	"I support this proposal."
Zachary	"Non-competes in the healthcare world area tragedy for both patients and healthcare providers. As a physician, I already see the burden of an overworked and understaffed system, which will only worsen in the coming years. Non-competes lead to dissatisfaction, burnout, and ultimate exodus from the healthcare industry. I find them unethical and I strongly support ending all non-compete clauses."
Matthew	"Restrictive covenants for physicians lock physicians into employment models, particularly with hospitals and large corporate entities that raise the cost of care and as a result the cost of health insurance for everyone in the country. These increased insurance costs are passed down to consumers. Thus removing the ability for physicians to leave hospital employment would indirectly serve to decrease the costs of goods and services across the United States. The hospital lobby has moved to block physicians from being included in this non-compete rule, which would serve their interests at the costs of consumers through out the country. Thank you for your time. Matthew D. Holland MD"
Dirk	"I strongly support the proposed rule to ban non-compete agreements. Non-compete agreements lower job mobility and decrease market competition while virtually never serving legitimate business interests."
Cecil	"As a physician and constituent , I am writing to ask you to support the Federal Trade Commission's (FTC) proposed rule to ban noncompete agreements in physician employment contracts. Noncompete agreements in health care impede patient access to care and disrupt care continuity, deter clinicians from advocating for patient and workplace safety, limit clinicians' ability to choose their employer, and stifle competition. Noncompete agreements also contribute to burnout and can worsen mental health by forcing clinicians to remain in unsustainable work environments. Despite well-documented clinician shortages, many health care employers still intentionally restrict physician mobility and workforce participation via noncompete agreements. Now more than ever, our nation's health care workers need Congress' support. Please support the FTC's proposed rule to protect patients' access to their physicians and ensure physicians can freely practice medicine in their communities."
James	"See attached file(s) Attachments Eliminate non- competes"

Timothy	"As a party to a non-compete agreement with my employer, I fully support a ban on them. They are completely one-sided and hurt employees who are merely trying to make a living."
Nadia	"As a physician , I strongly support the removal of non compete clauses and strongly oppose the AHA's assertions on this topic. Physicians should absolutely not be exempt from this legislation and removing them would only be a further slap in the face to doctors in the interests of corporate medicine and hospital administrators who continue to harm our healthcare system and drive burnout, depression, and suicide in healthcare workers."
Sa	"The issue is non-compete is the most restrictive tool to suffocate employees by essentially taking them hostage. If a place of work provides a reasonable amount of good will that benefits both parties, then there should be no need to force a non-compete. That only happens when an employer knows the work conditions that will be implemented are as such to stifle the employee. The U.S. federal government should protect employees by breaking the chain on non-compete."
John	"I strongly support this proposed rule. Working in a technical field, I have been subjected to non-compete agreements my entire thirty-year professional career. This has served to slow both my career progression and salary growth. As I work in a very small niche of the tech sector, there are only a small handful of companies that do what I do. Because of this, the effect of a non-compete agreement is absolutely stifling I have very little freedom of movement, and if I do try to move, I have to leave the general confines of my field which is very difficult to find another position before I can then move back into my normal career path. This is unacceptable in 2023 when tech companies have merged once, twice, or more, leaving very few employers with an outsized amount of control over my personal career and life—especially when in America those companies control my access to healthcare for my family and me. There is a fallacy that employers won't want to contribute training to employees without non-compete agreements. In my thirty years of working for government contractors and computer security companies, I've found that there is often little to no training available regardless. They make the claim removal of non-competes will affect training, but in reality, it really doesn't exist anyway because it is an "overhead expense" that they don't want to incur. Often the ONLY way to get some kind of training or education is in the act of changing companies, wherein you might have the opportunity to go through their onboarding internal training programs should they have them. In practice, the companies who truly provide training but worry that the employee will leave with their newfound skills simply institute a payback program on a sliding scale. If the employee leaves within a year of the training taking place, they pay a prorated amount of the training back to the employer upon departure. To suggest that a non-compete is needed to prevent employees leaving after training is not only heavy-handed but also obtuse. Often these non-competes go hand in hand with non-disclosure and non-solicitation agreements. Employers purposely conflate these topics to make employees believe that the non-compete is there to protect the company along with the other two. This is simply not the case. While the latter two do, in fact, protect the company, the first is strictly to suppress competition for recruiting and to drive down salaries, benefits, ownership options, and more. I firmly believe that if non-competes were removed from our society, we would have tremendous career growth in the technical sector and others that artificially stifle competition for human resources."

Jane	"I completely support banning non compete clauses. Workers have to sign them to be employed and companies can then keep working conditions poor and pay low because workers can not leave. It is a form of feudalism and has no place in our country. It hurts tax revenue by keeping wages low. It hurts families with the stress of a lack of options for higher pay or better working conditions. It gives the labor of a person to the control of a corporation indefinitely. Now can this be legal?"
Jessica	"I support ending non-compete agreements. As a physician assistant , I am limited from working within a five mile radius of my current practice if I leave. I would have to commute further daily if I wanted to leave my current job, or move somewhere else. This non-compete clause restricts me from providing patient care. Patient access to providers is an issue which causes some patients to go without healthcare. Please support this bill."
Edward	"Support the FTC ban on "non-compete" agreements. They had some legitimacy in the past, but have grown into a kind of modern slavery. Freedom to change employers should be a fundamental right."
Amber	"I think implementing a non-compete clause is allowing businesses to hold a monopoly on a person's ability to work. It should be banned. Everyone has a right to work and if a competitor is willing to pay more for a person's abilities and skills than the person should be able to better themselves and their families."
Claudia	" Physicians should absolutely be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it greatly limits their ability to negotiate their contracts and instead offers large hospital systems an unprecedented advantage over physicians in the marketplace. There is a large increase in physician burnout and allowing the market place to be more free would allow physicians more freedom and flexibility. Additionally, the last time an exemption of this nature was granted by the lobbying from the American Hospital Association (Jung v AAMC 2004) resulted in decades of delay for improving resident physicians' ability for fair wages and benefits; this is still an active struggle today. Please do not make the same mistake again for physicians of today and the future."
Richard	"How does allowing non compete agreements benefit the consumer/ average citizen in any way, shape or form? Ensuring consumer options are limited by agreeing not to compete with one another serves only to open an avenue for price gouging and nothing more."
Scott	"I signed a non-compete in the auto wholesale industry - the Auto Auction World. I started the Riclund Auto Auctions digital section which allowed dealers to sell vehicles to other dealers. I begin this in 2019 and we named it CAR-RAC. I grew CAR-RAC to the number one seller on two of three platforms (OVE and SmartAuction) in the United States. I made over $200,000 per year. The owner believed I was making too much money and hired someone to do it for much less. This is someone I trained. I hired over 12 sales reps throughout the country, trained them and managed them. All of this was done according to

	our business plan. They called me in and told me I was making too much money and offered me about $140,000 per year. I declined and asked to be released from my non-compete. They refused and now I am doing outside sales for a construction company. My non compete is for 24 months. There are companies in the auto auction industry that want to hire me but can not because of die amount of money it would take to tight the non compete. I am in Virginia. So in short, my non compete is keeping me from obtaining a job I am an expert in because I had a non compete and they fired me for making too much money on the pay plan they offered me in this same non compete. it is WRONG by any judgement. I can be reached at. I am retired law enforcement and would be MORE then happy to testify in court in this FTC court case. I have never been arrested used drugs or anything else and believe I would be an expert would be an expert witness. Let me know how I can help. Thank you - Scott Johnson - "
John	"As an emergency physician and a member of the leadership team for a small democratic physician group, we have found that non-competes are used by large corporate medicine groups (CMG's) to maintain contracts with health systems and decrease competition by groups such as ours. We have approached health systems about obtaining new opportunities for our physician group but learned that the health systems are concerned that the CMG's will enforce the non-competes over their employed physicians making it impossible to transition to another group. We do not use non-competes for our group as we don't believe in them and do not want to restrict our physicians. We believe that happy physicians provide the best care for patients, so encumbering a physician with a non-compete and requiring them to stay at a hospital they don't want to work at will create a worse outcome for patients. Please consider removing non-competes which decreases competition and, ultimately the quality of patient care."
Steven	"My name is Steve... and I live in Harrisonburg, VA. Please strike down noncompete clauses from businesses. Here is a personal reason why this is so important. The church I am afflicted with has been supporting an undocumented refugee from Nicaragua for almost two years now. She has a 6th grade education and a very disabled daughter. They both walked many miles and paid coyotes to drive them to safety. She would like to cook for a restaurant once she gets a green card, SS# and work permit. Even then she does not have a driver's license and no car so transportation will be an issue also. If and when she is employed as a cook in this area, is it very possible that at some point, for different reasons, she will decide to seek a different restaurant to cook for. If that new restaurant charges her with violating the competition agreement, she could be out on the streets again. Any rules that would permit charges like this to be filed against her must be struck down now. Thank you in advance for your help. Oh, I forgot to mention that she has two strikes against her because of racism: different original language and country of origin."
John	"Non-compete agreements are banning my family and I think they should be removed, or at least enforced on a industry by industry basis. I side with the SDPA in that removing non-compete agreements for medical providers is appropriate and should be enacted to improve the livelihoods of physician assistants and their families now."

" Families that can't afford children will not have them. Noncompetes keep wages artificially low and stifle competition. They make it difficult for skilled workers to change careers if they are written in an overly broad manner. Ultimately in my experience bosses have used non competes to keep their skilled work's pay shamefully low and to prevent them from doing side work or starting new businesses in the same way those businesses owner were able to in their own careers. Most business owners are not even realistically compelled to follow or read local law on these issues and impose whatever they like on those desperate for work. Non competes enable tyrannical employers the power to destroy work's livelihoods through threats of job loss, lost hrs., loss of health insurance, loss of future career prospects, loss of potential lifetime earnings, loss of freedom and agency in their work and in their lives. They enable employers to literally plagiarize a worker's work products and erase their existence in the eyes of clients for shit compensation. None competes function like being jumped into a gang the only means of escape from a bad job situation is to be jumped out. Leaving or being fired with a non compete sometimes leaves workers unable to work locally in their field through no fault of their own. Some people are prematurely forced out of the workforce all together because they cannot re-enter their industry after a profit motivated layoff A worker under a 1-5 year non compete after leaving is forced into an employment gap that other potential employers will view as a scarlet letter. If a worker resists signing these agreements even when they are banned in their resident state a worker risks injuring their small business tyrant's small baby ego and getting on his list and being cut lose because you dared point out to him he is doing something at best unethical and at worst illegal. That business owner may even throw a tantrum and accuse you of trying to steal his clientele and beg you not to talk to an employment lawyer while simultaneously threatening you with the prospect of speaking to a lawyer himself. Non competes enable this toxic work culture of disrespect power imbalance between older owners and younger workers. They fuel environments of fear, anxiety, hopelessness, verbal and financial abuses, trauma and suicide. Workers do kill themselves when laid off see the research. Laying off a low wage worker subject to a non compete is a public health threat. FTC give some power and profits back to the workers and we might just consider producing a future generation to keep buying products and doing work otherwise good luck with developing those citizens consumer robots. Really I don't know how else you will keep this economy going if you continue to allow profiteers and sociopaths to exploit humanity as if we were machines pushing us into burnout levels of inhuman efficiency for a cheaply as possible often before our brains haven even matured. The purpose of good governance is to keep the people from starvation and serfdom. The people must be free to maneuver a fast paced job market to evolve a leisure economy of rest , health and collective struggle. Don't give the greedy means to enslave your children in cancerous profit drive growth and auto exploitation. Nobody is hired by a company for life these days. Nobody is offered honest loyalty by their employer and so no loyalty should be coerced from workers! Do a little to dismantle wage slavery holding the whole of humanity in a cycle of boom and bust flushing more cash to those already shamefully fat and greedily feasts on this Anthropocene extinction. Original Comment In my career and industry noncompetes are used to intimidate skilled workers from leaving low paying jobs or accepting work in their field outside their full time jobs, which often do not pay wages that match increases in worker productivity or meet the rising standard of living. Anything like non competes that suppress wage growth directly contributes to the decline in population and dissolution of America's social fabric. Families that can't afford children will not have them. Noncompetes keep wages artificially low and stifle competition. J	"Thank you for pursuing the elimination of Non-compete Clauses from business. These clauses prevent employees from leaving their company and force them to accept conditions that are often less than desirable. These clauses also prevent employees from achieving their full career advancement and corresponding financial benefits. They also reduce the growth curve of the industry as a whole. These clauses are only beneficial to the elite few who control businesses. Please eliminate Non-compete Clauses from business."

Page	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers , future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. Noncompete clauses are self-harm, please stop making American workers bleed. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
BARBARA	"As an individual citizen, I heartily approve of removing non-compete clauses. These clauses logically go against innovation by preventing many startups and go against workers freedom of choice. Kudos to the FTC for tackling this issue."
Amanda	"To whom it may concern I am a clinically active physician. In the course of my 25 year career, I have spent all of that time subject to noncompete clauses. These noncompetes have been as much as a year, and have encompassed as little as a 10 mile radius and as much as an entire state and the counties nearest to that state. In each and every contract, the radius and duration of the noncompete was explicitly chosen to prevent me working for a competitor healthcare company. The organizations that I have worked for have included a major university, community health clinics and large hospice organizations owned by private equity across four different states. I feel that rather than serve my interests in forwarding my career and my salary, these noncompetes have reduced my opportunities and restricted my ability to earn a better wage. I recently had an employer hand me a new contract with a noncompete of two years rather than a year in the middle of tense negotiations over the salary. The intent was to clearly punish me for asking for additional pay and on call compensation. While health care organizations may say that they put resources into the development of a physician's practice, I can say that the value they derive from my work is far greater than any career development I have ever been

	offered. There may be some health care organizations that say that physicians are a valued workforce and therefore restricting their ability to work for a competing organization helps to protect their business. As a physician I was laid off from my job in 2018 and told that I could be replaced by a nurse practitioner. Clearly I could be and was replaced by a lesser trained clinician. In summation, noncompetes are one of the tools that restrict physicians from finding better paying and more humane positions."
David	"Noncompetes, restrict employees, ability to grow in profession, Forcing them to stay in a job where they're not growing or not fitting in is inefficient and counterproductive to our economy. Companies effectively trap the employees, and do not have to treat them well or respond to any of their concerns. Noncompetes should not be allowed in America ."
Kevin	"Non compete clauses are anti-worker. Ban them."
Shiv	"If I owned a healthcare business my two favorite laws would be the ones that say I cannot have any nearby competitors (certificate of need) and that my employees cannot leave to go work for the competition without incurring significant pain by having to sit out of the workforce for an extended period or relocate somewhere else entirely and thus not compete with me (restrictive covenant or non-compete clause). I am close to the end of my career so these laws are not going to materially impact me going forward but they have throughout the 30 years I have been practicing medicine. The coupling of a noncompete clause with CONs that exist in many states, allows healthcare companies to be mediocre and to take advantage of their employees. Both should go away. Not only do I 100% support NPRM, but I highly recommend the FTC take a long hard look at CON laws as well and consider outlawing them. CON laws in particular, by freeing healthcare companies from competition, allows them to perennially underperforming and underinvest in the healthcare of their patients while lining the pockets of their executives. The quality of healthcare would improve if both went away. I live in Virginia that has a very restrictive COPN (in Virginia it is titled "Certificate of Public Need" rather than Certificate of Need) regulation. Sadly, if an outstanding healthcare organization, such as Mayo Clinic, wished to open a hospital in Virginia and thereby improve the quality of healthcare and improve choices for the citizens of Virginia, it is unlikely that Mayo could successfully get approval to do so due to COPN. The public is largely unaware that these regulations exist but would almost certainly want them to go away if they became aware."
Arsalan	"I am a primary care physician who has provided care in urban, suburban and rural arms. I would like to highlight the negative impact to patients because of noncompetes limiting primary and specialty care. Hospitals leverage noncompetes to lock physicians out of a geographic locations which adversely impacts patient care and continuity of care. Noncompetes traditionally are used where an employee could steal trade secrets. In medicine the physician brings the IP in the form of their medical training not the other way around. Noncompetes also allow hospitals to force conformity to hospital protocols which do not always align with what physicians think is best for the patient. When these discrepancies occur hospitals can fire a physician and still prevent them from practicing in that community again removing an important patient advocate from the system. Physician noncompetes adversely impact not just earning potential but also cost CMS money on a macro and micro scale. Hospitals and PE backed entities aggregate to limit systems in a geography then salary bands for physician roles quickly become narrower adversely impacting physicians. But as these systems grow larger they also negotiate higher rates and push billing practices that can be adverse to consumers and payors such as Medicaid and CMS. When physicians dissent they are often reprimanded and can be threatened with termination if they persist. They also allow hospitals to push volume based expectations that limit quality of care in order to drive FFS revenue. (More visits to deal with the same number of problems). The presence of noncompetes gives hospitals leverage to underpay physicians while driving up costs for Medicare and CMS. (One may look at the expanded use of trauma codes which are not susceptible to PA/UM review rules and the rate of trauma code utilization by HCA hospitals over the last 15-20 years. Once you segregate by either or both admitting and/or driving diagnosis the use of this code has gone up based upon hospital protocols of when to call a trauma code driving up costs to both CMS and patients). I strongly believe noncompetes should be eliminated as they are negatively impacting our patients and communities. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play. and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency."

Michael	"Non-compete clauses are modern-day indentured servitude. Ban them."
Morgan	"I would really love for non-competes to go away. I have had to pass up many jobs due to being limited by contracts my jobs have imposed upon me. Then that meant I either had to move far away or look in other cities for a new job and have a longer commute."
Shannon	"I support banning non compete clauses. It absolutely hinders my ability as a physician to find a higher paying opportunity in the jobs I'm looking at since I have used a recruiting firm in the past."
Sven	"Non-competes actively (harm) industries and employees by preventing competition and depriving employees from being able to sell their most valuable commodity, their labor. In the vast majority of cases non-competes are unenforceable and serve only to have a chilling effect on employee movement and depressing wages. After 10 years as a software engineer I've never personally seen them used legally. And only used to threaten employees."
Frances	"Get rid of the non-competes!!"
Ingrid	"I work in a niche scientific field that requires years of training Because of the non compete agreement that was a mandatory part of my contract, I will have to move to a different field to get a job even though there are other companies hiring in my field. Without experience outside of this small field it is very difficult for me to get a job that uses my current skill set. It creates a massive barrier that keeps me from being able to change jobs."
Rohit	"Non-compete clauses for physicians and health care professionals do not make sense. The practice of medicine is based on publicly available data and standards of care, not industry secrets. They are used by hospitals to control physician autonomy and ultimately lead to worsening patient access to care. Highly recommend doing away with non- compete clauses."
Wyatt	"I've signed Non-Competes for 60% of the jobs I've had simply because of my skillset. No employer has the right to chain their employees to a non- compete in a free market ."
Mudit	"Not fair to families especially kids. The whole is forced to move far away from their friends, loved ones. Businesses have too much power, and employees have to continue working even though they are miserable-low output, could lead to mental health issues. Moreover, this goes against the liberal values and freedom of choice that our nation is built upon."

Karthic	"I believe non compete clause is used in a hostile manner to control the movement of employees and hold corporations hostage thereby increasing die expense particularly in healthcare. The private equity companies use their employed physicians as slaves and hold their contracted hospitals hostage. The working conditions are dismal and when physicians question the unsafe conditions for their patients the private equity companies tire them. So we also create unsafe conditions for our patients."
Joe	"I work in the corrugated box business for DS Smith. They have moved into the box market 6 to 8 years ago and had everyone in sales and lower management sign a non-compete. This document is so restrictive that you can't say anything negative about the copy and if I shared it with you I would have a problem with DS Smith. This is slavery and keeping me hostage, if I walk away from the company I have to leave the industry for 12 months before I can Perdue another position with a mother corrugated box company."
Robert	"I am all for the ban on non-competes. I have been the victim of one for 3 years now, waiting out a 5-year non-compete. The employer is continually threatening me by claiming that every client on earth is his, and everything I do is competitive. I'm in the field of decision-making and human reasoning so you can see how broad that is, and applicable anywhere, anytime and with anyone. Such employers bank on the fact they have more money to fund lawyers, and know the unemployed individual will only be able to finance so much lawyer time before they have to throw in the towel. That is unfair because it makes justice based on who has more money, rather than who is in the right. This is an unfair practice that is prevalent in today's society. As the notice for opposition statement read, it absolutely restricts creativity and innovation when those experts cannot continue their craft for others, under threat of legal action. Employers should treat their people better if they don't want them to compete against them. Their disservice to their employees should not prevent a more progressive employer from reading the talents of those mistreated by former employers. Because of this constant oversight by my previous employer I keep copious notes, maintain email/text paper trails and transcribe conversations in order to justify the facts. Because there is a wide gap between what the employer says versus what they do. There is also a wide gap between what they say and what they write, as they have selective memory when it comes to evidence. So the burden falls on the unemployed employee to keep such records in the event legal action is taken against them. Ifs hard enough looking for work under these conditions, but having to spend valuable time building a legal case as you go, is another unnecessary burden for the employee. More people than ever are leaving their workplaces today as they feel they are not psychologically safe. They work in toxic work environments, as described above. They should have the freedom to find work environments where their talents are appreciated and not tolerated."
Jennifer	"I strongly support the ban on noncompete clauses. It is OUTRAGEOUS that companies want to control our lives even after we no longer work for them (especially when they already pay so badly). How can we be free if companies can dictate what we do and where we work for years?? We don't belong to them -- we just work for them at low pay."

dereje	"Thank you so very much for finally realizing the harms of this wicked and stifling non compete provision. It is a prison both with and without walls and has been a source of agony to workers and their families unfairly. I believe it is a remnant of the slave days and truly appreciate the proposal to do away with it. Many many will breath a huge sigh of relief, the labour market will be more competitive and as a result will benefit the economy at large. Thank You"
dave	"The very notion of a non-compete clause is antithetical to free market capitalism. Trade secrets are one thing, hobbled former employees are another. Block non-compete."
Malcolm	"Long overdue! Excellent for labor."
Nikola	"As a physician I strongly support banning all noncompetes in the medical field. It will allow physicians to freely move about the marketplace and will encourage systems to improve their environments for employee wellness and patient safety"
Catherine	"Noncompete clauses are a grossly unfair way that physicians are regulated after dedicating their lives and substantial amount of money to training These are illegal and should've been banned years ago."
dwight	"I support the Federal government by the FTC to end non-compete clauses in any contract as this will restore the free exercise to work ,create and thrive in a country which professes to give equal opportunity for all its citizens. This non-compete rule should be abolished .Law still will be on the books to prevent or allow for litigation for stealing patent or other intellectual or real property. Although now in retirement, I suffered under this yoke while employed by medical groups or hospital systems. The only relief was to get fired. Eventually, after that-one is free to serve people more personally and with more enthusiasm even though one will often work longer and harder but the rewards are more than monetary. I believe this is so for many professions and businesses. The intended consequences of lapsing this yoke on employees is it will unleash more creativity, more innovation, more efficiency, more satisfaction, more competition for Americans. There is also the possibility of lower costs in some sectors. The struggle for independent owners who are not wealthy will be securing adequate capital to get started and survive the first year. This is one reason regulatory burdens which are not essential should be reduced or eliminated in conjunction with follow up or monitoring of the effects of abolishing the non-compete rule."
Erin	"I wholeheartedly agree that something needs to be done about the rampant use of non competes and how they affect employees. It's one thing to have an agreement not to poach employees or trade secrets but another to basically say "you can't use your expertise anywhere that is remotely close to this company's line of business." It's especially unfair to employees who may have been laid off who do not have another job lined up or end up taking pay cuts so they aren't in violation of a non compete. I'm so glad the FTC is taking this seriously and looking to make changes on the federal level."

Lisa	"Please do not place limits on which categories of workers are covered by this rule. I am sure business is lobbying to carve out top executives from the ban on non-competes but this would be unfair. ALL employees should be free to make a living in their chosen field - from top executives to lower-level salaried workers. If companies are concerned about trade secrets, there are NDAs which protect them. All non-compete provisions do is harm workers and stifle competition. This is a chance for the government to address inequities and unfair behavior posed by unfettered capitalist enterprises."
Marilyn	"Non-compete clauses are preventing delivery of good medical care and access to care. For example, mental health services are desperately needed in my city. The wait time for an appointment can be 6 weeks to 6 months, which is dangerous. However, if an employed psychiatrist leaves their current job, many will have to practice 25 to 50 employees away! This abandons their current patients and leaves a huge gap in needed medical services. Removal of non compete clauses will help small doctors offices/ or individual doctors tremendously. In many cities they are shut out because of big business corporate medicine. We need good doctors to have autonomy over their personal lives (like where they live) and their practice of medicine. Non-competes are stifling this and our medical system is deteriorating. Think of your own experiences with doctors and hospitals. It seems everyone has a story to share about subpar care and burnt out callous physicians or extenders. Non competes are contributing to this. Most importantly removing noncompetes will increase access to care! Currently if a doctor does not like the office structure or the way care is delivered at their practice they have to uproot their entire lives and move to a new city or state. This is unreasonable and malicious on a personal level. If noncompetes were void and a doctor wanted to offer care in a different way (home care/more telehealth/ alternative therapies) they could continue to care liar the current patient burden in their current city and offer and alternative to the large dominant medical system. Competition drives down cost and often increases innovation."
Doug	"I strongly support the proposed rule eliminating non-compete clauses in contracts. Iain a retired engineer but my comments apply to all employment. I believe such clauses harm the labor market by restricting freedom to change jobs, which both reduces pay and can prevent people from striking out to form new enterprises that would otherwise bring improvements which benefit society. I see no benefit to these clauses except for the rare situation where proprietary information essential to the business would be jeopardized, and these situations can be dealt with by other means.0"
William	"I would very strongly support in favor the FTC proposal to ban noncompete clauses. It is a burden for both low-wage earners and also for professionals. Myself I am a physician and about 12 years ago our independent practice affiliated with a community hospital system. Our referral network was and still is exclusively based upon the work of myself and the other employees at our offices. We kept our previous organizational name and the name and brand of the community hospital system we affiliated with does not add a single thing to our quality, efficiency, or level of business activity. Our initial contract did not include a noncompete clause, that after two years it was added to our contracts and we therefore currently are told that if we wish to work for a competitor, or even if we chose to work fully independent from any other organization or hospital system that we cannot work within a 25 mile radius of the affiliated hospital system, which itself has locations over a 70 mile radius. Therefore effectively I would have to leave this area or stop working for two years before I could continue to practice as a physician in our current location. Noncompete clauses almost completely benefit employers who already have a strong power advantage over workers due to their greater size, legal team, and monetary power. I very strongly favor a ban on noncompete clauses across all types of business and across all Categories of workers. I applaud the proposal by the FTC' to enact such a ban. I hope you will soon proceed with doing so and I hope you have great success in the endeavor."

Brian	"I fully support banning non competes, they only help large companies and hurt employees especially during layoffs. Many are very unreasonable as well, such as preventing an employee working in an entire industry, even if fired and not quitting."
Padma	""Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200". Like to see non compete clause go away"
Chinmaya	"Please get rid of Non- compete in medical field for physicians and surgeons!! Help to support themselves and the families in the long run to prevent burn out."
Diana	"I've read the proposed Non-Compete rule change and I support the changes. My husband too young to retire yet has 30+ years with the company has a non-compete clause to which is bound. He desires to leave the company where all his years of experience were gained due to mis-management. His company was once a leader in his industry but has been bought and sold several times to the point the job is unrecognizable and accounts are leaving in droves not to mention the experienced workers. He feels he could strike out on his own with the contacts he has nurtured over the years. His non-compete prevents that from being realized so the clause prevent workers from seeking better opportunities."
Monica	"I support the rule. A person should not be bound by the Employers contracts who try to exploit the employees while on the job and after they leave too. Freedom of choice for the hard working American should be the way!!!!"
Olivia	"I am a physical therapist by profession that lives in a small city. I have a 10mile radius non-compete if I leave or get laid off for any reason. A 10 mile radius for the city I live in is the majority of the area, making it so I will have to move if I want to change jobs. I am a young professional (31) and this fear of the non-compete prevents me from speaking up against practices with my workplace that I find unethical. This is especially because I want to start a family in the near future and do not want to be forced to move if I want to change jobs. I feel trapped and in healthcare I find non-competes to be ridiculous. We are trying to provide healthcare services to the population in the best manner possible, and are being prevented from doing so effectively by our employer due to fear of retaliation that comes from the non-compete uprooting our lives. It makes me wonder if going into healthcare was a good idea at all, which breaks my heart because I love what I do."

Daniel	"Each time a non-compete is enforced against a practicing physician, it likely disrupts sacred Doctor- Patient relationships. Which likely also leads to unnecessary additional visits and costs for the patient and the system. If organizations are truly patient centered , why would they do this? Furthermore, burnout is a huge problem in all of healthcare Banning non-competes will ultimately force organizations to compete on better treatment of their workforce, whether that be medical leaders, physicians, nurses, or maintenance staff. Finally, healthcare is on fire in the US consuming 20% of the GDP each year. Inflation on Medicare alone is $200 million dollars a day. If capitalism is the best way to fix healthcare then don't we need to encourage innovation with cross-pollination? One good way to do this is to end non-competes for everyone except perhaps at the very highest levels — President and CEO. There is so much money floating around healthcare I would not make a cut off at a particular salary level. If we believe that competition is good, then barriers to increased competition should be removed wherever and whenever possible."
Jonathan	"I completely support the Non-Compete Clause Rule. I have been subjected to NCCs on multiple occasions, and always on the first day of work at a new job as part of a series of papers I must sign as a condition of employment. Neither employer gave me advance notice of the NCCs, so I had little choice but to sign the NCC or resign from the new job on Day One. This is grossly unfair to workers."
Jane	"Non-compete clauses limit physicians from getting new jobs without moving and limit patients from staying with die physicians they want to see. They are bad for business."
Elyse	"As a senior-level employee in a Fortune 50 company, I fully support making non-compete agreements illegal. Allowing non-compete agreements to occur is anti-capitalistic, in addition to stifling job opportunities. Non-competes prohibit Americans from being able to make the best employment decisions for themselves and their family--including not taking a job due to its non-compete terms, staying in a job they'd like to leave due to the non-compete they're under, or having to pivot industries/roles to a lower-paying position (or even remaining unemployed!) just to ensure that they aren't in violation of their non- compete. This lack of competition hurts individuals, but it also hurts the companies themselves when they can't find enough talent available in the US. Allowing non-competes promotes outsourcing and insourcing over the individual American, and therefore the American economy."
Lee	"Non-compete contracts are harmful across the board. Iain a veterinarian who does not have a non-compete written into my contract, and an employer that believes everyone has the right to work where they are most content. I have seen so many young veterinarians forced from a geographic area they love because of unfair non-compete distances and rules written into their contracts. Yes, we need to be better educating our veterinary students about what to look for in their contracts, but in the meantime, let's just get rid of the non-competes and take that burden off of their shoulders."

Nikita	"BAN non compete clause for employed physicians nationally. Non compete clauses disrupt physician well-being and lead to burnout apart from disrupting patient care and poor outcomes for patients due to fragmentation of patient care/reducing access for patients due to physician need to relocate due to NON-COMPETE CLAUSES."
Laura	"Non competes end up causing hostile working arrangements. People sign them because they are told that there's no other option (if you area physician this is probably true) . The beneficiary of the noncompete basically can hold in to an employee outside of the rights of the employee . They can make the physician stay in a situation under duress - unless that MD can move out of the area . There are plenty of situations where moving is not possible. Now it's unsafe for patients - the situation is untenable . All because the owner wants to protect his/her money . Free enterprise doesn't apply when noncompetes are legal"
Garrett	"I strongly support banning non-competes. I am deeply concerned about my loved ones stuck with abusive employees and are underpaid due to non-competes."
Karen	"I urge the adoption of a rule to address the problem of non-compete clauses on a national level, since interstate commerce is so important to the United States. In our family, we have experienced a tragedy that resulted from the devastating effects of one of these clauses on a young man who should have had his productive professional life ahead of him, and now he is in the grave. It's time to put an end to this unnecessary stricture on individual employees."
Cass	"As a writer and theatre professional, I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. Too many in these industries are kept at low incomes because they cannot pursue multiple contracts simultaneously."
Salman	"Please please ban the non compete clause. I am a highly specialized vascular specialist who worked in the DC metropolitan area. Because of my specialization, I have to work and provide medical services in a metro area where tertiary care centers are present. When I was forced to leave my practice in the DC area, I had to travel to another city almost two hours away. These non competes are unfair and monopolistic. They provide advantages to large corporations and are anticompetitive. As specialist, I was also unable to provide highly specialized services to patients who relied on me and depended on me."
Karen	"I support making non- compete clauses illegal and unenforceable. I am a nurse and have lived most of life in an rural and underserved area. I have seen corporations place non-compete restrictions upon nurses which in essence binds them to that one employer without incurring a very burdensome drive to escape the area of exclusion. I have seen doctors likewise restricted and forced to leave the area, face litigation, or suffer years of unemployment. It is an effort to simply control employees and restrict competition."
Patty	"Please overturn these restrictive covenants that empower companies and handcuff employees."

Abhijeet	"As a doctor , I believe that removing non-compete clauses for physicians is a necessary step to ensure that patients have access to the best medical care possible. These clauses can limit a physician's ability to practice medicine in their chosen field and geographic location, often causing a strain on patients' access to care and leaving physicians with few options. Removing these clauses will allow physicians to practice where they feel they can best serve their patients, which is essential to improving overall healthcare outcomes. It will also foster competition in the medical industry, which can lead to better care, more innovation, and ultimately, better patient outcomes. Additionally, removing non-compete clauses will provide more freedom and flexibility for physicians to pursue their professional and personal goals, which can contribute to a healthier work-life balance and a better quality of life overall. Overall, I strongly support the removal of non-compete clauses for physicians, as it is a step towards creating a more patient-centered healthcare system that prioritizes access to care and quality outcomes for all."
Lori	"Non-competes have always been detrimental for patient care/access, especially in underserved communities. Competition generally provides better product for consumers, at the very least it provides options. Forcing doctors to uproot and leave a community they have already established a relationship with creates unneeded obstacles for patients."
BAOCHAN	"I am writing to express strong support for this proposed rule with two small modifications: 1) no exemption for tax-exempt hospitals and 2) no salary caps. Healthcare in the US has changed drastically in the last few decades and has been taken over by corporations. Physicians routinely graduate with over 8250k in loans. Non-compete clauses for physicians are now rampant. It takes more than 6 months to license and credential a physician. Having non-compete clauses apply to physicians essentially requires the physician to move his or her entire family in order to earn a living if the original job does not work out. Healthcare workers are retiring early in droves due to pandemic related and increased regulatory stresses. There is projected to be a massive shortage of physicians. The ones that are graduating are retiring early. Outlawing non-competes is one way to restore free market conditions to the physician employment market and to relieve one stress on the dwindling number of practicing physicians."
Dai	"The non compete is so onerous and extensive geographically that after the company leaves the locality the providers are locked out of the local market and has to either leave his or her family to get work or up root their lives to restart in another areas out side the non compete geographic radius despite the company longer having a physical presence at the practice location. Why are providers being punished when a company loses its contract with the client hospital or clinic or surgery center? This is inhumane and immoral. This infringes on basic human rights and freedom."
Logan	"Full support to remove the ability for companies to enforce non compete clauses."

Michelle	"I strongly support banning con-compete agreements and oppose the proposition from the AHA that physicians should be excluded from this. While physicians are higher income earners, that does not mean they should be exempt from having rights as workers. Physicians should still have the ability to leave a job where they are treated poorly without having to uproot their families, and current non compete agreements make that impossible. Non compete agreements give hospital corporations an excessive advantage over employees, including employed physicians."
A.	"Large corporations frequently buy out privately-owned small business in the optometry . During the acquisition process they acquire employees, particularly doctors and include overly broad non-compete agreements as part of the new contract. As they do so, they will not specify which practice location that agreement is specific to and they will have multiple practice locations around a multi-state region. That makes it almost impossible to take a job anywhere in the region without relocating home and your children. They do it not only full-time doctors but also part-time doctors who do not have an established patient base. Also, 10 miles of non-compete in an urban city that is densely populated means something very different than 10 miles in a sparsely populated rural area, but that is not considered by the corporate entity, nor do they negotiate the mileage. In addition, they have deep pockets and will not hesitate to prosecute even minor contract violation of this nature. Meanwhile the employee is stuck with high legal fees that they cannot cover and no job because of the non-compete clause. I fully support ending the non-compete clause rule that has gotten out of hand and is totally abused by large corporations. Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200"
Douglas	"Non-competes are anti-competitive and should be made invalid."
s	"This ban would help me and my family out in a major way. The agreement I was required to sign in order to obtain employment prevents me from moving to a competing firm. While I understand the basic principal of retaining employees, this rule has created an avenue for greed and does not hold the employer responsible to provide cost of living increases or other promotions. I'm being forced to work for them because I want to stay with the Customer. The greatest stress of my work life is dealing with my so called employer. They do not contact me nor return phone calls or emails. This firm is horrible and I want a way out. Adding a ban on the Non Compete would allow me to improve my work life, reduce stress, have a raise not seen in years, and countless other advantages. I am in talks with a lawyer in hopes of finding a way out."
Pranav	"Comment: I as a physician strongly support the ban on non compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations and hospitals. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the hospital groups to dominate the market and control the physicians. Non-profit hospitals should not be exempt from this ban. Sincerely, Pranav Parikh, MD"

Rosalind	"Non-compete clause rule should be banded. People should have the right to leave one job and go to another in the same field."
amber	"Noncompete agreements have prevented me from freely switching jobs, depriving me of higher wages and better working conditions. Noncompete agreements should be illegal."
Arjun	"I fully support the FTC proposed new rule against the non-compete contracts. This practice is pervasive in the medical industry. Hospital administration wants to create silos with non-compete clause so that physicians have to keep working at the same place or move out of the area if they are to quit the job. It increases the cost eventually when there is no independent physician left in the area once all the practices are bought by the single healthcare institution in the small towns."
William	"I believe the FTC should ban all non compete causes. California is a prime example of a state with a non compete law on the books for decades. That law has not stop the growth of Silicon Valley."
solmaz	"Non-compete clauses cause undue harm to both patients and physicians. Often times, physicians are forced to relocate if they leave their current place of practice due to a non-compete. This leaves patients struggling to find new providers. As there is a shortage in healthcare overall, many patients will then have to wait weeks to months to establish care with a new physician. This is especially bad for patient's who need close follow-up or who have complicated medical history. Please do away with non-competes so that physicians can do what they are trained to do and love to do--provide quality care to patient's long term."
Cesar	"Dear FTC, I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. As a practicing physician , I have seen firsthand the negative effects these clauses can have on the healthcare industry. Non-compete clauses are detrimental to healthy competition. By preventing physicians from practicing in certain geographic areas or with certain competitors, these clauses limit the ability of physicians to choose the best possible work environment for themselves and their patients. This stifles competition, resulting in a less competitive healthcare market that is less able to innovate and provide the best possible care for patients. Non-compete clauses also give employers unfair leverage in contract negotiations. Employers can use the threat of a non-compete clause to force physicians into accepting unfavorable terms, such as low salaries or poor working conditions. This can result in physicians feeling trapped in their current positions, unable to seek better opportunities elsewhere. Non-compete clauses can also result in physicians being forced to relocate their families, disrupting their children's education and their own personal lives. This can have a negative impact on physician morale and wellbeing, leading to decreased job satisfaction and higher turnover. Non-compete clauses can also disrupt continuity of care by preventing physicians from providing care to the same patients over time. This can be especially detrimental in specialty care, where continuity of care is essential for maintaining the best possible outcomes. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit patient access to specialty care by preventing physicians from practicing in certain areas. For all these reasons, I strongly urge the FTC to enact a ban on non-compete clauses. This ban would ensure that physicians can freely compete in the healthcare market and that patients have access to the best possible care. Sincerely, Cesar Plazas-Guzman, MID."

Orion	"I definitely support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. The concept of a non-compete clause was unsettling when I first came across it and the more I've conic to learn the more it sounds like a gross abuse of power. The simplest way I've found to put it in perspective is to imagine the opposite, a non-compete for an employer that requires them not to hire anyone of your qualifications for a specified period after you no longer work there. It's ridiculous, and should be treated as such."
Susan	"Non- compete clauses create real problems in my industry, where I may work through any number of agencies with the same final client, and in which a new agency might seek to prohibit me from working with someone with whom I already have an established working relationship! In short, they are not helpful to anyone and should be disallowed."
Shivaani	" Physicians should absolutely be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it greatly limits their ability to negotiate their contracts and instead offers large hospital systems an unprecedented advantage over physicians in the marketplace. There is a large increase in physician burnout and allowing the market place to be more free would allow physicians more freedom and flexibility. Additionally, the last time an exemption of this nature was granted by the lobbying from the American Hospital Association (Jung v AAMC 2004) resulted in decades of delay for improving resident physicians' ability for fair wages and benefits; this is still an active struggle today. Please do not make the same mistake again for physicians of today and the future."
Jason	"As a physician who has been subject to geography based employment non-compete clauses, I strongly agree with the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. My experience is that the non-compete clauses do suppress wages, decrease competition and limit the free movement of employees. In my personal experience, they're used the just that purpose to limit competition and restrict employee options."
M.	"End Noncompete AND Nondisclosure Both of these legal handcuffs need to be declared illegal and unenforceable, including any preexisting ones. Freedom to work and freedom of speech are the essence of America."
James	"Non compete contracts are anti-capitalism and anti worker. They are too close to indentured servitude, company stores and scrip for the modern age and should be abolished."
Qwist	"The non compete rule is unfair especially for physicians in healthcare. It gives employers unfettered power in controlling employees. I knew a colleague who when he changed hospitals had to fir 2 years stop practicing pulmonary medicine because of the non compete unnecessarily depriving patients of his much needed skill! and potentially leading to harm as patients who could have benefited from him could not . During covid when non competes were not enforced we saw how the medical establishment was able to help patient care and in a sense reduce the burden on each other with a free flow between hospitals. And in a sense having a federal standard fir contracts but banning non competes in the name of equity helps us all"

Prithviraj	"Non compete should be abolished."
Satheesh	"I support the rule for removing die noncompete clause"
Brandon	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, Banning non-competes helps lubricate the facilitation of trading labor for money. As a young electrical engineer , it is important that I have the ability to take my skills elsewhere that could be potentially offering me more money for more innovative work. As someone vying for a role in the nuclear fusion space, it is clear to see how not being restricted by a non-compete could really allow me to both get a better / higher paying job but also a job that has the potential to improve the lives of many here in the US and elsewhere. Thank you for reading my comment. Sincerely, Brandon Reasoner Fairfax, VA"
Lowell	"I was very excited to see this Ryle come from the FTC, thank you. My brother is a signals engineer in Nebraska he worked for a company in Omaha but married a woman in Lincoln. He constantly had to drive 40 mins everyday to Omaha and wanted to switch jobs. He found one for more pay and closer to home he let his employer know he was leaving and they stopped him with the noncompete clause. He was forced to drop the offer and he ended up working for the state in in an engineering position. I'm liberal but I think even a conservative wouldn't like this outcome. He was lucky to find another Job that would allow him to work close to his expertise."
Heather	"I am a solo gynecologist in rural Virginia and am witnessing the withdrawal of physicians from my area. Most physicians are closed to new patients and bringing in new physicians can be daunting when no competes inhibit physician movement. Please remove ALL noncompetes (including those of hospitals as NO ONE in medicine is nonprofit-- JUST LOOK at the CEO salaries and bonus structures). The lives in my community depend on physician mobility. Please vote to stop non compete clauses and let the patients have choice and access to great healthcare again! Sincerely Dr Heather Reese"
Heather	"Non compete clauses are restraint of trade amongst our medical communities giving patients long waiting periods to reach the most crucial specialists. Our local 'nonprofit hospital' pays its Executives more than 90% of its physicians and those of us in private practice make less than $200000 a year working 60-120 hours a week with ER call...These are only "nonprofit" in the eyes of the IRS and their restraint of trade of those independent community physicians must be stopped. Please abolish the "non compete clause" for physicians and allow us to take care of our patients without having to be forced into employment by a hospital system or abandon our patients in this restraint of trade. Sincerely Dr Heather Reese Independent solo OBGYN"

Lori	"I am writing to express my strongest support for the proposed ban against non-compete clauses for employees. I am sure that a well-organized group of employers will rally to try to dissuade the FTC from imposing this ban. They will be well funded, articulate and flood the FTC with reasons why this will be bad for businesses. I am writing as an affected employee and hope to be a voice to help advocate for all of us adversely affected by non compete clauses. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are devastating for workers and allow employers the right to hold employees hostage in their jobs with little recourse to advocate for fair working conditions. I am a veterinarian, where noncompete clauses are the norm. The justification for this is that as a veterinarian, you are so valuable to the practice that if you leave and clients follow you, your employer will be irrevocably harmed. The non competes are often in place for 1-3 years post departure from the job, and typically are enforced within a 30-mile radius of the veterinary hospital. For me and many of my colleagues, this has had devastating life consequences. My first job as a veterinarian was in a practice that was extremely poor managed. Bottom line, it was not a good job for many reasons. Unfortunately, my spouse and I had bought a new home when I took die job and he managed to find a great job for himself in the area. Therefore, moving out of the area was not an option for us. I ended up spending 5 years at this practice until the situation became untenable. Despite my length of service to this company, they would not release me from my noncompete. To keep my husband in his position, I took a job 120 miles away and lived away from home during the week for 3 years as this was die length of my non-compete. I only came home on weekends and the amount of life I lost during this time is unretrievable. I finally moved back home and have since taken jobs as a veterinarian only in a "relief" position as I am extremely reluctant to sign another non-compete with any other practice. I never want to be in a position where I cannot leave my job, no matter how bad it may be. There are many downsides, however, to only working as a relief veterinarian. I no longer have any benefits (fortunately have health insurance from my spouse). I pay for my own disability, and must set up my own retirement fund, without the benefit of any employer match. There is no paid vacation or sick time. Despite that, I am willing to sacrifice all of this to not be bound to another employer. I have long worried why certain fields of business have been able to "get away" with binding employees to their jobs. This is America, where competition and free enterprise have made this country. If an employer treats their employee well, then the employee would be very reluctant to leave. A non-compete gives an employer little motivation to focus on a mutually satisfactory relationship with die employee. This proposal would revolutionize my life and the life of so many bound employees. I sincerely hope this is not another proposal from the government that ends up going nowhere or takes decades to finally come to fruition. Many of us cannot afford to give away decades more of our work life. Attachments NON COMPETE"
Marla	"Non-compete clauses strike at the heart of what it means to be an American. We value freedom, innovation, and independence. Non-compete clauses are a form of corporate bullying that crushes creativity, innovation, and free and growing markets. Ossified, monopolistic economies that crush worker innovation do not last. Growing, creative economies with plenty of healthy competition are what we need in America. How can we continue to shine and maintain our place

	in the world without unimpeded creativity and new business growth? Non-competes are the most un-American aspect of the modern American economy and we need to ditch them now!"
Jeanne	"I am an optometrist who had been working my entire career in a small city in Virginia. My practice demographic was primarily older patients that required management of chronic conditions treated with medications and regular follow-up. I established wonderful relationships with my patients and had planned to never leave this area. After I sold my practice, I began work for an ophthalmology group one mile away which allowed me to continue to care for my patients at the new location. My employment agreement included a non-compete of 25 miles, which was non-negotiable. I accepted the position so I could continue to practice in my small city and had no intention of ever leaving the area. This allowed me to continue to care for my existing patients. Then, without warning, my new employer informed me that I would be transferred to another office 70 miles away!! This transfer was not negotiable; I was required to accept working at the new location or resign and comply with the 25 mile non-compete. The sole reason I accepted that position was so that I could maintain my presence in the community with which I had long established as a primary eye care provider. To say I almost begged not to be transferred was an understatement. My commute to work went from 10 miles to 70 miles each way, 2.5 hours and I began to experience back and knee pain from the drive. My employer refused to negotiate and again, my only option was to resign and be forced to seek employment outside of my non-compete. I asked if they would waive the non-compete, but they refused and stated they would enforce it to the fullest extent of the law. As a result, I had no option but to resign and accept employment with another practice outside of my non-compete in another city at a reduced salary. Enforcement of the non-compete was unfair and unreasonable because I'm not a surgeon and would have posed no legitimate competition with this employer, but they would not acquiesce. This forced non-compete was NOT in the best interest of the health of my patients. I had no intention of changing employment, but the 70 mile commute one way to work was unreasonable. My patients were left without their longtime doctor and had to search for care with another provider, ultimately interrupting their established care. Additionally, I was prohibited from contacting my patients to provide them with my new location. I hope that the FTC is successful in banning non-competes for the well-being of patients and their dedicated health care providers."
Tim	"Thank you for taking on this issue. As you develop the rule, I strongly encourage you to consider variable compensated employees (bonus, commissions, etc.) if the final rule includes a minimum salary to be excluded from non-competes. For example, a worker selling cell phones who makes a base salary of 535,000 but has an uncapped bonus potential could be argued that they are a "high income earner" even though the earnings are not realized. Situations like this are common for sales professionals. I can easily imagine business arguing this fact as a potential loophole to the rule. Non-compete clauses are an unfair anti-competitive practice which stifles worker choices, development, and income. I'm currently under a non-compete and cannot get another job in my industry in a similar job duty for two years after I separate

	employment. This has hurt my family because after starting my job the offered benefits are not competitive. The health insurance for example, for my family of 4 would cost half of my monthly salary. Moreover, the retirement match benefits are well below industry standard. With my experience I can easily find another job that offers better benefits, but I cannot out of fear of being sued. The non-compete is an opportunity killer. In order to avoid potential litigation, I have to stay out of the industry for two years. I have worked in insurance as a sales agent for the past 10 years. This has been my only professional job and my career of choice. Staying out of the industry for two years would bankrupt my family. The only reason the business uses this non-compete it to stifle competition and prevent workers from finding better paying jobs and telling their former co-workers about it. Thanks again for looking out for the right of workers."
James	"I am in COMPELTE FAVOR of a ban on non-competes. The family owned business I had worked at for 15 years was purchased by a large corporation. While working for the family, no employee was ever required to sign a non-compete or non-solicitation agreement. Many of the employees had been there as long or longer than me. The company enjoyed great success in the market and had its best year in its 30 year history immediately prior to the sale. I was presented with a non-compete/non-solicitation agreement by the new corporation and given one week to sign it or lose my job. I have a family of four that is dependent on my income and health insurance, which is purchased through the company. We have two competitors in our market. One is owned by the same corporation that we are now owned by and the other by another large corporation that requires signing a non-compete as a condition of employment. After 15 years of experience in my industry, I was left with the choice of signing a non-compete, moving my family 70 miles away from our location to not be affected by the non-compete. immediately starting my own business with virtually no time to prepare, or starting over at a job in a new industry. I signed the non-compete begrudgingly. I am now the manager of our location for this corporation. My pay has stagnated over the past three years in spite of extreme inflation and continued growth of both the top and bottom line for the corporation. When we were a family owned business, my pay increased every single year I was there as the performance of the company improved. I am compensated enough that it is very difficult to leave my current job to start over in a new industry but extremely disappointed that the corporation has virtually no incentive to increase my pay given my inability to look for work in my industry in our market. I would likely have started my own business in the same industry had I been given more than a week to contemplate my future without losing my entire income. Unfortunately, that option is off the table without relocating. Iam now living the unfortunate outcome of two large corporations controlling an entire industry in a geographic area. Customers are not aware, but we arc not allowed to compete with our "sister" company for work in our market. The customer suffers from this. Both competing corporations are incentivized to keep prices high because there is an abundance of work and only two corporations now servicing it. Gaining experience at the company will only benefit you so much because the corporation only seeks to keep you just happy enough that you won't leave for another industry. It is ALMOST impossible to hire someone with industry experience because you would have to hire from out of your geographic area to

	find someone not bound by a non-compete. I'd like to further clarify the ALMOST comment from above based on a particularly disturbing experience I recently had. For whatever reason, our competing corporation had to redo one of their employee's non-compete due an error in it. He did not want to sign it. He approached me looking for a new job. We agreed on a compensation package and it was approved by my direct manager. Then a high level manager heard about it and shut it down, not wanting to start a "hiring war" in other markets. I'm not sure how they would start a hiring war with this corporation given the degree to which everyone is bound by non-competes, but it gave a true sense of how friendly everyone is with the competition at the top of the corporate ladder while those at the bottom bear the brunt of it. We were presented with an opportunity to better our branch location while in turn getting a key employee from our main competitor. He had an opportunity to better his compensation package but ended up being turned away at the last minute and staying with the current company. It had all the characteristics of collusion. The corporation I work for was even smart enough to keep all the conversations about it to phone calls, even after I would email. They have no problem communicating via email about everything else, but it was very obvious they wanted none of this in writing. A ban on non-competes should not be a partisan issue. It should not have income limits beyond perhaps the most extreme cases of say C-suite employees. Low wage earners may represent the extreme abuse of non-compete practices, but employees at all levels of various industries are being trapped in their jobs while top level managers with huge compensation packages and shareholders reap the benefits. In a era of corporate buyouts and mergers, these practices will only get worse. Make employers work to keep their employees. Income disparity is extreme despite record corporate profits. It is time to give SOME power back to the people."
M	"This rule is a gift! I was talking to someone today that I'm trying to start a business with and one of our major concern was our contracts with our current employer. If this change is not implemented we'll have to limit our plans to go with our ideas for at least TWO YEARS!! It will also take a good number of targeted clients off our plates because our clause in our contracts were too vague.. PLEASE PLEASE PLEASE MAKE THIS HAPPEN ASAP"

	businesses. Small physician practices are also small business that should be supported . As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. independent practices area valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable."
Kurt	"Please do not exclude physicians from the non-compete rules. Hospital systems use those to handcuff physicians and ultimately harm patients. The corporate hospital groups are lobbying very hard to have physicians excluded because they know non-competes allow the hospital systems to treat us worse and pay us less. I've been a physician for more than 10 years and the only people who have benefitted from a non-compete are the hospital systems. They're harmful to patients and they're harmful to physicians."
Jane	"I fully support the NPRM on the non-compete clause rule. The FTC study reveals how damaging non-compete clauses are to all workers, not just those bound by a non-compete clause. Non- compete clauses are antithetical to the principles of a free market and capitalism. The only way a non-compete clause could ever be fair to a worker, and society, is if the employer is required to pay the employee full salary and benefits after a worker has left employment, for the entire duration of non-compete time required by any non-compete clause."
Aaron	"Non compete clauses ultimately hurt the community and the physicians and their families. Doctors move on average 2-3 times during training, then move to take their first job. If the job is not the right fit, the physician and their family should be able to stay in the geographic area and serve the community at need. instead, bigger hospitals require up to two years of a non complete which is not sustainable to travel towards of 25 miles each way for that long. This hurts young doctors, their families and ultimately the patients."

Linda	"I'm a retired senior citizen , and I'm writing to support the proposed ban and limit on non-compete clauses. As discussed below, I support the FTC's proposed ban on these non-compete clauses. We have too much inflation and price pressures to allow these clauses to encourage excess profits and high prices that hurt consumers. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people Banning or limiting these clauses will contribute to making it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! It also will encourage innovation and the promotion of more efficient ways of doing business. I do recognize that prohibiting these clauses has to be circumscribed by employers' rights to protect legitimate trade secrets, but those protections usually don't require an overall prohibition on competition. It also no longer makes sense to have geographic non-compete zones, because so much business now is done online and through the internet. Next,"
Lisa	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Owen	"I support this."
Virginia	"Physicians and advanced practice providers and other healthcare professionals should not have to be subject to noncompete agreements it drives down competition."
Meenu	"Many of are currently suffering because of non-competes! I and my colleagues are paid $70/hr working nights/ weekends, harassed.. non-compete is 25 Miles covering 3 states!!! We work for a renowned not for profit hospital! The CEO and C-suit make high 7 figures! I made 90k last year.. Please, please let non-competes for physicians go away.. ESPECIALLY hospitals.. not for profit hospitals are only on paper.. They make millions and pay their execs millions.. Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations (which I have personally suffered under) as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."

Anshu	"Competition is a vital part of our economy. Just as monopolies of producers hurt consumers, monopolies of employers hurt employees. Employers need to be able to compete to secure the best talent."
Alan	"I was a student-teacher in 2014. I took a job as a delivery driver at Jimmy John's to make ends meet. After I was hired, I was handed a stack of paperwork that had to be completed prior to my first shift. In addition to the W-4, the stack contained a non-compete agreement that prohibited me from working at any establishment that made more than 10% of their revenue selling sandwiches for two years after I left Jimmy John's. I asked the franchise owner about it. He said that he personally thought it was "stupid" but that "corporate" was requiring all new employees to sign the agreement as a condition of employment. In other words, I could either sign or walk. I didn't have much of a choice at the time. I needed the money and I signed it. It was a bit of a gamble though. Had I not found a teaching job for the following fall, I would either have to work at the one and only Jimmy John's in my hometown or risk violating the NCA if I took nearly any job in the food service industry. Luckily I was hired by one of our local school districts. Later I heard that this particular NCA earned Jimmy John's a couple of class action lawsuits and they dropped the requirement. But I often wonder how many smaller companies (or even bigger ones when times are tough) get away with exactly this sort of thing. I sincerely hope that this regulation passes. It's hard enough to find a job without having to worry about a team of lawyers coming after you in the event you find one."
Ameet	"I am largely in support of this rule. Non-competes have been draconian with no checks & balances on large employers"
James	"I ask the FTC to please follow the lead of many states in prohibiting noncompete clauses. Noncompete clauses empower businesses to suppress wages. There is no measure of wealth distribution in the US that could be construed to suggest businesses have insufficient economic power and workers have too much. To the contrary, in this epoch of wealth inequality not seen since the robber barons, empowering all American workers to seek the highest value for their skills, unfettered, is a straightforward if small step towards rebalancing the power of businesses and labor. It would make good a fundamental assumption in capitalist theory that parties will act in their rational self-interest, which currently many workers cannot. And its value and practicality have already been demonstrated in many states. I worked in a business supplying technology and materiel considered critical for national defense. I was labeled an expert in the field by my DoD customers and commended multiple times for solving logistical and technical problems with protective equipment during the previous two wars. I lead development contracts from the DoD to advance the state-of-the-art in warfighter protection, which set multiple records for figures of merit within my business, and which our program manager volunteered was the most exciting technology she had ever managed. When my business decided to discontinue that technology and transfer me, my noncompete agreement prevented me from continuing to support the DoD. I was removed from consideration at another firm in the third round of interviews because of my noncompete agreement - - again, for a technology my business had decided to not pursue and had transferred me out of. So, instead of having the opportunity to advance my career into management in the service of protecting warfighters, I had to exit that industry and move laterally, into a different industry that cannot value 20 years of my expertise, and which will not further the defense of my country. If the FTC had nationalized a prohibition on noncompete clauses two years ago, this would not have happened, and I would have had the opportunity to advance my career, improve my family's economic fortune, and continue to contribute to our nation's defense."

Amy	"I am a medical oncologist. I strongly feel that non-compete clauses hurt patients as it limits access to care. Myself, and numerous physician friends, experience the same trap- our employers beholden us to non-compete clauses which restrict us from joining or creating new physician groups which we feel would better focus on patient care. We are thus forced to move our families (and often our physician spouses) to new areas just to have a more favorable physician led practice. In addition, by staying in our current employment situation, our salaries are limited. The employer knows that it is difficult to uproot a family and are thus able to keep physician salaries lower than they would be otherwise in the market."
George	"I am writing in favor of a no-compete clause ban. It is an anti-competitive and more dangerous to our patients and workers than a monopoly. In my industry (health care) - no compete clauses are the rule instead of the exception. These are typically used to prevent employees from leaving jobs by basically making them leave town for 1-3y after leaving an employer. As a doctor that had to do this due to poor working conditions. I am well versed to offer advice. First, I made money for the health system that employed me year one on. They never invested in training me or any other activity. I knew no intellectual property and they still require the document. I was paid below market value from day 1, but working for a safety net hospital was worth the 30% pay cut. When the hospital started putting patients at risk and delayed their care with me, I tried to fix it internally. After hitting leadership roadblocks, I realized I couldn't responsibly work there any more and made plans to leave. I feel an duty to not support a system not focused on patients. My wife and kids loved our city, but due to the no-compete and threats of suits if I left and worked within the same city, the no-compete made me leave town for a year. Fortunately, I was able to find a job 1.25h away for the year, but to say it is not a hardship for me and my family would be a lie. The only reason for the no compete is to keep the profit i generate in a specific system. Please make this illegal. It is worse than monopolies of old because of the distribution more are affected and with smaller numbers at each employer there are rarely organized labor to fight had employers for working conditions, pay, benefits and in healthcare - patient safety"

Abby	"In a capitalist economy, based on the notion that a free market will elevate superior corporations through fair competition, non-compete clauses by definition disallow the competition that is the bedrock of the economy and essential for the continued success of the nation. The result is that inferior companies may reduce competition artificially, forcing the hand of consumers and employees alike, violating the principles of the free market and ensuring that the less qualified company wins, by cheating. This reinforces a landscape of monopolies who increasingly control entire markets, plunging the United States ever deeper into corporatism. That non-compete clauses ever were tolerated within a free market system is the real marvel. Get rid of them!"
Donna	"I currently work as an independent contractor (consultant) and my employer has put a noncompete clause in my contract. I cannot work for any facility directly; if I hear of a new facility that would like to contract for my skills, my contract states I must take that information to my employer. It's shocking that this can be imposed on an "independent" contractor and limits my opportunities and income."
John	"Non compete clauses adversely affect salespeople in tech field. We possess no secrets but we are forbidden from working with about 40 competitors at my workplace which keeps me from growing beyond where my company sees me at."
Kelly	"I am writing in support of the proposed action to ban non-compete clauses. These clauses prevent a fair employment market and impose an undue burden on workers by making them unable to seek alternative employment. If a small business cannot afford to pay workers the same wage as a nearby competitor, and therefore cannot retain employees, that is a problem with the business and its revenue model, not a problem to be solved by preventing employees from leaving by threatening their livelihoods. I encourage the Commission to enact this proposed rule."
Raymond	"I strongly support the banning of non-compete agreements. These agreements are akin to slavery in that they prohibit workers from leaving their current employer and then find work with another employer in their area of expertise."
Raymond	"I strongly support the banning of non-compete agreements. These agreements are akin to slavery in that they prohibit workers from leaving their current employer and then find work with another employer in their area of expertise."
J	"Completely agree with ban of non-competes between franchisors and franchisees. Unless the person wasn't integral part of the development, formula or something significant, there is no need for a non-compete. You cannot ban general practices or techniques learned on the job unless they are proprietary and are specific to that one task. Please get rid of it!"
Darlene	"I fully support the FTC's proposal to eliminate non-complete clauses. As a physician, I have heard and seen the damage these clauses can have on patient care. I have known physicians who have been forced to practice elsewhere for 1-2 years before returning to their home town to continue practicing. As an example, a dermatologist who had practiced in our city for over a decade year had to go to another city the a year before returning to our city to work— yet there was already a 6-month wait for patients to see ANY dermatologist in town. I

	perform complex breast reconstruction surgeries and worked at the largest non-profit health care system in Texas. I and was not allowed to perform these surgeries at the competing hospital in town, which forced patients with "the wrong" insurance to drive 1.5 hours away to receive their breast cancer reconstruction. Yet, I was not allowed to leave and open up a private practice in town to allow me to operate at both places as that would break my non-compete clause. I know plenty of physicians who are completely burned out because they have no option but to comply with the nearly unobtainable demands from whatever organization they are employed. A myriad of studies have demonstrated the ever increasing level of physician burnout. While this is obviously a concern fur physicians, it's a much larger one for patients! Patient care is compromised when a physician is burned out or too distracted to focus solely on the patient before them. I know large corporations will fight this and try to make arguments about the need for this. Yet, I question how a corporation's control of employee talent does not resemble a monopoly. Plus pass this proposal for the sake of patients and citizens everywhere in the US! Thank you."
JC	"Non-competes are bad for healthcare for everyone"
marie	"Please get rid of non compute. As a physician, these are terrible for physicians especially now when small practices are dying and physicians are employed by big hospital systems or venture capital companies. It was different when it was all small practices. No Non Compete!!!"
Keith	"The proposed rule to eliminate the non-compete clause is long overdue. This clause, in the form of a restrictive covenant, has perverted the landscape in contract negotiations for healthcare professionals for generations, hurting not only the providers themselves but also the communities that they serve. This is especially true in rural are-as, where patients may have limited options in selecting or even locating a healthcare provider. In my area of Southwest Virginia, most healthcare professionals are employed by one of two corporate entities. Because of the non-compete clause in nearly every one of our contracts, if one of us has a dispute with our employer which cannot be resolved and leads us to sever our ties with the organization, we are obligated to leave the area for a year or more, because the non-compete clause prohibits us from either joining the competitor or opening our own practice. Not only does this uproot the provider and his/her family, it leaves all of the provider's patients scrambling to find a new doctor. In a medically underserved area, that limits access to care and places patients' health and lives at risk, when they can't get their blood pressure or blood sugar levels monitored or get their prescriptions refilled. I myself am overdue for routine dental care, because my dentist was forced to leave his practice after he was unable to resolve a disagreement with the private equity firm that had purchased a majority stake in his dental practice. The non-compete clause should be directed to the dustbin of history - all the more so as U.S. life expectancy has started to decline, because it impedes access to healthcare, especially in underserved populations.'

Mary Jean	"Please eliminate (ban) non-compete clauses from the workplace. They are being abused by employers and harming American workers. The New York Times Opinion video about how NCCs have negatively impacted Americans was heartbreaking to watch. Please help the little guy".
Barry	"Non-compete clauses are not right. Because of them, workers who would want to leave their job and enter the job market are restrained from doing so. This is a gross disservice and needs to be changed immediately!"
David	"I haven't been directly affected by this issue, but I can't even imagine the plight of a poor worker who must leave their occupation entirely ,just for the sake of a corporation's monopoly."
Maeve	"The current environment of non-compete clauses in employment contracts places undue restraint on employees. It allows employers to use threatening language to scare employees from continuing in the fields and careers they have trained in for years. As a medical healthcare professional, with a doctoral level degree, it seems absurd that my current employer can prohibit me from working in the geographic area of 'the United States' for a term of 2 years after fulfilling my contract. This limits my ability to financially provide for myself. Beyond the crippling restrictions, it limits the progress that can be made in my specific field of study, all because my employer sees any former employee as a threat. Our economy would only benefit by freeing the workforce from restricting clauses and encourage employers to keep up with market demand in order to maintain their employees."
Jennifer	"This proposed rule prohibiting non-compete clauses is a very positive step to improve economic conditions for workers and to foster a competitive marketplace. I fully support this rule."
Nick	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 This proposed rule would benefit workers nationwide and is an excellent way to level the playing field for skilled employees looking to take those skills and improve their pay, as well as open the possibilities of new small businesses. I wholly support and endorse this proposed rule."
Benjamin	"My name is Benjamin...and (I) reside in tappahannock, va. I am currently in a lawsuit being sued by my former employer because i quit after 13 years of employment in the marine construction field because i was a salary employee and i was being used and mistreated and talked to in an unfit way. I was being made to work 70 plus hours a week, late evenings and weekends and some holidays. The more i did the more they threw on my shoulders. I did not recieve any overtime compensation and i had zero benefits. All i got was a paycheck. Very little at that because i supposedly was just over the low wage employee threshhold by $2000. Pathetic. Currently i am being forced to shell out THOUSANDS of dollars in attorneys fees to protect myself so i can move on with my life and earn an honest legal living. ABSOLUTELY RIDICULOUS. The selfish neglect of my former employer and the mere fact that he has to actually earn his own money now is the reason he is after me. I was forced to use my own cell phone for business purposes as well as my own email. Now i am crouching and hiding to perform jobs under the radar so i can earn a living and provide for my family. Non competes are unjust and unfair. its absolutely ridiculous i have to pay

	an attorney so i can better myself and my career to be happy. I was absolutely miserable working there and overwhelmed and exhausted. On top of all that to be talked to and treated like a slave and to have the non compete always thrown in my face was absolutely humiliating and depressing Thinking i could not ever leave a company because i couldn't work for someone else in a field that i have worked in for 20 years and the only thing i have ever done was entirely ridiculous. Please pass this law so i can move on with my life and earn an honest living doing what i know and what i love and pay my taxes without the bourdon of a selfish narcissistic animal suing me because he cannot use me any longer and has to actually work for once. PLEASE PASS THIS LAW ASAP. FOR CHRIST SAKE THIS IS AMERICA where is the FREEDOM?"
Adrian	"This allows employers to treat their employees like because they can't leave! If they leave it is a burden on them and their family to drive a ridiculous commute to find other employment! Please do away with non competes!! Original Comment This allows employers to treat their employees like shit because they can't leave! James Blair	"I will say that this non-compete rule has affected not only me but my family. having relocated several times to be able to work. Please get rid of this rule. I am 64 years old now and I am tired of moving around."
Kurian	"I feel that the ability for physicians to not be bound by non-competes will enable better access for patients to getting the health care they deserve. Physician non-compete clauses create an undue burden on physicians and favor their employers in way that prevents free market enterprise of all stakeholders. Large private equity and hospital chains will use onerous non-compete clauses to create a one sided scale that in the short term may benefit physicians financially but ultimately create a situation wherein physicians will be disenfranchised and will leave areas in search of better opportunities which will leave patients without access to healthcare. Physicians are already burdened with large medical school debt and expenses and non-competes create a serfdom which those without means are stuck and ultimately lead to a physicians' burnout. The opposite argument is that employers spend money to recruit and give doctors an opportunity to practice medicine. True in the short term but in the long term this only restricts a patient's ability to seek care with the physicians of their choice. And with the conglomeration of medicine as a whole patients are left with less choice. As a practicing physician and surgeon and one who have staled 2 practices in my career, I feel the free market should dictate how physicians practice not restrictive non-competes. If large corporations want to retain physicians who are the lynchpin of medicine then they would all agree non-competes clauses are not necessary. However their argument against abolishing it, is a testament to the fact that without physicians linked to non-competes their business model fails, and one in which physicians are truly at the top of the medical profession."

Nicola	"Non-compete clauses are a drag on workers' mobility and therefore harm the economy. They need to be banned."
Robert	"I fully support the FTC actions to prohibit any and all non-compete clauses or provisions by employers. They harm employees because the vast majority of employees have no leverage or bargaining power over these clauses at the time you are a new hire and, in many cases for new entrants to the workforce who need a job. In many cases, these clauses indirectly force you to stay in a job you really don't like but your talents and skills are most valuable salary- wise to work for another entity that may, would, could fall within the non-compete clause. Most employees do not have the financial resources to risk their employer seeking judicial monetary action against the employee for an alleged breach by the employee no matter however unfounded the employer's allegation of a breach. Not only is the specific employee harmed but other companies across the U.S. might benefit from hiring this employee and that hurts the economy of the community, state, and nation. In some ways it seems that a non-compete clause enables employers to monopolize talented employees by locking them in their current job upon pain of financial harm if they leave but staying working in that line or field of business. Employers have other appropriate remedies where they believe that a former employee is misusing proprietary information or trade secrets of a former employer. Yes, it is harder and more expensive for the former employee to pursue this alternate approach but it is not unconscionable like the non- compete clause forced upon a new employee with no leverage, bargaining power, or perhaps even a realization of what the non-compete clause really means. I am a 70 year old executive who, in my long, has mentored many young graduates about the ways of interviewing and joining the work force. They are vulnerable to buried terms in an employment contract, especially if they are excited about getting their first real job. This is true even if they have multiple college degrees and you would think they would know better. I am sorry but they don't in so many cases. (As an aside, I have never asked anyone to sign a non-compete clause for another reason---you really do not want to supervise an unhappy employee.) Thank you all on the Commission to tackling this seriously harmful business practice. Good luck with this effort"
Paul	"I am an emergency physician and Chief Financial Officer of a small physician owned group . Personally, restrictions on my ability to practice my trade infringe upon my freedoms of work. Such restrictions are physical gag orders to prevent me from benefiting from my years of training and experience. Particularly for hospital cases physicians, there are already mechanisms for control of practice based on hospital privileging processes. As a CFO, non-competes are blatantly anti- competitive. We deal with hospitals who would like to hire our group to provide services as the larger national groups with whom they contract provide substandard care. My product is superior and the hospitals want to hire us. Non-competes restrict the ability to transition these contracts as the hospitals fear the existing contract holder will attempt to enforce a non-compete and not allow good physicians already working at a hospital. Replacing a good physician is a difficult task and preventing good physicians from practicing their trade at a particular hospital raises a significant barrier to change and competition. The larger group should simply provide a superior product and compete on a level playing field with me. The threat alone of preventing a current physician at a current hospital from working for my group vs the existing group creates a stranglehold which decreases competition, decrease quality of service, and holds hospitals hostage to changing contracts within their own hospital. The question has to be asked for those who advocate for non-competes, "why can you not provide a service that is superior to the core such that physician non-competes should be unnecessary?" The only legitimate answer is to stifle competition and obviate the need to innovate or treat employed physicians fairly."

Kate	"Non compete clauses limit the ability of workers to have freedom to leave their job. Non competes standard in the medical field often say a company can terminate your position for no reason and leave you unable to work for 2 years within 20 to 25 miles of a facility. I would have to sell my home and leave my city. This is often applied to multiple locations if an employer has multiple sites of employment. Workers should have the freedom to leave a position without violating their ability to provide for themselves and their families This forces people to stay in positions for lower salaries and less benefits. The medical field is already devoid of benefits. It is standard to have no PTO and salaries have not increased for years Eliminating non competes will allow people to have the same advantages that other people enjoy. Please give us the freedom we deserve so we can have the basic decision of where we want to work. We are people, not commodities hospitals or corporations should be able to control and bully."
Venu	"As a practicing subspecialty physician , I have faced direct issues and loss of compensation and employment opportunities due to contractual non-compete language/clause. This specifically impacted patient care as I am a stroke and vascular disease specialist and could not practice where I live (Virginia) and have had to seek employment opportunities out of state which are onerous to my family and challenging to establish a new clinical practice. It seems quite unreasonable to limit my ability to provide subspecialized and needed care directly where I live and for my community in order to facilitate anti- competitive practices of an employer especially when there is no demonstrable impact to their business. The FTC's proposal to eliminate non-compete clauses will directly empower physicians to practice freely to improve working conditions, decrease burnout, and expand services to more patients in many markets."
Gavin	"I agree with doing away with non competes. I think they unnecessarily restrictive and frequently leave workers stuck in a bad situation because they cannot afford to leave their job."
Aarthi	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people. Noncompete clauses often force physicians to leave long term patients Our patients deserve better continuity of care."

Srikrishna	" Hospital and private equity based noncompetes are detrimental to patients and healthcare access. This is a serious issue and may help with the growing shortage of providers nationwide"
Steven	"I wholeheartedly support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. In exchange for some alleged, ephemeral benefit to the company they work for, these clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation and productivity, and harm working people economically, intellectually, and psychologically. With my son being self-employed, and his older sister in Spirit, several of my cousins, nieces, and nephews work for technology companies, that I strongly suspect forced them to sign Non-Compete Clauses. This new FTC policy will make it much easier for workers to earn what they're worth, and at jobs that are just perfect for them!"
M	"I strongly support this rule. Non competes are used inappropriately in medicine where they keep wages low and decrease mobility."
Robert	"It's obvious that large corporations are starting to conic into the medical market and change it even further. Those changes may be for the better or the worse however, complete control over a physician is unacceptable. The corporations are apparently setting themselves up to and trap us and prevent us from having a livelihood outside of their control. Eliminating the noncompete clause or minimizing its impact is critical to allow a physician, the freedom to actually work and maintain a livelihood. The corporations are trying to drive us out of markets that often encompass millions of patients. They literally have pushed positions out of the entire state in which these corporations dominate. That's unacceptable from anyone's standard. Freedom to make a living within a reasonable distance of their own home is necessary."
Pierre	"Been in industrial sales and sales management for 36 years. Previous company 30 years, current company 5.5 years. Current company came to me last year and forced me to sign a non-compete. If you don't sign you can be released. Non-competed are a way for employers to "control" you, impede your ability to have the ability to move to a better position, better opportunity, better working conditions. Non competes are basically extortion and a tool employers use to box you in - kill non-competes. They are unfair!"
Pierre	"Non-compete agreements should be ILLEGAL! Only protects employers and not the employee. If a company wants to guarantee an employee a financial security package upon exit then the employee has some financial relief. Otherwise, the employer is in full control. And, don't give me the answer your severance will equal one-week for every year. I left a company after 30 years for a better opportunity for me and my family. My new employer after being here 5 years now made me sign a non compete guarantee one week for each year - that's called GREED! Non competes should be made illegal."
John	"It is an onerous burden on an employee to move from an area to earn a living in their field of practice if they terminate employment and in many cases if they are terminated or contract not renewed. In the field of medicine, an argument in favor of a non-compete clause could be that the move into an area as well as die cost of setting up the practice and becoming recognized in a region is sustained by the practice or system. However, these clauses continue despite the a prolonged duration of employment or upon acquisition of a practice by a third party despite the employee having been well established in the community and region. It is my opinion that the application of non-compete clauses should be assiduously curtailed. This practice is anti-competitive. Moreover, it provides undue and unfair control over employees in all manner of professions."

Curtis	"Non compete clauses benefit companies only and restrict the employee from better pay and benefits. Companies should compete for good employees instead of holding them hostage."
Bruce	"Non-compete clauses can depress earnings. They also discourage entrepreneurship."
Lauren	"Physician noncompetes harm patients and doctors alike. They decrease access to care and keep doctors stuck in bad jobs without the opportunity to leave. This increases burnout and forced doctors to retire/reduce work which is a problem for patients. If you want the best care from the best physicians for you and your family, eliminate noncompetes."
Zachary	"I fully support getting rid of non compete clauses. I am a physician "
Carl	"As a physician , I have been dealing with and observing the effects of restrictive covenants all of my professional life (now about 30 years). I have watched as physicians have become employed en masse by hospitals, and watched those hospitals essentially force their employed physicians to sign covenants that would actually force them to leave town should they want to leave their employment with the hospital system. These physicians have built up a practice with their own hard work, and have kids and families that have put down roots in the community. They have essentially been made prisoners to their positions with the given hospital. As stated, this obviously stifles wages for the physicians, as the covenant essentially erases competition from other local hospitals. This form of enslavement needs to be curtailed or stopped. On the other hand, private practices also have restrictive covenants that inhibit physicians from leaving their group, and indeed some are written so that even if the physician is "asked" to resign, they cannot open a practice in a nearby area, usually for a period of 2 years. I have witnessed people taking temporary jobs for two years then moving back to the area, and have also witnessed lawsuits and court battles when physicians tried to ignore the restrictive covenant and go into practice nearby. I believe that restrictive covenants should be illegal, null, and void. I think that non- solicitation agreements could be allowed for short periods of time (one year?) to give the affected business/practice time to hire a replacement for the lost employee or make other arrangements, but after that, free competition should be allowed. So, free physicians to practice where and when they want to!! Patients will benefit. Physicians will be happier. Hospitals, who control a vast majority of the dollars now, will be a little less powerful. It will be a better competitive marketplace, as your many studies point out. Sincerely, C. Wei, M.D."

Deanna	"This is an absolutely wonderful law change. I was astounded to learn that Sheetz gas station has a non compete clause for employees. These causes, which people sign thankful they are getting a job, limits their ability to increase their income potential. Corporation executives make outrageous salaries while workers have to work extra hours if allowed or have multiple jobs and no life. No wonder we have a mental health and substance use crisis and so much homelessness. Thank you for finding a root cause for lack of prosperity for the entire country, a fundamental right in the constitution. The market will balance out earnings as competitors will be forced to treat employees with respect or lose staff. Terrible employers should go out of business IMHO"
Kermit	"Outlaw non-competes!"
Veronica	"Held me back from employment although my position of 5.7 years ended through no fault of my own. These are unfair to the worker!!"
Justin	"I am writing to express my strong belief that non-compete clauses should be abolished in employment contracts. These clauses are detrimental to both employees and the economy as a whole. First, non-compete clauses limit the mobility and career advancement opportunities of employees. They prevent individuals from seeking better job opportunities and earning potential, and can even discourage them from leaving a job they are unhappy with. This can lead to employees feeling trapped in their current roles, resulting in lower job satisfaction and productivity. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can stifle innovation and competition by preventing employees from bringing their skills and knowledge to new companies and industries. This can slow down the pace of technological and economic progress, and can even lead to a stagnation of ideas and practices. In light of these negative effects, it is clear that non-compete clauses should be abolished. They limit the freedom and opportunities of employees and hinder economic growth. I urge you to consider the impact of non-compete clauses and take action to end their use in employment contracts."
Jessica	"Please get rid of non-compete clauses, these have kept me from practicing primary care in my underserved hometown (Harrisonburg, VA) because of corporate greed."
Emma	"Today those who are early in their career stay at their jobs for roughly 2.75 years prior to switching companies Changing jobs allows those who are early in their career to seek higher paying jobs and role promotions more easily. As a young physician at 30 years old I am now searching for my first job after residency alongside thousands of my peers graduating from residency or fellowship this year. At this point in our lives, many of us are looking to buy a house, start a family and look forward to positively contributing to our community's health. However, when reviewing job contracts every single one includes a non-compete clause. This creates an exceptionally daunting task of finding a job that I am happy with immediately following graduation, that pays a competitive salary and offers benefits that are supportive for myself and family. If this first job turns out to not be a great fit, I will face either a long commute to a different site that is outside of the bounds of my non-compete clause or worse moving altogether. Additional commuting means less time with family, worse work-life balance and additional negative environmental impacts on the community. If we are forced to move, I will be uprooting myself and family from our community, forced to sell our home after a shorter than ideal amount of time and stripped of any additional work or volunteer opportunities I have been able to engage in within this community. With burnout at an all time high among physicians, elimination of non-compete clauses will give physicians the opportunity to seek other roles in their current communities instead of being faced with the hard choice of moving or leaving clinical care altogether. Elimination of the non-compete clause will empower physicians at any point in their career to find roles that better align with their desired role, negotiate for improved wages and safe working conditions."

Bruce	"I am in favor of the ban for non-executive employees and for blue collar industries. My son was coerced into a ten year employment agreement that was totally worded in favor of the Company. Six years into the agreement he left die company and is being sued by the Company for violating die agreement. This is a Company that installs docks and seawalls. There is a dispute as to whether he is considered a low wage employee or not. The Company has deep pockets and is trying to punish my son by making him incur large legal fees to fight the suit. Totally ridiculous."
robert	"I feel non-profits should NOT be excluded from this. most non-profit companies are using this title in order not to pay taxes. their executives are highly compensated and profits are a real goal in these companies. non-profit is a title that needs to be eliminated. thank you"

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Washington | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Washington:

	“I am a gastroenterologist in Seattle, WA. Unfortunately, I had to contend with a non-compete clause from my [former] employer. As a result, I had to spend 18 months at a satellite hospital where I wasn't able to provide medical care according to my skills and qualifications (I sub-specialize in Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis). I believe the non-compete clause is antiquated and unfair for both patients and providers. Essentially it prevents patients' access to a provider with whom they established sometimes long- term relationships and instead it forces them to choose a new provider from the old institution. In many cases this leads to lower patient satisfaction and quite often lower quality of care given the difficulty on the new provider to getting familiarized with a new and sometimes very complex patient. I think patients' interest should supersede petty financial interests from healthcare institutions and therefore, I am strongly in favor of repealing the non-complete clause nationally.” -Michael C.
	"This is an amazing initiative. I am in retail where I have hit the upper limit due to my title as diem are never higher level openings. My non compete essentially prevents me from going to any other retailer that has more than 100 stores or 100 million dollars in revenue. In other words, I see many qualifying jobs but I cannot be hired into those because of my non-compete. In other words , I am now slave to my current company as my experience is not directly transferable to non-retailer companies in the senior level positions." -Jar C.
	"I am a veterinarian in the Pacific Northwest, and I've personally seen the [harm] non-compete clauses have caused the veterinary field, as well as pet owners and their pets... At the hospital I worked in, a couple of veterinary neurologists felt that due to staffing, their patients and clients would be better served if they moved to a different clinic... the non-compete clauses are contributing to the shortage of veterinarians - not only restricting the movements of veterinarians who are seeking better working conditions, but subjecting pets and pet owners to egregious wait times or long drives to seek the care they need...This is egregious and heavily impinges workers' rights...To summarize, non compete clauses in the veterinary field have become an undue burden and hamper workers' ability to leave a workplace when their needs are no longer being met. It has consequences not just on veterinarians but also has a hugely negative impact on pet owners and pets. These are just a few specific examples." -Hannah C.

	"I am writing because non-compete clauses have negatively impacted my family. My son signed a non-compete clause when he went to work as an Optometrist in a small town. After several months the owner of the business/Optometrist decided to retire and sell his business...Because of the non-compete clauses he was forced to commute 2 hours a day in Seattle traffic and can't spend that time with his girls. It has resulted in loss of family time that is huge in the growth of children. He has a good job but die commuting is very stressful and has impacted his health and relationships with family. Without a non-compete clause he would have been able to maintain his Optometry practice in die local community with less stress and more family time. Please end this unfair archaic practice...My husband was also subject to a non-compete clause when we lived in Oregon. He lost his job as a printing press technician and repairman. He had worked for the employer for many years but suddenly at about 50 years old he was jobless and could not get a job locally because this Company was all over Oregon. He had to move out of state or start over in a new career...It is not only costing employees a great amount of money, it is putting undue stress on the family unit. " -Debra L.
	"I was forced to sign a non-compete agreement that limited my ability to work even with the other employees, Of course I couldn't work in my profession (CPA) when I made 60,000 a year from the company. It gave access by my employer to my bank records, and forced me to pay all attorney fees if I ever disputed the agreement. This is a horrible business tool and should be prohibited." -Carol J.

Constituent First Name	Comment Highlights
G D	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements."
Michael	"We absolutely must ban non-compete agreements. They are cynical and unfair, quashing competition and workers' ability to get a fair value for their labor. It is the workers who need protection from vastly more powerful corporations, not the other way around."
Sarah	"I support this rule. NDAs already cover proprietary information. If employers don't want to waste time and resources on training employees, they should compensate them satisfactorily so they don't want to leave. No one wants to innovate for a company that has them locked down against their will."

Rajiv	"I completely agree with making non-compete illegal. I have seen many employees get stuck with their current employer and fall victim when they are not treated well/fairly and the employee has no choice. Often, even when there is some doubt about the mat church of duties with the new employer, employees do not risk against their big company thinking they will lose to the big company. This also has an impact on their lifetime compensation. Non-compete has been misused by employer's."
Hasan	"Non competes are terrible for employees and should be banned for all professions including physicians. Hospitals have gained too much power in employees having to stick with them due to non competes. They only have the employer's best interest but not the employee. It would serve the American public to get rid of non-competes."
Iram	"As a physician, these non competes are terrible. They have become an excuse to keep salaries low, our hours long and does not motivate our employers to seek the best and brightest. Often times they get extended to not just one hospital or system, but to ANY location associated with that system (way more common know with healthcare becoming corporatized), so to change jobs we are forced to uproot our lives and move out of town to seek better opportunities, and many of us have kids in school, spouses with jobs so the only option is either to leave the field entirely or stay and be miserable. Lawyers don't sign non competes, why are we held to different standards?"
Glen	"HERE IS MY COMMENT: I STRONGLY SUPPORT the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses!!! Non-compete clauses DISEMPOWER EMPLOYEES and put them at a serious disadvantage in their careers!!! Those clauses SUPPRESS WAGES!!! The FTC must ALLOW WORKERS TO MOVE FROM JOB TO JOB -- and to EARN WHAT THEY ARE WORTH!!!"
Kirsten	"I'm a family physician, and I have a non compete clause. I wish I had never signed it, but I felt my hands were tied when this was "required" at every position I looked at after residency. I did not realize the implications for my future family at the time, but I feel stuck in my current job while wanting to stay in the community that my family is deeply embedded in. Please do away with non competes for every one in this country, including physicians."
michael	"20 years ago I was doing frequent consulting work in manufacturing and ERP System implementations. The organization I worked for didn't require a non- compete agreement and we never had issues with consultants jumping ship to compete with us since the company we worked for was ethical and provided fair compensation as well as treating us appropriately. Some of us

	even became 'independent consultants' rather than employees and then worked for the same organization as subcontractors giving them a large percentage of the billings....Companies argue these are needed to protect themselves from hostile actors - but the only thing they protect is profit margins by preventing competition and keeping wages low. If a person can get a higher salary from a competitor (and that competitor still makes a profit so is OK with that) then the current employer can also make sufficient profit paying that same higher wage. Non-Compete agreements are a restraint of trade, block employment opportunities and limit worker mobility. In a "free market" employees need to be able to move from bad employers to better employers without artificial constraints else an effective "employee monopoly" is created. I fully support the action of the FTC to block all past and future non-compete agreements."
anonymous	"Please act to limit the use of non-compete clauses. As a Director at a publicly traded company, I have been required to sign a non-compete clause at every job I've taken in the advertising/marketing industry since the early 2000's - even when I was operating in entry level and junior positions. My exposure to risk from an employer pursuing me for violation of the contract has been a career limiting factor for me. There is a substantial lack of clarity around whether the non-compete will be enforced, and at what level companies start to "care" about violations. As an employee, it feels like an imbalance of power for my employer to apply these handcuffs as a condition of employment. I've also struggled with the fact that the industry I'm in is broadly defined, so it is often hard to know what would be considered competitive."
Anonymous	"The multi-specialty clinic with whom I am employed has all providers (I am a pediatrician) sign a non-compete clause at time of hire. The stated purpose of this non-compete is to keep administrative affairs secret from local competitors. This could be achieved by a non-disclosure agreement. The non-compete makes seeking new employment in the area very difficult. We have not seen a raise since 2019. They have also recently rescinded a dividend from our building ownership. Taking inflation into account, this has resulted in a 20% decrease in real pay. There is little leverage an individual physician has to affect this, as finding new employment means uprooting one's family and basically starting over. As a lower paid physician, I feel trapped in my current employment situation. Basically the non-compete is anti-competitive, and does little to achieve the stated purpose of keeping "trade secrets". I prefer not to include personally identifiable information for fear of retribution from my employer."
Anonymous	"I appreciate the FTC reviewing Non-compete policies. This only supports organizations and negatively impacts employees in many ways. My company was part of an acquisition and the new company upholds non-compete clauses. The new company also laid off many workers and these former colleagues are unable to look for work in their area of expertise due to non-competes in place. This also holds employees hostage from looking to other roles which can preclude them from furthering their career and opportunity to earn more money. Employees can't use trade secrets if they transfer to new companies because that would still be illegal. The only beneficiary of non-competes are the corporations who already pay their CEO's extremely large packages while holding pay scales in check and not in line with inflation. I urge you to remove non-compete clauses for the benefit of the millions of employees affected."

Oscar	"The non compete clause is problematic at least. It prevents us from looking for a better set of working conditions on our area of expertise."
Sandra	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. This is especially egregious in the health care industry where medical providers are unable to leave a group practice or emergency room. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Danielle	"I feel that this law is completely unjust. I had to tip toe around changing jobs a few years ago due to this. My husband works in a very specialized field and these non competes would require our family to relocate out of state if ever he needed to change jobs. Please do all that you can to eliminate this law."
Glenn	"I support the rule change as proposed, to ban non-compete clauses. I am an IT professional working in Seattle, and non-compete clauses are standard and pervasive across my industry. I find them insulting and coercive, and a clear attempt to suppress wages and prevent workers from advancing to other companies without having to pay them a market wage or good benefits to persuade them to stay. Tech employers will argue (falsely) that such clauses are necessary to protect their intellectual property, but that is utter nonsense. Companies own their IP regardless of whether their employees are free to go work somewhere else, and if they believe an employee has taken their work product to another company, they can sue or criminally prosecute that employee for doing so. Simply preventing them from taking a job with another company is unjustifiable. Further, because non-competes are ubiquitous, their enforcement is also highly selective and capricious, meaning that in practice, they create an imbalance of power and force every worker to contend with the idea that their company might try to prevent them from finding work elsewhere in their chosen field, subjecting them to legal costs and potentially denying them a job opportunity that they have earned. These clauses are not reasonable, they're not fair, and they serve no purpose besides allowing employers to systematically collude to suppress worker wages."

Jacob	"As a University student upcoming into the job market, non compete clauses are one of the most scary parts about the labor market. They can chain you to a company fully and completely and in my opinion take away personal rights and freedom. I don't think being forced to move cities in order to change employers is ever a good thing for workers or the economy. Even if corporations lobby against real people and workers, I hope the futures and freedom of the younger generation persuade you to make the right decision and protect workers freedoms and my future."
B.L.	"I have worked in information technology for over 33 years. Many was the time I turned down work for fear of this rule. As a single parent, I could not afford to take the risk that some vindictive business would ruin me rather than see me work for a competitor. I cannot emphasize enough the difficulty and suffering that threat of non-compliance with no compete clauses caused myself and many others. Relieving our future of this burden cannot possibly happen soon enough."
David	"It is a shame that hard-working people and any level of business should be kept from pursuing there professional and job needs. Non-compete clauses are a corporate crime."
Brianna	"I am very pleased to see this as a consideration. The use of non competes is unfair to the individual. I have had corporations try to "sneak" in non compete verbiage into a contract that was explicitly to NOT have a non compete. It is manipulative and truly only protects the corporation."
Stephen	"Noncompete requirements are simply one more tool the corporate world uses to keep expenses for labor at an absolute minimum. These agreements force potential employees to "voluntarily" give up their constitutional right to choose their employers. BAN THESE UNCONSTITUTIONAL TACTICS!"
Stephen	"NONCOMPETES- MANDATORY ARBITRATION- UNION BUSTING- RIGHT-TO-WORK LAWS- STRIKE BUSTING- ENOUGH! WORKERS' RIGHTS ARE BEING ASSAULTED BY BOTH CORPORATE AND GOVERNMENTAL ACTIONS, AND THIS MUST S T O P ! OUR WORKING-CLASS IS RAPIDLY BEING TURNED INTO THE WORKING- P O O R CLASS, AND OUR NATIONAL SECURITY IS BEING ERODED BY THIS EGREGIOUS DESTRUCTION, CREATING A TWO-CLASS (RICH AND POOR) SOCIETY, WHICH IS DESTROYING OUR ECONOMY JUST AS RAPIDLY. ENOUGH!"

AnGee	"Please remove noncompete clauses. It is contributing to wage suppression at all levels including myself, a physician. This is in the best interest of everyone."
Susan	"I am a physician in Seattle and am working for a private group that required me to sign a noncomplete clause in order to continue with the group as a partner. In die event that I may not want to continue service with this group I would be required to drive a long distance in order to obtain employment. This is not practical. There are plenty of opportunities in Seattle and my family lives in Seattle. I am not sure what reason for the noncompete clause is my field as an anesthesiologist. I am not a threat to the group that I would take patients away from their practice. Anesthesia doesn't work that way. If anything, it would force the group to provide an acceptable salary and benefits package if they felt they had to invest in retaining providers."
stu	"Please continue this work and listen to the workers, not the employers! My wife is currently under a non-compete that is making it impossible for her to continue her work as a civil engineer. We would love to see these abolished!"
Erin	"I am one of only 50 Rheumatologists in my state but 75% live/work in the only major city in the State. It is unfair to force me out of the city where my family has made a home just because 1 want a new job. Non competes should not exist for physicians, it prevents needed rare specialists from coming to my state as no one can ever change jobs- we just have to leave the State Attachments ACR-Workforce-Study-2015 The attachment is restricted to restrict all because it contains copyrighted data"
travis	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Ben	"Non competes limit employee's' options to earn a living. Many companies require them to get a job. Those same jobs often require similar work experience. Meaning I'm either trapped at that job or when I look to leave i often need to move to a new space. Being trapped often means lower wages or staying in a job that may no longer work for an employee."

Reilly	"I am firmly against non-compete clauses for physicians in private or non-profit entities. Non-compete clauses are predatory, banning the physician and the patient populations that they care for. This is particularly evident in rural areas where when non-compete clauses are embedded in the contract, often forces the physician to leave their community if they want to leave a toxic/harmful workplace, as there are often no other reasonably nearby facilities that they can provide services to. I strongly urge the FTC to act on this and restrict the use of non-compete clauses. Right now, we are in a physician shortage crisis. We can not afford to authorize another barrier to healthcare access."
Helena	"Please remove the exception of a business sale. No business, just as employees, should be limited by a large corporation to open another business. I am a healthcare provider. The only way on can work is by having a practice. By selling a practice to a large corporation, they are restricting me from working within 20 miles or to open another practice in the state. I would have to uproot my family to be able to provide for my family. There is a shortage of healthcare providers in my state already. Restricting to work within such a large area of 20 miles after the sale of the business or to open another practice really affects access to care. Please consider to remove the business sale exception."
Helena	"What about non-solicitation of customers and other employees. Would that fall into the non-compete law? I am a healthcare provider and in addition to the restricted miles within which I cannot provide care, my contract also states that I cannot solicit any patients, referrals or employees. There is a financial penalty per occurrence. That means, if a patient of my previous employer walks in, should I refuse to provide care to that patient? Or if the patient was referred to me from the same referrer who also refers patients to my previous employer, should I still refuse to see the patient? Please consider to include the ban on such non-solicitation."
Tatyana	"As a future nurse practitioner and current nurse, non compete clauses have the potential to affect my employment opportunities. Many of my peers and coworkers have been forced to work in poor and dangerous conditions due to these clauses. If they choose to seek employment elsewhere they have to uproot their entire life and move unreasonable distances to seek new employment opportunities. These policies are unethical and only benefit corporations."
Stephen	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Thea	"Hello. I started a job with a noncompete in a small community on the Olympic Peninsula of Washington state where there are not a lot of options for employment. The job turned toxic the second day I was there. I was so stressed out and it only got worse. I didn't know what to do since there was a noncompete and I'd just moved to the area from out of state and bought a house. I became very depressed and actually had an outbreak of shingles three months after starting because of the daily stress and wondering what I could do for employment if I quit. The only thing I could figure out was to try to get an online job in my field to hopefully get around the noncompete clause. I was thinking if I didn't get an online position I'd have to drive 1 hour each way to an open position that was out of my noncompete 10 mile radius. There just aren't a lot of options available in rural, more remote areas like where I live. Fortunately I cold called a business that was just outside of the 10 mile radius in my noncompete who said they could use me and I was able to quit and move to the other position. Noncompete clauses should not be legal. They keep people in bad situations and allow employers to continue abusive practices because the employees maybe can't find another position outside the noncompete radius that they can practically and economically commute to. It also very much decreases personal power for the employee. It can be like indentured servitude in some circumstances that 100% benefits the employer and harms the employee. Had I not found the nearby job, I was considering selling my house 6 months after buying it and moving to a location where I could find a job that didn't require an hour or more commute through small rural roads that can be icy in the winter and have a lot of wildlife at dusk/dawn that area hazard. Thank you for considering my comments. I strongly urge that noncompete clauses become 100% illegal. Thank you."
Elena	"Iain in favor of banning non- compete clauses. These may make sense for CEOs or other highly-paid individuals, but they are being used against everyday workers and making it impossible for them to find other work. These clauses are a drag on the economy and only benefit big corporations.

	So much for everyone having the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Please vote to ban these undemocratic clauses."
Barbara	"I'm just a citizen with no personal investment one way or the other in non-competes, but to this I say: Praise die lord. Finally! YES to the non-compete clause."
john	"Having been and currently working under a non-compete clause, I support banning non-compete clauses. They hurt employees and prevent career advancement. I work at a toxic company and cannot leave to a lateral position with another company because they are a direct competitor and / or client to my current employer."
Frances	"Non-compete contracts are tools of oppression. Ban them immediately!"
Dawn	"Thank you for considering a rule to make illegal non-compete clauses. I was astonished to hear how many Americans have to sign them and I think it protects workers to not allow companies to require non-compete clauses. Thank you."
Tammy	"I disagree with the forcible limitation of talent and skills by an entity on the individual who possesses those hard won and needed resources noncompetes force people to abandon and uproot from communities who often times needs them. Please, do away with the noncompete clauses."
Matthew	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Matthew	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."
Anna	"Having a non compete clause in the physician contract limits treatment options for patients and deprives them of the choice they might have otherwise, including finding someone to see them in low- served areas. This limits physicians' choices on where to reside and work. It is extortionist and benefits large hospitals and healthcare systems rather than encourage the growth of small businesses. Please eliminate this unfair business practice."

KM	"It is time to remove the Non-Compete Clause from employment including workers who are no longer employed by the holder of the non-compete. People must be able to pursue work without boundaries and without fear from employers."
Cheryl	"As an executive with nearly 30 years of experience who has battled with employer offers and their attendant non-competes, I can't imagine I'm adding anything new to this comment section. I want to raise my voice as one woman who represents a total of six people who are among the most brilliant I've ever met. All of us have had to go to the legal mat -- often several times -- trying to get a succubus company off of us so we can continue our lives. Corporations can drop me with no explanation, and STILL ENFORCE A NON-COMPETE. Two of these individuals I know took massive hits, unable to take jobs for which they were highly qualified over decades of learning and development, for a YEAR. It destroyed their peace of mind and decimated their finances. How can this possibly be permitted in a free market? The best and brightest are handcuffed. (And I can't even begin to discuss more junior- level employees who fall to this, because it simply enrages me.) I am not a serf. I'm an American in a capitalist economy. I urge you to develop protective policy on this matter even if only to save the mental health and financial stability of those nailed to these things. It matters -- enormously."
Stephanie	"Noncompete clauses are contractual provisions that restrict employees from working for a competitor or starting their own business in the same industry for a certain period of time after leaving their current employer. While these clauses are often used by employers to protect their intellectual property and confidential information, they are aberrant for several reasons. Firstly, noncompete clauses restrict employee mobility and limit job opportunities. By preventing employees from working in their field of expertise, they are effectively restricting the employee's ability to earn a living. This can be especially harmful for low-wage workers who may not have the financial resources to relocate or retrain for a new career. In some cases, noncompete clauses can even lead to unemployment or underemployment, as employees may be hesitant to accept a job offer in a different field for fear of violating their agreement. Secondly, noncompete clauses stifle innovation and competition in the marketplace. When employees are restricted from working for a competitor or starting their own business, they are prevented from bringing their skills, knowledge, and experience to a new venture. This can limit the growth and development of new companies and ideas, leading to a less dynamic and competitive marketplace. Thirdly, noncompete clauses can be used as a tool for employers to intimidate and control their employees. By including these clauses in employment contracts, employers are effectively asserting their power and control over the employee. This can create an atmosphere of fear and intimidation in the workplace, leading to a loss of morale and productivity. Additionally, noncompete clauses can be used as a retaliatory measure against employees who may be considering

	leaving the company or who have expressed dissatisfaction with their current rule. Fourthly, noncompete clauses are often used in industries with low wage workers, where employees may not have the bargaining power to negotiate their terms of employment. This means that these workers are forced to sign agreements that restrict their future job opportunities, often without fully understanding the implications of the agreement. This can perpetuate a cycle of low wages and limited job opportunities, as workers are effectively prevented from pursuing higher-paying jobs in their field. Finally, noncompete clauses are often overly broad and restrictive, going beyond what is necessary to protect an employer's legitimate business interests. This can include restricting employees from working in any capacity within their industry, regardless of whether the new employer or business is actually in competition with the former employer. These overly broad clauses can prevent employees from finding work at all, effectively holding them captive to their former employer. In conclusion, noncompete clauses are aberrant for several reasons. They restrict employee mobility and limit job opportunities, stifle innovation and competition in the marketplace, can be used as a tool for employer control, are often used in industries with low wage workers, and are often overly broad and restrictive. While employers do have legitimate interests in protecting their intellectual property and confidential information, there are better ways to achieve this than through noncompete clauses. By focusing on building a positive and collaborative workplace culture, employers can create an environment where employees are motivated to stay with the company and contribute to its growth and success, without the need for restrictive employment agreements."

Logan	"Please stop non-compete clauses to help better our economy etc."
Greer	"This is a win for the people, and may help combat the wage stagnation we're seeing relative to corporate profits. Please pass this legislation."
Holden	"I am completely in favor of banning non-compete agreements, as they are inherently biased against both the free market and employees in general."
Pamela	"Please support prohibiting non-compete clauses. I appreciate your efforts."
Robert	"I believe that non-compete clauses are not acceptable. They only help the corporation, and never the individual. We need an open arena in employment law, such that people are free to work for whomever they desire."

Brooks	"I am a physician. For as long as I've known, noncompete clauses have been in place for most physician contracts. Nearly all of my colleagues are subject to one, as am I. These predatory clauses are the source of much tension for a lot of physicians. How is it fair that an employee be married to a single employer, sometimes for the life of the contract? Don't like your job? Too bad, now you're moving to a new city because most of these covenants cover large geographic areas. This disrupts personal and family freedom to choose where you live and work, and places undue stress on employees to perform. I would be very much in favor of the FTC ridding the nation of these ridiculous clauses and return freedom and fair competition to workers of all kinds, not just physicians."
Greg	"As a worker who has been subject to non-compete clauses, I welcome this rule. Employers are protected by confidentiality and non-disclosure agreements. Non-compete agreements provide the company the opportunity to coerce a departing or former employee into not accepting employment with a competitor or forcing the competitor to employ them in a different capacity due to the unsubstantiated belief the employee would be induced to violate those other agreements. Furthermore, having the definition of non-competes include "no-poach" agreements should be upheld as it prevents employees of a departing manager from seeking employment with the competitor in a similar capacity. If the comparative work conditions were sufficient to induce a manager to leave, restricting their reports or sub-reports from following them on the pretext of poaching should be banned as well. Most importantly, in the face of the massive layoffs sweeping the tech industry, to terminate someone's employment and then constrict their ability to seek new employment should not be legal."
Mohsin	"Non compete should be removed. It has great difficulty for physicians who practice on independent license in any organization. With physician shortage, if they resign, they should be allowed to continue practice in same area where they so many patients have established care with them"
Jim	"My daughter was working as a veterinarian in Eastern Wa. She signed a non-compete clause. In the recession of 2008 she was laid off by the veterinarian. She applied for other jobs in the area and was told the vet would enact the non-complete clause. I don't see how this can be since he violated her work contract by laying her off. I believe this is not fair. She was advised not to fight it."
Tom	"Strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses."
Anneka	" Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle

In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. Ashley	"I support banning non-compete clauses and contracts. For too long these devices have been a way to keep workers from taking advantage of better opportunities. It has allowed the employer to benefit at the expense of the employee. I support banning non-compete clauses because it will help level the field between the workers and the employers. For the last 50 years, employers have enjoyed an increasing amount of power and I believe we need to bring that back into balance. This is one way (along with anti-trust legislation) to do so and I applaud it."
Maura	"It is appalling that hard working middle class employees get trapped by employers who use such tactics as noncompete clauses to their employment contracts. This should DEFINITELY be struck down and free these workers to what is really an abuse of the system. Please do away with the noncompete rule and give the workers a chance at a better life."
Derrick	"Non-compete clauses are antidemocratic, pure and simple. They have no place in a free country. Freedom to work for whomever you choose is vitality important for human flourishing. Those in power - not just in government, but in business where they may make decisions that affect the lives of thousands of people - don't need this tool to control employees. If a company cannot retain employees without coercion, they do not deserve to keep them. For these reasons I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes — ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."

Earl Jay	"This is a great idea. Non-compete clauses should be banned. They operate under the pretense of protecting company secrets, but do you know how you prevent secrets from being leaked? Pay your employees well and don't treat them poorly. They maybe employees won't leave to competitors. This should achieve bipartisan support since it's both a left wing and a right wing idea."

Linda	"It is vitally important to workers that they be free to seek new employment without being hobbled by non-compete agreements that have been imposed by an employer. I strongly support the banning of non-compete policies, contracts, agreements."
Margaret	"I strongly am pro this new rule. Non-compete clauses prevent many former employees the ability to work within their industry for a set amount of time. And that seems very anti-capitalistic and if America is only one thing it's a capitalist hell scape for the anything else than the 1%. These non-compete clauses prevent anyone not in the 1% from being able to go to a better work environment that can utilize their skills. Let's eat the rich and get rid of these clauses and let the people move and make some money."

Samuel	"The FTC has proposed a rule to ban non-competes, and retroactively invalidate old ones. For those not familiar, many tech companies outside of California force employees to sign horrible non-competes that prevent you from getting other jobs related to that. These are downright evil. 'Why? They can be super broad, capturing massive industries or technologies They can include "lists of competitors that we can add to at any time" They apply to nearly everyone, not just those with sensitive information They are absolute . These contracts essentially would prevent you from working at companies with the exact skillset you grew. Henry	"This rule change would be very welcomed by all stripes of workers and promote greater competition and higher wages for workers. Please move forward with the rule change!"
Brenden	"Commenting in favor of removing the ability to give non-compete clauses. Am a software engineer and believe it is toxic and bad for our industry as well as locks people into unfavorable working conditions in fear of seeking employment at a similar company in the same industry."
Tinsley	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. I have personally been impacted by a noncompete clause and it led to my decision to leave my job as a physician at an academic medical center."
Matthew	"I strongly support the new rules regarding non compete clauses. I believe employer control of employees must end on the last day of employment. American workers currently lose their ability to get health insurance, buy a car, buy a house, get any loan, even if they have money saved to buy food. Employers should not have the power to control future employment unless they are also willing to support universal healthcare, low income loans, affordable housing and other policies that will soften the blow of unemployment or underemployment"

Sue	"I know attorneys who were retained to both enforce and defend against alleged violations of noncompete clauses. They enjoyed their job when they defended the employee. The employees could not believe that American law allowed such clauses to be imposed on them. Employers routinely used the burden of litigation to intimidate employees, or seek revenge for the employee's perceived personal disloyalty, rather than to protect any legitimate employer interest. I strongly support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule, as proposed in Matter No. P201200."
David	"Having worked in the digital health field for 10+ years, I can say without a doubt that this is stifling innovation. In the healthcare field alone, we are seeing doctors and clinicians are already facing extortionate NDAs that are intended to lock them into toxic work environments - as a direct fear of hospitals being forced to compete with other business or from their own internal cultures. Adding this to tech, where the same use of NDAs for "locking up" workforces, only compounds the issue, and severely impacting medical professional's ability to choose positions at healthy companies looking to actually make a difference instead of leaving toxic, predatory ones. And while I can only speak for my own experience, I see and hear this pattern running rampant in other fields as well. For the sake of a competitive market, innovation and worker's rights - please do away with all non-compete agreements."
Amy	"The harms non-compete clauses cause veterinarians cannot be overstated we can be trapped from the financial burden of our student loans into staying working at a toxic to physically dangerous clinic/hospital to the point that it causes irreparable harm, even driving colleagues to suicide who see no other way out. We deserve the same freedom to leave an unsafe or otherwise unhealthy work situation as much as anyone does."
Dean	"As a now solo Family Medicine Doctor, when it came time to leave my last employer for whom I had worked 8 years, they had a non-complete agreement in the original contract. I had spoken with administration prior to separation and they were unwavering about letting me out of the agreement which at the time was for a 20 mile radius from any site the employer had a clinical location. This was absolutely unconscionable as since signing the original agreement my employer was purchased by another entity and now had clinical locations all across the entire state of Washington. So I had to either leave Washington State completely or not be a primary care physician. This despite the fact that there is a great legal basis to suggest that health care companies do not "own" their patients. I went ahead and opened my small practice which employed a different model of care eschewing insurance care completely. My employer then took me to court which created an enormous sum of money for me during startup to even try to fight (30k) so I ended up setting with them and work in urgent care (with their permission) inside the zone of competition for 1.5 years more despite the fact that they had unilaterally changed their non-compete agreement to 1 year after I left their employ. This despite the fact that the waiting time to see a new doctor at their clinic is routinely 4-5 months out so they imposed on the community further limitation of access to care while showing no actual harm done to them (as they were seeing the maximum number of patients they could at the time anyhow. These non-compete arrangements have very real and striking ramifications on local communities causing professionals to have to leave the area instead of competing for services as is fair and equitable."

Michael	"I completely disagree with non-competes. They don't look out for the employee at all. I was a full time yoga teacher in Texas and remember not being able to teach at a studio I was supposed to start at because they found out I was teaching at another studio within 5 miles of them. That studio didn't even offer any special incentives or perks for me to even want to stay with them and honor the non-compete. Let yoga teachers teach where they want to!"
Marsha	"Please pass this; US workers deserve the right to be able to compete freely for wages."
Sierra	"I strongly urge the FTC to ban noncompete clauses. For many employees in a specialized trade, noncompetes make it nearly impossible to change employers and stay within their field. This causes an artificial scarcity of skilled work. It has affected me as a jeweler - I was unable to work in my home city for two years as a jeweler after leaving my employer for a better work environment. Noncompetes have been abused by predatory employers and at minimum should be re-examined."
Rio	"This is a great idea"
Cynthia	"Non compete clauses in employment contracts should be eliminated. Industries have other legal means to secure any proprietary information such as nondisclosure clauses, patents negotiated settlements at termination of employment. Routine training that is required for jobs should be at the employer's expense and the employees should not be held responsible for any repayment. Please remember that your agency was created to ensure fair treatment of all parties, not just the employers."
Wayne	"I have been harmed twice by unreasonable non-compete employment contracts. I work in a highly specialized field and quit one job when forced to quit or sign a non-compete. The other time I was able to get my boss to modify the terms to not make me unemployable. I have seen cases when even if the contract is not enforceable it was used to harass and unfairly limit employment. This type of contract should not be allowed since it often unfairly limits employment options and creates unreasonable working conditions. Please limit or eliminate this practice. Thank you."

Mark	"Although I am retired, so it would not affect me, I wanted to comment and urge the FTC to end the use of non-compete clauses. A company should not be allowed to limit anyone's free ability to switch jobs using whatever skills they learned. If there is a proprietary process of manufacturing that a company has developed, then it is reasonable that the employee should not be able to use that process at another company, but they should not be restricted from working in the same field/area at any other firm. Non-compete clauses are akin to slavery. Thank you for your attention, Mark Daniels"
John	"Noncompete clauses should be illegal under the 13th Amendment."
Virginia	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. This is the right thing to do since these clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people."
Eric	"A three-legged table does not rock but it is the most stable when the legs are spaced equally from each other. We have three interests here; short term business wants ("Business", dividends), ongoing societal needs ("Government") and medium-term human wants ("Workers" or.. individual lifetimes) It is vital that government place itself sufficiently apart from short term business wants and from the wants of the singular individual, that is the only way to effectively govern. What may be good in the short term for a few shareholders is rarely good for the ongoing prosperity of a whole society and a legislator who forgets or ignores this fact is not doing their job. In other words the three legs of this table produce the greatest stability - and the greatest long term prosperity - if they don't get too close to each other. I urge legislators to consider the real world implications of this allegoric table, in the context of this non-compete clause rule. When individual workers can resume working in the field they understand, they can bring the greatest benefit to society. When the individual worker can negotiate for their own value and be paid more, they are able to not only live a more robust lifestyle for themselves but also put their skills to best use, improve outcomes for whatever industry they serve, earn more money and therefore spend more money as well which enriches every business they patronize. Remember that money is a circulatory resource whose value is in its movement. Like blood, not like firewood. We do not stack blood like firewood when we are in good health - we circulate it faster. Thank you for your consideration."
Nicolas	"Non-competes stifle innovation and productivity. These agreements can also often serve to trap employees in lower-than-living-wage working agreements and are antithetical to a free market economy. If they employee can be terminated at (almost) any time for (almost) any reason, then then employee should also be allowed to leave their employer at (almost) any time for (almost) any reason."

Debbie	"This is against everything America stands for life , liberty & freedom !!! No one should be forced to change what they do for a living for anyone one or Company !!!"
don	"i am retired now but twice i had to find different work because of non compete clauses. and would have done again had i not refused to sign another. these non competes need to go away for 99% of the times they are used. they are used to control employees rather than to protect company secrets. from time to time government does the right think for workers, now is a good time to do that."
Cosmo	"The presence of noncompete agreements in the tech industry is a predatory practice utilized by employers as a cudgel against staff. The original limited intents and use cases for the agreements have been poisoned by corporations looking to abuse staff and then retain them under fear of litigation. There is no salvaging these agreements, as their simple existence allows companies with deep pockets to create legally abusive (and often legally unenforceable) agreements, knowing that even the most well-compensated individual employee can never muster the legal resources of a corporation. The proper course of action for the FTC is to fully prohibit the existence of these agreements under any name and to clearly and unequivocally end all existing and historic non-compete agreements."
John - anonymous	"Non compete clause has held my wage down and held competitive rates for my clients. I work as a project manager in the construction industry. I ban on this would keep a true free market open and competitive. I couldn't agree more with having a federal ban on non-compete clauses."
Andronetta	"Thank you for passing this non-compete rule. It is more fair to workers."
Sage	"I am a salaried employee in the electrical and electronics engineering field. As a young person who wants to achieve career success. I wholeheartedly agree with the FTC's proposed rule banning most non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are used to suppress wages in my industry and prevent innovation from many colleagues and peers in my industry. It would be a boon for the American worker and the American economy to ban non-competes. Thank you."
Jeremy	"I support the FTC in its proposal to ban noncompete agreements. These agreements are unfair to workers and the salaries they could command in a truly free market. I urge the FTC to eliminate noncompetes so that corporations don't unjustly benefit from arbitrarily limited competition. Support the free market and ban noncompetes!"

Julien	"Non-compete clauses are an unfair distortion of a free labor market and extend past the at-will employment period. Employees have no choice but to sign them to gain employment in states that do not restrict or forbid non-compete clauses. If a non-compete clause is desired, the employer should have to pay the employee full wages and benefits for the desired period. Alternatively, non-compete clauses should be abolished or be made non-enforceable."
Linda	"I support a ban on non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses are unfair to workers."
Scott	"The non-compete rule is garbage. How can a fellow employee in the same job that lives in California be allowed to disregard a non-compete, while an employee in Oregon would have to follow the rules from the same company. The non-compete is an outdated policy setup to block employees from finding new employment opportunities. It is interesting how the companies who ask for a non-compete are the same ones that are grateful a prospective employee did not have one in the past."
Cecile	"Right now, noncompete agreements are being unethically used across the country to prevent workers from quitting their jobs for a better offer. Competition drives markets and when noncompetes eliminate competition in the labor market, employers don't have an incentive to give their workers better pay, working conditions, or benefits."
Lee	"As a medical trainee preparing for a career in cardiology, I support this proposed rule to empower doctors to move freely to the best work environment that can sustain them in a long career of service to others."
Michael	"I am writing in response to my support to ban noncompetes. I am currently working for an employer who has imposed a noncompete upon me. This is my first experience with noncompete. It was delivered to me at the end of my recruitment process and after I had accepted the job. It is a two-year noncompete. I work in the hops industry which has had a long history of antitrust violations. Hops are one of the major crops in my area which is a remote rural area with few technical opportunities in plant breeding. My role is a Director of hop breeding. My employer is a private family business which is also a global multinational company. I am not an executive, I have no profit share, no royalty deal, and no ownership stake in any regard. Therefore, the noncompete would ban me from working in the hops industry for two years and would provide me no stake of anything for my work. I am an inventor of hop varieties where the trade secret is my talent and ability to manipulate their hop genetics. I sign the rights of my inventions to

	the company, as policy. Therefore it is my effort and knowledge that is the trade secret. Me, a person with unique talents they control during employment and two years after separation. I do not own their genetics. They however own me and my talent. Lastly, They're hop breeding company is a joint venture with their largest business competitor. These combined companies have 2/3 of the market share in hops. Therefore I am essentially blocked out of 2/3 of the job opportunities in hops from these two combined companies as they share hop breeding jointly."
Mary	"I am an optometrist in Washington state and enjoyed working at a private practice (Olympia Vision Clinic) for nearly 13 years. I explicitly interviewed and joined the group with the intention to work in an independently-owned business and NOT a corporate retail setting. Unbeknownst to the employees for months, the owner sold the practice to EssilorLuxottica under a new program called "Team Vision" that buys private practices to continue inning them in this facade model rather than the overt retail businesses LensCrafters, PearleVision, Sears Optical, Target Optical, etc. Even after the announcement of the sale and implementation of EssilorLuxottica's processes, there was no disclosure to patients about the true ownership and the business continues to run under the facade of the previous ownership (signage, documents, marketing, etc.) However, since a corporation cannot directly employ the doctors in Washington State, a new PC was created by the former owner and he is now employed by EssilorLuxottica to employ the doctors. (I still question if this is legal.) As the changes in care delivery, product offerings, and infrastructure became corporatized and I was no longer satisfied with my work environment, I resigned. As I never signed an employment agreement with the corporate ownership nor the new PC created to employ the doctors under the corporation, I feel that I should be released from the constricts of the noncompete clause. However, despite approximately 52,000 in legal counseling fees and my negotiation attempts, I'm told that they will not drop the non-compete. This causes me to drive an extra 40 minutes to seek employment elsewhere. In trying to start my own private practice, I found banks would not lend for a new business or purchase within the non-compete radius. This means that my existing patient base of thousands cannot seek care in the area in which they're accustomed- and as I serve the visually impaired and geriatric community- creates a barrier to their continuity of care. Starting a new business in a more remote community creates an economic challenge for me and my business partner personally- as we have to rebuild a patient base and invest a larger amount in marketing and travel. I strongly oppose noncompete clauses as they limit employment and ownership opportunities which harm our local economy and create an unnecessary barrier to healthcare access. Please feel free to contact me for additional details regarding this case."
Melissa	"Please support the ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses benefit only the employer, giving them substantial power over their employees. While a non-compete may possibly make sense in an R&D workplace that involves intense intellectual property, many non-competes include workers in

	lower, non-management, and middle-management positions. To strengthen our workforce and give people the option to better their lives should be the priority, not forcing people to stay in a less than ideal work situation because they will not be able to move forward in a new position."
Brett	"Hello, My name is Brett and I am writing in support of the proposed rule against non-compete clauses. I work in tech, and given that a many large tech employers conceivably "compete" in huge segments of the US economy, I've always been concerned about entering into non-compete agreements. When I was most recently job searching I intended to avoid signing a non-compete agreement, but that turned out to be nearly impossible as companies did not tell me if they were going to require one. The company I signed with eventually sent me one to sign only after I had signed my offer letter and told my other opportunities I was no longer interested, effectively taking away my chance to avoid it. Without the proposed rule I am now faced with either reduced employment opportunities, fear of potential legal action, or an extended period without work when I am next searching for a job. For these reasons, I support the proposed rule."
Gary	"Get rid of non compete clauses.. Please do the right thing and allow people the free movement of their labor. I first heard of this being imposed on a young man at a sandwich shop. I thought surely this is a joke. Then I realized the power it gives over an employee to confine employee to them and restrict wages, a mini monopoly on one's labor."
Judith	"IN 1972 my husband was forced to leave a Pediatric Clinic in Salem, Oregon and a non compete was in force. WE had to sell out house and move out of town with our 3 young children. The medical societies in both Marion-Polk County and Clackamas County went to the AMA and the OMA to lobby for a ban on Non compete agreements . The AMA was not interested and the OMA was not interested either. A member of the Legislature Norma Paulus entered a bill in the Oregon Legislature that did eventually pass. My Husband was asked to testify and was met on die steps of the Capital by a lobbyist for the OMA who had been instructed to head him off. He did not because he was working as a lobbyist after leaving a job as a disc jockey where a non compete had been enforced. I fully support your efforts to ban non compete clauses entirely."
Dean	"The Proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule should provide that even non-compete clauses in effect prior to the effective date of the proposed rule are null and void as of that date. Section 5 of the FTC Act is over a century old, providing a substantial basis for recognizing (and acting upon) the inherent anticompetitive nature of such clauses from their very inception."
Brooke	"Please help. As an ER dr get forced to work for contract groups. Again I lost job because hospital hired different contract group (plus old one wasn't

	paying us in time). I am now banned for 2 years from working at same hospital unless they pay 20,000 to the contract group that didn't even do the job well. How is this okay? When there is a shortage of us in a very difficult career we are in terrible working situations. We are leaving emergency medicine in droves."
Paul	"This just wrecks of a fixed system. People don't sign up for work and an opportunity to have their lives restricted."
Lindsay	"Non competes should be outlawed. It is a cheap way to retain and trap employees at their current job instead of encouraging a competitive marketplace. If companies are worried about retaining employees, they can create incentive structures to do so. This should extend to physicians and medical practitioners. Medical practices and hospitals are notorious for stringent non competes. With a growing physician shortage, it is time we do away with non competes so physicians can expand their practice and skill set as appropriate to provide care to larger populations. With additional flexibility, physicians can see patients in multiple settings as they see fit and will likely be able to close significant gaps in patient care. The current system of a hospital 'owning' the physician and thus the patient under the physicians care is antiquated and wrong. Please consider the needs of the American people and outlaw non competes across the board."
Paul	"Absolutely a great Idea. It will really help rural America the most. It is truly difficult to leave a job when there are only 2 in a Smaller town and they want to force you to sign a noncompete clause in order to get hired. You have no choice but to deal with that company however they treat you or completely uproot your life. Many of us have families near where we work and none of us want to leave them to a new city just because of noncompete clauses. Please make this rule change!"
Cheryl	"This is much needed reform. As an IT Project and Program Manager, I was told many times I was not able to move to a different company due to a non-compete agreement. My job skills are highly transferrable and can be used in many industries. For example. I worked for die local telephone company for 20 years. I decided to move on and take a job at Boeing. Two companies that couldn't be more different. I was told there was a non-compete agreement and that I wasn't allowed to take the job. They stated my non-compete was for 2 years. As stated above, my skills are highly transferable to almost any industry and would require me to be unemployed for those 2 years unless I moved to a completely different field. Fortunately for me, the company couldn't produce the document. Had they been able to, I'd have had to hire an attorney to resolve the issue. At die end of the day, people are leaving your company for a reason. In my example, I left due to lack of opportunity. Others leave due to wages, work environment, commute, etc. If you want people to stay with your company, be a good employer and they'll be with you for the duration of their career."

Paul	"As a physician in a small rural community I strongly support eliminating non compete clauses as any employment change would require me to leave my community. Non compete clauses reduces employees to serf like conditions and should be banned."
L	"Noncompete agreements area restriction on the right of American workers - it flies in the face of labor rights AND the idea of the "free marketplace." The Federal government needs to unhook itself from corporate ownership and ban such agreements for the good of the people, not just the shareholders."
Jack	"Non-compete clauses are everywhere in my industry (tech). On top of non-compete agreements being incredibly broad and essentially non-negotiable, there is also the threat of arbitrary enforcement. Because of the broadness of the agreement, essentially any person who take any job at a competing tech company (even a low level, entry level employee) is at the mercy of their employer's legal team. Even if proven to not be in violation of the non-compete agreement, the funds require to mount a legal defense against the richest companies in the world can easily financially ruin someone. Banning non-complete clauses will prevent arbitrary and frivolous legal actions and further spur innovation in America's tech sector as current employees no longer feel threatened to compete with former employers."
David	"I strongly favor any rule banning non-compete clauses for physicians. Non-compete clauses go against every principle of a free-market economy. Physicians spend many years gaining the skills and knowledge necessary to practice medicine. This difficult-to-obtain asset can lose tremendous value when non-compete clauses are in force. A non-compete clause may prompt a physician (who would otherwise want to remain in an area) to leave the region, thereby leaving the area's patients with fewer health care options. It is in the best interests of patients, society, and physicians themselves to eliminate non-compete clauses. There is no rational to support them."
Laura	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements."
Richard	"I urge the Commissioners to BAN NON-COMPETE CLAUSES NATION-WIDE. We are supposed to be capitalists in the USA, and "mobility of labor" is one of the key tenants of the capitalist system. It's one of the requirements of personal liberty. It's not right that only businessmen get to be capitalists, while their employees are peons who aren't allowed to find honest work elsewhere. No wonder Americans are so angry and voting for crazy demagogues like Donald Trump! Please help us."

Daniel	"I am not in favor of non-compete clauses that companies have that rule out employees leaving one company and immediately going to work at a similar company. I can see the legality of clauses of not allowing employees to take along customers from one company to another. The first clause hampers the freedom of the employee; the latter hampers the company."
Leslie	"I support this!! The proposed rule would provide it is an unfair method of competition and therefore a violation of Section 5 for an employer to enter into or attempt to enter into a non-compete clause with a worker; maintain with a worker a noncompete clause; or, under certain circumstances, represent to a worker that the worker is subject to a non-compete clause."
Caroline	"I feel we should eliminate Non-Compete Clauses because they are unfair to the employee. They make life unnecessarily difficult for those who do not have the resources to abide by the clause rules."
TREVOR	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I wholeheartedly support a ban on non-compete clauses. I consider them to be a wholly unconscionable clause, except in exceedingly narrow circumstances -- such as a specific employee's likeness being an integral part of a company's brand or offerings. Even then, regulation is required to protect the interests of said employee and to prevent the clause from being anti-competitive. I consider the anti-competitive nature of non-compete clauses to be patently obvious, both from the actual concept and from the data presented in this proposal, leaving ample legal justification for this rule. Additionally, I find the data presented on the effect of these clauses on the wages of workers to be very compelling evidence that this rule will increase public welfare, and I firmly believe that the welfare of real people should always be the ultimate goal of regulation."
Melissa	"I support the suggested non-compete clause rule and agree it would protect workers from being exploited by companies."
Marian	"Amen,Amen, AMEN"
Matthew	"As an engineer working in the software industry, I've seen the huge cost and anticompetitive impact of non-compete agreements in the technology sector. I strongly support the proposed rule, and believe it will have a very positive impact both on workers and the health of the industry as a whole."
eric	"As a software engineer, I am in favor of this. Non-competes are, by and large, used in a perfunctory manner that only make life more difficult for the workers who have to sign them if they wish to be employed. Outlawing them outright is not something that I feel would harm my industry. At the very least there needs to be consideration for the post-employment phase of the non-compete. Some sort of regulatory minimum wage for such consideration. Either way, kill them."

Thomas	"See attached file(s) Attachments Comment (005)"
Ivana	"In our busy, growing, population-diverse neighborhood in a city that is rapidly growing, the only grocery store, (Albertson's) centrally located, decided to close while it expanded its corporate 'empire' by merging with Safeway and a local chain, Ilaggens—But it also left behind a no-compete clause, cruelly affecting all the local inhabitants including many elderly/limited mobility, low-income families without transportation..! This has also affected the whole economic state of our neighborhood, as it also deprived many people of their jobs and affected access to a variety of foods for everyone who was able to shop there! Recently we were shocked to learn that Albertson's has now merged with the nation's largest food conglomerate, the 'Kroger' brand, which has a large store in this vicinity, but NOT near enough to offer local accessibility to our neighborhood as their prices have risen exceedingly in the past year, so we are still greatly affected by that non-compete clause—!!! Our local politicians seem to be helpless in bringing about a change in this status, so I'm appealing/hopeful for a positive ruling, as this would to restore the health/hope for our struggling/suffering neighborhood—! Thank you for advocating for us in this--!!!"
Aaron	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes -- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone. As a designer for technology, this issue is very important. It is essential for this profession to be able to move between businesses and often the domain experience is the only benefit of the gig economy."
Randy	"Non-compete clauses are an egregious use of market dominance to further limit options a resource - workers - might have. They are anti-competitive, anti-free market and in all ways designed to increase the market advantage of the employer. The idea that 'the employee leaves with valuable trade secrets' is ludicrous. They have skills and knowledge that make them valuable that are inherent in performing the work. Attempting to declare ownership of those infringes on the very idea of knowledge and denies basic principals of both humanity and the concept of skilled labor. Workers arrive at a new job BECAUSE of skills and knowledge and provide those without reservation to the employer's uses, but corporate greed truly knows no bounds as some now seek to hold our careers hostage because of of what we know. I urge you to end this odious rule."

Michael	"I agree with getting rid of non-competes. I nearly spent a few thousand dollars this summer because I wanted a lawyer to review my current job contract to look for non-competes (in case I wanted to start my own business). Companies should focus on their customers and innovation, not former employees would could become competitors."
Andrew	"Banning non-compete agreements in my State would definitely improve working conditions and wages, based on my own experience. I was forced to sign a non-compete agreement for my first salary job out of college. I didn't have much working experience or industry knowledge, but my employer was eager to have me at the time, and as a young employee I did not fully understand how the contract could be used against me in the future (and it was a requirement of getting the job, so I had NO option between getting the job and being subject to the non-compete requirements). Fast forward 6 years and I have gained a lot of experience by my company has not made working conditions or pay better to match the growth. Per the noncompete I was technically barred from working in ANY business RELATED to construction. That means if I followed the letter of the contract I would not be allowed to transfer literally any skills from my previous job to the new one. But here's the thing, they are MY skills. If my last employer wanted them so badly they could have paid more or made things better. My last employer does not have a monopoly on construction knowledge. I have kept my current job a secret and I cannot use my previous company or co-workers as a professional reference for fear of retaliation. If a piece of knowledge is SO confidential and important then that can be explicitly written in the contract, but you can't reasonably put whole blanket bans on peoples ability to work-also because every business has some kind of special knowledge that others don't, that's how most businesses stay open, by having some advantage over another. If companies are given blanket monopolies over their 'knowledge' then there is no incentive to improve or change for the better."
Shana	"This is absolutely amazing! So many people are trapped at awful jobs, and cannot leave due to time constraints on new employment in the same sector. People should not be bound to a corporation and unable to seek new work, for years. It is everything America is supposed to be against."
Mariam	"I am strongly in support of a ban on non-compete clauses in all employment contracts. NCCs constrain the freedom of working Americans to freely seek and accept employment. They are bad for workers and bad for the economy, because they unfairly and unreasonably prevent talented people in all lines of work from accepting positions for which they are qualified. Employers should not have the right to control their employees' future prospects in this way. Please pass this ban on non-compete clauses, with no loopholes, and no exceptions."

Braydon	"Hi, I'm writing to advocate for reigning in non-compete clauses. They are use far too broadly too suppress workers' opportunities externally and for frivolous reasons."
Peter	"I am a retired engineer and have also worked for about a year and a half for a large chain store near my home to fill gaps between engineering jobs. Based on my experiences I oppose ALL non-compete clauses in employment agreements, regardless of the salary of the person involved. The general rationale for this is that in the USA an employer has the right to hire and terminate employees at will. The advantage of this is that the labor cost of an enterprise is a variable, which the employer can change as its business circumstances change. This contributes to the efficiency of the US economy. In contrast, when I visited communist Hungary in about 1979, I went in the winter into a book store and asked them why they had about ten clerks on the sales floor when there were hardly any customers. The answer was that they were staffed for the peak season (the summer due to tourism) and apparently their economic regulations did not allow them to release employees for seasonal fluctuations, presumably to provide job security, one of the communist ideals. Allowing employers to adjust employment helps the efficiency of the economy, but people released must have the unrestricted right to find other employment using all the skills they acquired during their previous employment. This should apply regardless of the salary level of the employee. If a terminated employee has performed creative work or other proprietary work for an employer, the employer can protect it through the copyright and patent rights it has, as well as by requiring that employees properly document their activities and contacts. (The latter in particular for sales personnel.) A few examples of situations that occur. I have seen and experienced myself several situations where upon retirement, or ending of employment for other reasons, of people in supervisory positions, the wrong person was promoted to fill the position of the leaving person, causing the bypassed person, who should have been promoted to that position, to leave the company. That person should be able to find other employment, without any restrictions. In the retail area I have seen other situations of unfair termination. For instance, where the store management emphasized to employees to try to prevent theft by customers, a very capable and diligent employee got into a shuffle with a customer he suspected of being in the process of stealing product. He was terminated for that, instead of just receiving a reprimand and guidance on handling such circumstances better. Again, finding a new job, using all the skills one has accumulated, is a basic human right that should not be infringed upon by a non-compete agreement. These non-compete agreements are usually the result of senior management paranoia, combined with overzealous attorneys' efforts to protect their customers and increase their own billable hours at the same time."
Jeremy	"I support this rule. Non-compete clauses give way too much power to die employer and limit employees that specialize in an area from pursuing other positions. I work at a corporation that uses non-compete agreements even though the corporation has millions of employees. No matter how valuable any one of those employees are, they should not be restricted from taking positions with competitors or starting their own business."

Erik	"In my opinion, non-compete clause rules need to be banned. They're overwhelmingly used to disadvantage lower level employees, not to protect trade secrets."
Teri	"All employees should be able to freely market their skills and readily move between employment opportunities without restrictions imposed by a no compete agreement. Specialized education, experience and expertise are acquired as the result of individual effort and every person should be able to maximize their potential and professional goals without restrictions from an employer. No one should be tied to a position they no longer desire due to an agreement that theoretically benefits only to the employer and which they were essentially forced to sign to obtain the job. The reality is that people move between employers for all sorts of reasons and they should be able to readily do."
William	"The corrupt, Ponzi, casino, corporations of the just us of the U.S, Keep advancing towards citizens right to exist. More corporate greed that only benefits them. Paying off Politicians to weaken safety laws in the railroad industry, eliminating train crews, environmental regulations and the list goes on and on, there is no stopping this conduct. They want it all. They do not care how many die or go homeless, or get sick. This is exactly what's heading towards Palestine Ohio citizens. This non compete, is just more corporate greed B.S. bought to you by thousands of bought and paid for politicians, safety regulators. Hay , there should be a manual on how to own you own crowd of mafia politicians of the U.S. government."
James	"I strongly support the elimination of non-compete clauses. However. PLEASE ensure that the elimination of non-competes applies equally to ALL employers/entities. Physicians should NOT be excluded! Non-profit/tax-exempt hospitals should also NOT be excluded. Thank you!!"
Jonathan	"I am a Republican self-made millionaire, not a Communist. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Johanna	"Please end non-compete clauses for physicians! The only reason I currently do not have one is because I work as a per diem physician, the only way to allow some flexibility and allow me to change employers in my city (Seattle) if I want to. I have so many good friends and relatives who are stuck in clinics and hospitals where they are unhappy because of non-competes they signed (which are typically also non-negotiable), and instead of having the right to change employment, they must consider leaving the city or leaving the profession entirely."

Karla	"I support eliminating Non competes. As a new Nurse Practitioner, I declined to apply to a local healthcare company due to their non compete policy. I believe limiting healthcare provider's options to leave a job leads to abuse of the workers and negatively affects patient care. They limit the ability of providers to effectively serve their community."
Elizaveta	"I am in favor of ELIMINATING non-compete clauses from employees' contracts due to its productivity limitations and freedom to seek better fitting employment, and more globally impact on healthy competition of a free market. I currently practice in a medical specialty with a restrictive non-compete that excludes me from seeking other employment in the greater metro area. Changing employers would mean commuting over an hour away. With small children of daycare and elementary, school ages, such a commute would present unnecessary hardship on our family. Not working at all to wait out the non-compete time frame and then re-enter the local market means lost income and prosperity to the family and upward of EIGHT THOUSAND patients without specialty care access in an already underserved healthcare community where new patients may wait months to get an appointment. For the healthcare industry, I believe free movement of healthcare providers is critical. We need our providers on the frontlines working rather than being burdened by non-compete limitations. Thank you for reviewing this important matter and considering policy changes."
Tim	"I strongly support the FTCs proposal to limit noncompete agreements. These agreements stifle innovation and competition and are harmful to both employees, die market, and employers."
Jack	"Non competes should be banned. They're an unjust prohibition on employees, imposed by employers who leverage their disproportionate power in employment decisions to prevent their workers from working elsewhere. Non-competes reduce wages. More importantly, they limit employees' freedom. At 23 years old, I have just recently entered the full time workforce in Seattle. When I graduated college, I knew I wouldn't accept a job with a non- compete clause. I came to that individual decision after learning about non-competes in school. People shouldn't need to have the educational privilege of a college education — or the economic privilege to restrict a job search — to avoid being subject to a non-compete. No one should have their future labor controlled by their current employer."
Mary	"I support adopting the rule. I agree with the Chair's January 5, 2023 statement, and would add the following perspective. In 1982 my employer responded to the loss of client business in our region by terminating employees in order of salary expectations. During my termination interview I was asked to sign a noncompete agreement. I refused. It is a good thing I did. My employer subsequently dissolved its partnership, and the clients I had served turned to me to do their work. If I'd signed a non-compete agreement and thus couldn't accept the work, I would have had to go on welfare. That is because the downturn was region-wide where I lived, and no other regional employer like mine was hiring in my professional field."

Scott	"I agree with this new proposal, as I am under a non-compete with my former company, which I had no idea I signed when the company provided stock options, the verbiage was hidden deep into the contract. I recently joined a new company and worry about how vulnerable I may be to any legal action by my former company. The non-compete language was highly vague and generalized, but in my state of Washington it may be upheld."
Eric	"As a veterinarian restrictive covenants have been extremely deleterious to my career and my family. As the profession has become corporatized, the large multi-national corporations have essentially become a monopoly and in doing so failed to provide care to communities while simultaneously prohibiting private professionals from filling the void they have created. I am a practice owner and full heartedly support this initiative for the benefit of the veterinary profession and consumers alike."
John	"This rule is long past due, and I applaud die FTC in proposing this rule. Noncompete clauses are, as the name implies, anti-competitive and work against a free market for employees."
melissa	"Eliminating non competes would be fantastic. It is such a burden moving if you leave a job and have large noncompetes"
Diane	"I strongly support a government ban on non-compete clauses in order to strengthen die power of middle class workers and others to move to more competitive jobs with fewer restraints on them. Please consider this carefully and uphold the rights of workers."
Monica	"Non-compete clauses limit the ability of workers to negotiate for appropriate compensation by limiting competition when finding a new job, and employers have less incentive to increase wages for their current employees because they know they have limited options, if any, for example if they live in a small area, to move to a new job that may compensate them appropriately. It takes away power from the workers and binds them to terms and a contract that should no longer apply once employment is terminated."
Kelsey	"I am in such support of this newly proposed rule! I know several people that have had to turn down jobs due to non-competes."

Majd	"As a nephrologist practicing for almost 20 years, I have seen how these noncompete clause were used to block out competition in various markets. This kept these markets under control of certain medical groups and dialysis companies. It decreased the quality care that could be provided by competitors at lesser expense. I urge you to finalize this rule and end these frivolous noncompete clauses for everyone including physicians. Please do not listen to various organizations that claims that they represent doctors, when in reality they represent various sponsors, companies and healthcare systems."
E	"As an employee who has recently been laid off, but still have a non-compete in place- I fully support die ban on non-competes. It only hampers employees who want to work to find their next role in an area where they excel, have experience and can have immediate impact due to their experience. There are enough non-disclosure and no sharing of proprietary information rules in place to avoid trade-secret sharing. Let capitalism work and let the free-will of employee/employers work!"
Steven	"Non-Compete clauses are inherently anti-American. Letting a corporation tell you who you can and can't work for is outrageous. Why do we have to sacrifice so much just to work? Pay me a fair wage, and when I leave or get fired let me continue to eek out an existence for myself without having to change career paths or working as a waiter until my non-compete expired."
Michael	"Just wanted to add my voice to those supporting this proposed rule. I work in a profession commonly governed by them (software engineering), and can attest that it's had a distortive effect on the hiring and compensation market for engineers, by far in the favor of employers. The rationale that it protects employer intellectual property is belied by the size and health of the engineering market in state jurisdictions functionally without them like California. Far too often these are not used for legitimate business concerns (hairdressers in Massachusetts!?) but purely to suppress open competition for employee's talents."
Carol	"I strongly support die ban on non-compete clauses. Thank you for taking on this very important issue."
Christopher	"The proposed rule to limit or outright ban noncompetes is a very good idea, and I adamantly support it. I think there's no better evidence to support this rule than all of the innovation that comes out of California, where noncompetes are already unenforceable. Labor mobility unlocks potential and lets people invent and contribute to their fullest ability, ifs as simple as that. We as a nation are stronger when our people, be we typical or exceptional, are free to do what we do best and go where we are needed most. I can't for the life of me comprehend why noncompetes are legal. They are the most explicitly anticompetitive thing I can think of, and that they exist at all is evidence of the insanely asymmetric relationship labor has with its employers. Phrased in a more "capitalist" way, noncompetes allow employers to entrench inefficiency and get by while being less competitive. Great businesses will benefit from banning noncompetes, mediocre ones will lament it. I think we all can agree on the kinds of businesses we'd like to see more of in this nation."

Scott	"Re: the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule The use of non-compete clauses in employment is unfair to workers and has been exploited by business in order to control labor. The proposed rule needs to be implemented in order to equalize die playing field between business and labor. There might be a few hi-tech businesses which have a bonafide interest protecting intellectual property and manufacturing processes. However, even in these areas the technological pace of change and invention is quick and a non-compete clause of a year might be justified. For all other lines of business though, non-compete clauses limit die ability of labor to seek an improved working condition or salary and thus unduly benefits the business community to the detriment of employees and to the national economy."
Matthew	"As a physician and surgeon, I fully support implementation of this proposed rule. This rule will allow fee exercise of healthcare employees to work where they are needed and improve patient's and community's access to necessary healthcare. For too long, large hospitals and corporations have abused the non-compete clauses to prevent mobility of healthcare workers which has exacerbated staffing shortages and unfairly impaired physicians and nurses from changing jobs within a geographic area to continue to care for their patients when terms of their employment are unfair or substandard"
Elizabeth	"Hello, I support this action to abolish noncompete clauses. I have several close friends in Healthcare who own small business. They struggle in growing in practice due to a noncompete clause. It hinders work stream and personal expansion. Please move forward with this action and restore the uninhibited entrepreneur spirit to facilitate positive change and growth in healthcare, Along with wage equity. Sincerely, Elizabeth Johnson RN BSN Retired"
John	"Non-compete clauses are inherently monopolistic and undemocratic! They fly in the face of the face of equal opportunity, and are truly emblematic of the remnants of laissez-faire capitalism, a system that has been time and time again proven unsustainable. Do right by Roosevelt and busy the trusts!"
Cyndy	"I support ending noon complete agreements. I was prevented from getting a job in my field, a very small employment sector, because of an NCA. NDA should also be banned. No employer should be able to hide sexual harassment this way."

Bradley	"Please make non-compete clauses an option in only the most needed situations. Making them completely illegal would be better than what we have today. They are detrimental to workers and businesses."
Steven	"Please eliminate the non-compete regulations. They are unfair, hurtful & immoral."
Brandon	"Support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses!"
Kerry	"I am a physician and I support ENDING Non-competes. I do NOT support the comment made by the American Hospital Association that would like non-competes to remain for physicians. Non-competes lead to the net loss of physician from small rural communities. Non-competes allow new physicians with significant loan debt to agree to unreasonable terms in order for them to pay off their crushing debt. In turn hospital and clinic administrators can then abuse physicians because physicians cannot either move to a different clinic or start their own practice. Rather than stay under such abuse, most physicians will leave and move to another city. This causes massive upheaval and loss to communities that rely on these physicians. As a physician I advocate to END non-compete arrangements and agree with this recommendation. Please do not make a carve out for physicians to be exempt from this rule. No entity whether it is a non-profit, government, private, large business or small business should be allowed to enforce a non-compete agreement."
Samuel	"I work as a software engineer. In my industry, non-compete clauses are not used for their ostensible purpose (preventing trade secrets or information gained at your current employer from being used at another employer), and are more frequently used as a tool to limit the labor pool available to a competitor. Software Engineering uses a tool set that is generally applicable enough that there generally aren't reasons that non-competes are necessary to protect sensitive information or techniques. I don't believe that separating the extremely niche, but arguably positive, uses of non-compete agreements from the negative, purely anti-competitive, ones is possible through regulation. The best results are likely to come from prohibiting them as a matter of course."
Adam	"I support the FTC ban on non-compete clauses. I think that it would be wonderful if for once the government did something in support of workers instead of listening to powerful corporate lobbyists. Ban Non-compete clauses!"
Jesse	"Non Compete clauses should absolutely be banned. I almost signed one several years ago. It was with a 3rd rate robotics manufacturing company in Kansas and the clause would have prevented me from working in "any related field." I talked with a lawyer and decided I didn't want to be bound by the agreement. Since then I have found work in Washington, Wisconsin, and California. Moving between jobs has allowed me to learn more and transition faster from an artist into an aerospace engineer. Non-compete clauses stifles personal development and the economy: ban them!"

Steven	"Ban non-compete requirements"
Stacee	"Noncompete agreements are specifically harmful to patients in closed, suburban/rural communities. Specifically, where I live in the Pacific Northwest, we have a single hospital system that is nonprofit. This hospital system essentially has a monopoly on orthopedic care in the community. We are all under a noncompete agreement. This agreements spans 15 miles which means that in order to change jobs, we would have to move to Tacoma or Seattle and uproot our families. This can cost tendons of thousand dollars. Therefore, we are essentially "forced" to work in the system. This system has dramatically increased the cost of patient care. As practitioners we are not allowed to treat patients in lower cost outpatient surgical centers, but are forced to bring the patient's to the hospitals' OR. This substantially drives up the cost of care for simple, minor outpatient, elective orthopedic surgeries. While consistently increasing the cost of patient care, the company consistently pays physicians less and less. Over the course of the past 6 years, our pay has been decreased by approximately 15%. Despite this, administrator pay has consistently increased with inflation, and we remain trapped by our non- competes. Please consider the ramifications of ending non-competes, yes physicians might actually get paid a fair wage for the 60+ hour work weeks; but die primary benefit will be improved access to care for patients. These companies would be unable prevent good physicians from leaving their community."
Heide	"I am a physician at a children's hospital. My group, like others around the country, is in a staffing crisis which is affecting patient care. Our institution requires noncompete clauses for any new contract, which is limiting our ability to hire new doctors. This inability of physicians and other workers to freely choose jobs due to noncompete clauses is directly contributing to our hospital's crisis, and on a larger scale is affecting the health of our country. This exploitative practice should be banned."
Ann	"I strongly oppose noncompetes and was the victim of being unable to work in the same town when I quit my anesthesia job because I needed to go to part time when I couldn't find reliable childcare for my four kids. My husband is also an established physician in the community, and it would have been devastating to uproot our family and move so that I could find a different job. I was unable to work within the system for three years until my noncompete was over. I was forced to travel to work part-time and it was very hard on our family. Physicians work extremely hard and sacrifice a lot for their career and deserve to have the same options that other non-physicians have when choosing their jobs."

Drea	"YES YES YES!!!! My employer forced me to sign a non-compete that is overly broad in scope and geography. I am a program manager in govt contracting, and according to my non-compete, I cannot work in government contracting anywhere in the US for 2 years after I leave my company. I feel stuck in a toxic environment that I've been doing the same contract for 8 years, with no pay raise. I am literally stuck. I cannot expand my skills, work on different types of contracts to leant different types of govt contracts. The federal govt pays my company $10,300/ino for my salary. Of that, I make 83,000. The company is making their money off of my contracted salary with the DOD. I work remotely from WA state, but my companies headquarters is in VA. PLEASE MAKE THIS GO THROUGH SO I CAN EVOLVE AS A PROFESSIONAL! !+<<"
Odette	"I think that this is a great idea. I have been at a company where I had to sign a non compete to receive a small amount of shares as a pay increase. Tunis out the shares are not producing products yet. I have had to turn down 4 jobs in the last year due to this. Those jobs paid more for my skills. The only way out of this agreement is that I have Ti resign and work out of industry taking less pay for a year. I've generated millions for this company and think this should be illegal as a requirement for employment or any fonn of salary increase."
Pavel	"I strongly believe that non-compete clauses in employment and severance contracts are detrimental to individual freedom, innovation, and healthy competition. Firstly, non-compete clauses directly harm individual freedom by limiting people's right to choose where they work and how they utilize their skills. These agreements often prohibit individuals from taking on work that may be beneficial to their career growth or better suited to their skills, even if it's not directly competitive to their former employer. This lack of freedom not only limits individuals' job opportunities but also impedes their ability to fully develop and utilize their skills and expertise. The long-term cost of such restrictions is substantial, and workers bear all of it. Secondly, non-compete clauses area way for large companies to stifle competition and hinder innovation. When companies use non-compete agreements, they are essentially attempting to maintain a monopoly on the market by restricting their employees' ability to work for their competitors, even after those employees are gone. This practice not only limits competition but also hinders innovation since individuals who could be contributing to advancements in the field are restricted from doing so. Finally, non-compete clauses in employment and severance contracts limit growth and innovation by preventing skilled individuals from seeking out new opportunities. Innovation comes from talented individuals moving between companies, bring their skills and knowledge to new projects and teams, and in turn helping those people reach new heights. Non-compete clauses make it very difficult for individuals to find new opportunities, making the job market less efficient and less effective at matching skills with the best opportunities. In some cases, the experience and skillset of such individuals may be lost entirely when they are forced to switch to a different occupation. In conclusion, non-compete clauses are a significant barrier to individual freedom, innovation, and healthy competition in the tech industry. Banning such clauses would allow for more freedom and flexibility for employees, foster greater competition in the marketplace, and greatly improve the life of workers everywhere."

Edward	"I am subject to a non compete that is overly broad and indult burdensome where the employer offered nothing to compensate me for not competing with them in what amounts to a universal territory and universal technology for 24 months. I find the entire concept odious as they've essentially limited my ability to earn for my family in any market worldwide. I am in favor of eliminating or greatly reducing the term and scope of non Competes."
John	"Eliminate non-compete clauses. This is economic slavery and has no place in this country."
Praveen	"Non compete clause hurts physicians and patient care."
Olivia	"Non-competes are bad for workers and for business competition. If we truly want a free market then workers should be able to take their skills and labor to whoever will pay them the most of it. Also, such rules particularly harm low-income workers that have no choice in the matter but to sign a non-compete. There is no excuse to keep such a practice that is predatory towards workers. Get rid of all non-competes."
Besir	"I support this new rule."
Cynthia	"Back in the '90s, I was forced to fmd work in a different industry because there was a non-compete clause. This caused me great anxiety, as it took me 3 months to fmd another job and I was trying to pay my mortgage."
Randy	"As a working class citizen I believe eliminating Non-Competes will help create a more competitive market that would benefit our economy and our workers."
Steve	"Non-compete clause in contracts with medical personnel (ie Physicians and Surgeons) through University of Washington Medical Center has no term limit. A doctor employed there is therefore an indentured servant. Non-compete clause should be eliminated"

Maura	"I wholeheartedly support the FTC's proposed ban on non-compete agreements. These agreements are pervasive within the veterinary community and are often used to intimidate workers from leaving positions, asking for better wages or improved working conditions . Often communities are left with limited veterinary care because an associate veterinarian has been forced to relocate rather than work at another hospital or start their own business. Large corporations now own a majority stake of the veterinary market and can now employ fleets of lawyers to intimidate and pursue veterinarians that attempt to work within a non-compete radius. Non-compete agreements are often written that extend well beyond a reasonable scope in both distance and duration or over-reach into job descriptions that were beyond the employees role within the hospital. As a specialist veterinarian under my current non- compete I am not allowed to work in any scope of veterinary medicine within a 25 mile radius for 2 years. I am facing commuting 1.5 hours (one way) or completely uprooting my family to find a position at a hospital that is not within my non-compete agreement. I do not posses trade secrets. I am not privy to management meetings or corporate leadership discussions. The sole purpose of the non-compete is to intimidate me from leaving a corporation for a better opportunity or daring to start my own business ."
Andrew	"Perhaps an unappreciated benefit of eliminating non-compete agreements is that it will allow me as a primary care provider to better advocate for my patients to my employer, and to be taken seriously. Patients will benefit by empowering their advocates, which we as primary care doctors are privileged to be"
Cedar	"Please ban non-compete clauses! It will do healthcare workers and patients so much good! Less disrupted care by people who are treated better and paid better is what I want out of my health care system!"
DONNA	"We support abolition of the non-compete rule. It is only fair that competition can exist. Monopolies result if not and newer younger people get fewer chances. My beautician had to suffer from this rule so it hits the small-time entrepreneurs hard."
Annie	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of employees, making it difficult for workers to leave dangerous or abusive work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit

	competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. Physicians should absolutely be entitled to the new FTC non-compete rule. They should not be exempt from this needed worker protection as it greatly limits their ability to negotiate their contracts and instead offers large hospital systems an unprecedented advantage over physicians in the marketplace. There is a large increase in physician burnout and allowing the market place to be more free would allow physicians more freedom and flexibility. Additionally, the last time an exemption of this nature was granted by the lobbying from the American Hospital Association (Jung v AAMC 2004) resulted in decades of delay for improving resident physicians' ability for fair wages and benefits; this is still an active struggle today. Please do not make the same mistake again for physicians of today and the future. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Sincerely, A concerned physician"
Jerry	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete clauses. As a mid-career primacy care physician & as someone who strongly considered this when switching jobs recently. It is an outdated tool that unfairly provides advantages to the healthcare administrators & only hurts physicians & patients. If we mean free market, let's practice it!"
Devin	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements. Sincerely, Devin Leyba- Brown Auburn, WA"
Dalon	"100% agree with this. Especially in healthcare"
Xiao	"I am a hospitalist physician (MD) working in WA state and I fully support the move to ban non competes for healthcare workers. Many hospitals and staffing agencies use this as a means to cripple doctors and other medical staff from finding work (even in such areas that have labor shortage) when they try to leave their current place of work. We are also crippled in advocating for better working conditions (for the safety of our patients and our practice) and bargaining for higher wages because these companies know that we are locked into a contract for x number of years and leaving would cause significant financial hardship, or give cause for the former employer to sue us and our new employer. This is exactly why AHA is against this proposed ban, to protect their financial interests rather than the interests of their hardworking employees. If you think about it, noncompetes for doctors and other health workers, at least in the hospital setting, are truly unethical. It suppresses the free labor market and our wages. It also forces us to uproot our lives and either commute long distances or move far away when there are patients right on our doorstep who we can help and serve but are not able to due to a non compete clause from a company/employer that values profits over people. This is the first step to take in fixing a broken healthcare system and stop doctors from leaving the field, a field for which a drowning ship would be a perfectly apt metaphor. Please ban the non compete ASAP."

William	"I support FTC's proposal to ban non-compete agreements. These agreements hurt the working class and labor market by giving employers control over employees, even after terminating employment."
Chelsea	"Noncompete clauses should be outlawed. Employers will look for any reason to pay workers less and will often whine to get their way. But the US government should stand with workers, not corporations that just posted record profits. Help die people get out of wage stagnation. The evidence is clear."
Virgene	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses which hold worker's wages down, stifle innovation and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth by moving to other employers with better benefits and treatment."
Jordann	"As a single mother with a negligent and destructive co-parent, non-compete clauses render me choosing between my career and my children. Enforcing a non-compete clause requires me to re-enter the court system to re-establish a parenting plan with a pathological and destructive human. A career in healthcare is entirely for the benefit of the people in the community. As a single parent with no other source of income, either I choose to leave my children for periodic remote work - leaving my children vulnerable to the abuse of others who would know that I am away or causing the children to miss necessary time at school if they come with me, lose my capacity to support my family by remaining unemployed for the duration of the non-compete, or re- entering the court system to re-negotiate a parenting plan - one that took four years to establish in the first place."
Mitchell	"Please pass this rule! The economic philosophy of quasi Trickle Down that the USA has been operating under for the past 40 years DOES NOT WORK FOR THE LARGER POPULATION. It works only for the select few at the top. Non-Compete Clauses also take power away from workers for no other reason than corporate executives don't want to actually have to pay people a fair wage for their work. Executives seem to forget that their salary, bonuses and die business itself would not exist without the regular employees working on the good/service that the company provides."

William	"Competition is the Listerine of Life and essential to Equal Opportunity and the Creative Genius of America. The Competition kicks your butt out of bed in the morning and gives you Great Ideas for Free!!! END TI-IE NON-COMPETE CLAUSE NOW!"
Jena	"As a former employment specialist who works with people with mental illness (to a current mental health intern at a behavioral health agency), I can attest that these noncompete clauses hinder our society's most vulnerable because they limit people with limited skills to staying in often abusive conditions. Not to mention that the noncompetes harms the economy overall - if someone leaves a coffee shop for another coffee shop, we are all better off as a society if a person is able to use that skill set in another location."
Alex	"I've never understood why it should be possible to sign a broad exclusivity agreement as a term of employment. As I've changed jobs the set of locations that I'm contractually allowed to work at is a narrower and narrower field. This mainly feels like a method of wage suppression then an actual act of protection from competition."
Lorie	"I think non-compete clauses are ridiculous, and a way to choke back an individual's use of their own skills. Ban them NOW!"
Wendy	"Non-compete clauses hurt workers. People can't move to better opportunities within a related sphere of work. A worker's lack of job mobility allows employers excessive power over an individual's right to optimize their own choices. Employers have the right to protect trade secrets, but this can be accomplished through other means. Please go forward with this proposed rule change as soon as possible."
Jennifer	"Non compete agreements only benefit companies and not workers or the community. I am a physician with a non compete agreement, and would have to move my family across two counties or out of state to change jobs. My patients would lose their long term primary care physician. This is an unfair burden to place on the individual physician and it does not benefit the community as a whole. Healthcare systems argue they are protecting their investment in recruiting and hiring. They have the money and resources to fight this change. I hope they don't succeed."
K	"I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."

T	"The non compete in Seattle has made my life exhausting and challenging. My entire extended family lives in the surrounding area. My job is abusive and awful, and as the sole breadwinner, my options are to uproot our family and young kids to pursue a career in a new city without any family support or give up my job temporarily and wait years for the non compete to end (not an option, we have no other source of income). This is unjust."
Amber	"Non-compete clauses significantly hamper competition especially in the tech industry. It makes it difficult for employees to find new jobs especially for big tech companies which have products in almost all consumer facing tech. Also it makes it difficult for smaller companies trying to break into an existing space since they can't hire employees because of non compete clauses. They should most certainly be banned unilaterally."
Andrew	"The use of non-compete agreements has become outrageous. There is no place for them, especially when applied to lower level workers. The use of these contracts violates the spirit of capitalism. Make employers compete for workers. Ignore the Chamber of Commerce. In fact, these agreements are Un- American. This ruling will not affect me personally one way or another. But it does affect those around me. I urge you to make non-compete agreements invalid, and make employers trying to apply them subject to attorney fees and costs if they try to enforce them."
KEVIN	"I applied for a position at a clinic in a small Washington State town. I had to verbally accept the job before they would show me the full employment agreement including the non-compete clause. When I received the agreement the non- compete clause was ominous. It would have restricted me from treating any prior patient of any of their clinics; from receiving referrals from any physicians that referred to their clinics. The prohibition extended to their partner companies as well. With a little research I found they had partner companies in 26 states. I would also have to agree to not work in my specialty for two years after leaving their employment. In summary if I had taken that job I would effectively be prohibited from working in my profession for at least two years. These non-compete clauses have become oppressive and need to be abolished."
Ezekiel	"I am a physician at a children's hospital. My group, like others around the country, is in a staffing crisis which is affecting patient care. Our institution requires noncompete clauses for any new contract, which is limiting our ability to hire new doctors. This inability of physicians and other workers to freely choose jobs due to noncompete clauses is directly contributing to our hospital's crisis, and on a larger scale is affecting the health of our country. This exploitative practice should be banned."

Jose	"Non- compete clauses stifle competition and limit the career growth of professionals, including those of us in healthcare. Eliminating these unfair contract clauses is necessary for improving work conditions, particularly in the current setting of physician burnout. Please do not succumb to lobbying by hospital groups. Eliminating non-compete clauses is an important step in helping recover this badly damaged healthcare system."
Deborah	"I write in emphatic support of the FTC's proposed rule that would ban non-compete clauses. Around two decades ago, the law school clinic that I supervised represented a client who was denied unemployment benefits. Why? Because she had lost her job for refusing to sign a non-compete agreement. As I recall, her job was transcribing medical records -- certainly not a high level position with access to trade secrets. I was appalled that she was asked to sign such an agreement, given the type of work, her modest earnings, and the lack of any justification based on access to trade secrets. And I was even more appalled that one of the leading law firms in Seattle had drafted the non-compete and was defending it in an unemployment compensation hearing. Talk about unequal bargaining power and employers abusing their power. The economic arguments put forth by the FTC in support of this rule -- non-compete clauses' negative effects on workers' wages, stifling of innovation and new ideas, and impacts on economic liberty -- are all valid. The example I encountered is a reminder that the abuse and proliferation of non-compete clauses have been increasing for decades, one of the many factors that have contributed to the growing income and wealth inequality that afflict our nation. Thank you for proposing this rule. And please stand up against the onslaught of opposition and requests for more time to comment that you will undoubtedly receive from big business. Deborah Maranville, Prof. Emeritus, University of Washington Law School (for identification purposes only)"
annamaria	"As a physician I highly oppose non compete clauses. It is my constitutional right to work wherever I want and leave a job for another one without having to move my life, home and family. Thank You, Dr. AnnaMaria Marchionne"
Daniel	"Time to end this practice. I am tied to my health care institution for 2 years and for 10 miles. It has substantially damaged my ability to negotiate with my employer and held my salary down that I cannot get competing offers from die many institutions within my community."
Michael	"This rule is very, very important to implement, and I support it. Non-compete agreements are, and have always been, unethical: they rob employees of the ability to pursue more lucrative opportunities, barring them from using their most marketable skills to escape worker exploitation. By definition, they eliminate competition, which is bad for the economy, bad for employees, and bad for small businesses."

Edmond	"I agree with the FTC moving to bar non-compete clauses. There is strong data that non-compete clauses serve to depress wages and impact competition. Non-compete clauses represent a legal mechanism that supports industry over the individual. I see it as the role of government to protect the individual. In the field of medicine, they handicap contract negotiations on the part of the physician and can negatively impact a service area. Given that there is already a dramatic shortage of physicians that will only worsen over the next decade, this can have huge ramifications within a catchment area. Please move to bar non-compete clauses."
Ryan	"I'm a physician in the Northwest and I want say I completely agree with ridding the US of noncompete clauses. It is an awful tactic by businesses to lower wages and corner employees into making difficult decisions. From a physician perspective, I did not go into medicine to be a business. I did this to help my fellow human being. If my company doesn't provide me an environment to do this I shouldn't be forced to move out of the area to seek other employment for sometimes two years before returning Not only does this significantly affect my family but it also affects my patients and the community as a whole. Everyone loses except the healthcare company that employed me because they are more concerned about the bottom line and not the community at hand."
Josiah	"As a technology industry worker, non-compete clauses in contracts force high risks on me and my coworkers as individuals, while granting sweeping power to corporations. I personally know several people who have declined jobs on the basis of overly restrictive non-compete clauses, and a few others who have had to pivot their careers or industries to avoid penalties for non-compete. Intellectual property theft is already illegal; non-compete clauses place additional, unnecessary, and unjustified burdens on individuals while providing very little benefit to the corporations who issue them. Oftentimes, non-compete clauses are legally unenforceable anyway, or so burdensome to enforce that many contract holders decline to enforce them. I can't speak for other industries outside of Information Technology, but I imagine the same problems exist there as well. US corporations should not complicate employment contracts and negatively impact the lives of individuals for even a great payoff; much less a nebulous and often minimal one. Please put an end to non-compete clauses."
Micah	"Non-compete Clauses are anti-competitive and unnecessary in most, if not all settings. In the current world where geographic boundaries start to matter less, it can be argued by a corporate minority that noncompete clauses are appropriate. However, in the world of healthcare non-compete clauses harm more than just licensed practitioners. They provide significant harm and reduced access to care for thousands of patients on the panels of healthcare providers. For reference, one physician can have a patient panel of up to 3,500 depending on specialty. The use of noncompete clauses also encourages unethical, and sometimes illegal behavior on the part of healthcare employers, due to their influence and fear inducing terms when it comes to an employee standing up to or reporting an owner or management team that are breaking rules or laws or operating in grey areas. The proposed rule, getting rid of noncompete clause is generally, is a definite advancement in potential for retaining and maintaining access to care for patients, and allowing more innovation and competition in healthcare. Please ignore the corporate interests and their extreme minority arguments and pass this rule, eliminating non-compete causes in almost every instance."

Jean	"I support the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. There is strong evidence that it could have a benefit for employees, held to companies that do not pay a livable wage, and denied the right to seek better employment in the same line of work. Wages for many people have been stagnant while many businesses have accumulated great wealth for owners and people who have stock in those businesses. We need better conditions and fair employment opportunities for workers. Thank you."
Debbie	"Pass the ban on Non-Compete clauses!"
Jacob	"As a physician, this rule would significantly improve my quality of life. Non-compete clauses essentially trap highly skilled professions who have ties to a specific location, forcing them to stay with an employer which may treat them unfairly."
Kathy	"I am the CEO of a small medical company providing critical services to women. The health systems in Indiana have onerous non-completes for providers that create a monopoly in the state. They are afraid of competition, and even threaten to sue providers for talking to us. These women deserve to make the best career choice for themselves and their families. As a smaller company, we do not have funds to legally fight these large systems. We support elimination of the non-compete."
Alexander Duncan	"Hello and thank you for taking this up, I am an Emergency Physician and I support ending non-competes. In my position, I am bound by a non-compete dictated by TeamHealth, a large for profit enterprise. There is ZERO intellectual property of TeamHealth that I could take to a new job. I am restricted for a year and by distance, meaning I would have to find a job and move my family if TeamHealth loses it's contract with the hospital where I work. There is only one hospital in our community, giving me no other option. If they lose the contract, why would I be restricted from working with the next company to hold that contract? I can understand the idea of non-competes for positions where people are creating new products, but non-disclosures seem to address most of those issues. In providing Emergency Medical care, there is absolutely no reason for a non-compete other than to protect a large, for-profit company."

Jason	"I would like to state my support for a regulation prohibiting non-compete clauses in employment contracts. It is a disadvantage to employees who no longer wish to work for a particular employer and a way to stifle commerce. The employee would need to move or change professions and appears to enforce a form of open-ended indentured servitude. It is heavily used in healthcare and not only effects the employee but more importantly the patient. My family has lost two providers to non-compete contracts where these providers (a surgeon and gastroenterologist) had to leave the area after separation from their employers. We lost good people unnecessarily. I believe a regulation prohibiting employment non-compete contracts is both a boon to commerce and a social good."
Leslie	"No employer should be able to have control over our choice of where and how to work in the future! Their business is only to control our work when with diem and it's anti-democratic to allow them anything more!"
Joshua	"The restrictions on movement of labor that non-compete clauses represent don't make sense for the US, regardless of where you sit on the political spectrum. A functioning labor market where Americans can have the opportunity to be paid market rates for their labor is crucial to ensuring Americans are properly compensated and have opportunities to grow their careers and provide for their families. All of the above is true universally, but particularly so for lower-income workers, who pose little threat to their former employers' trade secrets and who would benefit more from wage increases. I strongly urge you to ban these clauses as un-American"
Matthew	"I support rulemaking that limits employers' ability to enter into contracts with workers that contain non-compete clauses. I and my past coworkers, software engineers, have been required to sign non-compete clauses as a condition of employment. These clauses suppress our participation in the job market. Some of us will job hunt clandestinely. Some of us have simply felt locked into our current employer indefinitely. Each of us has worried that we might be sued for breach of contract if we leave our job for another company that might be considered a competitor, even though each of us is employed "at will". At the same time, it is widely accepted that no employer will enforce these clauses against lower-level employees, reserving them only for important, highly compensated people. These clauses have a chilling effect, regardless. Even though the norm in our industry is to change companies from time to time in order to gain new experience that would be otherwise unavailable at our current company, these clauses reduce employees' willingness to look outside—or even discuss looking outside—their current company. The threat of enforcement is real, too. A former manager of mine decided he wanted to pursue whatever legal action was possible against one of my reports, who announced she was leaving the company. Her prior manager had gone to another company, then recruited her to follow, lle claimed. Neither the legal department nor his vice president had any interest in pursuing the matter, because they knew it wouldn't help us: my report would still leave (maybe to go somewhere different instead), and the enforcement would simply ruin whatever goodwill she felt for the company. Invoking the noncompete clause simply had the effect of terrifying a young engineer whose career was just getting started. From my perspective, then, these contract clauses provide companies with little value beyond the ability to, in the worst case, score a pyrrhic court victory, and in the rest of the cases, brandish before less sophisticated workers an instrument of psychological terror. Save our employers from themselves: drastically restrict the scope and enforceability of these non-compete clauses."

Nancy	"It's outrageous to support non-compete bans. This checks a worker's most basic right, i.e., to choose to take a job wherever he might wish. Surely no thinking person can accept the idea that going on unemployment benefits is preferable to finding work with a competing company."
Siri	"I am writing to support the FTC's proposal to ban noncompete agreements. Noncompete agreements prevent workers from switching jobs and pursuing better opportunities in the industry in which they have developed expertise, which stifles wages and limits career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to better opportunities for US workers. This is a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes."
Charles	"I whole heartedly support die proposed rule by die FTC eliminating Non-Compete Clauses"
Deborah	"I am anesthesiologist trapped by an extreme non-compete (15 miles from any current practice that contracts with my practice, for 18 months). Unless I drive 2 hours each way or leave the state (which would require me to leave my minor children, and I am a single mom), I cannot leave my practice. We have no trade secrets, and the non-compete is simply punitive. I am trapped. I have to choose between leaving medicine and a specialty to which I have devoted my entire adult life, and staying in a practice where I am overworked, underpaid, and completely burned out. Please, out law non-competes."
John	"Hello- I view non-competes as misused, abused employer tools to squelch competition and provide unfair contractual, including wage, employer leverage. I chaired the compensation committee of a large Northwest medical group of over 1000 providers with collective compensation of several hundreds of millions. We did not impose non-competes. Financial incentives such as moving costs, loan forgiveness can be clawed back w/o non-competes. Do not cave to business interests on this."
Leah	"I support putting a stop to Noncompete Agreements in order to support our economy and working population"

carla	"As I read this I find it hard to believe anyone would ever want to harm the workers and die businesses To ban non -compete clauses would take away another fonn of rights we have. How can any one with a good conscience want to even consider this okay ever. To support us the people to be able to compete for a better future is I believe the American way . Do not be the one to take this away. Reading stories on how these signing a non compete has hurt the worker who is not realizing how harmful that signature can be to their future. Do not allow non competes to continue to be in the work force. It is not helping us it is hurting us people. Trust is a major strength for us to live by daily. Don't you agree ? I can say if you vote to take away our right to compete for a greater job which brings a better life for families and future . I would not trust what you are doing in office for the people. I would reach every person I could to say do you know what your Government is doing now Be our voice for a greater America . Be a great leader for die people . It is never to late to show us you care and wants what is best fur us the people. Carla"
Mary	"Please ban the Non-Compete Clause for all workers(Matter No. P201200) in the United States. Trade secrets can be protected in other ways. Non compete clauses fundamentally abrogate the civil rights of America workers and create a class of employers that literally enslaves its workers by keeping their wages artificially low and prevents them from working by restricting their ability to work with a humane distance from their homes. This practice should stopped NOW."
Gregory	"It is time to end non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses act as a distributed monopoly, proportional to their prevalence within the sector of employment. Employers experience competition more and more only at the points where workers enter employment and not during the time workers are employed. Depending on the length of the average career, the fraction of workers who are retained by competition approach single digits. Mobility is an expensive proposition that is primarily born by the employees, since only a few workers receive relocation costs."

Mark	"The right to work is fundamental. Non-compete need to be abolished."
Bradley	"Non compete clauses hurt workers who are already struggling to make ends meet against high inflation and an economy headed for recession. Every individual deserves the right to employ their skills to secure the best possible opportunity to make a living. By limiting the pool of those opportunities, non compete clauses force workers to concede to choices they would other not make, and they deprive the market of the full range of skilled workers available. End non compete clauses at all levels, and give power back to industrious Americans who deserve the freedom and autonomy to seek a career path of their own choosing."
Arash	""Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200" I support this rule as a geriatric psychiatrist who serves in underserved communities. Private companies and public health entities should not be allowed to dictate where physicians practice. Forbidding, or worse punishing, medical providers from practicing where they want creates an unfair advantage for employers and ultimately hurts patients. The shortage of medical doctors in underserved specialties is particularly affected by the practice of non-compete clauses. Thank you for championing this effort."
VENKATACHALA	"I support the abolition of non competes for physicians. If I do not like the employment of a physician , physician group or a large hospital corporation.then I should be allowed to leave and join another job in same city across the street . This actually helps patient care as I am not leaving town and patients can still get care. As far as estimating cost of my leaving to the employer - it should be spelt out as a line item in contract and be reasonable. Since it would be laid out to me prior to moving - it will be upto me to plan ahead before signing on . As time progresses the ridiculous levy on a bad leaver will standardize ."

Dawn	"The industry in my previous employ had a noncompete clause. It held back myself and others from seeking a higher wage, better position at other companies. I disagree with the statement of closing wage gaps. Said employer now owns the competition, the workers lose in the end"
Robin	"There is no reasonable argument that I've heard for non competes at any level of industry. Not disclosing trade secrets is more than enough restriction for any level of employee, and anything beyond that is purely punitive."
Carl	"I am an electrical engineer with a very specialized skill set that is marketable to perhaps a dozen companies world-wide. In that respect, my skills are very valuable to these companies but to other companies I would have only average value. My current employer forced me to sign a non-compete contract; at the time I tried to decline but was told unless I signed it, there was no job offer. Also at the time, the company I worked for was in serious decline (they closed down soon after) and I did not have the time to consider other jobs. So I reluctantly signed. As it turns out, my employer grossly oversold his business acumen; this company is dysfunctional and mismanaged. Furthermore, I have not had a raise in 15 years (including the previous employer) and inflation has risen 40%, effectively resulting in a 30% pay cut. My ability to consider any other job that would pay anywhere close to what I make is severely restricted. The owner of the company has a reputation as a litigious sort so I have no doubt he would take legal action against me. Ironically, Thave brought far more expertise to this company than I have gained from working here. My skills were in an area in which the company had no other experts, and I have given them several new product designs. The areas in which the company did have expertise were also areas in which I was already very knowledgeable, so I have gained little from that. In the end, the non-compete contract has been one-sided: the company has benefited greatly from my work, and I would be taking nothing from the company even if I left and worked for a direct competitor. I also signed a non-disclosure agreement which I consider to be perfectly fair. When I left my old job for this one I fully honored my previous NDA, and I would honor the current NDA as well. But the non-compete contract has essentially chained me to a job that I no longer enjoy or want. As such, I enthusiastically support 16 CFR Part 910J."

Dan	"I urge you to support this. Non compete clauses are a travesty and need to be eliminated"
Zachary	"Long past due to have non-compete clauses banned. It's wrong for so many reasons: - They're largely unenforceable and exist solely to intimidate workers from seeking valid opportunities. - Companies are protected from trade secrets leaking through a number of enforceable mechanisms: patents, copyright, etc. - Blanket applied to almost all workers, regardless of role. - Nominally overly broad industries named, and ban huge swaths of employment opportunities."
Lucas	"I support the non-compete clause rule. The success of Silicon Valley in California where non-competes are unenforceable demonstrates that non-competes actually hold back innovation."
Erin	"Non compete clauses benefit only corporations, and only devastate individual medical doctors. Physicians want to work. We are here to help. Corporations devalue and nickel and dime every moment, every decision. If noncompete clauses continue to be another plague on medicine, our best and brightest will choose another path. Avoid medicine as a calling because the environment is too toxic to be rewarding and financially viable. They will take their talents to WHERE THEY ARE VALUED. NONCOMPETES ONLY BENEFIT TI-IE BUSINESS OF MEDICINE.....not the PEOPLE who need care"
Emily	"I support the FTC's new rules which would make non-compete clauses invalid / illegal. I am a veterinarian, and in our industry non-compete clauses are common and make it difficult for vets to move between practices without moving out of the area completely. There are a variety of reasons someone might choose to change employers, which could include earning potential, better hours/shifts, work more in line with their values and how they practice medicine, a higher or lower caseload, a closer commute, etc. It also makes it more challenging for veterinarians to start their own business, and since practice ownership allows higher earning potential than working as an associate, non-compete clauses indirectly limit and lower the income of veterinarians. In addition, I do not think income limits should be part of the new ruling and believe that non-compete clauses should be illegal no matter someone's income level. For veterinarians, while we earn a good upper-middle class income, most of us have a significant student loan debt burden so limiting our ability to change jobs without moving is an additional financial hurdle."

Angela	"I support the newly proposed rule that would make new Non-Compete Clause restrictions illegal and existing clauses unenforceable. I look forward to the positive effect this rule will have on America's workforce on all levels of skill and on the positive effect it will have on our economy."
Anh	"I am a physician at a children's hospital. My group, like others around the country, is in a staffing crisis which is affecting patient care. Our institution requires noncompete clauses for any new contract, which is limiting our ability to hire new doctors. This inability of physicians and other workers to freely choose jobs due to noncompete clauses is directly contributing to our hospital's crisis, and on a larger scale is affecting the health of our country. This exploitative practice should be banned."
Adam	"I am a software engineer fortunate enough to avoid the layoffs at die large tech company I work for. My former colleagues who were not so fortunate are, in states where they are still legal, forbidden by a non-compete from seeking any work they have skills for because being laid off does not cancel their non- compete agreement and the sprawling behemoth we work for considers itself in competition with everyone who has ever thought about a computer. I support the proposed rule in the strongest possible terms. A company has no right to insulate itself from competition by hiring, then firing, the people it believes are most qualified but it does not wish to pay, excluding them from the workforce for one to three years in a notoriously fast-moving industry. I see no need for exceptions. If a company fears an employee leaving on their own and taking their skills with them, that company had better pay that person what they are worth. We discourage children from licking cookies to claim them for later. We must not permit corporations to do the same at immensely higher stakes. If I was laid off, I would have no health insurance for myself or my partner. Asthma, arthritis, ADHD, autism spectrum disorder, and schizophrenia are difficult to manage whether insured or not; being kicked off my insurance and forbidden from getting a job that would provide it, or provide enough income for me to pay the ransom myself, would bankrupt us. Non-competes multiply the effect of the price of health care in the USA in preventing people living with chronic health conditions from equitable access to economic opportunity. I may not be able to function like a normal person in society, but I'm doing just fine as long as I stay employed by one of the tiny, tiny fraction of potential employers prepared to use die strange but occasionally-remarkable skills and tolerate the occasionally-remarkable dysfunctions of deeply weird people. I do know what my options would be without a non-compete but with one, I am very aware that I do not have any options."
Erin	"Hello, my name is Erin M. Nulf and Iain a physician assistant. In my position in medical practice, we have to practice under the supervision of a physician. We practice with our supervising physician in a collaborative fashion. As PAs, we are not able to open and operate our own practice. Despite this, many medical practices, regardless if they are owned by private equity,

	corporations, or privately held, routinely require non-compete agreements. This often stipulate that one is not able to practice within a certain mile radius, most commonly is 35-50 miles. Often these agreements include that mile radius to include ALL SATELLITE CLINICS of the practice, which then prevents one from essentially practicing anywhere within the geographical area they live in. As a PA, this is difficult---you can't open your own practice and a non-compete clause doesn't allow you to work under someone else unless you relocate a great distance from your current residence. This has been a hardship that I have negotiate everytime I have had to change practices (physician retiring & closing practice, relocating across country). We also sign employment contracts that, along with a non-compete clause, severely restrict our ability to work part-time, increase our income, or move outside of our specialty. These are a few good reasons providers are leaving medicine, at a time when provider shortages are growing while demographically need is increasing Banning non-compete clauses would allow more flexibility for physician assistants, and would most likely result in fewer providers leaving medicine."
Shellee	"I'm urging you to ban the noncompete clauses as proposed by the FTC. I'm recently retired, so I have nothing to gain professionally from this. But I must speak out for workers who have the right to a livelihood. It's so basic. The noncompete clauses are egregiously unfair, placing far too much power in the hands of employers. In these days of minimal job security, workers should at the very least have the freedom to pursue the best job possible with the best pay."
Registered	"I completely support the proposed ruling on non-compete agreements. As someone who has had my own employment options limited by such clauses, I would like to see these erased from the fabric of our workplace save for rare circumstances in which national security or public safety is concerned. As a Registered Nurse, these non-compete agreements limit my ability to work in certain locales and further the already fragile health care system, adversely affecting our communities. Lastly, although these are referred to as non-compete agreements, the times in which I encountered them prior to starting employment; I was not given an option to begin employment but not agree to a non compete clause. Rather it was a condition of employment, take it or leave it. Word choice matters and these clauses should be called out for what they are: non-compete labor restrictions. We need a transformation in our work lives in which employers compete to attract, employ and retain the best employees."
Brendan	"I am an attorney and information security engineer based in Seattle, WA. Non-competes of one sort or another are extremely common when Iain offered employment. Often, the non-compete clauses are extraordinarily broad, due either to a requirement that one not compete with any existing or proposed business of any part of a company (which, for large conglomerates like Amazon or Microsoft, is effectively "any pursuit on this planet or any

	other known to science"), or due to requirements that expressly forbid ever being employed again. The latter case is more rare, but more concerning: one Seattle-based financial services company offered me a noncompete clause (as part of an offer for an individual contributor position) that forbade me from performing any work in information security for several years after leaving their employment; when I pushed back, I received a note from their counsel that this clause was meant to ensure that I would never leave their company. (I assume the note had not been intended for my eyes.) Non-compete offers protect nothing in technological progress, harm individual workers, and only serve as a barely-veiled threat to employees: "do what we want, or since your health insurance is tied to us, we will ensure that your family dies of disease; you'll never be allowed to work for anyone else." I strongly support any action that the Commission takes to end their use in the United States."
Matthew	"I 100% support this non-compete clause rule. Please put it into action and help struggling working Americans. Thank you!"
Debra	"I'm writing to express my support for a rule banning noncompete agreements. They are particularly offensive when applied to lower-wage jobs and seem like a mild form of bondage to me. Anything that reduces competition between companies is an unfair advantage to larger, established companies. They use these to bind employees to their job. If they want employees to stay they should treat them right and pay them well. Thank you for moving to bar noncompete agreements."

Sarah	"As a physician, I was subject to a non-compete clause for the first 5 years of employment after I finished training, which involved 4 years of university,

	4years of medical school, 4 years of residency and 1 year of fellowship all undertaken at my personal expense. My employer did nothing to contribute to my knowledge and skills but was able to threaten me with legal action if I wished to use my skills and education in the location I preferred. It is offensive and un-American to allow employers to "own" the skillsets of their employees and to stifle competition and economic growth by trapping people in job circumstances they wish to improve. I applaud die FTC for moving to block these anti-competitive, labor market-manipulating contract provisions and believe that this type of rule that supports the democratic power of the people over die oligarchic power of corporations and the employer-class is exactly what our public institutions should be focused on. Please move forward with banning non-compete clauses in all employment contracts."
MaryBeth	"YES! DEFINITELY establish the non-compete rule. I know so many people who have had to deal with this. It's time to release people from being tethered to a former employer."
Heather	"Thank you for taking this into consideration. I highly recommend the removal of non compete clauses. They have a negative effect on physicians as we are limited in our abilities to negotiate for better wages and benefits for ourselves. I am a primary breadwinner in my family and my ability to seek die best compensation for my work directly affects my children and family Patient care is also negatively affected by this. There is an unprecedented corporate takeover of healthcare. Removing the few employee rights (ie voting with our feet) affects our ability to advocate. Corporations have even less incentive to focus on care of the patients and more focus on profits for management and shareholders Thank you for your time"

Margaret	"As an author, every book contract conies with a non-compete clause that varies between publishers, with lower-paid authors frequently getting more restrictive terms. I have seen everything from non-competes that bar authors from even working on projects that could sell elsewhere before the end of

	their contract, to ones that forbid authors from releasing a book with another publisher, even under a pen name, for half a year after the contracted book is published. Even the narrowest clauses still forbid authors from working on other projects in the same genre, which is typically where they've invested time building a readership. Most books take upwards of two years to hit the market after being acquired by a publisher. And most authors are paid advances of 550,000 or less... for the only thing they're contractually allowed to work on for those two years. That's less than you'd make in two years of a $15/hr minimum wage. This is designed to keep the author chained to the publisher that holds their most popular work, regardless of unfavorable terms, and stretch payments out so far that they'll accept the same bad terms just to make it to the next paycheck. Eliminating these clauses would force publishers to compete harder to keep their authors, and it would allow authors to publish more work in the genres they're already thriving in. It's 2023, folks. "Starving artist" is not a romantic ideal, it's a policy failure. This is one step towards fixing that."

Stacey	"Re: Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 Non-compete contracts are un-American on a fundamental level, at least when it comes to what we as a nation profess to be. If we actually hold "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" as an inherent right of the American people, then it is beyond absurd to allow an employer to have any say over how a worker conducts themselves when no longer working for them. Frankly, it's unacceptable to allow an employer any say over how a worker conducts themselves off the clock, too. The onus of maintaining healthy competition should not be placed on the worker."

Marilyn	"I support this proposed rule. There are many reasons that a person may want to change employers, some of them could be addressed by the employer (e.g., salary) and some perhaps not (scheduling around care of family members). Sometimes a person may be let go and it is not even their choice to leave the company. Employees should be able to control basic aspects of their own life without being forced to move or commute hours to obtain employment not affected by non-compete clauses."

Chaitanya	"I am a cardiologist who works in Washington State; I have a non-compete clause in my contract and it is a malicious clause that prevents me from continuing to care for my patients if the hospital system I work for created and environment for me to be terminated for cause and enforced the non compete clause. It is only detrimental to patient care and beneficial to the finances of large corporate hospital systems It should be abolished for the sake of patient care"
Norm	"Non-compete agreements only work if you have the financial resources to either tight or defend the agreement. As a CPA, I have been required to sign an agreement presented by my employer. And, now that I own my own practice, I have required my key employees to agree to non-competes. When I left my former employer (a "Big 4" accounting firm) to start my own business, before I even left employment I was threatened with "severe" litigation efforts if I attempted to solicit any clients. I had no chance of mounting a defense against an international business with deep pockets. So, when former clients searched me out, I had to turn them away even though I needed the business because I didn't want to be pounded into bankruptcy by my former employer. Fast forward 20 years and I'm parting ways with a former partner. We had both signed non-compete agreements. When she left to start her own practice, she willfully violated that agreement by soliciting all clients of our business and not just hers. During the preliminary process of filing suit against her, I was told by the mediator that these agreements are unenforceable because they restrict a professional's right to free trade. So, I essentially got shafted from both sides of the non-compete issue. Now, as a matter of course, I no longer require these agreements from my key employees. I take other measures to ensure that they would not be able to rob my business of its customers if they decided to strike out on their own. These documents should just go away. They're only a benefit to large businesses that can afford prolonged legal actions, even if there's no hope of them being enforced."
Martina	"Noncompete clauses are damaging to worker mobility. Virtually every job requires specific skills and domain specific knowledge. Those skills are enhanced and deepened through work and should be freely transferable to new positions. These clauses should not be permitted in employment contracts."
Robert	"I strongly support the proposed rule. With so few people protected by collective bargaining workers are at a serious disadvantage. This can be used to suppress wages. Also when used over and extended time prevents persons from leaving a low paying job. For doctors it interferes with the doctor patient relationship. Communities suffering from doctor shortages cannot have doctors laid off treating patients for periods of time or forced out of a community due these clauses."

Susan	"I believe noncompete clauses should be illegal and discontinued. Businesses and universities who use such clauses try to control their employees lives unfairly. The employees do not have the opportunity to search for a job with better working conditions, higher wages, or better opportunities. Under these clauses employees do not have the freedom to change jobs. This controls people's lives unfairly and causes them to have to move. It uproots people's lives. Doctors should under no circumstances have to sign a noncompete clause. It controls the life of the doctor and also the patients. I am very strongly opposed to noncompete clauses. Thank you, Susan J. Peck"
Laura M	"Physicians should not be subject to non- compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations (which I have suffered under) as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."
Tom	"I support the proposed ban. Non-competes have been used far beyond the originally intended high level executives and harm ordinary workers, ability to earn a fair wage for their labor. This is bad for businesses willing to pay qualified workers for their labor, and bad for our nation as it increases the wealth gap and income inequality."
annah	"I strongly support a policy to eliminate non-compete employment clauses, esp for employees making under $100k/year. It is ridiculous that fast food workers are unable to move between employers to take advantage of their skills."
anonymous	"I agree we should get rid of non-compete agreements. As a teacher, fitness clubs often have employers sign non competes so they are unable to work at

	local clubs. That means we have to travel to different districts area codes for a few hours of work to try and get a full time schedule. It hurts the industry."
Angie	"As a physician, I believe we must eliminate non-compete clauses in physician contracts. As hospital systems and/or private equity physician groups grow and merge to control larger areas of the country, these noncompete clauses become more and more onerous. Families and communities are disrupted because physicians will have to move out of state. The availability of specialized care may be limited if physicians are forced to move away due restrictive non complete causes. Communities deserve to retain their physicians that they know and from which they receive excellent care. Health care systems are now so large and powerful with preferred networks that single physicians leaving to other practices will have essentially no negative impact on the "business" that these gigantic hospital networks have become."
Jenna	"To whom it may concern. I am a veterinarian and while I can speak for the entirety of my profession and I know I represent a fair portion of my profession's support of this bill moving forward to remove non-competes. I personally can attest to the hardship that non-competes can create. When I needed to leave my first job out of vet school I had a 20 mile radius non-compete and in order to continue progressing my growth as a general practitioner veterinarian I had to completely move to another area of my state in order to find a good fit job and be outside this radius. I had to relocate to an area where I had not support system and less opportunities for my spouse to work in his field. Not everyone is fortunate enough to have the means to be able to afford to relocate or not have responsibilities that prevent them from being able to leave the area. The veterinary industry is in a shortage crisis due to many factors but non-competes are a contribution. Right now in the Veterinary Career Network job search engine there are 4,817 open positions for veterinary professionals (https://jobs.avma.org/). Some of these positions could be filled by vets who live within these areas but are unable to do so due to non-competes put in place by corporate and private practices alike. Employers must then advertise to vets outside of their area and focus financial means on relocation packages that they could be putting into retention packages or raises of the veterinary team to encourage members to stay, this leads to improved workplace morale and helps contribute to the other arms of the veterinary crisis which many vets are leaving the field entirely. Large animal veterinarians and specialist veterinarians are often the ones faced with the largest areas of non-competes. With the restrictions on specialists, this causes areas to be potentially deprived of important specialist services for the pet and livestock populations and leads to decreased quality care that can be offered which means certain conditions that could have been treated may be left untreated decreasing animal welfare and wellbeing and potentially leading to increased euthanasia in situations that otherwise may not need to have happened. The increased radius and increased likelihood of a large animal veterinarian having a non-compete is detrimental to the food animal and livestock

	veterinarian crisis. There is an estimated shortage in over 500 counties in 46 states of large animal veterinarians. (https://www.nifa.usda.gov/vmlrp-map). This shortage not only leads to compromised care of these species, leaving farmers to resort to taking care of their animals' medical needs to the best of their abilities but also affects human well-being and food safety. These vets are crucial to our safe animal protein food chain. When some of these individuals cannot practice large animal medicine within 50 miles of their previous employer for sometimes several years and relocation is not an option they often move into small animal medicine or leave the field. This then leaves the area they were serving now undeserved for large animals or even more underserved than what it was. I am very hopeful this legislation will be passed and the positive change that it will bring to my profession and therefore the positive impact it will have on pets and animals and the people who love and care for them. Best, Dr. Jenna Post, BVM&S, Medical Director"
Lis	"This is extremely important legislation to protect all industries and fair wages across all jobs and professions"
Denise	"Non-compete agreements have been abused for too long in order to prevent employees from accepting better offers from competitors. When I first read that fast food companies were using these clauses to prevent employees from moving to another "store" for a higher wage, I realized how abusive the use of this clause was being used. I agree that it is time to eliminate this practice and support the FTC in protecting workers rights and stopping this practice."
Eric	"Removing non-compete clauses will increase worker freedoms and improve the competitive incentives and quality of all businesses. This proposed rule must be implemented."
Hugo	"Hello as someone coming out of graduate school and training into a healthcare field with plenty of non compete clauses and fear this would be a game changer. Bad jobs keep people trapped in non competes due to fear and lack of mobilization within a county or city. I am all in favor of returning some of this ability back to the people and less on overwhelming and hard to deal with corporations. It's time this changed it'll create competition drive down prices."
Badeea	"This is important especially in a free market economy and when demand for healthcare is so high. Remove non compete clauses. Thank you for working in this!"
Toniann	"Don't forget the message: Support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses! Sample comment: I fully support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"

Kirsten	"Non compete clauses hurt workers ability to leave bad jobs and encourage employers to under pay/over work because they know the employee is trapped. It's un-American. Employees should compete with each other to retain the best talent by creating good jobs. Please give workers the ability to leave toxic places and still remain in their homes/cities/towns."
Miho	"Broad Non Solicits are commonly die work around for non competes in states that already ban non competes. Please include a ban on employers imposing non solicit as well as non compete agreements. Otherwise a ban on non compete is meaningless Thank you."
Keenan	"I agree with the banning of non compete agreements. These agreements are always against the best interests of the workers. They stifle competition, dissuade innovation and entrepreneurial, and handcuff employees."
Laura	"I strongly support this federal regulation and know it is needed. In my career, I worked for at least 3 firms that routinely used outrageous non-compete clauses to lock in workers, both professional and non-professional. The effect was stunning, closing doors for any opportunity to take a promotion with another firm because I carried the stigma of potential legal action, which at least one of these fmns routinely pursued, to keep the rest of their employees "in line." In my case, there was only one way to avoid die non-compete clause, and that was to leave without employment, and become an independent contractor, which professionals with families found very risky. If your ideas were unwelcome or unheard, you had no avenue to explore pursuit of those innovations. Folks were routinely told to shut up and go back to the assigned work. How much innovation has already been squandered? Time to change this situation."
Alexander	"BAN NONCOMPETE AGREEMENTS! great work! Ignore chamber of commerce"
Brett	"I've been subject to such non-competes. I wasn't an executive with vast inside knowledge, I was just a worker like any other, trying to get paid so I can afford food, shelter, and healthcare. These agreements put the onus on workers, often have illegal restrictions that the worker would have to hire a lawyer to be aware of and fight, and generally end up protecting the businesses from the common requirement of keeping their workers willing to work for them by removing alternative. I later moved to state (WA) where non-competes are limited. And I see no vast problems - in fact, those states that ban, limit, or restrict non-competes are often viewed as innovative with healthier markets."

Vanessa	"I strongly support the proposal to ban non competes. I am a veterinary medical oncologist and non-competes have restricted me from helping patients and their families even in areas where there was no other veterinary oncologist. The corporations veterinarians work for do not own a veterinarians education, bedside manner or medical expertise. To restrict them from using their skills to help patients is absolutely unfair. Non competes make it extremely difficult and often impossible to leave a bad work situation without having to also uproot your family and move a long distance way. In the case of veterinary specialists they often would have to move out of state in order to find work outside of their non compete radius. Please pass this proposal so that patients and their families are not preventing from accessing the services they so desperately want. Thank you, Vanessa Rizzo, DVM, ACVIM (0)"
Pamela	"I support the FTC's rule to ban the use of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. These clauses hurt workers and stifle competition."
George	"Any non-compete agreement is a restraint of trade, and an attempt to abridge our most fundamental freedom, the pursuit of happiness. No one should ever submit to the demand that they sign a non compete agreement. And the law should absolutely prevent them from ever being faced with the choice to keep their employment or submit to the compulsion to sign."
George	"Non competes are Extortion. I have experienced being told that I must agree to give up my opportunity for career advancement, if I want to keep my job and have any hope liar advancement in my current position. This demand held out a false promise. Those who sign such an agreement, immediately lost all the leverage that might have ever had to make their employer improve their wages or offer advancement. They lost it because after making that agreement they can no longer leave their current and take a better job in their chosen field. This kind of offer should be illegal. It is extortion and it is fraudulent if it is not accompanied with an immediate significant promotion or salary increase with a clearly documented career promotion and cost of living salary advancement plan leading to retirement and a pension."
Cynthia	"Please ban non-compete clauses required by employers from employees. Regular working folks deserve the right to work where and with whomever they wish. Competition between companies for good workers is good for our citizens. As a worker's skills and knowledge improve over time, workers should have the right to work for higher pay at a different company."
Julie	"Please consider eliminating this ridiculous rule hampering the rights of workers. No one should be penalized for looking to move on from one job to a better opportunity."

Rachel	"I support this rule that determines non-compete clauses to be an unfair anti-competitive practice. As a veterinarian, I have personally been subject to non-compete clauses and found them to be onerous and offensive to my status as an educated professional. Moreover, they make it difficult to attract new qualified staff to small businesses, because qualified staff dissatisfied with their wages or treatment at larger companies are often restricted from finding new work within a certain radius of their old company. Instead, they relocate to work for another large company in another city. Banning non-compete clauses would benefit workers of every economic status and also small business owners."
Susan	"I was an independent contractor for 25 years doing clinical trial monitoring mostly for pharmaceutical companies. All of my contracts included a NC clause. As a self-employed consultant with my own LLC, these blanket NC clauses infringed on my ability to conduct business. I was NOT involved, nor knew about proprietary information beyond the scope of the trial protocol (which is public on clinical trials.gov) If I was working on, say a Parkinson's clinical trial, that company may require that I sign a contract that includes language stating I could not work on a different neurological trial for a different company for 2 years in the future. This impeded my ability to run my business. I was no longer in a contract with them, yet they were dictating how I may do business. The scope of this practice is unfair and biased. Gig workers and others should be able to conduct their business with no shackles."
Erik	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Ramona	"I absolutely support the FTC banning non compete clauses imposed by employers. I work in healthcare and Non compete clauses not only have the effect of suppressing salaries and competition within healthcare workers, but also adversely affect patient care by denying them the right to see a provider of their choice, wherever that provider may choose to work. Are we free in this country to work where we choose or not? Are patients free to follow a provider of their choice or not? Under the current situation everyone involved loses except the employer."

Anna	"Please stop allowing employers to make employees sign non compete agreements. It will make employers work harder to retain their employees and will help with stopping exploitation of workers."
Gary	"yes! non compete is a serious breach of personal freedom."
Sarah	"Many of the comments I've read are from physicians who are locked into their positions. Unfortunately, this is not a surprise as many reputable academic institutions impose noncompete agreements on their clinicians. This practice is counter to the mission of academic medical centers to improve healthcare for the community. They result in less diversification of the healthcare workforce as waivers of noncompete agreements are applied discriminately and without transparency, resulting in widening of gender and wage gaps. Further, women are less likely to negotiate noncompete agreements compared with men (Starr et al. Journal of Law and Econ 2021). Physicians who belong to underrepresented groups experience higher rates of discrimination in academic medicine (Nunez-Smith, NI et al. J Gen Int Med 2009), but noncompete agreements can prevent them from speaking up due to fear of retaliation. The public is also harmed by physician non-compete agreements as covenants with a large geographic radius may drive subspecialized physicians out of the state, resulting in poor access to subspecialized care for patients. They also disrupt the doctor-patient relationship resulting in fragmented care for vulnerable groups who may not be able to navigate the system on their own. I write this in the hope that academic medical centers are not excluded from the proposed law due to "non-profit" status. The reason the non-compete agreements exist is because these organizations operate as for-profit businesses."
Rebecca	"Ban non competes! Even if they are rarely enforced they have a huge chilling effect. They are bad for workers and ultimately bad for our economy. More freedom to change jobs will help in a labor shortage and will drive competition and innovation. These serve nobody except employers in the short term."
Nathaniel	"Noncompete clauses limit workers options, finances and futures even long after they've left jobs. The extension of the practice to jobs outside of the C-suite has shifted the balance of power on the labor force overwhelmingly toward employers and left countless workers locked out of industries in which they are ready and willing to work in. The use indiscriminate use of noncompete clauses is dragging our workforce down and holding back the economy, even as employers struggle to fill positions. I am writing to ask you to please pass the proposed limits on noncompete clauses. It's the right thing to do for millions of workers, for the economy, and for our country. Thank you."

David	"I support the banning of the non-compete clause. Enough said. Please pass it into law."
Alexandra	"Non-compete clauses unfairly prevent me from making a living in the town where I live, and give my employer unfair advantage in salary negotiations. Given the challenges in healthcare today, I would rather prematurely quit practicing as a physician than allow my future to be determined by a non-compete clause, as will many more physicians who are a valued and necessary resource for society."
Aaron	"I fully support the proposed rule. I favor it for the protections given employees, regardless of the economic benefit at large as indicated by research."
Olivia	"I am a 26-year-old graduate student who will be entering the full-time workforce in June 2023. Non-compete clauses could hurt my ability to change jobs and advance in my career, and could force me into difficult situations. I should not have to decide between leaving a job with a toxic work environment or abusive boss and moving to another city or changing professions altogether. Furthermore, these types of clauses give companies more power over low-income employees, locking employers into a race to the bottom rather than competing for talent with better wages and benefits. Don't capitulate to big business interests. End non-compete clauses for everyone."
Kimberly	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I support this rule change because I was personally limited by a non-compete clause during employment in Washington State. I left the field for six months so I could go to work for a competitor. I am not sure how a six-month hiatus truly helps the employer. I do know how it held back my employment opportunities and wages."
Heather	"Non-competes are unethical and not at all patient-centered, They are the exact opposite of "life, liberty and pursuit of happiness". They are arbitrary and offensive and only serve greedy employers who can't find other ways to retain employees."
Benjamin	"Pass the rule. "Non-compete" clauses are, in fact, anti-competition and, therefore, anti-capitalist. They have no place in our economy, certainly not if we want it to be a competitive one that is constantly innovating to keep us ahead in the international sphere. Pass the Non-Compete Clause Rule."
Herbert J.	"Every day through the country employers terminate roles and employees in an effort to do what is best for the business financially. Employees deserving the same right to change roles and companies to pursue opportunities that benefit them in the same way. It's time to end this unfair advantage given to businesses and prohibit non compete clauses."

Linda	"As an engineer, I was subjected to and refused to sign a contract containing a overreaching non-compete clause. Here, Company X produced Technology A. The contract would have prohibited me from working on any project at any company that worked on Technology A, as well as all customers of its customers. So not only would it have prohibited working on any other project at Company Y, but it would have prohibited me from working in any US government job if the government was a customer of Company X. I refused to sign it, and they did offer me a more limited clause. But I didn't last there for very long. It's amazing how these corporate lawyers don't even try to write a fair contract."
Sofia	"I am strongly in support of banning noncompete clauses. People should be able to work without fear of being ineligible to walk again if they are laid off or need to switch to a different employer for a different reason."
Tianci	"Non competes restrict competition between employers as a result negatively impacts workers. Workers are essentially forced into signing a contract that heavily restricts what they can do to advance their careers"
Nicholas	"I support the proposal to eliminate non-compete clauses. Non-compete clauses make it more difficult for workers to earn a wage that is commensurate with their experience and expertise. In addition, they create an unreasonable barrier to someone leaving a place of employment in situations where the motivation may not be financial, but instead to switch to a better working environment or arrangement."
Reza	"Non-compete agreement is hurtful to the economy it block workers to make living and in many cases is used to reduce employees' options and as a result keep wages down. There are already many legal tools available to companies to protect their IP. The don't need this"
Jamil	"It is time to end non-competes."
Anita	"I support banning non-compete clauses in contracts. The non-compete principle creates a situation where the employee becomes a commodity, and employers can hold more power over the employee than what is reasonable. As a physician, I have seen patients suffer when work conditions for the physician become intolerable or unethical, and the physician is forced to totally leave the community they have established themselves in because of a non- compete. Patients are often not told about the physician's departure or whereabouts but are expected to accept the next physician who replaces the first. In this way, the patients are also treated as commodities for the institution's benefit. Employers argue that their investments in recruiting must

	be recouped. I argue that if facilities focused on becoming culturally sound organizations, they would not need enormous signing bonuses and recruitment shenanigans to fill their empty slots. In my most recent negotiations, I have refused to sign non-compete clauses. Let's put more heart and soul into business relationships by stopping this practice that makes the employee a slave to their organization. I have started a medical practice and we will not use non-compete clauses. Physicians wishing to join our organization will not receive signing bonuses and excessive monies will not be used in recruitment. Physicians joining us will have the ability to build their practices and be free agents, able to practice their art. They will be paid what they earn, so will not owe the company anything. If something in their situation changes, they will be able to make the best decision possible for themselves, their families and their patients without concern or a restriction on where they can practice. Please make a ban on non-compete clauses a reality."
Michael	"I am a new graduate family nurse practitioner who just signed my first non-compete. The stipulations are clearly meant to protect the organization and not public health. The clause states I cannot work for another company, for 18 months who is in the same county or the neighboring counties. I cannot work for another healthcare agency due to business conflicts. The non-compete clause comes from a Federally Qualified Health Center and it will take the government to correct this issue. Please do away with these restrictions and allow providers the ability to provide care for their communities."
Aayan	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements. I personally signed a noncompete agreement at my first job, and shortly after, I turned down a better job offer because it would have violated my noncompete agreement. Later, I found out that the noncompete agreement I signed is unenforceable in the state of Washington, where I live, because I have a low income, so I could have taken that better job. It would be much easier if noncompetes were banned altogether to avoid this kind of misleading business practice and stifling of opportunity. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
June	"Please ban the non compete agreement. My daughter is a licensed esthetician and with the current hours her job provided for her, she has been reduced to working 3 days a week at $15/hr when she has no clients and a mere 5% commission on services. her last paycheck was barely $900. Yet

	according to the non compete, she is not allowed to work at another spa/salon as an esthetician, or open her own business, currently and for a year after leaving this job within the range of 50 miles. Living in Seattle, WA, the current rate they pay her is not enough to pay her bills. Seattle is her home and she should not have to move 30 miles away to get another job or open my own business in the field that she paid $20,000 for school and hundreds of dollars to take my state board test and obtain my esthetician license. Not to mention, she went to school during the height of COVID. Please stop these employers from crippling lower wage earners and not allowing my daughter and others to creating a higher income for through entrepreneurship. Thank you."
Rick	"I am very excited to see the FTC pick up this issue. I believe non-competes are terrible and have even had a job offer rescinded because I requested to have the non-compete clause in the employment agreement deleted. They were never the right solution and have only become worse over time. If an employer really values an employee, they should do everything to demonstrate that to the employee. They should never be allowed to stop a worker from seeking employment elsewhere. I'm very happy to also see the rescinding of existing non-competes included as part of this proposed rule. Sometimes as workers, we find ourselves in a situation where we need to accept a job offer even when it came with a restrictive non-compete clause due to other circumstances in our lives. It is great to know we'll be protected too and have these wrongs righted should this rule pass."
Matthew	"I support this rule and I hope it is implemented. I am a worker, not an employer, but I have worked for multiple companies and have felt the shadow of non-complete causes cast over my work multiple times. I want to add that while many non-complete causes specify a geographic region, the remote work model, which is quite populate and effective for knowledge and information workers, makes it so that even a non-complete cause that is limited to a geographic region very restrictive for a person seeking employment outside of their current job."
Michael	"Workers should be free to leave any job and seek one that suits them without restrictions!"
Michael	"People should be FREE to choose the workplace that makes sense to them and be FREE to change employers when they want! No one should be "imprisoned" in a job that does not work for them!"
James	"Non-compete clauses area tool abused by companies to control their employees and punish them when they look for new employment. They should be a relic of the past and done away with as soon as possible."

Carrie	"I'm highly in favor of this. My husband was a physician and we had to move because his it covered a 30 mile radius. My kid had to change schools and we both had to get new jobs. Absolutely ridiculous. The current employer couldn't "afford" him because of poor business choices and yet we suffered."
Angie	"Non-compete clauses should be abolished for all positions. This would allow more competition to keep workers therefore increasing wages and improving benefits. Healthcare workers especially need this abolished to allow for fair compensation in a time when many are leaving the profession. Please abolish all non- compete clauses."
Elizabeth	"You should ban non compete agreements. I should be allowed to work in the field I choose for higher wages ."
Scott	"Non compete agreements kill the ability of millions to secure fair compensation to protect the ability of a very few to collect millions and billions in profit. Non competes are monopolistic in the worst way and affect nearly every skilled person working in corporate America. Get rid of them ASAP!"
Arlene	"Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC estimates that banning non-compete contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by 8300 billion per year. Original Comment Prevent non-complete clauses. Non-compete clauses make it harder to move on from a job that underpays or mistreats you, by allowing your former employer to sue you if you go to work for another company in the same industry. The FTC estimates that banning non-compete contracts would open new job opportunities for 30 million Americans and raise wages by $300 billion per year
Ronald	"I want to express my vigorous support for eliminating employee non-compete clauses. I have always found it interesting that the owners of large businesses love to wax poetic on how wonderful competition is, but their actions show just how much they loathe competition. Forcing non-compete clauses on workers is an excellent example of this These non-compete clauses exist simply to make workers more desperate, willing to work more hours in more dangerous conditions for ever shrinking pay and benefits. I was also happy to see that you addressed overly broad NDA's in the rule. I think the rule as proposed is well written and would support its adoption as is."
Adam	"My significant other is a doctor and we had to uproot more than 50 miles from one of her previous employers because of a non-complete clause she

	was forced to sign. It is unethical, in my mind, to remove choice from employment for any American citizen; healthcare workers should absolutely NOT be held hostage like this (nor should anyone else, for that matter). Please make non-compete clauses illegal."
Charles	"I understand the need for some corporations to protect their intellectual property, but the good is far outweighed by the negative. Negatives include stifling employee freedom, bargaining ability, and the freedom of choice, especially for those in the most demanding jobs like health care and food service."
Peter	"I strongly agree with this proposed rule. Non-compete clauses are anti-competitive measures that stifle competition, reduce consumer choice, suppress innovation and economic development. In a free market capitalist economy, all workers should be free to move employers and continue working in the industries and specializations in which they base their careers freely. A worker who disagrees with the business decisions of their employer should be free to voluntarily leave and enter business for themselves or with a competitor, provided they do not violate their ex-employer's intellectual property rights, and seek to compete with them directly. This rule change will invigorate the American economy to be more dynamic and create a level playing field between entrenched corporations that dominate their fields, and those seeking to challenge their market dominance"
Blair	"I support banning non-compete agreements. I agree with the analysis presented that corporations forcing employees to sign non-compete agreements are UNFAIR methods used to prevent competition. I support the authority of the FTC to regulate this arena and ban such agreements."
Jonathan	"To the chairman: I write in enthusiastic support of the FTC's proposed rule to ban the routine use of noncompete agreements in employment contracts. The widespread use of noncompetes does direct injury to large numbers of American workers seeking fair, market-based compensation and working conditions. The FTC has correctly cited evidence of abusive enforcement of noncompete agreements involving low-level employees possessing no knowledge of corporate trade secrets or intellectual property. The net effect of such agreements cannot be to protect corporate assets, but is used simply to provide an advantage in employment negotiations, thus depressing the wages of millions of Americans. As such, the widespread use of noncompete agreements is clearly an unfair practice affecting commerce, and is obviously within the legal regulatory authority of the FTC as outlined in U.S. Code § 45. I am a practicing physician who signed an employment contract containing a noncompete agreement in 2012, entering into this agreement with an organization that no longer exists. My original employer merged with, and was made subsidiary to, a new organization that is run under religious principles in conflict with my own. This new organization does not negotiate my compensation in good faith, and has reduced my compensation despite increases in my productivity. I would have never signed such an agreement with my new employer, yet I am bound to this organization under threat of legal coercion. To be clear, the forced compromise of my religious principles does direct harm to me. My only recourse to this coercion is to give up medical practice anywhere covered by my current medical license, which is injurious to the patients in my care, and to myself. For the good of the millions of American workers trapped in this system of peonage, I urge the FTC to enact the proposed rule."

Judith	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Steve	"I am strongly apposed to non compete clauses. Rather than protect employers, in reality, it hurts employees. I was laid off from employment in my early 60s and was held to a non compete agreement. I was prohibited from employment in my field for a year, which severely limited my job prospects. My field was highly competitive and fast moving with constant innovation and updating of information to begin with, but a year on the sidelines waiting for a non compete to expire was an unnecessary restriction adding to the difficulty."
Angelique	"I believe abolishing these kinds of agreements is die right thing to do, not only for the individual workers, but for the sake of the innovation and market competition we all benefit from."
Terry	"Anybody that supports the noncompete rule is a major media concern or someone bought by them. dNO brainer. Get rid of it."
George	"No more Non-Competes"
Dolly and Roy	"The working people of the United States support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down and harm working people. Please do something for the people who are the backbone of America for once."
Ted	"Noncompete agreements stifle competition in our economy and hurt workers by reducing options for employment. It is far past time that government reigned in these abusive agreements. They should be banned so that companies and workers both are able to compete on their respective merits rather than limiting worker choice via restrictive agreements."
Coby	"Non-compete clauses are anticompetitive by design, and hurt workers. Not being able to work for a competitor of a current or previous employer hurts my chances of finding work if I leave my job, even on good terms. In fact, a competitor in the same space is much more likely to hire me because that is the space my most recent experience is in, so non-competes rule out my BEST chance of finding employment again. I am strongly in favor of this regulation."

Lindsay	"non-competes as they stand would rather a person leave a field altogether. in this time of worker shortage, who does that serve? forcing physicians to move or retire when their working conditions are untenable is a gross violation of our own duties to care. there are no trade secrets leaving a hospital when a physician leaves. there are already anti-solicitation rules on the books, so hospitals would not risk losing patients due to physician malfeasance. it is why I as a pediatrician will never sign a contract. my work is a calling, not indentured servitude."
Robert	"Non-competes are now shackling workers with the fewest options and lowest wages. Ban exploitative non-competes. Don't let greed cripple our economy, innovation and a willing pool of workers."
Jeremy	"As an author, non- compete clauses in publishing contracts significantly hamper my ability to make a good living. They create a situation in which publisher's production schedules, rather than my ability to write, restricts my income. Publishers cannot publish fiction as quickly as authors can write it. Which is fair -- if I sell a book to a publisher, and they only want one book from me that year, it's their right not to publish another book from me. However, non-compete clauses prevent me from taking that book to another publisher and selling it, which means that my only option is to sit on the book while I wait until my publisher's production schedule is ready for another book from me. This is an exploitative practice that only serves the interests of the publisher and in no way serves authors interests. Publishers do not want the authors they publish to sell books to their competitors for obvious reasons, but instead of participating in a competitive system in which they have to pay authors for those books they exploit non-compete clauses to prevent authors from taking those books to market at all, even prohibiting authors from self-publishing books that the publishing company is not interested in buying but feels would compete with the books that they have agreed to publish. This system threes authors to swallow artificially created opportunity costs. It is not a fair system for authors, particularly given publishers control the release schedule for novels under contract. This means that even after an author turns in a book to their publisher, the clock on their non- compete timeline does not start ticking down until the publishing company actually releases the novel - - which can be months or years after the author has finished writing. I urge the FTC to correct this imbalance in the publishing industry, which favors massive corporations over the artists and creators who are the beating heart and soul of the industry, without whom the publishing companies would have no product to sell to begin with."

Kenneth	"I am writing to express my strong opposition to the American Hospital Association's (AHA) attempt to exempt physicians from the new rule prohibiting noncompete agreements. As someone who believes in protecting workers rights, I find this proposed exemption deeply concerning. Furthermore, I believe that noncompete agreements stifle innovation and growth, and render patients captive to healthcare systems that have little incentive to improve their care delivery. Exempting physicians from this noncompete clause rule would harm both the workers and the local patient populations that we serve. Noncompete agreements are often used by corporations to restrict the movement of their employees, making it difficult for workers to leave unfavorable work conditions or negotiate better terms. Physicians, like any other employee, should be free to seek better employment opportunities without fear of legal repercussions. Exempting physicians from the noncompete rule would only serve to benefit hospital corporations at the expense of the workers. It would allow these corporations to maintain a stranglehold on their employees and limit competition, which could lead to lower wages, fewer benefits, and overall worse working conditions for physicians. I urge the FTC to reject the AHA's proposed exemption and uphold the noncompete rule for all workers, including physicians. It is essential to protect workers' rights and promote a fair and competitive job market. Thank you for your attention to this matter. Sincerely, A concerned physician."
June	"I strongly approve die regulation change and update. I understand there are sufficient exceptions built into the new regulation to offer common sense relief if indicated. To make low wage workers, whether employees or gig workers, sign a non-compete gets very close to condemning them to slavery. The power imbalance is clear and immoral. Likewise, it's un-American that middle or higher wage earners be constrained by these contracts that block innovation, or movement to a job better suited for both employee and employer. Enforcing a non-compete even after a person has been laid off is even more immoral, likely condemning them to a lower paying job outside their field."
Anne	"Non-compete clauses hamper many people's career development. They only serve to help the employer continue to offer low wages to a captive work force."
Janice	"I support die FTC's proposal to ban the Non-Compete Clause Rule. This rule has been used by employers to keep wages low and opportunities limited for low/middle wage earning people who simply want to work. There are other rules in place (Non-Disclosure) that protect employers from former employees sharing proprietary infomation/technology belonging to their companies. Non-Completes simply put handcuffs on workers."

James	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to urge you to ban non-compete clauses for all employees, including physicians. As you know, non-compete clauses restrict an employee's ability to work for a competitor for a certain period of time after leaving a job. While these clauses may be useful in protecting a company's proprietary information, they can have a significant negative impact on employees and the public. In particular, non-compete clauses for physicians can have a devastating effect on patient care. If a physician is prohibited from treating patients within a certain geographic area, it can limit access to healthcare for individuals in need. This is especially concerning in rural areas, where there may be only a few physicians available to treat a large population. Additionally, non-compete clauses can limit career opportunities for physicians and discourage them from seeking employment in certain areas. This can exacerbate physician shortages and reduce access to healthcare for patients. Furthermore, non-compete clauses allow enterprises and institutions to pay below market rates, fail to improve their services and/or their working conditions and severely disadvantage employees with limited resources. Junior faculty members in academic institutions sometimes owe hundreds of thousands of dollars in student loans and despite having finished medical training have little resources to move families, find new jobs, places to live and establish their professional identities. Large academic and "not-for-profit" institutions dominate the market in many regions and essentially collude to maintain the lowest wages and lowest rate of job transition, solely for their own financial motives. This is not beneficial for patient care or for the individuals. Therefore, I strongly urge you to include physicians in any ban on non-compete clauses. It is crucial that we prioritize patient care, ensure that individuals have access to the healthcare services they need and improve the working conditions and care provided in our health care system. By prohibiting non-compete clauses for physicians, we can help to increase access to healthcare and improve the overall quality of care. Thank you for your attention to this important matter. Sincerely, James Town"
Greg	"After working as an Operating Engineer for 22 years, I've seen the negative impact of non-compete clause toward individuals and their families This is just common sense and time to resolve. I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth!"
Clovv	"I support banning non-compete clauses. Employees need the freedom to change their work situation, and their expertise shouldn't belong to their former employers."
David	"Eliminating non-compete clauses is something I totally support. I personally know of a young man stuck at a job at a company more than an hour's drive from his house. A similar job is available to him at a company much closer to his house, but because of a non-compete agreement, he would have to be out of work for a period of time before he could take the new job. His family cannot afford him to be not working, so he is stuck unless this obstacle is eliminated."

Eric	"I wanted to share my support for making non-competes a thing of the past. When I entered my first career as an adult, I spend 5 years learning the industry and perfecting my craft. I was still new to the workforce and didn't know how underpaid I was. When an opportunity for a promotion position at another company came my way, I took it and put in my two weeks. The owner of my previous company called me directly, told me he had no intentions of letting me go to a competitor. He flaunted the non-compete and threatened to take me to court, strip me of all my certifications. Or I could remain employed for him. This was a terrifying experience for someone who was still getting accustomed to the adult world. I was stressed, reading the non- compete and searching for state laws that didn't provide much clarity. I ended up calling the owners bluff, and thankfully he backed off. I hope you all find that these non-competes unlawful and abusive, so that no other young worker is manipulated by employers using scare-tactics."
J	"Having been forced to sign "Non Competes" as a condition of employment, I am "for" banning them nationwide. It is an unfair labor practice. Not much different in spirit from what the Shennan act was designed to protect our economy from. Companies attempt to monopolize their labor force. As most economists will agree, it's really not in a company's best interest to do this in the first place. It does inhibit growth and opportunity for the employees and though they don't see it, for the employers as well. The NFL has free agency-so should the rest of us. If there is a specific technical secret that a company wishes former employees not to share with their new employer then that's what copyrights/patents are for. At worst case maybe an NDA could be used with a time limit, but should only be used if a knowledge inherently specific to the former employers business advantage in the market place can be proved. Again best handled through patents and copyrights. Not geographic limitations. Let's do away with this hamstringing of us blue collar guys, sales guys, project managers, even technical design guys. Please free up the employee market place once and for all! Attachments This verbiage should be banned"
Natalie	"I am a physician and non competes HURT physicians, healthcare staff, AND patients. Please get rid of them! They only benefit large corporations who have no incentive to listen to health care workers concerns (why worry about safe staffing, physician/nurse/healthcare burnout, etc when they are powerless to leave, and you can make more profits?)."
Rachel	"I strongly support the FTC's proposed rule to ban noncompete clauses. These clauses often force workers to remain in their current jobs, which may pay less or have worse work environments than other companies, or risk them being shut out of their industry altogether if they decide to move jobs."

	These clauses practically enslave workers to one company, ensuring their personal or financial loss if they want to change jobs. These clauses are inherently exploitative and hamper innovation while reducing wages, all of which leads to a lower quality of life for each individual stuck under one, as well as their families and the country as a whole by stagnating the economy and suppressing innovation. The freedom to change jobs is core to economic liberty and to a competitive, thriving economy. Ending this practice would have positive effects, not just for the workers, but for companies, the economy and the country. Ending non-compete clauses would promote greater dynamism and healthy competition, as well as giving peace of mind and freedom to workers across the country. I fully support this proposed rule and would like to see it made law."
Nidhi	"Please make non-compete illegal. Yes, it protects small business, but if you work at Amazon and are an sde, you cannot work in retail, healthcare, video streaming, cloud technology, food industry and so much more. And they don't even have specific rules that you can not work the same industry, it is very loosely based and open for interpretation. So from workers point of view, after working in those giants you have very limited places to work. And that too for not some short period, but for 18 months! Non-compete hurts people to make a job change in their own domain, so they have to go find new domain. But new domain will not accept them in interview for higher level positions as they don't have the background. So for individual contributors this works against them. Please support individual workers by removing non-compete agreements."
Gabriela	"Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."

Peter	"Yes! I support banning non-compete clauses because they unfairly hams workers."
Logan	"I am strongly in favor of opening the labor market and restricting non-compete clauses. I work in medicine and these clauses are burdensome and allow exploitation and pressure of employees without adding any benefit to patients. They are added to all contracts indiscriminately, even in fields of medicine that do not carry regular scheduled patients such as Emergency Medicine and Urgent Care. Many colleagues have had to drive 60+ mi for 1.5 years after working under a restrictive contract, only to return back to their home community after the duration had been served. Noncompete contracts are heavily restricted for lawyers. How about we pass the same benefits onto the rest of the people by restricting these burdensome clauses for all other professions. Let's keep contracts competitive by restricting non-competes."
Kathryn	"Non-compete agreements are entirely one-sided and abusive. It should not be legal for a former employer to have any power over someone who does not work for them. They should be banned."
Xuan Mai	"By preventing a former associate from working in the region, it restricts the ability of clients to choose their veterinarian." Non competes for veterinarians throttles the profession's ability to thrive, prevents veterinarians are prevented from making optimal use of their talents, prevents pet owners from making choices for the health of their pets and the relationships they've formed with the medical team members that can become essential in their pet's wellness. By stifling competition, it benefits the former employer at the expense of economic health of the entire industry. Non competes take away the choice of an employee to set professional and personal boundaries and creates a culture of toxicity and abuse. In a field where mental health has become a crisis, where we have lost innumerable colleagues to burnout-causing a mass exodus of the profession ,and contributing to the suicide rate of our colleagues, non- competes add an additional barrier to providing a healthier environment for individual veterinarians, and therefore the profession itself to thrive."
Terry	"I strongly support the Federal Trade Commission's proposal to federally ban non-compete agreements. It's the right thing to do. For decades, exploitative non-compete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning non-compete agreements will help lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes, and thereby strengthening America."

Ann	"Non competes are a waste of paper. They are used to keep people stagnant in their work, keep wages lower, and make mobility more difficult. This 100% should go through. They rarely go to court because they have no teeth, and are a waste of resources for the over burdened legal community. Non disclosures are the real protection for companies sensitive info, and people should be allowed mobility for growth."
Siamak	"Hello, I very much support ending non-compete agreements. The free market is supposed to be free."
Amy	"Please ban noncompete contracts for individuals. Especially hourly and low wage workers. Thank you."
Colin	"Non-compete clauses may be justified for individuals who possess detailed and essential private business knowledge, like corporate executives, who could compellingly undermine the fundamentals of an entire corporate organization. It is absurd on the other hand to force employees like personal trainers at a gym (speaking from personal experience) to enter non-compete agreements. It is bad for the macro and micro economies of the country and its communities, and the career development and buying power of its citizens, which rely in large part on COMPETITIVE salaries to make a living, build wealth, and invest in their families and communities."
Mark	"I am highly in favor of this Rule in that the non-compete clauses of worker contracts are blatant collars around the necks of workers who are entitled to search elsewhere for higher wages and better working conditions, a fundamental right in a free America. These clauses' removal in CA were a great contributor to the success of Silicone Valley. Any politician or judge that speaks against them should be examined for their allegiance to corporate interests -- unprincipled corporations would of course prefer to leave them in when it hamstring workers and commands their loyalties beyond what is to their basic wellbeing."
Stacy	"We should absolutely make these non-compete clauses illegal in this country. Corporate greed is out of control and these CEOs are insane"

Stephen	"Non competes put an unfair burden on workers. This does not seem to be fair to the American people. Please ban non competes"
Rachel	"as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed I am a nurse in community health - we need physicians to be able to change jobs within the community!"
Lori	"I am in support of you eliminating the non-compete clause currently used by many employers. The clause definitely harms those who must sign one to be employed by limiting their future opportunities (definition of wealth). It also harms the economy. Covid clearly showed that the clause hurt our medical system nationwide. Doctors/nurses/etc who quit jobs during Covid, were unable to re-enter the medical sector in another position unless they moved. Many of them were trapped into either not working for a year or more, or working in another field entirely (and then choosing to stay out of the medical field altogether!). My son-in-law is currently trapped in his current position as a physician, with no way out unless he moves, takes on a hefty commute, or leaves the medical field entirely... Likewise my daughters (nurse and pharmacist), and another son-in-law employed by a large company that makes medical testing equipment. Our highly educated and highly paid workers should not be subjected to what essentially works out to be a long term loss of opportunity (again, the definition of wealth). Competition is healthy for our economy and population. It was said very well in the article above: 'The freedom to change jobs is core to economic liberty and to a competitive, thriving economy,' said Chair Lina M. Khan. "Noncompetes block workers from freely switching jobs, depriving them of higher wages and better working conditions, and depriving businesses of a talent pool that they need to build and expand. By ending this practice, the FTC's proposed rule

	would promote greater dynamism, innovation, and healthy competition." Please put an end to the entrapment caused by the non-complete clause. It is an unfortunate strangle-hold on too many of our working force. It seems so UN-American. I can see so many benefits to ending it. Please make it illegal. Lori"
Jeff	"As a Software Engineer working in the private technology sector, it is an open secret within the industry that many if not all non-compete clauses are unenforceable due to the transferable nature of skills, inter-organizational collaborations, and shared technology within the industry. The fact that these clauses are unenforceable, however, does not dissuade organizations from pushing them very aggressively and in such a way that suggests the employee could be litigated into oblivion. Even if unenforceable, this practice causes many voices to fall silent and has a tangible effect on the individual workers that is not unlike the threats and risks that come with pro-union sentiments. I would like to speak in favor of this rule that will leave Non-Compete clauses far less appetizing to employers, even as a bluff"
Rob	"I support outlawing non competes. This will help workers allowing them more work opportunities and removing obstacles to higher paychecks that they can put into buying a home, investing in their kids (or their own) education, and generally better themselves. I doubt employers are as helpless as their lobbyists make them out to be; do right by your employees, not your shareholders, and you should have nothing to worry about."
Julene	"Support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses! I've had two careers, as a laboratory technician, then went back to school for a Masters in counseling, I did what was social work for eighteen years and now am a psychotherapist. The freedom to not be tied to a job, to be able to grow is an important mental health factor, to always know you can grow and change. These non-compete clauses bind people into a job that can be abusive. Please support this ban."
Alexander	"If employers want non-competes, they should have to pay the employee their prior wages for the duration of the non-compete. That said, even that would be incredibly onerous for employees as many would have difficulties switching to better paying jobs. Under this system of liberal capitalism, we are supposedly neither slaves nor serfs, we are not property, and yet, employers are allowed to maintain ownership over our labor, even after they have terminated our employment or we have sought employment elsewhere."
Kaylin	"As a person affected by a non-compete in my past, I find non-competes to be severely restricting to professional career growth of the associate required to sign and quite damaging to rural America's ability to find veterinary care. I am a veterinarian and all jobs I could find when I graduated vet school required that I sign a non-compete, so I had no option not to sign

	one if I were to find employment. Although my first boss occasionally worked throughout the county, I rarely worked outside of the clinic. However, my non-compete consisted of excluding my ability to work as a veterinarian in all forms (clinical or industry) throughout the entire county (4,311 mil) for 2 years should I leave employment with my boss. This first job was within a rural and semi-rural county. Due to severely poor medical standards and discriminatory behavior, I needed to leave that position a year after being hired. Although the theory in my state is that "non-competes are unenforceable," my boss promised to sue me should I find a job within that non-compete boundary as he had done for previous employees so that even if he didn't win, it would still cost me my time and legal fees to defend myself. This required me to sell my recently purchased, affordable home and move 200 miles away to find another job as a small-animal veterinarian in an urban area. It was 6 years before I could afford to purchase a home again in this new area. Because of that non-compete, I could no longer provide a poorly served area with mixed and large animal veterinary services. I had an opportunity to return to another rural community a few years later for a mixed and ag-animal medicine veterinary position, but they were adamant that I sign a non-compete just as large and for just as long as the other veterinarian (2 years, the entire county). I refused to sign the non-compete and they refused to negotiate that part of the contract, so they are still without an additional veterinarian to this day (5 years later), continuing the issues regarding providing veterinary services to underserved areas."
Rebecca	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. Several years ago, I had a 1 year contract, which included a noncompete agreements, working through an agency. At the end of the 1 year, the company that I was working at wanted to renew my contract. However, during that year, the company had decided that they wanted to only work through a limited number of "preferred agencies", and my current agency was not one of them. They would not release me from the noncompete clause, even though they could not offer me work. So I sadly ended up missing out on continuing my awesome contract role and became unemployed."
Jess	"Physicians and healthcare providers should NEVER be subject to noncompete clauses. It 100% violates die patient physician relationship and patient rights to choose their doctor. It also further propagates the healthcare provider shortage when physicians are forced to leave towns they otherwise would stay in just to get out of toxic workplaces."
Gregory	"This makes sense for many reasons. Non-competes are unfair to the employee. employers would treat people better to keep them. To offer they rely on the non-compete to stop turnover. Please pass it."

Francis	"Non-competes as they are implemented today constrict employees in the workforce and unfairly favor employers in their enforcement. They block employees from making positive changes to their career by seeking out new employment opportunities, and the former employer does not have to bear any of the consequences; specifically, employers with a non-compete do not have to pay for "garden leave" when an employee gets a new job and leaves. This means employees are basically trapped. Moreover, there are existing legal protections in place for intellectual property transfer (i.e. NDAs). Whatever inventions an employee may make at the first employer still remain at that employer; non-competes just serve to trap employees. This leads to depressed wages for employees, as capitalism and market conditions cannot effectively seek out the fair (i.e. higher) wage than what non-competes suppress. Please make non-competes illegal / unenforceable."
gail	"Thank you for reviewing the non-compete clause. I believe the non-compete clause has no place in our work environment. Employees should be able to move to other opportunities without restrictions."

Neal	"Dear FTC, I am a Washington state residing US citizen and electrical engineer. I work in technology. It has become customary for me to have to sign non compete agreements with all of my employers. These non compete agreement limit my career mobility, they place unsure restrictions on the labor force, and ultimately reduce the competitive of businesses that otherwise might hire individuals like myself, were it not thr a non compete. These agreements have been justified as necessary to protect intellectual property, however there are other legal avenues for pursuing anyone who shares intellectual property from a past employer with a future one. In the past year alone I have ended discussions of multiple opportunities due to being bound by a non compete. Please do away with non compete for all employees, and let's help workers gain career mobility and increase competition amongst businesses." about such things when looking for my next job! Let's get rid of the non compete!"

Lori	"This legislature is long overdue to protect workers and the free market economy! Please pass this legislation! There is overwhelming evidence of the power imbalance, systemic inequities, and the negative impact and burden that non-compete agreements place on workers, the free market, and our overall economy..."
Paula	"Non-compete clauses hurt the country's competitiveness by stifling innovation. I have been personally limited by non-compete clauses, preventing me from seeking good jobs at companies that work on similar business opportunities."
HEATHER	"I support the FTC's nationwide ban on non-compete clauses in the US. As a veterinarian, non-compete clauses significantly and negatively impact our ability to provide continuity of care for our animal patients. In my profession non-compete clauses may extend from a 5-10 mile radius to over 50 miles effectively prohibiting the ability to work for an alternative employer or to start a business if within that range. I have known several veterinarians and veterinary specialists that have been forced to work outside their field or move the families outside of a "prohibited range" to continue to make a living. Non-compete clauses do not benefit patients, clients, employees, or communities."
Karen	"I live in the Pacific Northwest. My veterinary clinic chews through new doctors who then have to move out of the area to make a living. Meanwhile, our beloved pets and expensive livestock have to start over with another new vet (when they can lure another in). It's expensive and the quality of care goes down."
Jason	"I am a physician at a children's hospital. My group, like others around the country, is in a staffing crisis which is affecting patient care. Our institution requires noncompete clauses for any new contract, which is limiting our ability to hire new doctors. This inability of physicians and other workers to freely choose jobs due to noncompete clauses is directly contributing to our hospital's crisis, and on a larger scale is affecting the health of our country. This exploitative practice should be banned."
Jeff	"Please ban the use of non-compete, it's simply anti-productive and anti-workers"
Vladimir	"I support making all non-competes illegal. As a physician, I strongly oppose the AHA's stance. Non-compete clauses prevent certain physicians from taking some jobs and also do not allow others to leave jobs with poor conditions. This all results in less access to care for patients."

Kenneth	"I support the proposed rulemaking (NPRM) to prohibit employers from entering into, enforcing, or attempting to enforce non-compete clauses with workers, including independent contractors. Non-compete clauses severely limit skills workers from seeking alternative employments or efforts in negotiating better compensations in a free market of employment. Works should have the right to choose their employer and negotiate when the times come, without fear of being retaliated by monetary or geographic restriction set forth by such restrictive covenants. Companies should not use such measure to retain their employees, rather they should provide better benefits or offers to maintain their worker force, especially in current economy with rising inflations. Non-compete clauses also should never be applied to specialized field such as healthcare, law enforcement, or other private/public sectors that require highly specialized workers, who in turn would not be able to provide services to well-needed or underserved areas due to the restrictive nature of their contracts."
Leslianne	"Physicians advocate for the well-being of their patients and make changes within symptoms to preserve high quality patient care. Non-compete clauses put the power within the hands of hospital and clinic business owners, who increasingly are not clinicians or medically trained. Rather, those who benefit from non-competes are business-minded non-clinicians whose priority is the financial bottom line, NOT the health and well-being of patients. Please eliminate non-compete clauses and put the power where it belongs - in the hands of those patient-facing, ethical physicians who have committed their lives to the care of our communities. Clinician shortages are rapidly increasing, in part due to lack of job mobility for clinicians. When clinicians aren't able to switch jobs to find better fits without having to relocate themselves or their families, they make hard choices, which can include leaving the profession or cutting back clinically. Additionally, noncompetes give the employers unfair leverage. If clinicians are afraid of being fired or otherwise retaliated against because they have a noncompete and are unable to move, they are less able to effectively advocate for themselves or their patients. This can include speaking out against unsafe or unfair working conditions, negotiating fair contracts that help prevent clinician burnout, advocate for safe staffing, or speaking out against patient safety issues."
Brian	"Please do not exclude physicians from this ban! Many young physicians do not understand the business of medicine very well when completing their grueling medical education. They are easily convinced to take what appears on the surface to be a great job only to learn later that they are being taken advantage of. For many, the non compete clauses means uprooting their family and moving even when they may love their community and have better job opportunities would allow them to stay."

Katrina	"I support the removal of the non-compete rule for employees. It severely limits the earning capability of employees and is falsely used to keep wages low. Please remove this harmful and unfair rule."
Laura	"Kudos! To the FTC for recognizing and promoting workers' rights. As a physician surgeon I strongly support this rule and urge the FTC to include physicians' rights. For far too long, starting from the day after finishing medical school, physician trainees (residents, fellows) are treated as less-than by their employers. This new FTC rule would at least start to remedy that by functionally abolishing the non-compete. It hurts physicians and their families, their ability to earn a wage, it limits flexibility, and severely hurts patients' access to care when physicians are forced to move away from their region of choice due to antiquated non-competes. All the non-compete serves is to further line the wealthy pockets of what is now functionally for-profit healthcare C suite and administrators, and the larger growing body of private equity squeezing medicine and physicians dry. At its most basic, the non-compete is anti-capitalistic."
Claire	"A non-compete agreement unfairly limits the jobs a person can apply for. Having acquired experience in an industry, he is restricted from moving up in that industry. This is unfair and hobbles employees. The employee becomes a sort of slave to the current employer. Please outlaw these agreements."
A	"As a tech employee, I am 100% in support of banning non-competes. Working for the company I do today that has a very broad set of businesses means I am highly restricted in what type of opportunities I can take on. This is a positive and labor-focused initiative that is common sense and corrects an uneven playing field."
Anine	"I am opposed to non-compete clauses that are unrelated to executives with trade secrets. I have experienced changes in leadership that necessitated leaving one job for another. Had I been contracted under a non-compete, I would have been unable to escape emotion abuse from my new manager without jeopardizing my income, housing, and my children's well-being. This is about basic freedoms to make personal choices and the free market. Good employers are rewarded with loyal employees. Bad employers are subjected to turnover until they make necessary changes. No one should be forced to work against their will in a toxic environment."
Kraig	""No compete" restrictions disrupt our communities. I lost my long term physician because of these restrictions. She wanted to leave the University of Washington Neighborhood Clinic in my town (Woodinville, WA) and practice elsewhere in the community. However, the UW's `no compete" restrictions required her to practice at least 10 miles away. Because of this, she moved to a medical practice in downtown Seattle an hour away with traffic, and with expensive parking costs. So the impacts of these restrictions go well beyond those employees directly restricted. I urge you to prohibit "no compete" restrictions on all employees including professionals except when there is clear (and rebuttable) evidence that supports it."

Melissa	"I am in favor of strict limitations on non-compete clauses in contracts. Non-compete clauses should NOT be allowed for any low level workers. They should only be allowed for very few of the highest paid employees who have the most access to proprietary information.. They should be strictly limited in duration."
Kris	"Non-compete clauses in the tech industry discourage us from moving freely to other companies which stifles competition between companies. They give an unfair advantage to large companies like mine, which stifles innovation from newer and smaller companies, The economy will benefit from a reduction in these clauses."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

West Virginia | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for West Virginia:

West Virginia Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual WV Worker Earnings	Increase in Average Annual WV Worker Earnings
539,026	$253,817,680	$471

	"As a dermatology physician assistant in a rural state, I stayed in a toxic work environment for over 5 years. I was stuck in a job that kept taking away my original benefits one by one. It also negatively effected my income. My employer only gave me one raise in 5 years. It impacted my mental health, and negatively effected my personal life. I recently took a job an hour away to comply with my non-compete. It is a much better work environment, and I received a $25,000 dollar raise as well 3 additional weeks of vacation and 3 weeks of sick leave. If I hadn't had a non-compete I would have been able to transition to a better position both mentally and financially much sooner." -Megan
	"Please pass this. Do something to actually help workers, the majority of Americans, that have continually been getting shafted. No business has the right to hold workers hostage by threatening to sue them for changing jobs; it's immoral, (unjust) and needs to be illegal. Changing jobs has increased my salary from 40k to 135k over the last decade. I signed several non-competes, but took the chance that they were unenforceable, and improved my life vastly by doing it. Outlaw them so no one has to feel held hostage to a job, and scared to change jobs. It's not only better for workers, but better for business. Workers learn more skills by changing jobs, and become better employees overall. And the better businesses will grow while stagnant businesses can't hold onto cheap workers by threatening." -David
	"I am a physician and fully support getting rid of the non compete. It is detrimental to society to have hospitals determine who patients can get access to in their area based on the sole interest of the hospitals. Non competes solely exist to for their best interest and takes the incentive to treat physicians better by holding them hostage to the threat of needing to relocate their family if the want to change jobs. The is the complete opposite of what America Stands for and I really support the move to void non compete clauses." -Semeret
	"Being a small blue collar salesman from West Virginia in the coal industry, noncompete agreements have caused me much strife. Companies require that you sign one to keep you stuck in a job where they will pay you low wages, instead of letting you move to a competitor who is willing to pay you more. I get a nondisclosure agreement from sharing trade secrets but most of these low paying sales jobs everybody knows what everybody else is doing already. When you're barely making it paycheck to paycheck, you should be able to switch jobs freely for one that will better your situation and your family. Please get rid of noncompete agreements They have caused me horrible anxiety." -T

Jason	"To whom it may concern. I am a physician, and I am under a noncompete in West Virginia . Which is an underserved area .. as it stands if I were ever to seek new employment, I would have to move further worsening the physician shortage in my area. This is unfair to my patients. A hospital system called Mountain health now has a monopoly in my area after buying up several local hospital systems. Though I am well compensated my pay falls far below national average for my field. I want to help the patients of my home state always and I do not want to move. if non-competes were abolished I could better negotiate my salary. Likewise, I could start my own weight loss clinic on the side, which is something my area desperately needs as I feel mountain health is failing their patience in this area. Thank you very much ! I'm summary. Non-competes give an unfair advantage to the employers in an employee , employer relationship and stifles competition. And we all know that competition is great for the economy please abolish noncompete's."
Ali	"Non-Compete clauses in physician contracts are unjust and forces physicians to either stay in a situation that is uncomfortable or risk disturbing their life entirely by having to move from what you have built for years. Most industries doesn't have such restrictive clauses in their contracts."
Tania	"Clinician shortages are rapidly increasing, in part due to lack of job mobility for clinicians. When clinicians aren't able to switch jobs to find better fits without having to relocate themselves or their families, they make hard choices, which can include leaving the profession or cutting back clinically. Additionally, noncompetes give the employers unfair leverage. If clinicians are afraid of being fired or otherwise retaliated against because they have a noncompete and are unable to move, they are less able to effectively advocate for themselves or their patients. This can include speaking out against unsafe or unfair working conditions, negotiating fair contracts that help prevent clinician burnout, advocate for safe staffing, or speaking out against patient safety issues. To exclude nonprofit hospital systems, would render the proposal much less effective for clinicians given that the majority of hospital systems in the US are 'nonprofit' in name. The proposal should be revised to include all hospital systems."
Eric	"I would support the proposal regarding non-compete clauses, based on how non-compete clauses have affected my career and the careers of others in my field. The proposed legislation should not exclude physicians and other professionals. In my geographic region, two hospital systems control every hospital within a 2 hour drive. My current contract contains a non-compete that does not allow me to work for a competitor within a 50 mile radius for a term of 1 year. This is a standard term in physician contracts with my employer. This prevents the smaller hospital system in the area from recruiting from the talent pool of the larger healthcare system. There are a limited number of fellowship-trained physicians willing to move to my (admittedly) rural area. If someone decides they like the area but do not like working for the larger corporation, they are not able merely switch employers. This

	is beneficial for the larger corporation, but not necessarily for access to specialty care for those patients whose insurance only covers the smaller hospital system, as it disadvantages that smaller corporation from recruiting specialists. Personally, I would have to move to a new area, work locums, or have a 100 mile drive daily for a year if I wanted to switch employers, even though my skill set is in demand. The non-compete clauses in my contract hurts me, the smaller regional hospital corporation, and ultimately patients in the area who cannot (because of out of network insurance costs) utilize the larger hospital corporation network. The only entirety benefitting from the non-compete is the larger corporation that already has significant power due to owning over half of local hospitals and physician offices. The proposed rule would remove the stifling effect these non-compete clauses bring to business."
Madison	"As someone who lost an opportunity to work for a company due to a non-compete clause, I support this rule and would like to see it passed. Non-competes are rampant in my industry of speech- language pathology and prevent many from obtaining optimal employment."
Michelle	"Non-competing agreements create an indentured servitude - without a termination date. This is far worse than the agreements so common in the 16th and 17th century. Young people come out of college with a great deal of debt - and they simply cannot afford to work for less wages for years while they wait for the expiration date of the agreement. Nor can they afford to relocate in order to find employment in a locale far enough away to meet the provisions. Some agreements purport to survive even after the termination of the employee - So once signed, an employee cannot seek an increase in pay, advancement in his profession or duties, and if he is fired, he still cannot seek employment elsewhere. Thus they work under complete duress - without any of the protections and opportunities provided in truly market driven system. This is simply a new form of feudalism with the serf being bound by all practicality to the first employer he works for. My son-in-law has been trapped in a job for over a decade due to non-compete agreement. Many attorneys have confirmed that the agreement is binding. H Companies use these to avoid short term perceived losses - however, all markets - and therefore our US economy flourish best when it allows workers to move and progress to a situation which best uses their talents - and companies gain much with employees who have had varied experiences and training Trade secrets are well protected under existing law - Corporate practices have already de-personalized their marketing - so loss from an employee leaving (ie a doctor from a medical practice) is already limited since a corporate name is attached to the clinic and clients/customers/patients are processed and marketed toward loyalty to a corporate brand rather than individual professionals. Thank you for your time and consideration. Young employees are usually unaware of these type of contract provisions and are hired after simple verbal interview applications. Much paperwork is presented to them and they sign totally unaware of the trap. Those that are aware - are pressured into signing and often have been told by their parents that the provisions are unenforceable and not worry about them. Once signed"
Allison	"I agree that a non-compete clause is unfair."

Jill	"Please repeal this rule. I work in healthcare in rural West Virginia. If you were treated badly by one employer and choose to leave, you have to drive 30 miles or find something totally out of your field. We have shortages in our job and they regulate a monopoly on the providers and prevent patients from getting the care they deserve. It makes you stay in a situation where you were treated poorly because you can't afford to move. Please help us."
Dina	"Dear F.T.C. Members; Thank you for your proposed rule to ban the use of noncompete clauses in future employment contracts and void such clauses in existing contracts. The noncompete clause has unjustly damaged many workers' careers and their lives. Whatever benefit they give employers, notably the ability to keep wages noncompetitive, which itself is unjust to low-paid workers, is not worth the hardship they cause. I hope you will support the ban of the use of such clauses. Sincerely, Dina Coe"
Diane	"I support FTC regulation to ban non-compete agreements, NPRM"
Diane	"Ending non-compete agreements will allow workers more freedom and more opportunities and options. Employers will compete for employees which is a hallmark of free markets."
Diane	"Please ban non-compete clauses. They restrict competition that is necessary in a healthy market system They also prevent laborers from getting better jobs and improving their situations."
Martin	"I was brought on by a contractor to work for a gas company. Upon landing my dream job which I was told 'this is who we are hiring through fill out the application and we will get you an interview" so the contractor did not even recruit me offered no incentive but required me to sign a a non compete. Now he refuses to give any adjustments do to higher travel mileage or positive performance reviews. While I have peers doing the same work making $100 more a day receiving health insurance better 401k options and the ability to go work 1099 instead of W2 which would save me even more money. All because of this non compete I had had no option in siting which offered me nothing in return. Now he doesn't feel the need to take care of me as an employee rather feels it's better to threaten that I can't leave. He literally does nothing for me or the other few unfortunate enough to be hired on through him at that time period, but some how we can't leave him. I could make $30,000 more a year through multiple other companies, but instead my family struggles because of him threatening to file a lawsuit if I leave. I had to quit paying for my medical insurance because of all of my bills and am developing what might be skin cancer but can't afford to go to a doctor and work 242 days out of the year in a salary position"
MATTHEW	"As a practicing primary care family physician, I whole- heartedly support the elimination of non-compete clauses. While there are countless arguments to be made, the most important is the undeniable fact that non-compete clauses cause greatest harm to those our healthcare systems is meant to provide for, our patients. Non-compete clauses in the primary care setting legally coerce physicians into abandoning their patients by forcing providers out of the immediate geographical area. Therefore physicians are often times left with the choice to be at the mercy of their employer or choose to leave their patients behind and physically relocate their practice to another area. As a provider the most infuriating aspect of non-compete clauses in healthcare, is the fact that health care would not exist without the very medical providers and patients that non-compete clauses seek to harm. A move to ban non-compete clauses from medicine is a move towards restoring fairness and promoting equity for both providers and patients within our health care system. Sincerely, Dr. M"

Philip	"Physicians took an oath to put patients first, they also have a fiduciary responsibility to their patients. The corporate practice of medicine is illegal in most states. Noncompete agreements are in direct conflict with the ethical practice of Medicine because they put Physicians at risk of being strong, armed into practicing unethical medicine, and into putting their employers over their patients. Physician should have a right to work and move freely just like every other person. Physicians are the value creators. There's no intellectual property or business value that is created by health system employers -they bring patients and doctors together, they are compensated, handsomely for that service, and they should have no further influence or jurisdiction over the practice of medicine."
Gary	"Originally, NDAs were designed to protect trade secrets from being transferred to competitors. They have been greatly expanded as a tool for wage suppression. Burger flippers can change jobs? This is a gross over-reach. Please ban these ASAP."
Bethany	"Non competes need to end. I live in a rural community where there is a need for physicians. My current contract has a 20 mile non compete for 1 year. This may not seem like a long distance, but this is a rural, mountainous area where a 20 mile drive can take up to an hour and most physician offices are in similar locations due to terrain. Effectively, ending my contract means I will not get to practice in my hometown for a year otherwise I will be faced with ridiculous fees. The area needs physicians, so to make one sit out for a year because of location is ridiculous. Some people might argue to just go ahead and pay the fee, but as a part time primary care physician, the fee is 50-75% of my annual salary. It's criminal."
Peggie	"As a retired school teacher with an MLM business, not being able to share about another equally beautiful MLM hinders my ability to supplement my fixed income fully. Today most of our purchases are made online; the non-compete rule is antiquated and hampers social selling unfairly. Please remove the non-compete clause rule. Thank you, Peggie "
Charity	"To Whom It May Concern: I am writing to express my strong opposition to the use of non-compete clauses in contracts for healthcare providers. I urge the Federal Trade Commission to take action to prohibit the use of non-compete clauses in contracts for physicians. Such a prohibition would help to ensure that patients have access to the care they need, and would promote competition in the healthcare industry. These clauses or restrictive covenants unduly restrict employed or contracted providers from practicing medicine within a certain geographic area and/or for a specified period of time after leaving a practice or other employment situation. This can lead to loss in income and instability for healthcare providers and their families The use of non-compete clauses in physician contracts is harmful to the physicians and the patients they serve. Physician non-competes limit the mobility and job opportunities of physicians, and can prevent them from providing consistent care to patients in need. This leads to shortages of physicians in certain areas, and can make it difficult for patients to find the care they need. Furthermore, non-compete clauses in physician contracts can limit competition, which can lead to higher healthcare costs for patients. By limiting the number of physicians in a given area, non-competes can also limit the number of choices that patients have when selecting a healthcare provider."

Thomas	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Over the years, I have had to sign one or more of them, always under duress. I STRONGLY urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Mark	"The Non-Compete Clause is anti-competitive, anti-American and should be gone."
J	"This is an excellent idea and I fully support this ban on non-compete clauses. As the name suggests these clauses are made to thwart competition in the free market. It limits workers ability to leverage their skills or leave a bad work environment. I particularly support this with regard to physicians. This will go a long way to help improve physician contracts and help the physician shortage!"
Jennifer	"I am a District Manager who worked for WIS International- was 1 of less than 100 people in the country who was a DM that serviced WalMart exclusively for their annual inventories. After 16 years my job position was eliminated and my Company still threatened me with the non compete I was forced to sign. This non compete, according to an attorney I consulted, said it was one like he had never seen in 43 years. It bans me from working in my field (which is already incredibly limited/specialized) or for any client I had serviced in the ENTIRE UNITED STATES. I didn't quit. Wasn't fired. My job position was eliminated as they have the contact for my territories to a new to the game company. People like me just want to work... been doing it since I was 14 years old- am 51 now. I don't want a handout, don't want public aid- I just want to work, doing what I'm good at, without the constant fear that I could be assured...at any time. My Company did a great job of reminding me all about the contract I signed- so much for big business doing the right thing by its people. Thank You, J in Ohio"
Valerie	"Non compete clauses are a travesty. They force people like me into continuing to work at an unsuitable job, unless you want to uproot your life and your family. They put all the power into the hands of owners and corporations, which can then treat you how they choose because they know they have you trapped. Please eliminate non competes for all professions and give workers the chance to negotiate fair deals."
Jerld	"As an employee bound by a non-compete clause this would be a great. My employer reminds us every year that we are bound by this rule and has threatened other employees after leaving that they have more money and will fight it till the employee is broke."
Nick	"please stand strong and ban non-competes. I've personally seen lives upended and upward mobility stifled because of them. Non-competes are anti- capitalistic and depress GDP growth."

Adam	"There is currently a shortage of medical providers in the US, and hospitals compound this with non compete clauses. Many Hospitals use non compete clauses to attempt to make sure physicians, physician assistants, and nurse practitioners are unable to work at other competing nearby locations if they decide to no longer work for their current hospital employer. This can force providers to move far away from the location to meet the criteria of the non compete. This can cause a noticable shortage of properly trained providers, especially in rural areas where it can be difficult to entice certain medical specialties that now must move across country to escape a non compete. This negativity effects communities who now have to travel further for specific medical care. This is also difficult for the physicians, PAs, and NPs who must uproot their entire lives and move a far distance to be outside of the mile distance restrictions set by non compete clauses. Faced with moving to meet the requirements of the non compete the hospital has set or facing a breech of contract lawsuit for attempting to practice medicine in the same community is stressful for anyone. This is an unfair burden that should be removed to allow physicians and other providers to remain in communities they love and serve without having to face the strife of legal consequences non compete clauses place on them."
Thomas	"I would like to speak in favor of the ban on Non-compete clauses, particularly for physicians. I see two problems with non-compete clauses for physicians (and similar employees). First, the primary idea of a non-compete clause is to protect what is deemed as vital proprietary information or "trade secrets". As professionals, physicians go to school and then residency to learn how to do their jobs. They then take national tests to demonstrate competency in their ability to do that job. None of that information is coining from their employer, so there really are no "trade secrets" for the employer to protect. The second argument I've heard for allowing non-compete clauses is that it can be expensive for a company to recruit physicians and the companies feel they feel the non-compete clauses enable them to protect their investments. However, there are other ways that could be achieved. Off the top of my head, they could require a certain length of initial employment in the contract, to make sure that the employee was around long enough to offset the recruiting cost. And, if the employee leaves before that time, they could easily have a clause that a pro-rated amount of the cost incurred in recruiting them would have to be repaid. Of course, if the company wasn't so onerous to work for, they might not have such recruiting problems in the first place. The idea of non-competes also seems to be applied rather arbitrarily. For example, in the state of West Virginia, non-compete clauses are not allowed for lawyers, but are allowed for physicians. I wonder who made those rules? We need to create an atmosphere that allows for healthy competition in all professions/jobs There may be some instances (none come to mind at the moment) where non-compete clauses may be a valid idea to protect true trade secrets. In today's day and age, however, I would bet that there are very few true trade secrets that are not already protected via patents or other legal protections, that would justify use of this clause. In light of this, I am in favor of banning non-compete clauses in employment contracts."

Charles	"They should be banned. Businesses have abused them tremendously."
daniel	"Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. To be clear, there are nuances to this discussion and a blanket endorsement of the FTC proposal. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CFOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and

	reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to upnxr their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carve out in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Therefore, as grassroots physicians and our supporters, we respectfully submit that noncompete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Kelly	"Please get rid of these agreements they are horrible for the middle class working man who might need to change jobs to provide a better living for his family. Too many times I've been forced to sign a non compete then have to pass on a better paying job because of the agreement with my current employer."
Ellen	"I am writing to express my support for a ban on non-compete clauses in employment contracts, particularly in the healthcare industry. Non-compete clauses have a negative impact on labor markets and can contribute to physician burnout and worsen the physician shortage. Non-compete clauses limit a physician's ability to seek new employment opportunities, which can lead to decreased competition, lower wages, and less access to healthcare for patients. Furthermore, non-compete clauses contribute to physician burnout by limiting their professional autonomy and flexibility. In some cases, physicians may be forced to continue working in a situation that is not a good fit, which can lead to decreased job satisfaction, decreased quality of care, and ultimately physician burnout. More and more physicians are retiring early, or taking non-clinical jobs. Finally, the physician shortage in the United States is a growing concern, particularly in underserved areas. Non-compete clauses limit the mobility of physicians, making it more difficult to attract and retain physicians in areas that need them the most. For these reasons, I urge the FTC to consider a ban on non-compete clauses in employment contracts, particularly in the healthcare industry. Doing so would help to promote competition, increase physician mobility, and ultimately improve access to healthcare for patients. Thank you for your consideration. Sincerely, Ellen Thompson, MD Professor, Marshall University JCE School of Medicine"
Charlene	"I strongly support the ban on non-compete clauses. I feel it keeps salaries, benefit packages, and advancements down and stagnates the workforce by not allowing workers to freely move from one job to another for better pay and/or benefits in the same area that they reside. If a company/corporation is good and reputable they should not fear competition-their employees will voluntarily stay for decent pay, decent benefits, and a decent work environment-if they are not providing this their employees should be able to leave with no repercussions."
Luke	"More competition is always a good thing. Help the workers and raise their wages like the left wants. Stop anti-competition practices and be a true capitalist. Thank you for being proactive."

Leandra	"I fully support prohibiting employers from implementing non-compete clauses that limit workers' freedom to explore opportunities."
Fri	"Non compete clause are evil. They get physicians trapped in jobs with low pay and mediocre benefits."

Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Wisconsin | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Wisconsin:

	"Thank you for this brave and long-overdue proposal. As a physician/surgeon, due to non-compete clauses in contracts, I have twice been forced to move/uproot my family/leave behind many unfortunate patients. Due to non-compete clauses in contracts, large employers and hospitals often have no impetus to improve working conditions, provide safer/better patient care, invest in needed equipment/infrastructure requested by physicians. They are aware that employees will be miserable/complain, but rarely willing to move, uproot their families, pull children out of schools, etc. I believe in free markets and as such - - I am firmly against non-compete clauses since employees should continue to work for an employer because they want to work there, not because of coercive non-compete clauses. Unfortunately, entire industries (such as my field in medicine) have made these so pervasive that it is not possible to find jobs without these clauses." - Baseer
	"I am a physician who practices in a rural setting in the Midwest. Non-compete clauses hurt Americans who live in rural areas. Because rural areas are less populated, and large-scale health networks are clustered in the largest city in a rural area, a non-compete clauses in rural parts of the country mean that physicians need to move out of the area in order to find a new job if their employer makes their current job unbearable. As most non-competes contain a diameter of miles within which a physician cannot practice, and since in our rural areas of the country the next are with hospitals or clinics might be over an hour away, physicians have had to leave our rural area due to non-compete clauses. With health care employers becoming increasingly large, often spanning multiple states, the balance of power has completely shifted to the employer side. Removing non-competes would bring competition back into the healthcare workforce, allowing physicians to remain in their homes, in their children's school districts, and practice medicine in more favorable conditions." - James
	"Please ban all non-compete clauses, forced paybacks for on-the-job training when employees quit, and fines employers impose for leaving employment. When I worked for Home Instead senior home care, they didn't give me enough hours to live on, especially since they broke the law and didn't pay for any travel time between multiple daily assignments of an hour or two each. Because of the non-compete rule they made me sign as a condition of employment, I was unable to pick up the extra hours I needed from any other home care agency, nor was I allowed to work for any other agency for 6 months after I did quit. Despite multiple labor laws, the entire U.S. system favors employers, who have power and money to do what they please, even when it's illegal. Enforcement is practically nil for labor laws." - Lori

	"I fully support the proposed rule. I would be directly affected by this rule change in a positive manner. In September 2021 I was unexpectedly terminated from my job with a market leading manufacturer. I was in a sales role for the employer which is headquartered in Ohio. I was given no reason or indication as to why I was being let go. A condition of employment is that all employees must sign a non-compete agreement that identifies 25+ companies that pertain to my industry which my expertise is made of (Plumbing). My non-compete also stated global enforcement for a period of 1 year from my date of separation. This agreement has GREATLY limited my employment opportunities in the industry that I am familiar as well as my network. My former employer would not negotiate any of the companies listed in the non-compete agreement. These legal fees were out of my own pocket while being unemployed and not receiving severance pay. Again, in order to be an employee I had to sign the agreement; it was not requested upon termination so therefore I couldn't just not agree. Put this rule through as soon as possible to help the many others in similar situations such as me!" - Sarah
	"It is inherently anticompetitive to restrict the free movement of employees. I work for a large healthcare IT corporation that makes it very difficult for me to find a job in related field because of unfair non compete clauses. I know many people who would have taken a new job or moved but cannot due to non compete." - John
	"As a young veterinarian with large amounts of student debt this new rule would be very beneficial. Currently if I wanted to be an owner in a practice, the non-compete clause would force me to leave the area, creating a further financial burden on my family, or buy a practice with extensive financial burdens. Creating this new rule would help many young veterinarians who want to start their own business." - Eric
	"In my industry, web software and application development, noncompetes are already unenforceable, but still commonly used as intimidation techniques for especially junior level employees. I support banning them, as long as you enforce significant penalties for companies that violate the new rule." - Samuel

Rose	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. There is nothing health- affirming or beneficial to patients or providers about non-compete clauses in the contracts between health care providers and hospitals or group practices.

	Nothing. Those types of provisions are benefit only profit motives of the institutions requiring them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. Non-compete contracts can result in patients losing access to the physicians and other providers who know them best. They can prevent providers from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and they increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. Non- compete clauses are anti- health, anti-patients rights, anti- professional, and are monopolistic in the extreme. Please ban them."
Leslie	"Doctors swore an oath to provide the best medical care to their patients and the non-compete agreements that corporate hospitals and clinics is a direct opposition to this Hippocratic Oath. Hence, I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. People are PAYING for medical care and we demand medical treatment that is evidence-based, peer-reviewed research that can be independently verified when treating patients. We want a complete end to pHARMa drug "therapy" with caused death, illness and side effects and other standard care practices that kill and cripple people and keep them drugged up. You sick standard care practices will end. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Mercedes	"I STRONGLY support the FTC proposed rule BAN NON-COMPETE CLAUSES. MOST Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. HEALTH IS NOT A BUSINESS of WHO CAN LOCK IN THE MOST patients to a practice AND GIVE PRACTICALLY NO, NO CARE TO PATIENTS THAT WILL ACTUALLY HEAL THEM. The Pharma Industry with the hospitals are looking at selling the most drugs but care less about TRUE HEALING of the HUMAN BODY AND MIND!! Contracts that PROHIBIT medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti- competitive, but are DEFINITELY dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are DEFINITELY BAD MEDICINE. I STRONGLY urge the FTC to FINALLY ADPT THIS proposal AND BAN NON-COMPETE CLAUSES IN MEDICINE, HEALTH, ETC."

WE need thinking and caring Physicians, & medical care individuals that look and treat us as the individuals we are.....and we shall do the same. For example. non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are definitely bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them"
Dean	"I support the FTC proposed rule banning non-compete clauses. Hospitals and other facilities Americans depend on for care abuse non-compete clauses to the detriment of patients and the medical professionals who care for them. Contracts that prohibit medical professionals from caring for their patients outside of corporate employment are not only unethical and anti-competitive, but are dangerous to patients. For example, non-competes result in patients losing access to the physicians who know them best, deter physicians from speaking out about patient safety concerns, and increase the cost of medical care by thwarting competition. Enacting this type of requirement will go a long way towards restoring trust in the medical system. Currently trust in the medical system is at an all-time low. Personally, I would have nothing to do with hospitals and the allopathic system. The bottom line is that non-compete clauses are bad medicine. I urge the FTC to adopt the proposal to ban them."
Manohar	"I'm [...] a responsible independent MD physician, I support the banning of the non-compete clause in employment contracts that makes the physician serve freely and effectively so that health care needs and demands can be met expeditiously in all areas of health care delivery especially for physicians of all kinds who are in short supply in face of growing demands everywhere. It's truly absurd to hold anyone hostage to illogical terms and conditions to begin with. Surely there's vested interest for the parties and agencies that are opposing the shunning of the non-compete clause in contracts & regulations.gov's initiative is really v. very commendable to end of the partisan ship to crate the divide between employer and employee when actually together they are here to serve all of our patients fairly and efficiently in all walks of the health care delivery to make the industry equitable for all, no matter if one is at the receiving end or giving end, together we constitute the one and the whole."
Shola	"Thank goodness the government is finally intervening on workers' behalf to eliminate this archaic practice. Let business figure out other ways to retain workers (like benefits and positive workplace culture) besides legal handcuffs. Thank you!"
Morgan	"Non compete clauses in physician contracts are predatory and manipulative. They should be outlawed outright."

Steve	"Non-compete clauses are harmful to the economy in general and to all the individuals involved. Non-disclosure is sufficient to keep a companies secrets secure."
Joshua	"I wholly support this proposed rule. Non-competes hamstring both employees and employers, especially in situations of highly skilled positions and competitive markets."
Tim	"I have had a non-compete forced on me by a part-time job. I lost my primary care physician to a non-compete clause; he just disappeared. This practice must be banned and there must be a financial penalty fir including them in a contract after this rule goes into effect."
Mark	"Comment on Non-compete I have experienced the horrors of non competes as a young surgeon in 1993. The first I had ever heard of such a thing. (Wausau Medical Center vs Mark Asplund, Wausau Med. Ctr., S.C. v. Asplund Case Brief for Law School LexisNexis.) In the medical field non competes are used almost exclusively inappropriately to control employees(providers of health care) just as the name says to not compete no matter how onerous either pay, quality, hours, or other treatment is. It is not used to protect trade secretes etc. Once clear of my noncompete in 1993 I was able to establish a practice how, where, and with whom I wanted. It took several years a broke me. I subsequently recouped and help established a wonderful group without a noncompete. Without non competes empowering large clinics and hospitals in the medical field higher quality and more cost effective medicine would result. I loved the city of Wausau and am from Wisconsin and at 30 years old I could not imagine the clinic could force me to leave. Unfortunately they are now more ubiquitous than ever so please FTC protect health care from non competes with your rule. I was told during this ordeal that the Wausau Medical Center felt non- competes were the only glue that held them together. That is a weak model."
Ezana	"As a practicing physician, I am strongly in favor of the proposed rule. Non-compete clauses harm competition and reduce worker mobility, including that of physicians like myself. Eliminating non-compete clauses will also help address the shortage of physicians in this country by allowing the right number of physicians to be present at the right time at the right places."
Iyad	"Hospitals should not be allowed to apply restrictions where physicians can or can not go. Patients should have the complete freedom to choose what physician they want to see and follow. Patients follow good physicians NOT physicians' employers! Administrators at hospitals try to twist physicians' arms to follow what the administration wants because they know if that physician decides to leave, they have to leave that town or City for 1-2 years, causing significant disruption in patient care, which administrators don't care about. Many hospitals have lost their compass, they want to make big bonuses in millions or billions. physicians are not slaves, they should have the absolute freedom to choose where to go, whether to keep in town or leave, and patients should be allowed to continue their care with that physician if they decide to leave that employer but stay in town. This is patient care, this is completely different than holding a position where you have access to some plans/information, that competing hospitals shouldn't be made aware of. Midlevels generally talking don't have non competes, and is several states can practice without even physicians' backup, why should physicians be forced to continue to practice under the non comepete whip?!"

Ihsan	"It is a long overdue act to equalize rights in labor market to improve quality and competition to maximize economy and consumer experience, perhaps most importantly in healthcare to decrease patient care costs."
Shreshtha	"Non compete clause should be banned with immediate effect, it lowers the quality of workforce. Hospitals and employees should compete for the best physicians without restriction."
Wills	"I support ending non-compete agreements. They are a tool for large corporations and companies to strong-arm and bully individuals into servitude and it only benefits the wealthy and privileged. If they want to compete, companies need to innovate, not force people to stay at their jobs or stay out of work for a period of time."
Matthew	"I encourage the FTC to continue towards implementing its planned nde change to prevent non-compete clauses. As a Family physician non-compete clauses put an undue burden on our profession to continue to work for practices with no reasonable alternative options. Non-compete clauses often force us to either move our family, home, and our entire lives to another area, or forego practicing in our desired or certified field for years before we can return to our patient population. This rule would enable new practices to be opened with novel care models including a Direct Primary Care model that no longer empowers large medical systems to perpetuate inefficiency and administrator led medicine. It would also force physician employers to create a more constructive rather than restrictive environment that we current have to practice under. I look forward to a time when physicians and other professionals are able to practice with freedom and to provide much needed novel models for providing our services to the public of the USA."
Kevin	"I side in favor. Non-compete clauses needlessly prevent healthcare workers from participating in the market as they are liable for suit if they leave their current job and take another job within an arbitrarily defined area that has nothing to do with their work. These non-competes exist more as a preventative measure for hospitals to control their workforce without needing to play by fair trade rules. For example, and attending physician at my hospital wanted to leave his job but was unable to take a job at a competing hospital due to being within the non-compete clause radius. He was forced to move his home and family outside of that area to work. I do not believe that employers should dictate the living and working conditions of its workers like this. The mirror existence of this clause discouraged me from seeking further employment at my hospital institution. I do not believe this country should uphold principles that benefits only employers at the cost of disrupting the lives of workers."

Bridget	"I support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. In my industry (healthcare IT consulting), non-competes bar quality candidates from engaging in meaningful work due to fear of retribution or legal action. This impacts the quality of service provided to healthcare organizations which ultimately impacts patient care. In all actuality, a non-compete clause prevents growth and may force individuals to remain in roles they are unhappy with or seek employ in a lesser capacity for a period of 1-2 years to run out their non-compete. The employer maintains complete control in these situations, leaving the individual between a rock and a hard place."
Mary	"It seems obvious that a non-compete clause is extortion, if not indentured servitude! I can't believe it is still legal! Please pass this new rule to ban such outrage and free those workers who felt no choice but to sign such bondage agreements. This is supposed to be a country of freedom, please follow through and help it live up to such claims. Thank you."
Justin	"Great news!!! Long time coming. Please approve and make rule apply to existing employment contracts."
Mark	"This is a absolute MUST to go into effect particularly in the field of medicine where doctors are on an island, locked out of whole cities and areas of practice at the will of large healthcare organizations who continue to decrease pay and increase workloads causing the medical specialty to have not only mental health issues but no way for physicians to make a change!! Please institute the banning and rescinding of non competes as SOON as Possible!!"
Daniel	"Non Compete clause are most often used as an anti competitive tactic to retain and restrict employees from using practical skills at a competitor, now covering things as broad as programing, being in a customer facing position, or making sandwiches. This does not serve to protect the employers IP, but to discourage employees from seeking other work. It is most often a demand of exclusivity as a condition of employment with no extra compensation and no reciprocity between parties. Something that is illegal in right to bid states for an employee to do, but perfectly legal for an employer. Something that employers know is illegal by including the language that the non compete being invalidate does not effect the rest of the contract on most every non compete. I urge the FTC to restrict their usage and crack down on their anticompetitive behavior."
Elizabeth	"I strongly support eliminating or sharply restricting non-compete agreements in all fields of employment. I could list a great many reasons, from my father being essentially completely eliminated from employment because of one 20 years ago to the constant abuse seen. But what I want to address more directly is the use of them in medical employment. My primary care physician recently left their large employer for another clinic in town. I wanted to stay with my doctor due to a complicated health history and a good working relationship with a doctor I could

	trust. I was not allowed to do so, due to the noncompete she was required to sign in order to work as a doctor in Madison, WI. I was livid. I understand the initial intent - to keep a predatory employees from poaching all of a small firm's clients. That made sense for small, single owner or EEC partnership firms. But this clinic system (SSM Health) is one of the largest in the United States. I strongly and vehemently object to my free choice of physicians being limited not by own choice or my own insurance but by a third party's prohibitions. It's ridiculous, it seems to me like a violation of the right to commerce and free association, and it's unfair. It's a limiting factor for a vast amount of innovation and entrepreneurship. In short, it's an idea whose time passed around the time we barred indentured servitude. Thank you for your consideration."
Parker	"I agree with Non-Compete Clause Rule being proposed. I have worked in management roles for several organizations in which they require an "employment agreement" which is largely just contains the non-compete details. This is a tactic used by employers to gain a competitive advantage over an employee's option of leaving the organization for future growth and development to an organization that is offering more in development from their current employer. I understand the aspect of privacy and proprietary information sensitive to a company I agree but limiting one's right of working for another company in the same industry seems unfair and a disadvantage for the employee especially when your current employer is not offering growth opportunities."
Jennifer	"I support the change to restrict enforcement non-compete clauses in contracts for physicians and other medical professionals. As a patient living in a community served by 2 hospital systems, the medical professionals who treat me are essentially blocked from leaving their employers if they wish to practice in our part of the state. Twice I have had a physician who wished to leave a restrictive medical system to better serve patients, and both times they had to move out of the community. This disrupted my care, as one was a primary care provider I had been seeing for over 10 years and the other was a specialist I had an even longer relationship with. My choice was to either continue with them by driving to another community or establish myself with new providers who did not know me. As a patient with a complex medical history and multiple chronic conditions; I receive better care when my providers know me and we work together. Disrupting continuity of care and restricting providers from making the best employment decisions for themselves is unfair and hands off too much control to administrators. My nephew is now a doctor, and he has shared with our family how his contract is written. It is appalling that he has had to (after 12 years of education and training) surrender his self-determination and professional judgement to a corporation. They own his medical work."
Noah	"Companies should not be allowed to ban previous employees from working somewhere else. If they don't sign my paycheck anymore, I shouldn't have to listen to anything they say"
Lily	"I support this rule. Currently, employers have few to no restrictions on what sorts of non-compete agreements they can include during the hiring of new

	employees, and for many people, they feel that they are forced to sign away their rights. While in theory, an individual is never forced to take a job, in practice, low-skilled workers and those with specialized skills frequently have very few options. In these cases, employers can use their monopsony or oligopsony-derived market power to coerce employees to accept a non-compete, which further decreases an employee's negotiating position. While non-competes are far from the only cause of declining worker power, they are one of the contributors, and it seems clear that they do little to aid in the economy's dynamism and ability to raise all boats. Rather, they enrich employers at the expense of those among us with limited employment options - in short, the most vulnerable of our citizens. Banning non-competes would provide large benefits to both individual employees and to the economy as a whole, all without the need to spend federal dollars. In fact, due to the higher wages low-income employees would command, this would save the federal government money from welfare costs, while also helping to build wealth among those left behind. To give a concrete example: many fast-food or restaurant workers, who make very little money, are forced to sign non-competes that stipulate that they can't work for other restaurants or fast-food chains in the city or even state they live in. While this might not hold up in court, it serves its purpose - namely, to make employees feel as if they have no other option than to stick with their current employer, rather than to find more remunerative employment. At the same time, it is highly unnecessary for the employer, as the employee's knowledge about how to assemble a fast-food meal alone would not enable them to start a competing business. In short, I believe this rule should be adopted to help individual employees build wealth, decrease the federal budget deficit, and help the economy work better for everyone."
Anna	"I work for a company that requires all new employees to sign a non-compete before they start. This non-compete states that we cannot work for any competitors or customers for 1 year after we leave the company. The non-compete comes with a list of over a thousand "competitor" companies. In addition, the company I work for holds nearly 75% of the market share of customers. This means that the non-compete makes it almost impossible to work in the industry at all once you leave until the non-compete has run out. It is also possible to extend the non-compete by an additional year (for a total of 2 years) if the employee buys any company stock during the time of their employment. For me, this is such a deterrent that I have never purchased stock. I worry that I cannot leave my current company without leaving the industry entirely because I can't be hired by any company in the industry. This would likely mean taking a massive pay cut while I "wait out" the non-compete, which I cannot afford. So I stay. A key detail I'd like to call out is my company's ability to enforce the non-compete with customers. The company requires all customers to sign contracts stating that they will not hire ex-employees from my company until the non-compete has run out. My company can enforce this because in order for employees at a customer to do their job effectively, they need to be able to log into a website that my current company hosts and owns. If a customer tries to hire a new employee that hasn't waited out their non-compete with my company yet, the company will refuse to give that new customer's employee login credentials to access this website. This means the new employee would not be able to complete a large portion of their duties, so the customer doesn't end up

	hiring them. This non-compete is hamstringing any employees ability to move on from the company without leaving the industry entirely and likely taking a large pay cut. For up to 2 years. Which also means some of our skills will be stagnated and rusty by time we can finally re-enter the industry, likely resulting in fewer opportunities and lower salaries starting out than would be without the gap in employment in the industry. Please help to ban non-competes and prevent a company from enforcing a non-compete through customer contracts and refusing ex-employees access to vital industry resources. Thank you."
Paramjith	"Working as a hospitalist, non compete clause doesn't make any sense at all, as hospitalists don't follow patients in the community after discharge. Paramjith Chawla, MD"
Concerned	"This proposal is a long-overdue measure to curb the anti-competitive overreach that businesses have enjoyed for too long. Noncompete clauses are clearly a violation of workers rights to choose how they trade their labor. Imagine if employers were subjected to restrictive contracts that control who they do business with just so they hire workers? Noncompete clauses are just that, except it is workers whose economic options are curtailed. Not only is this unfair, but it is harming the economy. Unfettered mobility of workers is essential to growth and prosperity."
Concerned	"Non-competes are anti-worker and in my experience are not used for preventing the loss of "trade secrets", but of artificially lowering workers' potential salaries. My employer maintains a not-readily-available list of employers who, from my first week, I am unable to work at for years following temfination of my employment. This list includes not only direct competitors. While my company produces a highly specialized enterprise-only product, I cannot work for either Apple or Amazon in certain divisions, who have little in common besides being, broadly, tech. Banning me from working at another -tech" firm has nothing to do with trade secrets and everything to do with salary. Additionally, this list includes any customer organization, even one who I have had zero work with. If I were to try to work for one of these organizations, then they would be unable to create an account for me in a system that includes a core part of any job I may take, including validation of my credentials. Again, if I were to go to a customer and work in a different role than the one I have now, they would be unable to create an account for me in the system that verifies that I have the credentials to do the job until the non compete has run out. If noncompetes were ended, would this stifling practice be allowed to persist? My employer is in the practice of nearly exclusively hiring college seniors who will not understand the full ramifications of the noncompete when told to sign it, and then ban them from going to any of the customers they build relationships with, nor to branch out into any other frm in the humongous world of health technology. Any employee who requests the list of companies (or even sectors of those companies) we are banned from going to also does so knowing that that request marks them as a flight risk, making it incredibly difficult to even stay in compliance with the noncompete. Noncompetes should be banned. This includes any behavior that functions noncompetitively, including retaliatory actions like preventing system access, or "anti-poaching" clauses in business contracts. Any "anti-poaching" rules that remain in place, for example for national security related firms, must keep a list readily visible."

Callie	"As a physician non competent clauses force us to stay in abusive employment because we are unable to leave without having to leave the city that we live in. My non compete is 25 miles and 2 years that destroys my ability to leave my job unless I leave the city which uproots my family from their jobs and my kids from their schools. If the US is a free market I should be allowed to compete with any system if I leave and let's be honest I will likely be employed by another large system so the impact will be minimal These policies are oppressive and leave no room to negotiate better temis. The organization can also fire us without cause and still enforce the non compete which is very difficult for physicians. It should not be allowed."
Sharlene	"I am in complete agreement with the proposed rule. Please implement this to protect American workers, increase wages, and decrease costs for consumers."
Maleah	"I am a clinical psychologist, working in a very rural community. I believe the banning of noncompete clauses is not only appropriate, but necessary. In many ways, such clauses, force medical and mental health providers out of their communities. Often, those same hospitals and clinics will then hire traveling employees and locum practitioners at much higher rates of pay. This often leaves local employees resentful, creating hostile, disconnected, ineffective systems and working environments with inefficient communication. The cost of such a disjointed and siloed system is much more than financial. It's human life. I am continually baffled with the lack of effectiveness and efficiency in the country's current healthcare system despite all of the money spent, our life expectancy has decreased. While I am sure that this issue is multi-faceted, part of its ideology is the capitalist, fee-for- service business that is our current medical system. This puts a focus on revenue over patient care. Sadly, the noncompete clauses are often embedded in that business structure, which does not allow for practitioners and health professionals to compete with these massive systems. Please ban the non-competes. They are hurting everyone."
Courtney	"As a family physician in the rural Midwest, my colleagues across the US and I are negatively affected by non-compete contracts. Hospitals and clinics often run by larger remote organizations have the ability to keep employees in a certain area with sub par working conditions, sub standard benefits, and often grueling schedules as they know a job change would require a move outside their set radius and thus moving a household, changing schools, and often changing a physician's spouse or partners job as well. A rule eliminating a non compete clause would promote improved working conditions, require improvement in integrity from larger healthcare groups with little interest in employee wellbeing and thus improve standards across the board from healthcare organizations who can no longer mistreat employees without consequence."
Matthew	"I am most definitely in favor of this rule. Ostensibly, employers include these as if they're going to invest great time and effort into you and your training, but as an

	engineer this has never been the case in my career. I think it would be extremely positive for common workers and for the economy to ban non- compete agreements."
Romeo	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Your plan will boost the economy and directly help millions of workers, future new business owners, and people like me all across the country. As you know, noncompetes agreements stifle entrepreneurship and hurt working people. In fact, workers in states and industries with more noncompetes suffer from lower wages, less job mobility, and lower levels of job satisfaction, even when they themselves aren't bound by such agreements Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Jennifer	"I am in support of noncompete refonn. I am a physician that was employed in Illinois that could not take another job in the city I owned a house in due to a noncompete clause. I was terminated without cause due to covid. I was forced to take a job in another state due to the noncompete. I had to move away from all my family for a minimum of 2 years."
Wesley	"Honestly this is the first piece of proposed legislation open for public conunent that I've ever been excited about. I'm currently stuck in a job because the non compete clause in my contract means that I can't work for a competitor (and the list of competitors is exhaustive) OR one of our customers for 2 years after my last day at my current company. I can change industries but that is overly complicated when a more pointed tool like a non-disclosure agreement would prevent me from disclosing company secrets were lto work for a competitor. This is a great idea and should be implemented for certain."
Bhavik	"I am a dentist currently under contract with a fairly restrictive noncompete covenant. Often it chills employees into seeking better employment for fear of litigation from a former employer. I wholeheartedly support the FTC's new proposal to eliminate noncompete covenants in employment contracts, especially beneficial in healthcare among other industries. I hope lobbying groups aren't able to thwart this much welcome proposal."
Erik	"Dear Federal Trade Commission, I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses. As a physician, I have seen firsthand the negative effects that non-competes have on the medical profession and the patients we serve. Non-compete clauses restrict healthy competition within the medical profession and limit the ability of physicians to pursue their chosen career paths. These clauses give employers unfair leverage during contract negotiations, allowing them to pressure physicians into signing restrictive agreements. Furthermore, non-competes often require physicians to relocate their families in order to comply with the contract, disrupting continuity of care and creating stress and upheaval for the entire family. In small town America, if a physician must leave a community due to an unfair non compete, sometimes it can be years before that physician is replaced. Additionally, non-competes limit

	patient access to specialty care. When physicians are restricted from practicing in certain geographic areas due to non-competes, patients may be unable to access the care they need or have to wait longer for appointments. This can be especially problematic for those with chronic illnesses or serious medical conditions. I also strongly believe that non profits should not be exempted from this rule. This would give unfair advantage to non profits and they typically operate just like for profit organizations - just under a protected tax umbrella. Hopefully, by putting everyone in the country under the same rule, all employers would step up and work to keep physicians content to stay at their jobs. At this point, many of us are "stuck" at a unsatisfying or unfair employer due to the fact we don't want to pick up and move our families from the communities we live in. For all these reasons, I strongly support the proposed rule to ban all non-compete clauses regardless of for profit or not for profit status. This will allow physicians to practice freely and provide better access to quality care for patients."
Amy	"I am a physician trying to open a primary care practice in one of the most medically underserved areas in Wisconsin, and I can't because of a non-compete. There is a wait-list for those needing an X-waivered physician to prescribe Burpenorphine, a lifesaving medication for those suffering from opioid use disorder. Since I can't practice in this area, there are people who may the because they don't have access to my care. I also have fellowship training in Osteopathic Manipulation and am specially versed in pain management that doesn't involve drugs or surgery, and acquired a following of patients that can't be helped by anyone but me.... and these patients are obviously typically disabled as they suffer from pain syndromes. Now these disabled patients have to find a way to drive an hour to see me. https://www.wiscnews.comcommunity/portagedailyregister/news/divine-savior-suit-seeks-to-stop-doctor-from-opening-portage-practice/article_93561b7b-5dc8-59ce-b53c-b5c1596ae7ad.html Noncompetes are a public health disaster. I am literally offering cheaper, higher quality healthcare to an underserved community and the patients don't get the right to choose who treats them because corporate profits are more important than people actually getting better in healthcare. To make this even worse, the contract I signed said that the noncompete should not have any power if the hospital was bought out. I never signed a contract with the hospital that bought the one i did sign a contract- so even though they shouldn't be able to hold me to the noncompete of the previous organization I worked for, they are still using the noncompete to tie me up in a legal battle that is preventing people from getting care. If there is any hope for American Medicine, that will involve getting rid of noncompetes for healthcare workers to allow some iota of the Free Market to fix things."
Diana	"This is essential in a country like the US. We should be allowed to choose who we work for and shouldn't be punished for leaving an organization that makes us unhappy, especially if there's another organization who can provide a better offer."

Johnny	"I am an Emergency Medicine physician working and living in rural Wisconsin. I was essentially forced to accept a non-compete clause which functionally locks me out of my entire region because I work in multiple critical access hospitals. The consequence of this is that despite my desire to stay in the area and continue serving this community, should I have to change jobs for any reason, I would be forced to move away. That's one less doctor to serve an already underserved area. In my experience, non-compete clauses are contrary to individual freedoms, free market competition for my labor, and serve only to maximize profits for hospital corporations. Doctors and other in-demand workers may benefit from higher wages, but the real winner is the health and stability of our nation. If I make more money, it will be spent in my community and not pocketed by distant shareholders. My family will be more secure in my community, and it will be easier for me to continue working in my region rather than moving far away and likely to a higher-demand urban area where the shortage of qualified physicians is less severe. The FTC should disregard complaints from corporate representatives and implement this new rule, which will allow financial and social benefits to accrue to individuals and communities instead."
Cory	"I am a practicing dermatologist. There is no logical reason for medical professionals to be forced into non-compete clauses. It artificially limits the natural ability of physicians to practice where needed, and where desired, to cater to the whims of a business. With the MASSIVE physician shortage in the United States, Congress should be doing everything in its power to make it easier for physicians to practice, not harder. Where patients are able to be seen is already dictated by insurance network limitations. Don't make an already difficult situation for them unnecessarily more cumbersome."
Kelly	"I believe that All NON COMPETE CLAUSES need to go away. They are 100% unethical. NO ONE should be denied work close to home or for whatever reason in today's environment forcing many to work more than 25 miles away from home especially with today's gas prices etc. If any employer is a good employer they will have good staff retention, if not they will suffer the consequences of staff turnover period. BUT NO ONE should deny anyone the right to work where they choose."
Steve	"I support the proposed rule to eliminate non-compete clauses. I have been in the electrical trade for over twenty years. In order for me to make the move from doing field work to office work, the company I work for wants me to sign a non-compete. Over the last 22 years I have worked in nearly all aspects of the electrical industry. I started as an apprentice, worked to journeyman, service tech, job foreman, and then master electrician. I spent almost two years as an electrical inspector. The next step in my career is to become a project manager and estimator. In order to do that, I will have to sign a non-compete. I will be managing several large accounts for the company. If the accounts that I am hired to manage, decide to centralize services and terminate our contract (through neither one of our faults), I could be unemployed and unable to work in any aspect of the electrical industry for two years, within a 60 mile radius of the company office. I understand that the company wants to protect and maintain their clientele and I would have no issue signing a non-discloser for the company. My concern with the non-compete, is, if we lose our clients, I will likely not be able to support my family. Thank you for your consideration."

Derek	"In 5 years I have moved from financial to health then to a different industry because of. One compete. Moving from industry I am passionate about to one where I am not fully involved. This should be banned to spur innovation as I would have been a brilliant mind in my initial industry as I was passionate about it"
Myra	"I fully support the rule change to ban no-compete clauses that stifle employees' abilities to change jobs. Non compete clauses have gotten way out of hand."
Phillip	"I am personally impacted by non-compete requirements to a large degree. Nominally, I'm only barred from a couple dozen companies, but there is a supplementary list of companies that are effectively off-limits to me unless I find a position there outside my professional field. This list is 45 pages long, with three columns of companies per page, making a significant bar to finding a new position."
Daniel	"I am writing in support of the proposed Non-Compete Clause Rule. As a retired rural Family Physician, I have seen time and again situations where enforcement of a non-compete has resulted in physicians being forced to leave a community and end long-established patient-physician relationships. The consequence is that already-underserved rural areas have their physicians driven away. This is not in the public interest. Thank you for proposing this rule. It is long overdue."
Allison	"Noncompete contracts are predatory and unfair. Even in states where they are not permitted, employers have been known to pressure employees into signing NCA's and then using the mere threat of legal action to scare employees away from seeking better employment. I signed a noncompete for a job that pays me less than 30k/year because it was the ONLY job that I could find in my field, during a time when I was desperate for work. Because of this, I risk being dragged to court if I try to seek a better opportunity. At such a low wage level, obviously I can't afford decent legal counsel. My employer did not offer me additional money to sign the NCA. They did not offer me special training, and I don't have access to any particularly sensitive industry secrets. My NCA stipulates no geographic or time limits: my employer has threatened to take me to court if I seek other employment within the field EVER, ANYWHERE. My options were to sign, or not get a job, during a time when jobs were otherwise scarce. I was afraid of never being able to break into my industry, and I was desperate for a steady paycheck. If my employer did take me to court, would they win judgement against me? Possibly not. However, the sheer ordeal of it, including the legal fees and time suck, would cripple me even if I were to win. Again, I make 30k/year. This feels like a form of indentured servitude. It is antithetical to a free-market mindset. PLEASE ban NCA's. Thank you."

Stacy	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I am a normal, employed physician who moved across the country for a job opportunity that turned out to be within a system with a culture of harassment and bullying. I needed to leave the organization, but my noncompete made it so I either had to move my family away from where we lived or commute a long distance >25 miles in an urban city in order to be employed. I was essentially trapped. I am an anesthesiologist, so I do not carry a patient load or have any reason to have a noncompete or restrictive covenant. Despite this, I had to employ my own employment attorney who negotiated me out of the noncompete at an out-of-pocket cost of over $5000. Doing away with noncompetes is absolutely in the best interest of employees and helps even the playing field with large employers who have shark lawyers and essentially try to "own" their labor pool. Please please continue down this road and eliminate noncompete clauses on a federal level."
Jacob	"Non-competes actively hurt employees, and inhibits competition among companies. I am personally restricted in leaving my current role as my employer has a non-compete with all other companies in my area that my skill-set could apply to."
Bob	"I support the FTC's proposal to ban non-compete clauses. Physicians have been encumbered by these clauses for several years and the clauses penalize patients. As there has been more consolidation of the health care industry, the effect of the clauses because more onerous. Thank you for reviewing this."
Shelley	"I had a 2 year, 30 mile no compete clause. All this did was prevent the community from having a good health care provider who wanted to stay connected within the community. My organization basically bullies people into staying with this type of contract rather than trying to improve a very hostile environment. I think no compete clauses have no benefit to the consumer or the businesses. It would be welcomed to make this illegal for organizations to impose this. I was lucky, at least I could drive a distance a make a living. If workers can't drive or have no transportation, this can become a hardship, contributing to more poverty and poor working environments"
Nicole	"Need help with what to say? Here are some ideas you can copy and paste or use as prompts! "I support a federal ban on noncompetes. As a physician I have directly felt their impact and saw how it impacted the patients I was no longer able to serve since I had to leave the community in order to leave my job." I support a federal ban on noncompetes. We're currently in a physician shortage. Non-competes are an undue burden and lead to physicians either stopping the practice of medicine completely or leaving their communities either temporarily or permanently. Both of these outcomes only worsen this shortage and directly impact the health of the American people."
Megan	"I am conunenting in support of the proposed rule by the Federal Trade Commission regarding Non-Compete Clauses. I am a nurse practitioner, and currently bound by a highly restrictive non-compete clause in my contract with my

	employer. This non-compete limits my ability to seek other employment both geographically and in service line - which is a significant detriment to my community should I need or choose to move on from my current employment. I have witnessed the loss of highly talented, effective clinicians from my region due to these non-competes; this has a rippling, deleterious effect on the healthcare of individuals in my community. Not only are experienced clinicians lost, but their historical and regional knowledge of how to connect with various service programs for their patient -- truly the core skill necessary for breaking down healthcare silos and a crucial feature of collaborative, whole person care -- is forever lost and not transmitted to a new set of local clinicians. While my non-compete has significant impact and barrier to me, the community will feel these effects in a much larger scale. The elimination of non-competes would help keep clinicians like myself embedded in the communities we serve, and challenge our healthcare organizations to create healthier workplace and compensation models to retain exceptional talent. In this situation, all would win -- healthcare providers would continue to serve in communities they are invested in, patients have longitudinal care with providers who can address not only their medical issues but also the socially-driven healthcare disparities, and health systems would grow and develop in ways that are in service to their employees, patients, and communities. I strongly urge the FTC to adopt the proposed rule related to non-compete clauses - the health of our nation is just one area that could see overenvhehning benefit from this change."
Kyle	"I am in full support of disallowing non-compete clauses in contract. They stifle innovation and competition and put workers in a precarious position. Please pass this law. There is no need for companies to block and individual rights flyer they have ended their employment with an employer."
Sandy	"As a physician, I am strongly in favor of the proposed rule by the FTC to ban non-compete clauses. The issues with noncompete agreements have been brought up by physicians for years, and it is important to highlight the physician voice in this debate, as major players such as the hospital system lobbies are speaking on their own behalf, and not that of their employed physicians. The majority of physicians would agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are bad for both physicians and patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021, which is roughly 10% of the physician population. In an era where profits are continuously being put above patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying dramatically as physicians leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and burnout, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families. A noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the area in which they practice. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market

	forces allow that ultimately would lead to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenge of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate legal actions by their employers, or unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency. As it is currently written, many lawyers have stated that the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area would have greater repercussions is much more reasonable. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems, and be aimed at keeping independent physician practices viable. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."
Gregg	"Non-compete contracts should not be enforceable, and I approve this rule to eliminate them. As a physician, I have to earn the respect of referring physicians and patients. If a hospital only wants to deal with a group of physicians, they can restrict privileges to those that have the contract. Therefore, the non-compete is superfluous. Also, the state that licenses me has a vested interest in seeing that I

	practice medicine. A non-compete is highly restrictive in that regard. Why should I be prevented from practicing in a state where I am duly licensed because of financial incentives - and not the medical quality of my work. Finally, medicine requires referrals to the best available specialist or primary care provider when needed. Why should the financial interests of a group take precedent over the ethical practice of medicine? In many cases, those with the financial interest do not practice medicine. With all due respect to hospital administrators and health care systems run by non-providers, they have no business restricting my ability to provide high quality care to patients willing to see me. Why should they decide who can and cannot practice in their area? But a word of caution: they might revoke privileges rather than enforce a non-compete. This must also be addressed. Thank you."
Reena	"I am a physician going through extreme hardship as I am going through my non compete period. The non compete is for 18 months and 20 mile radius. I am not able to relocate due to family commitments. My career is significantly affected because of this. I can provide additional information if necessary."
Jarod	"Non-compete Clauses do nothing but hinder a worker from furthering their career and experience in a field by taking away a businesses need to stay competitive with others. They need to be done away with, they've turned into tools to take advantage of working class Americans."
Kimberly	"This should be banned! It's not fair if we want to change jobs we are handcuffed to the employer we don't want because of fear of lawsuit!"
Norda	"Workers should have a strong voice. Thank you."
Alexander	"I work in sales and have worked in sales for the past 9 years. Non-competes have gotten more and more outrageous every year. I've been at my current company selling physics simulation software for the past 3 years. Learning the industry and preparing me to be a better sales person. Most sales positions require you have industry experience at higher levels and currently I'm banned from working in my industry for 24 months after my termination. Which means all of the expertise I've gained and all my bargaining power to move to a new job or negotiate a raise, is completely gone. They know I will have to start over and completely limits competition. It makes it so they can pay us less money and tie our hands so we cannot move anywhere else. I've always been a capitalist and this is far from capitalism. It's completely limiting competition in the labor market and reducing wages across the board. I know I'm not alone and everyone one of my friends in other industries (finance, I.T. and manufacturing) are all bound by the same rules. It's creating a fixed labor market with no benefit to the employees. These contracts are also given after you gave notice from your previous employer and side comments like "they never enforce it". I know for a fact, they do enforce these and it makes it so other industry players cannot hire you for fear of expensive lawsuits. These non-competes should not apply to almost anyone and they're currently the standard for any new employee. Please remove non-competes for the good of the American workers and the market in general."

Yang	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. Noncompete agreements are the kind of thing you'd think wouldn't exist in the 21st century, the kind of thing that thed out with company towns and corporate scrip, yet here we are. Here's to success in your endeavor and easy passage through the court system and whatever else might stand in your way!"
Cynthia	"Please place a ban on non-compete agreements. 30M Americans are trapped by these contracts. The ban is estimated to increase wages by nearly $300 billion/year."
Greg	"I completely support ending non compete agreements. I Myself worked under a non-compete foe 20 years new management replaced the old managers and we were terminated. The company then threatened to sue any competitors that would hire us using the non-compete as a weapon."
Gregg	"I oversee around 600 healthcare employees in VI-IA and we have a ton of skilled providers that want to work with us part time but are terrified to even formally talk to us due to the non competes. This would do a lot of good for a lot of people and long over due."
Helgaleena	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people."
J	"I fully support eliminating noncompetes. I am an advanced practice nurse."
Zach	"The non-compete in my state (Wisconsin) doesn't seem to have any systemic balance to the employee rights. The broad, and over biased radius that companies have initiated on these NC is ridiculous. It essentially forces an individual to oppose their true niche, and trade in their skills for another path less likely to benefit consumers. Likewise, it can create enough anxiety that one completely stops working or potentially moves out of their community/state. Please pass the discontinuation of this skill depriving clause that has been in place far too long. Thank you for the opportunity to have a voice."
Joel	"Three years ago I began working as an optometrist in the Milwaukee area of Wisconsin. It was a great job, and I signed a two-year non-compete with a ten mile radius from my employer. He had given me a handshake agreement to buy the practice from him in a few years time. When it came time to sell me the practice, he sneakily sold to a very large private equity group for a much larger sum than I could ever pay him. It was fair that he chose to sell to a different group, but the contract that I had signed with him actually transferred over to the large, corporate, private equity group. The private equity group was able to enforce my non-compete and essentially force me to work with them or force me out of town. The only job out of town that I could find was 15 miles away from my

	own home, which was unfortunate given all the amazing opportunities that were right here in the Milwaukee area. Not to mention the thought that I may have wanted to open my own practice next to my home and begin anew. The non-compete decreased my potential wages by approximately 20-30k a year due to the fact that the out of town job paid significantly less. Non-compete clauses seeming protect ONLY employers who aren't decent enough to their employees to keep them long-term. Non-compete clauses should be banned and replaced with greater protections on a businesses IP. Please ban non-compete clauses to protect thousands of people like me who are unfairly managed, and then moved far away from home in order to avoid a legal battle."
Joseph	"Physicians took an oath to put patients first, they also have a fiduciary responsibility to their patients. The corporate practice of medicine is illegal in most states. Noncompete agreements are in direct conflict with the ethical practice of Medicine because they put Physicians at risk of being strong-armed into practicing unethical medicine, and into putting their employers over their patients. Physicians should have a right to work and move freely just like every-other person. Physicians are the value creators. There's no intellectual property or business value that is created by health system employers -they bring patients and doctors together, they are compensated, handsomely for that service, and they should have no further influence or jurisdiction over the practice of medicine."
Jerold	"Non-compete clauses are very anti-competitive. I could see a short, time-limited noncompete such as 2 years, when recruited to a job. The employer has expended time and resources to recruit so that is reasonable. Otherwise, the non-compete is just a way for large employers to squeeze the individual providers into staying in a bad situation or moving out of the area. A similar situation occurs with locum tenens agencies when they "present you" to a potential employer and then prevents the physician from employment with the hospital for an excessively long period of time. The locum tenens agencies "present" us without having written permission to do so."
Dan	"I am a physician under a noncompete. I feel like I am trapped in my current job because to leave I'd need to uproot my family and move outside the noncompete radius. I don't necessarily want to leave my job but I don't have the ability to do so ."
Wayne	"Workers should be able to move to other companies as they choose. Anything else is a restriction of their rights in the United States of America."
Susan	"I strongly support the FTC's proposal to federally ban noncompete agreements. For decades, exploitative noncompete agreements have barred workers from pursuing better employment opportunities in the same industry, stifling wages, and preventing career advancement. Banning noncompete agreements will lead to higher wages and better opportunities for American workers. The typical agreement hurts everyday workers. This would be a critical step toward strengthening the middle and working classes --- ultimately building a stronger economy for everyone."

Patricia	"Non-compete clauses are effectively a tool for restraint of trade. I would support the ban."
Scott	"I wholeheartedly oppose any non compete clause that limits my ability to care for my patients in my community if I were to choose to switch practice locations or employers."
Mark	"Hello: I would like to add my concern that 'non-compete' employment clauses are signed in a subordinate position, limit competition, and should be abolished as a practice. The nature of these contractual terms limit fluidity of employment and stagnates competition on all sides of the equation. They negatively impact families by 'staying put an accepting the status quo' or leaving a defined, ever enlarging non-compete radius...now several counties at a time in my area. I am glad that something is finally being done regarding these despicable and anti-competitive practices. Mark Hodgson, MD"
Ed	"During my working years I and several of my colleagues were hampered by our employers' non compete clauses. Our employment opportunities, within the same industry, were severely limited. Attempts at opening new businesses within that industry were vigorously fought by fonner employers. I urge you to abolish Non-Compete Clauses in the American workplace. Thank you. Ed Holahan, Viroqua, WI"
Jessica	"Please do away with noncompetes, they hurt the worker."
Season	"I support your changing things and banning non-competes. Please, please, pretty please! Thank you for your attention to it."
Matthew	"To Whom It May Concern: I am writing you today in support of a ban on non-compete agreements for all employees, including those working for non-profit organizations. I am a family doctor working in a rural community of 8,000, and my contract contains a non-compete agreement. Our community, like many impoverished rural communities, desperately needs more people willing to work here in medicine, including doctors and nurses, and currently, if I am unhappy with my current position, I would have to find work outside of this community for the next 2 years due to my non-compete agreement. Rural communities desperately need to retain the doctors they have and recruit more doctors and other health professionals. Non-compete agreements like mine serve only corporate interests, not the needs of my community. Thank you for standing up for workers and communities against anti- competitive corporate practices."
David	"As a recently retired dentist of a 35 year career, I can attest to the negative effects of Non-Compete Clause employment agreements both personally and during the search for young dental professionals to assume my dental practice business. In most areas of the nation, people face some level of difficulty

	obtaining access to dental care and services. This is due in great part to dental professional manpower shortages especially in smaller cities. It is well known that dentist graduates are burdened with very large educational debt loads upon completing their educations and a large percentage of them take positions with corporate owned, "chain" dental practices. This is primarily due to lucrative contracts that provide substantial salaries that would seem to remedy their debt loads. These contracts always include severe non-compete clauses for distance and monetary penalty. These new graduates quickly learn that they must produce very aggressive levels of dental treatment production. often with questionable and sometimes unethical recommendations, to cover the cost of their salaries or suffer wage "claw backs". Discouragement and dissatisfaction runs very high in this gaup and they begin to look for ways to exit these situations in order to practice with greater self detennination. Young dental professionals select desirable areas they want to live and practice in long tenn. A study by the University of Nebraska School of Dentistry showed a large majority of dental graduates from dental schools in the United States choose to practice in communities very similar to the ones they grew up in. Thus, when they attempt to change their practice venue, they encounter the non-compete restrictions and can be forced to leave the community they so carefully chose to begin with. This hurts community because dental care is vital to overall community health. Dentistry is strongly relationship based and patients are justifiably upset when a dentist they have established trust with is forced by a non-compete clause to relocate to another community. This also exacerbates the manpower issue because it so negatively affects the turnover cycle of local dental practices when dentists choose to retire and transition their practices to new owners. Non-corporate dentists are also guilty of using non-compete agreements because practice transitions are almost always managed by professional brokers who universally include a non-compete in the transaction. The point I really want to make as it pertains to dentistry is that dentists simply do not compete with each other! They compete with other discretionary spending by patients: automobile dealerships, Best Buy, fishing lures, fashion accessories, etc. The dentist-patient relationship is based on style of care and a patient's comfort level with the approach to that care. Dentists arc very loathe to admit this! My opinion is that elimination of non-compete clauses in dentistry employment contracts will be a great improvement for community access to dentists and the important community health services they provide. I strongly urge you to enact the Non-Compete Clause Rule in the best interests of all communities in our nation."
Douglas	"I am a physician. The national bar association who represents attorneys prohibits signing of non-competes for ethical reasons. They cite attorney client privilege. The exact same logic applies, if not more so for the physician patient privilege. Noncompetes are unethical and generally anticompetitive. This rule needs to pass."
Ben	"Please get rid of them they prevent innovation and worker freedom"
Phil	"Great idea! This should've been done years ago: abolish all non-compete agreements."

Syed	"I'm an inpatient physician and am concerned about non compete clauses that I have to sign prior to employment. I hold no trade secrets and practice independently. Non compete clauses exist to stop Physician-Patient relationships and decrease access to health care. They exist to make more money for mega corporations. They inhibit negotiate and stifle competition."
Fred	"My former employer's non-compete clause made my year after leaving very difficult and tumultuous. I had to take a 50% pay cut to get a job and lose some of my experience/muscle memory of my former job. I also declined to buy any stocks with my former employer solely because it would have increased my non-compete to two years. My life would have been so much simpler and less stressful if the non-compete didn't exist."
Cailey	"Dear Chair Lina Khan, I'm writing today in strong support of your effort to ban noncompete agreements. I was bound by a noncompete and forced to take a much lower paying role in a different industry due to corporate greed. Thank you for standing up for working people's freedom to stay in their industries when they change companies, whether due to a move or a better offer. Thank you for your work, and please issue a final rule that bans noncompete agreements."
Will (Willard)	"Recently employed by Armfield Inc. a UK owned subsidiary of Armfield Ltd & ultimately Judges PLC. I was the US Manager of Annfield Inc. a sales office based in New Jersey for 7.5 years and prior to that time 10.5 years as a salesman representing two markets for the sale of capital equipment to educational institutions and food technology R&D departments in commercial and educational research settings. I departed from employment with Armfield Inc. in January of 2023 to open a single operator business selling Instructional Engineering Systems LLC, where my company would on some instances compete against Annfield and 5 to 7 similar companies. The company I now represent is GUNT of I lainsburg, Germany a company that manufactures approximately 700-800 more products than Annfield. In March of 2023 Annfield sent cease & desist letter invoking a non-compete written within my 2016 contract preventing me from competing with Armfield in any capacity to including the following; I can't start a competing business, work for a competitor in the USA, even though I only directly sold into 3 states, Ohio, Arkansas & Oklahoma. Their reasoning is simply that I know business very well, having worked in the field for 18 years. Armfield's noncompete is 12 months, which would force me to find alternative work at 59 years old and not accept the outside opportunity within the industry I know, unless I'm willing to accept less income in unrelated markets for 12 months, then leave those employers to return to the market I perform in the best capacity. That is not good for the individual, the GAP employers if a longer tenured employee was what they're seeking. Watching the public forum the FTC posted I saw some attorney's or business representatives repeat the need to protect business assets including trade secrets & other proprietary or intellectual property as the set of reasons to hold tightly to the ability to enter into noncompete agreements stating how "fairness" at the time of resignation can simply "be worked out". They know full well employers react to resignations and post-employment in many ways, including walking employees the moment they

	resign, laying off the employees & sending noncompete threats or reminders and in some cases work things out without counsel. Mostly I heard hard business personalities, somewhat robotically or coldly expressing why corporations need to retain the right to keep employees under their roof & under the businesses control, with the current or recently departed employee having to seek paid counsel to get free and continue working in a familiar field or profession. Now here is my specific and current experience in bullet point form showing examples of unfair treatment by my former employer Armfield, Inc. have gotten away with, to this point, and is attempting. * I was promoted with a target salary & profit sharing target. The bonus profit share was normally = 35-40% of my prior salary, and with the promotion the bonus move to 45- 50% of my new salary. * The bonus profit sharing program was contracted. * In 2015 Annfield Ltd./Annfield Inc. was acquired by Judges PLC UK. * The Judges CFO immediately imposed a management fee upon Armfield Inc. specifically moving it against the profit share bonus reducing the pool by a minimum of 570,000 reducing my share by $20,000 2016 forward. * I disputed the change when I fully understood the impact on the US team and was given no relief by Annfield or Judges. * SO, I obtained a promotion and new management immediately reduce my compensation at the stroke of a pen, but I cannot argue too strongly & cannot gain new employment in the industry I knew then for 11 yrs, BECAUSE THE NONCOMPETE IS HELD OVER MY HEAD. * It is fine to know the above is wrong and should assist me in fighting the noncompete, BUT at WHAT COSTSS? I have retained solid legal counsel while using personal savings to fend off my former employer of 18 years. * Additionally, 1yr ago Annfield hired my UK counterpart from a competitor GUNT of Hamburg, who ironically I represent now. The new Annfield hire brought his former employer's confidential price list to with him to Annfield who's management supplied it for me the US MGR April 2022 for competitive use. I refused to utilize the stolen property warning Annfield legal action could be at risk. I was ignored. In summary, I refused to utilize stolen information my employer provided, now I'm possibly headed to court over a noncompete for a company afraid that I will divulge information about them, which I would not do on their behalf 1yr ago. * The ONLY way I would support noncompete agreements would be when the employer, "so fearing the former employee's potential" is willing to PAY GARDEN LEAVE with benefits for the entirety of the noncompete term. From there the employee, the future and past employers could bargain or simply let the noncompete run out."
Jacob	"This would likely be one of the most revolutionary business policies in a long time. Noncompete clauses allow companies to get away with paying their employees less than they should be, and actively harm competition. This rule would do so much good to all of the United States, putting money back into the middle class and raising wages, which have long struggled to keep up with inflation."
Kelly	"As a small animal general practice veterinarian for 25 years, I believe this is LONG overdue. I support the FTC in this."

Taj	"Please support the removal of non-compete clauses. I have personal experience of this clause being used as retaliation for leaving a toxic workplace environment. I lawyered up and was instantly left alone, but it was a terrible experience that caused me to leave a patient population I enjoyed caring for and nearly caused me to uproot my entire family. These clauses hurt physicians and anyone in any field who has it in their contract. Many of us are lured into practices with falsities only to find out the true situation of the workplace once officially working. This is very common for early career physicians and people fresh out of training We are lied to, and then bullied by the noncompete. This must stop. If practices want to keep doctors and other staff, give us the support we need to provide high quality care and succeed."
Jonathan	"As a physician I vehemently oppose exclusion under this proposal. We should be entitled to participate in the healthcare market to the maximum our skills allowed. We are already exploited through our training and straddled with debt from our education, the least that could be done is allow us to obtain our true market value in what is supposed to be a semi capitalistic market"
tarun	"Having non compete clause impedes the ability of MDs to provide care in under served areas. Me and my colleagues have free time to provide clinical care to patients in our community but non compete clause from my primary employer does not let me help needy people in my town."
Philip	"As a Radiologist, I am opposed to non-compete clauses. Radiologists do not, as a rule have their own patients making this clause unreasonable and essentially makes a Radiologist a prisoner of his employer."
Therese	"Wholeheartedly agree with abolishing no compete clauses for physicians. They are used to lock providers into the system and force us out of the market if the working arrangements or expectations aren't met by either party. Healthcare corporations fear that patients will follow their physician if the physician leaves the organization and practices with another organization. They are very anti-competitive. The standard no compete clause in my area is 30 miles from all sites of work for 3 years which forces a move for most of us who would consider changing to another organization or practice arrangement."
Maureen	"Please eliminate noncompete clauses to the greatest extent possible. Thank you."
Gwynne	"Physicians should not be subject to non-compete clauses because it can limit patients' access to healthcare, reduce competition, and negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. Firstly, non-compete clauses limit patients' access to healthcare, particularly in areas where there are already limited healthcare providers. This is because physicians may be prevented from practicing in the same geographic area, which can lead to longer wait times, reduced quality of care, and potentially higher healthcare costs for patients. Secondly, non-compete clauses can reduce competition among healthcare providers, which can lead to higher prices and lower quality of care. This is

	because patients may have fewer options to choose from, which can result in less pressure on healthcare providers to compete on the basis of quality, price, or innovation. Finally, non-compete clauses can also negatively impact physician autonomy and career opportunities. For example, a physician may be prevented from leaving a particular healthcare organization or hospital to start their own practice or work for a competitor. This can limit a physician's ability to grow their career, gain new experiences, or pursue different professional opportunities. In summary, non-compete clauses can negatively impact patient access to healthcare, reduce competition, subject physicians to predatory and abusive employment situations (which I have personally suffered under) as well as limit physician autonomy and career opportunities."
Andy	"Stop picking on doctors! We give up our 20's to help people live healthier lives! This is a really important public health issue, even though it may not seem like it. Clinician shortages are increasing, in part due to lack of job mobility for clinicians. When clinicians aren't able to switch jobs to find better fits without having to relocate themselves or their families, they make hard choices, which can include leaving the profession or cutting back clinically. Half of my friend circle has quit medicine in the past 5 years, not for retirement but because of burnout and inability to change jobs locally. Additionally, noncompetes give the employers unfair leverage. If clinicians are afraid of being fired or otherwise retaliated against because they have a noncompete and are unable to move, they are less able to effectively advocate for themselves or their patients. This can include speaking out against unsafe or unfair working conditions, negotiating fair contracts that help prevent clinician burnout, advocate for safe staffing, or speaking out against patient safety issues. It's really hard to make the argument that one clinician leaving a hospital system significantly hurts a hospital system, so the argument for noncompetes is weak. If lots of clinicians left en masse, there are larger issues with that hospital system that need to be addressed. Importantly, the current FTC proposal as written could exclude nonprofit hospital systems, which would render the proposal much less effective for clinicians given that the majority of hospital systems in the US are 'nonprofit' in name. The proposal should be revised to include all hospital systems"
Kevin	"No physician has ever asked to have a non-compete clause in his or her employment contract. Such clauses serve only to reduce competition and interfere with a physician's ability to practice medicine without interference."
Vikas	"I fully support the proposition to remove non-compete clause from physician contracts. It negatively impacts our freedom of practice."
Kent	"I am an 85-year-old retired veterinarian. My first veterinarian employer required me to sign a non-compete agreement as a condition of employment. Eager to work and begin my career, I signed that document without thought or hesitation. Several years later, it became apparent that I was being taken advantage of. My employer worked half the hours I did in the practice but also worked part-time for the city as a meat inspector for local slaughter houses. When I attempted to negotiate a better salary commensurate with the income I was generating for the

	practice, he fired me. Several days later he attempted to hire me back again. I refused and, within a few months I opened my own practice on the opposite side of the city. His attorney threatened me with litigation if I didn't honor the non-compete portion of my employment contract. Because I had proof that my employer kept two sets of books, I threatened to contact the IRS if he continued to threaten me. I never heard another word from his attorney. During my practice years, I never required associate veterinarians to sign non-compete agreements and I never had a problem as associates came and went in response to personal reasons. The legal and medical professions consider non-compete agreements to be unethical because they sever the client or patient relationships. The American Veterinary Medical Association (AVMA) has failed to even consider that possibility for the veterinary profession. They do, however, have lengthy ethical statements about the sanctity of the Veterinarian-Client-Patient-Relationship (VCPR). The ethical considerations of non-competes have never been put to a vote within the AVMA hierarchy. Beyond concerns about the VCPR, however, there are enormous concerns about the emotional damage that non-competes inflict on veterinarians who simply want to improve their professional status or escape from toxic employment practices. Stressors abound in the veterinary profession and those stressors are reflected in the unusually high suicide rate by veterinarians. During my long veterinary career, I have never, ever heard of a veterinary employer who has been stressed because a veterinary associate joined or opened a practice within convenient driving distance of the employers practice. Stress stories from associate veterinarians who have suffered because of the restrictions from non-competes are in the thousands. It is clear that non-compete agreements are exactly what they indicate...to prevent competition within a free society. I urge the FTC to do end them once and for all. Thank you for listening!"
William	"Non competes are by and large, unenforceable and illegal in emergency medicine. Regardless, why is it OK for physicians to be the only ones excluded from this? Garbage. Politics and control."
John	"I support the ban of non-complete clauses. I am a medical/mental health practitioner in a small (300,000 population metro area) region of the upper Midwest. Non-compete clauses, which my current contract includes, significantly interfere with my and my colleagues' ability to pursue meaningful modes of employment and subsequently become "trapped" within dysfunctional healthcare systems. In turn, the presence of non-compete clauses for all medical professionals negatively impacts patient access to healthcare. I am pleased to see the FTC proposing this rule and fully support the ban of non-compete clauses."
Monica	"I am a family physician working in a rural small town. I provide care to a lower income patient population at a hospital system owned clinic and at a critical access hospital. The most frequent challenge I face is providing access and excellence to my patients. Unfortunately, though primary care and inpatient medicine care is critical to population health, these services are not well reimbursed and therefore are a lower priority for healthcare systems. When I see

	a need — improved RN support, phone follow up, administrative support to off load billing and paperwork time- its rarely appreciated as a priority. These things are a priority to patient care and access- but they don't make money. My primary leverage is my work. The struggles to produce good patient centered care is poorly motivated by even well intended policy under the current reimbursement situation. After asking for improvements for years and hearing nothing but demands to increase patient numbers and revenue, we had 2 providers quit our clinic. They did not have young families and had the flexibility to drive for 45 miles to switch to a clinic outside their non-competes. After that, under the implicit threat of more providers leaving we were allowed to hire RN support which has improved patient care. I have 3 young children and a husband with a job in our town- I am compelled to keep my job to avoid uprooting my family. I can't leave to join a better work environment without great personal sacrifice. I can't control the environment in which I practice my profession. The lack of agency for a healthcare provider, a profession grounded in an loath of patient care, is maddening. If I wanted to leave the "non-profit" world of hospital system care and work for a federally qualified or other mission driven practice I can't without huge time/personal cost. Fix the healthcare system or at least let me leverage my work or free me to practice in the right environment for my patients."
Marc	"I strongly support a ban on non-compete clauses. I know of someone in my family who was subject to such an agreement and it has greatly limited their ability to get a job that they were very qualified for. They serve only employers, no one else, and they need to be banned. It's really that simple."
Joshua	"I am a cardiologist that just left corporate healthcare to start an independent private practice. I strongly believe that the model and practices of my former employer didn't support quality, efficient care. I will say that undoubtedly, the non-compete clause that my former employer wielded over my head could have been a significant deterrent to moving forward with this plan. Fortunately for me, the non-compete I negotiated 15 years ago had a limited radius and therefore I am able to remain close to the majority of my patients. Before deciding to start an independent practice, I was offered jobs by the two other corporate/academic systems in town, but their non-competes dissuaded me from signing contracts with either. I was too concerned that if they also decided to change strategy or direction, then the new non-competes would force me to move my family and start from scratch in a completely new environment. As o was unwilling to entertain this possibility, I decided to try my hand at private practice. The existence of my non-compete has unfortunately dominated my decision-making, and I would strongly advocate for their abolition."
robert	"I support this Ban particularly in health caw to maintain physician/patient access. I am a physician bound by an 18mo non compete with a hospital system. I had built a large word of mouth practice over 20 years in a primary and secondary markets. The current hospital system enticed me with unfulfilled promises, and rather than investing in business growth on my behalf (ad, referrals);expectation in like for a non compete; I have supported myself by my prior patients reaching my team by previous provided cell numbers, and the employer has demanded we discontinue this practice. The system of re- identifying your location used by ems to keep patient/physician intact is heavily leveraged to the employers as it can take 9 months to have locations updated. Please side with keeping patient access to care with their providers and not hospital lobbyist!!"

Judith	"Banning non compete agreements is a great idea. Do it!"
Andrew	"As an professional (veterinarian) individual who has worked for both privately and corporately owned practices as well as been an owner of a privately owned practice, I fully support the FTC's investigating and working towards banning non-compete agreements."
Horace	"I am definitely for the abolishment of the non-compete clauses. These stifle innovation, limit worker's rights and create an unfair environment for workers to attain their fair wages as well as lifestyle limitations regarding the ability to obtain reasonable employment within their geographic area. These non competes force employees to move, take their kids out of school and disrupt social networks. As a physician, this gives all the power to the hospital employer, and limit the patient's ability to seek continued care from a preferred provider if the physician is released without cause from the employer. This is also used to limit retirement funds ("deferred comp" plans) and place restrictions on whether these can be collected, or if they're penalized for trying to provide care to their patients."
Micah	"Dear Regulations.gov, am writing to express my concern about non-compete clauses for physicians. As a physician, I believe that such clauses can have a detrimental impact on patient care, medical innovation, and physician mobility. Non-compete clauses limit a physician's ability to practice medicine in a certain geographic area or for a specified period of time after leaving their current position. This can severely limit a physician's career options and, in sonic cases, force them to relocate to continue practicing medicine. This can be especially problematic in areas with limited medical resources, where losing a physician can have a significant impact on patient care. In addition, non-compete clauses can stifle medical innovation. Physicians who are bound by non-compete clauses are often prevented from sharing their patient-care expertise and ideas with colleagues, which can hinder progress in the field. This can have a direct impact on patient care, as medical innovation is critical to improving outcomes and developing new treatments. The idea that optimal medical care and treatment should be limited only to one hospital suggests that we care about business interests more than health outcomes. Optimal medical care is NOT a "trade secret" - it is simply the right thing to do. Furthermore, non-compete clauses can also have a negative impact on physician morale and job satisfaction. Physicians who feel that their options are limited by non-compete clauses may be more likely to feel trapped in their current position, which can lead to burnout and other negative consequences. I understand the importance of protecting an employer's interests, but I believe that non-compete clauses are not an effective way to do so. Instead, I would suggest that we explore alternative approaches, such as a confidentiality agreements for specific medical technology or select care advancements that are appropriately specific to a single hospital, to protect the employer's trade secrets and other proprietary information. I hope that you will consider my concerns - I have no financial interests in this and only want the best thing for the health of patients everywhere. Thank you for your attention to this matter."

Fong	"I am in favor of banning non compete. It is preventing me from freely switching jobs, depriving me of higher wages and better working condition."
Leighann	"Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200 I live in the State of Wisconsin where non-competes are common. I left my position to join another organization that was willing to work with my year and half long non-compete and was doing well at the organization. I blow my sales number out of the water and was exceeding my boss's expectations (his words to me "you have easily paid for your seat through next year" this was at the beginning of November 2022) At the end of November 2022 my boss was given the opportunity to hire 2 other people that were in the same industry, however, they had been released from their non-competes because the business they were working for closed its doors in the Wisconsin market. They quickly started bringing in their old clients due to the fact that the other business had closed. Right after Thanksgiving, my boss terminated me, stating various reasons. I am now under 2 non-competes one that will end in April and the other that will end in November 2023 and I am not able to work in my chosen industry despite being terminated without cause. I have worked in the same industry and have had great tenure for most of my career, but because of one poor manager, I have been kicked out of my industry for at least the next year. I understand the need to protect trade secrets, however, employers have turned these into blackballing people from industries and managed to take their livelihood away. Non-competes need to go away, confidentiality agreements should be enough to protect companies and still allow people to make a living."
Matthew	"This is a fantastic idea. I am essentially a corporate "nobody" who worked at Epic Systems, a behemoth healthcare software company, for 11 years. I possess no strategic knowledge or trade secrets. I am bound by a two year noncompete that prevents me from working with EPIC'S OWN CUSTOMERS, which represents a majority of the healthcare market, to use my skills. This is broad overreach and must be stopped. Warning: Epic will surely attempt to skirt this rule by restricting access to its online forums, which I would likely need to be effective in my job at an Epic customer. Your rule must also address this in order to have its desired effect."
Lance	"Regarding: Non-Compete Clause Rulemaking, Matter No. P201200. I am writing to comment in favor of banning non-compete clauses. I was employed for 36 years as a medical professional (Optometrist) in a large Midwest medical clinic. The town I lived in has a population of 21,000 people in central Wisconsin. When employment contracts have 30 mile non- compete clauses, as mine did, it would require me to leave my home and move to a different city if I desired to practice elsewhere. Leaving one's home, established friendships, nearby children and sense of community is difficult. To force this on someone as a mandate for leaving a practice, as in my case, is a significant burden. In addition, this gives an

	employer relatively free reign to reduce income and benefits to good employees who have established successful practices under threat of loss of home and community. In my case, my income was reduced one year by 25% and another 15% the following year to the point where I was either forced to retire early or move. Non-compete clauses represent an unfair burden on employees, they reduce competition and make for an unpleasant work environment. Please put an end to these unfair mandates."
Christopher	"I'm in favor of abandoning non-compete clauses, esp in the field of medicine"
Ruth	"Non compete clause is not doing any justice to the poor families. They have to make their families suffer if they want to quit a job . It empowers the health systems and take the right away from the physicians to even resign"
Ruth	"I support removing the non compete clause . It is breaking the physician community- forcing physicians to live out of a neighborhood just because of these policies . Too hard on family life . It's " enslaving " the physicians and making the organizations decide an entire Family s fate to live or move out of a community just to find jobs, HORRIBLE CLAUSE . Must be removed"
Megan	"It is imperative that physicians be allowed the same rights as other workers to be free of criminal noncompetes in the name of corporate greed. As a majority of physicians are employed it is imperative they be afforded their constitutional rights equal to other working citizens."
Micah	"As a psychiatric nurse practitioner I am subject to a non-compete clause that would force me to drive more than 50 miles away to find other work, or uproot my family and move to a different community. This 3 year non-compete clause is excessively onerous. My skills are specialized and in high demand, however, my wages and career mobility are severely suppressed by this non-compete clause. Nurse practitioners and physician assistants must not be exempted from a ban on non-compete clauses. The hospital system I work tbr cites market research and prevailing wage arguments as justification tbr keeping wages low, while benefiting from a regulatory environment that the administration can leverage market forces against it's employees. Nurse practitioners deserve to sell their labor on the open market without restrictions. I implore the FTC to ban non-compete clauses, and refrain from making exemptions to this ban for health care workers."
David	"I strongly support the new rule to improve the economy and the lives of millions of workers by finally fixing the broken non-compete system. I have had a non-compete in a tech position and it contributed to me being basically unemployed for months after leaving it, despite wanting to work and having a valuable skill set. I have many friends trapped in jobs because they are the sole income for their family but they'd be locked out of the job market for 1-2 years if they quit their current employer. That employer uses that power to often demand unreasonable amounts of work hours as well (50+, regularly 60+ hrs/week with no additional pay). Non-compete clauses are not entered into freely, handcuff the

	free market, and undermine people's freedom/wages/benefits Eliminating the current absurd and damaging non-compete system will be one of the best and most impactful political changes I've seen in my lifetime. Please follow through on it."
Jennifer	"I am pleased to see the FTC is doing something about non-compete clauses. I am one of the vast majority of physicians who agree that noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are on the whole bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. Currently in my area (Milwaukee) many physicians are leaving a particular hospital and are being forced to practice about an hour north of the city for 18 months to wait out their non-compete. What I see happening is yet another scenario in which those who are wealthy and have excellent choice within their healthcare insurance as well as the time and money to travel are driving to maintain that trusted physician they've had for years or even decades. Those who don't have that kind of flexibility, ability to pay for gas, or even own a car are not able to follow and are stuck finding a new physician who doesn't know them. I am seeing and hearing about this firsthand as my neighbors are VERY upset at the idea that non-compete clauses are getting in the way of the established patient-physician relationship. Further, I am seeing many of my physician colleagues leave the field in droves secondary to widespread frustration and moral injury. Therefore, it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or the inability to provide for themselves and their families. Given the growth of large hospital systems, a noncompete clause for a physician often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. I myself, would not be able to juggle commuting two hours each day to serve out a noncompete. This raises several issues of the downstream effects of noncompetes in coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating checkpoints that market forces allow that ultimately would have led to better systems that served clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced with the choice of uprooting themselves and their families each time they want to switch practice environments, and the daunting challenging of reestablishing a reputation and practice in a new location. Employers know this, and use it as leverage when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. This can effectively hold physicians hostage at unfavorable working conditions for decades, while employers evade market forces that would necessitate change. It is hard to make the argument that a single physician leaving a large hospital system would significantly threaten the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. Arguably, this is exactly where market forces should come to play, and ultimately lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. In a situation where physicians

	can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that are a better fit for them personally within their geographic locations (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field is growing at a time where clinician burnout is at an all time high. Therefore, many physicians are now electing to stop practicing medicine altogether rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally at a time where this is already a public health emergency."
Megan	"Non-compete clauses are an abhorrent, monopolistic practice which go against the tenants of fair trade and capitalism, and infringe on citizens rights to seek work where they see fit. Non-compete clauses need to be outlawed entirely, in every industry and corner of the economy."
Elizabeth	"I found myself under a non-complete/non-solicitation clause twice in my life. Once when I worked for Huntington Learning Center (2007-2009) as a K- 12 tutor and again, just recently, when I worked for The Virtual Gurus, a Canadian company that hires Virtual Assistants from the United States. Each non-compete/non- solicitation agreement was not only in force during my employment with each company, but for a period of 12 months following cessation of employment. After the onset of The Great Recession, my hours at Huntington Learning Center kept getting cut to the point they terminated my employment. Not knowing what to do, I decided to go into business for myself as a private tutor. Little did I know I was going to find myself being threatened with legal action for trying to make a living for myself. The same thing happened to me after I left The Virtual Gurus following 3 months of failed employment in which they refused to give me any clients to work with. Personally, I think these types of agreements are just wrong. Nobody should be put in a position of not knowing what to do and how to make a living for themselves in the event employment doesn't work out with whatever employer they're currently working for. Why should the employer dictate to the employee what they can and can't do with their life? If something isn't working out, a person should be free in life to take on another job while employed or to seek other employment options, whether it's self-employment or working for a competitor, following cessation of employment WITHOUT being threatened with legal action. Everyone has a right to work and to even seek out better employment opportunities. Opportunities that will work for them or pay better. I think non-compete/non-solicitation agreements should be illegal."
Stephen	"I support the FTC's ban on non-compete clauses. These clauses hold workers' wages down, stifle innovation, and harm working people. This policy will make it easier for workers to earn what they're worth! Regulations.gov says: "A single, well-supported comment may carry more weight than a thousand form letters.""
Barbara	"Non-compete clauses put an unnecessary burden on employees of all areas. It makes leaving a job impossible without leaving a community in which they call home, and allows corporations to carry on with the exploitation and poor compensation that employees desire to leave. As a physician, there is nothing

	proprietary about what I do. If I wish to leave my current position I should not have the burden of being forced out of my community because a corporation decrees it."
Matthew	"I fully support the FTC's effort to eliminate non-compete clauses. These clauses limit competition and decrease the employee's power relative to the employer. As a physician, my industry is rife with non-compete clauses. My current non-compete clause is two years and 20 miles. However, because the type of medicine I practice (orthopedic trauma surgery) is limited to major hospitals, it is de facto more of a 70-mile restriction. Having to relocate myself and my family over an hour away is a significant disincentive to changing employment. This decreases my ability to try to improve conditions for myself or my patients, as my employer knows that I am unlikely to leave the organization for another job. The organization argues that they invested money in my training and relocation, but after 8+ years, they have long since been repaid for that investment. A retention bonus would be a far more fair way of encouraging loyalty than a non-compete clause. Furthermore, these rules harm patients, making it more difficult for them to see the physician they choose. I would encourage the FTC to eliminate non-compete clauses for all workers. I have read that some states eliminated them only for workers making less than a certain amount of money. While I am fortunate to have significantly more financial resources than some of the workers whose examples you cite, my financial resources pale beside those of the multi-billion dollar corporation that employs me. I am in no position to challenge my non-compete in court. Even if I were to win, the legal fees would be prohibitive. Furthermore, I hope that this will apply to all employers. There are rumors that non-profits may be exempt. Multi-billion dollar non-profits dominate healthcare. Exempting these organizations would render this ruling moot in healthcare. Thank you for considering this comment."
Jill	"How on earth can an employer be allowed to sue someone, just for leaving one job, and going to another? People do this all of the TIME!!!! Please eliminate the Non Complete Clause Rule! People need to have the life that they deserve, before more people the of stress related illnesses. Thank you for considering this."
Dana	"I support the proposed rule to ban non-compete clauses nationwide. I worked for years in digital media, an intersection of sectors (media and technology) where broad, restrictive non-competes are common. I watched colleagues forced to sign noncompete agreements to keep their jobs later laid off and unable to find work in the space where they'd spent years developing a network and expertise. I watched my employer sue a former employee for moving to a competitor, after refusing to match the compensation and advancement opportunity the competitor offered. I teamed up with fellow employees to negotiate a less strict non-compete when we were asked to sign one, and the concessions we won gave me the freedom to move into freelancing when my family had to move out of state and to build a career that's allowed me to build the small business I have today. Non-competes keep people from achieving higher pay, better benefits, career advancement, professional development, entrepreneurship and personal life goals. They go against the stated values of U.S. capitalists and hams our economy and society in order to protect the wealth of a few who refuse to innovate."

Tommy	"As a marriage and family therapist, under a non-compete, that extends beyond the city that I've in with my wife and four children, I find non-competes to be against a free market economy because I am unable to compete with my current agency, in the city I want to live in. I have not received any special knowledge that I would not have had at any similar agency. It restricts my ability to engage in fair competition because the person with the power and ability to hire me at the time, presented a non compete necessary for employment. So, while building my career, I was under duress to sign if I wanted to have a job in the field when I needed it to take care of myself and my family. Now, I would like to further my career and financial earnings, but my options are leave the city where we call home or continue working for the company I am at solely because of a non-compete. This creates in some sense a monopoly via restriction of qualified workers to compete, a restriction of the free market, and quite frankly a unfair playing field that does not allow me to work and live where I would like while having done nothing wrong."
Bridget	"Hello. I support the ban of no competes. I work in the insurance industry in a non-client facing role that is low paid for the market and for inflation. I could make double the income with a different company however I was forced to sign a no compete and cannot switch to a competitor even though I have no inside trade secrets or knowledge. I am a strictly a customer service representative. I would have to move or take a different job in a different industry. These clauses are used to keep worker wages low and they only hurt the most vulnerable. Thank you for doing something about this."
Ashley	"Thank you for considering this splendid and sensible Rule. Non-compete clauses are a hammer employers use to drive wedges between good workers and better jobs."
Thomas	"7:00I'm 1.25.2023 Dear Sirs & Madam's of the US Federal Trade Commission; I am an individual with enthusiasm about this proposed new rule: Non-Compete Clause Rule (NPRM), It sure sounds like a good new rule. Please ban all or just overburdening NDA's & NCA's. Hindering American's ability to work anywhere they wish, crushes the hopes and dreams of American Workers. This rule has been needed to help American Workers for a long time as evidenced by the many other comments from American Workers who are trapped in these NDA's & NCA's."
Russell	"Non- complete clauses needs to go now, because it would ban labor agreements."
Jeremy	"A former employer of mine (who did not have employees sign non-competes when I joined the company), threatened to add a non-compete clause to employment contracts when I candidly explained that I was considering working for a company that the employer did business with. The employer described my interest in working directly for this client as "setting a bad precedent". If an employer is motivated to use non-compete agreements to retain employees, this does not reflect well on the quality of employment they offer, and so this behavior should not be legally encouraged. My personal anecdote suggests that an important function of non-compete agreements is to weaken employees."

Clint	"I strongly agree with banning the non-compete clause. As a physician I see how healthcare organizations are mistreating physicians and other healthcare workers and compromising patient care with overly business-minded decisions. Leaders of these organizations say they are caring for people but that is not their true motivation. Giving doctors and other healthcare workers more autonomy will help keep these agencies accountable and lead to better outcomes."
Kirsten	"I am a family physician and am in full support of this proposed law. Noncompetes have made it almost impossible for our area to have enough primary care physicians, because no one wants to be "stuck" working for a health care system that doesn't take good care of its employees. Unfortunately, there are many of them. I am now in private practice, and will retire before I would ever lock myself into another employment situation where I am not my own person as in the past. I have spent much time and money in the past to change practices, and it is punitive on the part of the employers for their own gain and has nothing to do with patient care. We absolutely must abolish these unfair practices."
Mary	"I would like to urge you to prohibit non-compete clauses. I live in rural Wisconsin where the nearest town of more than 50,000 is 60 miles away. As a small business owner with 6 employees for many years, non-compete clauses made it difficult to hire highly skilled workers. My husband, a physician, currently is not working while he waits out his non-compete because we do not want to move from our community. These are two personal examples that contribute to stifled economic growth in our town, decreased access to needed healthcare, and negatively affect families' ability to support themselves."
Paul	"About time!"
Confidential	"I absolutely support the plan to invalidate non-competes. My former employer Epic makes people sign them so that it will be harder for them to move into consulting when they leave Epic. It has nothing to do with protecting IP, and everything to do with making it harder to leave the company for greener pastures. Similarly, the consulting companies I have worked with force you to sign a Non-Compete so you can't take a full-time job with a hospital you've consulted with. Again, nothing to do with protecting IP, and everything to do with preventing you from getting other work (and thus forcing you to stay where you are, even if they aren't treating you well or paying you fairly). Please please strike these down!! I'm not putting my name on this, because I'm afraid of repercussions from these companies, but I feel strongly about the issue! Look at CA, which invalidates most of these already. They're doing great!"

robert	"Non-compete clauses are being highly abused. While it might be necessary in a few cases to protect a companies work products, it is being used or rather abused as a way to prevent someone from applying for a job and earning a decent income."
J	"I know many people very negatively affected by non-compete clauses. If employers want to retain employees, they need to provide better wages and benefits, not control how and where people work. Non-compete clauses are literally the antithesis of free enterprise. I can't believe they were ever allowed in a free capitalist society."
Davud	"While not an Optometrist, my field of tech often falls under these non-compete clauses. I believe that this direction is vital for workers to be able to maintain their skills in a field, while also protecting their economic mobility. Workers need to be able to protect themselves from exploitative or toxic workplaces by being able to quit without having to change the entirety of their field. I understand that there is a balance between workers and employers, however the fundamental strength of a worker is to be able to leave a workplace if the conditions they were hired for do not suit the worker. Doing away with the non-compete clauses would be a great step towards this in multiple fields where companies exploit the immobility of their workforce to add additional burdens or lower the quality of their workplaces. Thank you for putting forward this proposal, and I sincerely hope it goes through."
Mitchell	"I'm a 28 year old, recently promoted manager at a biotech company. While I am lucky to work for a company that does not believe non- compete clauses are necessary in their employment contracts today, that change was recent. Prior to 2020 my contract included a non-compete clause. On a personal level, this influenced my decision- making when considering staying with this company or working for another. The geographic limitations meant if I left for a similar job at another firm, I'd be forced to move out of the city I live in, incurring the monetary and social costs associated with such a change. While not prohibitively expensive, it did change the calculus of the situation enough that I never truly considered changing jobs, even as I developed hypertension directly related to my occupation. From the company's perspective, this is usually a good thing. Keeping experienced staff on hand and keeping downward pressure cm wages within their workforce is worth the potential for some employees to have more negative views of the company, and considering a non-compete clause only comes into play when an employee wants to leave already anyway, not much goodwill could be lost to begin with. Conversely, these clauses are only ever a negative for the employees forced to sign them. Because terms of employment are typically only reviewed for entry- and mid-level staff at the end of the interview process, the only way a potential employee could negotiate to have a non-compete clause removed is if they both know of the practice beforehand and have enough leverage in the negotiations to get the clause removed. In some cases, they'll have to take a reduced wage as a result. For the vast majority of entry- and mid-lever workers in the United States, this simply isn't an option. Broadly published and accepted studies and surveys indicate that anywhere from 30% to 50% of Americans couldn't come up with $400 in an emergency, so for a large section of the population, saying no to employment due to a non-compete simply isn't an option. Couple that with how medical care remains tied to employment for the overwhelming majority of working-age Americans and you can quickly see how power is over-concentrated with employers when negotiating terms of employment. There is a long-standing body of work dedicated to comparing the work output of the workforce in the United States against wage growth. These two metrics were largely in sync with each other until the mid to late 1970's, at which point real wages diverged from productivity and have failed to converge again. This, along with greater detail on the gap itself and theories as to why it exists, is well outlined at https://clockify.me/productivity-pay-gap. I bring up this gap because one of the cited reasons for its persistence is a reduced proportion of profits being distributed to the lower 80% of wage earners. This demographic is precisely the demographic this rule is proposing to protect. Given all of the above, I hilly support instituting this rule as-is."

Eddie	"I've been working in healthcare IT under a Non compete, and it has unfortunately stifled me from being able to leave and transfer my skills to other companies and move from the place I currently live. My employer has been taken to court by some of its employees over the agreement but unfortunately this has always failed due to the contract. I would feel a weight lifted knowing I can safely move around and leverage my skills and interest without concern of being sued by my former employer."
Dr.	"Yes, please remove non-competes.from physician contracts as this will greatly reduce physician shortages by allowing for more physician practices. In particular, there is a mental health crisis and a shortage of psychiatrists and child psychiatrists. Non-competes ties an arm behind the psychiatrist who could otherwise serve an impacted area after changing jobs."
Alex	"I am an employee of Epic Systems Corporation ("Epic"), based in Madison, WI, which requires all employees to sign a non-compete clause when they begin working. Their non-compete clause prevents employees from seeking employment at their competitors. My role at Epic is as a technical services engineer. Epic's non-compete requires that former employees do not work at a list of their competitors. This list has thousands of entries, and includes many of the large, high paying companies in the healthcare software industry. The contract also prevents former employees from working for their customers. Epic's market share is so large (and is getting larger) that this precludes working at all large hospital systems in the United States. I believe that this non-compete: - Substantially and adversely affects the ability of former Epic employees to be employed at the market value of their skills and services - Forces former Epic employees into work outside of the healthcare industry, where their previous work experience is less relevant Epic Systems Corporation employs at least two different strategies to force employees to abide by its non-compete. First, they require new employees to sign the non-compete clause for a term of 1 year after the last date of employment, and extend the clause to two years if they receive stock. In practical terms, the combination of a one or two year lock-out from any

	medical software consulting company, or any direct competitor, is a death knell for the former employee's career for one or two years. Many former employees have discussed "waiting out" the non-compete in less lucrative fields. The second, and more pernicious strategy, is that Epic has signed contracts with their customers, as well as with any consulting companies who work with their customers, which prohibit those companies from employing former Epic employees. Epic enforces this contractual agreement by not giving former employees access to key pieces of job functionality for their (potential) new role working for their customer. They do this by restricting "UserWeb" access. Without UserWeb access, employee's ability to perform job tasks in Epic-related hospital IT is degraded to the point where they are unemployable by these organizations. It is essential that any rule which is adopted contains language preventing a former employer from enforcing contracts with their customers which disallow customers to hire their former employees. It is also essential that any rule which is adopted contains language preventing a former employer from discriminating against their customer's employees on the basis of their previous employment status with that former employer."
Kathryn	"I am a physician. The non-compete has caused huge hardships for many of my colleagues. We all know that there is a provider shortage in some states that non-competes can make worse. Non-competes make this problem worse. This is a public health/safety issue. Please make them obsolete."
Nicholas	"Non compete clauses are purely for corporations to underpay employees since it will be harder for them to find new work in their fields of expertise. It is antiworker and against an open market"
Joseph	"Good day - I am a practicing emergency veterinarian. Currently I am bound by a 2 year non compete in my city of 2 emergency practices. The "competing" practice is providing expanded services and broadening access to care. Because of my non-compete I would need to relocate my family to a new city even though there is a wonderful job waiting for me near my home. There is no place for non competes in medicine (human, veterinary and pharmaceutical services). At a minimum this should be eliminated. Please consider."
Susan	"I am in full agreement with this ban. I am a nurse who has a 2 year no compete clause. I had to seek employment over a hour drive from my house due to this. I drive past a few hospitals on my way to my new employer because of this. This is not conducive to a work/life balance for anyone let alone a nurse who has three children at home. Please vote to ban non-competes for everyone! It is not right to limit working options."
Christopher	"This proposal is spot on. I am a person right now in the middle of a legal battle I can't afford with a company that let me go but now holds me hostage to a non compete document from 1998. Non competes do have their place and should prevent people from sharing trade and company secrets. However, they should not infringe on the freedom of someone to accept a job in the industry they know. Companies do not own relationships, people do. Companies do not create

	customer loyalty people do. People are not property. Companies have weaponized non competes to thwart freedoms. In our country founded on freedom nothing should impede a person's ability to provide for their family if done legally. Finally, I believe many companies do not treat their employees well because they do not have to. People become almost forced to continue to work for their current employer as change in their preferred field becomes difficult or impossible. If non competes were banned for employees, companies would be forced to compete for employees on the basis of the company's merit. That would be a very good thing for the US worker, the economy and long term for the companies who used to weaponize non competes if this legislation becomes law."
Jon	"As an aspiring tree care professional, non-compete agreements prevent me from switching employers/companies to access better work conditions or opportunities. No tree service company has ever invested in me, I learned to climb and saw while working for Federal agencies (USDA and NPS), and also through self-education and practice on my own. I believe that non-compete agreements have adversely limited competition in the tree service industry. This hurts employees who could do better if they were free to change their place of employment, and it hurts consumers who have fewer tree service providers to choose from. Attachments Exhibit 1 no health insurance for tree workers because they are not free to leave and work elsewhere Exhibit 2 Friends taught me to do this Not investments from businesses Exhibit 3 I can't trim or cut your tree if I'm not free to work"
Tim	"Please get rid of the non compete as after 30yrs with my company as a franchise owner our parent company was sold and they didn't want any franchise locations so we were forced out with a terrible buyout forced on us and then we we forced to sign a non compete for 2yrs .so here i am with my family making an 16th of what i was and stuck with this non compete that i cant go out on my own ."
Cody	"If I were to set out to create a means of stifling competition between competitors in a free market, non-competes would be a good way to do it. As a rule, if you area business and you wish to retain customers, you make yourself better to do business with. This relationship should apply to employees too. If you wish to retain employees, make your business a better place to work. That's how a free market is supposed to work. In addition to being partially responsible for the stagnation of wages and stifling of entrepreneurship, non-competes are on shaky ethical grounds. I have worked in the same industry for over 16 years. My credibility as a prospective employee hinges on being able to market myself based on my experience in the industry. Although I work in customer service, I have still been asked to sign a non-compete. For me, a non-compete is a death sentence. My ability to maintain my standard of living depends on my ability to remain in the industry in which I have accumulated so much experience. I should be free to choose an employer the same way a customer is free to choose which business to support. I am in complete support of the proposed rule to ban non-competes."

Unknown	"Thanks for bringing this up. It's not fair for employees, creates monopolies . It doesn't protect the companies against any infringement, eliminates competition. In healthcare , it's even worse. As a physician you are forced to move out of the city even when there is a shortage and you already had good bond with your patients in your own community . I-low is that beneficial to anyone except the employer ?"
Dr. A	"Please protect doctors & MAKE SURE THIS BAN ON NON COMPETE CLAUSES APPLIES TO DOCTORS & hospitals. These non compete clauses continue the exploitation of health care workers and yes, doctors as well."
Kathryn	"I fully support this proposal by the FTC. As a practicing physician, I see the harm non-competes do to all physicians, their families, and their patients. Please pass this proposal!"
Jenna	"Noncompete clauses in the healthcare field are bad for both physicians and for patients. They discourage market forces that allow physicians to vote with their feet if they don't agree with decisions being made by hospital systems that are to the detriment of quality medical care or clinician career longevity. According to one report, 117,000 physicians left the workforce in 2021; this is roughly 10% of US physicians. Currently, profits are prioritized over patient care and the physician shortage is amplifying as physicians leave the field secondary to widespread frustration and burnout; it is important for physicians to be able to speak out about these issues or leave their jobs without fear of retribution or that they will line unable to provide for themselves and their families. Given the gmwth of large hospital systems, a physician noncompete clause often means that leaving a job would require a physician to leave the geographic area in which they practice. The downstream effects of noncompetes include coercing physicians to accept conditions they are not comfortable with, eliminating market forces that can lead to better systems for clinicians and patients, and contributing to the physician shortage. Physicians with noncompetes in their contracts are forced to uproot themselves and their families if they want to switch practice environments where they must reestablish their reputation and practice in a new location. Employers leverage this when physicians speak out against situations that are detrimental to patient care, inappropriate or illegal actions by their employers, or unreasonable/unsustainable working conditions. Physicians are held hostage at unfavorable working conditions while employers evade market forces that necessitate change. A single physician leaving a large hospital system hardly threatens the hospital system's business model. If many physicians want to leave simultaneously, this could affect a hospital system; however one would be forced to examine what the hospital system was doing wrong that so many physicians wanted to leave en block and not be a part of that hospital's mission. This is exactly where market forces should come to play to lead to hospital systems that better serve the needs of clinicians and patients. When physicians can't relocate geographically due to personal reasons, they are prevented from pursuing opportunities that arc a better fit for them personally within their geographic location. (better pay, more flexibility, better hours, etc). When physicians are forced to work at jobs that aren't good fit, disillusionment with the field grows while clinician burnout is at an all time high; many physicians are electing to stop practicing medicine rather than work at a job they don't enjoy, thus exacerbating the physician shortage and access to care nationally —and this is already a public health emergency. As it is currently written, the FTC proposal would not apply to nonprofit organizations. Given that the majority of the hospital systems in the country are classified as nonprofit in name despite the business model being the same as other healthcare entities, this would actively give nonprofit hospital systems an unfair advantage over independent physician practices and for-profit health systems. It is important to note that several of the hospital systems that produce the most in profits and pay their CEOs many millions a year are 'not for profit' in name. Therefore, this rule seems arbitrary, and if the FTC proposal was to have its intended consequence, noncompetes should to be eliminated for both not for profit and for profit hospital systems. While it is hard to argue that a single physician leaving a hospital system would significantly affect the bottom line for a large hospital system, it is quite true that a single physician employed by a small independent physician practice could significantly hurt that independent practice by using the practice's resources to build a patient base and reputation, and then opening their own practice across the street. Given that the footprint of an individual practice is smaller than a hospital system, the argument that a physician wanting to leave that practice could still practice in the area without having to uproot their families is much more reasonable. Independent practices are a valuable player in the healthcare ecosystem, and preferred by many patients. Therefore, if a carveout in the FTC proposal is created in healthcare, it should be for independent practices, not for 'not for profit' healthcare systems. Non compete clauses are detrimental to both physicians employed by hospital systems (both for profit and not for profit) as well as patients. Ultimately, noncompete clauses at large healthcare employers are detrimental to our nation's long term ability to maintain access to quality care, and should be outlawed."

Nanci	"My current employer required I sign a non-compete clause when I was hired as a psychotherapist. Now, 3 years later he is selling the practice group to a large corporation and will not remove the non-compete. If I am not comfortable working for the new company and I leave employment, the non-compete prohibits me from working anywhere within a 25 mile radius. I am also prohibited from continuing to treat any of my clients. I will essentially be unemployed or have to seek employment in a community where I don't have connections to, or knowledge of, local resources. My current clients will suffer due to forced termination and disruption of treatment. I fully support the proposed regulation to prohibit non-compete clauses. Employees are unfairly being forced into economic hardship."
Abby	"I am strongly opposed to non-compete agreements and I feel that all forms of them should be immediately banned at the federal and state levels. Non-compete agreements harm workers in many ways and are typically extremely one-sided (in favor of the employer), overly broad/restrictive and downright unfair to honest workers. They harm workers financially either by resulting in lost or lower wages, cost employees potential job opportunities that they would be

	otherwise qualified for, and cause undue financial harm in cases where the employee is forced to participate in an unwanted legal battle. Besides financial and legal damage to the employee and their family, non-compete agreements and associated legal/financial issues resulting from them also create mental health issues and direct harm to employee well-being. If an employee chooses to build up their skills and knowledge over the years and specialize in a particular industry/market, role, and/or line of products or services, why should that employee then be effectively punished for that and told they cannot make use of these valuable skills for a period of months or years after working for a certain employer? This is downright ridiculous and it's obvious why so many other countries have banned non-competes entirely. Non-competition agreements are often written in an extremely confusing and/or overly broad or generic manner, and even for the majority of employees who desire to "do the right thing" and not breach the non-compete are often left with many questions about what the non-compete actually covers, what it really means, what behavior is allowed vs. not allowed, etc. It is even more confusing given every state has different laws around them currently, especially in the age of post-COVID remote/telework. A non-compete clause could even cause an employee to remain employed in a harmful, toxic, abusive workplace longer than they desire because the employee is unable or unwilling to secure new employment that could potentially violate their non-compete agreement out of fear of retaliation. Non-competes have also been directly proven to negatively impact women and people of color disproportionately. It's a completely unacceptable scare tactic that employees should no longer have to put up with simply in order to maintain or secure employment. The vast majority of American employees are not malicious and simply want the right to maintain and gain meaningful employment in their own chosen field of work at their own chosen company using their set of specialized skills. Non-competes also stifle healthy business competition which goes directly against "The American Dream", the core American values system of freedom/freedom of choice and capitalism itself. Healthy and rigorous competition among direct and indirect competitors creates welcome innovation and advancement, and also reduces risk of dangerous monopolies. This directly benefits every American citizen. I urge the FTC and Biden Administration to immediately place a federal ban all pre-existing and future non-compete agreements effective immediately."
Ben	"As an Anesthesiologist non-competes are ubiquitous. Most employers non-competes would require me to move to another city, or not provide medical care for 2 years to avoid breaking the non-compete"
Daniel	"This is a fantastic idea. Non-complete clauses are hannful, anti worker, and provide power to large organizations to force workers to stay in unfavorable jobs for fear of being sued. Fully in support of this. Additionally, there should be no exceptions made. Special interest will likely try to carve out exceptions for high income professions (such as tech, law, medicine). I'd discourage these exceptions should they be presented. These positions are the type that create new businesses, new opportunities that employ others and promote competition and a healthy economy. Voiding non-compete clauses would be a huge boon to workers of all economic levels and promote new business and competition that would result in a healthier U.S. economy and better financial/working opportunists for all."

Richard	"THIS IS JUST LIKE BEING FORCED TO JOIN A UNION.... IT ALLOWS COMPANIES TOO MUCH CONTROL OVER EMPLOYEES."
Donna	"Non-compete clauses are just that - anti-competitive. They definitely should NOT BE ALLOWED in labor or employment contracts!"
Ali	"I am a physician and 100 % support that the non-compete clause should be banned. It is not fair that hospitals have the autonomy to hire and fire whereas medical staff are bound by these clauses and cannot change jobs to a nearby hospital even if they are in a toxic enviromnent"
Jed	"Non competes need to be banned, they are used to bully and suppress wages"
Gordon	"Non-compete rule should apply to all workers. Healthcare workers should not be excluded."
Si	"I am a physician and I have had to move my whole family twice now due to non competes. This adds unnecessary stress to my whole family, esp my young kids. I don't see the point of enforcing non compete- if an employer and employee are not a good fit, why they want the employee to not seek job elsewhere in town? The only reason I can see is to keep employees under their thumb, to agree to their unjustified rules, demands and tactics- because an employee will think twice before resigning if they have to move their whole family. Employments are power struggles these days- we need fairness, equality and empowerment on both sides.work culture needs to become less toxic."
Gaurav	"I fully support this legislation. We must ban non competes. It is critical for the future and longevity of this nation that we maintain our rights."
Paul	"I am very much in favor of banning Non-Compete contracts. They are bad for worker morale and are a disincentive for companies to improve the conditions for their employees."
Edward	"To whom it may concern- Please ban the current practice of non competes within the healthcare field. This widely used practice amongst healthcare employers has driven a wedge between provider and patient for years. I myself have felt the affects of this unjust law. After 10 years of practicing in an underserved community, my employer made a unilateral decision that affected my compensation negatively by 35% overnight. Then they refused to reverse their decision I sought other employment. Since I had a 30 mile noncompete for 18 months, the closest job I would find was 60 miles away. All of my patients either had to drive the 60 miles, find another doctor, or suspend their care for 18 months until I eventually returned to the community once my noncompete end. And who gained from this? The hospital I had worked for as they had total control of the market for the 18 months I was gone. What did they do with that time you might ask? Did they recruit another physician? No! They used locum providers that were not available on a regular basis to care for the community causing many to suffer physical, emotionally, and financially. Please end this out dated practice!"

Ian	"I am in support of this ban, it will nurture a healthier economy with more competition in a space, and help fix the issue of people underserved for goods and services. This is an important step to return America to the juggernaut of innovation it once was."
Jared	"Without consistent regulation regarding non-compete clause statutes, many physicians are beholden to one specific hospital system, and forced to move cities, if not states, in order to pursue other opportunities as their career evolves. This is an unfair standard for anyone to be held to, and it stands out in the career of physicians given the inflexibility and demands of residency (where residents are locked in to practicing at a given program for 3-7 years at typically below minimum wage for hours worked, potentially 80+ a week on average, and make roughly 4 times their salary in profit for their hospitals annually). I beseech the FTC to provide more equity between fields and careers by ending what has become habitual non-compete clauses"
Sandra	"I need help for my husband who has Alzheimers. I have hired a helper through Comfort Keepers, and they have a non-compete clause in the agreement. They also do not pay the caregivers a living wage. I think this business and others like it exploits both people in need and the caregivers they need to hire. I have attached a copy of the agreement. Attachments comfort keepers"
George	"Strongly support in theory but this needs to include nonprofit hospitals. They need to compete for employees as well. Doctors, nurses, and techs should be allowed to change jobs without moving. These are typically multi million dollar or billion dollar enterprises. Their employees need the freedom of changing employer."
John	"I would like to voice a comment in support of this rule. Labor is a market, and the free market only works when there is competition. The very nature of a non-compete removes the competition from the labor market and harms workers. If non-competes were removed, then employers would have to come up with innovative ways to attract and retain employees leading to higher wages and better working conditions for all."
Marty	"The Honorable Lina M. Khan Chair, Federal Trade Commission Washington, D.C. I wholehearted support and encourage the FTC to pass the Proposed Rule, without the exception. The Proposed Rule is based on evidence that non-compete clauses stifle new business and new ideas, significantly reduce wages, exploit workers, and hinder economic liberty, all of which is true and I have experienced first hand. The Proposed Rule also recognizes the need to protect the individual against the needs of the business. But the proposed rule forgets all

	these goals when it exempts the entrepreneurs who have worked tirelessly for years to create a business and can only sell it if they agree to onerous conditions that they cannot use their knowledge and expertise to start another business. If the Proposed Exception stays in any "final" rule, then the very entrepreneurs the Proposed Rule is supposed to encourage, stimulate and inspire, will be hindered from innovation because they will not be able to use their knowledge and ideas to create something new and better. Many small business owners often work for years to build and create their initial business, then sell it when it becomes profitable. But in order to sell the business they are often required to sign sweeping non-competes that define the industry they are not allowed to work in by the broadest possible terms with the longest time frames the new owners can justify. The result is that the very entrepreneurs the rule is designed to protect are forced into non-competes that prevent them from creating another business, with new jobs and new technologies, moving the economy forward. Undoubtedly, the lobby of the venture capitalists looking to buy companies will object because they want to protect their investment and will claim that they will narrowly tailor their non-competes to avoid any detrimental effects. Do not be fooled. So long as the exception exists, the larger more capitalized businesses will do everything they can to eliminate competition, and allowing them to prevent the innovation and freedom needed to allow small business creators to keep doing what they do best. If it is unwilling to eliminate the Proposed Exception, it should be limited. If the FTC wants to protect and encourage people, the Proposed Exception should have a threshold built into it. I propose changing the Proposed Exception so that it only applies to people that sell their business entity and/or ownership interest for over $2,000,000. This change would allow the small business owners and upcoming entrepreneurs to keep building, designing, and innovating, but would still protect the value of a business acquired by a buyer. Businesses sold for less than $2,000,000 simply do not have the resources necessary to recreate their business fast enough to be competitive with the company that was sold. I urge you to remove the exception and pass the rule."
Patrick	"I support the proposed rule change to eliminate non-compete clauses in employment contracts. I agree with the commission that employment non-compete clauses stifle competition and limit employee movement and advancement."
Peter	"I personally feel trapped at my current job due to a non compete agreement. My employer thought it was unfair for himself to have a noncompete a decade or so ago, but ensured to put an even longer one into my contract. If I were to leave my job, I would forfeit all of the collections yet to be received for the work I already performed and have to work at a location at least 15 miles away from my current employer the 2 years according to the language in my contract."
Jessica	"As a patient, non compete clause is affecting mine and my families ability to receive medical care. Our pediatrician left a practice and we aren't able to be informed where they are going. When we find out, it is an hour away be of the non compete. And when we look for other Drs closer they aren't accepting new patients. So for an entire year we are driving 2 hrs round trip to see our

	pediatrician until they can move back to a local medical group. The non compete clause is not just affecting the life of the Dr, but is also impacting many of us who rely on their services. As an employee I am also bound to a Non compete. And I feel as though I have lost any leverage to negotiate for better pay as I can't really leave my job now. To leave my firm and do the same job I am currently doing I would have to move out of state. And with my family they know that is not an option. So basically they have no motivation to give me any raises be they think I'll just stay at my job no matter what."
Shannon	"Please end non compete clauses so that bard working members of our communities have the freedom to work in the fields they have experience in without having to travel out of the communities they reside in. These non compete clauses are preventing low wage workers especially from finding employment near their homes. Many of these people rely on public transportation. Many of these workers can't afford the additional travel costs. Please make sure this burden isn't placed on workers who don't have access to trade secrets. These workers don't have more access info about the businesses they work in than the customer themself."
Susan	"I worked for less than a year and left because it was a hostile environment at Aurora hospital in Green Bay. Due to the contract I signed I had to have an attorney help me negotiate my way out of the noncompete as I had just moved across the country thinking it would be a good job. There was only one other employer here that I could have worked for in town. These noncompetes are such a disservice to the community for whom doctors are serving as well as a severe stressors for doctors. Please ban them from employment contracts for doctors."
David	"Dear FTC: I support the rule to end all do not compete clauses in employment. Iam a Wisconsin physician with over 17 years of experience in my specialty. The Wisconsin Medical Society, of which I am a member, also opposes do not compete clauses. Back when I competed my specialty training and sought employment, all my perspective employers required a do not compete clause as a condition of employment. Today, in almost all specialties, all physicians that I am aware of are required to sign these agreements. I have 13 years of training beyond high school. Like all the physicians I know, my employer never paid for any of the financial or opportunity cost of my training These agreements, commonly referred to as restrictive covenants, seem to be written for the primary purpose to limit the physician's employment opportunities, rather than any real protection of the employer. They are made with broad radius and significant year restrictions. If a physician desires a new position of employment, physicians either face loosing significant time with their family in long impractical commutes, or face having to leave the community in where they live. The net effect is if you like where you live, you have to accept the work conditions your employer mandates. Most of the physicians who I have known who left their employer ultimately moved out of their community, many frequently out of state. Sadly, almost all of them enjoyed the community in which they lived. More disheartening, some experienced physicians facing the same dilemma chose

	early retirement. They gave up practicing medicine rather than move from their home communities. Their experience cannot easily be replaced. Their value to their patients now is permanently, prematurely lost. For most of our new physicians graduating from residency, they face one chance to effectively pick where they want to work in the community of where they want to live. This is wrong. Currently almost all health care companies do not market individual physicians, they market their brand. Their brand is not affected by which physicians are hired or retained. Their patient populations also would not be threatened if physicians did not have restrictive covenants. In addition, most patients now select health care organizations primarily based on who is covered by their insurance. Patients do not select their insurance based upon which physicians are covered. Eliminating do not compete clauses will not affect the ability for these organizations to significantly retain their patients. It will however, significantly affect how they relate to their physicians. Most physicians I know who left their employer did it because of their work conditions and not their pay. By giving physicians more freedom in employment, you will increase their voice, decrease physician burn out, and minimize early retirement. Most importantly with a reduction in physician burn out and early retirement, this will expand physician access and ultimately improve patient care. I feel do not compete agreements are wrong in my industry. I am sure the same situation applies to other industries. People are more effective working in a job that they want to be at, rather than a job they feel they have to be at. If an employee becomes valuable to an organization, the solution is not a preemptive limit on their work freedom, but rather to improve their work conditions. Do not complete agreements need to be eliminated. Thank you for your courageous stand."
Mason	"§ 910.1 Definitions (b) (2) "Functional test for whether a contractual term is a non-compete clause" should be amended and broadened so that its second sentence includes language to the effect of: "The term non-compete clause includes a contractual term that is a de facto non-compete clause because it has the effect of prohibiting the worker from seeking or accepting employment or executing job duties associated with employment with a person or operating a business after the conclusion of the worker's employment with the employer." It is important to include a direct reference to language to the effect of, "or executing job duties associated with employment" or else this rule will be immediately and completely circumvented via a contractual provision already in place and used to enforce non-compete clauses at Epic Systems Corporation. I have no doubt that similar companies would also adopt similar language to prevent their employees from achieving employment in their field of work. Background: I am a former employee of Epic Systems Corporation ("Epic"), based in Madison, WI, which requires all employees to sign a non-compete clause when they begin working. Their non-compete clause prevents employees from seeking employment at their competitors. My role at Epic was as a software developer working on improving a narrow aspect of their scheduling software. Epic's non-compete requires that former employees do not work at a list of their competitors. This list has thousands of entries, and includes many of the large, high paying companies in the healthcare software industry. The contract also prevents former employees from working for their customers. Epic's market share is so large that this precludes working at all large hospital systems in the United States. I have

	attached an old version of this list. I believe that this non-compete: * Substantially and adversely affects the ability of former Epic employees to be employed at the market value of their skills and services * Forces former Epic employees into work outside of the healthcare industry, where their previous work experience is less relevant Epic Systems Corporation employs at least two different strategies to force employees to abide by its non-compete. First, they require new employees to sign the non-compete clause for a term of 1 year after the last date of employment, and extend the clause to two years if they receive stock. In practical terms, the combination of a one or two year lock-out from any medical software consulting company, or any direct competitor, is a death knell for the former employee's career for one or two years. Many former employees have discussed "waiting out" the non-compete in less lucrative fields. The second, and more pernicious strategy, is that Epic has signed contracts with their customers, as well as with any consulting companies who work with their customers, which prohibit those companies from employing former Epic employees. Epic enforces this contractual agreement by not giving former employees access to key pieces of job functionality for their (potential) new role working for their customer. They do this by restricting "UserWeb" access. Without UserWeb access, employee's ability to perform job tasks in Epic-related hospital IT is degraded to the point where they are unemployable by these organizations. It is essential that any rule which is adopted contains language preventing a former employer from enforcing contracts with their customers which disallow customers to hire their former employees. It is also essential that any rule which is adopted contains language preventing a former employer from discriminating against their customer's employees on the basis of their previous employment status with that former employer."
Jack	"My SO quit her job in the medical tech field recently due to the insane stress and the workload her employer put on her, she loves the field but just didn't fit with that employer. Now that she has quit she is essentially being forced to seek jobs outside the field she has experience and real talent in which makes the job search feel purposeless and hopeless. The FTC should ban noncompetes to allow greater economic freedom for Americans and stop corporations from hurting their ex-employees. Caving to corporate lobbyists on this issue would be cowardly and explicitly anti-american which I guess wouldnt be a great shock to witness but I have hope that the folks at the FTC can do better for Americans."
Linda	"It is not fair that only physicians have a non-compete clause."
Kris	"Please, please void noncompete clauses for the average American. You are the only way to balance the power that businesses hold over the lives of workers who are just getting by. We can't organize our way out of this power imbalance. Big businesses will pour money into opposition here because they are benefitting so much from the status quo, at worker expense. Please stand up for the American worker and do not bow to their pressure."
Vineet	"Comment: I as a physician strongly support the ban on non compete clause as proposed by the FTC. This ban is essential for a physician to practice medicine as it should be practiced in the interest of the patients rather than of the corporations and hospitals. The opposition to this ban is motivated by the greed and need of the hospital groups to dominate the market and control the physicians. Non-profit hospitals should not be exempt from this ban."

Shaina	"Please remove non-competes - they make it extremely difficult for workers to get jobs for long stretches of time. This can halt someone's career if they are specialized in a field, forcing them to take lower paying jobs while waiting out the term and stalling career growth. Laws should support the rights of citizens and workers, who vastly outnumber the few corporations who put this in place. Please take the right call for your family, friends, and neighbours, not for a corporate lobbyist."
chris	"I support the FTC position to eliminate non-competes. I work for a large health care system and the non-compete prevents market wages and breeds poor treatment."
Dustin	"I am strongly in favor of your proposed ban on non-competes. As a physician in a rural underserved area, I would have to leave for two years and come back if I leave my current employer. Not only is this harmful to me and my career; it is unethical and harmful to patients. Non-competes are morally and ethically bankrupt, especially in the field of medicine. Please eradicate this anti-competitive and harmful practice."
Greg	"As an independent physician specialist of 25 years, I would appeal to the emotions of patients who read this and agree that our profession is less patient-focused, more institutionalized, and increasingly hurried in our encounters with you. This is not what we envisioned when we were in our 20's and were starting medical school. The attached graph summarizes in a single slide how physician income has eroded relative to the consumer price index by 46% in the past two decades while hospital income continues to surpass CPI each year. Physicians now routinely start practicing medicine in a large health system for economic reasons. For those physicians wishing to branch out and provide the individualized care of year's past, non-competes prevent this transition without uprooting one's family. I am fortunate to have a supportive community that valued my services straight out of medical training and has allowed me to practice independently my entire career. Were I entering practice today, I would likely find myself in the non-compete bind that I read in others' comments. I support the FTC's action and hope that coordinated action by CMS economically re-incentivizes physicians to branch out and provide the type of high quality, consumer focused care we expect from other sectors. Attachments Physician vs hospital wage growth"
Kris	"I am a physician in rural Wisconsin and have been here for over 20 years. This is typical for physicians in small towns. My colleagues and I are forced to accept whatever contract our multi-state employer provides or uproot our families. Please stop the non compete clause in labor contracts."

Karla	"I strongly support outlawing non-compete clauses, or at least greatly limiting their use and scope. I am a radiologist, and most radiologist positions require signing a non-compete clause. Radiologists do not have their own patients, and thus cannot offer competition to a practice if they leave and join another practice even if it is physically nearby. My current contract does not allow me to practice within 20 miles of any hospital where I currently offer services for 1 year, which would greatly limit my ability to take another job in the city where I live, work, and have family and friends. These non-compete clauses are ridiculous and do not benefit working people."
Matthew	"In a US healthcare crisis that was predicted in 2000, we anticipated a shortage of physicians. What those forecasts didn't account for was physicians leaving healthcare due to dissatisfaction. To put in your 10,000 hours to master a skill and then be told by an administrator that you can't do it the way you want or use the implant you feel is best for your patient because another one is cheaper is insulting and has pushed physicians away from field. I'm in my early 40s and very few of my colleagues are happy with their employer, yet they are trapped. They are not paid "fair market value" because they can't leave, without relocating their families. If skilled or excellent physicians were viewed as an asset to an organization as opposed to as locked in, there would be reason to improve workplace settings and actually strive for engagement that would ultimately result in optimal patient care."
Blossom	"It is time to ban the non-compete clause. This clause is an archaic method to stifle free-enterprise and skews capitalism to favor big business. It means our family would have to move far away of my husband tried to leave his current place of employment."
Renee	"The non compete needs to end. As a physician who has given up a large portion of her adult life to educating and training myself to be able to care for people it is absolutely disheartening that in order to change to another host Paul system or practice we have to completely uproot our families to do so. Being a child to a physician parent is difficult enough the way it is (long hours, can't be involved in extracurriculars due to scheduling) that it is heart breaking to think my kids would have to be uprooted if I need to change jobs. In addition the way the system is set for us it allows hospital systems to take advantage of us and we have to put up with a lot because they know we won't leave because of the detrimental effect this has in our family. Physician burnout and suicide rates are high. This definitely contributes."
Joanna	"I am fully in support of a comprehensive ban on non-complete clauses, and strongly advocate that this must include a ban on non-competes for physicians. Other clauses such as non-solicitation clauses and non-disclosure agreements are more than adequate to protect business interests for these organizations. As medicine becomes more complex, the medical field is becoming increasingly run by large organizations and the voice of the physician caring for the patient is completely stifled. The average physician no longer has much power to advocate for productive change to help patients, reduce costs, improve safety, and reduce

	bum out. Non-competes for physicians have allowed these negative changes to get worse each year. My experience has been that for physicians, non-compete clauses are almost never able to be negotiated. Once signed, health care professionals that would like to work elsewhere must either upend their entire family, including children and spouses, leave medicine entirely or continue to work within an organization that is not right for them, an organization that may not listen to their input on how the organization should be improved. Based on the published literature, these non-competes lead to significant disparities for women, those with lower income, and minorities. They are especially harmful to young professionals who do not have the means to fight them in court. Health care is run by massive organizations who have the power to bury those who fight these non-competes in legal costs, whether they are appropriate or not and so physicians are bullied into complying with them. Not only does this stifle wages, but it prevents physicians from having a voice within the organization to promote change to better patient care, leading to worse patient outcomes and higher costs for patients. This is especially difficult for families with children and professionals who have partners who are also working as they often cannot move their whole family to pursue a different career path. I would urge the FTC not to omit health care professionals, including physicians, from this ban. This would be harmful to health care in this country."
	"To the FTC, Hello, my name is I live in , am 45 years old, and have been in sales all of my life. For the last 16 years, I have worked for a large marketing firm as an Account Manager building a book of business for them. My business has now grown to nearly $1.2 million in annual revenue. For the most part, they have been very good to me, but as I see it, there are flaws within the business model that I have no control over. These flaws can (& do) create health problems related to extremely high stress levels and over exertion just trying to keep up. Let me explain further. When trying to grow a book of business from the ground up, it's like running on a treadmill. We start out slow. As that business grows, due to the increased amount of client retention work it requires, the treadmill starts moving faster and we lose more time in our day that used to be used for prospecting new accounts. With 16 years of growth, today, I manage a very large book of business. Thus, my treadmill has been running VERY fast over the last few years helping my clients achieve their goals. However, in my corporate America position, no matter how big my book of business gets, I am still always required to sell a certain amount of new accounts every month. As you may assume, when you take and add all these new accounts onto an existing business of my size, the treadmill gets kicked up to max speed. Now when I have a few bad months where I don't maintain my new business quotas, the commission structure on my ENTIRE book of business is drastically slashed down to what we call Base Commission. Unless you're still at home living for free with your parents, this base pay is nearly impossible to live off of. The pay scale is structured to reward top performers, not mediocre performances. On the other hand, when your business is firing on all cylinders above quotas (new accounts, client retention, client increases, etc), they pay us very aggressively. Can you see the problem here? The carrot is always dangled out in front of the horse to run faster and faster and faster until the horse collapses and then from over exerting itself. This would be me running on the treadmill at max capacity for years. Like most others, my finances are all based upon the monthly reoccurring income I have built up. To have my income slashed when new business requirements are not met hurts my family, but if I don't tend to all my accounts that already invest with me, well, that hurts my family too. Why not just change jobs? Well, considering all of my experience is within this industry and I have created a healthy income stream for myself through it, it's not that easy... Unless non-compete orders are removed. You see, at some point, something's gotta give because I can't keep doing this. I'm beginning to bum out at the pace I am currently going at so this needs to slow down or I'm going to find myself with work induced medical & health problems like stress, anxiety, and depression issues. However, if I don't keep up with my new business requirements, I am then written up and eventually let go. With a non-compete in place, I am stuck in the middle with no way out. To be clear, it's not that my company is bad in any way, it's just the sales model is geared to increase company profits at the expense of running a person till they're ragged. I have no way of changing their sales model. Upon hearing of this proposed change, I immediately felt a small glimmer of hope. A hope that if non-compete orders are eliminated at a National level, there may be some light at the end of the tunnel for me. An opportunity to maintain some of my relationships that I have cultivated over the years and bring them with me to a place where pace can be dictated at what best fits my life at that time. Removing non-competes would also promote entrepreneurship, something our country was founded on. In summary, if non-compete agreements are eliminated (or modified to only protect a companies intellectual property, trade secrets, and proprietary information), this would promote companies to restructure their commission schedules in fair ways that stop holding our incomes hostage to their quotas. If they are forced to value us for what we have brought (& continue to bring) to the table, we would be treated with more respect and appreciated more for our work, even during our rough patches that life brings to everyone. Please consider my thoughts when making a decision on this important law. Constituent Support for the FTC's Noncompete Rule

Wyoming | Statewide Impact

On April 23, 2024, the Federal Trade Commission issued a final rule to promote competition by banning noncompetes nationwide, protecting the fundamental freedom of workers to change jobs, increasing innovation, and fostering new business formation. The FTC estimates that the final rule will result in 8,500 more new businesses each year, and $400-488 billion in increased wages over the next decade, including for Wyoming:

Wyoming Covered Workers	Increase in Total Annual WY Worker Earnings	Increase in WY Average Annual Worker Earnings
217,787	$108,650,236	$499

Estimated Increases in Total Annual and Average Worker Earnings by State \(ftc.gov\)

	"Since competition is so good for our democracy we should have companies compete for workers. Non-competitive clauses reduce competition so I support restricting them." -Joan Pye
	"I am writing to support the banning of non-compete clauses in employment contracts. Since I have not been subject to any non-compete clauses, I have been allowed the freedom to move across the country, and change jobs several times. This has vastly expanded my employment and professional development opportunities, and I can imagine I would feel extremely resentful if I were stuck in the same job instead of having the freedom to change employment at will. It is unfair that businesses are forcing these noncompete clauses on employees, and they significantly reduces employee freedom. Businesses should be ashamed for pushing these clauses on more and more workers. Please vote to ban non-compete clauses!" -Amy Patterson
	"I agree with this rule. Working in [rural] America, there are many companies, especially energy companies, that require all employees to sign noncompete agreements. The agreements make it to where if you leave employment you would have to move several hundred miles away or to a different state to work in the same field. I also support revoking existing non-compete clauses." -Yvonne A.
	"Noncompete clauses do not safeguard business interest or improve patient care. Enforced noncomplete clauses allow business to be bullies, tear families apart, force employees to move to other states, or spend an entire year of salary on attorney fees to successfully fight the noncompete in court." -Robin Sproule
	"I've been required to sign a noncompete multiple times, they really don't do anything besides stagnate wages and prevent workers from having the freedom to seek better jobs. Competition is healthy, I support banning non competes." -Chris Jeremiah

"Please stop 'noncompete' clauses/options in employment contracts. They are unfair to the vast majority of workers [who are] coerced, forced or ignorant when signing said contracts. When initially used, they were intended to limit a select few employees. They are now abusively used against common people, often with little financial means to counter them. Outlaw 'noncompetes!'"
